Senator PEPPER. And you also have some concern for the "numerosity," which may be a questionable word, of the various organizations which are outside, directly, the United Nations Charter. You have some concern lest the total effect, although unintended, of those various circumlocutions or collateral arrangements may be to weaken confidence and support upon the United Nations Charter and the United Nations Organization.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Exactly, sir; yes.

Senator PEPPER. Now, first, if there were no article 3 in the North Atlantic Treaty, and no article 9, would you find in that treaty anything contradictory to the obligations which the members of the United Nations have already assumed? If articles 3 and 9 were not in the treaty, would you find anything in it that in any way appears out of harmony or in any way out of accord with the obligations that the members of the United Nations Organization have already assumed?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Well, we see something of a danger in article 4, which states [reading]:

The Parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the Parties is threatened.

The danger is that the scope of their consultations is not restricted.

NEW OBLIGATIONS ASSUMED UNDER THE TREATY

Senator PEPPER. Include, then, articles 3, 4, and 9. In other words, is it not already an obligation assumed by the members of the United Nations that they will aid in the preservation of the independence and security of all members of that organization?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, sir; it definitely is.

Senator PEPPER. If any nation in the world by armed force were to invade another nation, at least a nation that is a member of the United Nations Organization, do you not regard it as the obligation of all the members of the United Nations Organization to go to the defense of that victim of aggression by arms?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes; I think it is a definite obligation.

Senator PEPPER. And you think that is what the Secretary of State and the President said, and intended to say, in the statements that you have quoted in your statement?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is right.

Senator PEPPER. So that if we merely say that we of the North Atlantic community will agree that an attack upon one member of that community is an attack upon the security of all, and the ones not directly attacked will go to the defense of the victim of the aggression, that is no new obligation that we are assuming.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. No new obligation, but an obligation more explicitly defined.

Senator PEPPER. More explicitly, no doubt, and having possibly a psychological effect, in the general opinion that it will be in the interest of peace.

THE TREATY AND THE UNITED NATIONS

But your fear is that the degree to which articles 3 and 4 and 9 are implemented may carry this obligation we already have to the point of creating a new entity which will take on a new character and, in effect, if not by design, be out of harmony with, if not in opposition to, the scheme and intention and effect of the United Nations Organization.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes. I am in total agreement with that.

Senator PEPPER. As Senator Austin said, as you quoted in your statement, the way we carry out the treaty will determine what it shall become. If overemphasis is not put upon articles 3, 4, and 9, it is possible, is it not, that the existence of this firm and additional agreement or accord to the Atlantic community may create the equilibrium of force, may create the sense of security, that may make it possible again for the United Nations Organization to resume the role that it was intended to occupy in keeping with peace and promoting the welfare of the world, may it not?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is our hope, and we think there is a real chance of that.

Senator PEPPER. In the one case, if it be regarded that there are those who are potential aggressors, their aggression might be thwarted, and if there be those overly excited, their concerns might be allayed, so that there might come about that general reestablishment of equilibrium which might permit the United Nations to go ahead again as the real hope of the world for peace and for profit.

So your admonition to us and to the Government, if this treaty is ratified, is to be overzealous in not taking advantage of the technical authority that articles 3, 4, and 9 may give them, to create something which in fact and insubstance will undermine and weaken the United Nations Organization?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes.

Senator PEPPER. One last question: If we set up these regional organizations, and again I am using them separately as a geographical group of nations in the same geographical area, would you not regard it that somewhere in the distant future, after perhaps going through another valley of travail, we would have to come right back again to where we were at San Francisco in 1945, and set up again, or reestablish, an international organization designed to prevent the aggression and to keep peace through collective security? In other words, have we not got to rely eventually upon collective security and not regional pacts or national strength for a lawful and an orderly world?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, absolutely.

Senator PEPPER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator McMahon?

Senator McMAHON. I have no questions.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much, Mr. Schwebel.

Mr. James P. Warburg, of New York City.

STATEMENT OF JAMES P. WARBURG, NEW YORK CITY

Mr. WARBURG. Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to express my grateful appreciation to you and to the members of this committee for the opportunity to testify on the important and far-reaching proposal now before you. I speak for no group or organization, but merely as one citizen anxious for the safety and welfare of our country. I am neither a lawyer nor a military expert. Such competence as I may possess derives merely from practical experience in international affairs—as a banker, as a public servant, and as a free-lance observer and reporter. I can say that I have for many years diligently studied the problems of American foreign policy, and that I have given particular attention to the twofold proposal now under consideration, ever since its outlines first emerged into public view. Your own far greater knowledge and experience will enable you to detect any fallacies which may underlie the opinions I shall venture to express.

The Atlantic Security Pact and the program to rearm western Europe must, I think, be considered together. The forthright testimony of the Secretary of State has made it clear that the treaty is the consequence rather than the cause of the rearmament program launched by the Brussels Treaty Powers on March 14, 1948, and endorsed on the same day by President Truman.

CONTAINMENT OF RUSSIA

I should like first to say a word about the context of this twofold proposal. It springs from a policy which should, in my opinion, go down in history as the Churchill doctrine, instead of being associated with the name of our President. This policy rests upon the theory, advanced by Mr. Churchill at Fulton, Mo., in March 1946 that the Soviet Union alone is responsible for the world crisis and that the Soviet threat to peace is essentially a threat of physical conquest. From this theory derived the policy of seeking to contain the Soviet threat within a physical frontier manned by physical force. This essentially negative approach to peace has become one of the two major trends in our present foreign policy. The other positive trend is the plan developed by President Truman and Secretary Marshall to attack the causes of mass discontent which invite communist exploitation.

My own belief has been that the present world crisis derives from a number of factors, some of which are the products of the time in which we live and have nothing whatever to do with the nature or intentions of the Soviet Union; that, in addition to these non-Russian factors, there has been, and is, a very definite Soviet threat to peace; but that this Soviet threat has been, and still is, primarily a threat of Communist penetration or subversion and only secondarily a threat of military conquest.

Holding this belief, I have been an enthusiastic supporter of the Marshall Plan and a persistent critic of the doctrine of physical containment. For the past two years, I have viewed with increasing misgivings the ever greater preemption of our energies and resources by the negative and not very successful policy of strategic containment and the consequent slow strangulation of our positive program.

In terms of dollars the ratio now stands at about three and a half to one. We are now spending less than $6,000,000,000 a year on our constructive program for peace. At the same time we are insuring ourselves against the failure of that program to the tune of more than $18,000,000,000.

This anomaly results, I think, from two basic misconceptions: First, the oversimplified scapegoat analysis of the world crisis; and, second, the widespread acceptance of a very dubious analogy to the Nazi design of military conquest. Our obsession with these two misconceptions blinds us to those aspects of the world crisis which have nothing to do with Russia or communism. and, at the same time, prevents us from seeing the true nature of the Russian or communist menace.

POSITIVE APPROACH TO RUSSIA

If we could shake off this obsession, I believe that two things might happen.

First, we might recognize that the way to stop Russian is to stop letting Russia make our foreign policy; in other words, we might see that Soviet expansionism can best be halted as the by-products of a constructive American policy for peace.

Second, we might change our attitude about the United Nations. Instead of sadly shaking our heads over an impotent debating society and consoling ourselves with the easy notion that the United Nations would work, if only the Russians would let it work, we might set out to make the United Nations into an organization capable of enacting and enforcing world law. Were we to set out to do this, we should, of course, encounter Soviet opposition. But it would be Soviet opposition to a constructive program of peacefully uniting a divided world, in which we should enjoy far greater and more effective support from the peoples of the world than we can ever hope to muster in the present sterile and highly dangerous power struggle.

So much for the context of the Atlantic security program. I am prepared to amplify these few remarks, if time permits and the committee so desires. Given this context, which cannot be changed overnight, it seems to me that the twofold North Atlantic security program must be examined from the point of view of its efficacy as an instrument in our present policy. I shall now state my position from this narrower point of view as quickly and as precisely as I can.

ADVOCACY OF ATLANTIC TREATY

So long as we live in a world of international anarchy dominated by a power struggle between the two halves of a divided world, I am in favor of any declaration which makes it clear to ourselves and to others that a physical attack upon western Europe is an attack upon us, and will be so regarded by us. I have spent most of my adult life fighting the isolationist illusion. I supported our entrance into the League of Nations and opposed the neutrality acts. When western Europe was faced by the threat of Nazi conquest, I was horrified by our connivance in the so-called peace of Munich and, shortly thereafter, publicly advocated an open military alliance with Britain, France, and the Low Countries as the only hope of preventing the outbreak of World War II. I do not object to such an alliance now, provided that it does not take our eyes off the real danger—which is now not military but political—and provided that we do not fool either ourselves or our friends about what we are doing.

PRETENSES IN TREATY

We are fooling ourselves, I think, when we try to clothe this treaty in moral garments. To say that all the signatories are united by a common heritage of ethical belief and democratic conviction seems to me a dubious statement about large segments of the French, Dutch, Belgian, and Italian populations which willingly collaborated with and lived quite contentedly under fascism. It seems a dubious statement about any country in which 25 percent of the people are today Communists, or about any country whose government seeks to deny democratic freedom to colonial peoples. This moral pretense becomes a complete mockery when Portugal is one of the signatories and when flirtatious eyes are cast at Franco Spain.

Likewise I think we are fooling ourselves when we maintain that we are undertaking this program in order to strengthen the United Nations, when it is clear that we are trying to find a means of filling the gap left by the failure of the United Nations.

These two polite hypocrisies seem to me to weaken our undertaking. I do not think they are vitally important because I do not believe that the American people take either pretense very seriously. There is, however, one respect in which I am afraid that some one is being seriously and dangerously led astray. In what is perhaps the most important aspect of the twofold proposal, I believe that either the American people do not realize what is afoot, or else our friends abroad are under a most regrettable misapprehension.

SECURING WESTERN EUROPE FROM ATTACK

From what I myself heard in Europe recently and from the published utterances of foreign officials, it seems clear that our friends abroad expect the new program to secure the frontiers of western Europe against invasion by the Soviet Union. They are not interested in the promise of another liberation from enemy occupation. "Next time," said Premier Quenille of France, "you would be liberating a corpse."

To secure the frontiers of western Europe means to hold an invading Russian army at the Oder, or the Elbe, or—at the very worst—at the Rhine. Being no military expert, I have tried to find out what military experts think this undertaking would require. The impression I have gathered, here and abroad, is that there would have to be created in western Europe a ground force of at least 40 fully equipped and highly mobile divisions and that such a ground army would have to be supported by great tactical and strategic air power by fully functioning services of supply and by adequately protected sea communications with the Western Hemisphere. To say that it would take at least $10,000,000,000 and a million men under arms to secure the frontiers of western Europe against invasion is probably a gross understatement.

Assuming that we were to supply all the money and equipment—assuming that, in the event of war, we undertook to provide much of the needed air power and the protection of the sea lanes—there would still remain the question of trained and mobilized manpower to secure the west European frontier. So far as I know, there are only three sources from which this manpower can be drawn: Western Europe itself, western Germany, or the United States.

SOURCES OF MANPOWER NEEDED TO SECURE EUROPE

Western Europe as a whole is suffering from a shortage of manpower, which at present is one of the chief obstacles to recovery. Italy is the only country which has a manpower surplus, but Italy cannot be rearmed without violating the Italian peace treaty. If a million men are withdrawn for military service from the farms and factories of France and the other European signatories, the recovery effort will come to a standstill and the door will be opened wide to Communist subversion or penetration.

If military manpower were to be recruited in western Germany, it is clear, I think, that two things would happen: Russian retaliation would be provoked, and the already dubious morale of any potential French Army would be destroyed. I say "the already dubious morale" because we cannot ignore the fact that, with 25 percent of France voting Communist, the Russians have a far more dangerous fifth column in France today than the Nazis had in 1940.

That leaves the United States, and perhaps Canada, as a source of the necessary manpower. A former French Prime Minister has been making speeches in this country recently urging that we send a large American force to Europe now to stand guard over its frontier. However, even if we were prepared to do that, it is necessary to bear in mind that, in spite of our huge military budget of $15,000,000,000 a year, we have at present a combat force of only about 10 divisions.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE OR EUROPEAN RECOVERY

It would seem clear, then, that if the Atlantic security program means what our European friends think it means, either western European recovery will have to be halted in its tracks, or else the United States will have to undertake a vastly greater commitment than the American people realize today. Halting the European recovery program means that we shall have to face the necessity of increased and indefinitely prolonged Marshall plan assistance, or else throw open the door to Communist penetration at the very moment when it has been almost locked by patient and costly effort.

If the Atlantic security program is intended to mean that we are to secure the frontiers of western Europe against invasion, then the presently proposed $1,130,000,000 is merely the first bite at a very much larger commitment. It costs something like $250,000,000 to equip one armored division. I do not know what it would cost to create a force of 40 divisions—either European or American—in Europe. But, whatever it costs, this would again be only the beginning, because we could hardly assume that the Russians would sit still on their side of the iron curtain while we proceed in a leisurely manner to build up a defense capable of holding their presently available striking force. Actually, all the Russians would have to do to double their present immediate striking power would be to bring up another 50 existing divisions from wherever they are at present stationed in the Soviet Union. If they did that, our defense force would again have to be proportionately strengthened. And even this sort of calculation would work out satisfactorily, only if the Russians did not hit upon the bright idea that maybe they had better get the whole thing over with before we had built up any defense at all.

These seem to me the facts to be faced, if we are talking about securing the west European frontier against invasion.

If, on the other hand, we are not undertaking to do what our friends think we are doing, what is the point of diverting European manpower and resources from recovery to rearmament? What good will it do to build half a defense force? Twenty divisions are no better than the 10 or 12 which exist in western Europe today, if it takes 40 to do the job. Surely, it is folly to think that the French, or the Dutch, or the Belgians would fight a delaying action for the benefit of Britain and the United States, if they knew in advance that their countries would be overrun and occupied. Surely it is folly to weaken our own military strength by putting some of our stock of weapons in the hands of troops who—in the event of war—would be forced to surrender them to the invader.

NEED FOR CLARIFICATION OF COMMITMENT UNDER TREATY

Before the treaty is ratified, Mr. Chairman, I think the American people have a right to know what it means. I think our friends abroad have a right to know what it means. Either we are, or we are not, undertaking to defend western Europe against invasion. If we are, let us not deceive ourselves about the costs or the risks involved. If we are not—if we are merely undertaking to deter invasion—let us not permit our friends to be deceived. Let us make clear to them what it is that we are promising to do.

Shortly after the treaty was signed, our Chief of Staff, General Bradley, made a speech, which I understand was cleared with the State Department, and in which I thought he clearly implied that our European friends were right in assuming that the frontiers of western Europe are now to be secured against invasion in the event of war. On April 27, the Secretary of State himself said to this committee [reading]:

It is understandable that the free nations of western Europe cannot look forward with equanimity to invasion and occupation in the event of war, even if we guarantee subsequently to liberate them. Nor is it to our own interest to permit them to be occupied with the consequent necessity of the costly liberation of these areas.

CONFLICTING COMMITMENTS

On the same day, according to the New York Times, the Secretary of State told this committee in response to a question that "there was absolutely no intention to send substantial numbers of American troops to Europe in any eventuality short of war." In response to another question he is reported to have said that "there was no thought of bringing western Germany into the alliance." And, finally, speaking of the proposed American subsidy of $1,130,000,000 to west European rearmament, Mr. Acheson is reported to have stated that "the countries to be aided would themselves put up from six to seven times what the United States provided."

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that these statements add up to the conclusion that the western European signatories are to provide all the manpower and roughly 85 percent of the material resources required to secure the frontiers of western Europe against invasion. I am unable to reconcile this conclusion with the repeated assurance given by the State Department that rearmament is not to take precedence over or interfere with west European recovery. I fear that the Secretary of State for whose integrity, wisdom, skill, and courage I have the greatest respect and admiration, has fallen heir to an unclear position not of his own making and is, to a certain extent, its prisoner.

CLARIFICATION OF TREATY BY SENATE

In these circumstances it seems to me that precisely the sort of occasion has arisen when the Senate, in the fulfillment of its constitutional duties and prerogatives, is in a position to help the President and the Secretary of State in their patient pursuit of peace, by bringing about a clarification of the proposal.

Two kinds of clarification are possible.

The first would establish that the twofold program means our participation in a determined effort to defend western Europe's frontiers in the event of war.

The second would establish that we are undertaking to make our utmost effort to deter a would-be aggressor from attacking western Europe, but that, if this effort should fail, we are committed to avenge and liberate, but not necessarily to prevent invasion.

In the event of the first alternative, I would feel compelled—if I had a vote—to cast it against the ratification of the treaty. I would do so most reluctantly, knowing that, in the present circumstances, our failure to ratify would involve grave risks. Yet I would feel that these risks were not as serious as those involved in the attempt to erect a dubious defense against what I conceive to be the secondary danger of military attack, at the price of weakening western Europe's defenses against what I conceive to be the primary danger—namely, the threat of Communist penetration through exploitation of economic distress and political instability.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the wisdom of the Senate will lead to a clarification of the twofold program in the opposite sense. Such a clarification would rest upon the recognition that the only effective way to protect western Europe against military invasion is to prevent the outbreak of war. Were this premise accepted, a clarifying statement might take approximately the following form [reading]:

1. The treaty means that the United States recognizes that it has a vital interest in the security of western Europe and that it will fight, if necessary, to maintain that security.

2. The treaty means that the United States serves notice upon any potential aggressor that military attack upon western Europe means war with the United States.

3. The treaty implies that, so long as no effective supranational peace-enforcement machinery is established, the United States will do its utmost to maintain sufficient military power to make it apparent to a potential aggressor that any attempt at military conquest of western Europe is foredoomed to failure.

4. If, in spite of the foregoing deterrents to aggression provided by the United States, an aggressor should nevertheless embark upon military adventure, the United States preserves full freedom of action to fight the aggressor in whatever manner, by whatever means, and in whatever theater or theaters of action it may deem expedient, in order to restore as rapidly as possible the security and freedom of the North Atlantic area.

If the treaty were thus clarified, I should be in favor of its ratification. I should even be in favor of a limited amount of military aid, designed primarily to enable the freely elected governments in western Europe to deal effectively with possible internal threats of violence, and to promote a greater feeling of self-respect and security. But I should stipulate that such military aid must not be given to governments which are not freely elected, and that it must not assume dimensions which would divert any of the nations of western Europe from their primary task for achieving economic health and political stability.

GEOGRAPHIC SCOPE OF TREATY

In voting for a program thus clarified, I should be well aware of certain defects in the treaty which, I am afraid, is now too late to remedy. By including Norway, the treaty pushes the declared area of our vital interest right up against the Soviet frontier at its northern extremity. At the same time, the treaty limits our commitment to certain countries of western Europe, leaving others—notably Finland, Sweden, Turkey, and Iran—unprotected. This seems to me inconsistent and unwise. In spite of these now probably irremediable defects, I would consider that the treaty has two offsetting virtues, provided that the whole program is clarified as suggested. These virtues are: First, that the treaty makes explicit to every American citizen a commitment which has long been implicit in our whole foreign policy; and, second, that it makes this commitment unequivocally clear as a warning to any would-be aggressor and as an encouragement to our friends.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that my recommendation is at least precise and clear. I am grateful for the opportunity to present it for the consideration of your committee.

Should you find merit in the suggestion I have ventured to place before you, you will, I believe, have cured the Atlantic security program of its most dangerous defect. This program may then well become a most useful stopgap device to buy the time in which a positive, constructive American program for peace may be developed. Its ultimate effectiveness as such a device will then be determined by what we do with the time gained, in Europe and in Asia—more specifically, in Germany and in the southeastern rim of the Asiatic Continent.

NECESSITY FOR CLARIFICATION

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Warburg, you condition your approval of the treaty upon the adoption of these suggestions which you advance as being clarifications; is that true?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless they are adopted you are not for the treaty?

Mr. WARBURG. Unless the treaty is clarified I think it is a highly dangerous instrument.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean clarified in the way you want to clarify it?

Mr. WARBURG. I do not mean it has to be in those particular words. I think it has to be made clear whether we are or are not undertaking to secure the frontiers of Europe against invasion.

The CHAIRMAN. In your first clarification you say [reading]:

The treaty means that the United States recognizes that it has a vital interest in the security of western Europe and that it will fight, if necessary, to maintain that security.

Does not the treaty do that?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why any clarification?

Mr. WARBURG. Because the impression abroad, and given I think with reason abroad because of the statements made here, is that it means more than that. It means we are undertaking to secure the frontiers of western Europe against invasion in the event of war.

The CHAIRMAN. You are for the treaty if they adopt this clarification, and the clarification to my mind is clearly expressed in the treaty already, so why clarify something that is already clear?

Mr. WARBURG. If it is in the treaty, sir, I do not know where to find it. I do not believe the treaty says anything about whether we defend or do not defend the frontiers of western Europe against invasion.

The CHAIRMAN. Your reservation does not even say that. You say [reading]:

It has a vital interest in the security of western Europe and that it will fight, if necessary, to maintain that security.

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct, but the essential part of my clarification is point 4.

The CHAIRMAN. I am just taking them one at a time. You have disposed of that satisfactorily. The second clarification is that the United States [reading]:

serves notice upon any potential aggressor that military attack upon western Europe means war with the United States.

Doesn't the treaty say that already?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why add a condition? We can't get your vote, now, unless we adopt section 2, which you say is already in the treaty.

Mr. WARBURG. Sections 1 and 2 are explicit in the treaty; section 3 is implicit in it. I did not want to state section 4 without putting in the context of the things we are doing.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not got to 4 yet. We cannot clarify it all according to your program with just one line. [Reading]:

3. The treaty implies that, so long as no effective, supranational peace-enforcement machinery is established, the United States will do its utmost to maintain sufficient military power to make it apparent to a potential aggressor that any attempt at military conquest of western Europe is foredoomed to failure.

Does not our program of national defense over here, of $15,000,000,000, and the language of that treaty, mean what you say in section 3?

Mr. WARBURG. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why the necessity for section 3?

Now [reading]:

4. If, in spite of the foregoing deterrents to aggression provided by the United States, an aggressor should nevertheless embark upon military adventure, the United States preserves full freedom of action to fight the aggressor in whatever manner, by whatever means, and in whatever theater or theaters of action it may deem expedient, in order to restore as rapidly as possible the security and freedom of the North Atlantic area.

Is there anything in the treaty that limits our rights to fight the war with any kind of weapons, whatever we may determine to, if we do enter war?

Mr. WARBURG. The whole point of my testimony, sir, is to emphasize the ambiguity which exists as to the meaning of the twofold program, the treaty and the rearmament of western Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. You have agreed that your first three clarifications have already been clarified. What is there in the treaty that conflicts at all with your condition No. 4?

Mr. WARBURG. Senator, it is not in the treaty at all. May I explain the reason for the first three clarifying statements? The essential point is point 4. If you pick out point 4 without the first three points, it could be interpreted as backing out of something we have said. I do not want to back out of the underlying commitment of the treaty at all, and in order to say 4, I think you have to say 1, 2, and 3.

The CHAIRMAN. You have said 1, 2, and 3. That is already in the treaty. What is there in your point 4 that is contrary to what the treaty says?

Mr. WARBURG. There is nothing that is contrary to what the treaty says.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what we are dealing with. We are dealing with the treaty, are we not?

Mr. WARBURG. We are dealing with what people think the treaty means here and abroad.

The CHAIRMAN. We are dealing with the treaty. We do not go out on the street and ask every fellow we meet what he thinks of the treaty.

Mr. WARBURG. May I document the point by giving you some quotations from testimony made here?

The CHAIRMAN. We know what testimony has been made. I can't see the strength of your No. 4, when you are negatively saying that we are going to fight, if we do fight, with all the means that we may employ. That goes without saying. If we have a war, we are going to fight with the weapons we have and can get.

SECURING EUROPE AGAINST INVASION

Mr. WARBURG. It makes it clear that we are not necessarily undertaking to defend the frontiers of western Europe against invasion. That is not now clear, and the Secretary of State testified to this committee in almost the same words as those of the French Prime Minister, saying that liberation was not good enough.

The CHAIRMAN. You have read the treaty?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that not make it clear?

Mr. WARBURG. It says we regard an attack on western Europe as an attack upon us. It does not say whether we will or will not do what the French think it does mean.

The CHAIRMAN. It is specifically provided in the treaty that in that event we do whatever we deem necessary, whatever we deem necessary to restore the security of the North Atlantic area. That is in the treaty, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. If that is your interpretation, then I should not think you would object to my clarifying statement, because that is exactly what I think it should mean.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is already in the treaty, and clear, I do not see why we should adopt as a condition of ratification another bite at the same cherry.

All right, Senator Vandenberg. Take the witness.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Warburg, I find myself confronting something of a conundrum, as I think the chairman's questions have suggested in a preliminary way. It seems to me I can substantially accept your thesis. Certainly I agree with you that the only effective way to protect western Europe against military invasion is to prevent the outbreak of war, to stop it before it starts at all. I certainly agree with you, if I understand you correctly, that you think the great and real operative power of this treaty cannot be forces in being, but must be the potential force of the combined invincible resources of those who notify prospective aggressors of what they are up against.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. Well, we are in complete agreement in that thesis. And I am wondering whether the trouble we find ourselves in in understanding each other does not attach almost directly to the proposed military implementation program. If there was no military implementation program pending, would you find in the pact itself any of the fears you express?

CLARIFYING THE OBLIGATIONS UNDER ARTICLE III

Mr. WARBURG. No, I don't think I would, sir; but the fears I express arise from the sort of thing which has been said by General Bradley, and if you will pardon me for quoting this again, here is what Mr. Acheson said in response to a question from Senator Wiley [reading]:

They—

speaking of the European signatories—

say, "If there were a really serious all-out attack, we know that in the long run probably the great strength of the United States would in the end defeat the aggressor, but in the meantime we would be overrun. Most of us," they say, "would be dead. Our civilization would be pretty well destroyed. The final outcome would be that the United States would be liberating a corpse."

That is the Secretary of State to this committee. It is almost identical with a statement made by Premier Queuille when the treaty was under consideration. He used the same phrase, "You would be liberating a corpse."

Senator VANDENBERG. I understand there have been statements of interpretation abroad which do justify many of your comments, and interpretations with which, so far as I am concerned, I do not agree. I certainly concur in your thought that we must not permit our friends to be deceived. That would be the last possible crime we could commit.

But, Mr. Warburg, isn't about the only way we have left to test the reality of the hazards to which you refer to look at the actual military implementation program which is being suggested? And I ask you these questions with no commitment whatever to the military program myself. I reserve my own judgment in connection with it. But as you have clearly indicated in your statement, a military program of $1,000,000,000 could not possibly be any sort of a defense against invasion. Isn't that true?

Mr. WARBURG. Certainly.

Senator VANDENBERG. Well, then, why doesn't it follow that our program isn't one to prevent war, instead of one to prevent invasion?

Mr. WARBURG. Well, I think that in the absence of the other statements that would be a reasonable inference, but the statement I have just quoted, made by the Secretary of State, and the one I quoted earlier—those two statements mean to me that we recognize, as General Bradley said before, that it is not good enough to deter invasion, that it is not good enough to reliberate, that the next time we would be liberating a corpse. I can only read that to mean what the French think it means, namely, that we are undertaking to secure their frontiers against invasion in the event of war.

Senator VANDENBERG. If all of our treaty friends sit in together and agree tentatively on a military-aid program of $1,000,000,000, isn't it inevitable that they must understand that they are agreeing to a program which does not contemplate any attempted Maginot Line, or something of the sort? Must they not know at the very moment they confront that program? I am not arguing with you.

Mr. WARBURG. I do not know how much they know about what comes next after this first step in the program. So far as I know, there has been no public testimony of any sort on how the program develops.

Senator VANDENBERG. So far as I know, there is no information available. At any rate, I have no more than you have at that point. But I do have the general information that the preliminary implementation does not even contemplate any substantial increase in the numbers of their own troops. It merely apparently contemplates the effective, the more effective, arming of existing units and gearing them together on some sort of a basis which creates the united value instead of the diversive value.

Now, I cannot say to you that that is the program, because I do not know that it is. But assuming that that is the program, for the sake of the argument, would you not find that program substantially in line, even with your own asserted willingness to provide "a limited amount of military aid"?

Mr. WARBURG. For internal security?

Senator VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes; I would. Actually I believe, insofar as one can guess at the answer to an ambiguity, that the clarification I am suggesting merely states clearly what is intended, and if that is true, I think we should not take the risk of having a lot of people, particularly our friends, think it means something different.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think there is a great deal to be said for the importance of eliminating ambiguity.

In your fourth point, I assume that when you say "the United States preserves full freedom of action to fight the aggressor in whatever manner, by whatever means," and so forth, you are not undertaking to reserve any right not to do anything about it. You are merely preserving the right of the choice and time and method of doing it.

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct.

Senator VANDENBERG. Which, as I understand it, is precisely what we already do in the treaty. So that in the final analysis, unless the implementation program discloses something far different than the prospectus has indicated, it looks to me as though you and the committee were in substantial agreement.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Warburg, one other question before I turn you over to Senator Pepper.

PURPOSE OF THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Is not the chief value of the implement program, about which the details are not yet available, to give assurance to the European countries associated in the treaty of a sort of an earnest money payment, that we mean what we say in the treaty and that we show our good faith by granting this limited, very limited, aid, of $1,130,000,000? Is that not true?

Mr. WARBURG. I would not so interpret it, and I would not like to. I do not like to say that when we do something we have to put something on the table to prove that we mean it.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not object to reaffirming what you have already promised to do?

Mr. WARBURG. It depends on what I have promised to do.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you favor giving them a dollar or not?

Mr. WARBURG. What dollar?

The CHAIRMAN. Any dollar. Do you favor giving any military aid as implemented, or not?

Mr. WARBURG. In the first place, I think it is extremely dangerous to divert them from recovery to rearmament; with the proviso that that does not happen and with the proviso that such military aid as is given is primarily for the purpose of maintaining internal security on the part of freely elected governments, in which I do not include Portugal, then I see no harm in such a program.

The CHAIRMAN. You want to limit it to "internal." You do not want to fight the invader or repel the invader?

Mr. WARBURG. I did not say I did not want to fight the invader.

The CHAIRMAN. You said you wanted military aid limited to domestic purposes.

Mr. WARBURG. So long as we make it clear that what we are giving them military aid for is to stabilize their situation at home, and not to put them in a position to hold the Oder or the Elbe or the Rhine, I see no harm in it. But if we intend to put them in a position to hold the Oder or the Elbe or the Rhine, then by all means let's do what it takes to hold those lines. We are not going to do that with the present plans.

The CHAIRMAN. Your plan is to regulate their internal difficulties, and let the foreign situation take care of itself?

Mr. WARBURG. No, it is not to let the foreign situation take care of itself, sir. I think our job is to do two things. One is to deter aggression by making it clear that if any aggressor attacks our friends in western Europe, they are dealing with us at the start. I am for doing that. The second thing is, to help Europe lock the door against the primary danger, which is Communist penetration or subversion, by means of the Marshall plan.

The CHAIRMAN. Does not the treaty make clear your first point, that if there is an armed attack on any one of the nations signatory, we are in the picture from then on?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, but it is not clear whether or not we are in the picture with a commitment to defend the Oder line, or the Elbe, or the Rhine.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not go into detail. It does not tell whether we will shoot them with a particular kind of weapon or whether we will drop a bomb on them. That is a detail.

Mr. WARBURG. I do not think it is a detail from the point of view of a Frenchman whether his country is invaded and overrun or whether it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Frenchmen are parties to this treaty. They signed it and they accept it as it is written, and we accept it as it is written. And I think the French understand it very thoroughly. I remember when they were here and signed it, a lot of us had conversations with Mr. Schuman and others. They know what it is about. As already suggested, one of the primary purposes of the arms proposition is not to vastly increase their armed forces, not for the purpose of diverting anybody from productive activities under the Marshall plan, but to modernize their equipment of arms and things of that kind. That is what we are told is the purpose, and I think it is the purpose. And the fact that you made some statement about the Europeans spending five or six or seven times as much money as we do, that does not mean new money. It means they have a normal military budget. They may add to it—I do not know—but it is stated by the Secretary of State that their entire budgets for defense and military preparations would be about six or seven times as much as that of the United States contribution. Is that true?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Senator Pepper.

NEW COMMITMENTS UNDER THE TREATY

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Warburg, I will be interested to get your view as to what are the new elements which this proposed treaty brings into being, at the same time commending your desire to let everybody know what ye are doing. Looking at article 1 of the North Atlantic Treaty [reading]:

The Parties undertake, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

That is simply a reaffirmation of an obligation that all the members of the United Nations have assumed, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. Surely.

Senator PEPPER. So there is nothing new in that. Article 2 [reading]:

The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

Those are substantially and essentially also the general obligations of the nations who are members of the United Nations organization as particularly, for example, set forth in chapter IX of the United Nations Charter, and more specifically in article 56 of chapter IX, where [reading]:

All Members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action in cooperation with the Organization for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55— which are the general principles of a higher standard of living, full employment, conditions of economic and social progress and development, solution of international economic, social, health, and related problems, international cultural and educational cooperation, and universal respect for and observation of human rights, and fundamental freedom for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion. So there is nothing substantially new in article 2.

Now, article 3 [reading]:

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the Parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

Do you regard that as imposing a new obligation upon the members? Did they in the United Nations Charter assume the obligation separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, to maintain and develop individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack?

Mr. WARBURG. I am no lawyer, but I should think not. I should think this was new.

Senator PEPPER. I agree with you. In the United Nations Charter there is a machinery, there is a technique, provided for resisting armed aggression. There is a general obligation imposed upon the members to resist armed aggression. But I do not know of any affirmative obligation upon the members other than through the United Nations Organization to give continuous mutual aid and assistance to develop individual and collective capacity to resist attack.

Article 4 [reading]:

The Parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the Parties is threatened.

Do you know of any such obligation to consult among themselves in the United Nations under the Charter?

Mr. WARBURG. No; I do not.

Senator PEPPER. Article 5 [reading]:

The Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the Party or Parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other Parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

Do you regard that as imposing any substantially new obligation upon the members of the United Nations?

Mr. WARBURG. I do not consider myself competent to have a useful opinion on that, Senator. My feeling is that what we are proposing to do there is pretty much what was intended by the United Nations Charter. As to whether it comes under one paragraph or another I would not venture to express an opinion.

Senator PEPPER. It may reemphasize, and it may have certain practical advantages, but do you not regard it that if any members of the United Nations were attacked by armed force, by an aggressor nation, it would be the duty of the others to come to the aid of that party in the way they deem best?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

Senator PEPPER. And so on with the other provisions. I only read article 9 [reading]:

The Parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented, to consider matters concerning the implementation of this Treaty. The council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5.

Article 3 is the article on mutual aid; article 5 on collective resistance to an armed attack upon any member or members of the group.

Mr. WARBURG. That would seem to me something new which is made necessary by the failure of the United Nations.

SELF-HELP AND MUTUAL AID FOR SECURITY

Senator PEPPER. Your thought is that what we are establishing here is something in the nature of a vigilante until forces of law and order in the world can be substantially established in this getting together to resist any attack upon any member of the community.

Mr. WARBURG. If I may put it just a bit differently, I would say it is a resort to old-fashioned military alliances in a period in which the world is run on that kind of power politics.

Senator PEPPER. In other words, although you say you are not a lawyer, it is general knowledge that the citizen was entitled to the privilege of self-help until law and order came to the community to give him public protection and security.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

Senator PEPPER. And then, when we got public protection and security, we made it unlawful for men to carry pistols around in their pockets.

Mr. WARBURG. But the important point is that I think it does not follow that when you have this vigilante kind of protection, you necessarily come to law and order afterwards. You sometimes do and you sometimes do not.

Senator PEPPER. But the new matter is setting up a new organization with a solemn treaty obligation for continuing mutual aid, and with the establishment of a council to make recommendations as to how articles 3 and 5 shall be implemented.

COMMITMENTS UNDER ARTICLE 3

You say that language in the treaty, together with all that has been said or assumed, has given the impression to the other nations, at least to the European members of this community, that for all practical purposes we are taking over the responsibility of giving them a great volume of arms and military aid, and of becoming an integral part of a military organizations, a military defense?

Mr. WARBURG. I do not know whether they think it involves our giving them great quantities of arms or not. I think what they do think is that either by giving them great quantities of arms or by sending American troops over to do the job we are undertaking to secure them against a possible invasion.

Senator PEPPER. The Senate has been asked to vote upon the ratification. We are asked by the President to give our advice and consent to a proposed and recommended treaty, and we are primarily, of course, voting upon the treaty, which is written in the English language. And the instrument obviously is supposed to mean what it says. But I think it is wise to make it very clear that under articles 3 and 5 we do not propose to furnish either troops or an adequate amount of equipment to stop any potential aggressor at the borders of the European members of this Atlantic community that are parties to this treaty.

Mr. WARBURG. That is substantially correct. I would not put it in just those words, because I think that arouses unnecessary fear that we would not even try to do it. We might try to do it. All I am concerned with is that we do not promise to do it.

DECLARATION OF WAR

Senator PEPPER. It is clear to everybody that if anybody attacks with armed force any member of this group that we call the North Atlantic Treaty group, the United States of America, for all practical purposes, declares war against that aggressor, if it is an all-out armed attack?

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct.

Senator PEPPER. And that we here in Congress will vote for war?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

Senator PEPPER. That is clear to everybody. As a matter of fact we do it anyway, regardless of this treaty. We would do it because we did it once in 1917 and we did it again in 1941. We would do it again—

Mr. WARBURG. Except this time we do not wait for a couple of years to do it.

Senator PEPPER. That is right, and we are obligated to do it, in the opinion of most of us, under the obligations we have already assumed, and most of us do not regard that this treaty imposes any new obligation insofar as giving all-out aid to resist a war that might be started against any member of this community or any other members of the world community, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. WARBURG. So far as I am concerned, Senator, the substance of this treaty is merely an honest affirmation of what has been our policy for a long time.

ARTICLE 3 AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator PEPPER. I thoroughly agree, except in article 3, and there is a possible point of ambiguity that allows these people to have a difference, an honest difference, of opinion as to what they may expect from it.

If we are the ones that are expected to give the arms aid, and it is supposed to be in great volume, obviously we will have to be the one to determine the distribution of it, will we not?

Mr. WARBURG. I suppose so; yes.

Senator PEPPER. And in the final analysis, if we are the strongest member of the community, and the one furnishing the great volume of new equipment for all practical purposes, we would more or less be regarded as at the head of the table in this defense combination, would we not?

Mr. WARBURG. I should think so.

Senator PEPPER. And a military organization of necessity has to take on a certain degree of rigidity. I mean, you have to have planes somewhere, one type of plane somewhere, another type of plane somewhere; you have to have ships of various types at different places; you have to have different kinds of weapons at different places, manned by personnel. In other words, if of necessity, if a comprehensive military plan for the defense of the European members of this community is to be worked out, has got to have a pattern about it, and naturally somebody has got to be the one that forms the pattern, and somebody has to implement it.

Is it not almost necessary that the matter grow into something of quite large proportions if we do start out with the assumption that we are to set up a single military force for all practical purposes to defend this Atlantic community against potential attack?

Mr. WARBURG. Well now, just as you put it, Senator, again, "defend it against potential attack" can mean two things.

Senator PEPPER. I do not mean in the sense of being right there at the border. I mean to join them in resistance to attack.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes. It is essential to have a pattern. It is essential to have a plan. But it is even more essential for our own security that we do not fool ourselves about what that plan is. If, for example, we did mean—which I do not think we do, and all I am saying is that we should make it clear that we do not—that we were going to attempt to hold the frontiers of western Europe, then unless we made sure we could hold them we would be embarking on a gigantic Dunkirk. We would be starting off with a guaranteed initial defeat.

Senator PEPPER. I think it is very obvious that if we intended to make anything like an effective resistance at the borders of the European members of this community it would take a very advanced military plan which would involve the placement of both matériel and manpower.

Mr. WARBURG. Over there now, before any war starts.

OBLIGATIONS UNDER ARTICLE 3

Senator PEPPER. However, again going back to what we are actually doing here, and I think you make a valuable contribution to give further occasion for the clarification of the possible ambiguity that might be in article 3 of this treaty, is that we are passing upon a document. Now, the Secretary of State appeared before this committee and, in response to the inquiry of the chairman, he was asked what Senators, and of course that would include members of the House, what Members of Congress, should feel, or must feel, to be their duty in respect to article 3 if we gave the necessary advice and consent to the ratification of this treaty.

The Secretary of State said, as I recall it, that a Senator could not hereafter say that we owed no obligation to give aid and assistance to the other members of this community, but the degree and the volume and the kind of aid given, as I construe it, under article 3, would be in the sound judgment and confidence of the individual Senator or Member of the House of Representatives. Do you recall that?

Mr. WARBURG. I thought his testimony was very forthright and very clear.

Senator PEPPER. So that we who are Members have a perfect right to make it clear that we look very skeptically, speaking only for myself, upon article 3, and I regard myself as having the right to exercise, so long as I am here, exactly the prerogative that the Secretary of State so clearly, and so courageously defined; that we are willing, individually, to help with further economic assistance, if it be required and help certainly these countries to provide for their internal security, and to help them also to regain their confidence, but that we reserve just exactly what the Secretary of State said we might, if we vote for the ratification of this treaty, the right to exercise our own individual judgment.

When anybody proposes to do something affirmatively as to the volume or the character and the timing of the aid that is proposed to be given, we reserve the right to exercise our own individual judgment.

Mr. WARBURG. That is substantially all I would like to see made clear to our friends abroad.

Senator PEPPER. That is substantially, as I understand it, what you are suggesting here.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Warburg. I want to be sure I do not misunderstand you. Again I say that I agree with about 99 percent of your thesis.

INTERPRETATIONS HERE AND ABROAD OF UNITED STATES OBLIGATIONS

Are we not making it clear as to the pattern contemplated under article 3 when, as a result of conference among the treaty powers, the arms program under article 3 is limited to one billion dollars? If that is a permanent pattern, it cannot be the type of aid against which your fears run, could it?

Mr. WARBURG. No, it could not, sir, in the absence of statements by the Chief of Staff of the United States Army and the Secretary of State, which to me imply the opposite, and which seem to imply the opposite to people abroad. Why is ex-Premier Reynaud in this country now making speeches saying we ought to send a lot of American troops over now? What did Premier Queuille say? "The next time you liberate us it will be too late. You will be liberating a corpse."

Senator VANDENBERG. I can understand those statements, and I can also understand that if the representative of the French Government has agreed to such a limited program as it is apparently limited, we do not yet know, it seems to me that there is pretty universal consent to the present system of interpretation for which you contend, and with which I substantially agree.

So that on the basis of any such hypothesis as exists up to date, our only task, as I listened to your very able presentation, is to make it perfectly sure that the facts as they exist are not misunderstood.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the best way to not let them be misunderstood is to put in the treaty what we mean, and we have done that, and I do not think you have challenged anything that we have said in the treaty, have you?

Mr. WARBURG. I do not challenge anything you have said in the treaty, sir. I think Senator Pepper brought out a point that there are possible interpretations.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, there are possible interpretations. A man looks at a horse and one says he is a dun and another says he is a sorrel.

Mr. WARBURG. I am concerned with whether the horse has three or four legs, not what his color is. I think the Europeans are. I think they are concerned with whether they are getting a horse they can ride.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course they are concerned with it, but when they are concerned they need only to turn to this treaty to see what we promise to do and what we do not promise.

Mr. WARBURG. I do not think they can, with all due respect, with the statements that are on the record.

The CHAIRMAN. How can we hunt them all up individually and tell them what we mean by this treaty? Their leaders have come here to Washington. They have negotiated this treaty to start with. They had a great ceremony here in which they signed it, and the presumption is that they agreed to what is in the treaty, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. My point is—

The CHAIRMAN. I know. Answer that question, please. Is not the assumption that they know what is in the treaty and what they have agreed to?

Mr. WARBURG. The assumption is that they know what is in the treaty and they also know what is in the arms program for the first year, and I agree with Senator Vandenberg that every indication from that point of view means they are not going to be put in a position to secure their frontiers against invasion.

The CHAIRMAN. Not immediately, no. The treaty does not contemplate the sending of an army now to string along the Rhine. It only means that when they are the victims of an armed attack, we act.

Mr. WARBURG. When they are the victims of an armed attack the Russians will be at the Channel before anything can happen, unless something is done before they are the victims of an armed attack.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you favor sending an army over there now and keeping it there to protect their borders?

Mr. WARBURG. That depends on military judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. You have testified militarily. You have submitted yourself to this committee. I want to know what your wishes are. Do you want the United States to send an overwhelming army to the Rhine and maintain it there?

Mr. WARBURG. Speaking as a lay citizen, I would say that would be a very foolish thing to do, because I think that is the way to provoke a war we are trying to prevent.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what we are not going to do. We do not plan to do that. But I judge from some of your statements that you thought that was what we ought to do.

Mr. WARBURG. I do not think I made any statement that could be so interpreted?

The CHAIRMAN. I apologize. I am being fair by bringing it to your attention.

Senator McMahon?

Senator McMAHON. As a resident of Connecticut, I have had a very lengthy correspondence with Mr. Warburg about this treaty and about the proposed implementation, and I want to compliment you, Mr. Warburg, on making what I think is a very definite contribution to the thinking on this situation.

Mr. WARBURG. Thank you, Senator.

Senator McMAHON. As I understand it, Mr. Warburg, you are enthusiastically for the Marshall program.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

FORCES NECESSARY TO SECURE EUROPE

Senator McMAHON. You are fearful that we cannot, or we are not able to, put the kind of an armed force or might into Europe without seriously impairing our ability to carry on the Marshall plan.

Mr. WARBURG. I do not think we can create a force in Europe capable of holding the frontiers of western Europe against invasion without halting the entire recovery program.

Senator McMAHON. I take it, since you are for the pact, that your difficulty arises out of the fact that you do not believe that we can implement it by a force in being to the tune of 40 divisions completely armed.

Mr. WARBURG. Force in being in Europe, yes.

Senator McMAHON. That is your difficulty.

I realize you have disclaimed a military expertness on the subject, but have you any confidence in our ability to deter aggression by the Soviet Union or anyone else by simply citing the pact and relying on our own armed forces to be thrown into action if the aggression should occur?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes. I think there is a good deal of evidence to support that that is not a wild dream. In the first place, the Red Army could have overrun western Europe at any time in the last 2 years. One fact.

The second fact is that it has not done it. It has been deterred by something.

Senator McMAHON. And what it has been deterred by has been our strength and our own armament, has it not?

Mr. WARBURG. Assuming that the Russians want to conquer western Europe, which may or may not be the correct assumption, but it is the only safe assumption we can make, then I think it is fair to say that they have been deterred from doing it by the knowledge that they would be in a war with us which they could not hope to win.

Senator McMAHON. Yes. So really what it boils down to is that you are for the Marshall program for rebuilding Europe, you are for the pact, and you agree that any invasion or aggression must be combated by this country in its own interests, but that you believe that that invasion will not start if the United States maintains an armed might and an armed establishment here of sufficient caliber and quality to deter the Russians, and you do not believe that they can be deterred by the kind of, shall I say, token armed force that we might assist in establishing in western Europe.

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct.

Senator McMAHON. And that token armed force, plus what the Europeans are able to do for themselves, in addition to not being conclusive on the Russians, would in addition to that tend to deter European recovery.

Mr. WARBURG. Correct.

Senator McMAHON. By the Europeans, because they have not the substance with which to reconstruct or rearm and build a new military establishment.

Mr. WARBURG. And especially not the manpower.

Senator McMAHON. Especially—of course that goes with it—not the manpower.

NATURE OF COMMITMENT UNDER ARTICLE III

Senator McMAHON. So that really your appearance here endorses the pact and endorses the Marshall program, but you are in disagreement with the proposition of sending $1,130,000,000 worth of aid to Europe, as I understand it.

Mr. WARBURG. No.

Senator McMAHON. Although you do approve of sending enough to maintain their internal security.

Mr. WARBURG. And I do not know whether the amount proposed is too big or too little for that. I am only concerned with one thing, Senator, and that is what we make it clear to ourselves and clear to our friends what the commitment is that we are undertaking. Then it is up to the military people to decide what the necessary implementation of that commitment is.

Senator McMAHON. And the only commitment that you personally are willing to make to western Europe at this time is that we now, out of our own continental force, our own forces in the United States, our own Air Force, suitable instruments, suitable weapons with which they might be equipped, should be relied on by the Europeans to deter the Russians from aggression, rather than to rely upon us to furnish the equipment, to say nothing of any manpower, for 40 ground divisions.

Mr. WARBURG. That is, I think, what we are really saying, but we have not made it clear, and I think we should make it clear.

Senator McMAHON. That really is your whole position, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. Right.

Senator McMAHON. You are not alone in that. That is a close question. And there are many factors—the morale of the peoples of western Europe. There is a very grave consideration. It may be that the size of the revolver the man might have in his house might not be sufficient to destroy anybody that invades him. On the other hand, the possession of the revolver might give him enough comfort so that at least he could go about improving his ground and raising the food in his adjoining farm. That is possible too.

Mr. WARBURG. I do not deny the value of this psychological argument. To my mind it is the only argument that makes any sense for any kind of rearmament.

Senator McMAHON. And I might add that that is the only argument that makes any sense to me.

Mr. WARBURG. I will go with it so long as it does not do two things: So long as it does not cause us to fool those fellows over there as to what we really are doing and promising to do, and so long as it does not take their eye off the real danger, which is still the danger of Communist penetration and subversion. If you can give them a little sense of security by giving them some popguns and not make them think they are getting 105-millimeter howitzers, when they are getting the popguns, I am all for it, but we will lose every friend we have in the world if we undertake a commitment that they think means one thing and then turns out to mean another.

Senator McMAHON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that the doubt in the minds of the foreign nations may be clarified if we refused to ratify the treaty? They would know where we stood then.

Mr. WARBURG. I think they would know in a very unfortunate way where we stood. I am not suggesting that, sir.

CLARIFICATION OF THE COMMITMENT

The CHAIRMAN. Do you favor the treaty or not? Do you favor the ratification of the treaty as it stands?

Mr. WARBURG. I do not favor the ratification of the treaty and the arms program, which I take as one, as it stands, or as they stand, because I do not think it is clear to the American people or to the people abroad what the sum total of the two means. I think it is very easy to clarify it. I think that what we have been discussing here shows pretty clearly that we all do understand it to mean pretty much the same thing, but it is also quite clear that that is not what the people abroad think it means.

The CHAIRMAN. How can we legislate for the people abroad, except here in our own language, and not on what some other fellow on the street may think about it?

Mr. WARBURG. I have taken the liberty of suggesting a way to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Their officials came here and signed the treaty and agreed to it. Now, because you say some man in France does not understand it, we ought to modify it and put in a reservation of your particular brand. Did you not agree with me a while ago that your three reservations were all in the treaty already?

Mr. WARBURG. The four paragraphs are one clarification. I would not call it a reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. A clarification, which is a reservation, by the way, if it changes in any way the treaty; and if it does not change the treaty there is no use for it and no occasion for adopting it.

Senator McMAHON. I think, Mr. Chairman, if I can say this, that Mr. Warburg is simply taking the position that the pact in itself is all right. What he is disturbed about is the fact that the implementation is not, in the way it is proposed going to be militarily effective. He is in effect expressing a military judgment, despite the fact that he has disclaimed military expertness. With that I do not quarrel, because I think that we here have to exercise some judgment on military things. If we do not, then we have abandoned our constitutional prerogatives, and I certainly intend, when the arms implementation bill comes before this committee and before the Senate, to examine it very closely on the basis of the evidence that is presented as to its military effectiveness. However, one element of military effectiveness, a great element, is the psychological effect it has on the people whom you are trying to help.

I, like Senator Vandenberg, reserve explicitly my opinion as to what I am going to do when the arms implementation thing comes here. I have been much more convinced of the effectiveness of this guarantee without the arms proposal than most people. Certainly if you regard it as an extension of the Monroe Doctrine, as the drawing of a line which recognizes what we know factually are our interests, we know that the people in South America that are protected by the Monroe Doctrine, now revised in the Rio Pact, haven't any arms from us, yet they are under no illusions as to our willingness and readiness to back up the guarantees that we have given them.

So with this matter here. I do not think the Europeans have any illusions at all that we mean what we say. They may have some differences of opinion in their own minds as to how it is best to do that.

Mr. WARBURG. They have no illusion that we mean what we say, but they have some doubt as to what it is that we mean.

Senator McMAHON. I think maybe you are correct about that. Of course, that is a difficulty.

Mr. WARBURG. And I must say again, I think the doubt is entirely legitimate. When you take the statements that have been made about the futility of engaging upon an enterprise which involves letting them be overrun and reliberating them—

Senator McMAHON. The implementation bill as it goes through the committee and through the Congress, as it goes through the debate on the floor and finally comes out, will undoubtedly do a great deal to clarify the whole situation.

Mr. WARBURG. I do not know if it is proper for me to make this perhaps as a query, but it seems to me that if you are going to clarify the thing only when you come to the implementation you may have a worse psychological effect. If you do not do it when you sign the treaty—and the treaty is the commitment the man abroad knows about and looks to—and if you then do something with the implementation program which seems to him different than what you have said in the treaty, he is going to feel let down; whereas, if you say the same thing at the time you ratify the treaty he will say: "Well, this is not what I thought you meant, but if this is what you mean, O. K. Then I won't expect something I am not going to get."

Senator McMAHON. Undoubtedly in the debate on the treaty there will be talk about the implementation. There is no question about it.

Mr. WARBURG. That is why I suggested the clarification of the treaty.

Senator McMAHON. It would have been desirable, perhaps, to keep them separate and distinct and apart, to ratify the pact and then some time later go out and take up the other matter, but it is pretty hard to keep them apart.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Warburg, you said awhile ago you would not favor the treaty unless it was also combined with the military implementation, is that right?

Mr. WARBURG. I said I could not express a judgment on one without the other. I consider the two things are one, and I would not be in favor of ratifying the treaty because it is one-half of a twofold program, unless it is clarified.

CLARITY OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. We cannot very well act on both of them at the same time, because there is only one before us. The other has not yet been submitted to the Congress.

Is it not true that one of the chief values of this treaty is the assurance that it gives to the western European powers of its terms, the protection, and also an assurance to any aggressor who might contemplate an armed attack that we are going to the rescue of these western European nations?

Mr. WARBURG. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. Those psychological appeals are implicit in the treaty.

You speak about clarifying the treaty. I don't think I ever read a treaty that is as plain and as clear in its terms and its implications, if you want to stretch it that far, as this particular treaty is. Anybody that can read the English language, I think, can understand it. You say some man in France doesn't think that way so your idea would be to give him a resolution or reservation to satisfy him. Then you go across the line and in Belgium you find a Belgian who thinks something else. You would adopt a resolution or a statement something like yours to satisfy him. Then you go over to England and you find a crabbed old Scotchman who thought something different, and you would introduce a resolution to clarify the matter for him. Is that your kind of program?

Mr. WARBURG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you ought to broaden it. You ought not to limit it just to that one Frenchman. You have brought up the Frenchman, saying that he doesn't understand it, and it looks to me that the Englishman is inclined to have the same consideration.

Mr. WARBURG. I am inclined to think the American people are entitled to the same consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. They are, and they have it right here and they can read it and also understand it.

Mr. WARBURG. They can also read what the Secretary of State said and what General Bradley said, and they do not mean the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you need clarifying, instead of the treaty, because your views are so nebulous on those points that I do not understand them. You have agreed that all four of your points are covered by the treaty, by its plain and explicit language. Why clarify something that is already clarified?

Mr. WARBURG. I do not believe, Senator, if I have not made my point clear to you, that I can make it clear.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not critical. I just want to examine, I want to probe, your views and your suggestions, and try to get the facts.

Senator DONNELL, you are free now.

Senator DONNELL. Very well, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Warburg, this treaty is a treaty for 20 years, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

DURATION, WITHDRAWAL, AND EXPULSION

Senator DONNELL. And there is no provision for withdrawal from it or for expulsion from it?

Mr. WARBURG. I read the testimony, and I would have said there isn't any, but some people seem to think there is.

Senator DONNELL. I think you would agree that there is nothing in the language of the treaty that says that anybody can withdraw or be expelled.

Mr. WARBURG. No.

Senator DONNELL. So when we go into this treaty it does become of some importance as to whether it is ambiguous or not, when we are going to go into it for 20 long years?

Mr. WARBURG. It is important if it is only for 1 year.

Senator DONNELL. I think so too, and it is decidedly important if we are going into it with all the possible changes over a period as long as the time from the beginning of the depression of 1929 up to now. It is tremendously important that we should remove all ambiguities if we can.

Mr. WARBURG. I should think so.

Senator DONNELL. That is your thought?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

GENERAL BRADLEY'S STATEMENTS ON IMPLEMENTATION OF ARTICLE III

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Warburg, you have talked here about the fact that different interpretations and statements have been made by responsible officials in the different contracting countries. You have referred to the Chief of Staff of the United States Army in some speech that he made. Was that his Army Day speech?

Mr. WARBURG. Two speeches, Senator. In his speech before the Jewish War Veterans on April 5, in New York, he said this [reading]:

It must be perfectly apparent to the people of the United States that we cannot count on friends in western Europe if our strategy in the event of war dictates that we shall first abandon them to the enemy with the promise of later liberation. It is a strategy that would produce nothing better than impotent and disillusioned allies.

On the second occasion, which was his testimony here, he said [reading]:

Geographically, many of these member nations are already in positions where any aggression into western Europe would be a conquest of their homelands. I assure you that our frontiers of collective defense lie in common with theirs in the heart of Europe.

Then he talked about the difficulties of an amphibious invasion, and concluded by saying:

I hope that the occasion shall never arise when I might again be called upon to participate in such a hazardous and costly operation.

Senator DONNELL. I think the first speech, an excerpt from which you read, is his Army Day speech, and has been previously placed in this record, or part of it, by myself. There is one very significant sentence that I think ought to go in in addition to what you read, and if you do not mind I would like to read it. Perhaps it is two sentences. As I have it, General Bradley said this, and he is Chief of Staff of the United States Army, is he not?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. He said [reading]:

At present the balance of military power is centered in the United States, 3,000 miles from the heart of Europe. It must be perfectly apparent to the people of the United States that we cannot count on friends in western Europe if our strategy in the event of war dictates that we shall first abandon them to the enemy with the promise of later liberation.

You read that. Am I correct in understanding that you think the implication there is that we cannot count on friends in western Europe if what we are going to do is to abandon them to be run over and conquered by Russia, and then we come along with a slow process of liberation to get the country back. That is what you meant?

Mr. WARBURG. Right.

Senator DONNELL. That is the interpretation of what he said?

Mr. WARBURG. That may not be what he meant. That certainly is the way one is entitled to interpret it.

Senator DONNELL. At any rate, that is the way you interpreted it, and it certainly would appear to you to be a reasonable interpretation.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Does not the next sentence seem to fortify the reasonableness of your interpretation? He says [reading]:

Yet—

that is to say, this policy of first abandoning western Europe to the enemy with a promise of later liberation—that is the only strategy that can prevail if the military balance of power in Europe is to be counted on the wings of our bombers and deposited in reserves this side of the ocean.

You would think that that would tend to fortify the validity of your interpretation, would you not?

Mr. WARBURG. I should think so; yes.

Senator DONNELL. And then that final sentence that you read from General Bradley [reading]:

It is a strategy that would produce nothing better than impotent and disillusioned allies in the event of war.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Now, may I ask you also, Mr. Warburg, if you do not think it reasonable, in view of the circumstances and the observations of General Bradley, to think that when the President of the United States, in his inaugural address, said, on January 20 of this year [reading]:

If we can make it sufficiently clear in advance that any armed attack affecting our national security would be met with overwhelming force, the armed attack might never occur. I hope soon to send—says he—

to the Senate a treaty respecting the North Atlantic security plan—would you not have in mind, Mr. Warburg, that it is certainly reasonable to conclude that what the President had in mind there was that there should be placed over in Europe, perhaps by the Europeans themselves, perhaps by the United States, without discussing who is to place it, in order that Russia should be deterred from attacking she should have the assurance and knowledge that she would be met with overwhelming force, so that she could not get into Europe? Is that not a reasonable interpretation?

Mr. WARBURG. It is a possible interpretation. It seems to me precisely the kind of statement one should make; namely, that an attack will be met by overwhelming force. You do not say where.

EXTENT OF OUR COMMITMENT UNDER ARTICLE III

Senator DONNELL. I am not asserting it is the only interpretation. But the point I am making is, as I understand you to make it, that by the observations certainly of General Bradley, and I will leave out the President for the moment, plus the reaction that the Europeans, as, for instance, former Prime Minister Reynaud has stated in this country, certainly somebody has been left with the impression that by this treaty we are obligating ourselves to use such force and help and aid as will prevent the overrunning of Europe and this slow process of liberation from being the only salvation of Europe.

Mr. WARBURG. Yes; and I think the two statements I quoted from the Secretary of State are open to similar interpretation.

Senator DONNELL. And perhaps the one from the President may not be as strong as occurred to me. You may be quite right on that. Yet I think it is subject to an interpretation along the line that I have indicated.

Now, Mr. Warburg, you have heard here this afternoon, have you not, Senator Connally say, "Why, we have here this treaty. All they have to come and do, if the question arises as to what it means, is to go read it. It is just as clear as the nose on your face and everybody can understand it," or words to that effect.

Let me just ask you, did you read, in the course of the testimony from which you previously read, the assurance that we were given by Senator Connally and Senator Vandenberg a few days ago, that in treaties that have been made in the past, treaties of alliance, you cannot look solely into the text; that you have to look to the background to see what the meaning of them was. Did you read that in their statements?

Mr. WARBURG. I did not see that.

Senator DONNELL. You have read considerable of the testimony, I judge?

Mr. WARBURG. I have read what has been reported in the newspapers, and I have also read the full testimony of the Secretary of State from the transcript.

AMBIGUITY OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Warburg, one other point. You are speaking about this ambiguity under the treaty itself. You read, perhaps, or rather you heard Senator Connally today, in commenting on your own statement, did you not, point out, as he said, and I think I quote him in haec verba, that—

The treaty means that the United States serves notice upon any potential aggressor that military attack upon western Europe means war with the United States.

You heard him say, did you not, in substance, that the treaty said that?

Mr. WARBURG. I believe so; yes.

Senator DONNELL. And he takes the position the treaty covers the first three, and I think he thinks covers the fourth, of your points. That is what you understood his questioning to indicate?

Mr. WARBURG. I was not clear what he thought about section 4.

Senator DONNELL. We will leave four out. Certainly the first three you understood he thought were clear in the treaty.

Mr. WARBURG. That they were unnecessary because they were in the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. He was looking at it or had it in his mind when he was talking that the treaty means that the United States serves notice upon any potential aggressor that military attack upon western Europe means war with the United States. That is what your point No. 2 is.

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. That is what he was referring to when he was pointing out point No. 2?

Mr. WARBURG. I think so.

SENATE DEBATE OF FEBRUARY 14, 1949

Senator DONNELL. It is very interesting to note in that connection, is it not, that back here only a few weeks ago, when Senator Connally was interrogated about what he was going to favor in this treaty, he said this (from the Congressional Record, 1189-1190):

I do not, of course, approve of any language which may be adopted which could be construed as automatically inviting the United States in war—and then a question to him—

Or as a moral commitment to fight?

and his answer:

Of course. In the case of governments I do not know the difference between moral commitments and legal commitments. I certainly would not desire the adoption of any language which would morally commit us to fight. I think our morality is worth something in the world, and we would not want to play with a moral commitment even though we might not be legally bound. But there are many people, and we have found them in government and elsewhere, who would favor automatically going to war, which would mean letting European nations declare war and let us fight.

Then the question:

Which would of course be entirely contrary to the Constitution, would it not?

His answer:

Certainly. Congress alone has the power to declare war.

AUTOMATIC DECLARATION OF WAR

Are you not interested, Mr. Warburg, to observe that today, notwithstanding that observation on February 14 of this year by the chairman of this committee, he now asserts and argues that this statement in the treaty means that the United States serves notice upon any potential aggressor that military attack upon western Europe means war with the United States? Are you not interested to note those respective comments of the distinguished Senator from Texas?

Mr. WARBURG. I will confine my comment to saying I was very pleased when the Senator said that that paragraph was inherent in the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. He did say it?

Mr. WARBURG. So I understood him to say.

Senator DONNELL. I noticed the Senator from Florida likewise today said substantially the same thing, that everybody concedes that in the event of a material attack, or words to that effect, our Nation will go to war.

Mr. Warburg, you are not a lawyer. I know that. But you certainly have studied this question, and you refer to having been a public servant. Do you mind telling us very briefly what public service you have had?

Mr. WARBURG. It was short and minor, sir. I was financial adviser for the American delegation to the World Economic Conference in London in 1933, and then I was Deputy Director of the Office of War Information in charge of European propaganda during the war.

Senator DONNELL. And you are a banker and have been for many years; have you not?

Mr. WARBURG. I am no longer a banker. I was one for 15 years.

Senator DONNELL. What was the name of the firm with which you were associated?

Mr. WARBURG. Bank of Manhattan Co.

Senator DONNELL. In what capacity were you there?

Mr. WARBURG. I started as a clerk in one of the banks that became part of it and I ended up as vice chairman of the board.

Senator DONNELL. That is one of the largest banks in New York City?

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. You have read the Constitution of the United States, or at least are familiar with it?

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall in whom the power of declaring war is vested in the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. WARBURG. As I recall, that is in the Congress.

Senator DONNELL. And the Congress—and I remember Senator Pepper a few moments ago spoke of Congress—means both Houses of Congress; does it not?

Mr. WARBURG. I should think so.

Senator DONNELL. If it be true, as your clarification would make it and as the Senator from Texas now understands the treaty to mean, that the United States serves notice upon any potential aggressor that military attack upon western Europe means war with the United States, then it is true, is it not, Mr. Warburg, that by going into this treaty we would be placing ourselves in a situation that when an armed attack of any material nature, like, we will say, 200,000 or 500,000 troops, is made upon any one of the signatories, we go to war—that is what it means. It means, therefore, does it not, that the Senate and the President of the United States, by going into this treaty, without the House of Representatives having any power about it, have successfully bypassed the participation of the House of Representatives in determining whether we shall go to war?

Mr. WARBURG. It sounds correct. I do not know. I am not a constitutional lawyer.

PRETENSES IN THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. It sounds correct, though, you say?

You say at page 4 of your statement, "These two polite hypocrisies seem to me to weaken our undertaking." I assume that by "hypocrisies" you mean something that is not true; do you not?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes; I mean a pretense.

Senator DONNELL. In what document are those two pretenses or polite hypocrisies found?

Mr. WARBURG. Well, the first one is in the treaty itself.

Senator DONNELL. The North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Where is the second one?

Mr. WARBURG. I haven't the treaty here. I lent my copy to the preceding witness and he walked off with it.

In the preamble of the treaty, in the second paragraph [reading]:

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law.

Senator DONNELL. That is one of the two hypocrisies?

Mr. WARBURG. That seems to me so, when you include Portugal.

Senator DONNELL. I was just going to ask you about that. You mention Portugal, and the subject of Portugal has arisen two or three times in the testimony and, as indicating that this matter of Portugal is one which is not a mere afterthought on your part, you mention it in your statement here this morning:

that is to say the moral pretense of trying to clothe this treaty in moral garments—becomes a complete mockery when Portugal is one of the signatories and when flirtatious eyes are cast at Franco Spain.

You mean that to be true—that that is a hypocrisy?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes; I consider it a hypocrisy.

Senator DONNELL. The second of the hypocrisies to which you refer is the maintaining of the position that we are undertaking this program in order to strengthen the United Nations when, as you say, it is clear that we are trying to find a means of filling the gap left by the failure of the United Nations. You regard that as a second hypocrisy?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes. I do not believe that is in the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. But that is one of the arguments of certain of the proponents of the treaty; is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. So that the treaty itself then contains what you consider as one false pretense, and the proponents, in part at any rate, are using what you consider another hypocrisy or false pretense in advocacy of it? Am I correct in that?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes. I mention those two things because I think they weaken our whole position.

Senator DONNELL. I note you do, and I would certainly concur in your view that any hypocrisy or untrue statement or pretense would weaken our position.

EUROPEAN INTERPRETATION OF UNITED STATES COMMITMENT

Mr. Warburg, you have told us now about what you consider ambiguities. Senator Connally does not consider them such. Maybe others do not consider them such. But incidentally, by the way, in connection with what the Senator has previously considered as not being in the treaty, as I understood it, back on February 14, or at any rate he was not going to affirm such a treaty as that, you read about Mr. Rasmussen, did you not, of Denmark? His statement some few weeks ago as to what the treaty means in its obligations—did you read that?

Mr. WARBURG. I think I did, but I do not recall the words.

Senator DONNELL. It is his observation, made on March 22, which appeared in the United Press of March 23, in the Washington Post:

Foreign Minister Gustav Rasmussen told Parliament today that under the proposed North Atlantic Treaty the United States "would go to war" if any one of the signatory nations is attacked. To the Danish Government, he said, there is no doubt that the United States will consider herself pledged to assist an attacked nation with all her force.

"If armed force is necessary to reestablish security, it is evident that the member countries possessing such force are obliged to use it. That means that if an armed attack occurred on one of the member countries, it could have only one answer: The United States would go to war."

That is thoroughly in line with the observation Senator Connally made, is it not, in agreeing, or stating that point No. 2 of yours, "The treaty means that the United States serves notice upon any potential aggressor that military attack upon western Europe means war with the United States" means just what it says, and the understanding of Mr. Rasmussen is thoroughly consistent with that view?

Mr. WARBURG. It would seem so to me, but Senator Connally is the judge of that.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. You have pointed out what you say you consider ambiguities. Maybe somebody else does not consider them that.

DANGER OF A COMMUNIST COUP

Let me ask you this point: You have read here from the preamble the language that [reading]:

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

I call your attention to article 2, also, which states [reading]:

The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being.

Do you see any mention there of the Communist Party, or of undertaking to provide for the contingency that one of these 12 signatories should become Communist?

Mr. WARBURG. No.

Senator DONNELL. Certainly there is no language in this agreement, this treaty, from end to end, that states that if one of the signatory states became a Communist state, it shall thereby be expelled from the treaty; is there?

Mr. WARBURG. I do not see any such language.

Senator DONNELL. Yet you feel, do you not, Mr. Warburg, from what you have said in your statement, that this matter of Communist infiltration and the possibility of a nation becoming Communist is by no means an impossibility. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. No; I think that is the primary danger.

Senator DONNELL. You think that is the primary danger, you say?

Mr. WARBURG. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. And you are talking about the primary danger in some of the signatory countries, countries signatory to this agreement?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And you mention in that the already dubious moral:

Because we cannot ignore the fact that with 25 percent of France voting Communist, the Russians have a far more dangerous fifth column in France today than the Nazis had in 1940.

You have seen, have you not, Mr. Warburg, as a banker and as a public man and as a citizen, rapid changes take place in these countries like France, for instance, and in Italy, with respect to their political complexion?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And it is entirely possible, is it not, that within a period of 20 long years either of these two countries, or perhaps some other countries signatory, might become a Communist country? That is correct, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. I should think it is quite possible.

WITHDRAWAL AND EXPULSION

Senator DONNELL. I do not know whether you interpret this an ambiguity or an omission. I would say an omission. Perhaps you would agree with that. But is there not therefore a very interesting omission in this treaty, namely, the omission to provide means by which a party signatory could be expelled if the political history of that country should become repugnant to the desires of the other signers?

Mr. WARBURG. That raises another question, Senator, on which I do not feel competent. It did not seem to me the main issue. That is why I confined myself to what does seem to me the main issue. There is a question as to whether, if there were a Communist coup, such as happened in Czechoslovakia, the treaty would become operative, and that question seems to me to precede the other, because if you are going to take action under the treaty to prevent the coup, the question of what happens if a country goes Communist does not arise.

EVENTS IN THE OCCURRENCE OF A COMMUNIST COUP

Senator DONNELL. I am glad you brought that up, because precisely the same point has been suggested here several times during the testimony, namely this, if I may just amplify it and ask you this question: In the opinion of some, it is rather unlikely that Russia, if she could, through a coup engineered from without but consummated from within, would take over a country like she has some of these countries. It is somewhat improbable that she would waste her treasure and men and guns in an armed attack. Now, the question arises, does this treaty cover at all that situation, so as to become effective in the type of situation in which Russia is perhaps most likely to seek to overcome some of these countries that we are told she should not pick off?

Mr. WARBURG. I read the testimony of the Secretary of State, and I think it was your questions, as a matter of fact, Senator, that elicited his testimony, and I came to the conclusion that what we think this treaty means in this regard is that we will have to regard each event by itself and make up our minds whether we do or whether we do not act, and if so, how. I should say the treaty did not clearly state we would do one thing or the other. I do not see how it could.

Senator DONNELL. Possibly not. I am not saying that it could. But the treaty may arouse in the minds of many people the idea that it is going to be an effective treaty against Russia in all contingencies, yet fail to have any effect whatsoever in such an instance as I have recited, namely, the instance of the coup. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes; although I think there is less reason to even think the treaty operates in such a case than there is to think that it means we are securing the frontiers of western Europe.

Senator DONNELL. Unless it could be demonstrated that Russia had directed and influenced interior forces to attack a government and take it over by force, in which event it might be called an armed attack. Is that not correct?

Mr. WARBURG. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Warburg, are there not other ambiguities in this treaty which you may have regarded as more or less subsidiary, but still ambiguities?

Mr. WARBURG. There may be. My trouble is with the one I testified on. That seems to me basic.

CONSULTATION UNDER ARTICLE IV

Senator DONNELL. For instance [reading]:

The Parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the Parties is threatened.

Is that clear as to whether or not it would obligate a consultation with respect to a threatened attack against some of the colonial possessions of one of the signatories? Is that clear to anybody?

Mr. WARBURG. I should have thought that was clear. I should have thought the treaty only included the specified names areas in the North Atlantic area.

Senator DONNELL. If you will just refresh your memory by looking at articles 5 and 6, which are the ones that refer to the limitation of territory, namely, article 5, "an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America," and article 6, defining the territory to include as well the territory in the Algerian Department of France—

Mr. WARBURG. That is not a colony.

Senator DONNELL. I am not saying it is a colony. But those two are the only provisions in the treaty that refer to the territorial extent of the treaty; is that correct?

Mr. WARBURG. So far as I know; yes. And they seem to me quite precise and clear.

Senator DONNELL. I think so.

Article 4, however, does not refer to how far or where the obligation of that article may extend. For instance [reading]:

The Parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the Parties is threatened.

Suppose that one of these signatories has certain territory south of the Tropic of Cancer, so that it is not within the North Atlantic area. Are you able to tell, or can anyone tell, whether the territorial integrity as defined here would refer to the colonies which are south of the Tropic of Cancer?

Mr. WARBURG. I do not feel competent to express an opinion. That is a legal question, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

DEFINITION OF ECONOMIC CONFLICTS UNDER ARTICLE II

You have noted, I have no doubt, the provision of Article 2, that the signatories [reading]:

will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

Are you able to tell, Mr. Warburg, what, if any, conflicts in international economic policies between any of these signatories exist, or what is meant by that term here?

Mr. WARBURG. I should think what was meant was the perfectly normal conflict of any two nations, or any one or more nations, which are trying to sell in the same markets or buy the same raw materials. It is inherent in competitive national economies.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the purpose of the committee to recess at 1:30, and Mr. Warburg may return and you may return if you like.

Senator DONNELL. I would like to interrogate him, not so very long but a little longer than 5 minutes more, Mr. Chairman. I would dislike to have you come back, but I did not get started until pretty late.

Mr. WARBURG. I am at your service.

Senator DONNELL. Is it your understanding, then, from article 2, the sentence that I have read, that it is the contract of the 12 signatory parties that they will seek to eliminate all competitive disagreement between one another so they will no longer be competitors for the trade of the world?

Mr. WARBURG. I would say that in the first place the agreement is to seek to eliminate, and not to eliminate. That means they will use their best efforts to cooperate rather than compete.

Senator DONNELL. But then you understand that to mean, as I understand it—if I am wrong, please correct me—that they are contracting that they will use reasonable efforts to seek to eliminate the competition existing between their respective countries, is that right?

Mr. WARBURG. I should think so.

Senator DONNELL. So that if this treaty is signed, then, there should be made, in order that that article can be complied with, an honest, genuine effort to remove all competition between Great Britain and the United States, all competition between France and the United States, all competition between the United States and all other signatory countries?

Mr. WARBURG. I think that the use of the word "all" goes perhaps too far. I should think it meant the use of the best efforts on the part of each signatory to cooperate with all other signatories rather than to compete. When you say "to eliminate" you are stating an unattainable goal.

Senator DONNELL. It may be an unattainable goal, but there is no limitation here. The language is, "They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them," and there is no provision that this shall mean only partial elimination. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. WARBURG. To the extent possible they agree to eliminate competition.

Senator DONNELL. In article 3 of the treaty there is the provision that "by means of continuous aid and effective self-help" the parties "will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack."

ITALY AND THE TREATY

I think you referred in your statement, did you not, to the fact that a violation of the Italian peace treaty would result if Italy were to be rearmed?

Mr. WARBURG. Correct.

Senator DONNELL. Is there any provision in the North Atlantic Treaty to eliminate Italy from the provisions of article 3, which I have just read?

Mr. WARBURG. I am not aware of any such provision, Senator.

Senator DONNELL. In fact you are quite certain, are you not, Mr. Warburg, that there is no such provision?

Mr. WARBURG. Is there not in the treaty a provision that it shall not be in conflict with any other treaties signed by the signatories?

Senator DONNELL. Yes; there is this provision [reading]:

Each Party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the Parties or any third state is in conflict with the provisions of this Treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement in conflict with this Treaty.

There is that provision. Do you think, Mr. Warburg, that that is clear in determining that we are not to send any arms to Italy?

Mr. WARBURG. That is again a legal question. I should think it could be clarified to advantage.

Senator DONNELL. It is certainly not as clear as it could be made, is it?

Mr. WARBURG. I should think not.

Senator DONNELL. And your own judgment is, as I understand it, that in view of the provisions of the peace treaty with Italy, we cannot rearm Italy or assist in it without violating the Italian peace treaty?

Mr. WARBURG. Within the limits of the armed forces permitted under the treaty we could. Beyond that I should think we could not.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall whether there are any signatories to the Italian peace treaty other than those who are in the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. WARBURG. The Soviet Union, as I remember.

Senator DONNELL. So that in order for us to rearm to any extent beyond the provisions of that treaty we would have to obtain the consent of the Soviet Union, would we not, or else put ourselves in the position of violating a contract to which it was a party?

Mr. WARBURG. I am not sure, but I think Yugoslavia was also a party.

Senator DONNELL. And it would be likewise true that if we go ahead and rearm Italy under the terms of the North Atlantic Treaty beyond the provisions of the Italian peace treaty, we would be violating the obligations to Russia and Yugoslavia unless we secure their consent to rearmament of Italy?

Mr. WARBURG. I should think that would be correct.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that I will not ask Mr. Warburg any further questions.

I appreciate very much both the courtesy of the committee and that of Mr. Warburg, and at this point I shall desist.

The CHAIRMAN. We will take a recess until 2:45. We thank you very much, Mr. Warburg, for your views and your testimony.

(Whereupon, at 1:35 p. m., a recess was taken until 2:45 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(The committee reconvened at 2:45 p. m., upon the expiration of the recess.)

The CHAIRMAN. The hearing will be in order.

We are under tremendous pressure. That is the reason I was suggesting the witnesses be as brief as possible. If you care to not read all of your statement we can put it all in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us who you are, whom you represent, and where you come from.

STATEMENT OF REV. DUDLEY H. BURR, CHAIRMAN OF THE PEOPLES PARTY OF CONNECTICUT

Reverend BURR. I am the Rev. Dudley H. Burr, chairman of the Peoples Party of Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the Peoples Party of Connecticut?

Reverend BURR. That is the Connecticut branch of the Progressive Party.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the Wallace party?

Reverend BURR. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. We have had several expositions by Mr. Wallace himself and several other representatives of that group. We cannot give all the time or any considerable time just to one group, you know.

Reverend BURR. I would like to place before the committee some things from Connecticut that I think are pertinent to this North Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. From Connecticut?

Reverend BURR. Yes, sir; from the people of Connecticut.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go ahead. We may have to stop you if you go too long.

Reverend BURR. I am opposed to the Atlantic Military Pact as a clergyman, a veteran of World War II, and a political leader of many thousands of people in the State of Connecticut.

MILITARY ALLIANCES AND REARMAMENT

As a minister, I am committed for the basic principle of Christianity and all religions, peace among nations, and brotherhood among men. The Atlantic Pact is a military alliance clearly based on the rearmament of one-half of the world against the other, and as such it can only result in leading those nations it is aimed against to take countermeasures and launch a full-scale armaments race.

History proves that such military alliances and such arms program as this entails lead only to war and never to peace. But the international situation has been discussed very frequently here in these hearings and has been generally broadcast. Opinions are varied as to just what would happen in case the Atlantic Pact is ratified. I personally believe that it will bring war instead of peace because it is basically founded on a war philosophy, and not on a peace philosophy.

One does not establish military pacts on the basis of a peace philosophy.

I believe that it undermines the whole system and the whole philosophy of the United Nations, as well as undermining the constitutional provisions in the American Constitution for making war.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND THE COLD WAR

But I am more than ever concerned with what it will do to us here internally in our own Nation, here in these United States. I do not think it is a matter of opinion as to the growth of unemployment in our country today. Connecticut is especially an industrial State. Our industries are devoted largely to consumer needs and to producing for consumer needs. During the war we produced war materials, as the other plants throughout the Nation went to work and produced war materials. But in times of peace we expect to produce for consumer needs. That is why at the present time we have a large element of unemployment there in Connecticut, because consumer needs are bogging down.

Since the start of the cold war and the beginning of the Truman doctrine, more and more markets throughout the world have been closed against us. As these markets in the world have been closed against us, causing unemployment at home, this very unemployment has closed other markets against us so that we find Connecticut industries with huge surpluses on their hands.

I have it from reliable information that the price of brass at the 1st of June will take a decided plunge downward, that it will reach a new rock-bottom. Just last evening in a report from our public welfare commission in the city of Hartford they reported that at this season of the year, since 1932 welfare has dropped off due to the seasonal activity of tobacco farming. This year welfare has increased 37 percent, instead of dropping off as it usually does.

I believe that this unemployment is largely due to the cold war and the situation that has been engendered through the buying of the Marshall plan. It seems to me that this North Atlantic Pact, being an extension of the cold war and the Marshall plan, will breed more and more unemployment throughout the land. At least it will restrict employment and labor within certain given areas.

COST OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

We do not know how much money it is going to take to implement this pact. We have heard about a billion and a half dollars. But the pact is very much like a marriage, it is not the initial cost, it is the upkeep that is going to be rather terrific, and once we start on the upkeep of this pact, I don't think you know, nor does anyone else know, how much it is going to cost us in supplies and in men, if we choose to protect the military supplies that we send over to the European nations.

As a consequence, this may mean going back to a war economy utterly and completely throughout the land, which could very readily get into the thorough regimentation of all labor. It will certainly reduce our civil rights because in times of war or national emergency civil rights are reduced and the country gets on an entirely different basis. That we understand.

The North Atlantic Pact, it seems to me, is bound to bring to us a state of national emergency, the cause of which I do not see existing in our world today, for I do not think there is any nation in the world today that willfully wants to start a war. I do not believe the people of our country want to start a war. I do not believe the people of any other country want to start a war. The last one was too utterly devastating for anyone to think in terms of a new war, especially with the United States in possession of the atomic bomb, a weapon that we can use for total destruction.

ANTI-COMMUNIST HYSTERIA

Another aspect of what it is doing to the United States is the effect that this whole upheaval and turmoil, connected with the hysteria against Russia and communism, is developing in the minds of the young people of the United States. Discipline is very difficult to get today among them. They have very little outlook. Their reply, whenever anyone talks to them about that is, "What is the sense of talking about the future or looking toward the future, we are going to be in another war." This comes from the young people. Of course, they are too young to vote and as a consequence I suppose they are not of great importance, so far as the political situation in our land is concerned, but they are of tremendous importance to me.

This is one thing I do not like to see developing in our Nation, because ultimately they are going to be able to vote.

If this pact is intended as a defense pact; and intended to bring peace in the world, I believe that it is on the wrong footing, for it is founded on war. If this pact is intended to stop the spread of socialism through the world, then why are we supporting such governments as Britain, Denmark, and Norway, which are almost thoroughly Socialist in concept?

If this pact is intended to stop communism, or at least to contain communism, it seems to me the way to contain it would be to build a satisfying way of life and standard of living here in our United States rather than to be spending huge sums of money on an armament program that goes right down the drain and pouring huge sums of money into Europe.

Sunday's New York Herald Tribune carried an article from the United Nations Economic Commission saying that the Marshall plan, the whole system of the ERP, was hurting the economy of those nations that were participating in the ERP and that it would seriously delay their recovery for years to come. More and more money has to be poured down that empty—and I say empty—drain, for it appears it is not ever likely to fill up as long as we are willing to pour out the money in huge quantities.

LESSENING OF TENSIONS NEEDED

As we look at the situation in the world today, it seems to me the best thing we could do would be to lessen the tensions that exist, as tension is being lessened today in the Berlin blockade. The Russians have withdrawn the blockade, for which we are very happy. That to me proves that we can get together, that we can talk over these tensions and that they can be solved without military pacts, or without threats of force.

And I do not believe that the threat of the military pact had anything to do with the lifting of the blockade in Berlin. I believe that it was the willingness of both sides to sit down and talk together about a matter that existed in great tension. This tension exists not only in the national headquarters of these nations, but it likewise exists among the people of this particular nation, for this tension is wreaking havoc throughout our land, in every institution that we call social among us, in our schools, our churches, and our families.

NEGLECT OF SOCIAL WELFARE LEGISLATION

We are spending tremendous amounts of money that could be spent for public housing. We are spending tremendous amounts of money that could be spent for health insurance, that could be spent for unemployment compensation insurance extending the time and increasing the amounts of money to be paid to those who are unemployed.

Our public welfare rolls are increasing today by people who have extended beyond their limit their unemployment compensation and cannot find jobs.

I am here today not only to ask for peace, but likewise to ask for jobs. It seems to me that if we go on with the ratification of this North Atlantic Pact we deny to our people both of these things.

THREAT TO CIVIL RIGHTS

There is one price that Americans will pay and will always gladly pay and have begun to pay for this war program, a price that cannot be measured even in billions of dollars that is the heritage of personal liberty, our rights of freedom of speech, thought, and press. These rights have been diminishing rapidly all around us, especially up there in Connecticut where for 300 years we have known the rights of free speech and the rights of citizens to declare what authority the Government shall have.

The inevitable end of this antirights crusade will be the same as that of Hitler's anti-Communist crusade, not the destruction of communism in our country which, as an idea, cannot be destroyed by guns or by dollars, or even contained by force, but the destruction of all of our democratic institutions, all popular welfare, all social progress, and all national honor and integrity of the nation who perpetrates it. "He who lives by the sword shall die by the sword."

The people of Connecticut are a skilled people in a rich land. They want jobs, producing for a better life for all. They have always been ready to defend their freedom and their homes, but they will not sacrifice everything for a useless, disastrous war program. They want to build plowshares. They want neither to live nor to die by the sword.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. You are minister of the Gospel, are you?

Reverend BURR. Yes, sir; Congregational.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a veteran of World War II, are you?

Reverend BURR. Yes, sir; 5 years in the service, 3 of them overseas in the Pacific.

The CHAIRMAN. How is that?

Reverend BURR. Five years in the service, three of them in the Pacific with Infantry battalions.

The CHAIRMAN. What branch of the service were you in?

Reverend BURR. Chaplains' Corps.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke of housing, that you desired to have housing. The Congress recently passed a housing bill, did it not?

Reverend BURR. I look on that bill as rather inadequate.

The CHAIRMAN. But it shows a disposition, does it not, to meet that problem?

Reverend BURR. True, and if we were not spending so much money on war preparedness we could build a lot more houses, could we not?

NATIONAL DEFENSE

The CHAIRMAN. You are against the budget for the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps, are you?

Reverend BURR. I did not get your question, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I say, Are you against the budget for the military, the Air Force, the Navy, and so on?

Reverend BURR. Yes, sir; I am. I think this money can be applied to better ends than to containing communism.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are not for our remaining in a position to defend ourselves in the event of another war?

Reverend BURR. I am for peace, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we are all for peace.

Reverend BURR. Well, I saw too much of war. I am for thinking in terms of peace, not thinking in terms of war.

The CHAIRMAN. But suppose no matter how much you want peace your country is attacked by a foreign power, don't you want to resist?

Reverend BURR. Who is going to attack us?

The CHAIRMAN. I didn't ask you that. I asked you if we should be attacked. I don't know who would attack us. You would want to resist, wouldn't you?

Reverend BURR. You are presenting a hypothetical question, aren't you, without saying who is likely to attack us? I can't think of anybody who would attack us.

The CHAIRMAN. If you don't want to answer the question, all right, just let it go.

Reverend BURR. I can't think of anybody who would attack us.

The CHAIRMAN. I know, but if we should be attacked, wouldn't you want to resist?

Reverend BURR. My experiences in the last war show me that resistance, even resistance, is futile.

The CHAIRMAN. Futile?

Reverend BURR. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We can have peace by just letting the totalitarians, the despots, and the dictators do what they want to and just say, "All right, go ahead"? Is that the kind of a peace you would want?

Reverend BURR. I want peace.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Take the witness, Senator.

Senator DONNELL. I do not care to ask any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Reverend BURR. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mrs. Broy. Just a minute, Mrs. Broy. Is Mr. Imbrie here?

Mr. IMBRIE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long will it take you, Mr. Imbrie?

Mr. IMBRIE. Twelve or fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The reason I ask is that Mrs. Broy is a resident here and you are from a distance. If it is going to take you any length of time we will hear Mrs. Broy first. She has been here all day. I recognize you, Mrs. Broy.

STATEMENT OF MRS. CECIL NORTON BROY, ARLINGTON, VA.

The CHAIRMAN. Mrs. Broy, tell the reporter who you are, where you live, your business, and so on.

Mrs. BROY. My name is Mrs. Cecil Norton Broy. My address is 524 North Monroe Street, Arlington, Va. I was born in Texas and I am very proud of it. I am the widow of United States consul, Charles Broy, and lived nearly 10 years with him in Europe while he was serving as United States consul for this country. We were stationed in Brussels and London during those years.

During that time I traveled widely in 14 European countries because I am interested in good government, and I wanted to find out all I could while I was living over there about the political and social conditions in Europe.

Before I married Mr. Broy I was married to the late Congressman Sisson, of Mississippi, who for some years was a member of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. From him I learned what I know about fundamental American Government.

DANGER OF WORLD GOVERNMENT

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the Atlantic Pact should not be ratified. We should go no further down the road toward world government. It is a broad road leading to the destruction of our Republic. Two forces in the world are working toward world government—communism and some international bankers. At times these two groups have worked together. For example, the money to finance the propaganda for the Russian revolution was given by a New York banker, a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the international banking house.

The New York Times of March 24, 1917, relates in detail the story of a meeting in Carnegie Hall, New York City, celebrating the Russian revolution. I read only one short paragraph from this photostat of the New York Times of that date:

An authority on Russian affairs, George Kennan, told of how a movement by the Society of the Friends of Russian Freedom financed by Jacob H. Schiff, had at the time of the Russo-Japanese War, spread among Russian officers and men in Japanese prison camps, the gospel of the Russian revolutionists.

The CHAIRMAN. That was when?

Mrs. BROY. March 24, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. You said the Russo-Japanese War.

Mrs. BROY. These men were in prison camps following the Russo-Japanese War, and while they were in the prison camps of Japan—

The CHAIRMAN. The Russo-Japanese War occurred in 1904, did it not?

Mrs. BROY. Yes, sir; but these men, many of them, were still in prison camps in Japan.

The CHAIRMAN. From 1904 to 1917?

Mrs. BROY. I thought it was in 1906. Anyway, the literature was sent to them and that is where they had inculcated into them the doctrine of communism.

The CHAIRMAN. Therefore you are against the treaty?

Mrs. BROY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. On account of that?

Mrs. BROY. There is one thing further. I want to bring to your attention one other reference. This is from the Sisson report, whom Woodrow Wilson sent as his personal representative to Russia at the time of the Bolshevik revolution.

I read the appendix, Document 64:

STOCKHOLM, September 21, 1917.

The communication is to Mr. Raphael Scholan, Raparandi.

DEAR COMRADE: The office of the banking house of M. Warburg has opened in accordance with telegram from President of President of Rhenish-Westphalian Syndicate an account of undertaking of Comrade Trotsky. The attorney (agent) purchased arms and has organized their transportation and delivery to Lulea and party named to the office of Esmond & Son in Lulea, receivers, and the person authorized to receive the money demanded by Comrade Trotsky.

J. FURSTENBERG.

The CHAIRMAN. Mrs. Broy, that is all very interesting, but we are not passing on those matters now.

Mrs. BROY. That is all I am going to say about that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. We have a treaty before us, and I would be glad to have any views of yours as to the treaty.

Mrs. BROY. I take it, the Atlantic Pact had in mind Russia as a potential enemy, and I just wanted to give a little background very briefly on how it started, of how communism was helped, I mean.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

FINANCIERS AND AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mrs. BROY. Our foreign policy does not make sense from the viewpoint of the American taxpayer. In recent months we arranged for a large loan to Great Britain. Following this a few weeks ago only, Great Britain loaned Russia $36,000,000. This loan was made after the Atlantic Pact had been proposed with Russia as a potential enemy. According to Walter Trohan's article in the Washington Times-Herald of April 20, 1947, entitled, "Foreign Policy Really Shaped by the Financiers," I shall read just one or two excerpts:

The nimble fingers of Wall Street and the long arm of London counting houses are widely regarded on Capitol Hill as the real moulders of the so-called American bipartisan policy. The New York financial interests and various elements profiting in foreign trade are now considered as having shaped American foreign policy for the last decade.

Through two world wars, Mr. Chairman, we have lost over a million men and billions of dollars. All thinking people know that one way to get a country down is through one war after another. The members of our Republic know that.

Our taxes and our cost of living are entirely too high. The Atlantic Pact would greatly increase both. It is common knowledge that the dollar is worth only about 40 cents.

DANGER OF ENTANGLING ALLIANCES

If we do not heed the warning of the founding fathers and enter into entangling alliances, the world will become an armed camp, Mr. Chairman. Should the United States of America attempt to finance a world military program, our people's backs will be broken through economic burdens and physical exhaustion. We must not endanger our own well-being through any such program.

The Russian Frankenstein has been set up and has grown strong through the work of many different kinds of persons, but the United States of America is the last free great country on the face of the earth. Let us keep her so. Let her be an example to those countries of the world who want to establish stable governments patterned after ours.

We have fed and clothed the starving people of Europe. Surely we should now be in a position to retire gracefully from the scene. Let us work for Western Hemisphere solidarity through strict adherence to the Monroe Doctrine. Let us keep ourselves strong, then should another war come, we would not have been weakened by spreading ourselves too thin.

UNITED STATES OF EUROPE

Mr. Chairman, I now respectfully submit, as I close, a recommendation which I believe to be constructive and for the good of ourselves and the other peoples of the world. I suggest that you gentlemen of this committee recommend that Mr. Churchill organize a united states of Europe. This course would have several benefits. First, it would give the nations of Europe a chance to learn to work together, a chance they have never had before. This united states of Europe could be patterned after our own United States. Those nations could learn the value of democratic government and cooperation in working together.

The second benefit is that it would take the financial burden of Europe off the shoulders of our American taxpayers. If those certain international bankers who helped to bring on the Russian revolution have seen the light and no longer believe in the glories of communistic government, let them put some of the billions which they control at the disposal of Mr. Churchill for this suggested united states of Europe. In this way they can make amends for the trouble they have caused by their ill-advised actions in the past. What we must watch out for is this great Republic of ours. We must not be maneuvered into a position, Mr. Chairman, where through some incident in Europe we could automatically be brought into a third world war.

This Atlantic Pact, in my opinion, would make possible just such an incident.

Then after a third World War, when we are so weakened through loss of blood and resources, any would-be world dictators could then more easily take us over, especially if there were large standing armies available for the use of this purpose. Let us not fall into this trap.

Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee, the future of this republic is in your hands. You must be as wise and firm as the founding fathers and so protect our Government and our people. May God guide you to that end.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. I don't believe I would care to ask any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mrs. Broy, we were very glad to have you.

Mr. Imbrie.

STATEMENT OF JAMES IMBRIE, CHAIRMAN, PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Imbrie, give the reporter your name, residence, and so on.

Mr. IMBRIE. My name is James Imbrie. My residence is just outside of Princeton, N. J. I happen to be a retired Wall Street banker, and spent all my business life as an international banker. I also, perhaps, should add that I am chairman of the Progressive Party in the State of New Jersey at the present time, and also chairman of the New Jersey Independent Citizens League, which is a continuation of an organization called the New Jersey Independent Voters League for Roosevelt, which was formed in 1944, and which I formed and led at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any conflict between these two parties you are heading, the Progressive group and the other one?

Mr. IMBRIE. No; the majority of the New Jersey Independent Citizens League, after supporting Governor Driscoll in 1946, by vote in convention, decided to support Wallace in 1948 on the question of peace, the question which made him leave the Democratic Party, sir.

If I may proceed, I would like to read a very short letter which came to me last week in the mail, signed by five outstanding citizens of the Nation and which expresses the general over-all objection to the pact, which are my personal sentiments and perhaps expresses it better than myself.

The CHAIRMAN. You endorse the letter, in other words?

Mr. IMBRIE. I do, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead.

Mr. IMBRIE. May I read it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

LETTER ON ATLANTIC TREATY

Mr. IMBRIE (reading):

Four years ago the United Nations was founded as the basis for a stable and enduring peace. Today mankind is threatened with the catastrophe of atomic war.

The diplomats sign the Atlantic Pact in the name of peace and in the guise of strengthening the United Nations. But the Wall Street Journal far more realistically describes the pact as "the triumph of jungle law over international cooperation."

We who send you this letter are not willing to believe that brute force is a substitute for human reason. We are not willing to replace the one world of the United Nations with the two worlds of the Atlantic Pact. We are not willing to stake America's security solely upon military power.

We know that you, and men and women of influence like you throughout the Nation, are deeply concerned lest our Government take a false step that may cost us our freedom and plunge our country into a catastrophe which is still possible to avoid. We believe you share with us the desire to do everything possible to safeguard the American people from the terrible indictment that, through our Government's action, we might become responsible for the destruction of civilized man. We are certain you would welcome an opportunity to meet with others like yourself to discuss the war danger, to make your opposition to the pact manifest and to decide upon constructive alternative proposals for peace. With Americans everywhere sensing the danger of our current foreign policy, it is surely our obligation to make articulate this opinion.

We therefore invite you to join with us the week end of May 20 and 21 in Washington, D. C., in a nondelegated meeting of leaders of civic, church, labor, and community organizations. No responsibility seems as urgent as the need for all of us to find common ground upon which to make our stand for real and lasting peace.

It is signed by Emily Greene Balch, Rev. Edwin T. Dahlberg, who I think is president of the Northern Baptist Convention a week or two ago, Dr. Albert Einstein, Thomas Mann, and Bishop W. J. Walls.

FINANCIAL BURDEN OF THE TREATY

I personally would like to speak for a few moments on my objective as a conservative businessman and international banker all my life. I want to start from the very drab premise that it is impossible for our country or the world to afford what the obligations are as incurred by this Atlantic Pact.

I want to also say, if I may, that I feel your committee should not feel that because I am one of a minority, perhaps, in appearing before you, that therefore our opinions should not weigh.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no, we are glad to have your view.

Mr. IMBRIE. No, because Cassandras are always in the minority, and I am here basically because I feel—

The CHAIRMAN. What did you say about who is always in the minority?

Mr. IMBRIE. I say Cassandras, those who warn of coming destruction.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, now you are getting back to my language.

Mr. IMBRIE. I am pointing to the fact that in 1927, '28, and '29, a period through which I lived and was active as a Wall Street banker, at that time when we were clearly driving toward economic disintegration, there was only a handful of even Wall Street leadership to speak out and tell the truth, Mr. Mitchell, president of the Illinois Trust Co., and a few others.

I say that today if this pact is backed by military armament of Europe, in my opinion we are certain to have economic chaos.

I am talking then to the third paragraph of the pact in which we as a Nation pledge ourselves individually and collectively to maintain and exploit—

The CHAIRMAN. Establish.

Mr. IMBRIE. "Exploit" will do. Well, "exploit" will do well enough, but that is not the word used.

The CHAIRMAN. "Will maintain and develop."

Mr. IMBRIE. "Will maintain and develop" our capacity.

The CHAIRMAN. "Their individual and collective capacity."

Mr. IMBRIE. That is right. Maintain our individual capacity to protect ourselves against aggression.

DANGER OF ECONOMIC DEPRESSION

This being a 20-year pact, I hope that if we maintain and increase that capacity which will be called upon and which we pledge ourselves to do, that must mean that we will maintain for more or less a period of 20 years our present armament race. It could be at least so interpreted.

I recall, and we all do very well, when the 1932 situation broke; the New Deal was proposed by Roosevelt and the expenditures of money that were proposed under it. The Republicans held at that time that any large increase in the public debt beyond the debt at that time, which was approximately 40 billions, could not be withstood economically by our country. We now have a debt of $252,000,000,000. I think it is clear that businessmen feel, and even the economic advisers to the President seem to feel that additional taxes in any large measure are beyond the point of reasonable ability of business to withstand in this period of present recession, let alone if we kick ourselves into a period of real depression.

I therefore plead that your committee recommend to Congress in its report this whole matter of the Atlantic Pact be put over until after the meeting in Paris on the 23d. I think that all business people are aware, are alive to the difficulties of the present situation and what is the best thing to do. But clearly, this Atlantic Pact was negotiated at a time when the cold war had reached its height.

In the last few days there certainly has been some relief from that and the possibilities are that some real progress can be made toward the elimination of the cold war at the Paris conference.

One cannot be didactic, but I only express this thought that to a Wall Street banker negotiation is the breath of his life. It is my conviction—if you care to, those who are proponents of this pact, if you care to call it holding it as a threat—I will say in any event that it seems to me that to put through this pact before the meeting on the 23d would be disaster from the point of view of the meeting in Paris on the 23d.

I therefore plead with you that you take at least that viewpoint into consideration before coming through with the recommendation that the Atlantic Pact should go into effect.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, we thank you very much for your view. Senator Donnell, any questions?

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

Senator DONNELL. What house were you with on Wall Street, Mr. Imbrie?

Mr. IMBRIE. I was head of the old investment banking firm of Imbrie & Co. I had large business interests in South America and from 1914 to 1920, my firm originated and handled jointly with the Equitable Trust Co. all the financing that was done by this country in South America; we controlled a bank in Brazil in 1920; we controlled an investment banking firm in joint account with the Darmstadter Bank, which is the fourth largest German bank. I have had large foreign businesses in Swiss banks for many years, the old Rotterdamsher Bank at Rotterdam, and so on.

Senator DONNELL. What was the street address in Wall Street of Imbrie & Co.?

Mr. IMBRIE. The address was 61 Broadway, sir, and afterwards 150 Broadway. We were members of the New York Stock Exchange, but I was the head of the firm for 25 consecutive years. We never did any margin business, but we were members of the stock exchange and did business for cash. We also came under the New York State Banking Department.

Senator DONNELL. During your experience, did you have occasion to be abroad from time to time, either in Europe or South America?

Mr. IMBRIE. I always went abroad twice a year. I had an apartment in Paris from 1918 to 1932, and always went abroad at least twice a year.

Senator DONNELL. When was your last trip to Europe, Mr. Imbrie?

Mr. IMBRIE. In the late summer of 1931.

Senator DONNELL. And you have been retired for several years?

Mr. IMBRIE. I have been retired since 1935. I have been in very bad health.

Senator DONNELL. You are living in New Jersey at this time?

Mr. IMBRIE. I am living in Princeton, just outside of Princeton, yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. We were very glad to hear you, Mr. Imbrie. As I understand it, you made your money in Wall Street, but when you wanted peace and quiet and culture you moved down to Princeton.

Mr. IMBRIE. Yes; I moved to Princeton. I happen to be a Princeton graduate, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I assumed there was some connection there.

That is all, and thank you very much.

Mr. IMBRIE. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the representative of the organization known as Religion and Labor Foundation here?

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. We very reluctantly have to announce that the hearing will be recessed now until tomorrow morning at 10:30.

Mr. WHATLEY. Mr. Chairman, would you prefer to hear me now or later in the week?

The CHAIRMAN. Who are you?

Mr. WHATLEY. I am David Whatley. I have a request in.

The CHAIRMAN. You just put it in today, did you not?

Mr. WHATLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Since you live here in the city you can come any time.

Mr. WHATLEY. I just thought it might be more convenient for you at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have a prepared statement?

Mr. WHATLEY. I can be very brief, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, have a seat.

STATEMENT OF DAVID WHATLEY, CABIN JOHN PARK, MD.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, sir?

Mr. WHATLEY. David Whatley. I live at Cabin John Park, Md. I am a member of the District of Columbia bar and engaged in the real estate brokerage business.

I am very diffident in taking the time of the committee since you have given so much devotion and time to this controversial question. But frankly, Mr. Chairman, I could not find anyone in authority who is considered an expert on matters of this nature who would express my point of view. Therefore I asked permission to state it briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. In your statement here you say, "I promise not to duplicate ground already covered."

Mr. WHATLEY. I will not, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have something new, is that right?

Mr. WHATLEY. I hope so.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, go ahead and let us hear it.

Mr. WHATLEY. I should like to question, first, the constitutionality of the—

The CHAIRMAN. You were here before this committee on another occasion, were you not?

Mr. WHATLEY. On the occasion of the ratification of the United Nations Charter.

The CHAIRMAN. You were against that?

Mr. WHATLEY. I was not against it, Mr. Chairman. I proposed that the Government adopt the Charter by a constitutional process, by a constitutional amendment in order to afford undoubted constitutional authority for our implementation of the security sections under the military arrangement whereby we would delegate contingents of our armed services to the United Nations. I believe that the Congress would never have permitted that.

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is water over the wheel.

What universities are you a graduate of?

Mr. WHATLEY. Columbus University, and post-graduate work at National University.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a local university here in Washington?

Mr. WHATLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the other one is the what?

Mr. WHATLEY. National University. They are both local law schools.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your office here?

Mr. WHATLEY. 2127 Lee Highway at the present.

The CHAIRMAN. That is in Virginia?

Mr. WHATLEY. Yes, sir. I have a business called Better Homes Sales and Service. I am engaged in real estate.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not practicing law, then?

Mr. WHATLEY. Only occasionally.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, a great many lawyers will practice only occasionally, but it is part of your business to be a lawyer, is it not?

Mr. WHATLEY. Yes; I find very little interest in it except on constitutional grounds. I am not enough of an authority to command any compensation in that respect.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, go ahead.

AREA OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. WHATLEY. I should like to say that the original Constitution founders never, of course, envisaged an extension of the doctrine of national defense to include the defense of western Europe. They would, of course, have turned over in their graves at the mere thought of such a thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, let us see if they did. In 1778 didn't the United States enter into a treaty with France, a defensive treaty, for both France and the United States? And did not France in compliance with that treaty send an army and navy here that helped us in the Revolutionary War? You are aware of that, are you not?

Mr. WHATLEY. That action by the French Government in sending forces over here, of course, was not unconstitutional.

The CHAIRMAN. But we signed the agreement. The treaty was a written treaty between the United Colonies. They had not obtained their independence; they made their declaration of independence.

Mr. WHATLEY. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I am aware of that.

The CHAIRMAN. We signed that, did we not?

Mr. WHATLEY. You will agree that treaty was directed toward the military situation in North America and not in Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. It was in North America and in Europe because the treaty specified that if as a result of the former treaty of amity and friendship between the United Colonies and France, that should France be involved in war, we would join her, defend her against an attack from Great Britain.

Mr. WHATLEY. But when the Constitution was drafted you may recall there was debate in convention as to whether to include therein the West Indies as part of our defense system. It was decided that we would not so include them as part of the Colonies.

The CHAIRMAN. They were not included.

Mr. WHATLEY. Because of the difficulty of defense of those areas. Our frontier at that time extended only to Winchester, Va., you may recall. The mere thought of extending it even to the Pacific was very fantastic. It was never, of course, envisaged that we would consider the defense of any area outside of the Atlantic seaboard as included in the words "common defense."

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go ahead.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF TREATY

Mr. WHATLEY. I should like to say that the treaty itself, of course, may be thoroughly constitutional, in spite of these objections I have raised. But, at the implementation of the treaty, which Mr. James Reston predicts may very well occur next year, in his article of February 17 in the New York Times, whereby we would delegate to this Central Control Military Council contingents of our armed services which would be stationed in Europe—

The CHAIRMAN. Who said they would be stationed in Europe?

Mr. WHATLEY. Mr. Reston predicted that.

The CHAIRMAN. What Mr. Reston predicts and what we do are quite different things.

Mr. WHATLEY. I know, but he has information from the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. If you want to testify about the treaty go ahead and do it. I do not care about your quoting somebody who does not have accurate information, because none of us have accurate information about what the implementation is going to be. We have a general statement. You appeared here, so you said, to argue against the constitutionality of this treaty, and we are ready to hear you.

Mr. WHATLEY. May I close my argument on constitutionality, sir, and extend it in the record, if I may, to save you time in order to make a further point?

The CHAIRMAN. We would like to see it before it goes in the record. We will receive your statement and if it fits the bill we will put it in the record.

Mr. WHATLEY. Thank you, sir.

INTERNAL SECURITY OF WESTERN EUROPE

I am disturbed less by the constitutionality of the treaty, Mr. Chairman, than I am by the premise on which our doctrines of military and foreign policy seem to be based. That is the premise that we must prepare for war on the continent of Europe against Russia within the next 2 years, along the lines suggested in the first treaty, the internal protection of those countries.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't mean the internal security, you mean the external security.

Mr. WHATLEY. The internal security is all that could be envisaged by it.

The CHAIRMAN. The treaty does not say anything about internal security, does it? It says "security against an armed attack by another nation."

Mr. WHATLEY. True.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why do you drag in internal security? It is not in the treaty at all.

Mr. WHATLEY. It is my conviction, sir, that the plan proposes and contemplates that we will export sufficient arms in the first year of the military assistance program, merely sufficient to provide for internal security against armed attack within the country, or another Czechoslovakian coup. That in the succeeding years we will begin to build up to where in the third year we will approach a situation whereby the forces of western Europe could actually retain the forces of Russia at a predetermined frontier.

READINESS FOR WAR

I think we do not have time for that and I feel very strongly that that doctrine does not take into account the new type of warfare that I believe will be waged with weapons of mass destruction other than the atomic bomb. And it does not take into account the fact that Russia now has these weapons; that we are now ready to go to war with Russia, without the military assistance program, without the pact. As was said by Admiral Zacharias last May——

The CHAIRMAN. You say we are ready to go to war with Russia? Is that what you are testifying now? Or are you talking about Mr. Zacharias?

Mr. WHATLEY. I am quoting Mr. Zacharias because he is a military authority and I agree with his statement that we are ready to go to war with Russia now; that we have three weapons more powerful than the atomic bomb.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know who gives you any authority to say that we are now ready for war with Russia. Nobody else has said it. Where do you get that authority to speak for the United States?

Mr. WHATLEY. I have no authority and maintain no authority, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. You are saying that we are now ready to go to war with Russia.

Mr. WHATLEY. I am a mere lay citizen expressing an opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. I know, but that is what you said. You said we are now ready to go to war with Russia. I want to know by what authority you say that.

Mr. WHATLEY. I say I agree with the statement of Admiral Zacharias, whom many people consider to be a military expert, one of our military experts, even though he is now retired; that he makes the point that the controversy over conscription and matters of that nature are extraneous. I will quote him in quotations, if I may. That is in his article of November 1947.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a World War veteran, and you know that talk about conscription is not pertinent; do you not? You are a World War veteran; are you not?

Mr. WHATLEY. I am not, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Not in World War II?

Mr. WHATLEY. No, sir; I was a IV-F in the war sir. My brother gave his life in the war and I am very glad to know that he was not merely maimed, in which case he would be back here today to see the situation we are in vis-à-vis Russia, which is exactly the same position we were in before.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go ahead and finish your statement.

Mr. WHATLEY. I wish merely, Mr. Chairman, at the expense of trespassing on your time, to make this brief point: That Russia now has weapons which can completely devastate the civilian populations of most of our urban centers; that such weapons may be already infiltrated and hidden in our major cities; that we may even now be breathing the tabun gas which was described in detail by an expert on military matters in the United Nations World, February 1948. Such gas, of course, can be breathed for 3 or 4 hours without detection, but is fatal in most instances.

I wish to point this out because it seems to be implicit in the statements of every military man and every foreign policy leader in the country, that we are invulnerable, virtually, relatively invulnerable to attack from Russia until she gets the atomic bomb; that we must take these policies before she gets the atomic bomb.

I agree that Russia is a menace, but I also agree that any nation is a menace in the light of these weapons of mass destruction.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

I can only appeal to you, sir, that the Congress set up a Joint Legislative-Executive Council on National Security which would complement the work and research of the National Security Council and provide more than a mere token representation on that Council, as was contemplated under an amendment proposed to be made by Senator Tydings to the Armed Services Unification Act which would place the Vice President on that board; that such an agency could then get the independent judgment of any official, independently, on matters of high importance of this nature. That independent judgment is not now available under any of the procedures that are in existence at the present time before Congress. You only have to read the hearings before the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate to be struck by the fact that they simply never get into questions of basic military policy of this character; that no committee on Capitol Hill is staffed with experts who could get any independent research done on matters of this nature; that it is a question of life and death for millions of our American citizens.

I do not propose to have the right answer. I am merely quoting the conclusions of a few men who have done a great deal of research on the subject and whose ability and patriotism I think are highly respected.

I am profoundly convinced that our whole trend of foreign policy and the security system would probably be changed and that many provocative statements and policies would be changed if the policy makers were aware of the fact that a war with Russia tomorrow, next week, or next month would mean the death of perhaps a third or a fourth of the population of this country.

RESERVATION TO THE TREATY

As regards the pact, I would probably do as 95 percent of the Members of the Senate would do, and vote for the pact, in spite of the fact that it is probably unconstitutional, since it will undoubtedly take away from the Congress its ability to pass upon a declaration of war. The President, as you well know, can put the armed services into immediate action without any opposition from the Congress. It is just as Mr. Roosevelt in his wisdom did. And as Senator Lodge pointed out in radio debate with Senator Watkins 2 weeks ago, we were actually at war with Germany a year before the Congress declared war.

So I can only appeal to you that you propose as a reservation to ratification that no military action can be undertaken without the consent of the Congress, both Houses, as was intended by the Constitution, even though that provision has been violated perhaps 20 times in our history. That still does not affect the basic validity of our constitutional doctrine.

I think that would perhaps alleviate the fears of the men in the Kremlin that we will provoke war with them in somewhat the same nature that Dr. Charles A. Beard and other historians pointed out that we provoked war with Japan in 1941, in pursuance of some promise or secret agreement that may have been made similar to the agreement between Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt on the occasion of the Atlantic Pact, about which Mr. Churchill said on the floor of the House of Commons in January 1946, "Mr. Roosevelt promised to go to war with Japan, whether or not we were attacked." The American people did not know that. The American people do not know what commitments have been made in the 6 months of long negotiation on this pact. Certainly all that time was not spent on working out the facile and beautiful wording that finally went into the pact.

The American people are entitled to an assurance that we will not be drawn into war without their being able to pass on it at least through their representatives in the Congress, as provided in the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; thank you very much.

Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. You are excused.

I think that exhausts our witnesses for this afternoon, unless the representatives of this organization known as the Religion and Labor Foundation of New Haven, Conn., are here.

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. Then they have lost their day in court if they are not here.

The committee will take a recess until tomorrow morning at 10:30 a. m., right here in this room.

(Whereupon, at 3:55 p. m., a recess was taken until 10:30 a. m. of the following day, Wednesday, May 11, 1949.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment on May 10, 1949, at 10:30 a. m., in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), Green, Vandenberg, Wiley and Hickenlooper.

Also present: Senator Donnell.

The CHAIRMAN. Miss Muriel Draper.

Miss Draper, I understand you have a very short statement. I make that reference because we have scheduled another witness for this morning and, until he arrives, we will go ahead and hear some of the rest of you. Have you a short statement?

MISS DRAPER. Yes, it is. You requested one.

The CHAIRMAN. You requested to appear.

MISS DRAPER. Yes; and you requested me to make it short, and I am trying to comply.

I am the president of the Congress of American Women, and as such I bring you the statement made by the Congress of American Women.

The CHAIRMAN. Just what kind of congress is that? You do not mean that all American women belong to it.

MISS DRAPER. No, sir. The Congress of American Women is an organization in the United States of America. It does not include all women, any more than the Congress of the United States includes all men and women.

I will go ahead with my statement.

STATEMENT OF MISS MURIEL DRAPER, CONGRESS OF AMERICAN WOMEN

MISS DRAPER. The Congress of American Women completed on Sunday night a national convention in which representatives of 300,000 women all over the country participated. The convention unanimously voted, after considerable discussion, the adoption of a resolution opposing the North Atlantic Pact.

It is our firm belief that as the Berlin blockade problem was resolved through negotiation, so all problems now disturbing international relationships can be brought to a peaceful settlement. There must be, however, a will to make peace. There must not be a determination to prepare for war on the highly dangerous theory that military alliances and armaments races can lead to peace. We must not root our economy in arms production and sales. We must not develop such a political and economic stake in war and its preliminaries that we will fear peace more than we do war.

OPPOSITION TO ATLANTIC TREATY

The Congress of American Women is opposed to the North Atlantic Pact because it will promote—as it has already promoted—a “Peace Is Dreadful” atmosphere. The governing parties of the signatory nations have gambled their political futures on the continuation and intensification of the cold war. They fear peace. The rearmament commitment implicit in the pact will gear our economy and the economies of western Europe to arms production. Jobs will seem to depend upon the cold war. Efforts will be made to spread a fear of peace.

There should be no doubt about the fact that the pact and the rearmament program go together. In spite of double talk calculated to appease political misgivings on both sides of the ocean, the pact makes clear American obligation to finance rearmament. In this connection, it is absurd to accept the one-billion-dollar estimate of the cost as other than partial. One billion cannot rearm the signatories. The first billion will lead to many more billions. If this committee approves the pact, it is accepting the full, unpredictably enormous financial commitment of the rearmament program.

As women, we are dismayed at an American financed arms race. An arms race may lead to war. If we have not succeeded in working out an effective plan for arms reduction that is surely no reason for stimulating arms expansion. We oppose the arms program and the pact which initiates it.

Nothing, however, is quite as alarming as the ease with which, under the pact, we can find ourselves and the rest of the world at war. Congress theoretically retains its power to declare war, but Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, has made it perfectly clear that a congressional declaration will simply acknowledge military action which has already been ordered by a Defense Council. This Defense Council will decide when “armed attack” or its equivalent has taken place, and it is by its decision, not Congress, that the pact is to be invoked. The Defense Council will not, it is clear, consider the Dutch aggression in Indonesia, for example, or the French aggression in Indochina an “armed attack.”

PEACE AND WAR

Our organization's devotion to the cause of peace has made it an ardent champion of the United Nations. We are troubled now by the pact's complete disregard of the United Nations. The pact is the antithesis in both letter and spirit of the United Nations. It puts the Security Council's power to act against aggression into the hands of the Defense Council.

Most of all, the pact comes at a time when peace seems more possible than ever before in the last 3 years. With the lifting of the Berlin blockade and the pending meeting of the foreign ministers, it would seem particularly imperative that no step be taken which might interfere with a peaceful solution of international differences.

American women do not want to send their brothers, sons, and husbands into another war. We do not want to see our sisters all over the world send their brothers, sons, and husbands into another war. Is there anything that the people want that this pact provides? The people want better homes and schools and a better standard of living. This pact will give them bigger and better bombs and bigger and better bombers. The people's will is for peace. And the pact would inevitably lead them to war. It is because we are convinced that the whole spirit of the North Atlantic Pact is contrary to the needs and the will of the American people that we, of the Congress of American Women, oppose it. And it is for this reason that we will fight it with all our strength—and with all our hearts.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

POWERS OF COUNCIL UNDER TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Only two questions. One is, Miss Draper, would you tell us, please on what you base your view that the Defense Council makes the decision when armed attack is taking place? I do not find anything in the North Atlantic Treaty that says the Defense Council has that power.

Miss DRAPER. As I understand the treaty, it is not, of course, put in the clearest language, which we hope to arrive at by the end of these hearings, but as I understand it, there can be an Atlantic Council which is a Defense Council which can be called into existence at the request of the signatories of the Atlantic Pact to maintain and develop the resistance of the signatory countries to armed attack, and therefore it would seem as if, under those circumstances, they can decide their own action, though we know in the North Atlantic Pact that it is suggested that the Security Council of the United Nations would be informed after this decision had been arrived at.

Senator DONNELL. That is the basis of your view?

Miss DRAPER. Yes.

MEMBERSHIP OF CONGRESS OF AMERICAN WOMEN

Senator DONNELL. The only other question is this: Senator Connally inquired as to the Congress of American Women. How large an organization is that, and where is its membership geographically? Is it all over the United States?

Miss DRAPER. Its membership is in about 14 different States. The number is 300,000, including our affiliated representation, and I have just come back from a tour of 10 States where I have spoken in churches, in schools, in girls' colleges, in universities and in many organizations of men and women, including the Congress of American Women, and the opinion of the majority of those people is against the North Atlantic Pact.

Senator DONNELL. Finally, where was the national convention held to which you refer? How many delegates were present at it?

MISS DRAPER. It was held in New York City and 197 delegates, guests, and observers, officially elected, were present.

SENATOR DONNELL. How many of those were members of the Congress of American Women?

MISS DRAPER. They were all members of the Congress of American Women or affiliated groups, with the exception of 11 guests who came as friends of the group to listen but not as official members.

SENATOR DONNELL. Thank you.

MISS DRAPER. You're welcome.

THE CHAIRMAN. Is your organization listed on the Attorney General's subversive list?

MISS DRAPER. Indeed it is, as most organizations that are fighting for peace are.

THE CHAIRMAN. We have the pleasure this morning of hearing Mr. Norman Thomas, a man of wide information and considered views.

MR. THOMAS. It is very nice of you not to say, as most people do, "the man most often defeated in the United States."

THE CHAIRMAN. That is no discredit, to be defeated.

MR. THOMAS. I am glad you think so. Anyway, I am just expressing appreciation of your omitting that usual part of that introduction.

THE CHAIRMAN. I never introduce anybody with any strings to it.

MR. THOMAS. By the way, I want to express my special thanks to you gentlemen for the trouble you have taken for allowing me to appear on short notice. Only because of several other obligations, including jury duty, did I request that consideration, because I could appear at no other time.

THE CHAIRMAN. Jury duty is a very laudable responsibility.

MR. THOMAS. For lack of time, I have written out only an outline, which I shall elaborate briefly.

STATEMENT OF NORMAN THOMAS, NEW YORK CITY

MR. THOMAS. May I make it clear that I am not committing the Socialist Party or the Post-War World Council by what I say? In both organizations there is division of opinion, but I think virtual unanimity on the safeguards which I shall stress.

As matters stand, I favor ratification of the pact for reasons somewhat similar to those given by John Foster Dulles. To refuse now to ratify the pact in which our Government took the initiative might be a tremendous jolt to governments and parties in Europe on which the hope of democracy depends.

I always believed that the negotiation of the pact was motivated by a sincere desire only for defense and not aggression. Nevertheless, I thought there were better ways for the United States to assure the nations of the world of all practicable support against military aggression. Neither under the pact nor without it is it possible or desirable to say that any aggression means that the United States will formally go to war, but there are other supports that can be given. I feared that for the United States to seem to give special aid to some nations, members of the United Nations but not of the pact, would tend to encourage aggression against nations outside the pact.

UN AND THE TREATY

In some quarters it is argued that the pact may be a step to a North Atlantic Union which I think would virtually junk the UN. For that we are not ready and I hope will not be ready. Weak as the United Nations is in many ways, I do not want it junked or further weakened under any circumstances now. We want to move toward a world federation of the right sort in which better balance will be achieved if there is a United States of Europe along with the United States of America, the Pan American Union, and the U. S. S. R., rather than if the nations of Europe are divided permanently in the orbits of Moscow and Washington. I do not want the pact to hinder the growth of sentiment and organization for the United States of Europe.

ARMS NEEDED TO SECURE EUROPE

There has still been no answer at all to my insistent question whether responsible military men really believe that by any pact or any feasible expenditure under it we can make western Europe invulnerable if the Russian high command should decide that the hour had come to attack, even in the fact of risk of world war. Unless Germany should be rearmed, which no one dares so far to suggest, it is estimated that our allies could make available about 12 divisions for defense along the Rhine while the job would require 40 divisions with appropriate air support. I have heard earnest and intelligent advocates of the pact and military appropriations under it admit that what they are after is a psychological rather than logical effect on the nations; that actions in themselves inadequate or irrational may yet convince the world of our sincere intention to act against aggressors and thus strengthen the morale of our friends and weaken our potential enemies. Along that line of argument lie dangers: the danger of raising false hope, the danger of building up a whole network of national military machines insatiably crying for more; the danger of aggravating rather than minimizing the armament race without compensating guaranty of that precarious thing, military security.

I want to say that even on the military side we do not reckon just with the military strength of Russia and the satellite states, but with the probable fact that in the very military forces of France and Italy there would be a fairly high percent of Communists whose first loyalty would be to the Communist cause, not the most certain of allies, therefore. I noticed with regret a dispatch in this morning's paper showing some increase of the Communist vote in Sardinia, and of the Left Socialists, the so-called Left Socialists. Actually they are not left. And I think that has to be borne in mind in any computation of military affairs.

To guard against these dangers that I have referred to briefly many things should be done, some of them possibly by reservations to the pact or by action parallel to it. I stress the most important:

FRANCO SPAIN AND THE TREATY

1. It must be made absolutely plain that the United States will steadfastly oppose the inclusion of Franco's Spain in the pact. I am not too happy about Salazar and Portugal, nor am I inclined to think there is much strength from his membership. It is nonsense to think that in a military sense the poverty-stricken, tired Spaniards, many of whom hate Franco, would be an asset. The only use for Spain would be as a possible bastion behind the Pyrenees for American troops after the rest of Europe had been overrun by Communist forces. That is a grim outlook for American boys which can scarcely be tolerable to our allies. They want to be defended, not liberated once more after a horrible atomic war. To take Spain into the pact would be cynically to flout any contention of concern for democracy or regard for the moral character of government. Cruelty and intolerance in Spain parallel cruelty and intolerance in Communist countries. Franco cannot cleanse his hands of blood by wringing them in frantic protestations of hatred of communism. Cruelty and injustice are cruelty and injustice no matter under what flag they are committed or under what slogan they are sanctified.

COLONIAL POLICIES AND THE PACT

2. Steps must be taken so far as possible in conjunction with the United Nations to make it clear that the pact will not furnish moral or economic aid, directly or indirectly, to the wretched colonial wars which have been waged by the Netherlands and France in Indonesia and Indochina. These wars create a situation made to order for racist and communist exploitation against the United States. From Asia may yet come a greater peril to us than from Europe. The news of another agreement in Indonesia is good. This time it must be carried through to a fair and just peace with the satisfaction of Indonesian desires for independence, and we must not be blackmailed by the Netherlands or France into a support of their colonial policies on the ground that they are necessary to us in western Europe. We are necessary to them.

DISARMAMENT

3. The third provision which must accompany the ratification of the pact is the declaration that the effect of the pact must be to reduce and not increase total armament expenditures; that is, ours and theirs. It is clear that no practicable expenditure of itself will guarantee perfect safety. The steady increase of expenditure jeopardizes our own economy and tends to build up the military everywhere. It is appalling to think that we will be expected to help finance the European equivalent of our brass hats who, according to the Hoover Commission, do not know the meaning of proper budgeting, in Luxemburg, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway, Denmark, France, Britain, and possibly Salazar's Portugal. Think of all of them clamoring for more. It is fantastic to expect American taxpayers to accept so great a burden, and we would not get, as I think Senator Vandenberg is quoted as saying yesterday, and we would not be building, a sound Maginot line by any conceivable appropriation of that sort.

4. Most of all I want to urge that, preceding the ratification of the pact or accompanying it, there will be a mighty appeal by the United States for an end of the armament race under effective international controls which would make the pact unnecessary. The end of the armament race requires the universal abolition of peacetime military conscription, the demilitarization of narrow waterways and island bases, the liquidation of weapons of mass destruction, and the international control of atomic energy for peace, and the general reduction of national military forces down to a police level. These things will, of course, require a strengthening of the UN and provision for an international security force probably on a quota principle.

I do not think that the men in the Kremlin would accept the necessary controls, certainly not at first proposal. Nevertheless, an American appeal might be a beginning which would bear fruit sooner than we think. A continuance of the present armament race dooms mankind to poverty and war. It is quite true that you can preserve peace by overwhelming military superiority. You can preserve peace by fear, for a time, and somewhat precariously, but it is not conceivable that for the next generation there will be such a complete preponderance of force on our side that we will win the way a bulldog wins against a rabbit, because the rabbit knows he hasn't got a chance; and in this race, everything we know about history, everything we know about logic and psychology, make it entirely certain that after 30 more years of an armament race we will go to war. You get what you prepare for. In the meantime, Shaw's famous statement that "If the other planets are inhabited, the earth must be their lunatic asylum," is verified by what happens, for in every land less fortunate than our own not compulsorily disarmed, every night's sun goes down on children crying themselves to sleep for lack of bread, although every government is spending from 25 to 50 percent of its budget on arms and not getting security out of it. Economically it is the greatest boondoggling in the world, and I do not see a successful war against poverty anywhere, or on the food problem.

DANGERS OF ARMAMENT RACE

If there has to be this stress on arms, and inevitably the hate, the fear, the hysteria, that are necessary to support so great a burden everywhere, the continuance of the kind of cold war even on a less aggravated plane than now, inevitably that kind of thing will give rise to incidents that will bring war.

I do not think that there can be an end of conflict in the world so long as you are dealing with aggressive totalitarianism, but I think that the time may come when somebody will have the sense even on that side to realize that mankind is doomed so far as decent civilization, possibility ultimately that the human race is doomed, if we are to go on and on with this armament race, and that it is universally desirable to take it out of the realm of atomic war. To a certain extent we have done it in civil life. There are immense conflicts, even in America, that no one dreams will bring us to war, because there has been a change of attitude and in plans. There can't be a change of attitude and in plans while you have to maintain the attitudes and the economic burdens of the present armaments race. There are no logical limits that can easily be fixed to it. It is always more and more, and the Hoover Commission made it unnecessary for me to comment on the way the military budgets, even in America, are compiled.

That is why I wish with all my heart—I think something dramatic ought to be done—that Secretary Acheson, while this Assembly of the United Nations was still in session, would go before it and say, "We want nothing so much, we Americans, as a reasonable arrangement for stopping this thing that hurts the world so terribly." Now I know that that requires arrangements. I am not advocating unilateral disarmament. But I think we have made a psychological error in stressing that first such and such arrangements must be made and then we can talk about disarmament.

APPEAL FOR DISARMAMENT

I think that our President, our Secretary of State, should say to the world, "We know, we Americans, the desperate cost. We are temporarily the strongest of nations, but we know how this thing hurts and how terrible will be the effect of another war by reason of the improved methods of destruction which have been discovered and are going to be discovered so long as in every great country the leading brains in your physical laboratories and chemical laboratories are harnessed to the business of finding better ways to kill more people. We know it, and therefore we Americans tell you that we will hold up pacts and everything else until we can get a clear answer from the nations. Will you come into a plan, properly set up, with provision for international security? We won't dictate the plan. We have ideas; we want you to negotiate."

Sooner or later that has got to be done, because in the Atlantic Pact—I am not talking about my lifetime but the lifetime of my children and certainly my grandchildren will see an atomic war if this kind of armament race goes on, pact or no pact, and therefore I want now that appeal. It will do certain things even if it is rejected.

It will make the American people stop, look, and listen in their frantic and largely unconscious rush into militarism in the name of defense.

It will prove to the nations of the world our real and urgent desire for peace. If it is Stalin who refuses so beneficial a thing to mankind as transfer of conflict from the realm of atomic war and preparation for it, let him clearly be made to take the blame.

No iron curtain can keep from the peoples behind it all news of our proposal. Today we are making it easy for Stalin to regiment his people under the false but plausible pretext of our militarism, which he says is aggressive. We can, by the kind of appeal I urge, if it is properly made, greatly increase the difficulties of the dictators' tasks in Russia and in the satellite nations.

This appeal, accompanied by a standing and often repeated invitation for all nations to come in, could give to the North Atlantic Pact an obviously moral quality as purely a defense pact, which in no other way can it acquire in the minds of the peoples of the world. In any case, the appeal would launch a great idea, and ideas have a way of winning sometimes sooner than we think. For this proposal there is no rational substitute.

Our Congress should say that the money we would save on arms we shall use for the works of peace; among other things, to implement President Truman's offer of economic help that backward nations need the most. It is only by such economic help that large areas in Asia and Africa can be brought to a level on which healthy democracy is possible. We are blind if we do not see that in the long run the gravest dangers to the next generation are more likely to arise from an overcrowded Asia than even from Europe. Our foreign policy must never forget this fact. And in meeting that fact the North Atlantic Pact is more likely to be a hindrance than a help unless at least it is safeguarded along the lines of my proposal.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Thomas, as I understand it from the first part of your statement, you are for the ratification of the Atlantic Pact if it contains your suggestions.

Mr. THOMAS. I am for the ratification if, by reservation or more probably by parallel action, the things that I have suggested can be done, right.

PROPOSALS FOR ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT IN THE UN

The CHAIRMAN. You speak of disarmament, which is, of course, a very laudable enterprise. Is it not true that the United States endeavored to get a limitation and control of atomic energy, but Russia would not agree?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that is true, and it is also true that that is why I say that I do not expect immediate agreement from Russia, but still I think it is important to, as I say, sow the seeds of the idea.

May I say very respectfully that I was always rather critical of the way in which the very admirable Baruch plan was presented. It seems to me that what was actually happening was that we were saying we were going to do a wise and very generous thing about the weapons on which we held temporarily a monopoly, but without even in principle a consideration of the general issue of disarmament.

Now, as everybody admits, even if our plan for atomic energy had gone through, as I still hope it may some time, even if that plan, as revised by the committees of the UN, had gone through, it is generally admitted that in the event of war any nation having knowledge of atomic energy would use it in war, and you would have still had all the pressures and tensions of the arms race.

I think, therefore, that our proposal should have been a greater stress on disarmament, saying that the immediate problem was atomic energy, but that we were by no means stopping there. In other words, I do not think we were sufficiently clear or dramatic in presenting it.

If I may say so, I think that that has been a fault of our foreign policy right along with plain people. I haven't been in Europe. I haven't been in Asia since the war. But from time to time, through my Socialist connections, for instance, I see a good many people who come from those countries to the UN and so on, and the people I see are on our side. They are not advocates of Russian or Communist totalitarianism. But there is always the lurking suspicion, the lurking fear, often groundless if you like, or comparatively groundless, we Americans would say, and I think that in public affairs, especially with the world in its present mood, there is a tremendous necessity for a simple but dramatic appeal to get ideas launched.

Now, what Mr. Acheson did, and did rather brilliantly, was to make debaters' points against Stalin's insincere peace offensive. They are admirable debaters' points, but I have won, if I may say so, lots of debates and not an election, and it is possible to win debates and make next to no impression on the popular mind, especially the mind in Asia, for instance, which is already prejudiced because of race and other factors.

I feel very strongly on this point, and hence I am urging this appeal, even with the full knowledge of the difficulties of communism.

Senator, if I may say so, I was better aware of the nature of Communist obstruction than most Members of the United States Senate, quite a while before most Members. It isn't just a matter of Russia, it is a matter of communism, and I was warning against peace by appeasement and getting abused for it as far back as 1944, at least. So don't think I have an optimistic view. Only time marches on. There are evolutionary factors. Stalin isn't immortal. There is a chance for a split in the monolithic structure. The three great props of the Russian regime are the terrible secret police, the Army, and the rising class of industrial managers. And there is a lot of evidence that they don't love each other. I don't see how they can. Stalin's enormous prestige holds them together, and I am not predicting anything so fortunate as a good revolution in Russia. Our regard for revolution depends on the locale, and against whom.

But I am saying that there may be cracks in the monolithic structure, and that ideas can get in. I am saying that I think there is a terrific exaggeration of the degree to which Russians and certainly other people behind the iron curtain can be kept from some knowledge of what we are after. It is along those lines that I make my plea for this sort of an appeal. Why not? Nothing lost—much gained!

RELATIONSHIP OF ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Thomas, in regard to the control and regulation of atomic energy is it not true that our motive was that that question was the most imminent and dangerous, and therefore if we could bring about an arrangement of that kind it would contribute to disarmament?

MR. THOMAS. I understood that, and I want you to know that to the best of my ability I always supported the Baruch plan. But if I may use a rather hasty and crude illustration, which I don't doubt you can find flaws in when thinking it over, when you are dealing with a tiger you do not say, "Look, tiger, your teeth are your most dangerous point, and if you will kindly come down we will file them down." It seems to me when you are dealing with the arms race you are dealing with a total problem, and while you may have to act in detail in order to get results, and the most important detail was atomic energy, nevertheless the thing that mattered was the idea, and the idea that seems to me important was that nations could not afford war any more and could not afford victory under the circumstances of modern weapons. Neither Russia nor we could afford a victory in another war. Look what it has cost us to try to rehabilitate what we have now. Suppose after victory, weakened by losses, torn somewhat by internal dissension, we had to rehabilitate a world with hunger and hate rampant. Stalin would have an equal difficulty. I have no desire to talk to Stalin, nor do I believe that anybody's just talking to Stalin would work miracles, but I would like for somebody to say to Stalin that as a professed infallible Marxist he believes that the weapons, the tools, one uses shape the culture one has. Certainly the weapons that war is going to use will make war no longer a midwife for a Leninist revolution. It will be a midwife for death.

That is just a suggestion to the State Department. Get some of their ex-Marxists to tell it to Brother Stalin—and they have still got ex-Marxists around, don't forget.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not, however, be true, that if we could approach this matter on the atomic level that would be a great contribution to the general problem?

Mr. THOMAS. That would have, and that is why I always supported it, at the same time saying that I doubted it would work as an isolated thing. I even told that to Mr. Baruch, who, if I may quote him—he did not say it in confidence—said that was his original idea, but it wasn't the State Department's.

The CHAIRMAN. My thought was that every step that we can accomplish along the line would bring a nearer approach to the general problem of disarmament which you have in mind.

Mr. THOMAS. I think you are right, Senator, but it is like this: If you are having to go on a very hard journey, the important thing is not to concentrate on the importance of this step on the road. The important thing is to hold up to people a vision of the desirability, even the necessity, of arriving at the goal, and the goal at which we have got to arrive to be reasonably safe is, as I say, the end of the arms race and the transfer of conflict from the realm of atomic war, and I think that our statesmen—and I do not mistrust their motives—have made a mistake in their lack of holding up the goal. Great things are done by vision. The verse in the Bible which says "Where there is no vision the people perish" is a very practical verse, and if you have the vision you can find ways to do things, and if there isn't the vision clearly stated in a dull and oppressed and often horror-ridden world, it is hard to get people to do the next things they ought to do.

The CHAIRMAN. But in order to get total disarmament we would have to have seven or eight—

Mr. THOMAS. In order to get it you have to get what you haven't got. The way to get it is by pointing out its enormous desirability. I have said "total disarmament down to the police level in the States," and I recognize the necessity of strengthening the United Nations and of probably erecting an international security force. I do not minimize the difficulties, but I think that the thing that I look forward with most horror to is a world in which we go on sincerely desiring something better because we do not know how to do it and do not even therefore proclaim passionately what we want to do, and point out how logical is our proposal. What I say very briefly here is even from a Russian standpoint logical, except that Stalin is afraid of any inspection behind the iron curtain. It is logical to say to any nation, "No matter how you differ, we can't afford what modern war costs. We can't afford atomic and bacteriological devices and all the things scientists are constantly discovering."

Conflict? Yes. There are differences in interest, and so on. But it has to be lifted out of the realm of atomic war if there is to be a hope for civilization and democracy.

I suppose men would survive an atomic war. I know the present tendency is to diminish the absolute quality of the atomic weapon.

I notice we are now writing nice little essays on "How to Live With the Atom Bomb," and all you need to do is to make each city look like a doughnut and be sure you are in the right part of the doughnut when the bomb comes.

Granted there has been an exaggeration of the atomic bomb as a weapon, nobody knows what other weapons will be, and it is still bad enough to make what has always been a very terrible method of achieving good ends more futile, more frustrate, more self-defeating, and I think that for the United States, just because we are in our preeminent position, to say that loudly and clearly would not get immediate conversion, but it would get results and it would have the other effects I talk about in connection with the North Atlantic Pact, as a guaranty of the genuineness of our desire for defense.

STRENGTHENING THE UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Thomas, allow me to say that so far as your views about strengthening the United Nations, we have no opposition. In fact, I am sure the whole committee, and for that matter the Congress and the Government, are strongly in favor of strengthening the United Nations and trying to so modify it or amend it as to remove the delays and procrastinations and the confusion and opposition with which it has met in its workings. At San Francisco we had great hopes, and our hopes were based on the theory that the great nations would cooperate and would undertake to carry out the purposes and the ideals of the United Nations. In that hope we have been disappointed. But I still think that through the United Nations we will have a stronger hope, even, than before, that we may ultimately so improve it or modify it as to make it a more effective agency for the maintenance of world peace.

I think already, with its defects and with its obstructions, it has performed a great service in many respects.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree, Senator. I may say that I was critical of the UN. I still am, of its constitution, which probably may have been the best that was then possible. I still think we want to move toward a fuller type of world government, but I do not think you can get that tomorrow, and therefore I want not to weaken the UN. I want, in the administration of the Atlantic Pact, to strengthen the UN. But I do believe the UN would be stronger if a great idea could be preached through it and around it.

I want to acknowledge the fact, I think too much neglected in America, that the UN made, not a total contribution, but a real contribution, to a much more satisfactory settlement in the Middle East than we thought likely a year ago. I think the UN probably, even somewhat weakly, has nevertheless contributed to the desirability of renewed negotiations in Indonesia, and this time I hope they stick. I assure you that I want to defend the UN.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you will observe that in the treaty before us now there are a number of references to the United Nations, and in each instance the treaty recognizes the overriding authority of the United Nations and a desire to cooperate and not to hinder the United Nations.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that desire is genuine. I think circumstances sometimes make it difficult, and I must confess that I do not exactly think that the terms of the pact fit into what would be an ordinary construction of the covenant, but the times are extraordinary and I am not inclined to press that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. Well, Mr. Chairman, there is very little I want to talk with Mr. Thomas about. He always intrigues me because he gets so much sense into his presentation of Socialist views, and I think he has done that again.

Mr. THOMAS. It is native to Socialist views, Senator. The importation is much easier than if you are a Republican.

Senator VANDENBERG. That, of course, depends upon the point of view. Perhaps I could not expect you to be as generous as I am.

Mr. THOMAS. No. You can afford to be generous. You sit there.

NO IMPERIALIST OR AGGRESSIVE MOTIVES BEHIND PACT

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Thomas, in view of your willingness to see the pact ratified, I take it that it would be fair to summarize your attitude perhaps as follows: That you do not suspect any aggressive or imperialistic motives on the part of your own Government in proposing the North Atlantic Pact, but that you want to make it obviously and unmistakably plain to the world that our lack of aggressive and militaristic objectives can never be misunderstood by anybody.

Mr. THOMAS. That is entirely true. I have never said, and do not think, that the United States Government or people have imperialist ambitions. I have argued to the contrary. I think we can acquire them by the things we do in time. I think there are probably people that may have them. But the European notion that what we do is for our selfish advantage is rather fantastic; or that any great group thinks it is for our selfish advantage is, I think, somewhat fantastic.

Nevertheless, you have to deal with abnormal psychology among peoples, and the history of militarism warrants suspicion, and the means you use sometimes lead to ends that you do not originally calculate.

I will say about the North Atlantic Pact that the fact that it has Norway and Denmark in it I think means that there will be a considerable caution about any aggression, because they would be so easily the victims of it.

Senator VANDENBERG. And in the final analysis, you would look upon continued and insistent American leadership in behalf of universal disarmament under adequate disciplines as the maximum demonstration we would make of good faith?

Mr. THOMAS. As the maximum, Senator. You will notice that I also said things about not wanting Franco Spain in, and about my worry about the indirect effects of the pact on the Asiatic situation. I think they should be looked into. And I also think the test of the success of the pact will be whether, in the comparatively short time, it decreases rather than increases the total military burden. Otherwise it does not make sense. If every time you add more people officially to your side it costs you more, you are out of luck.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think that is all I have.

Mr. THOMAS. You will like to hear that I believe in reducing taxes when possible.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of taxes?

Mr. THOMAS. That is another subject—reducing it, not increasing it—just for the fun of increasing it, and the way to reduce it best would be along this military line if and when it becomes possible, and I profoundly hope that the Hoover report won't be in vain in that connection.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wiley, you are next.

Senator WILEY. Mr. Thomas, I am sorry I was not here when you gave your statement. I follow through with Senator Vandenberg, that I never hear you but what you intrigue me.

PENETRATING THE IRON CURTAIN

I just want to ask you one or two questions. How are we going to get behind the iron curtain of the Marxists? I am not talking about the physical curtain; I am talking about the iron curtain of the mind. How are we going to penetrate that?

Mr. THOMAS. You are not going to penetrate it with the convinced and fanatic, I would prefer, Leninists. But I do not believe myself that the hold of fanatical communism on masses of people, the conscious hold, is great, and I think that we can make it much harder for the fanatical Leninist, the fanatical Communist, to manipulate by propaganda, coercion, force, the popular mind and the popular action, by rather dramatic displays of the excellence of our intentions.

I say that with some reason. I knew a correspondent, an Australian correspondent, who was in Russia during the war, and he very much impressed me by his own belief in the rather lukewarm support. You remember that contrary to what we were told at the time, there were more potential Quislings in Russia than anywhere else. Ukrainia was profoundly disaffected, and several people, including this reporter, told me that if the Germans had not been so bestially cruel, they could have got it.

Now, I think from the Russians I have met, who have got out, and from people that I know from the satellite countries, that we greatly exaggerate the degree to which the Soviet has created the Soviet man, completely at the mercy of the propaganda departments of the Kremlin, and I think that we want to take extraordinary care to make it as hard and not as easy as possible for Stalin to do that job of controlling the mind.

I repeat, I am not thinking you will convert Molotov. Senators here know better than I, but my reading of the papers would indicate that he is not a likely candidate for conversion.

Senator WILEY. Is it true that in your judgment probably five or six million people only constitute what you might call the hierarchy of the Marxist movement in Russia, and the other 195,000,000 folks are just ordinary folks of different nationalities? I think it has been said there are 70 different tongues in Russia.

Mr. THOMAS. There are more than that. I have seen in Russia translations of over 100 languages used in some of their texts.

Senator WILEY. Considering that fact, considering the fact that there are only 5,000,000 folks who provide what you might call the police of this mind of Russia, of this 195,000,000 in the mass, I do not know but what you had some ideas of how we are going to penetrate that and bring, as I see it, to them the antidote to what Stalin is constantly apparently feeding them, and that is that they have to be fearful of us, fearful of the democratic processes.

Mr. THOMAS. The propaganda of the deed is the best, but I have been long the advocate of a kind of unofficial organization of Friends of Freedom, who would be concerned with getting in the truth, with helping refugees to get out. I happen to be one of those who believe that such an organization, which is now possibly under way, could play a very useful auxiliary role in the matter. I am a great believer in the possibility of the Voice of America, which is apparently well heard in the satellite states.

But when all is said and done, I think we have to have the propaganda of the deed. We have to show the working of our democracy in race relations and in economics. I have just been over to talk about that to the House. I also believe that we have got to be mighty careful, if I may say so, not to repeat the kind of speeches that were made in the House when the military bill was passed. The reaction was shocking, and deservedly so, to Representative Cannon. What Cannon said, in effect, was "We shall carry on a war of annihilation by superior weapons from the air while we ask the last Frenchman to do the dirty work on the ground for us," and that kind of speech can do incalculable harm.

Those are the things we have to take into account.

Senator WILEY. Have you any other suggestions?

Mr. THOMAS. I wish I did. I assure you this haunts me. If we get rid of this business of the cold war, I think not perfectly, perhaps in a blundering fashion, we would solve our domestic problems. But this is a shadow over everything.

ENDING THE COLD WAR

Senator WILEY. It has been suggested here by some folks that another convention, another great call for the nations of earth, an appeal to Russia through the State Department and through other agencies, might be successful. What is your idea about that?

Mr. THOMAS. I am very sympathetic with the notion and with the people who make it, but cannot convince myself that just a general call, "Come on, let's have a great convention!" will get very far. You see, in years gone by I have had my experiences with kindness, and you do not get further by handling the kind of fights that you have just on general principles. I think if you can say "Even you Stalin, cannot afford victory in war, much less defeat; your people can't afford this arms race," then you might have something practical to set up a properly organized conference through UN auspices for the strengthening of the UN. But I do not believe that just a general go-to, now, "Let us have a better world government," or "Let us have more friendship," would at the moment work.

I emphasize "at the moment," because I repeat that time marches on for others than Henry Luce, and that things change.

Senator WILEY. Then your conclusion, as in your answer to Senator Vandenberg, is that for the time being the pact, in your judgment, should become a reality, and that supplementing that we should take every human way that we can conceive of to try to bring about a meeting of minds between the peoples and the leaders of earth?

EFFECT OF FAILURE TO RATIFY

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, that is right. I think it is the lesser evil. I have already said that I was a critic of the approach of the pact. I still am. My criticisms have not been removed. But I think that now our refusal to ratify it would play into the hands in France, for instance, of De Gaullists and possibly of Communists themselves, by still further weakening the none-too-strong democratic forces in France. I fear a similar thing would happen in Italy, and possibly in the smaller countries, and for that reason, things having gone to that point, I favor ratification with the accompanying actions which we have discussed.

Senator WILEY. Does that imply that you thought before steps were taken to put the pact into reality there was an alternative?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes.

Senator WILEY. What was that?

ALTERNATIVES BEFORE SIGNATURE OF PACT

Mr. THOMAS. The real thing we are anxious to do, as I take it, is to give the assurance to the peoples of western Europe that they are not going to stand alone, that we are back of them, to give assurance to other decent people that we are back of them. I think a way could have been found by the same patience and ingenuity that went into the pact for America to give that assurance within the United Nations and without the formalities of this pact, and the doubts that it raises concerning relationships with the UN. In no case are we promising automatically to go to war, not even under the pact, as several Senators have made plain and they have to make plain.

Senator WILEY. That is just your belief. Have you anything to base that on, that the pact is, well, let's say, out of time, that it was not necessary to have it?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, look. If we had time, you have no idea how many debates I would like to have as to what might have been, and if we were now arguing, "Shall we proceed along the line of this pact or shall we proceed through other devices to give assurance to the nations that we will regard aggression against them as aggression against us?" and at the same time to strengthen the movement toward a United States of Europe, as I think in general we are, I think it would have been much preferable.

Senator WILEY. Is not the analogy you used a little while ago, that you do not argue with a tiger, you do not just try and fix his teeth, the situation we face in the world, that the human mind in many senses is berserk?

Mr. THOMAS. If that is the case, neither the North Atlantic Pact nor anything else will do you much good, because no one believes the North Atlantic Pact of itself is so overwhelming as to make war out of the question. If the mind has gone completely berserk, we are lost. I personally do not think so. I think there are evidences of some recovery of the mind. Anyway, that is what we have to gamble on, and I believe that the North Atlantic Pact ought to be appraised primarily in that setting; as of now, I think it had better be ratified, with the accompanying things I have spoken about.

Senator WILEY. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

FAILURE TO RATIFY

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Thomas, I am sorry that I did not get to hear all of your statement, because I have been very interested in your views, but I gather that you feel that under present circumstances, at this moment, everything that is done and by, that the adoption of the North Atlantic Pact will be of assistance in reorienting or re-strengthening the common mind of those who have a will to peace, such as you were talking about to Senator Wiley.

Mr. THOMAS. Possibly, but that is not what I was affirming. I was affirming that it would be much less dangerous than the rejection of the pact. We are, in my judgment, in a difficult world, where we often have to make choices of relative evil. Nobody would have desired, even the best friends of the North Atlantic Pact would not have desired, at the time of the framing of the San Francisco Charter, that it should come into being. We are dealing with choices of evils, and on that I think it is better to ratify the pact, with the accompanying provisions that I have discussed.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I was not attempting to suggest that your basic idea was that, necessarily, but I have tried to preface my question on the statement that, considering everything that has gone before, and the situation that we find confronting us here with the pact either up for ratification or for refusal—

Mr. THOMAS. I am not too happy about it, but that is how it looks to me.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And that under all those circumstances, as we presently find them now, a ratification of the pact would contribute more to the reorientation of our composite picture.

Mr. THOMAS. If by parallel action some of these other things I have discussed are done.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. May I, again prefacing my question upon the fact that it exists, and not as theory as it might have been existing before the pact was signed. I take it that you believe that ratification of the pact will be on the plus side rather than on the minus side in our struggle for future peace?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; but I can imagine that I might say "No" if, for example, there should happen what I do not think will happen; if there should be a few more speeches in favor of the pact on the order of Representative Cannon's. I would say that the ratification was a mistake. If there should be an open invitation to Franco Spain to come in. I would say ratification of the pact was a mistake. If anybody should say secretly or openly to the Dutch or the French, "This gives you a better chance to clean up those people over in Asia or Indonesia," I would say the ratification is a mistake.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I believe that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Thomas, we have present Senator Donnell, by courtesy of the committee, and he would like to ask you some questions.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be very happy to answer Senator Donnell as best I can.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Thomas, I want to call to the attention of the committee, and also of yourself, the concluding three sentences of your prepared statement, and to ask you a question based on them.

Mr. THOMAS. Surely.

SAFEGUARDING THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. They read:

We are blind if we do not see that in the long run the gravest dangers to the next generation are more likely to arise from an overcrowded Asia than even from Europe. Our foreign policy must never forget this fact.

And then, Mr. Thomas, finally, this sentence in your statement:

And in meeting that fact the North Atlantic Pact is more likely to be a hindrance than a help unless at least it is safeguarded along the lines of my proposal.

That is your belief, is it not?

Mr. THOMAS. That is my belief.

Senator DONNELL. Now, am I correct or incorrect in understanding, Mr. Thomas, that it is your belief that the North Atlantic Pact is more likely to be a hindrance than a help unless at least it is safeguarded along the lines of your proposal?

Mr. THOMAS. That is my belief; and I refer there in particular to the delicate but very important task of conveying unmistakably to the French and Dutch Governments that they cannot virtually blackmail us into indefinite support of their colonial wars. I hope the Dutch are already on the road to peace.

As I remember the figures, we have given the Netherlands just about the help that it has cost them to have won their expedition in Indonesia. Harold Isaacs, just back from Indonesia, in one of the most eloquent and impressive of short speeches—he is a correspondent of Newsweek—that I have heard, told about the terrible impression of Indonesia on the plain men and women of Indonesia because Dutch troops looked like Americans, so completely do they wear our equipment.

DANGERS OF THE ATLANTIC PACT

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Thomas, I want to ask you, so there will be no misunderstanding on the part of either myself or anyone else, this question, without any qualification whatsoever in my question. I want to ask you, Do you believe this morning, as you sit here in this chair, that the North Atlantic Pact is more likely to be a hindrance than a help unless at least it is safeguarded along the lines of your proposal?

Mr. THOMAS. Most emphatically. I have a habit of writing what I believe and sticking to it to the best of my ability.

Senator DONNELL. And what do you mean by saying that "it is more likely to be a hindrance than a help"? Would you be kind enough to define that clause?

Mr. THOMAS. In several ways. I have suggested one of them. It might encourage the, I think, very stupid Dutch and French policies in southeast Asia. I think, unless safeguarded, with Salazar keeping on asking for Franco in, it might encourage and strengthen Franco's position, which I do not want strengthened. I am not asking intervention against Franco. But I think we are in an intolerable position in the all-important business of capturing the imagination and loyalty of peoples, unless we take a stand against cruelty, and if it were time and appropriate, I could tell you things that have happened in Spain that are exactly parallel to what we complain of justly in the Communist countries.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Thomas, I have been greatly interested in both the questions that have been presented to you by the committee, with whose views you may possibly know I am not entirely in accord in many respects—

Mr. THOMAS. I read that.

RATIFICATION WITH ACCOMPANYING PROPOSALS

Senator DONNELL. I have noticed with great interest the fact that there has been repeated questioning by the members of the committee, and certain of them particularly, to bring out from you that under all the existing present circumstances you would be in favor of the ratification of the pact, but I have noticed with equal interest the fact that in each time, I believe—maybe one time just solely in the context—you have said in substance, "Yes," with the concurrent inclusion or passing, enactment, or whatever the term may be, of your proposal. Am I right in that?

Mr. THOMAS. You are entirely right. It would be presumptuous for me to dictate the way in which these supplementary things could be done. I dream about a reservation saying that the pact will not go into operation until this appeal for the end of the armament race under the proper sanctions has been made and rejected. But I can imagine other ways of accomplishing the same result. I am not dictating the tactics. But I am saying that the moral effect unmistakably must be made of the proposals that I have advanced if the North Atlantic Pact is to be potentially useful.

Senator DONNELL. Rather than a menace?

Mr. THOMAS. Rather than a menace; right.

Senator DONNELL. You think it is essential that there be adopted practically simultaneously with the ratification of the pact the proposal you make in your statement this morning?

Mr. THOMAS. That is entirely correct.

Senator DONNELL. And I have noticed also that in your response to these numerous questions designed to put you here on record that you are in favor of the ratification of this pact you have each time, with possibly the one exception which I think may be explained by the context, either used the expression "Yes, ratification with my proposal" or the equal words "If my proposal be adopted." Am I correct in my interpretation?

Mr. THOMAS. You are entirely correct, but you see I do not want the implication to go out that I think these proposals are so unacceptable to the State Department and to the supporters of the pact that they cannot be carried out. I believe they ought to be acceptable to the supporters of the pact and should be carried out. I want to emphasize that.

Senator DONNELL. And I take it that you believe that your proposals are entirely in harmony with the expressed desire of the State Department?

Mr. THOMAS. If the State Department means what it says, and I see no reason to doubt it, then the State Department ought to be more eager than I for some dramatic proof. If the State Department means what Mr. Jessup has said at time about Indonesia, it ought to accept wholeheartedly what I propose.

About Spain we get all kinds of confused reports, but I do not think that Eric Johnston and I are in the State Department yet.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Thomas, you mentioned a few minutes ago that you are not too happy about this pact, or words to that effect. Am I correct in that?

Mr. THOMAS. You are right.

Senator DONNELL. And you also said in your printed statement [reading]:

I thought there were better ways for the United States to assure the nations of the world of all practicable support against military aggression.

Do you still believe that?

Mr. THOMAS. As of the past, yes, but now that the pact is negotiated, no.

Senator DONNELL. I am coming to that point in just a few minutes, about the negotiation of the pact and the effect of it. Therefore, and if I am wrong you want to correct me, what you are advising is the ratification of the pact with your proposal.

Mr. THOMAS. Right.

Senator DONNELL. And I am not clear whether you are here advising the ratification of the pact if your proposal be discarded.

Mr. THOMAS. No; I am not. If my proposals are discarded I am not advising ratification of the pact.

Senator DONNELL. That is perfectly clear.

Mr. THOMAS. There is a time. It is conceivable that it would take some time to carry out these proposals, but I would have to be assured of a very genuine and effective will to carry them out before I would favor it.

Senator DONNELL. And if you are not given that assurance, and that assurance is not based on reasonable probability that it will be carried out, you are not here advising that that be ratified?

Mr. THOMAS. That is right, because I think if these things are now carried out I could explain to my friends in Europe that we weren't letting them down, that we were insisting on certain provisions which ought to accompany it. But I do not want the pact turned down or these provisions lost sight of.

Senator DONNELL. In other words, you want them both adopted, and you are not here advising ratification of the pact unless both of them are adopted, or you are given reasonable assurances that they will be.

Mr. THOMAS. I am for both, and therefore I can conceivably be no 100-percent friend of either side in the debate.

Senator DONNELL. I understand you are here advocating the adoption of the pact plus either the adoption of your proposal or assurance it will be adopted, and you are not here arguing the ratification of the pact unless that assurance or adoption of your proposal be given to you; is that right?

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct.

Senator VANDENBERG. Will the Senator yield?

Senator DONNELL. Surely.

IMPLEMENTATION OF MR. THOMAS' PROPOSALS

Senator VANDENBERG. The Senator spent a great deal of time nailing this thing down very categorically. Let us be sure now that we do all understand you as anxiously as the able Senator from Missouri.

You have also said repeatedly that there are different ways of implementing the objectives.

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct.

Senator VANDENBERG. And you are not submitting as a categorical requirement that the memorandum submitted by you this morning must show up in similar form in connection with the action of Congress?

Mr. THOMAS. Of course not, because the amendment isn't based on a form. For instance, to make it explicit, there is a rule that I think would have validity for our cosigners in the adoption of law. The Supreme Court considers the debate, does it not, in the interpretation of law? The nature of the debate will be extremely helpful. The statements already made by both of you gentlemen have been, I think, definitely helpful.

Senator VANDENBERG. The committee report could be particularly authentic.

Mr. THOMAS. The committee report could make an immense difference. I think in connection with Asia, the statement carefully worked out by the State Department concerning our attitude on Asia might fill the bill. A statement to the effect that, a kind of underscored statement since there are continual references to it, Franco Spain will not be eligible to the pact, could be made in half a dozen ways, and the more of them the better.

May I say that I am discussing the pact. I am not necessarily discussing the question of ambassador, more or less. I am discussing the administration of the pact.

Senator VANDENBERG. I beg your pardon.

Senator DONNELL. That's all right.

The CHAIRMAN. May I intervene just a moment?

INCLUSION OF SPAIN

Mr. THOMAS, of course Spain is not a member of the pact at present, and would it not require the unanimous consent of all of the members of the pact to admit Spain?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, I believe so.

The CHAIRMAN. Isn't that wholly improbable?

Mr. THOMAS. It is improbable, but I do not want us to be urging it or seem to other nations to be urging it or that it shall be thought that will urge it.

I remember shortly after the publication of the pact somebody published an interview with Salazar already raising the question of Spain's admission, and so great is our power that, to put it rather brutally, we could probably bulldoze other nations into saying yes. I don't want any hint of that.

The CHAIRMAN. That would have probably come up in the negotiations, if there had been anything of that kind.

Mr. THOMAS. No, because if I were what I am not, if I were an advocate of the admission of Spain, as I think some people in high office are. I would go slow. You know, the way you get things done is to say you aren't going to do them until the last minute.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Thomas, in connection with Spain, I was not on the floor of the Senate yesterday, but I was on for a few minutes while the distinguished chairman of this very committee, Senator Connally, was discussing Spain, not at all with respect to entry into the pact, so far as I heard, and I am quite confident he was not. But I would like the record at this time, in this proceeding, to show the fact that the subject of Spain and the recognition by this country of Spain, and the appointment of diplomatic representatives, was under discussion in the Senate on the floor yesterday, and participated in, I think I am understanding and inferring correctly, with the general idea of approval by the chairman of this committee of the appointment of diplomatic representatives from one nation to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. If I may intervene right there, the Senator from Texas was not taking part in any debate. He was busy here on the committee and walked into the Senate. Senator Brewster, of Maine, was advocating diplomatic representatives to Spain, and he propounded the question to me which perforce I answered. I told him that I thought we should have diplomatic representation in Spain, not for Spain's benefit but for our own benefit. We send ambassadors abroad to serve this country and to keep posted as to all transactions. But I in no sense, and I specifically stated that I did not, approve of the Government of Spain or her institutions, but said that we had diplomatic representatives in Russia, we have diplomatic representatives in all of the satellite countries, and I saw no logical reason why we should not have a diplomatic representative in Spain. That is all there is to that.

MR. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, may I say on that, since it has come up, that I am on record years ago as having said that I thought the business of expressing disapproval by withdrawing ambassadors was very dubious.

The CHAIRMAN. Right.

SPANISH QUESTION BEFORE THE UNITED NATIONS

MR. THOMAS. The more difficult your relations, the more truly you need a good guy, I mean a good statesman, to represent you; and so even back in the days of our dealings with Germany I did not think the way to express disapproval was to withdraw an ambassador. I am still of that opinion on the general issue.

Here you have a special issue. Contrary to what I would have thought were the wisest tactics, it became a sort of a matter of United Nations action to express disapproval of Spain through lack of diplomatic representatives. By the way, there is not a complete lack of diplomatic representatives; it is just the top that you take off. In other words, I believe that usually if you want something done you send the boss and not the office boy, but diplomacy is wonderful!

Now, having got started this way, I think that to change it now, and under the pressures now, would be a mistake, or for us to urge it would be a mistake, because in politics, as you well know, actions cannot be judged with simple, cold logic. They have to be judged in their psychological setting and in their psychological effect. Hence I am not for the immediate sending of an ambassador to Spain, although I want to be on record for about the tenth time in discussions of this sort as objecting from the beginning to the notion that you make effective progress by recalling an ambassador.

CRUELITIES IN SPAIN

I would like to give you an illustration about Spain, if I may take time. Last summer I wrote a letter to the President, or the State Department, asking if we could get authentic information about the horrible atrocity that was reported in the Asturias, you may recall, when 22 men, allegedly for no offense that was announced except trying to form a union, were arrested by Spanish gendarmes, dynamite sticks tied between their legs, and thrown down a dry well, and to make sure the dynamite would go off they poured burning kerosene over them. I asked for an inquiry and I got from the State Department assurance that it would be made.

I never got any report, although later, through the British Government indirectly, I did get a report, giving the names and family histories of 9 of the victims. There were 22 in all.

I don't think our policy has helped much, when we could not more effectively speak out against that outrageous atrocity.

Recently, as you know, 8 or 9 or 10—we get very little real information from Spain—men were convicted and 2 or 3 were given death sentences and the others life sentences for trying to form unions in the Asturias. One of them was a man named Nadau, who had made a very heroic record of resistance in France, in which country he was a refugee from Franco, and had been decorated after the liberation of France by both the French and British. He went back to his own country and was trying to form a union. That is the only charge against him. He was arrested and sentenced to death. A little dispatch said that the Pope had intervened, in this case through the papal nuncio, and Franco graciously gave him 30 years. I am not sure but what I would have taken death, and I reckon the Pope asked for something less than 30 years. That is too much like Cardinal Mindszenty's sentence.

It is that kind of thing that is continually going on in Spain, along with all the intolerances for which we ought not to apologize, and there is no consideration of expediency which will strengthen us in the minds of the world in defending democracy by condoning the horrible brutality and the cruelty of this unilateral one-party Government headed by Franco, and of that I want to make an emphatic declaration.

SENATOR DONNELL. I want it clear, Mr. Thomas, that I am not discussing the question of Spain, the matter of ambassadors, or placing ambassadors in Spain. The point I desired the record to show was that the subject of the relations between this country and Spain was on the floor of the Senate yesterday.

Now, Mr. Thomas, what was it you said in regard to the possible future effect of an address similar to that delivered by Congressman Cannon recently? Should it be repeated? What did you say about that?

MR. THOMAS. I said, if it should happen, and I am reasonably sure it will not, that an address in support of the pact should be made in the terms that Mr. Cannon used in support of his military appropriations, it would be disastrous, and would go far to make us appear as genuinely and rather callously willing to be militarists at other people's expense.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Thomas, 20 years is a long time. You referred to 30 years. You know the term of this treaty is 20 years, do you not?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

INCLUSION OF PORTUGAL

Senator DONNELL. And it is impossible, I take it, is it not, Mr. Thomas, to anticipate either the vagaries of individuals or the contingencies that may arise between countries over a period of 20 years. That is correct, of course, is it not?

Mr. THOMAS. Right.

Senator DONNELL. You mentioned in the course of your testimony, and since have, Portugal. I call to your attention this language in the preamble of the North Atlantic Treaty, referring to the parties to this treaty:

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law.

May I ask you, Mr. Thomas, whether you think Portugal, which I believe is one of the signatories—I know it is—comes within the definition of a country, as it is presently being administered, whose common heritage and civilization are founded on principles of democracy?

Mr. THOMAS. Emphatically not.

Senator DONNELL. You do know that Portugal's representative was here and made an address and signed the treaty on behalf of Portugal, with the consent of the other 11? That is right, is it not?

Mr. THOMAS. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Thomas, at one point in your original testimony there was a very short expression which I think might be ambiguous unless it were explained. I think in substance you did make it perfectly clear a little later, but at one point you said something about "It will make the American people stop, look, and listen in their frantic, and largely unconscious, rush into militarism in the name of defense." My recollection is that that sentence was not preceded, as it is in your written statement, by what I think you meant, namely, "An American appeal, properly made" will do so and so.

Mr. THOMAS. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. So the by-term "It" you are not referring to the North Atlantic Treaty, but you are referring to an American appeal, properly made.

Mr. THOMAS. Absolutely. Thank you for making that 1,000 percent clear.

Senator DONNELL. I think I want to ask, if I may, just one question on this point. Senator Vandenberg a few minutes ago said that you are not insisting on the form of the appeal which is set forth in your statement this morning.

Mr. THOMAS. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. I take it that you are not insisting, am I not correct, on the language of it or the form of it, but that you are insisting on the substance of it.

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. You have read the North Atlantic treaty, I assume?

Mr. THOMAS. Indeed.

Senator DONNELL. And you have studied it with care?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Thomas, I do not know your background. What was your profession or business before you became active in public life?

Mr. THOMAS. I was a clergyman, and after that I was an editor.

Senator DONNELL. Where was your editorial work?

Mr. THOMAS. At various publications. I was at one time associate editor of the Nation. I have been connected with other publications. I was also secretary of an organization known as the League for Industrial Democracy, and various other jobs.

Senator DONNELL. And as a clergyman, of what denomination?

Mr. THOMAS. Presbyterian.

Senator DONNELL. Where did you practice your profession of the ministry?

Mr. THOMAS. In New York.

Senator DONNELL. New York City?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. I think, being from Missouri, you would agree that that being a wicked place, it was a proper place to go, would you not?

Senator DONNELL. I will make no commitment along that line. I might get into serious trouble with some of my New York friends.

PROVISIONS FOR WITHDRAWAL AND EXPULSION

But, Mr. Thomas, referring to the matter of Communists, have you in your study of this treaty found anything from beginning to end in it which says that if a country, one of these 12 signatories, should become a Communist country during the 20 years that it could either voluntarily withdraw or be expelled? Is there any such thing in this treaty?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I did not see it there. I should imagine that on just plain common sense it would withdraw or be expelled. I do not think this lack of specific certification to that effect would make too much difficulty.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Thomas, I think that your point as to the common sense that you would expect to be evidenced here in the treaty—I am not quoting your language; I am putting it in my language—that the common sense of providing some means for withdrawal or expulsion is very impressive, but what I am asking you is if you have found anything in this treaty which makes provision for either withdrawal or expulsion.

Mr. THOMAS. There I want to say a word for the State Department. If you are negotiating a treaty with your friends, now, if you do something very bad, it is all over. At least you try to avoid that. It is assumed, I imagine.

I am not a lawyer, and I may be wrong. That would be my assumption.

Senator DONNELL. May I inquire of Senator Connally, please, from his experience and knowledge, is there any provision in the Charter of the United Nations for withdrawal?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes.

Senator DONNELL. There is a provision in the Charter of the United Nations?

The CHAIRMAN. There is a resolution, but no express provision in the Charter.

Senator DONNELL. There is a resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know of any similar resolution that has been adopted by the signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I do not, Senator.

COMMUNIST STRENGTH IN EUROPE

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Thomas, yesterday we had the privilege of hearing Mr. James P. Warburg. In the course of his testimony he stated, and I will quote the sentence without the context; perhaps I ought to read two sentences to make it clear [reading]:

If military manpower were to be recruited in western Germany, it is clear, I think, that two things could happen. Russian retaliation would be provoked, and the already dubious morale of any potential French Army would be destroyed. I say "the already dubious morale" because we cannot ignore the fact that with 25 percent of France voting Communist, the Russians have a far more dangerous fifth column in France today than the Nazis had in 1940.

Do you agree with the statement of fact as contained in what I have read, that there is 25 percent of France today voting Communist?

Mr. THOMAS. That would seem to be shown by the polls. There is some encouragement to believe that communism is progressively weakening, and that men would act as Frenchmen rather than as Communists, but I regard as very serious the Communist strength in both Italy and France. It is one of the factors we have to contend with, and as I understand the sentences you read from Mr. Warburg, I should fully agree with him.

For instance, I should certainly agree that were we to rearm western Germany, the Russians would rearm eastern Germany, and the French would have a fit.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know, Mr. Thomas, speaking of Italy, how far the parties signatory to the North Atlantic Treaty could go toward rearming Italy without a violation of the peace treaties?

Mr. THOMAS. No. I know they could not go too far under the peace treaty.

Senator DONNELL. You have mentioned something to the effect that no one believes that this treaty will provide—you used the term, I think—"overwhelming" force, or words to that effect. Did you use that?

Mr. THOMAS. What I said was, looking down the vista of the years, say 20 or 30 years, no one believes that this treaty will indefinitely provide such completely overwhelming superiority to an eastern Russian bloc which may make use in time of Chinese manpower so that we can win simply the way the bulldog wins on the rabbit, that there is no use fighting.

Senator DONNELL. Are you familiar with these two sentences in the President's inaugural address:

If we can make it sufficiently clear in advance that any armed attack affecting our national security would be met with overwhelming force, the armed attack might never occur. I hope soon to send to the Senate a treaty respecting the North Atlantic security plan.

Do you recall that as appearing in the President's address?

Mr. THOMAS. Very well.

Senator DONNELL. That is all, Mr. Thomas. I thank you and the committee very much.

Mr. THOMAS. May I say to you, Senator Connally and Senator Vandenberg, that I appreciate the courtesy you showed in making it possible for me to come a little out of order at this time. It was the only time I could come, and I am very grateful.

The CHAIRMAN. We are very grateful to you. We thank you very much, Mr. Thomas, for a very enlightening and able presentation of your views.

Dr. Phillips Elliott.

STATEMENT OF DR. PHILLIPS ELLIOTT, FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION

Dr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, on Good Friday, April 15, a statement signed by 31 clergymen was released to the press. This statement expressed concern regarding the Atlantic Pact and attempted to sound a warning against its adoption. I am appearing today on behalf of this group of clergymen to express in spoken words the convictions which that statement made on that earlier date. A copy of this statement has, I think, been placed in your hands, and with your permission will be inserted in the record.

(The statement referred to, entitled "Statement on Atlantic Pact," reads as follows:)

STATEMENT ON ATLANTIC PACT

During this Lenten season in the year of our Lord, 1948, the thoughts of Christian people in the United States, as elsewhere, are necessarily often occupied with consideration of the North Atlantic Pact. A study conference under the auspices of the department of international justice and good will of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, recently held, was unable to decide either to support or to reject this proposal. It is appropriate in these circumstances that individual Christians and groups should share with each other their thinking about a step which is generally recognized as the most important in American foreign policy since the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine.

The Atlantic Pact provides for bringing the nations of western Europe and the United States into a military alliance. Some advocates of this step hold that it must not be regarded as anything but a highly dubious and a temporary expedient. They desire that it should be so used and so represented that it may not be a manifestly and aggressively hostile policy but one to be developed or superseded in a constant pursuit of world concord and cooperation. It is the contention of these advocates that under such conditions Europe's fear of a new retreat into isolationism on the part of the United States would be allayed. They believe that building up and pooling the military might of the countries involved and putting Russia on notice that an armed attack on any one of them will be regarded as an act of war against all, will deter Russia from attempting further to extend her power sphere. Thus the countries of western Europe will be saved from Communist domination, and economic recovery and stabilization, based on what may yet be accomplished by an increasing exchange of goods between east and west under the Marshall plan, will become possible in the democratic world generally. It is furthermore suggested that there are forces at work in Russia and in countries of the Soviet bloc, which will before long result in the drastic alteration of the present Soviet policy, provided that a firm and united attitude on the part of the democratic nations against further Russian aggression makes it clear that the men in the Kremlin are not all-powerful and must substantially moderate their course.

Admittedly this is a gamble. It also admittedly means continuance at present of the policy of the cold war in a divided world. This is the crucial and ominous fact, even if we assume that the policy of which the North Atlantic Pact is a part, is purely "defensive," which of course Americans would find it impossible to believe if conditions were reversed and Russians were entering into a military pact with Latin-American nations.

It is hoped—sincerely hoped by many who are as deeply troubled as we are—that this threat of possible resort to war against Russia will end the danger of war; but we need to face unflinchingly and honestly what are the instrumentalities with which the cold war is being waged. The adoption of the Atlantic Pact means continued stock piling of atomic and biological weapons, continuance of peacetime conscription, increase in the already colossal arms budget, building a world-wide spy network, maintenance of military bases around the world, no relaxation in military influence of education, science, industry, and commerce, to say nothing of the periodic waves of national hysteria without which none of these measures could be maintained.

The United States has already gone a long way down this road, and there is ominous likelihood that ultimately it will prove to be a disastrous road. We cannot believe that peace and righteousness will be found at the end if we keep traveling it. Mankind has tried these methods of military alliances and armament rivalries for many centuries. They have led to disaster in the past. Humbly we submit that to depend upon them for deliverance now, after two world wars and in face of the nature of modern war and the character of the weapons which it employs, reveals that men are no longer behaving rationally and have become morally calloused about the diabolical nature of the weapons which nations use today in the defense of their interests and in the pursuit of the values they cherish.

The dilemma in which thoughtful citizens, and especially Christians, now find themselves becomes more complicated and painful with each fresh crisis. It is always impossible to find a satisfying answer to the crisis of the moment taken in isolation. The next step toward ruin can always be made to seem inevitable in the light of the one preceding it; while each time the hope is held out that this will be the last such step and—despairingly—men grasp at that hope. For that very reason it will be a catastrophe of the first order if the American people and their leaders now allow themselves to be content with this one more step on the old road of power politics, armament rivalry, and cold war.

The hour is already very late. It is time to make a decisive turn, to take another and a better road. This means that the American people, as well as people everywhere, need a new sense of direction, a greater moral sensitiveness, a new faith and dynamic to drive out the feeling of helplessness which now holds them in thrall. Preeminently it is the Christian church upon which the responsibility rests to summon men and nations to cast way their self-righteousness and complacency; to call them to deep moral repentance; to allay the fears which are driving them to deeds of madness; and to release spiritual springs for cooperative attitudes and actions. It is for the Christian church, especially during this Lenten season, to speak the word of peace and reconciliation in the midst of strife, suspicion, fear, and hate.

Were the Christian church to utter such a distinctive word, and instead of supinely underwriting national policy set about creating a new spiritual climate, new political possibilities might very well, in God's providence, open up. The American people might give new expression to their generous impulses and turn to feeding and helping foe as well as friend; for so Jesus taught. Quietly and persistently they might practice righteousness and establish equality among all races in their own land, that the democratic way of life might become a shining reality and an example which all peoples might be eager to follow. The American people might then make clear to their Government their desire that American foreign policy should be based upon:

(1) Loyal support and consistent use of the United Nations and its instrumentalities.

(2) A ringing and persistent call therefore for the resumption of serious efforts to secure universal abolition of national military establishments at the earliest possible moment, as an evidence of the earnest desire of the people of the United States to dispel the dense fog of suspicion which now blocks all movement on the road to disarmament.

(3) Unremitting efforts to explore the possibilities of negotiating peace with the Soviet Government; and the use to that end, not of fear inspired by our arsenal of atomic weapons, which can only lead to counterarming, desperation, or a temporary sullen retreat, but of a resolute good will.

Penitently those who sign this statement confess that no less than others they have failed so to surrender themselves to the will of God and so to venture on faith in the power of Christ as to enable the church, which is the body of that Christ, to speak peace to this weary and troubled age.

Men and women from various parts of the land, however, seeing to what extent human wisdom is frustrated and human power, turned upon itself, has been brought to naught, have asked us to call on Christian leaders and people to set apart a time for prayer and fasting, that our minds and hearts may be purified and wisdom may be given to our people and their Government in this critical hour. We are certain that these requests reflect a deep-seated feeling in the hearts of multitudes; and so we heed this exhortation to turn anew to the eternal source of wisdom and peace and to ask all our fellows to do likewise.

We trust that many churches and groups will be moved to set apart special periods for prayer and fasting, individual and corporate. All to whom this message comes will, we feel sure, wish to devote increasing time to daily prayer.

Whittemore, Ministers in Honolulu, T. H.

The signers of this statement were acting as individuals in signing it. Their official connections are given merely for purposes of identification.

Dr. ELLIOTT. Our chief concern—I am speaking now of the 31 men whose names are appended to this statement, all of them clergymen of various denominations, some of them teachers in theological seminaries—

Senator DONNELL. Is it the intention of the gentleman to put the list of names in too?

Dr. ELLIOTT. They are right with the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be all right.

WORLD DIVISION

Dr. ELLIOTT. Our chief concern, speaking of this group now that issued this statement on Good Friday, regarding the contemplated pact is that it accepts the principle of a divided world. Already people are talking of "our allies" and "our enemies." The great conflict in economic and political philosophies of which the United States and the Soviet Union are the spokesmen is allowed by the pact to harden into a permanent pattern of division. Frontiers of thought become frontiers of armaments. The world is not one world but two, and never the twain shall meet.

Any statements regarding the defensive nature of the pact do not alter the hard, sordid truth that by it we are accepting for a long time to come a humanity which is broken and divided. Such a state of apartness creates the climate in which suspicion grows, small overt acts are greatly magnified, and war becomes increasingly conceivable. This is the more serious because of the hope which has been inspired by the United Nations. We all recognize its inadequacies, yet all have watched with eagerness its progress during these hard years of infancy. The name itself is appealing: "United."

We know that for all groups of men it is true that "United we stand, divided we fall." No amount of military implementation for a divided world can give to mankind the security which comes through even the simplest enterprises projected and accomplished on a world-wide united scale.

No phrases can be clever enough to obscure the fact that the principle of nations divided conflicts seriously and perhaps fatally with the principle of nations united in which the postwar world has been placing its greatest hope.

Many arguments have been and will be heard which reveal the dangers of this essentially military alliance, such as the danger that the power to declare war will, if not theoretically, at least practically, be taken out of the hands of Congress and given to those who are capable of swiftly moving military instrumentalities, the danger of the heavy outlay for arming the nations of Europe added to the already excessive budget for military purposes in our country, and constituting an almost unbearable economic burden; the increasing tendency to think and plan in military categories regarding world problems capable of eventual solution only on the basis of war. That is another danger in the pact.

LOSS OF WORLD LEADERSHIP

But the chief peril, and this is my concluding page in this statement, would seem to me to be the fact that such an alliance turns the thoughts and energies of our Nation away from the opportunity of its great leadership.

There are two Americas known throughout the world, as anyone who travels in Europe or Asia will testify. One is the America which is conscious of its power and conceited over its prestige and determined to use any means, however ruthless, to have its way. The Atlantic Pact is part of the program of such an America, vigorous, aggressive, and unyielding. The other America, known and loved throughout the world, is the generous America pouring out its bounty to those in any form of need in Europe or Asia, asking no return or reward for the sharing of the blessings which God has bestowed upon our Nation's life.

We cannot permanently be both kinds of a country. We cannot lead both by force and by friendship. The issue which this pact presents to us will to a considerable degree determine the kind of America the world will know for decades, and perhaps for centuries, to come.

We can be proud of our economic and military power, but that pride will come at the cost of the affection of the peoples of the world. Or we can try to find our pride and our power, which lies in the spiritual leadership. We can propose and sponsor movements for steady disarmament among the nations. We can grasp every opportunity for dealing with the nations of eastern Europe as a man talks with a man, yielding no sacred convictions of our own but recognizing that the most sacred conviction which men can have is human brotherhood.

Nor need we wait until other nations take the lead before such overtures of peace are made. Many people talk as though our ethics could be no higher than the ethics of communism or of Russia. We say we will talk only the language that they will understand, so we talk the language of bombs and troops. Well, we have our own language. We need wait for no example of leadership to be set for us that we may timidly follow. Our country can lead. It has led in the past, and it must lead now, not in its great military capabilities but in its passion for unity, not in its skill in waging war but in its tenacity in waging peace; not in its power to arm half the world against the other half, but in the breadth of spirit which refuses to let any member of the family of nations be permanently outside the area of understanding and good will.

Such an attitude and such leadership by our Nation would be the greatest possible means and contribution which we could make toward lifting up the heart of the world today and giving it a confidence that men can live in abiding peace.

SUGGESTIONS FOR BASIS OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me call attention, on page 2, to the first paragraph and three practical suggestions:

The dilemma in which thoughtful citizens, and especially Christians, now find themselves becomes more complicated and painful with each fresh crisis. It is always impossible to find a satisfying answer to the crisis of the moment taken in isolation. The next step toward ruin can always be made to seem inevitable in the light of the one preceding it; while each time the hope is held out that this will be the last such step and—despairingly—men grasp at that hope. For that very reason it will be a catastrophe of the first order if the American people and their leaders now allow themselves to be content with this one more step on the old road of power politics, armament rivalry, and cold war.

The American people should make clear to their Government their desire that American foreign policy should be based upon:

(1) Loyal support and consistent use of the United Nations and its instrumentalities.

(2) A ringing and persistent call therefore for the resumption of serious efforts to secure universal abolition of national military establishments at the earliest possible moment, as an evidence of the earnest desire of the people of the United States to dispel the dense fog of suspicion which now blocks all movement on the road to disarmament.

(3) Unremitting efforts to explore the possibilities of negotiating peace with the Soviet Government; and the use to that end, not of fear inspired by our arsenal of atomic weapons, which can only lead to counterarming, desperation, or a temporary sullen retreat, but of a resolute good will.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to ask the witness this question: Being confronted as we are with a proposal to either sign or refuse to sign, that is, approve or refuse to approve, the North Atlantic Pact, what is your position? Are you advocating that the Senate approve the North Atlantic Pact or disapprove it?

Dr. ELLIOTT. Disapprove it.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. Dr. Elliott, I assume you are the same gentleman, Dr. Phillips P. Elliott, Minister of the First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y?

Dr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. And you have offered for the record the entire mimeographed statement on the Atlantic Pact which is signed by these various gentlemen, listed at the conclusion of it?

Dr. ELLIOTT. That is true.

Senator DONNELL. And as I understand, Mr. Chairman, that has been admitted, together with the names, into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you, Doctor.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Cadbury, how long will it take you?

Dr. CADBURY. Mr. Chairman, I will shorten my statement considerably—10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be very satisfactory. Go right ahead.

Dr. CADBURY. May I accept the assumption that the whole statement will be printed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, we will print your whole statement, and we are not pressing you to unnecessarily reduce it, but we are pressed for time.

Dr. CADBURY. I would rather read, and then, if there is time, make some further oral statements or answer questions.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

STATEMENT OF DR. HENRY J. CADBURY, HOLLIS PROFESSOR OF DIVINITY, HARVARD UNIVERSITY, IN BEHALF OF THE FRIENDS COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL LEGISLATION

(Dr. Cadbury read excerpts from his prepared statement, but received permission to include complete statement, which reads as follows:)

STATEMENT BY HENRY J. CADBURY, HOLLIS PROFESSOR OF DIVINITY, HARVARD UNIVERSITY, BEFORE THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, IN BEHALF OF THE FRIENDS COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL LEGISLATION

My name is Henry J. Cadbury. I live in Cambridge, Mass. While I serve as chairman of the American Friends Service Committee, this morning I appear on behalf of the Friends Committee on National Legislation.

No one can disagree with the objectives actually intended by the proponents of the North Atlantic Pact. They are the prevention of war between the western nations and Russia, and the increase of a sense of security in Europe that will enable the nations to accelerate their economic recovery.

The questions that every thoughtful American must ask are these: Is the pact likely to prevent war and increase confidence, or will it do precisely the reverse?

What other effects will it have—especially unfavorable effects? Are there not other important lines of foreign policy to be recommended as alternatives?

In his address before this committee on April 27, Secretary Acheson quite rightly declared that "while everyone wants peace, not everyone is prepared to work for it." One might well add the question whether all those who are prepared to work for peace will work for it in the best way. Nations often stumble into war when they little want war.

Let me say briefly from what angle I approach this question. I am no professional strategist and I speak for no powerful organization. But the Religious Society of Friends (called also Quakers) has with a special detachment from the military philosophy watched for 300 years the recurrent failure of all political devices that aimed for lasting peace by relying upon military alliances, threats of preponderant force, and the accumulation of new and more deadly weapons.

On the other hand, as Quakers, we have observed and have tried to promote the decrease of tension. For on decrease of tension rather than on increase of armed might security really depends. That is because it means security for both sides and not for only one. Collective power that is unilateral, whatever its strategic assurance, tends always to create even in the minds of those who control it a psychological insecurity.

A second experience that I represent is the direct contact on the part of our relief workers, with the victims of war, in a person-to-person relationship after two world wars, in Europe both east and west and in Asia, both the Near East and Far East. We know something of their tragedy and hopelessness, of their genuine wish for peace. We know also the fears of many Europeans which, beside a fear of Russia, include a fear of America in spite of their natural gratitude and admiration for us. They find themselves caught between two great powers. They fear that rearming will replace recovery and that their limited manpower and slender resources will be directed from butter to guns due to unwise handling of the situation by the intransigence of larger or smaller governments.

Obviously, there is no single nor simple step that will resolve the present power struggle that will give the world security from the expansive threat of totalitarianism and communism, or that will assure peace for a war-ravaged world.

The world must choose whether it is going to put its faith in military force and arms or in the processes of reason, of reconciliation, of government, of law. The basic question before the world now is whether military measures such as the North Atlantic Pact and the accompanying arms program can advance the security of peoples, can lead in the direction of one world, can overcome the threat of communism, and can preserve democracy.

We are pleading for an attitude of mind and a determination to make an alternative program work, which will give men more hope and security than subscribing to the outworn idea of military pacts. This process was described recently by one of America's most thoughtful columnists, Thomas L. Stokes:

"The aim of the projected alliances is to preserve peace by arming ourselves all over the world. It is defensive, negative, and old as man, and has proved futile for centuries."

We call instead for the most heroic efforts ever to be made by our country and the most dynamic leadership to be exerted by our Government for:

(1) Seeking a series of settlements to end the cold war with the Soviet Union.

(2) Pressing persistently and vigorously for universal reduction and limitation of armaments.

(3) Full American support for the United Nations and the principle and practice of genuine third-party judgment.

(4) The development of universalism instead of military regionalism.

(5) The use of American resources for healing and reconciliation and recovery rather than increasing reliance upon military power at home and abroad.

Let me speak briefly to each of these five points.

1. The United States should persistently seek a series of settlements to end the cold war with Russia

I am sure all of us hope that the Berlin blockades will be lifted after all the delays and difficulties. That would be an auspicious beginning for further efforts to end disagreements on many matters between the east and the west. I do not underestimate the difficulties involved. They are due in part to a long series of moves and countermoves for many years past, to possible mistakes on both sides, and to deep and genuine ideological differences. Whatever else the American Government does, it would be a mistake to build a policy solely upon distrust and to neglect a persistent and continuous effort in season and out to find solutions for situations which otherwise might tempt to aggression.

Again and again, in our work of relief and reconciliation, we Quakers have watched hostility yield to friendship—even on the part of those who with or without reason seemed least amenable to friendliness. We have had extraordinary experience also with cantankerous governments and with hard-boiled officials.

With all due precautions against deceptions and exceptions, we still believe that by and large among nations as between individuals there is, if we are skillful enough to find it, a language beside force that is understood, and an ultimate capacity for response to straightforward, patient, tolerant attempts at mutual understanding.

II. The United States should press for universal reduction of armaments

Historically military alliances have been neither effective nor successful ways of providing peace and security. They usually lead to counteralliances and countermeasures, with increasing insecurity. There can be no genuine security for the world with each side straining to achieve a preponderance of power. If we want a fundamental solution to the problem of security, it must be security not only for us and for our friends but for Germany and Russia as well.

The eighth paragraph of the Atlantic Charter signed by President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill declared:

"They believe that all of the nations of the world, for realistic as well as spiritual reasons, must come to the abandonment of the use of force. Since no future peace can be maintained if land, sea, or air armaments continue to be employed by nations which threaten, or may threaten, aggression outside of their frontiers, they believe, pending the establishment of a wider and permanent system of general security, that the disarmament of such nations is essential. They will likewise aid and encourage all other practicable measures which will lighten for peace-loving peoples the crushing burden of armaments."

The United States has made what in many respects was a very generous offer in the Baruch plan for the control of atomic energy. Experts still argue over whether those proposals were adequate and whether the negotiations were carried on with the flexibility necessary for securing agreements. It is tragic for the world that on this matter negotiations have not yet succeeded. However, the United States has made no comparable proposals on the whole field of conventional armaments, nor a comprehensive counterproposal to the suggestion of one-third reduction made last fall by the representative of the Soviet Union.

Should not the United States campaign for an over-all disarmament program year in and year out as energetic and as unremitting as the State Department effort in behalf of the reciprocal trade agreements over a period of 15 years, or the campaign for the International Trade Organization over the past 3 years? Just because the achievement of disarmament is so difficult and complex the dedication and determination to achieve it is all the more imperative.

Let me call your attention to article 3 of the Atlantic Pact. It says:

"The parties * * * will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack."

Am I mistaken in thinking that the plain result of this is to forbid reduction in armaments for 20 years (art. 13), or at least for 10 years (art. 12)? I have known other treaties that failed to provide or encourage reduction in armaments. Does this one solemnly bind the members individually and collectively against reduction? Can this Foreign Relations Committee show me that article 3 is not susceptible to such interpretation?

III. The United States should give full support to the United Nations and the principle and practice of third party judgment

Is the North Atlantic Treaty consistent with the United Nations—its Charter, its purposes, its budget, and its influence? In spite of repeated claims that the North Atlantic Treaty is consistent with the purposes and Charter of the United Nations, the treaty tends to overshadow and circumvent the UN in its procedures, expenditures, the sacrifices it asks and the loyalty it expects from its signatory nations. It enlarges the doctrine and possibilities of automatic war without advancing the authority of third party judgment and the certain jurisdiction of the United Nations. Is such a regional military alliance as the North Atlantic Treaty, negotiated entirely outside of the UN, really authorized in the Charter? Is the North Atlantic Treaty really consistent with article 1, article 53, and article 54 of the Charter?

However, the question which disturbs us most is this, Does the pact, in fact, deny UN jurisdiction on action regarding aggression?

Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty binds each nation to assist any country attacked "by taking forthwith, individually, and in concert * * *, such action as it deems necessary," and requires that such measures will be reported to the Security Council and will be "terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security."

The signatories thus become the judges in their own case, decide when there is aggression and who is the aggressor, without any standards being laid down or any procedures defined. The so-called Atlantic Nations are free to act without mediation, and become the judges of the adequacy of the United Nations Security Council actions. Does not this destroy both the principle of third party judgment and the real jurisdiction of the United Nations?

As Alexander Stewart points out in Zion's Herald, it is important to restrict rather than extend the area of conflict. He writes—

"An example of the successful use of the UN is the Palestine situation. A war in Palestine has recently been ended by negotiation. No one has suggested that it would have been better to have other nations enter the war and extend the area of conflict. Yet, under the proposed North Atlantic Pact, an attack on any signatory nation would be considered an attack on all of them and might involve them in war."

The size and importance of the nations signing this agreement causes it to overshadow the United Nations, because the pact includes three of the five permanent members of the Security Council, all of the major colonial powers, and represents more than 50 percent of the world's industrial capacity.

UNITED STATES EXPENDITURES ON INTERNATIONAL AGENCIES

Compare the proposed figures of $1,130,000,000 cash plus an undefined amount of equipment for armament abroad under the Atlantic Pact with the pathetically small investments which the United States makes in agencies of the United Nations. The following figures are budget requests for the next fiscal year from President Truman in his annual budget message to Congress; they have not yet been appropriated. Among these budget requests are:

United Nations, including United States expenses.....	$18, 115, 260
UNESCO, world education for understanding and peace.....	3, 720, 400
World Health Organization, fighting epidemics and disease.....	1, 920, 000
International Labor Organization, for all who labor.....	848, 058
Food and Agriculture Organization, overcoming world hunger.....	1, 250, 000
Pan American Union, political and economic cooperation, Western Hemisphere.....	1, 536, 352

WORLD EXPENDITURES ON UN AGENCIES

The budget for the UN agencies for the year 1949 from 58 member governments adopted at the Paris Assembly last fall is as follows:

Total budget for the United Nations.....	$33, 469, 587
Additional for specialized agencies, International Labor Organization.....	5, 215, 539
Food and Agriculture Organization.....	5, 000, 000
UNESCO.....	8, 473, 530
International Civil Aviation Organization.....	2, 062, 185
World Health Organization.....	5, 000, 000

IV. The United States should promote universalism rather than military regionalism

Just as one example, the United States is proposing to spend in 1 day on arming Europe as much as this country spends in 1 year on both the World Health Organization in a world-wide program for combatting disease and epidemics and on the Food and Agriculture Organization designed to work out global solutions to hunger, malnutrition, and the equitable distribution of what the earth produces as food.

The Food and Agriculture Organization has been asked by various member governments or its conference or its council to undertake more than 300 projects in the field of its operations, but because of the lack of funds it can undertake only a fraction of them. This is only one example of the trickle of funds for the constructive purposes of building a world community and solving the basic problems which cause war as over against the flood of money used for military purposes. When will the Foreign Relations Committee and the Appropriations Committees really take seriously their opportunity to provide more adequate support of international efforts through international agencies—financial, moral, and political?

V. The United States should use its resources for healing and reconciliation

Will not the military implementation of the treaty divert needed funds, resources, manpower, and scarce materials from recovery at home and abroad? At the present time the United States is embarked on the European recovery program designed to overcome some of the wholesale bombing and devastation and disruption of the war. There is no assurance yet that European economy will be soundly restored by 1952, since so much of their financial planning is based on more exports and less imports, and Europe cannot fully recover unless there is more mutual trade both within western Europe and between western Europe and eastern Europe, and between Europe and the United States.

While American taxpayers are straining themselves to pay the taxes for the European recovery program which was designed to overcome widespread undernourishment and to promote economic conditions essential to democracy, the Atlantic Pact program creates major competition in American foreign policy by setting up rearmament against recovery and makes our foreign policy increasingly subservient to military policy. By implication the American people are asked to assume an unstated economic burden for an undetermined number of years in order to underwrite an economically unproductive arms race.

It is difficult enough to promote friendship through economic aid to other nations. Military alliances are more likely to create jealousy among nations included and enmity among those excluded than to build progressively closer the ties that really last.

It is a wide-open question whether the shipment of arms to Europe will endear us to the peoples of Europe. Can it be seriously argued that it has endeared us to the common people in Greece, or Turkey, or China?

In regard to Norway, for example, the Worldover Press on April 15, 1949, reported from two sources in Norway that "although the Storting decided by a large majority that Norway should join the nations in the North Atlantic Pact, it is improbable that the people would support this action by anything like the same vote. Some observers even doubt there would be a majority at all." This report goes on to cite various forms of opposition to the pact: (1) Opposition to the manner in which it has been put through without a more popular consultation; (2) opposition to present and future American bases in Norway by those who cannot believe this will not be a logical later step; (3) opposition to rearmament as a deterrent to a more real and permanent defense—economic recovery. The conclusion of the report reads: "Whether the elements opposing the pact constitute a majority, or a substantial minority, these are questions that the signing of the pact has not resolved. Norwegians in goodly number will watch developments with an anxiety not foreseen by those who find in the pact nothing but greater security for the people."

In the American Friends Service Committee Newsletter for April 8, 1949, are some excerpts from a French article about the plight of some of the university students in France:

"You often hear, when you talk to French people, this startling remark, 'The war was bad enough, my friend, but it was nothing compared to the years of peace we must pull through' * * * Among those whose situation has become tragic under the pressure of inflation are the university students, whose family income rarely goes above 30,000 and 40,000 francs a month * * * For students, even more than for other citizens, the struggle for daily life is a constant problem. A monthly allowance of 7,000 francs constitutes a complete scholarship; the so-called 'minimum vital' has been estimated at 14,500 francs. Very few families can provide that amount, which just covers one decent but cheap meal a day, rent, registration fees, a few books, and transportation * * *

"No one can wonder at the story told of a student who, at a dance, had for his partner the wife of a member of the American embassy. She mentioned dreams, by way of small talk. He said, 'I often dream, but it is the same dream. I dream that I am no longer hungry.'"

And yet these students belong to the generation upon which the real future of Europe depends. Suppose this proposed billion and more a year were spent on the hungry minds and bodies of the youth of Europe upon whose strength and wisdom much of the fate of the world ultimately rests. What Europe needs more than any other one thing is healing and reconciliation.

Now let me turn from these five phases of an alternate program and raise briefly only a few of the questions regarding the implications of the pact itself.

I cannot conceal my feeling that there are several ambiguous elements in the proposed pact coupled with its military sequel. It is recommended as having two purposes, both of them defended as desirable. We should not look upon either of them lightly. It is said that it will either prevent war, or give us and our friends a better chance to win a war. Any war, even if we win, will be a universal tragedy. Let us not acquiesce in a policy that talks with equality about another world war. The people of Europe do not do so. We have won two such wars already, and they have proved even with our victory colossal disasters. The only adequate program for the world today is the abolition of war itself.

The policy of attempting to prevent war primarily by deterring others through force is questionable practically and dubious morally. This we know not only from the study of international history but from experience in personal life. Wars apparently thus delayed by a show of force have frequently broken out in later fury. Or the threatened party has desisted from one enterprise in one area only to throw himself into another more subtle enterprise elsewhere. He is rarely enlightened or reformed by the process. Rather the reverse. The attack on war must be much more fundamental than an attack on attack.

There are also inevitable difficulties in any scheme which regards the prevention of war as merely the prevention of aggression. It has the moral difficulty of seeming to condone the same acts that it condemns if the latter merely precede in time the former. This scheme has the legal difficulty that it does not set up some neutral and authoritative judge who will pronounce with persuasiveness to all parties just when and by whom the aggression occurs. It has the psychological difficulty that what seems defense to one party is bound to seem aggression to another. There has never been found a way in which, with all the professions of innocence in the world, a military pact of any kind—call it defense, nonaggression, or collective security, or whatever you will—could convince an excluded party that it contained no menace.

For example, President Roosevelt once defined our attitude thus: "An attack begins as soon as any base has been occupied from which our security has been threatened." No doubt we shall be judged in this matter by others as we judge them.

The present pact has all these difficulties and there is another purely military factor—that actual initiative and the prior use of aggressive weapons is coming to be so regarded by some military men and others as justifiable defense that the whole distinction between sheer aggression and deliberate forestalling of an expected attack dwindles away. Only so can America's defensive and non-aggressive professions be squared with the stock-piling of long-range and aggressive weapons. Permanent peace depends on the common intention of possible rivals to renounce both forms of military procedure—the initiative or aggression and the initiative of anticipatory defense.

To justify the treaty involves some versatility in argument. Let us take Norway. I happen to know that many Norwegians regard their membership in the pact as a danger and even those who reluctantly voted for it brought themselves to do so with the assurance that the United States will come to their rescue. But if one turns to the United States, we must assure them that the military defense of Norway is by no means categorically promised. No careful use of words can overcome the possible contradiction inherent in trying to satisfy always both of these parties. Insofar as the United States keeps itself uncommitted, Norway is running an uncompensated risk. Insofar as Norway's defense is legally or even morally assured by the pact, the United States is committed to engage in any war that involves Norway, no matter what irresponsible citizen of whatever nation on either side of the iron curtain might light the fatal fuse.

Again the treaty is declared both to be in accordance with the United Nations Charter as a regional arrangement (ch. VIII) and also to be necessary because the Security Council cannot operate against Russia vetoes. But article 53 of the same Charter says that "no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements without the authorization of the Security Council." Hence, when it comes to enforcement, either article 53 of the United Nations Charter must be ignored, or the same action could have been taken through the United Nations, and much of the reason for bypassing the more inclusive organization disappears.

Another dilemma of the present situation is illustrated by the United States News of May 13, which speaks of Dean Acheson as a Secretary of State without a crisis, comments: "He must talk peace to the Russians and, at the same time, try to convince Congress that the Russians remain a menace, that effective foreign policy still requires big appropriations."

While most of the speculation about the pact concerns its effect on Russia and her satellites, let us consider its effect upon other nations. I may suggest some of these effects in a single sentence each:

Taking the world as a whole, the pact tends to accentuate and perhaps solidify the present unfortunate though not quite congealed cleavage into two armed camps.

Taking the members in the pact, it may give some cohesive value. But the very lack of real geographical or ideological unity—considering Italy as Atlantic, Algiers as noncolonial, and Portugal as democratic—weakens its rationale and its durability in the eyes of all concerned. As the Chinese proverb says: "You can put two men in the same bed, but you can't make them dream the same dream."

The tendency of the pact on neutral nations may well be to compel them to choose one side or the other instead of encouraging them to exercise mediation as a potential bridge between opposing blocs.

The tendency of the pact on colonial peoples may well be to substitute for the respect which they may have had for American colonial policy a new suspicion that we are arming and supporting imperialist mother countries and thus permitting exploitation and subjection of other dark-skinned people than our own.

The tendency of the pact on ourselves may well be to allow us to trust unduly such a precarious instrument and to relax our effort along sounder lines—political, economic, and cultural—to create in spirit as in name the United Nations of the world.

In many ways, this last is the most serious objection to the treaty—and includes them all. The treaty is only another move in the cold war when something quite different is urgently needed. What is needed is a move in a completely different direction. I do not mean surrender or appeasement; I mean energetic and imaginative and creative enterprise, something as new and as ambitious in the field of statecraft as the Manhattan project was in the field of warcraft. The ultimate and inclusive objectives cannot be reached all at once, but the steps toward them must be much more consistent with them than is the proposed policy of alliance against alliance, power against power.

No intelligent, no patriotic, no humane American can look with real satisfaction upon the choice of the inferior alternative as embodied in the pact and the arms program. Having repeatedly been lured into the game of power politics by the analogy of innocent police force or by its claim of lesser evil, he must inevitably have some uneasy doubts about those features of the pact which perpetuate these claims. The assurance to ourselves of our good intentions and the axiomatic way in which military assumptions are uncritically accepted should not, if we have learned anything from history, allay these doubts. Instead I plead with you not to take the pact as though it were a fait accompli or even the best under the circumstances. The Senate can still reject it, or can amend its military menace with reservations, or can bring it closer in line with true internationalism, or can replace it, in collaboration with our own executive departments and other governments, by not one but many alternative undertakings that will better commend themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. By "Friends" do you mean the Quakers?

Dr. CADBURY. I mean the Quakers; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 4 of your statement; what do you mean by "third party," somebody other than members of the group?

Dr. CADBURY. I mean where, when a person believes he is attacked by another person, to have the matter decided by a third party.

OPPOSITION TO ATLANTIC TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

You are opposed to the treaty as it stands?

Dr. CADBURY. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. And your organization opposes it?

Dr. CADBURY. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. You would prefer to go along as we are going now?

Dr. CADBURY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Rather than to undertake to do anything under the treaty?

Dr. CADBURY. It would be a mistake to adopt the treaty. It would be a mistake not to adopt the treaty and to do nothing very constructive, spectacular, and emphatic of a more constructive kind. It is possible to make two mistakes, and both of those would be mistakes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then we wouldn't do anything.

Dr. CADBURY. No, no. Reject the treaty and do a great deal.

The CHAIRMAN. We haven't the great deal at present before the committee. We are just dealing with the treaty. So your judgment is that we ought to reject the treaty.

Dr. CADBURY. And get going as fast as possible, so far as your particular committee can implement in the more constructive methods of not continuing but ending the cold war.

The CHAIRMAN. The Friends are against war, of course, are they not? The Quakers are traditionally against war?

Dr. CADBURY. And we have had 300 years to test our theory.

The CHAIRMAN. I say, you are traditionally against war?

Dr. CADBURY. The answer is "yes."

The CHAIRMAN. For any purposes?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Take the witness, Senator Vandenberg.

Senator VANDENBERG. I have no questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Dr. Cadbury, I notice in the second paragraph of your mimeographed statement, which you did not read—

Dr. CADBURY. I am perfectly willing to be questioned about it.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. You used these words [reading]:

No one can disagree with the objectives actually intended by the proponents of the North Atlantic Pact. They are the prevention of war between the western nations and Russia, and the increase of a sense of security in Europe that will enable the nations to accelerate their economic recovery.

If those are the objectives of the pact, and if, as you say, no one can disagree with the objectives of the pact, then I take it that your objection to the pact is not the pact itself, or its adoption, but what you believe to be the possible implementation of the pact later, and its results, the results of the implementation.

Dr. CADBURY. Like the Secretary of State and others, members of this committee, I believe the two things go together, and my objection, as I say, is not to the purposes of the pact but it is because I frankly believe the pact will not promote those purposes.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. May I ask you this: If the pact were standing completely alone, and there was no proposal or no suggestion of any implementation of the pact, what would your attitude be toward the approval of the pact? I am assuming that it was just standing alone, as the pact now reads.

Dr. CADBURY. As the pact reads, it requires the parties to take forthwith such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Therefore you would be against it?

Dr. CADBURY. I would be against the pact.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Even though you state that no one can disagree with the objectives actually intended?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes. I repeat that. I believe that the purposes of those who framed it were genuine, sincere, and desirable. I just do not think it will work.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I have been trying to get your attitude where there was a division of attitude as between the two separate categories.

Dr. CADBURY. I do not think we can separate them.

SETTLEMENT WITH RUSSIA

Senator HICKENLOOPER. On page 2 you set out five steps. One is [reading]:

Seeking a series of settlements to end the cold war with the Soviet Union.

Do you contend that this country has not taken or made great efforts to bring about peaceful settlements of the peace treaties in Europe, peaceful settlements of disputes, objections to territorial aggression, and Communist coups in various places of the world? Do you feel that we have not done much along that line?

Dr. CADBURY. I think we have done a good deal along that line. I think we have neutralized it by some other things we have done.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Do you have in mind at the moment those other things that we have done that have neutralized it?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes. I think the cold war is a series of moves on both sides, not on one side alone.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Do you recall at the moment any original or affirmative move in the cold war that we have taken that has blocked peace; in other words a move that has not been taken to counter some other definite and positive move that Russia has previously made?

Dr. CADBURY. It may be that some of our sins are sins of omission.

DISARMAMENT

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Your second classification or suggestion is [reading]:

Pressing persistently and vigorously for universal reduction and limitation of armaments.

Do you believe the United States has been less zealous along that line than other nations in the world in the past good many years, and even after World War II?

Dr. CADBURY. I think there have been several occurrences in the last 30 years when the United States has not joined heartily in such moves. You may be asking whether we have been more remiss than others. I do not think it is a question of whether we are more remiss, but whether we have been as active and earnest as we should have been.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Certainly you remember our program after World War I, and our destruction of naval units and our reduction of our armed forces down to somewhere in the neighborhood of only 100,000 in the whole United States jurisdiction.

Dr. CADBURY. I also recall the whole cold war.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I presume you recall also that after this war we recalled the overwhelming bulk of our troops back from foreign countries and discharged them back into civilian life, and we put away our guns and put our ships in moth balls, and things of that sort. Do you consider that not to be important steps toward disarmament and the direct reduction of armed forces?

Dr. CADBURY. If that were the whole story, that would make a good record.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think you recall without doubt our very strenuous efforts over more than 2 years' time to bring about a universal solution of the control of atomic weapons?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes. There was a short reference to it in my statement.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. In which we have offered to do what no other nation in the world has ever done so far as I know in history. We have offered to give up to an international control group this most powerful of all destructive weapons that has been developed up to date.

Dr. CADBURY. Yes; on our own terms we have offered that.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. But would you not agree that our terms are terms that safeguard the use of that weapon against being used for destructive purposes?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And that is the only basis upon which we put it, that we must be sure, and the whole world must be sure, in giving up this weapon and this control, that the safeguards are ample to prevent its being used for destruction.

Dr. CADBURY. I agree with that.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And would you also agree that we have made no progress whatsoever, apparently, in getting such assurances from Russia that will safeguard its use against destructive purposes?

Dr. CADBURY. That is where we have reached an impasse, an impasse that is not based on a difference in principle but on certain minor matters where both we and Russia have not gotten together.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. What do you call "minor matters," Doctor?

Dr. CADBURY. Questions of timing, questions of inclusion of exclusion, questions as to the exact manner of inspection. Some of those are minor.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. May I suggest to you that there are three elements in our proposal, three major elements? One is the creation of an international group which can take this over. The second phase is inspection of the resources and potential possibilities of each nation of the world, to which we have openly and freely repeatedly offered to accede, and the third phase is the ability of swift and adequate punishment or retaliation against any nation that attempts to violate the agreement on atomic energy.

I may call your attention to the first part, that so far as I know Russia is willing to agree to join a group and receive the information on atomic energy, but Russia will not and has—that is, up to this time—been adamant in refusing any kind of reliable inspection within Russia or her territories by the international group, a thing which we are willing and ready to concede and to give. But she has adamantly refused that inspection, and she has not accepted the principle of punishment or restraint, if you please, against those who would violate the terms of that agreement, and we are still maintaining our position along that line. We have never withdrawn. Our proposition is still there.

So I wonder if you do not believe that we have made some most unusual gestures along that line in the interest of world peace and the reduction of armaments and the taking out of possible use the greatest destructive weapon that has been developed up to this time.

Mr. CADBURY. I said in my statement [reading]:

The United States has made what in many respects was a very generous effort in the Baruch plan for the control of atomic energy. Experts will argue whether those proposals were adequate, and whether those negotiations were carried on with the flexibility necessary to securing agreements. It is tragic for the world that on this matter negotiations have not yet succeeded. However, the United States has made no comparable proposals on the whole field of conventional armaments, nor a comprehensive counterproposal to the suggestion of one-third reduction made last fall by the representative of the Soviet Union.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Is there any question in your mind but what the United States will gladly enter into arms reduction, dependent only upon the assurance and the proof that the other nations are doing likewise?

Dr. CADBURY. No. I think they will. I am urging that they should continue to make even more earnest efforts in that direction.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Do you advocate the United States giving up substantially all of its armaments before any other nation does likewise, as a gesture of good will?

Dr. CADBURY. I think we can afford to go ahead of other nations, and I would only recommend the more radical proposal if I thought the United States had the spiritual backing behind it which that would require. I wish it had.

SUPPORT OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Senator HICKENLOOPER. No. 3 in your classification refers to [reading]:

Full American support for the United Nations and the principle and practice of genuine third party judgment.

Is it possible that you are minimizing the tremendous leadership that the United States gave toward the formation of a United Nations, without which there could have been no United Nations?

Dr. CADBURY. No. At each point you are quite right. I am not minimizing. I am asking for a maximum.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Is it a small contribution when the United States is contributing some approximately—well, better than 40 percent of all of the cost and expenditures of the United Nations and its various specialized organizations?

Dr. CADBURY. Perhaps it is not very much out of proportion to our advantages.

USE OF VETO IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Senator HICKENLOOPER. The question of third-party judgment that has been set up within the United Nations has been agreed to by the United States. But I think you are well aware that 30 times Russia has used the veto in the Security Council against every substantial effort to preserve peace or to settle the affairs of the world, the international affairs of the world peacefully. Do you defend the Russian use of the veto 30 times in the United Nations?

Dr. CADBURY. The Russian use of the veto is entirely legal. The use of majority is another legal method. When we are in the majority we use the majority method. If we were in the minority, we would use the minority method, just like the President of the United States. He has the use of the veto. When does he use it? He uses it when he is in the minority. He does not use it when he is in the majority, when he has enough to go with him. The use of the veto, therefore, is no indication of morality. The President does not change his morals when he loses the majority and starts using the veto.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think probably I could agree with the general philosophy about the veto, that the use of the veto per se designates nothing immoral. But the continuous and repeated use of the veto by Russia 30 times since the formation of the United Nations and its operation, 30 times against the efforts that evidently have been made toward settling the affairs of the world peacefully, would seem to me to be accumulative evidence that good will called for some criticism.

Dr. CADBURY. I cannot quote the figures, but isn't it true that nearly half of those refusals had nothing to do with war or peace, but had to do with the admission of this friend or that friend?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think that the admission of nations into the United Nations Organization might have a great deal to do with war or peace.

Dr. CADBURY. It might.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And I think it certainly has a great deal to do with the philosophy of the United Nations, and the inclusion of people who would band together to add greater strength to an international organization.

I merely mention that because it seems to me that your statement is replete with the criticism of the shortcomings of the United States and you are casting a great deal of blame for the world situation upon what you believe to be our failure in taking steps to encourage the peace of the world. [Reading:]

4. The development of universalism instead of military regionalism.

UNIVERSALISM VERSUS REGIONALISM

Is it your belief, Doctor, that anybody in the Congress of the United States—I am speaking comparatively, and there might be one or two, I don't know, out of 500-some Members—I am speaking of the practically universal opinion and desire of the Members of the Congress of the United States that we have war, that the country be plunged into war. Do you believe that that is the opinion of the overwhelming number of the Members of the Congress?

Dr. CADBURY. I am sorry; I did not get one word in your statement. Plunged into—

Senator HICKENLOOPER (reading):

- The development of universalism instead of military regionalism.

I am asking you, or do you not believe—perhaps I should put it in a leading way of that kind—that to all intents and purposes the universal desire of the Members of Congress of the United States is to keep this country out of war?

Dr. CADBURY. Certainly.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And therefore that these regional arrangements probably have been developed in desperation because other means of peaceful settlement just have not been successful in settling these great issues?

Dr. CADBURY. Do you mean the Russian use of the veto?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. The Russian use of the veto, the Berlin blockade, the Communist coups in the Balkans, and the items of coercion and control that communism has in its expansion in those areas saddled upon people and that we have tried to prevent as much as we could. Would you believe that we feel that this way may be a step that is indicated because other steps such as argument and persuasion and principles of morality and attitudes of morality have failed?

Dr. CADBURY. I think that is the intention, but I think it is a very unwise step. Do you want me to give an illustration?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Yes.

Dr. CADBURY. A friend of mine's wife had a minor infection. She went to a doctor. The doctor gave her a drug. The result of the drug was it gave her a very serious over-all disease. She went back to the same doctor. He gave her another drug. In each case the drug cured the thing that they went for, but it produced, finally, in her, a complete nervous break-down. Now, by that time, having tried the military method once or twice, I think I would change doctors.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Of course, I do not question your illustration, but I question the value of its use because it is so palpably, as someone used the other day, a miniscule occasion in the great field of medicine, where the overwhelming, almost universal use of specifics has proven so successful that it is beyond argument, so I do not agree with your condemnation of just one drug.

MILITARISM AND THE TREATY

But you say we have tried militarism. May I go back to World War I? Germany was known to be a growing, building aggressor under the Kaiser. Isn't that true, prior to World War I?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. England did not have a strong military establishment.

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. France did not have a strong military establishment.

Dr. CADBURY. England had a fleet.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And France did not have a fleet, and yet their failure to arm themselves to a proper degree to meet this known and growing aggression was almost disastrous.

Dr. CADBURY. I remember that the President, in dealing with this pact, called attention in these words [reading]:

It is a simple document, but if it had existed in 1914 and in 1939, supported by the nations which are represented here today, I believe it would have prevented the acts of aggression which led us into two world wars.

There was a pact, a defense pact, with Belgium. Hitler attacked Belgium—an "armed attack," using the words of this text here. Was that any good, that pact? Isn't it characteristic of aggressors that promises to go to the defense of an armed attack are ignored by aggressors?

DETERRENT EFFECT OF THE TREATY

Senator HICKENLOOPER. But is it not well known that at the time Hitler attacked neither Great Britain nor France nor any other country touching Hitler's Germany at that time was in any reasonable degree prepared to resist Hitler's attack for even a short period of time, and so he felt perfectly free and safe to commit his depredations? Do you think that had he known that he would have met in his aggression a tremendous force that might defeat him and stop him that he would have jumped so quickly?

Dr. CADBURY. I haven't much respect for the intelligence of would-be aggressors. I do not believe they are easily deterred by that sort of thing. Every act of aggression in recent years has been the same.

I see behind you on the board a place where all the Atlantic countries are blacked out. Didn't Japan know at the time of Pearl Harbor that practically all those countries would come in against her, not to mention some which do not show on the map—Australia, India, and China? Did that restrain attack?

This philosophy that the threats of force prevent aggressors does not reckon with the psychological facts about aggressors.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. At the time I don't like to get into the philosophy of that, because I do not know what Japan thought at the time. I am not qualified to speak about what went on in the Japanese mind. But certainly Japan knew at the time of Pearl Harbor that we had nothing in the Pacific that could stop her expansion in the Pacific, and later events showed that we had no sufficient force in the Pacific or any other place to adequately cope with Japan. We had to build it and we had to create it out of our resources and our industry, so Japan felt for at least a long period, I am sure, reasonably safe and immune from retaliation, during which she could consolidate her positions out there, and I think events showed that.

Dr. CADBURY. May I go back to your statement about 1914, and the pact with Belgium. It was Sir Edward Grey, Premier of Great Britain, who appealed to this pact to resist the attack of Germany upon Belgium. Now, Sir Edward Grey later said this about the cause of that war. He did not say anything about England's being disarmed. What he said is this [reading]:

More than one true thing may be said about the causes of the war. But the statement that comprises most truth is that militarism and the armaments inseparable from it made war inevitable. Armaments were intended to produce a sense of security in each nation. That was the justification put forward in defense of that. What they really did was to produce fear in everybody. Fear causes suspicion and hatred. It is hardly too much to say that between nations it stimulates all that is bad and it depresses all that is good. One nation increases its armament and makes strategic railways toward the frontiers. The next nation increases its armaments. The first nation says it is only precaution, only very reasonable. The second nation says its preparations also were only precautions, and points out with some cogency that the first nation began the competition. And so it goes until the whole continent is an armed camp covered with strategic railways and munition preparation.

The lesson of European history is so plain. It is that no enduring security can be found in competing armaments and in separate alliances. There is no security from any power unless it be a security in which its neighbors have an equal share.

For the sake of the record, that is from Twenty-five Years: 1892 to 1929. Viscount Grey is the author.

ARMAMENTS AND SECURITY

Senator HICKENLOOPER. There are two conditions of security, reasonable security, in which each side can have an equal share. One would be the security of completely no armaments at all on the part of any nation. I think that would give a reasonable degree of security, as much as you could have, in which each nation would share, because they would both equally be unarmed. Another degree of security, whether it resulted in security or war or not, but a feeling of security, would be where both nations were armed equally well. I mean each nation that was equally armed with the others would have a sense of security. It might result in war; I don't know.

But we face the situation today where one nation is tremendously armed—Russia. I do not know whether anyone knows how many troops they have under arms and on the borders and through the Balkans, but they are in the millions. We know that they have not stopped their war preparations. We know from their declarations that world domination is their goal, and we know that war is their means, if necessary, to attain that world domination, and while I think none of us, or all of us, share equal zeal for peace, yet what kind of a situation faces us where we have a declared aggressor who is tremendously armed and who is maintaining his armed strength, and we, on the other side, are watching that aggression grow and its purposes develop without any ability to meet it and without any strength to meet it unless we get to the point where we can say to the aggressor, "You will be met with force, the combined force, moral, physical, and otherwise, of the freedom-loving nations if you complete armed attack."

We seem to find ourselves in that position today. We have tried peaceful means, certainly. We have offered to give and we are giving; I think we have given some $24,000,000,000 toward the humanitarian and economic readjustment of Europe. I do not think we have been cheap about it. But we have come to the point where we must unite our strength, I believe, to assure any aggressor that we are going to maintain the principles for which we think we have made great sacrifices.

I do not know what the answer is. I think we have tried turning the other cheek, repeatedly, and we have lost ground.

Dr. CADBURY. Senator, it would take me a good while to express the points at which I agree and the many points with which I disagree with your analysis, and even if your analysis were completely correct, the problem we have to deal with is whether it seems that way to Russia. Does Russia think we are completely disarmed, that we have a very feeble fleet, that we have no stock pile of weapons, that we are not spending much money on our military equipment? I take it from you that we are not. You ought to know whether we are or not. But I do not believe Russia has the same opinion.

Our problem is not a problem of facts but of psychological reactions.

PIERCING THE IRON CURTAIN

Senator HICKENLOOPER. How would you break through the iron curtain to get the Russian people to follow humanitarian philosophies?

Dr. CADBURY. That is a tough question, and the reason it is tough is not what is happening today but what has happened for the last 30 years.

Our committee, the Quakers, were in Russia before the Bolshevik Revolution. We stayed in Russia longer than any foreign agency. We have been trying to get into Russia ever since the end of the war. We have succeeded in getting into the satellite countries—Finland, Poland, and Hungary. We are working and have been working for years in China. And if you ask me on which side of the line we are working, I will have to say that the line moves and we stay still. The center of our work, Chungku, has changed hands five times. We have had some experience, then, behind the iron curtain. And we would like to increase that experience. We think that, as we deal with the common people and as we are known not to be of a menacing character because of our beliefs, we can make contacts with Russian officials, that we can at least make a little headway toward piercing the iron curtain.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Dr. Cadbury, I want to say this in all sincerity, and I am not trying to get into any philosophical discussion with you here, necessarily, because you probably would beat me all to pieces on that kind of an argument. I have vast respect for your ideas.

Dr. CADBURY. I have no desire to make points in debate, sir.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I want to say this, that there is no organization for whom I have a higher regard for its self-sacrifice, for its idealism, than the Friends organization. I believe that no organization has written a finer record of contribution to the relief of human suffering going into all parts of the world and doing a great humanitarian job than your organization. I have nothing but the highest respect for it.

But we are dealing in a pretty practical world, where the logic of men's minds doesn't always rule the physical action of their bodies or of communities. Now here is your great organization which, as much as any organization, has proved its selflessness; that is, so far as doing things for other people are concerned. As you say, you have been behind the iron curtain, your group. You have been in China. But after thirty-some years of proof of your good offices and your good work you cannot get behind the iron curtain again today, when I am safe in saying, I am sure, that there is no evidence that anybody could remotely produce that your organization has ever done anything ill to anyone behind the iron curtain, and on the contrary has done much good to human beings behind the iron curtain. Yet you can't get back there as you would, and you can't have the entree to reach men's minds back there and get them to see what you and I probably commonly agree would be the sound philosophy of humanity.

Dr. CADBURY. It is tragic that we cannot get through.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And therefore I say that so far as I am concerned, I think every member of this committee and of the Senate is as earnestly and zealously looking for peace as the rest of the American people. But I think it is a point that when a great organization such as yours, with a tremendously fine record of unselfish contribution and sacrifice on the part of not only your organization but the people who make it up in foreign lands, when your long and splendid record of humanitarian conduct right on the ground itself, among the people, where they can see you every day; when your organization cannot receive the acceptance and those things behind the iron curtain I wonder if it is not just infinitely more difficult for nations that move in great matters and not always with the same particular approach to settle these questions almost overnight by peaceful philosophy, and I wonder if it isn't sound that we will have to take the next best method of assuring the preservation of peace as nearly as we can, and that is to say, "Well, we will have peace if we have to fight for it. We will have principles of right retained in this world if we have to fight for it. We don't want to, but we will if we have to, and we have tried."

Dr. CADBURY. May I make a reply to that, sir?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Yes, indeed.

EFFORTS TO PIERCE THE IRON CURTAIN

Dr. CADBURY. One reason why our organization finds it difficult to get behind the iron curtain is that we are identified, in spit of ourselves, with an American foreign policy which is regarded in Russia as hostile. They believe that America is trying to spy in Russia.

Now, then, we are not entirely unsuccessful. Such moves as we have made with the consent of the State Department to send people into Russia have met with a good deal of encouragement from the Russian side. But as has happened two or three times in recent years, when we felt that we were making some headway, I know it takes patience and I know it is not a matter of turning the cheek once but of probably turning it 77 times, and then some act on the part of the American Government, some irresponsible statement by a statesman, comes to the ears of the Russian Government, and you can be sure that nothing is said that they don't know. They know what the Quakers think of the Atlantic Pact. They knew it before you knew it, though you both might have guessed alike. And therefore we are handicapped.

All I am suggesting is that some parallel action on a spectacularly generous scale be made by the American Government.

Now, just one instance: I had the pleasure a year and a half ago of going to Oslo to receive, on behalf of the American Friends Service Committee, our share of the Nobel peace prize. When I went there I said to the people of Norway, "We would like to use this money as a gift to the needy in Russia, as a gesture of good will from the American people to the people of Russia." And the committee that awarded the prize, to whom I spoke privately, said, "That would suit us excellently."

Well, I came home. We had a talk with the Russian Government and we said to them, "Is there anything you would like to have as a gift?"

They thought a while, and they said, "We find it almost impossible to get streptomycin for the tubercular children in our children's homes."

We said, "We will try to get it."

They said, "We cannot get an export license for it ourselves."

We went to our Government here. We asked for $25,000 worth of streptomycin to be sent by us as a gift to Russia. We got the permission. We sent the streptomycin. It was distributed where they said they would distribute it, among the children, tubercular children, in their children's hospitals. We received a very friendly letter of acknowledgment from the Russian Red Cross.

That money was not the Nobel prize money. We are now in negotiation with the Russian Government, asking them whether they would be willing to receive a second such gift. And we hope that that will come through also.

Now, I find it difficult to think of parallel gestures to that, ridiculously small considering the need in Russia, that have been made either by private non-Communist organizations or by the American officials, officials of Government, of a similar character.

I do not boast about this. I merely suggest it as an indication that there may be some things that we are not doing, or not doing on the scale that ought to be done; and also I am suggesting that we ought to be very careful that this policy of attempted friendship is accompanied by this policy of attempted friendship for Russia.

LEND-LEASE CONTRIBUTION

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I also recall the United States furnishing $11,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease materials, some of them munitions of war, a great deal of it food, and considerable clothing and medicine, to Russia over some years, for which we received no credit in Russia and no understanding by the Russian people of the American intentions and good offices and good wishes toward their success. I will say practically none. I guess some information may have percolated.

Dr. CADBURY. I also recall that the brunt, a good deal of Hitler's campaign, was borne by the Russian people; that, according to General Marshall, the Russian people lost more in housing, in manpower, both civilian and military, in proportion to their number than any one of the belligerent nations.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I recall that they lost a good deal in life and property in the war. I was not referring to that, nor was I attempting to discuss their contribution to the war in one way or the other. I merely mentioned that we had given them $11,000,000,000 in lend-lease material for which even the $11,000,000,000 that I personally believe was the weight in the scales that tipped them toward victory, for which there was no acknowledgment.

Dr. CADBURY. We gave money and they gave their lives and their own homes. We both were contributing to a common cause and I am not prepared to make comparisons.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. The only thing I am saying is that the tremendous contribution that we made to them in medicine, clothing, munitions, and things that they needed to win their end of it, to win their end of the battle over there, those things, we have not been given any general credit for in Russia, and I think that the contributions which we might make have to be realized and appreciated by the people of Russia in order to orient their minds in the direction of cooperation with the people that they do not believe are going to fight them. But if we cannot get that down to the Russian people, if we cannot get it in their minds, in some degree, we are treading a very dangerous path meanwhile, if the policies of the Politburo are permitted to go on as they have already declared their policy to be.

I think, Doctor, we could probably argue this thing all day and probably agree on a good deal of it and disagree on procedures. I think the end result we could thoroughly agree on. The road down which we should travel to get to that result we might disagree on.

I certainly have appreciated your contributions this morning and I appreciate the great sacrificial efforts you are making to relieve suffering over the world. But I again say it is significant that with all the great deeds you and your people have done in those countries the evident difficulty that you have in getting acceptance by those countries now ought to indicate the difficulties that we have to face.

Dr. CADBURY. We are aware of the difficulties perhaps better than you are, from first-hand contact. I am not wanting praise.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I have taken such a long time here. I have enjoyed visiting with the doctor. I suppose I should confine myself to a few questions and quit visiting with him.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

PREVENTION OF WAR AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator DONNELL. Professor Cadbury, Senator Hickenlooper called to your attention the second paragraph on the first page of your mimeographed copy, which reads [reading]:

No one can disagree with the objectives actually intended by the proponents of the North Atlantic Pact. They are the prevention of war between the western nations and Russia, and the increase of a sense of security in Europe that will enable the nations to accelerate their economic recovery.

I ask you, Professor Cadbury, whether or not the next paragraph, which is short, of your mimeographed statement reads as follows:

The questions that every thoughtful American must ask are these: Is the pact likely to prevent war and increase confidence, or will it do precisely the reverse? What other effects will it have, especially unfavorable effects? Are there not other important lines of foreign policy to be recommended as alternatives?

That was the next paragraph of your statement?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Professor, you were asked by Senator Hickenlooper whether or not in view of your nondisagreement with the objectives intended by the proponents of the North Atlantic Pact you would be favorable to the pact if it stood alone, without implementation. I ask you, Professor, is it not true that the North Atlantic Pact in at least three places contemplates implementation; first, article 5, to which you referred; second, article 3, which reads:

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the Parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack—and third, the concluding sentence of article 9, which sentence reads:

The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5.

Am I not correct in my statement?

Dr. CADBURY. I believe it is in the text.

NORWAY'S INCLUSION IN THE PACT

Senator DONNELL. Now, professor, you did not read all of your text. You spoke about being in Norway. Would you be kind enough to turn to page 6 of your statement, in which you refer as follows, to an article in the Worldover Press which appeared 11 days after the signature here in Washington of the pact. You say [reading]:

In regard to Norway, for example, the Worldover Press on April 15, 1949, reported from two sources in Norway that "Although the Storting decided by a large majority that Norway should join the nations in the North Atlantic Pact, it is improbable that the people would support this action by anything like the same vote. Some observers even doubt there would be a majority at all.

This report goes on to cite various forms of opposition to the pact [reading]:

(1) opposition to the manner in which it was put through without a more popular consultation; (2) opposition to present and future American bases in Norway by those who cannot believe this will not be a logical later step; (3) opposition to rearmament as a deterrent to a more real and permanent defense—economic recovery. The conclusion of the report reads: "Whether the elements opposing the pact constitute a majority, or a substantial minority, these are questions that the signing of the pact has not resolved. Norwegians in goodly number will watch developments with an anxiety not foreseen by those who find in the pact nothing but greater security for the people."

You have given us that as a quotation from the Worldover Press. That is correct, is it?

Dr. CADBURY. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. What is the Worldover Press?

Dr. CADBURY. It is an international news agency.

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard it as of a reliable nature?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes; and furthermore, in this particular case I am in constant correspondence with people in Norway, members of the Society of Friends or Quakers and others, so that I quoted it because it stated well what I could have said in my own words.

Senator DONNELL. In other words, you concur with the statements of fact and the views expressed in this quotation from the Worldover Press issued 11 days after the signature of the fact here in Washington?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

RESTRICTING THE AREA OF CONFLICT

Senator DONNELL. I call to your attention one further quotation which appears at page 4 of your mimeographed statement, and which portion you did not read [reading]:

As Alexander Stewart points out in Zion's Herald, it is important to restrict rather than extend the area of conflict. He writes, "An example of the successful use of the UN is the Palestine situation. A war in Palestine has recently been ended by negotiation. No one has suggested that it would have been better to have other nations enter the war and extend the area of conflict. Yet, under the proposed North Atlantic Pact, an attack on any signatory nation would be considered an attack on all of them and might involve them in war."

Do you concur with the observations made by the writer, Alexander Stewart?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. What is Zion's Herald?

Dr. CADBURY. It is an interdenominational newspaper published in Boston.

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard it as of a reliable nature?

Dr. CADBURY. It is as reliable as the individual author. I regard Mr. Stewart as a competent observer of international affairs; and furthermore, our committee happens to be involved in the relief of refugees in Palestine, and had considerable knowledge of the situation in Palestine; although they were there in a purely nonpolitical way, we cannot help but observe the movement of political forces and the effectiveness of the UN agencies, and other factors.

Senator DONNELL. And you agree with the general point that he makes, that in Palestine there was a situation in which war existed, yet it was ended by negotiation, and in the further point which he makes, that under the North Atlantic Pact, an attack on any signatory nation would be considered an attack on all of them and might involve all of them in war. You concur with that observation?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. So you believe that the statement made by Mr. Stewart in Zion's Herald is well founded both in fact and in argument; is that correct?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes.

MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL LEGISLATION

Senator DONNELL. Professor, you spoke of your committee. Has your Committee on National Legislation, for which I understand you to appear, authorized your appearance here today?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes. They invited me to appear on their behalf.

Senator DONNELL. Do you mind telling us very briefly approximately how many persons are on that committee and how widely distributed they are?

Dr. CADBURY. It is the organization representing the Society of Friends in America in the field of national legislation. The Society of Friends in America is organized into about 30 yearly meetings. Each yearly meeting appoints representatives to the committee.

Senator DONNELL. And the Friends Committee on National Legislation is how large a body and how widely distributed?

Dr. CADBURY. I will ask the secretary to answer that accurately.

Mr. E. RAYMOND WILSON (executive secretary, Friends Committee on National Legislation). The membership of the general committee is about 135 individuals from coast to coast. Its constituency is about 100,000 in the Society of Friends. We have distributed nearly 30,000 copies of this pact. There has been one member of our committee that has expressed his support of the pact; the others have either indicated their strong disapproval or have not notified us of any dissent.

Senator DONNELL. That is one member out of how many?

Mr. WILSON. One hundred and thirty-five.

Senator DONNELL. Now, professor, I want to ask you also this question, just about yourself.

ATTITUDE OF THE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL LEGISLATION

The CHAIRMAN. You do not mean to say that all the other 134 are against the pact? You simply mean that one man indicated he was for it. How many indicated they were against it?

Mr. WILSON. We discussed the theory in principle of regional pacts for nearly 3 months when we adopted our annual statement of policy in January, and went on record then opposed to the general principle of regional military alliances.

The CHAIRMAN. Before this treaty was submitted?

Mr. WILSON. Before the final text was available.

The CHAIRMAN. You said a minute ago you wrote all 135 of them and one said he was for it. How many said they were against it?

Mr. WILSON. There has been no further dissent, either on our general committee or on our executive committee, in the opposition of the committee to the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. I know. You said you wrote all 135. One wrote in that he was for it. How many wrote in that they were against it?

Mr. WILSON. I can't give the exact number, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have given the others. Why can't you give that?

Mr. WILSON. I do not recall. We have discussed this.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not talking about discussing it. You said you had written all 135. One man was for it, but you made no response as to how many wrote in saying they were against it, and you do not know now.

Mr. WILSON. I should say the majority.

The CHAIRMAN. Wrote in and said they were against it? I wish you would check that. I think it is a little peculiar that you should know so accurately one side and not have accurate information on the other side.

Mr. WILSON. I guess the Senate has the experience that often-times people express opposition to a measure when they do not express their support of a measure.

Senator DONNELL. Would you be kind enough, as Senator Connally suggested, to check into that and furnish to this committee, if it meets the approval of Senator Connally, which I assume it does, the information as to how many, in response to your inquiry, voted for it, how many voted against it, and how many were silent? Will you do that?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

FRIENDS COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL LEGISLATION,

Washington 1, D. C., May 17, 1949.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,

*Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,
United States Capitol, Washington, D. C.*

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: In response to your request at the hearings on the North Atlantic Pact for details regarding the attitude of members of the Friends Committee on National Legislation on the pact, I am sending for the record the information for which you asked.

The annual statement on legislative policy of the committee, adopted January 6, 1949, contained the following paragraph on the North Atlantic Pact:

"We oppose (1) attempts to form a North Atlantic Security Pact and other proposals for armed alliances in the guise of regional arrangements under the United Nations, because these, we believe, will further solidify the existing divisions in the world instead of reducing these divisions and fostering the unity necessary for peaceful cooperation; (2) establishment of bases in, or a military alliance with, Spain; (3) efforts to misdirect the Benelux agreements into a military alliance; (4) the building of military bases in former mandated and colonial areas; (5) the policy of attempting the containment of Russia by military pressure, because it bypasses the United Nations and retards the development of security through truly international action."

The entire statement had been circulated in advance to the 120 members of the general and executive committees which make up the Friends Committee on National Legislation for their comments and criticism.

The annual statement as finally adopted tried to take into account suggestions and dissent so far as possible so that it might represent as closely as possible the thinking of the committee. The statement was then discussed in detail at the annual meeting and adopted with some dissent on a few items.

As you know, the Quaker business procedure is to seek as far as possible general concurrence and not to adopt statements by majority vote or coercion of a minority.

Unfortunately, due to our extremely limited filing space, the correspondence on this statement was destroyed after the document was finally edited by the editing committee and printed for distribution. We do not have a record of the exact number who wrote in approving the statement or expressing dissent, but I recall no objection at that time to the section quoted above.

On April 12, the executive committee met and discussed the implications of the pact as published. There was no opposition expressed to the position taken at the annual meeting.

In order to give you as accurate a picture of the present thinking of the committee as possible, in response to your question, I sent a letter on May 12 to each member of the executive and general committees, asking them to let us know their present attitudes on the pact and the accompanying arms program, since the text of the pact had been published and the discussion is now underway in the country.

The committee is scattered from Maine to California, so that there has not been time for complete and full response, but of the replies received to date, out of 120 members, the following tabulation summarizes the replies received from 76 members:

Opposed to the North Atlantic Pact, 69; opposed to accompanying arms program, 75; in favor of the North Atlantic Pact, 7; in favor of accompanying arms program (with some reservations), 1.

Sincerely yours,

E. RAYMOND WILSON.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Professor Cadbury, will you tell us, please, whether or not there has been any authorization for you to appear, which authorization was granted after the signature of the pact was effected, April 4.

Dr. CADBURY. The committee asked me to appear in case it was signed.

Senator DONNELL. When did the committee so ask you to do that?

Dr. CADBURY. There was a shift. Mr. Pickett was asked to speak and then the doctors said his health did not permit it, and they came back to me and asked me again after it was signed.

Senator DONNELL. So after it was signed this committee you are talking about now, the Friends Committee on National Legislation, requested you to appear in opposition to the pact?

Dr. CADBURY. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Have you given us today what you understand to be the substance of the views of the Friends Committee on National Legislation with respect to the pact?

Dr. CADBURY. Yes, and not only so, but since that is a partly delegated committee, as representing the views of the Society of Friends throughout America.

I may say that of these 28 annual meetings, 4 have been held in the last month or two, only 4, and all 4 of those independently and without prodding or urging from any central committee have gone on record as opposed, completely opposed, without any reservations opposed to the Atlantic Pact.

I am not sure I can lay my hands on it, but I will be perfectly glad to put in the record a sample of one of those resolutions.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, may I have leave to request Professor Cadbury to furnish to the committee within the next 5 days—can you do it that quickly—copies of all official actions that have been taken since, we will say, the 1st of October of 1948 up until and including the present date, by your organization or any department or committee of it with respect to the Atlantic Pact?

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say to the Senator that I do not object to putting some of it in, but I think it would encumber the record and be rather a burden to put in all transactions.

Dr. CADBURY. There are only two short statements. They are joint statements.

(The statements referred to are as follows:)

BALTIMORE YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS,
April 2, 1949.

STATEMENT ON THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT

From its earliest days the Society of Friends has held that war is contrary to the spirit, the life, and the teachings of Jesus, who renounced the weapons of worldly passion and replaced them by methods of love and self-sacrifice.

We reaffirm our conviction that no plea of necessity or policy, however urgent, can release either individuals or nations from their duty to follow the law of love.

If war is to be abolished, the spirit from which war proceeds must be eliminated and the beginnings of strife must be as carefully guarded against between nations as between individuals. To give occasions of offense or jealousy to people or governments of other countries, whether by the accumulation of armaments or by a hostile attitude, is not only a violation of this law of love but contrary to the best interest of all nations.

History has shown that military preparedness, rather than preventing war, is actually conducive to it.

The spirit and the letter of the North Atlantic Pact is contrary to our Quaker principles and beliefs. We feel it will not end the cold war. Rather, we are convinced it will intensify it and arouse fear and suspicion in those against whom it is directed.

We feel it will reduce and undermine the authority of the United Nations Organization by its attempt to form its own union of security.

The North Atlantic Pact provides for rearmament at a time when world recovery is dependent upon constructive economic rehabilitation and aid.

It encourages the concept of regionalism, a concept which can only continue divisions and increase tensions.

We recognize that this trend toward reliance on material and military might is but a symptom of a sickness more grave and fundamental. This fear and greed and lust for power which has overtaken us all can be overcome only by a complete reversal of this present trend.

We call upon the President, Congress, and the American people to recognize in this hour their opportunity and responsibility for assuming moral leadership. We urge our leaders, supported by the American people, to take courageous steps in this new direction.

We recommend as constructive alternatives to military alliances the following:

1. Strengthen the United Nations by giving it greater support.
2. Support and encourage universalism rather than regionalism in order to strengthen the bonds of friendship throughout the world. Only as we replace fear by faith can we end the cold war.

3. Launch a positive program of world disarmament and remove from a war-weary world not only the heavy burden of armaments but the fear and the suspicion which they foster.

These are bold but not unrealistic measures. Nothing less will be sufficient. Upon the nation with the greatest strength and resources is laid the responsibility for proving its sincerity by taking the lead.

We call upon the American people to renounce all forms of violence and oppression and turn to those moral and spiritual values which alone can make a nation great.

In the words of William Penn, "A good end cannot sanctify evil means, nor must we ever do evil that good may come of it. They must first judge themselves that presume to censure others. We are too ready to retaliate rather than forgive or gain by love and information. * * * Let us then try what love will do, for if men did once see we love them, we should soon find they would not harm us. * * * Force may subdue, but love gains; and he that forgives first, wins the laurel."

On behalf of the two yearly meetings of Baltimore, meeting in joint session, fourth month, second, 1949.

J. HAROLD PASSMORE,

Clerk, Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends, Stony Run.

EDWARD F. RAIFORD,

Clerk, Baltimore Yearly Meeting of Friends, Homewood.

THE ATLANTIC DEFENSE TREATY

A CONSTRUCTIVE ALTERNATIVE

In the present world of fear and force, we of the Philadelphia Yearly Meetings of the Religious Society of Friends feel compelled to reaffirm our faith in the processes of cooperation based on Christian principles.

We believe that the Christian concept of universal brotherhood means that all peoples of the human family must come to understand each other and to act with good will toward one another.

The crucial issue before the American people now is whether we shall seek peace and security through military power or by building a world community on the foundations of Christian faith and good will.

We oppose the North Atlantic Treaty because it intensifies the division of the world into two competing power areas. It implies further large-scale rearmament. It promotes regionalism when universalism is needed.

We urge upon our Government unremitting efforts to find a basis of ending the cold war with the Soviet Union.

We ask our Government to recognize and strengthen the moral authority of the United Nations over all nations.

We call upon our Nation to cooperate with other nations to halt the arms race which threatens to bankrupt civilization, which increases the danger of war, and which undermines the one-world concept of the United Nations. As a step in this direction we urge our Government to begin immediately the reduction of all categories of armaments, and to proceed through the United Nations toward world disarmament.

We heartily support every effort to develop the world's resources through the United Nations for the welfare of all peoples.

Our country should meet the tragic needs of this hour with a fresh dedication to the fulfillment of the divine purpose for a world of order and peace.

(Adopted by the Philadelphia Yearly Meetings of the Religious Society of Friends, March 28 and 29, 1949.)

Senator DONNELL. May I ask the professor, if he finds that there are other statements, without encumbering the record by any detail, if he would be kind enough to give a very brief synopsis of the actions so taken, and when and where they were taken?

Dr. CADBURY. There are only four of these groups that have met in annual democratic assembly since the issue has come before us, and these are the four here.

Senator DONNELL. Where were they held?

Dr. CADBURY. Two of them in Philadelphia and two of them in Baltimore.

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

Senator DONNELL. One last question, and that is this: You are described at the top of your statement as "Hollis Professor of Divinity, Harvard University." Tell us, please, what is that professorship, how long have you been there, what are your general duties, and what is, generally speaking, your background in the way of education and experience?

Dr. CADBURY. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not appearing on behalf of Harvard University.

Senator DONNELL. I understand that. It has bearing on your own individual education, background, and experience.

Dr. CADBURY. The chair I hold is the oldest academic chair in America, founded in 1721. I have been incumbent of that chair since 1934. The field in which I teach is the New Testament. My own education you can check in Who's Who. I hold a graduate degree from Harvard, honorary degrees from Glasgow. My undergraduate life was at Haverford College, and I hold an honorary degree from there also.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask leave to have the reporter insert at this point the Who's Who in America description of the witness?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask, finally, is the entire mimeographed statement to be set forth in the record?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you, gentlemen, very much; both you and the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. We have greatly enjoyed having you here, Doctor. We know you are a man of culture, education, and refinement, and of high ideals.

You are excused.

Mr. Howard Johnson wants to appear and present Mr. Eugene Dennis' statement. Is he here?

Mr. HOWARD JOHNSON. That's right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I will state that the committee has already decided that it would not hear a statement of this character read, because there is no opportunity to cross-examine the witness, but we are willing to put it in the record, which I think will give every member of the committee an opportunity to examine into it.

You, Mr. Johnson, are representing Mr. Eugene Dennis?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is right, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Why can't Mr. Dennis be here?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Dennis requested—

The CHAIRMAN. I am not asking what he requested. I am asking you why he is not here.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am explaining that. He requested from the judge in the Federal court in the southern district, where there is now some litigation current, that he be allowed to appear, to give this testimony. The judge refused, and that is why he is not here. I was chosen and authorized by Mr. Dennis to deliver this statement to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. We are glad to have you deliver it, but we cannot have it read at this time. I am not acting on my own. I consulted the members of the committee before they departed. It was their view that it could not be helpful to have a statement introduced here with no opportunity of the committee members to cross-examine, but we would let you put it in the record.

Mr. Dennis, I believe, is the executive secretary of the Communist Party of the United States, is that right?

Mr. JOHNSON. Not exactly. He is the general secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. I will change it. So he is the general secretary of the Communist Party in the United States, is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; thank you very much.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to say this, that Mr. Dennis will be very interested, because of the importance of the views of the Communist Party and the question of elaborating on his statement itself, that this committee would use its influence to have him appear here.

The CHAIRMAN. We cannot interfere with the courts. That is not our business. We did not get him into court and we are not supposed to get him out of court.

That is all. Thank you very much.

The committee will take a recess until 2:45. We want to admonish the witnesses that expect to appear this afternoon that they must be brief, because we have a large number of witnesses, and we cannot give each one all the time that he might desire. We want to be considerate, we want to be courteous, but there are physical limitations upon this committee.

(Whereupon, at 1:35 p. m., the hearing was recessed until 2:45 p. m. of the same day.)

(The statement of Eugene Dennis reads as follows:)

STATEMENT OPPOSING THE ATLANTIC TREATY

Submitted by Eugene Dennis, General Secretary of the Communist Party, U. S. A.

The Communist Party is opposed to the North Atlantic Treaty and calls on the Senate to reject the proposal that it be ratified. With a great and growing body of Americans, we Communists hold that this is an aggressive military alliance which jeopardizes the true interests of our Nation and the welfare and security of the American people.

The brutal reality of this treaty was bluntly stated in an editorial that appeared in the Wall Street Journal of April 5, 1949:

"Proponents of the Atlantic Pact might object to designating it jungle law. But the most cursory analysis reveals the thinness of the veneer of civilization covering it. It makes military might the determining factor in international relations.

"The fact that the west believes right underlies its might does not make the Atlantic Pact any less a substitution of brute force for the human quality of reason."

Throughout the west, and not least in the United States, men and women who retain the human quality of reason reject this new proclamation that might makes right. In growing numbers, the forces of labor and the people see that Wall Street's adoption of brute force as a means reveals the end to be world domination, conquest, and, ultimately, atomic world war.

The first anti-Communist pact, signed by Nazi Germany, Fascist Italy, and militarist Japan in November 1936, also announced itself as a defensive alliance, aimed at the maintenance of peace and the preservation of western civilization. With a notable lack of originality, the bipartisan proponents of the Atlantic Pact repeat almost verbatim the arguments advanced by Hitler, Mussolini, and Tojo to justify their preparations for World War II.

Like Hitler's Axis, the Atlantic Treaty is directed not only against the Soviet Union, but against all democratic nations and peoples.

Like Hitler's Axis, Wall Street's Atlantic Treaty climaxes a whole series of war preparations. If ratified, it will advance us further on the disastrous road to world war 3.

First the Truman doctrine, and then the Marshall plan, prepared the way for the Atlantic Treaty. These precursors of the treaty were also falsely labeled as defense measures whose adoption would assure peace.

But the Truman doctrine, at heavy cost to the American people, keeps Greece embroiled in a disastrous war. The heroic Greek people continue their ever more effective resistance to the Monarchist-Fascist Athens forces, armed and commanded by the American militarists.

In fact, if not in name, the Truman doctrine was also the essence of American policy for aid to the corrupt and reactionary Chiang Kai-shek regime, and for the containment of Chinese democracy and progress. Now peace is coming to China as a result of the total defeat of this imperialist interventionism. Peace and freedom march with the victorious people's armies of liberation, led by the great Chinese Communist Party.

In an attempt to overcome growing popular opposition to the Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan was put forward as a humanitarian program. It was announced as a program that would stabilize peace by contributing to the peaceful reconstruction and recovery of the Marshallized countries. We were also told that it would avert a new crisis of overproduction in the United States, and provide full employment for the American workers.

The Atlantic Treaty is itself proof that the Marshall plan has not stabilized the peace. With its ratification, ERP would drop all pretense of being anything but a measure for putting the economies of the Marshall plan countries on a war footing, and making western Europe an armed camp under Wall Street domination. And mounting unemployment at home demonstrates the Marshall plan's failure to avert the growing economic crisis.

Other military alliances, like those binding the Latin-American and Benelux countries to the United States Wehrmacht, also preceded and paved the way for the Atlantic Treaty. Preparation for this third world war axis included the establishment of far-flung American bases and other military establishments, the institution of the peace-time draft, vast increases in arms appropriations, the stock piling of atomic bombs, and moves toward the creation of a satellite west German state.

Not only the forerunners of the Atlantic Pact, but also its projected successors, reveal its aggressive war aims. We are already being told that this peace measure is to be followed by still other military alliances in the Mediterranean and the Pacific.

Looking at the Atlantic Treaty in the context of the foreign policy of which it is an instrument—who can any longer doubt that this is an imperialist war alliance? It repudiates the policy of American-Soviet cooperation on which Roosevelt based his great design for lasting peace. It commits the United States to a policy of hostility to the Soviet Union and the eastern European democracies to aggressive war preparations which in the end can only lead to world war 3.

The Atlantic Pact undoes the long work to which the late President Roosevelt devoted so much time and effort. It undermines the United Nations and violates its charter.

Article 39 of the Charter vests exclusively in the Security Council the function of maintaining peace by protecting all nations from aggression or the threat of aggression. The pact emasculates the Security Council, and arrogates to one group of powers the authority to make war without consulting the Security Council.

The pretense that articles 51, 52, and 53 of the Charter permit regional arrangements for the collective self-defense of any group of nations, and hence sanction the Atlantic treaty, does not stand up under examination.

Article 52 permits the formation of regional arrangements to deal with those aspects of maintaining peace and security appropriate for regional action. But the Atlantic Pact is not a regional arrangement. It includes such widely separated nations as Norway and Italy. It extends to colonial possessions and bases from the Azores to the Belgian Congo.

Article 53 of the Charter, which permits the UN Security Council to "utilize" regional arrangements in order to maintain peace and security, also specifies that no enforcement action shall be taken by regional bodies "without the authorization of the Security Council with the exception of measures against an enemy state * * *."

But, unlike the defensive treaties concluded among the eastern European nations and the Soviet Union, the Atlantic Treaty is not directed against a possible revival of aggression on the part of the former enemy countries, Germany and Japan. On the contrary, it envisages the admission of a western German state in which the spirit of aggression, as well as the industrial potential of war, have been resurrected. It embraces fascist Portugal and plans the inclusion of the Axis Ally, Spain. This treaty is not directed against the World War II enemies, with whom we are still officially at war. It is directed primarily against our allies in the anti-Axis war—against the Soviet Union and against those forces in eastern Europe which gave resistance to the Nazis, and now head the governments of their countries.

Article 51 of the Charter permits individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the UN. But the crux of this article is its provision specifying that such self-defense is permissible "only in case of attack" and only "until the Security Council" has taken the appropriate measures. In setting aside these conditions, the Atlantic Treaty nullifies the authority of the Security Council.

Hailing the Atlantic Pact on March 18, British Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin, in effect, told the House of Commons that the United Nations is no more. "Frankly," Mr. Bevin said, "just as the League of Nations did not fulfill its purpose, neither has the United Nations."

It cannot be denied that if this defeatist estimate of the United Nations were before the Senate for ratification, the American people would rise in their wrath to demand that it be rejected.

The Communist Party opposes the Atlantic Pact on principle, as a menace to our own Nation and to world peace. No pretense of "demilitarizing" the pact could alter its war character. It is and must remain an aggressive war alliance—regardless of whether or not it is implemented by an arms-appropriation program—large or small.

Nevertheless, the cost of the pact, and its effect on the economic life of our own Nation and of western Europe must be assessed.

On April 21, Secretary of State Acheson assured this committee that the first year's armament bill would amount to "only" $1,000,000,000. This assurance was designed to allay the fears aroused by Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, who warned on April 5, that the rearmament of western Europe would face the United States with bankruptcy.

But Secretary Acheson's figure is only a fraction of our huge arms burden, which is already having a crushing effect on the living standards of America's working people.

Percentage-wise, another billion dollars for arms is no more than a 7 or 8 percent increase in the current war budget. But that 7 or 8 percent is not small potatoes when we consider that the present war budget is taking 50 cents out of every dollar spent by the Government. It is placing an enormous tax on every worker's pay check, and unbalancing the family budget of the working farmers, the middle class and the professionals. Four years after the end of World War II, the American people are paying taxes as high as those they carried at the war's peak. This war tax is drastically reducing the amount the American people can spend on food, rent, and clothing. It is depriving them of needed social services and essential Government aid—of adequate housing, education, health and medical care, of a higher minimum wage and expanded and more adequate social security benefits.

The figure of something over a billion dollars is only a first down-payment. No limit has been set to the billions required for the arming of the Atlantic Pact countries, already staggering under the burden of their present huge war budgets.

An additional billion-dollar outlay for arms means an increase of at least 20 percent on the dollar value of the western European armament program. No wonder that the conservative British Economist reported on January 8: "There is no means by which the Marshall plan countries can, even with the present scale of American aid, prevent a serious fall in their standard of living in 1952."

This deterioration of the economic situation in western Europe must inevitably increase the suffering with which the developing economic crisis threatens the people of the United States.

Moreover, the stimulation of rearmament in western Europe presupposes the revival of western German war industry. In anticipation of this, Gen. Lucius Clay, on April 25, already called for the integration of western Germany into the so-called European union—that is for the rebuilding of its war potential as an arsenal and base for military operations against the Soviet Union and the democracies of eastern Europe.

The American people and those of all other countries are suspicious of the Atlantic Pact, and fearful of its ratification. That is the very reason it was rushed to signature, and presented to them as an accomplished fact.

The main selling point of the big business interests behind this treaty, and of their bipartisan hucksters, is the myth that an invented threat of Soviet aggression threatens our country and western Europe.

All the facts totally debunk this fabrication, as even some supporters of the treaty admit. Thus, the New York Times of February 27 said editorially that a Soviet attack on the United States is "fantastically improbable." On April 20, the Times' rabidly anti-Soviet columnist, Anne O'Hare McCormick, declared: "It is absurd to believe that the Soviet Union contemplates sending an army across Europe or starting a shooting war against the United States."

But it is no secret that powerful forces in the United States do contemplate starting a shooting war against the Soviet Union and the countries of eastern Europe. The bipartisan supporters of the "cold war" in which the treaty is an ominous new development boldly advocate "preventive" war. Congressman Cannon was the latest of many public figures to urge the atomic pulverization of Soviet cities and the mass murder of the peoples now rebuilding homelands ruined by the Nazi invaders.

Because it is a Socialist state, the Soviet Union does not need profits wrung from conquest and colonial exploitation. It needs neither to dominate the economies nor to annex the territory of other lands. Consequently, the Soviet Union pursues a resolute policy for world peace. It is not, and cannot be, an aggressor.

Unable to point to a single act of aggression or threatened aggression on the part of the Soviet Union, the proponents of the Atlantic Treaty argue that a war alliance is needed to protect other nations against the invented danger of "indirect aggression" emanating from Moscow.

Article 4 of the pact specifies consultation by the signatories for the purpose of taking armed action "whenever, in the opinion of any one of them, the territorial integrity, political independence, or security" of any member of the alliance is threatened.

But the threat to territorial integrity, political independence, and national security comes from the dominant power within the alliance—from the United States. The Atlantic Treaty itself, like the Marshall plan, is an instrument of intervention against the peoples and nations of western Europe and threatens their territorial integrity, political independence, and security.

American imperialist intervention is not only a threat, but a recorded fact. It can scarcely be claimed that because the intervention of the United States in China failed of its purpose, it did not take place. Or that because it is meeting stubborn resistance in Greece it is not being ruthlessly carried on. The road to the Atlantic Treaty was paved by Wall Street's political and economic interventions in the internal affairs of the signatory countries, particularly France and Italy.

"Indirect aggression" is the treaty's transparent excuse for the repression of labor and of any movement for social change or national liberation which the rulers of the existing social order consider a threat to their profits and power.

Article 4 reveals that the treaty is a holy alliance for the repression of the labor and Communist movements of western Europe. This is admitted by James Reston, in the New York Times of March 1; "The executive branch of the Government is convinced that some of the western European nations must have military aid not only to defend themselves against external aggression but primarily to bolster their police powers against their own Communists."

And Secretary of State Acheson, explaining the treaty on March 18, confessed that while a purely internal revolution would not be regarded as an armed attack, "an uprising, inspired, armed, and directed from the outside would be a different thing."

This statement is reminiscent of those habitually made by big business, which professes to respect the right of workers to organize and strike—but defends its use of antilabor violence on the ground that the workers are being "misled by outside agitators."

In the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, all popular movements against feudalism and monarchy were denounced as inspired by American or French revolutionaries. Today every movement for the improvement of the people's living standards, for national liberation, or social advance is denounced as "Moscow inspired." The Atlantic Pact commits the United States to the forcible suppression of all popular movements, and thus makes a mockery of the Atlantic Charter, the Four Freedoms, and the aims for which the peoples fought the Second World War.

Article 4 is not only an instrument for intervention against any people which defends its national independence, rejects reaction and fascism, or decides that capitalism has outlived its social usefulness. Article 4 is also designed to continue the oppression of all the colonies of the imperialist powers associated in the new alliance.

This was made plain enough by Belgian Foreign Minister Paul Henri-Spaak when on March 18 he declared in Brussels that "consultations between the signatories could also take place in case of an incident occurring outside the geographical area of the pact if one of the signatories considered its security involved."

Thus Spaak admits that the treaty is intended to keep a handful of imperialist rulers in effective domination over much of Asia and Africa. He also strips the pact of its last claim to be a purely regional arrangement, confined to Atlantic powers.

Some Senators have indicated that they oppose ERP aid for the Netherlands if that country continues to defy the United Nations with respect to Indonesia. It will be interesting to see what stand they take on the Atlantic Pact, which is designed to give the American monopolists a greater chance to muscle in on the empires the pact seeks to maintain by force.

This committee has heard both charges and denials that the Atlantic Treaty violates the Constitution of the United States. The plain fact is that the treaty arrogates to the executive branch of the Government unrestricted power to make war.

It would leave Congress only the power to make formal declaration that a war is being waged.

But the treaty invites and promotes other violations of the Constitution and would advance the process of nullifying the Bill of Rights already going on. In advancing the military preparation for a third world war, the treaty accelerates the growth of fascism—and particularly the adoption of measures aimed at the total suppression of every force that struggles against the war makers.

The current political heresy trial of the 12 Communist leaders, as well as the police-state legislation adopted by a number of States and pending in the Congress, are war measures auxiliary to the Atlantic Treaty. So are the witch hunts and book burnings, the mounting antisemitism and increasing violence against the Negro people, the growing attacks against labor and Americans of foreign birth—all of which have accompanied the preparation for the Atlantic Treaty.

It is inherent in the logic of the treaty that its bipartisan proponents filibuster against antilynch and antipoll-tax legislation, and retain the Taft-Hartley Act while this war measure is being rushed to ratification. The attempt to brand as treason the patriotic struggle for peace threatens the suppression of all movements in defense of the people's living standards and democratic rights.

The signing of the North Atlantic Pact has increased, rather than diminished, the growing opposition to it in all parts of the world. This treaty is opposed not only by the nations and peoples against whom it is most obviously directed, but by the majority of the people in the signatory countries—including the United States.

The working class and its Communist vanguard in western Europe is a serious force for peace. But the Communists and their allies, particularly in the key countries of France and Italy, are by no means the only forces opposing the treaty. It is whole peoples, including the masses in all political parties, who are demonstrating their determination to repudiate the war commitment made by the governments of the signatory countries, and who voice the people's refusal to fight for the gain and glory of Wall Street.

The great world peace conference recently held in Paris spoke not only for the Communists and the left. It spoke for the hundreds of millions of plain people everywhere in the world who are rallying in united action against the imperialist war schemes of the United States monopolists.

Nor is it only the left, including the Communists, in the United States who oppose this war alliance. The committee must have considerable evidence of the far wider organized, and unorganized, opposition which is already substantial and grows rapidly. Strong opposition to the treaty has been voiced by major church groups in this country, and by the outstanding cultural leaders. Among the rank and file of the trade-unions, the Negro people, and the farm organizations sentiment against the treaty is increasing and becoming more vocal.

In view of the temper of the people, and taking into account the forthcoming meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers, further consideration of the Atlantic Treaty should be halted. To cut these hearings, in an attempt to rush ratification before the people have made themselves heard, would reveal that the United States approaches the Foreign Ministers' Conference in bad faith. Our Government cannot even pretend to good faith in negotiations for a peaceful settlement of differences with the Soviet Union, if in advance of negotiations it concludes this aggressive military alliance.

The masses of the American workers and people recoil with horror from the prospect of the atomic war which the Atlantic Treaty in effect assumes to be inevitable.

In accord with the desires and needs of the American people, we Communists call for a pact of peace and friendship with the Soviet Union, and for the repudiation of the aggressive Atlantic war alliance.

We call for universal disarmament, and for a policy that will make the United Nations work for peace.

We call for implementation of the UN resolution on curbing the warmongers for the destruction of all atomic bombs and the outlawing of their manufacture.

We call on our Government to negotiate with the Soviet Union a settlement of the German question along the lines of the Potsdam agreement, and for American-Soviet cooperation such as the Roosevelt policies made possible.

We call for the establishment of friendly relations with the new, liberated, China.

We call for normal foreign trade relations without interference in the affairs of other nations, and for an expansion of Government expenditures to meet the American people's peacetime need for homes, education, health, and social security.

The Communist Party, declaring that World War III is not inevitable, proclaims the inevitability of the people's continuing struggle for peace.

We are confident that the American people, refusing to be intimidated or stampeded, will organize and unite to defeat this infamous war alliance. But Atlantic Treaty or no Atlantic Treaty, we believe that our people will strengthen the effectiveness of their struggle for peace. We Communists are and will remain an integral part of the American people's movement of resistance to the imperialist and war-breeding policies of Wall Street. We are confident that the workers and people of our country and of the world will enforce their will to peace.

AFTERNOON SESSION

(The committee reconvened at 2:45 p. m., upon the expiration of the recess.)

The CHAIRMAN. Rev. Kenneth Ripley Forbes. All right, sir, tell the reporter your name and your business and whom you represent.

STATEMENT OF REV. KENNETH RIPLEY FORBES, THE PHILADELPHIA COUNCIL, THE COUNCIL OF ARTS, SCIENCES, AND PROFESSIONS

Reverend FORBES. I represent the Philadelphia Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions. I am pinch-hitting for somebody else. I have no documents or manuscript to hand you, but I want to present the following things.

I am not going to try to analyze the past. I am not able to, and I would not if I were. There are others far better qualified that will do a job of that sort.

There is just one thing I would like to present to this committee, and that is the fact of the very considerable volume of opposition to the ratification of the pact as it stands today. I think people in general take for granted that this thing is going through, perhaps is; but I doubt whether it is generally recognized how much widespread opposition there is to the pact.

OPPOSITION TO THE TREATY

I would like to give these few concrete examples for whatever they may be worth. On the 13th of last month there were 16 Midwest union leaders of the CIO, the A. F. of L., and the railroad brotherhoods, who took a position in opposition to the pact. On the same day—

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean by a resolution or what? Was there any written—

Reverend FORBES. By a resolution, I suppose. I have not seen the thing in writing. I have just seen the facts stated in the press. I have not seen the statement, that is, the resolution.

But on the same day I understand 267 New York leaders of the CIO and the AFL ran a good-sized advertisement in the New York Times—that, of course, is generally known, and is on record—in opposition to the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you aware that the American Federation of Labor and the CIO have both indorsed ratification of the pact.

Reverend FORBES. So I understand; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Reverend FORBES. I am just trying to point out that in the lower echelons of both these organizations there appears to be considerable organized opposition to the pact in various of their local units. The same is true of the CIO farm equipment workers, who, on the 27th of March, opposed the ratification of the pact.

On the 16th of March, 70 leaders of farm trade-unions, religious, veterans, and business people, expressed themselves also in opposition to the pact. Then, as was presented by somebody eariler today; a well-known fact that on the 4th of last month was the open letter of 300 distinguished religious and educational leaders, including the president of the Council of Bishops of the Methodist Church, who put themselves on record in opposition to the pact.

The Farmers' Union, who, I suppose, represents several million Americans, in a statement passed unanimously by its national board, said, among other things, these words, according to the records in the press [reading]:

There continue to be certain very disturbing elements in our Government's foreign policy. Of these, the most alarming is the proposal for a North Atlantic Security Treaty, obviously to be followed by extensive arms aid to Europe.

We cannot prove such, of course. We believe it to be directly contrary to American precedent and history, and to be a futile gesture. We deplore the sponsorship by the United States or by Russia of, or participation in, regional or bilateral defense agreements, and believe such efforts will weaken the United Nations.

Those are samples of what seems to be a fairly extensive and important section of public opinion in the lower echelons of organization against this pact. My only point, except to mention those, is to maintain that it is a very dubious wisdom, if American opinion is divided even by a representative substantial minority, to enter into something that will be an entirely new departure in American policy.

The pact, as I understand it, is not even reviewable for 10 years. It is not denounceable for 20 years. And if the opposition that we are starting with today grows from any sort of motives or reasons, such as one might imagine—taxation, for instance—it would put us in a very weak and embarrassing position.

That is my only contribution to your committee, that we face a more or less divided opinion in America about this pact. Therefore it seems to me that we ought to go pretty slow before we ratify what is so very widely opposed in so very many quarters. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Any questions, Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you a question. You appear for the Philadelphia Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions. We have another witness here. He represents the National Council of—

Reverend FORBES. He represents the national council.

The CHAIRMAN. So the two of you really are representing the same organization. Is that not true?

Reverend FORBES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Which is padding things up pretty badly. We have got a great list of witnesses.

Reverend FORBES. I have not consumed much of your time.

The CHAIRMAN. No; but I just wanted to observe that we cannot hear two or three different people from the same organization.

Senator GREEN. May I ask a question? It has occurred to me since I said I did not care to.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

CHOICE BETWEEN RATIFICATION AND NONRATIFICATION

Senator GREEN. You realize, do you not, when you state there are objections to this, that most of the choices in the world today are choices between two evils. The choice is: Which is the least objectionable?

REVEREND FORBES. Quite so.

Senator GREEN. Do you regard this as the least objectionable or the more objectionable?

Reverend FORBES. I do not know that I quite get your last question.

Senator GREEN. The alternative to doing this is doing nothing.

Reverend FORBES. A choice of evils—

Senator GREEN. That seems to be the choice.

Reverend FORBES. Quite so.

Senator GREEN. They both have objections, and both are possibly fraught with misfortune or evil results. Which is your choice?

Reverend FORBES. I am not quite clear what your alternative is. One is the ratification of the treaty. Is that it?

Senator GREEN. And the other is doing nothing.

Reverend FORBES. And the other is the refusal to ratify. I think the greater of the two evils is to ratify.

Senator GREEN. I wanted to find out which you chose.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Thank you very much.

Mrs. Anna Steelman Eicke, representing American Lithuanian Workers Literary Association, who states that she will be very brief.

STATEMENT OF MRS. ANNA STEELMAN EICKE, REPRESENTING AMERICAN LITHUANIAN WORKERS LITERARY ASSOCIATION, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mrs. EICKE. I certainly shall. You can take my word for it. It is less than 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead. Are you an American citizen?

Mrs. EICKE. I certainly am.

The CHAIRMAN. Why do you say you are originally from Lithuania?

Mrs. EICKE. I am not. I am an American, but I belong to a Lithuanian-American society.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is your allegiance? To the United States?

Mrs. EICKE. Certainly, always.

The CHAIRMAN. Lithuania is no more, anyway, is it?

Mrs. EICKE. We still have our parents there, and we still like their culture. We think it is educational.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not ask you that. I said Lithuania itself has passed out of the picture as a government, has it not? Russia absorbed it.

Mrs. EICKE. If you refer to the World Almanac, you will find that Lithuania was voted in to the U. S. S. R. in 1940.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead.

Mrs. EICKE. I am appearing in behalf of American Lithuanian Workers Literary Association, an organization of 7,000 Lithuanian-Americans interested in cultural and educational activities.

WEAKENING OF UNITED NATIONS

I am here to urge the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to disapprove the North Atlantic Pact on the grounds that:

1. It would weaken the United Nations, the one hope for peace. The pact is contrary to the letter and spirit of the United Nations Charter. It supersedes the United Nations. It has nothing to do with the regional pacts, agreements, or agencies provided in articles 52 and 53 of the Charter. No stretch of the imagination could call a regional agreement a pact which takes in the United States, Great Britain and its colonies, France and its colonies, Norway, Italy, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, Iceland, and Portugal.

WORLD SPLIT

2. It would split and divide the world into two armed camps. It is an alliance for war and it is aimed against one of our great allies in the great war against fascism. We agree with Henry Wallace when he says [reading]:

Stripped of legal verblage, the North Atlantic Military Pact gives the United States Army bases up to the very borders of the Soviet Union. If we apply Christian principles and try for a moment to put ourselves in their position, the true meaning of the Atlantic Pact will be clear to us. Supposing the Soviets had military bases on the Mexican border? The Canadian border? On Cuba? Could the treaty which puts guns in our faces be called a pact of peace?

We fully agree with the Federal Council of Churches of Christ when it says [reading]:

No defensive alliance should be entered into which might validly appear as aggressive to Russia, as a Russian alliance with Latin America would undoubtedly appear to us.

ARMAMENT EXPENDITURES

3. The pact would require additional billions of dollars from us for the armament of Europe. We are already spending more than half of our budget on arms and cold war. The Government has a request for an appropriation of about $1,300,000,000 for one implementation of the North Atlantic Pact.

But this is only the beginning. It is estimated that the western European nations would demand from us to equip and maintain anywhere up to 70 divisions. This would add up to tens of billions of dollars. At the same time we claim that we have no money for building houses, schools, and hospitals; for clearing slums and for improving the health of the Nation.

4. The pact would bring us into an entangling European alliance against which George Washington warned us. We do not need it. No one threatens to attack us.

5. The pact commits us without the right of deciding for ourselves, to another war. It negates our Constitution which states that only Congress has the power to declare war. The pact sets up an Atlantic council and a military staff committee in Europe with more power than the United Nation's Security Council.

Therefore, we urge the Senate not to ratify the North Atlantic Pact or at least suspend it while the Big Four confer and create for the meeting as peaceful and friendly an atmosphere as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a native-born American, are you?

Mrs. EICKE. I WAS.

The CHAIRMAN. Your husband was from Lithuania?

Mrs. EICKE. No, my husband was also an American.

The CHAIRMAN. You realize that Russia absorbed Lithuania, took it over?

Mrs. EICKE. We do not understand it that way. We understand that it voted into the USSR.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I do not know how you understand it, but it is now a part of Russia; and you seem to have a great sympathy and affection for Russia.

You say you agree with Mr. Wallace and his attitude and statements. Now, that is what I meant a while ago. We cannot have everybody that belongs to a group to appear here individually. Mr. Wallace has been here and some of his followers have been here and testified, and now you are here representing the Wallace cult.

I just want to warn other witnesses. We cannot have half a dozen people representing a single group because we have got a long string of witnesses and our time is very much filled. I just throw that out for what it is worth.

Mrs. EICKE. I represent the Lithuanian American Literary Association, and that is how we understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, we thank you for coming.

Mrs. EICKE. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. I think I will possibly have to go to the floor. All the other Senators are going over for a vote.

Prof. Colston E. Warne, the National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions. How long will it take you? You have had one representative here today.

STATEMENT OF PROF. COLSTON E. WARNE, THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE ARTS, SCIENCES AND PROFESSIONS

Professor WARNE. It will take me about 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Professor WARNE. My name is Colston Warne. I am a professor of Economics at Amherst College. I am testifying today on behalf of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions, a political and cultural organization of which I am a member. I offer for the record a list of the officers of that organization.

(The above-mentioned list of the officers of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions reads as follows:)

SUBVERSION OF U. N.

Professor WARNE. We are opposed to the ratification of the North Atlantic Pact as we have been opposed to the Truman doctrine and Marshall plan. All of these measures are integral parts of a foreign policy which subverts the United Nations and advances us further on the road to war. What is happening in China today exposes the speciousness of that policy. So do the growing numbers of partisan fighters in Greece. So does the report casting doubt upon the success of the Marshall plan report issued last week by the Economic Commission for Europe of the United Nations. The Truman doctrine has not stopped the civil war in Greece. The Marshall plan has not fostered genuine long-run recovery in Europe. And in our judgment the North Atlantic Pact will not assure peace.

The United Nations was conceived by Franklin Delano Roosevelt and created by the Allied Powers of World War II as the instrumentality through which the nations of the world could establish and maintain peace. It is based on the concept of unanimity among the great powers, and it provides all the necessary machinery for airing and settling differences among nations by peaceful means. In it are embodied the hopes of humanity.

In the past 2 years, this Government has consistently followed a policy which undermines the authority and effectiveness of the United Nations. First we substituted the Marshall plan for UNRRA and now we substitute a military alliance for the conference table and the Security Council.

The CHAIRMAN. I am sorry. I will have to ask you to suspend because I am summoned to the floor, and there is no other member of the committee present to conduct the hearing. I will have to ask you to wait until 3:30, and I will return.

Professor WARNE. Indeed.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not care to just put your statement in the record? You are not content with that?

Professor WARNE. I would much rather finish it, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. We want to accommodate you.

(Thereupon, at 3:05 p. m., the committee recessed until 3:30 p. m.)

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir. You had already proceeded quite a little ways, had you not?

Professor WARNE. I had proceeded through about one page.

RESOLUTION OF CULTURAL AND SCIENTIFIC CONFERENCE ON WORLD PEACE

On March 25 through 27 of this year, a Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace, of which you have undoubtedly heard, was held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel under the auspices of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions. I should like to submit for the record a copy of the general resolution unanimously adopted by the 2,800 delegates at the plenary session of that conference.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Put it in.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE ARTS, SCIENCES AND PROFESSIONS,
New York 18, N. Y.

TEXT OF RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED AT PLENARY SESSION, CULTURAL AND SCIENTIFIC CONFERENCE FOR WORLD PEACE, SUNDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 27, HOTEL WALDORF-ASTORIA

To create an environment in which our lives prosper; to discover a process whereby man's fruitful aspirations may find a future in the atomic age; to contribute to the establishment of an environment in which reason may operate as a scourge of fear and hatred; to take from the shoulders of the creators of the earth's wealth, its people, the dead burden of armies and their armaments and to remove from their minds the rending shocks of insecurity; to reaffirm the duty of artists, scientists, and workers in the professions to toll for a society of nations founded on justice for all; the cultural and scientific conference for world peace has been held and does herewith affirm:

The hour is late to unite for peace but there is yet time to save the peace if we truly unite. Humanity does not want another war. Peace is necessary and peace is possible. The maintenance of peace is the responsibility of all peoples. If the American people recognize their solemn duty and affirm their will, they can do their share to maintain peace.

The peril of the times has united us who are gathered here. The deliberations of this conference have strengthened our unity. On the issue of peace, irrespective of differences on other subjects, we propose to take our stand.

This is our stand:

We wish to open and keep open the channels of communication among the peace-minded peoples of all lands and in particular between our country and the Soviet Union. It was to this purpose that the conference was called. We have succeeded in demonstrating that the channels can be kept open. Those who have tried to discredit our efforts, because they have already yielded to fear, hate, and hysteria, have failed in their purpose. We invite them to reconsider their position and to join us in a common endeavor to save the future.

The interchange of ideas that has been achieved here is the way which our leaders on the highest level must take. All nations should judge every act of statesmen by whether their acts strive for peaceful negotiation and by whether they contribute to the settlement of American-Soviet differences on which the peace depends.

If the security of western Europe is in danger, if the security of the world is in peril, if fear stalks our land, it is because the terrible gulf between the United States and the Soviet Union has widened.

We will measure all plans, pacts, and budgets by this test. Will they bring us closer to peace, or do they rest on the false and dangerous premise of inevitable war?

Judged by these criteria, programs of rearmament and of military alliances from any source or any purpose, gravely intensify the danger of war.

Whatever the reasons, and whosoever the blame of the past, the heavy cost of the world's detour from the path of peace in these 4 years is obvious. It has been costly to America and to all nations. It has burdened all men with intolerable expenditures for waste and destruction. It is the shadow in every classroom and every laboratory and has begun to invade the churches. As is usual in times of hysteria, discrimination against the Negro people and other racial and political minorities has been intensified.

The drive toward war emasculates the United Nations. It increases the oppression of colonial peoples. It creates barriers between the United States and other nations.

The talk of war and the preparations for war endanger our liberties, and bring prejudice, intolerance, and violence to our streets and our meeting halls.

Every new measure hastily imposed on our people, every pact and military alliance drawn up under the pressure of war dramatizes our moral failure and emphasizes how quickly we must find a way to peace.

The first step on that way to peace is American-Soviet understanding.

Conscious of our responsibility and the urgency of the hour, we hereby resolve:

1. To do everything possible to strengthen the United Nations, as the best hope for peace.
2. To express our greetings and pledge our cooperation to other movements for peace throughout the world, conscious as we are that cultural and religious and labor groups, and many others are affirming the will of the world for a peaceful resolution of the present deadlock.
3. To continue the work begun here so that our countrymen may be roused to protect the peace; to instruct the sponsors of this conference to constitute themselves as the cultural and scientific committee for world peace of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, and to increase their numbers from among the men and women in the arts, sciences, and professions, to take appropriate measures to bring the decisions of this conference to the attention of the American Government and the United Nations, and to undertake an active campaign in the cause of peace.

We are an independent American movement. We are but one voice in the crescendo of the American and world will for peace. We will not cease our efforts until peace has been secured. In this endeavor, we serve our culture and our country. Only thus can our country and men and women of culture help serve the world.

Professor WARNE. I would like to read to you two sentences which pertain to this question. [Reading:]

We will measure all plans, pacts, and budgets by this test. Will they bring us closer to peace or do they rest on the false and dangerous premise of inevitable war? Judged by this criterion, programs of rearmament and of military alliances from any source or for any purpose, gravely intensify the danger of war.

It is our opinion that the North Atlantic Pact is such a military alliance as it imperils the peace.

OPPOSITION TO THE TREATY

The NCASP is opposed to ratification of the North Atlantic Military Pact for the following reasons: Because it contradicts both the letter and the spirit of the United Nations Charter, rejecting the concept of one world at peace for a return to the discredited system of power politics which divides the world into two armed camps and inevitably leads to war.

Because it is based on the false thesis that the Soviet Union wants war and is threatening military aggressions, a thesis which has been given the lie by such statesmen as John Foster Dulles, who, on March 9, speaking before the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America said [reading]:

So far as it is humanly possible to judge, the Soviet Government * * * does not contemplate the use of war as an instrument of its national policy.

I do not know any responsible high official, military or civilian, in this Government or any government, who believe that the Soviet state now plans conquest by open military aggression.

The CHAIRMAN. You quote Mr. Dulles. Do you approve of Mr. Dulles' attitude on public questions?

Professor WARNE. There are really two Mr. Dulles.

The CHAIRMAN. John Foster Dulles.

Professor WARNE. Yes, there is the Mr. Dulles who made this statement in reference to Russia; and one also, I understand, who has made an inconsistent—

The CHAIRMAN. You ought to make it clear in your record, because John Foster Dulles is one man, and some other kind of Dulles is someone else.

Professor WARNE. I am speaking of the same John Foster Dulles, but I am speaking of the attitude which he takes on this particular issue, his attitude on the Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. You are quoting him with approval, and yet he is for this pact, is he not?

Professor WARNE. He is for this pact; you are right. But he has stated specifically, and I have not seen any indication since March 9 that he has altered his stand on this, that the Soviet Union does not contemplate the use of war as an instrument of its national policy, and I think that that is highly pertinent.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Dulles was here before this committee a few days ago. Did you read his testimony?

Professor WARNE. I have read his testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. He said he was for this treaty, did he not?

Professor WARNE. He did, and his testimony runs in contradiction to this basic statement which I think is very forceful.

The CHAIRMAN. If you feel that way, I would not call him as a witness.

Professor WARNE. I call him as a witness on this one specific point.

The CHAIRMAN. You say it is contradictory, and you just call him on that part. That is your way, is that it?

Professor WARNE. I call him on the specific attitude that he denies that the Soviet State is today planning military aggression.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you here as an advocate of the Russian State?

Professor WARNE. I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead.

REASONS FOR OPPOSITION TO TREATY

Professor WARNE. Because it will further distort the economics of western Europe by sacrificing even more of their funds to an increased military budget, by diverting sorely needed manpower to armaments production, by crippling still further the efforts of those countries to rebuild their peacetime industries.

Because it will create a similar imbalance in our own economy, increasing the arms budget and expanding munitions production at the expense of the social and economic needs of the country.

Above all, we oppose the North Atlantic Pact because we believe it to represent not a peace pact nor even a defensive alliance, but rather deliberate and organized preparation for war. And we firmly reject any idea that such war is inevitable or necessary.

It is our considered opinion that the differences between the Soviet Union and the United States may be resolved around the conference table, and we look forward to the Paris Conference of Foreign Ministers as an important step toward such peaceful discussions. Once these high-level conversations have been instituted, it will then be possible to strengthen the United Nations as the chief instrumentality for maintaining world peace.

HASTE FOR RATIFICATION

Before analyzing further the reasons I have just stated for our opposition to the pact, I should like to state that I am greatly disturbed by the statement of Senator Connally, as reported in yesterday's Times, that—

It would be very helpful if the Foreign Relations Committee would conclude its hearing on the treaty before the Foreign Ministers Conference started. Indeed, it would be desirable if we could get Senate ratification of the treaty before then.

Leaving aside for the moment the effect that any decisive action on the pact might have on the potential success of the Foreign Ministers Conference—and I will come back to that—I should like to consider the basic implications of trying to speed up the hearings of this committee.

Such indecent haste could be construed in no other way than as a contravention of the basic purpose of public hearings—that is, to permit every citizen and group which indicates a desire to speak, the opportunity to be heard. Limitations on such testimony would, at any time, represent a dangerous curtailment of the democratic process.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you consider we have been unduly hasty?

today? Have we not been patient? We have been in session—tomorrow will be 2 weeks—and I suppose we will be in session for 2 or 3 more weeks.

Is that undue haste? Do you regard that as undue haste?

Professor WARNE. Not if you are in session two or three more weeks. I think that is excellent.

The CHAIRMAN. We have been courteous to you. We have given you your chance to speak your piece and give us your views. What complaint have you got against this committee, except that you are not the committee?

Professor WARNE. I have no point with respect to that. I merely suggested that the haste reflected in that quotation of trying to get this matter disposed of before the Foreign Ministers Conference is the—

The CHAIRMAN. My view in that was it would be an encouragement to the foreign ministers to let them know something about what is happening in the world. Go ahead, though.

AUTOMATIC DECLARATION OF WAR

Professor WARNE. It is particularly appalling when attempted in relation to the North Atlantic Pact, which, if ratified, would commit the American people to a possible war at the discretion of the military without any necessity for Senate approval.

The CHAIRMAN. Why do you say that? That is not so, and you ought to know it is not so, because it is specified in the treaty that it has to be approved by the constitutional processes, which means declaration of war by the Senate.

Professor WARNE. Well, the question there involved is—

The CHAIRMAN. You are a professor of arts and sciences.

Professor WARNE. I am a professor of economics.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you artful enough and scientific enough to read the Charter and know what it means? That is what it says, no automatic declaration of war.

Professor WARNE. No automatic declaration of war, but there is a real—

The CHAIRMAN. No declaration of war, except by Congress, where the Constitution puts it.

Professor WARNE. There is a pledge to restore and maintain security in there, which pledge has to be implemented, if words mean anything.

The CHAIRMAN. By true constitutional processes. Now, you know what that means, do you not?

Professor WARNE. But this in a sense should be farming out—

The CHAIRMAN. No; it is not farming out anything. Go ahead.

Professor WARNE. We disagree, I think, markedly there.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Go ahead.

Professor WARNE. To steamroller a proposal so foreign to the historic policies of this Nation to a vote without the fullest and freest possible discussion from proponents of all viewpoints would negate the very fundamentals of our democratic tradition in the eyes of our own citizenry and of the world.

Moreover, so far as we have been able to ascertain, unlimited time has been granted to those representatives of the administration who testified in favor of the pact. It is only the opponents of the pact who, as in the case of many of the State councils of the National Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, have been refused any opportunity to testify or, as in my own case, have been requested to limit the length of my statement. There would seem to be a deliberate attempt on the part of this committee to prevent opponents of this measure from testifying fully, if at all.

FOREIGN MINISTERS CONFERENCE AND THE PACT

The news of the lifting of the Berlin blockade and of the impending conference of the Big Four foreign ministers has raised the hope of statesmen and citizens that the world war is on the verge of being melted away. I cannot believe that anyone who wishes peace would want to predoom that conference to disaster. And yet, that is just what any definitive action taken between now and the time of the Paris meeting would do.

How could we possibly convince the world that we were coming to that meeting with a will to agreement and settlement of differences if we had just ratified a military alliance with two of the other participants which is clearly directed against the fourth conferee?

Can it be that the adherents of this pact are fearful lest the successful outcome of the Big Four conference would demonstrate to the Members of the Senate and many citizens that even the supposed reasons for this measure do not exist? Are they afraid that the American people will not want to be defended from peace by a war pact?

I can find no other explanation for this unseemly rush to conclude hearings, although I would think that, professing peace, this committee would want to consider the outcome of that conference most carefully before making any recommendations to the Senate.

The only inference to be drawn from speedy conclusions to the hearings and possible quick ratification of the pact prior to the foreign ministers' meeting is that once again the administration will force the forthcoming conference into lines already crystallized by the workings of the pact.

This can only serve to limit the possible areas of agreement among the foreign ministers, cutting down the usefulness of their discussions and thereby perpetuating the illusions upon which the cold war is based. We have tried to stack the cards this way before; but international politics cannot be manipulated like a poker hand.

COST OF OUR FOREIGN POLICY

Our successive adventures in foreign policy, from the Truman doctrine down, wherein we stacked the cards always on the side of military power, committing the United States to a policy of arming reaction and violence, have not once produced the expected result—that the alleged enemy would cower in fear and therefore yield to our position.

What have these cards, stacked by the administration, cost the American taxpayer? As taxpayers and consumers, we are paying for it directly in higher prices, high taxes, and inflation. As our taxes siphon through our Government Treasury and are placed at the disposal of a combine, which includes a generous quota of the armaments producers, they take the form of $625,000,000 for military expenses in the Greek-Turkish aid program; $17,000,000,000 for the Marshall plan for 4 years; $2,000,000,000 for occupation costs in Germany, Japan, and Korea; $1,500,000,000 to provide the first year's arms under the North Atlantic Pact.

Over $22,000,000,000, plus a few more billion for Chiang Kai-shek. That is the bill so far. In the next few years, it will jump billions more because a combat division costs $400,000,000; and, according to the military men who plot their campaigns, win their wars in advance—36 such divisions must be prepared in Europe alone within the next 2 years—nor do these figures include an air force. It is anybody's guess what the final cost of the cold war will come to. The administration is too shy to give us exact figures on this score.

To these billions of dollars we must add costs which cannot be estimated in money. Fear of war is costly. So far has this gone that, to fight the war danger, to object to red baiting, to propose public works like schools, and housing is to turn the proponent into a foreign agent.

Even the most unwary consumer still believes he should get his money's worth. This bill, so far, is over $22,000,000,000. And what have we bought? The right, nay the necessity, under the terms of our present foreign policy, to buy more and more of the same, with no end to the cycle. For, it is implied that after the Truman doctrine, the Marshall plan, and the North Atlantic Pact, will come a Mediterranean Pact, and a southeast Asia Pact. Ours is only one country on this earth, with only a small proportion of the world's population, and with the proud privilege of having developed its resources to the point where it can supply 60 percent of the world's goods.

The National Council of the Arts, Sciences and Professions, which I have the honor to represent, holds to the opinion that this privilege, growing out of our advanced technology and great natural resources, confers upon us all the responsibility of using these goods for the benefit of our own people and those of the world.

STRENGTHENING DEMOCRACY

Even at high prices, $22,000,000,000 would provide millions of homes, thousands of schools and road, scientific medical research, and the incalculable benefits of a free citizenry, unfettered by political restrictions in its ideas and researches. Lifting of the armaments burden from our own country, as well as from the peoples of western Europe, who are now being forced to add to the cost of war devastation the cost of a new arms race, would free us all and bring to the forefront those democratic precepts which were truly involved in the building of American democracy.

Twenty-two billion dollars, or even a part of $22,000,000,000 expended to provide for that one-third of our Nation which is ill-housed, ill-fed, and ill-clothed would place the United States in the forefront of the United Nations as the proponent of those values and practical expenditures, principles of national independence which would fulfill the purpose of the United Nations. Such a policy of fostering democracy and giving relief through the United Nations would allow the people of Greece to decide for themselves whether they want a king or a president.

Such a policy would by now have strangled the Franco regime and would have allowed the Spaniards to set up their own republic. Such a policy would allow Indonesia to be controlled by the Indonesians. Such is the policy which the people of China have taken into their own hands.

In so doing, they prove that the greater the amount of money we spend for armaments to influence their politics, the greater their determination and ability to manage their own affairs. The history of the United States from its inception, through the War for Independence, the War of 1812, and the American Civil War, is living proof that the aspirations of any people determined to make their own destiny cannot be diverted by bullets.

The news of the lifting of the Berlin blockade and of the impending conference of the Big Four Foreign Ministers has raised the hopes of statesmen and citizens that the cold war is on the verge of being melted away. I cannot believe that anyone who wishes peace would want to predoom that conference to disaster. And yet, that is just what any definitive action taken between now and the time of the Paris meeting would do.

STRENGTHENING THE UNITED NATIONS

This conception that freemen will fight against tyranny helped found the United Nations, which grew out of the victorious fight against a fascism which believed guns and airplanes and concentration camps could mold the world to its desires. The establishment of the United Nations based on the concept of unanimity and the recognition of the rights of sovereignty, laid the groundwork for mutual assistance and the domination of no country by another. The perversion of this policy in the hands of our present administration is rapidly disorganizing the functions of the United Nations and its ability to maintain the peace.

The North Atlantic Pact supersedes the United Nations by a military council. It places force above reason and peaceful negotiation; it paves the way for war, not peace.

It is for these reasons that we ask this body—the Senate of the United States—not to ratify the pact. It is for these reasons that we implore the use of negotiation through such peaceful means as the forthcoming Ministers' Conference; it is for these reasons that we must have a truly strong United Nations which, supported in true harmony by the principal nations, can guarantee the peaceful economic and political development of the peoples of the world.

THE CHAIRMAN. You want to strengthen the United Nations?

PROFESSOR WARNE. I do.

THE CHAIRMAN. Do you think that 30 Russian vetoes on important matters since the beginning of the Charter has tended to strengthen it?

PROFESSOR WARNE. I have no brief whatever—

THE CHAIRMAN. I did not ask you about brief. I asked you that plain question.

PROFESSOR WARNE. I do not think that indiscriminate use of the veto by any nation strengthens the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. Why are you dodging Russia? She is the one that has imposed the 30 vetoes, and I asked you that plain question. Then you shot off on a general statement, because you are afraid someone will think you are in sympathy with Russia.

I do not charge you with being in sympathy with Russia. I just asked you if 30 vetoes by Russia tended to strengthen the United Nations.

Professor WARNE. I think the answer given earlier this afternoon was very appropriate, and that is, it is a question of what they veto and the question of a majority versus a minority in an organization. I do not think that has a strict bearing upon this immediate issue.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you refuse to answer the question? That is what you do?

Professor WARNE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think 30 vetoes strengthened the United Nations?

Professor WARNE. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. Or weakened the United Nations?

Professor WARNE. I think the tendency to overuse the veto definitely weakens the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. Why did you not state that instead of making a sermon on the subject?

Professor WARNE. I stated it in the beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. You were against the Greek proposition, the Greek assistance.

Professor WARNE. I am against our policies in Greece.

The CHAIRMAN. You are against giving them any money, giving them any armaments, giving them anything?

Professor WARNE. I would give relief to Greece through the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. The United Nations has no relief funds.

Professor WARNE. It does not, and that is where the trouble begins.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly. It has none, so you want to have it done through the United Nations when they have no relief funds. You were against the Turkey bill, of course, against the aid to Turkey?

Professor WARNE. Of course.

Professor WARNE. I am against the use of Marshall plan funds in the way in which they are used, rather than through the United Nations. I am not against the use of it.

The CHAIRMAN. You are against all these plans because you want to do them some other way. Is that it? You have got a plan of your own?

REGIONALISM AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Professor WARNE. I am against our policy of regionalism associated with the employment of countries and political governments as instruments of a political policy.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not know that in the charter of the United Nations, it provides for regional arrangements? Answer that, please. I am not going to ask you any more questions unless you can answer them.

You are not fooling anybody. You are smart enough to know what we ask you. You are a professor of what?

Professor WARNE. Economics.

The CHAIRMAN. Economics. Well, economics, I thought, taught something about the plainness of a thing. You know what I am asking you. I do not care to ask you any more questions if you are going to dodge them all.

Is that all?

Professor WARNE. That is all I have.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. We thank you very much.

Professor WARNE. You are welcome.

The CHAIRMAN. You never did answer my question whether you recognized in the United Nations Charter regional arrangements.

Professor WARNE. I did; I said "Yes."

The CHAIRMAN. You were talking about the United Nations. Why do you not approve of that?

Professor WARNE. I very thoroughly approve of the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. I know, but of that clause about regional action?

Professor WARNE. I think there is an appropriate scope for regional action, and that scope does not involve international relief commitments in the military field, which commitments must always under the charter be subject to the scrutiny of the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you the president of this National Council of Arts, Sciences, and Professions?

Professor WARNE. I am not. Harlow Shapley is the president. I am merely a representative.

The CHAIRMAN. You were merely delegated to come down here?

Professor WARNE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. That is all. Thank you very much.

Mr. Morford.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD MORFORD, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF AMERICAN-SOVIET FRIENDSHIP

Mr. MORFORD. I am Richard Morford, executive director of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship since January of 1946.

The CHAIRMAN. Before that, what were you?

Mr. MORFORD. I am a Presbyterian clergyman; and I was the executive of the United Christian Council for Democracy before that. Before that, I was minister of the House of Friendship in Albany, and secretary of the Federation of Churches. Before that, I was a Presbyterian minister in Morristown, N. J.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you abandoned the pulpit for this organization of Soviet Friendship?

Mr. MORFORD. No, sir, I count this a part of my ministry still. I am not an active minister in a church at this point, but I hold regular standing as a clergyman.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go right ahead.

Mr. MORFORD. I think that we have reached a turning point in American foreign policy in the consideration of the North Atlantic Pact. The United States Senate is required to make a decision determining the life and destiny of the American people for years to come. Not only the people of America, but the people of the Soviet Union and of the entire world will learn whether we place major reliance on peaceful negotiations to settle world problems or are determined to employ the threat of war and preparation for war as an instrument of national policy. We are about to declare either that we want to live in the one world with our differences but in peace, or that we choose to divide the world into two armed camps awaiting the call to war.

THREAT OF WAR AS AN INSTRUMENT OF NATIONAL POLICY

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt you right there. Do you think that the Congress or the President or anybody else is determined to employ the threat of war and preparations for war as an instrument of our national policy?

Mr. MORFORD. In the attempt to prepare for the resistance to an armed attack, this indicates a threat of war in conditions which we decide are not met. I do not see how you could call it other, sir, than a threat of war.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, if we do not lie down and just let them walk over us, we are employing threats of war and preparation for war?

Mr. MORFORD. No; that I did not say.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not say it, but that is what you meant, was it not?

Mr. MORFORD. There is a choice of major reliance whether upon a peaceful negotiation or whether we want to build up a defense, as we indicate, against armed attack, which has behind it the threat of war and is supported by armaments. This is a part of the implementation.

The CHAIRMAN. You think that a nation which acts in defense of its soil and its territory and its people, if it resists an armed attack, is the one that is guilty by having determined to employ the threat of war and preparation for war? Is that your attitude?

Mr. MORFORD. No. My attitude would be that I think in the implications of this pact and building up resistance for attack, we will in effect be establishing a very tangible threat of war by the rearmament of Europe; and that in itself constitutes an aggressive act.

The CHAIRMAN. What would you do in case of an armed attack? What would you have the nation do? Just sit down and do nothing, let their armed attackers run over them?

Mr. MORFORD. No, that is exactly the practical problem, sir, that I find reflected by the American people, wondering what actually would constitute an adequate defense; and these practical considerations I would like to have an opportunity to present here.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. I will not interrupt you any more. I have long since learned that when a fellow has an obsession, there is no use to interfere with him.

Mr. MORFORD. It is the conviction of the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship, which I represent, that ratification of the North Atlantic Defense Pact would be a gigantic leap in the direction of total and disastrous hot war. And we are convinced that a leap backward later even to our present untenable cold war position would be all but impossible.

This military alliance is called a defense pact. But it is a war pact directed toward the Soviet Union as the alleged aggressor nation.

We believe, however, that the nation most ravaged by World War II—both its people and its Government—fervently desires peace.

It is not accidental that Dr. Warne and others turned to Mr. John Foster Dulles in his statement to the American churchmen in Cleveland, and I have repeated it here, that no responsible official in our own or in any other government believes that the Soviet Union plans military aggression.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. John Foster Dulles testified here before this committee that he is for ratification of this pact.

Mr. MORFORD. That is quite true, sir. But you see, what Mr. Dulles went on to say that I have here quoted was, that it was in his judgment quite unwise at this time to rearm Europe and to continue to establish bases in Europe for these could hardly be regarded by the other side as an act of aggression; and it would be too much to ask, said Mr. Dulles, that they restrain themselves in the event of such a situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the last time Mr. Dulles spoke on this thing he said he was for the pact.

Mr. MORFORD. That is correct, sir. But he is afraid of the armament that goes with it, and this is the thing I want to attest to here.

Yet it is proposed that 12 nations, including the United States, shall band together for the primary purpose of preparing for war against the Soviet Union and any friendly countries which may choose to cast their lot with the Soviet Union.

Other leaders who have spoken before me in this room and many other Americans in wider public forums have said that to create such an alliance is to sacrifice the future of the United Nations by undermining it now.

Others have pointed out that under pact provisions the traditional and exclusive right of our Congress to decide upon war as set forth in our Constitution is taken away. Others have expressed the belief that this country becomes automatically involved in war the day an attack breaks out at any point in the world where a signatory power may allege that aggression has taken place.

If this is not so by literal interpretation of the pact, it should be so practically, said Mr. Walter Lippmann in his Herald Tribune column on May 4. With these interpretations of the implications of the pact, barring Mr. Lippmann's cynical wish, the National Council has publicly expressed its agreement before this time.

DANGER OF ARMAMENT RACE

But in addition to these points, we believe that it is important to emphasize before this committee again today our conviction that to undertake to fulfill the obligations of this pact is to initiate a world-wide armament race.

Whatever arms and men for Europe are required in the first year of operation is one question. The first staggering stories we were told by military spokesmen have been put on the shelf, and a modest appropriation of $1,000,000,000 plus for arms for Europe for the initial period is now proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. Pardon me. Let me interrupt you. Do you know how big an army Russia has now?

Mr. MORFORD. I do not, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You ought to know. This organization of Russian Friendship is saying that she wants peace. Do you not know that Russia today has the largest army on the globe?

Mr. MORFORD. That may well be possible.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not possible? Is it not so?

Mr. MORFORD. I do not know, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think if you are going to testify before this committee on Russia's desire for peace and on military expenditures and all that, it looks to me as if you ought to post yourself on that before you come down here to tell us about it.

Go ahead. I will not press you on that.

Mr. MORFORD. I could talk on it, but I could not talk with authority concerning the actual armed forces of the Soviet Union. I do not think that information is available. It might well be, but it is not, and there are a whole line of reasons behind that.

As Secretary Johnson has already explained to you, the large amount of arms for western Europe will be surplus, provided at 10 to 15 percent of original value. In other words, western Europe is to receive at least $5,000,000,000 worth of American war material during the initial period. All this cost to be added to our own near $16,000,000,000 arms program, without speaking about millions for Greece and Turkey.

Earlier talk about manpower to go to Europe with the guns has been silenced in official quarters. The American people are entitled to know the true intentions of the proponents of this alliance and the cost in lives and fortune that is contemplated.

Sooner or later—and western Europe statesmen say it must be sooner—we shall have to invest from 20 to 30 billions of dollars in arming Europe and support the armament with as many as 100 divisions of men. This is the judgment of the well-known military analyst, Max Werner. I judge that the overwhelming bulk of the armament for western Europe, America will pay for, and that at least a quarter of the manpower we shall ultimately have to provide.

And will the defenses of western Europe then be impregnable? I am not convinced by the testimony of the military leadership of our own country. I do not think they are convinced themselves, if one can judge by the fight going on among the armed services as to where military superiority is to be found.

The CHAIRMAN. Your prediction of these dire results is based on your theory that there will be an armed attack on somebody in this treaty by an outside power. Is that not true?

Mr. MORFORD. It is based upon the proposition put forward here that it is necessary to build up defenses in order to resist a potential armed attack.

DANGERS OF REARMAMENT

A primary reason for our being here today to register our opposition to the pact is that we believe the results of a world-wide armament race are bound to be disastrous to the United States and its people.

We will ruin the economy of the United States in the process of arming Europe and ourselves. The families of this Nation are not going to be able to pay the bill in taxes over any extended period.

The President's chief economic adviser, Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, warned recently that additional spending for the rearmament of Europe would mean "additional taxes or * * * a budget deficit." Whatever the bankers say, when the families of the Nation are without money to buy the goods they need, the entire economic structure stands in peril. There have been collapses before.

The rearmament and preparation for war required by the pact would take us on a military adventure which, besides being economically ruinous, is in itself a form of aggression which both invites and justifies equal rearmament and preparation for war on the other side. Two armed camps will face each other. Has it not been said that the best defense is an offense, to move before the other fellow moves? This is the way war starts.

We do well to ponder the words of Sir Edward Gray following the First World War:

Great armaments lead inevitably to war * * * The increase of armaments that is intended in each nation to produce consciousness of strength, and a sense of security, does not produce these effects.

On the contrary, it produces a consciousness of the strength of other nations and a sense of fear. Fear begets suspicion and distrust and evil imaginings of all sorts * * * It was these that made war (in 1914) inevitable.

In this kind of business the original objective of our foreign policy will be superseded by the objectives of massing superior military strength—beating the other fellow to the draw and winning the military victory—even though civilization may be destroyed.

For it is difficult to see how communism is to be contained or beaten or destroyed the world around by war. Is the result of a third world war to be different than the results of the first two? The New Statesman and Nation, conservative British weekly, concluded its recent editorial in opposition to the North Atlantic Pact with the warning that 200,000,000 people belonged to Communist regimes at the close of the First World War, that the total had risen to 600,000,000 at the end of World War II, and that it can be expected that communism will continue to advance wherever, as in China, the old order breaks down. If the defeat of communism is our goal, it should appeal to the sense of most Americans that neither the threat of war nor war itself will achieve it.

But now the things that are more peculiarly the things you would expect from me today.

SOVIET-AMERICAN DIFFERENCES

But what about the major differences which divide our country and the Soviet Union, you ask. Is not her system a threat to ours? Let me make answer. The Soviet Union about whom we speak today is the same socialist country that fought a war of liberation against Hitler side by side with us and our western allies.

The CHAIRMAN. But which was allied with Hitler and signed a treaty of alliance—

Mr. MORFORD. That was a treaty of expediency, sir, when it was not at all clear that the rest of Europe, and certainly not that America, was prepared to do battle with Hitler.

The CHAIRMAN. Signed it in the middle of the war, did they not?

MR. MORFORD. They signed it at a point when Britain and France—

THE CHAIRMAN. You know what I am asking you. Did they not sign it during the war?

MR. MORFORD. Right.

THE CHAIRMAN. Hitler and Ribbentrop?

MR. MORFORD. Right.

THE CHAIRMAN. And Hitler was then conquering all the other nations that he could conquer, and Russia joined with Hitler in a treaty; and it was only when Hitler broke the treaty and attacked Russia that she fought.

MR. MORFORD. Britain gave way at Munich, as you recall, sir.

THE CHAIRMAN. I am not talking about Britain. I am talking about Russia and Germany. What about it?

MR. MORFORD. I am talking about the treaty of expediency that Russia made with Germany when she found that Britain was going to play Germany off against the Soviet Union because Britain wanted to defeat bolshevism.

THE CHAIRMAN. All right. It seems to me you are apologizing for Russia all along the line. You say you want Russian and American friendship. I want to say my view is that we want Russian friendship. This committee wants Russian friendship. The whole Government of the United States wants Russian and American friendship, but we do not want it to be a one-way street. We want some friendship on their part.

MR. MORFORD. That is correct.

THE CHAIRMAN. Every day they are filling the air and the papers with abuse and denunciation and hatred of the United States. That is not a soil that generates friendship, is it?

MR. MORFORD. No, sir; but my practical question is that I think neither is a business of rearming Europe a way to accomplish it either. I think it is impracticable and unsound. It is only on that basis I come, not as an apologist.

The Soviet Socialist system was no barrier to our joint fight for victory. Our system was no barrier to Soviet cooperation. The difference in systems is no greater today.

The sound and sensible conclusion we are constrained to draw is that two major systems exist in our world. Both will continue to live, each evoking the loyalty of tens of millions of people. They will not give way one to the other, no matter what the threat. They can live in peace with their differing economies and politics. They can cooperate to their mutual advantage.

Even yesterday a Russian spokesman declared on the Moscow radio heard in this country that "It is certainly natural that if two different systems could collaborate in war, even more can they collaborate in peacetime" and then he concluded that such collaboration is desirable in the interests of maintaining a stable peace.

EAST-WEST TRADE IN EUROPE

Yet we have chosen under conditions imposed through the Marshall plan to dam the flow of an East-West trade which would, in truth, advance European recovery on a permanent basis and save American money now going into the Marshall plan for productive purposes here at home, benefiting the American people. It is the American businessman and financier who will attest to the profitable trade relations in the past with the Soviet Union whose capacity and willingness to purchase our goods is enormous and whose credit has been proved A-1.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, wait a minute. Let me interrupt you. You say that we have chosen conditions imposed through the Marshall plan to dam the flow of an East-West trade, and so on.

Mr. MORFORD. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not know that the ECA or the Marshall plan has been encouraging trade between the European nations and the Soviet satellites?

Mr. MORFORD. This, I am not clear about, Senator. I would like to—

The CHAIRMAN. If you are not clear on it, why do you make this bald statement which is not true?

Mr. MORFORD. Because I am not sure of the alleged truth that we have not attempted to curtail East-West trade.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you read the testimony before this committee on the ECA bill by Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Harriman and others, that they were encouraging trade between the East and satellite nations in western Europe?

Mr. MORFORD. But it is witness of the eastern countries, and it has been documented in the same international trade meetings, that they have not been able to gain export licenses for their materials, nor have the other countries been able to ship them the goods that they wanted. This has been true, sir, with regard to the trade treaty that stands between Britain and the Soviet Union.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not talking about Britain. I am talking about ECA and the Marshall plan.

Mr. MORFORD. Britain is a part of it, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I know, but she is not running it. Mr. Hoffman is the Director. And as between the testimony of Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Harriman, and others here in this committee, you prefer to take the testimony of some of the countries of the satellite nations?

Mr. MORFORD. I do not, sir. I am trying to take the testimony of Britain, and at the moment Britain's testimony—

The CHAIRMAN. You said the representative—

Mr. MORFORD. Through the Board of Trade has been to the fact that she has been able to receive the food that the Soviet Union promised under trade agreement, and has not been able to ship the machinery because of the political bottleneck imposed by Bevin.

The CHAIRMAN. By whom?

Mr. MORFORD. By Mr. Bevin.

The CHAIRMAN. Bevin is not the ECA; I am talking about the Marshall plan now.

Mr. MORFORD. I am talking about the Marshall plan, as we take that Marshall plan and put the influence and the pressure upon Britain to prevent her from a full and free flow of trade.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. I do not want to interrupt you any more. Go ahead and get through with your statement.

Mr. MORFORD. The Soviet Union has signed treaties of friendship with France and Britain. The Soviet Union concluded trade treaties with Britain and with other western European countries before the Marshall plan crack-down on East-West trade. We are leading nations who presently depend upon us economically into an untenable position of enmity with the Soviet Union.

SETTLEMENT OF DIFFERENCES

Why does not the United States undertake a treaty of friendship with the Soviet Union? Such a treaty has been offered by the Soviet Union, and I judge that the Soviet Union would be willing to make cooperation concrete by a trade agreement also. Why should we enter a war pact against a nation that has offered us a pact of peace?

It is acknowledged there are difficult problems unsolved upon which friendly relations have broken in the past. Nobody denies the gravity of the problems; nobody will say that these can be settled without some compromise on both sides. But neither do we think that the price of settlement need be the sacrifice of principle or of legitimate interests and security needs on either side. Once again the Soviet Union is meeting us half way in an effort to settle one of those difficult problems left by World War II which, because of double intransigence, has raised a serious barrier between us. The Berlin blockade on both sides is to be lifted tomorrow.

Nothing would contribute more to the easing of world tensions and establish wholesome conditions for a fruitful meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers on the German peace settlement than the postponement on your part, gentlemen of the Senate, of decision on the North Atlantic Pact. It would demonstrate that we are not yet irrevocably committed to preparation for war; that our meeting at the conference table is in good faith.

HASTE IN RATIFICATION

I would like to establish this disagreement which you have already had with Professor Warne on this point, for we do feel that unnecessary haste toward ratification of a war pact at the time of a meeting—

The CHAIRMAN. You do not want it ever to be ratified. Of course you do not want any haste because you do not want it ever to be ratified.

Mr. MORFORD. This is the position of the council. The plea that I come to you with in the last sentence of this is a plea, sir, at least that you withhold while you are trying out the full possibilities of the peaceful negotiations which have again been resumed after this long break—

The CHAIRMAN. I asked you the question, though. You stated in your testimony that you are against ratification. That means you never want it ratified, and, of course, you complain of anything that looks toward ratifying it, whether it is haste or whether it is deliberations or what it is; you are against it.

Mr. MORFORD. I was not questioning here the haste. I was questioning here a relationship of attempting to ratify this completely new move in American foreign policy at a time when you are able to resume peaceful negotiations and see what can be accomplished at the council table.

The CHAIRMAN. We are going to have peaceful negotiations in the Foreign Ministers Conference on the 23d. I am perfectly willing to wait and see what they do. If Russia is there and has a veto in her pocket, it will not amount to anything.

Go ahead.

Mr. MORFORD. We are compelled to disagree strongly with the chairman of this committee the honorable Senator from Texas, Mr. Tom Connally, who was reported by the New York Herald Tribune to have stated last Sunday that the pact ought to be ratified in time to impress the Big Four Foreign Ministers when they meet in Paris on May 23.

Senator Connally was said to have warned that unnecessary delays "might be misunderstood and misrepresented" by the Russians. We feel, on the contrary, that unnecessary haste toward ratification of a war pact at the time of a meeting to find common ground for a peaceful settlement can only be understood by Russia as well as by other nations as an American demonstration against peace.

I come here today to say that the National Council of American-Soviet Friendship is not cynical about international relations. Some Americans see much to criticize in the actions of the Soviet Union. Some Americans have been critical of American foreign policy since the end of World War II. Nevertheless we believe that amity will be the reward of an honest effort of our two countries to face each other at the conference table as equal nations, feeling equal concern and responsibility for preserving both their own interests and world peace.

We shall not succeed in advancing the peace at the council table beginning May 23 if we suspend a sword above the chairs of the Soviet representatives. Nor will we succeed in subsequent peace conferences—indeed, it is hard to see how there can be any—if we go through now with an alliance which puts one sword in the hands of the western European nations, two swords in our own, and points them in the direction of the Soviet Union.

Not only will the peace be lost by such action. Not only will the so-called enemy nations suffer in war. We will do well to reckon coldly with the ancient Scriptural warning, "They that take the sword will perish by the sword."

For the sake of our own country and its people we ought to withhold approval of the North Atlantic Pact at this time. For the sake of mankind let us consider this matter further, gentlemen of the Senate. We do not want history to convict America of the crime of being ringleader among the nations which brought disaster and ruin to civilization. No amount of negotiation, however difficult and prolonged, can be as bad as one day of atomic war.

Let us stick to the ways of peace.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

The CHAIRMAN. All right. That is fine. If a nation should arm itself and make an armed attack on another nation, what would you want to do about it? Have peace and just let them come on in and take it?

Mr. MORFORD. No; that would be the time to decide whether it should be resisted.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you favor now? Suppose a nation arms itself and makes an attack on another nation. What do you want to do about it? What would you favor?

Mr. MORFORD. I would want to know what the nature of the attack is. I do not want to make a generalization, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Any kind of an attack. That is the nature, any kind. Would you favor just lying down and letting them walk over you? That is the way to have peace, just to let the other fellow do what he pleases to you and do nothing about it, and you have got peace. But you have got slavery with it.

Mr. MORFORD. But if there is an armed attack, sir, that does not necessarily mean that you want to assemble all of the forces which already have been assembled to throw the world into war because of an attack that may take place at any one point where any nation alleges there has been aggression.

There are too many complications in that kind of a business for me to make an answer at this point that is reasonable.

The CHAIRMAN. You decline to answer, then? Is that right?

Mr. MORFORD. On the basis that I have just indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You seem to think that nearly everything Russia does is right and nearly everything your country does is wrong.

Mr. MORFORD. I have not said so, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I know you have not said so, but is that not the upshot of your testimony?

Mr. MORFORD. I do not think that is the implication. The only thing I am saying is what we are finding among the people, that even though the objectives may be accepted, this is not the practicable way. In fact, this is the ruinous way to try to meet even the objectives which have been the basis of our foreign policy since the end of the Second World War, namely, to contain communism the world around.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, thank you very much. I am sorry the other members of the committee are not present to interrogate you further.

Mr. MORFORD. You have been very patient.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, sir. I want to warn all further witnesses that you had better come with your written statements because the chances are that we will not be able to hear you all at length on every imaginable question unless you put it in a written statement, that we can incorporate in the record and allow you about 5 minutes to then explain what the written statement means.

We will recess until tomorrow at 10:30 a. m.

(Thereupon, at 4:20 p. m., the committee recessed until Thursday morning, at 10:30 a. m., May 12, 1949.)

(The following statement was submitted for the record:)

STATEMENT OF STEPHEN A. DAY, COUNSEL OF WE, THE PEOPLE, INC., BEFORE THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, UNITED STATES SENATE, MAY 11, 1949

The pending treaty marks a violent departure from the time-honored position of the United States in foreign affairs. It also marks a violent departure from the Constitution of the United States. There must be strong justification for such a step and the record discloses no such justification. We are forced to conclude that the pending treaty does not stand alone; that it is but a link in a chain of events most of which are secret and unknown to the American people.

No one can believe that this treaty is not aimed at any particular nation. We all know that the Soviet Union is the aggressor expected to make the "armed attack" set forth in article 5. If Congress should declare war in the constitutional manner against the Soviet Union for reasons deemed sufficient, we would have no objection. But we do object to a betrayal of the birthright of every American citizen by an underhanded and sneaking approach which is unparalleled in our history.

Take for instance the report to the Security Council of the United Nations that an armed attack has been made against one of the signatories and that armed force "shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security." What a travesty is involved in these words when we know that the Soviet Union is a member of the Security Council, possesses the veto power over its decisions, and at the same time is the aggressor. Furthermore, we all know that the United Nations and its Security Council have no police force and could not possibly "restore and maintain international peace and security." Such provisions do not do credit to a great Nation like the United States.

Britain and France already have treaties with the Soviet Union which are in direct contradiction with the pending treaty. These nations would have to decide which of the two treaties they should honor. In fact, a leading official in France has indicated that France will examine any given situation to determine which nation is the aggressor, the United States or the Soviet Union, and then France will aid that nation which in her opinion is not the aggressor. What will become of the munitions of war provided by the United States to France? Will they be used against us? We all know that there are millions of Communists in France who have openly stated through their leaders that they will never fight against the Soviet Union.

It has been argued that this treaty will prevent World War III; when it is known in advance that the United States is committed to come to the aid of the nation upon which an aggression has been made, the Soviet Union will not fight. It is pointed out that we could have avoided participation in World War I and World War II if we had taken similar action before those wars. This is mere wishful thinking.

Under the Constitution of the United States the people are sovereign. Our Supreme Court has held that a treaty cannot change the character of the Government. We cannot permit any authority to exercise powers superior to the sovereign people of the United States. It is quite conceivable that under this treaty with its military alliances, the ruling authority of the North Atlantic Pact could carry on a state of war for the indefinite future and the character of our Government would of necessity be changed. This ruling authority of the pact would give only a small voice to the United States and our destiny as a free republic would be lost. The price is entirely too high.

From our commitments in the Marshall plan and the other international obligations we have assumed, the Soviet Union is well aware of our attitude should it be so misguided as to extend the Iron curtain further into Europe. We alone possess the atom bombs and a great fleet of B-36 land-based bombers to carry them. We now have sufficient bases from which to launch them without the entanglement of this treaty. In fact, our best defense depends on our freedom of action and we must remain unfettered by any ruling authority of the pact which could disagree with our own board of strategy. Certainly, the wording of the pending treaty falls far short of protecting the United States which is the only Nation with sufficient power to offset the Soviet Union. This is a highly dangerous leap in the dark and not too well considered.

When it comes to implementing the treaty with vast supplies of armament, and the treaty and the arms are intertwined to such a degree that they are inseparable, the difficulty of decision is simplified. For it is out of the question that we can for a moment build up a vast arsenal on foreign shores to last perhaps forever. Our domestic needs are already reaching gigantic proportions, our national debt is colossal, there is developing in the United States a feeling of indifference and complacency that does not augur well for the continuation of a strong and healthy republic. Let us refrain from ratifying this treaty until we know more about it and where we are going. In justice to the sovereign people of the United States, we can do no other.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to adjournment on Wednesday, May 11, 1949, in the room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman) and Vandenberg.

Also present: Senator Donnell.

Senator Vandenberg (acting chairman). The committee will come to order.

Senator Connally is temporarily detained in a meeting of the Finance Committee, and will be here shortly. He has asked me to make the record until he arrives.

On the list that is handed me the first witness is Mr. Oliver S. Allen, vice chairman, Progressive Party of Massachusetts. Mr. Allen, will you have a seat? We will be glad to hear from you.

STATEMENT OF OLIVER S. ALLEN, VICE CHAIRMAN, PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. ALLEN. My name is Oliver S. Allen. I am appearing against ratification of the Atlantic Pact as vice president of the Progressive Party of Massachusetts, as a former Democratic nominee for Congress in Massachusetts, and also as one who served in Europe as a United States naval officer for 2½ years in World War II.

On Tuesday, I received a telegram from the clerk of your committee saying that the committee would be "willing to allot me 5 minutes." Then I picked up the New York Times and read "Senators to Speed Ratification to Aid Paris Talks." Senator, I have nothing against speed in the proper places, but I know I express the conviction of most New Englanders when I say that no considerations can warrant precipitate action upon a proposal which, for the first time in our history, commits us to a peacetime military alliance.

REASONS FOR OPPOSITION TO THE TREATY

I oppose the pact for the following reasons:

First. It strikes at the heart of the United Nations no matter how artful the language employed to conceal that fact. It is the climax to our policy of killing UNRRA, proclaiming the Truman Doctrine, launching the Marshall plan outside the UN, and retaining potential war industry in unrepentant Nazi Germany. Beyond the pact lies an inevitable arms race and beyond that, as history tells, us, war. No informed historian can conscientiously advocate the pact as a promoter of peace.

Second. The pact is based upon the theory that you can't do business with the Russians but the Russians have repeatedly expressed a desire to negotiate outstanding differences and have lifted the Berlin blockade without the condition that we give up our plans for western Germany, plans which we will ultimately have to forego if we are to avoid world war III. Much is said about Russian aggression, but John Foster Dulles tells us that no responsible high official believes the Russians plan conquest by military aggression. And if you mean ideological aggression, the only way to meet that is to raise living standards to the point where communism will lose its appeal. The pact will interfere with that job.

Third. The advocates of the pact assume that you get agreement in international affairs by means of a get-tough policy so ardently espoused by military men. Franklin Roosevelt knew better. You may get a temporary armed truce that way but never a settlement. Settlement is going to require that we provide security against a renascent German militarism, that we support long overdue industrial and agricultural reform, and a world program for abundance under the United Nations without strings of political ideology attached.

Fourth. The financial outlay morally committed by the pact to police the world with arms, in the long run, will leave us weaker than the Russians. It will mean lower living standards and neglect of human welfare. It will mean shackled labor, further invasion of civil liberty and increasing military control of our lives. And temporary employment in arms production would be provided at the expense of a catastrophic depression with radical social change later on.

Fifth. By ultimately channeling western European manpower into military pursuits, the prospects of European recovery would be destroyed and western Europe would be on a permanent American dole.

Sixth. As the obligations of the pact have been defined by the Secretary of State, we might well find ourselves involved in domestic and colonial uprisings against exploitation all over the globe. The common people would hate us as many of them now undoubtedly do in China. We cannot prosper or even survive if we lose the affection of the common people.

Seventh. The pact means military arrangements with countries right up to the borders of the Soviet Union. The suspicious Russians might well believe that they were going to be attacked as they have been so many times and that belief alone could produce war.

Eighth. As a practical matter, the pact much reduces Congress' power to declare war. A President, strongly influenced by the military, could feel much less restrained by our Constitution if he had the pact.

Ninth. From a military point of view, there would be little sense in sending the arms without the men. Europe does not have the available manpower to handle the arms and what manpower it has will have little taste for arms for a long time. Therefore, you will have to draft American boys.

DANGER OF HASTY ACTION

For these reasons, I respectfully urge rejection of the pact, and I urge that caution be followed at this time in taking precipitate action.

I close with a quotation from an editorial in the Boston Globe of yesterday, entitled "Undue Haste" [reading]:

Senator Connally seeks to justify his sudden dedication to haste by explaining this speedy ratification will impress Russia. The need in this tremendously important matter is not to worry about the viewpoint of the Russians, but to emphasize the importance of giving thorough and complete information to Americans.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Allen, I simply want to suggest to you my own complete agreement with the thesis that this pact must be totally explored before there is any action upon it, and I feel that the chairman of the committee is also quite anxious to pursue that policy. If there have been any suggestions with respect to limitation of time, it is simply a reflection of the fact that we have a terrifically long list of applications to testify, and there is obvious duplication and repetition in much of the list.

I think you can be sure that at least so far as one member of this committee is concerned it is his opinion that this pact if adopted, is of no greater use than is measured by the conscious acceptance of it by American public opinion.

Mr. ALLEN. I am sure those remarks will reassure the country.

Senator VANDENBERG. Senator Donnell, do you wish to ask any questions?

Senator DONNELL. Just a few.

DECLARATION OF WAR

The eighth point which you make is "As a practical matter, the pact much reduces Congress' power to declare war." Am I correct in understanding by that statement that you do not mean that the pact would alter the fact that Congress under the Constitution is the only body that has power to declare war, but that you do mean that under the operation of the pact it would be easily possible that through Executive action in going ahead with war preparations and actual participation in war there would be no practical alternative left to Congress except to declare war?

Mr. ALLEN. That is what I mean, Senator. Of course, as matters now stand, the President has authority as the Chief Executive to move our armed forces about. The power to declare war is in the Congress. The effect of this pact, as I see it, would be to encourage a President who might be at some time strongly influenced by the military to take action without feeling the restraint of the Constitution.

Senator DONNELL. And would you agree with this, that although the President does have power today as Commander in Chief of the Army to move our forces under some circumstances, at any rate there is today no contractual obligation between this country and 11 other countries obligating us to consider an attack on one of them as an attack on us.

Mr. ALLEN. I feel that is true, and I feel that the pact here, no matter how artful the explanation, is a contractual commitment on our part to do certain things which will lead to war.

Senator DONNELL. There is no doubt in your mind that the pact is a contractual obligation and puts us under some type of obligation under which we presently are not?

Mr. ALLEN. In my opinion.

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Allen, just a word in regard to your own experience and profession. I observe your service in Europe as a United States naval officer. Would you tell us, please, just what is your own business or profession, and just a little of your educational background?

Mr. ALLEN. I am a lawyer, Senator, a graduate of Dartmouth College and Harvard Law School, and have practiced law in the city of Boston apart from my service in the Second World War.

Senator DONNELL. Are you related to J. Weston Allen, of Boston?

Mr. ALLEN. I am no relation. My family is all staunch Republican as he was, but I am Progressive.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Lawrence R. Mallery, Jr.

Mr. Mallery, will you identify yourself and indicate for whom you speak?

STATEMENT OF LAWRENCE R. MALLERY, JR., MALVERN, PA.

Mr. MALLERY. I am Lawrence R. Mallery, Jr., of Philadelphia and Malvern. I did serve with the American Friends Service Committee for 14 months, but I am testifying today as an individual.

Senator VANDENBERG. You have that right.

Mr. MALLERY. Thank you, Senator.

MILITARY INFLUENCE ON FOREIGN POLICY

As a member of the American Friends Service Committee for 14 months, I was given the opportunity and time to examine and accumulate considerable factual material on the role which our military has and is playing in our economy, politics, and in our thinking in general, as well as its influence on our international behavior. I respect the sincerity of the interest of our military leaders in preventing war, and protecting our national security. We have supplied them with more funds and influence than they have ever before enjoyed in our peacetime history. Military men have held key positions in our Government, and have served as our ambassadors to foreign governments.

During the past 4 years we have appropriated more than $50,000,000,000 for their use to build up a stock pile of atom bombs, maintain an Air Force to deliver the bombs in large quantity anywhere on the globe, maintain the largest military force of manpower in our peacetime history, finance peacetime military conscription in this country, and build military bases all over the world. No military machine is worth a nickel without an enemy, and the avowed enemy of military leaders is communism. I contend that despite the almost unlimited resources at their disposal our military leaders have failed to achieve their avowed purpose, and for two basic reasons:

1. Communism, like democracy or Christianity, is an ideology against which no military machine or threat of force can be successfully pitted.

2. Economic poverty breeds communism, and by voting UNRRA out of existence and by diverting our resources to enormous military preparation we are indirectly responsible for the very conditions in which communism is flourishing in the war-ravaged nations of the world.

DANGERS OF MILITARY ALLIANCES

Psychologically, a military alliance such as the proposed North Atlantic Pact will serve to increase the ardor of the despairing Eurasian who is more readily enticed by promises of a subsistence level. Furthermore, such a military alliance will further the fallacious concept that military strength, and possibly war, offers a solution to mankind's basic problems.

We cannot blame our military leaders for our slow progress in eliminating the causes of war. We must blame ourselves, and specifically our statesmen, for having accepted the oversimplification of our military leaders that we can prevent war by arming for it, and that Russia is responsible for the current threat of war. Accepting such an oversimplification has narcotized us to the awful realization that our problems are infinitely more complex, that war will further intensify them, and that unless we begin to solve our problems by means other than war the very survival of civilization is unlikely.

The gap between our technological progress and our sociological incompetence has grown so broad that what is required of us is a revolutionary abandonment of the framework of old ideas and the substitution of the concept that our fate is not inexorably linked with that of all of the peoples of the world, for our present concepts of nationalism. Security is no longer possible on a national level, and the establishment of an atmosphere of mutual confidence and respect in which a benevolent global community can be achieved will not take place until our statesmen rededicate themselves to the fundamental moral principles that so competently guide our lives on a community level.

To blame Russia for our military preparation, for the existent fear in this country, and for the heart sick despair of the peoples of many of the rest of the countries of the world is to indulge in neurotic escapism. We must, instead, confess that we have so far failed to display an intellectual, moral, and practical courage sufficient to convince even our own citizenry that we have and are exploring with untiring diligence the means of creating a mutually acceptable world order. Nothing short of an herculean effort, unprecedented in human history, is required of us if we are to reverse our fateful direction and declare our faith in the fundamental goodness of mankind. The North Atlantic Pact would constitute still another instrument of fear, with the practical effect of accomplishing the very opposite of what we must unequivocally strive to achieve, a world united for the common good of all mankind. We are, in fact, dealing not with nations but with 2,000,000,000 human beings. The dignity of the human being is our divine mission, not his destruction. Because of our incomparable material, political, and sociological superiority over any other nation, leadership must inevitably come from us. We must substitute an ever-increasing demonstration of good faith for our present attitude of distrust, and we must substitute self-criticism and conciliation for our present critical attitude toward Russia. Russia, and all of the other relatively undeveloped countries of the world, need our help, not our hate. Not only our security, but our very survival, depends upon our ability to reconcile our differences. The North Atlantic Pact is not a pact of reconciliation, but a commitment to old techniques which are no longer valid. Modern society finds itself in the dilemma in which its salvation lies in a power in which it apparently has no faith—the spirit of love as expressed in the Sermon on the Mount.

I plead that you gentlemen dedicate yourselves to the conviction that the American people and our democratic government have the moral strength to meet the appalling crisis in which our immoral society finds itself.

Senator Vandenberg, I have a few excerpts that I would appreciate if it could insert them in the record. I was told you were short of time.

Senator VANDENBERG. Very well.

[From the Fellowship, May 1949]

THE NORTH ATLANTIC SECURITY ALLIANCE, CALLED A FORCE FOR PEACE, THREATENS REALLY TO BE A PACT WITH DEATH

(By Alfred Hassler)

By the time this issue of Fellowship reaches its readers, the North Atlantic Security Alliance, whose actual provisions were first made public on March 19, may have been signed by the participating countries and ratified by the United States Senate. If it is, that will be one of the more ominous indications of how completely this fear-ridden country has abandoned faith in itself and in every democratic value in favor of reliance on military power.

The pact is a military alliance. It commits the United States more directly to participation in war than any previous move in our history except for actual congressional declarations of war. It undermines, probably fatally, the one hesitant approach the nations have made toward a permanent world organization. It writes finis, for the time at least, to the so-recent dreams of "one world," and chooses instead a two-world division that contains the ominous possibility of becoming no world at all.

The published draft of the North Atlantic Security Alliance provides that the parties "consult together" when any of them is "threatened"; and regard an armed attack on any one of them "in Europe or North America" as an attack on all, to be resisted by action including the use of armed force.

Actually, the wording of the document is relatively unimportant. Nations that insist on unlimited sovereignty reserve automatically the right to default on the most sacred treaties if they consider it in their "national interest" to do so. The evil of the pact lies not so much in what it says as in the fact that it was written at all.

With the world political scene what it is, no one can seriously doubt that the United States would resist militarily any armed attack on western Europe by Russia. The depressing importance of this treaty lies in its tacit assumption that hope for a peaceful solution to our world problems is dead and that for the indefinite future all mankind must be divided between two armed camps.

Despite the pact's pious protestations that it is purely defensive and not directed against any specific nation, the motivation behind it on the part of its moving spirit and indispensable participant—the United States—is obviously:

1. To win the cold war with Russia and preserve peace by a policy of "containment";

2. To prepare strategically to fight and win a war against Russia if the policy of containment does not work.

American architects of the pact expect it to accomplish these purposes in three principal ways:

1. By encouraging the free democracies of western Europe (which will probably include totalitarian Portugal and may later include Fascist Spain) to resist Soviet pressure on the more or less explicit promise of American armed aid in the event of war;

2. By arranging to supply the armies of these same free democracies with American arms, to create a buffer force that can take the first shock of an attack and perhaps slow it down long enough for the United States to launch atomic bombing raids and other countermeasures;

3. By acquiring, in exchange for these arms and promises, American military and air bases in Europe, thus furnishing evidence to the Kremlin of American determination, and at the same time making available a beachhead for operations when war comes.

NO CHANGE IN POLICY

The pact does not represent any sudden reversal in official American thinking. On the contrary, it follows logically from the Truman doctrine, our policy of toughness in Germany, and the anti-Communist refinements of the Marshall plan. So the opposition to it is not essentially new, but grows out of a conviction that the American Government has grossly misconstrued the nature of the world conflict, and is taking countermeasures more likely to heighten the danger than avert it.

One of the most important aspects of the pact, from the point of view of the United States, is that it effectually bypasses the constitutional right of Congress to declare war. This will be true no matter what legalistic phrases may be incorporated to save face for Congress. Unless the pact is so radically altered as to become a totally new document, the decisions for war or peace will in fact be made on the military level, by a joint western European-American staff dominated by United States military personnel and policies, and a minor incident set off by someone relatively obscure could plunge us into war.

Diplomatic and trade relations between East and West and policy decisions in all matters will be regulated by their effect on the military situation. Censorship will be widely extended and political reaction encouraged in the name of security. This process is already well begun, but there has been hope that increased attention to trade and functional cooperation might gradually shift the balance the other way. With the signing of the pact, which means total commitment to the idea of a two-power division of the world heading for eventual military conflict, that hope will virtually disappear.

There is a parallel to this situation in modern penology that was observed by most CO's who did time in prison during the last war. Theoretically, what is called custody—the business of walls, guns, guards, and punishment—is only a part, and a minor part, of the prison picture. Custody is the necessary framework within which the reform and rehabilitation techniques are supposed to operate. That is the theory. In practice, custody dominates everything. The necessity of keeping men confined against their passionate desire to be free requires such a concentration of attention and effort on the part of both keepers and convicts, that there is neither the time nor the psychological climate for rehabilitation to operate. The result is that the rates for both crime and recidivism continue to climb even while penology becomes more enlightened and effective.

So it will inevitably be with the pact. Decisions as to allocations of rearmament funds will, of course, be made on a military basis, but so will the distribution of so-called reconstruction money of the ERP. ERP money increasingly will go where it can most effectively build the war potential of western Europe, rather than where it can stimulate peacetime production and a stable economy. The signing of the pact will have been our confession that we now have thrown our full reliance for security on the military; they would be more than human if they did not emphasize the inevitable corollary, that military considerations therefore become preeminent and unchallengeable.

Some recipients of ERP aid spend more on arms and armies than they receive from ERP, and the United States is urging them to spend more. Here are the figures, in millions of dollars:

	ERP	Arms		ERP	Arms
Belgium-Luxemburg.....	200	96	Norway.....	105	42
Denmark.....	109	47	Portugal.....	10	48
France.....	875	1,100	Sweden.....	54	214
Greece.....	170	116	Turkey.....	30	190
Iceland.....	7	0	United Kingdom.....	940	2,200
Ireland.....	64	12
Italy.....	555	360	Total.....	3,474	5,709
Netherlands.....	355	284

The fallacy of guaranteeing peace or security by signing military alliances becomes clear when the supposed logic of the method is examined. Here are two great powers, the Soviet Union and the United States, at which world military and industrial power is polarized. To one or the other of the two the other, weaker powers are gravitating, with varying degrees of reluctance, drawn by considerations of economic or geographic dependence and literally unable to remain aloof in a world where a neutral is suspect by both sides.

These two great powers are now almost pathologically fearful and suspicious of each other. Neither, it may be safely presumed, actually wants war—certainly their peoples do not. Yet each, driven by its fears, not only continues to increase its preparations for war but, in order to make palatable the enormous sacrifices that such preparations entail for its citizens, constantly works at the task of heightening, rather than lessening, the fear and suspicion.

This task is made infinitely simpler by the aggressive-looking, suspicion-motivated actions that each of the two powers takes periodically; increased arms appropriations, extension of military conscription, establishment of military or political beachheads beyond the power's own boundaries, and so on.

Each of these actions, justified to the home population as defensive, is inspired by a previous act of the enemy power, and in turn is the inspiration for his next countermove.

With that kind of pattern for a guide, what is the thesis of the North Atlantic Pact? Reduced to its simplest terms, it is that by uniting western Europe militarily with the United States, thus bringing American power literally and physically to the very borders of the Soviet Union, present Russian suspicions will not be materially increased, but the Russian threat will be effectively countered.

PACT WILL INCREASE FEAR

Logically, the proposition is absurd. The signing of the pact inevitably will heighten Russian fears and simultaneously provide the Politburo with invaluable propaganda ammunition for use both in Russia and in the rest of the uneasy world. Militarily, Russia will counter with increased armaments, increased pressure on her satellite nations, and increased efforts to strengthen native Communist movements in the western nations. These moves will turn the security gained from the pact to ashes in our mouths, and stimulate us to new and more expensive measures, and so on and on. The history of militarism has shown impressively what the ultimate end of that kind of action-reaction chain will be.

Without a doubt the pact is the death sentence of the United Nations. The disingenuous attempts of the State Department to bring the pact under the UN mantle by citing article 51 will deceive no one; the pact is the culmination of a succession of crippling blows that, on the part of the United States, began at San Francisco with the insistence on the veto power, and progressed through the sabotage of UNRRA, the bypassing of the UN in the Greek-Turkish Truman doctrine affair, and the decision to keep the Marshall plan reins of ERP in the nationalistic hands of the United States rather than turning them over to the UN.

THE NATURE OF THE STRUGGLE

What is most disheartening is the almost complete failure of the American Government and press alike to comprehend either the real outline of the world struggle or the real nature of world communism. In the face of instance after instance of the sacrificial devotion of individual men and women to communism, going to the extent of a willingness to suffer prison or martyrdom, most of us persist in regarding communism as a wholly cynical quest for power on the part of a greedy and unscrupulous group of politicians.

The fact is that communism's world strength is a form of religious fervor surpassing that exhibited on a large scale by any of the other world religions today. Communism's appeal to the masses is the promise to hungry people of a world in which there will be enough to eat; to exploited people of a world free of exploitation; to minorities of a world free of discrimination; to the insecure of a world of security. In their despair, hungry, homeless men will close their eyes to the brutality of communism's methods and embrace it as their only hope in a bitter world.

There was a time, not very many years ago, when democracy had that kind of appeal and aroused that kind of fervor. That was the time when democracy meant freedom from tyranny to the tyrannized, freedom of opportunity to the enslaved, freedom of speech to the terrorized.

But America's great reservoir of good will around the world has almost disappeared. In the sight of millions of the world's people the United States now is the principal defender of the status quo, the fabulously rich nation whose charity is doled out only to the deserving poor, the democracy whose fine professions are belied by undemocratic actions at home and abroad.

Many non-Communist Europeans already are fearful of the tremendous added strain to their shaky economies that the Atlantic Pact's emphasis on military strength will mean, as many Americans are afraid of what the cost of arming western Europe, estimated at four to five billions a year, will do even to our prosperous country. If the pact means, as it will, the slackening of progress in rebuilding peacetime production, and the sentencing again of millions of men to the empty waste of military service, the result may well be the very conditions of despair in which communism recruits its new millions of adherents. So that from a coldly practical viewpoint, the consequences of the pact are likely to be a heightened tension between the governments in the east and west reaching its breaking point at the time when the fears and privations of the masses of the people result in a world-wide strengthening of the Communist movement.

There still is an alternative way we could travel. The real oppressors of the world's people today are poverty and exploitation and war. Democracy could quickly recapture its appeal for all the world if it made an all-out attack on these. If the United States were to concentrate its efforts on the kind of constructive activities suggested by President Truman's proposal to develop the backward parts of the world (but free from its imperialistic implications) the effect would be electrifying. If the United States were to appeal for universal disarmament, agreeing at the start to dismantle its atomic bombs and bomb plants, a thrill of hope would run through the world that no propaganda ministry could effectively distort.

That kind of program would be an idea, a creative, dynamic idea that could capture the enthusiastic allegiance of millions—the idea of a world of abundance and peace without the repressive political machinery that communism deems necessary. That kind of idea would take the appeal out of the Communist idea and the sting from the Communist threat. Military alliances will not.

MILTON MAYER WRITES ABOUT JOHN FOSTER DULLES

John Foster Dulles was in Cleveland the other week to address the Third National Study Conference of the Churches and World Order, under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches. The Christian Century, which tries harder than I do to cherish the institutional churches as the repositories of salvation, asserted that "the Cleveland conference leaned heavily on John Foster Dulles, who spoke more frequently on the variety of subjects which were before it than any other person." If the Century speaks truly, and I suppose it does, the conclusion is irresistible that Mr. Dulles is an ever-weakening reed.

Under the editorial title "Cleveland Strikes Out!" the Century reported that the delegates' "actions in the conference and the statements with which they concluded what they had to say on the floor were in most cases cautious and equivocal, secularistic and confused. If this is the best the churches can do, it is to be hoped that the third national study conference will be the last." The Century's whole report was a blisterer, but what fixed my attention in connection with Mr. Dulles, was the Century's documented assertion that "the conference voted against the principle of the Atlantic Pact, it voted for the principle, and it voted that it could take no position upon the pact."

Now if Mr. Dulles is to be judged as a burgeoning Christian, it must be in connection with such phenomena as the institutional church's attitude toward Atlantic pacts and the like, since Mr. Dulles affects to be something of an international statesman as well as something of a world Christian. He is the key man in the United States UN delegation and does not violently object to being called one of the architects of the UN.

The conference announced that "we do not pass upon the proposed Atlantic Pact because the final text is not available and time is not available for adequate study of its implications." The Century observed: "If this is leadership, local churches and denominations may be excused if they find themselves unable to recognize it as such." The Century, as I say, still looks to the institutional church for leadership.

True, the United States of America has proceeded so far along the road to totalitarian dictatorship that its Government had drawn up the pact without consultation with its people. But the very fact that text and time were not available should itself have been the occasion for an unqualified protest by the conference against this technique of totalitarian dictatorship. Why didn't the conference demand text and time and, failing to get it, condemn the pact out of hand?

The answer can only be that the conference was a willing party to the secrecy with which its Government was drawing its country into an alliance for war. Mr. Dulles, as key man of the United States delegation to UN, should have known the contents of the pact in Cleveland. (Its text was released a week later.) If he didn't know them, he should have resigned from the UN delegation rather than play a part in committing the conference to being a quiet accomplice of the conspirators. And Cleveland was crawling with State Department double-talkers who were supposed to be telling the churchmen all about our foreign relations.

A MILITARY ALLIANCE

Mr. Dulles knew what the pact was as well as you and I did. He knew that the pact was a military alliance for a declaration of war by its signatories on the occasion of an aggression by unnamed parties on any one of them. Knowing this, he knew that the pact was the death warrant for the United Nations, whose article 53 says that "no enforcement shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council." The pact violates the UN Charter and destroys the UN and if Mr. Dulles didn't know it he didn't know what the American newspaper readers knew.

But Mr. Dulles was being disingenuous. He said at Cleveland that "the people of western Europe, and particularly of Scandinavia, ought not to seem to bring United States military might directly to Russia's border." I urge you to pipe, in passing, this Christian statesman's emphasis on seeming, and then I go on to quote Mr. Dulles: "It would, indeed, involve a high tribute to Soviet leaders to assume that, under these circumstances, they would exercise more self-control than would our people under comparable circumstances, as, for example, if the Soviet Union had military arrangements with a country at our border."

Mr. Dulles was saying that the Atlantic Pact was a declaration of war and that Stalin was crazy if he didn't attack us now. But Mr. Dulles was trying to say it the unintelligible way because, first, he intended to support the pact and to commit the institutional church to compliance with it, and second, he intended to return to Cleveland some day, after Russia had been goaded into war and the United States (as well as Russia) was defeated, and remind the institutional church that he had warned them.

Having run his errand in Cleveland, Mr. Dulles then returned to the pure air of the temporal world and proceeded to support the pact, saying, "It does mean that if an attack occurs within the North Atlantic area, and the Security Council cannot handle it, then the United States has a duty to act to repel the attack and to restore peace." This is, of course, more gobbledygook, concealing, but not too well, the statement that the United States will violate article 53 of the United Nations Charter, which specifies that the Security Council, and no one else, can and must handle attacks.

Says the Century, "The conference never did decide whether the reality with which it was most concerned lay in guns and goods or in God as He is revealed in Jesus Christ. * * * The statements generally lacked the note of Christian love. The discussion of justice and human rights consistently dealt with these in terms of expediency, as a means to curb Russia rather than to express Christian brotherhood. Amazing blind spots averted the conference from the use in war of atomic and other methods of mass destruction, the continuance of peacetime conscription, the reduction of our colossal arms budget, the curbing of our worldwide spy network, the threat of universal military training, the reduction of the number of military bases around the world, or the relaxation of military domination of education, industry, commerce, and science." The Christian Century is amazed because figs do not grow from thistles, because the Christian ministry does not preach Jesus Christ crucified.

I submit that the Christian ministry, if it wanted to perform the Christian mission, would keep away from John Foster Dulles, who wants to be a Christian without performing the Christian mission. Mr. Dulles is a worldly man, who does not yet understand the dreadful circularity of the Christian commitment, namely that the only way to try to be a Christian is to be one. If he wants to try to be one, he will have to stop building power alliances like the UN and stop tearing them down for new power alliances like the Atlantic Pact. He will have to get down off the platform, all the way down to the prie-dieu, and ask to be lifted up. He is a weak reed, but a heavy burden, too heavy to be lifted by mortal man. And if I misjudge him, may he say so and say why, in this or some other place, and God forgive me my intemperance.

HISTORY REPEATS

"* * * More than one true thing may be said about the causes of the war, but the statement that comprises most truth is that militarism and the armaments inseparable from it made war inevitable. Armaments were intended to produce a sense of security in each nation—that was the justification put forward in defense of them. What they really did was to produce fear in everybody. Fear causes suspicion and hatred; it is hardly too much to say that, between nations, it stimulates all that is bad and depresses all that is good.

"One nation increases its army and makes strategic railways toward the frontiers of neighboring countries. The second nation makes counter-strategic railways and increases its army in reply. The first nation says this is very unreasonable, because its own military preparations were only precautions; the second nation says that its preparations also were only precautions, and points out, with some cogency, that the first nation began the competition; and so it goes on, until the whole continent is an armed camp covered by strategic railways. * * *

"The lesson of European history is so plain. It is that no enduring security can be found in competing armaments and in separate alliances; there is no security for any power unless it be a security in which its neighbors have an equal share."

(Compiled by Lawrence R. Mallory, Jr., for the American Friends Service Committee (peace section), Philadelphia, Pa.)

1. THE NATURE OF WORLD WAR III ACCORDING TO LEADING AMERICAN SCIENTISTS AND MILITARY EXPERTS

The scientists

"Antiaircraft defense guided by radar eventually reached such efficiency that 80 to 90 percent of the V-1's aimed at the London area were shot down. But if the remaining 10 to 20 percent had carried atomic war heads there would be no London today."—W. A. Higginbotham, chairman of Federation of American Scientists, New York Times, November 3, 1946.

Dr. J. R. Oppenheimer testified before the Senate Military Affairs Committee in October 1945 that an enemy nation could destroy all United States principal cities and kill 40,000,000 people in 1 night with the atom bomb.

"Six atomic bombs of the present known design, strategically dropped on New York, would efface this vast, sprawling city. And, if one of the six were dropped in the bay, with the 'right' wind blowing, the city would be made uninhabitable for 100 years, so great would be the resultant radioactive contamination."—INS release, New York (appeared in Philadelphia Inquirer, February 8, 1948) (Interview with W. E. Kelley, manager of operations for the U. S. Atomic Energy Commission).

"Victory for an aggressor nation can be assured in a few terrible hours in an atom war of the future."—Dr. Morris Perlman, Washington Times-Herald, October 28, 1945.

"1. Atomic bombs can now be made cheaply and in large numbers. They will become more destructive.

"2. There is no military defense against the atomic bomb and none can be expected.

"3. Other nations can rediscover our secret processes by themselves.

"4. Preparedness against atomic warfare is futile, and if attempted will ruin the structure of our social order.

"5. If war breaks out, atomic bombs will be used and they will surely destroy our civilization.

"6. There is no solution to this problem except the international control of atomic energy, and ultimately, the elimination of war."—Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists, Inc., November 17, 1946; statement announced by Dr. Albert Einstein.

"Scientists are weighing the possibility of exploding an atomic bomb in the midst of storm clouds to create a literal rain of death * * *. Rain falling from the clouds would be poisoned with the deadly byproducts of the bomb explosion."—New York Sun, May 28, 1947.

"Scientists 'who ought to know what they are talking about' predicted an atomic bomb capable of 'killing every living thing on the American Continent.' There never would be a defense * * * against this 'saturation weapon,' a bomb 1,000 times more powerful than any yet used."—UP dispatch, London, November 5, 1947, quoting Dr. Harold C. Urey, vice chairman, Emergency Committee, American Atomic Scientists, Inc.

"No corner of this planet is safe against sudden destruction. * * * Technical development favors aggression, and has made defense on the basis of national armaments ineffective."—Dr. Albert Einstein, Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, November 1947.

"Today we have weapons which could not only paralyze but destroy all of the world's cities. Against older weapons no defense is perfect. Against atomic bombs a defense would have to be perfect or it would be no defense at all. Our Government is spending millions on technical research and atomic counter-measures, but the answer will remain the same; a perfect defense against atomic attack is humanly impossible."—Dr. W. A. Higginbotham, New York Times, November 3, 1947.

"Agents have already been perfected and produced in quantity that can kill man, beast, or crops * * *."—Hanson Baldwin, on germ warfare, New York Times, September 27, 1946.

Dr. Albert Einstein describes our dilemma as a "vicious circle which threatens the continued existence of mankind as no other situation in human history has ever done." He continues, "The progress of technological development * * * has actually contributed to the dangers which threaten peace and the very existence of mankind * * *. However strong national armaments may be, they do not create military security for any nation nor do they guarantee the maintenance of peace. There is no compromise possible between preparation for war, on the one hand, and preparation of a world society based on law and order on the other."—United Nations World, October 1947.

"Never, since the beginning of recorded history, has mankind been faced by so terrible a problem. Either we must, within the space of a few years, unlearn ancient beliefs and prejudices and consent to an entirely novel form of political and military organization or, if we fail in this, we must expect a world-wide disaster, surpassing in its horror all that past misfortunes enable us to imagine."—Bertrand Russell, British Broadcasting Corp. address, reprinted in the Sun Life Review.

The military

"It is no longer a secret that the bombs dropped at Nagasaki and Hiroshima were of a primitive type already obsolete when they were used. We now have bombs 50 times more powerful * * * there are today in the arsenals of several great powers other weapons * * * more devastating than the atom. They are capable of exterminating the last vestige of human, animal, and even vegetable life from the face of the earth. This is not a prediction of horrors to come. These weapons exist. They are being manufactured right now, while you are reading these words."—Rear Adm. Ellis M. Zacharias, wartime Deputy Chief of United States Naval Intelligence, United Nations World, November 1947.

"* * * the next war probably will not last 6 months."—Admiral William Halsey, UP report of Navy Day Victory War Loan Rally, St. Louis, Mo., October 29, 1945.

"In the next war, the first 7 days will be decisive."—Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, Look Magazine, July 8, 1947.

"Arthur Mayer has just completed a tour for the Red Cross. In Tokyo he asked General MacArthur, * * * 'What I would like to find out is how the Red Cross can do a better job in the event of another war.' 'There won't be time for the Red Cross to do a better job in the event of another war,' General MacArthur replied. 'The next war won't last long enough for that.'"—St. Louis Globe-Democrat, February 28, 1946.

"For the foreseeable future there can be no adequate military defense against atomic weapons."—United States State Department, in a report published January 1947, The International Control of Atomic Energy.

"We won the last war. And it's the last war we'll ever win. If we have another, this Nation will lose.

"We'll lose, and the enemy we fight will lose, because victory in atomic warfare is no longer possible. One nation cannot defeat another nation today. That concept died with Hiroshima."—Gen. H. H. Arnold, This Week, January 11, 1948.

3. MILITARY CHARACTER OF UNITED STATES OFFICIALS AND POLICY

"If we see that Germany is winning we ought to help Russia, and if Russia is winning we ought to help Germany, and that way let them kill as many as possible, although I don't want to see Hitler victorious under any circumstances. Neither of them think anything of their pledged word."—Senator Harry S. Truman, New York Times, June 24, 1941, quoted by the Times, November 12, 1947.

"The President, an artillery captain in the last war, has never gotten over his awe of generals * * * Some of Truman's civilian advisers are complaining that General Marshall can overrun them on almost any issue. They point out that twice—on the atomic bomb and on military training—Truman has accepted the general's views against strenuous cabinet opposition."—Drew Pearson, October 28, 1945.

President Truman appointed Gen. George C. Marshall as Secretary of State on January 7, 1947.

New York Times, January 8, 1947, reported that if General Marshall were sent to the Big Four Foreign Ministers Conference in Moscow (March 1947), "the United States would have three top generals in its representation there" (General Marshall, Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, Ambassador to Russia, and Gen. Mark Clark, Austrian treaty negotiations deputy).

"If man does find the solution for world peace it will be the most revolutionary reversal of his record we have ever known."—Gen. George C. Marshall, Report to the Nation, 1945.

"The terms of the final peace settlement * * * cannot in my opinion alter the necessity for a system of universal military training."—General Marshall, Report to the Nation, 1945.

"The world does not seriously regard the desires of the weak * * * we must enforce our will for peace with strength. * * *—General Marshall, Report to the Nation, 1945.

"* * * it is desired to obtain authorization of the Congress to detail military and naval missions to any foreign government whenever in the discretion of the President the public interest renders such a course advisable. * * * It is a traditional policy of the United States to aid friendly nations and to achieve and to maintain their independence and to support the system of the 'open door.' From the viewpoint of maintenance of international peace as well as from that of strictly American interests in the field of economic development and general security, it is obvious that the policies mentioned in the preceding paragraph should be vigorously supported and put into execution."—Gen. George C. Marshall, memorandum to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, February 25, 1947.

"The United States now relies on military and naval strength in achieving the aims of its foreign policy to a greater degree than ever before in its peacetime history."—Foreign Policy Association, October 3, 1946, Washington, D. C.

"In the entire 6 weeks of the Moscow Conference * * * General Marshall apparently did not unbend. He was as rigid as the Washington Monument * * * though there were many outstanding questions between the United States and Russia and the United States and Britain, he apparently made no effort to talk out these problems. * * *"—New York Times, April 30, 1947.

"The President still has Admiral William D. Leahy as his personal Chief of Staff. * * * Confidential reports and estimates of the daily situation in the world, which are placed on Mr. Truman's desk each morning * * * are the product of Central Intelligence Agency, largely staffed by military men and so far directed (in its brief existence) by two admirals and one general. George C. Marshall, General of the Army, is Secretary of State. The Assistant Secretary for Occupied Areas was Maj. Gen. John H. Hildring, and is now Charles E. Saltzman, a former brigadier general. Japan is governed almost unilaterally by General of the Army Douglas MacArthur. * * * Korea is under a military man. Germany is the domain of Lt. Gen. Lucius D. Clay; Austria, of Lt. Gen. Geoffrey Keyes. * * * In the Foreign Service Lt. Gen. Walter Bedell Smith is our Ambassador to Moscow; Admiral Alan G. Kirk is our Ambassador to Belgium; Lt. Gen. Albert C. Wedemeyer just headed a special mission to China. In South Africa and Panama retired generals head the legation and embassy, and throughout South America some 13 American military missions wield not only military but political power. * * * Of course there is nothing insidious in this, per se. * * * Most of the men mentioned are good public servants; many of them are exceptional. Collectively, however, they represent a pattern; they have in common the habit of command and discipline and the mental outlook of years of military training—a tendency to apply in their thinking the yardstick of physical power. * * * —Hanson Baldwin, The Military Move In, Harper's magazine, December 1947.

The following quotes and editorial comments were first published in the pamphlet, "The Militarization of America," issued by Dr. Albert Einstein and 20 other leading Americans:

"Never before have the Army and Navy been so powerfully placed in Government controls. And never before has the United States adopted so stern a foreign policy. * * * The group as a whole have been operating as a team."—United States News, March 21, 1947.

When Gen. John H. Hildring was made an Assistant Secretary of State, "He brought with him to the State Department 26 of his assistants in the War Department."—New York Times, May 8, 1947.

A number of other key positions in the State Department are occupied by military men who "served during World War II as General Staff secretaries or assistants at the War Department here or at Army headquarters overseas."—Washington Star, February 2, 1947.

Col. Carlisle H. Hummelsine, Director of the Office of Departmental Administration, described by the New York Times of August 17, 1947, as head of the executive secretariat in the State Department, was formerly in the office of the Army's General Staff. Lt. Col. W. J. McWilliams, who was secretary of the General Staff of the Sixth Army group, is Col. Hummelsine's executive officer in the State Department. W. W. Chapman, Jr., executive assistant to Assistant Secretary of State John E. Puerlfoy, was deputy assistant secretary of the Combined Chiefs of Staff. Walter K. Scott, chief of the Division of Communications and Records, is a lieutenant colonel who was secretary of the General Staff of Supreme Allied Headquarters in Europe.

Capt. Richard Weigle, executive officer of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, was secretary of the General Staff of the Chinese Combat Command. Col. Ira W. Porter, a West Point graduate and secretary of the General Staff of the Fifth Army, is administrative officer on the Division of Foreign Service Administration.

Capt. L. W. Parke, an Annapolis graduate, is Chief of the Cryptography Division in the State Department. Selden Chapin, Director General of the Foreign Service, is a Naval Academy graduate. Haywood P. Martin, the Deputy Director of the Office of Foreign Service Planning, was a Navy lieutenant who formerly served in the Navy Department. Charles E. Mills, Associate Chief of the Division of Foreign Service Planning, was a Navy lieutenant in the Navy Department.

John W. Bays, a retired read admiral, is senior Assistant Chief of Foreign Service Administration.

The Washington Star of February 2, 1947, lists still other positions in the State Department held by military men. It says:

"Ten of the twenty men ranking as executive officers in the State Department have been brought in during recent months from the military services."

The Under Secretary of State, Robert A. Lovett, who served 5 years as Assistant Secretary of War for Air, was a naval aviator in the First World War. He was described by Arthur Krock in the May 15, 1947, New York Times as having worked closely with General Marshall during the war and as being one of those who feel that General Marshall's "wish thereafter they would seek to carry out as a national duty."

"Today the Army has virtual control of foreign affairs, commencing on the home front with General Marshall as Secretary of State, and his Assistant Secretary of State for Occupied Areas, Maj. Gen. John H. Hildring, who directs the military commanders controlling our foreign policy in occupied Europe and Asia. The chain of control in diplomatic hot spots both in the execution of basic policy and in the formulation of ad hoc arrangements, lies almost totally in the hands of the military authorities."—Army and Navy Bulletin, January 18, 1947.

Bernard Brodie, who has been a resident civilian member of the War College faculty, and who generally espouses the Army's point of view, is the author of studies on the atom bomb, universal military training, etc., for the Legislative Bureau of the Library of Congress.

Military influence has been extended to the United Nations. For example, Warren Austin, the UN delegate who was the military's enthusiastic supporter while in Congress, has as his deputy representative on the United States Atomic Energy Commission Frederick Osborn, a former major general in the Army. Ralph A. Bard, former Under Secretary of the Navy, is the deputy representative on the United Nations Commission for Conventional Armaments. The State Department's Director of United Nations Affairs is Col. Dean Rusk. The New York Times of May 7, 1947, stated that two of the three advisers to the "American atomic delegation to the United Nations are military men: Maj. Gen. Leslie Groves and Maj. Gen. Thomas Farrell. Col. Kenneth Nichols, West Point engineering professor, was also added to the American staff.

"Instead of being starved and ignored as the Army always is in peacetime America, our War Department is going to be one of the most important and influential branches of our Government, and the question of military control will confront us not only in war but in peace. The lesson taught by these recent war years is clear: Our whole economic and social system will be in peril if it is controlled by the military men."—Donald Nelson, in his book Arsenal of Democracy.

"* * * If Congress passes any piece of legislation drawn up by the military without carefully looking it over, the military are, in effect, writing the laws. National emergency can be used time and time again to insist that the budget, the money, or the bills proposed by the armed forces are required in the defense of the Nation, that unless they are passed our national security will be endangered."—Brig. Gen. Merritt A. Edson, testifying before the Senate Armed Services Committee, May 1947.

"* * * men in uniform are no different than other people * * *. Given the opportunity, men in uniform will grasp the same power that men do in the fields of labor and industry * * *." When asked by Senator Saltonstall, "if I did not place faith and intelligence in the people of this country," the reply was, "I do not overlook the power of propaganda."—Brig. Gen. Merritt A. Edson, June 14, 1947.

4. MILITARY PROPAGANDA IN THE UNITED STATES

"Heaviest spender for advertising space in United States newspapers in 1946 was the War Assets Administration * * *."—Washington Post, May 8, 1947, which then went on to list the Army recruiting services as third. The Post quoted Printer's Ink magazine as saying, "It is interesting to note that the first and third of the leaders are Government agencies."

The Army and Navy Journal, January 12, 1947, announced that the Army had "initiated peacetime program intended to train and maintain large staffs of uniformed public relations specialists. The Army is now operating an information school at Carlisle Barracks, Pa., headed by a general officer at which officers are being trained in newspaper and radio techniques and a monthly magazine issued. The Navy plans the commissioning of public information specialists in its permanent Regular officer corps, and is now indoctrinating officers through tours of temporary duty at the Navy Department."

"As of December 31, 1946, 1,313 military personnel held full-time positions in public-relations activities which represents an annual sum of $2,855,827 and 626 military personnel held part-time positions in public-relations activities which represents an annual sum of $314,289. As of the same date, the War Department had 753 civilian employees doing full-time public-relations work which represented an annual sum of $2,275,375, and 309 part-time civilian personnel engaged in public-relations work representing an annual sum of $235,563." (This totals nearly $6,000,000.)—Quote from a letter by Lt. Col. L. D. Perry, to Representative E. H. Hedricks, West Virginia, March 14, 1947.

The February 1, 1947, Army and Navy Journal, reporting on a luncheon and conference held by the War Department on January 30, 1947, for members of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said, "The presentation made the Senators by General Stuehends was similar to those which the Army has been making to outstanding civilian groups * * * throughout the country * * * during the past few months. These presentations include an outline of the postwar Military Establishment and its manpower problems * * *. Top-level speakers have presented these programs in several cities and before diverse civilian groups. These tours have been supplemented by other Army speakers appearing throughout the country."

12. U. S. S. R.

"In 1945 the profits tax, the Minister said, yielded only 4,600,000 rubles, less than one-fifth of budgetary expectations, chiefly because production got out of hand, notably in coal mining. In heavy industries costs were swollen to nearly twice the estimates. Because of defective production, losses in manufacturing of agricultural machinery and transport equipment in the first half of 1946, exceeded 120,000,000 rubles. Not only was Russian production as a whole far behind the schedule of the 5-year plan, but the output of many items was decreasing * * * the yearly petroleum deficit in the Soviet Union was set at more than 25,000,000 tons."—New York Times, November 4, 1946.

Look magazine in its February 4, 1947, edition carried an account by Elliot Roosevelt of an interview with Stalin in which Stalin said, "Not a single great power, even if its government were anxious to do so, could now raise a large army to fight another Allied power, another great power, because now one cannot possibly fight without one's people—and the people are unwilling to fight."

On February 6, 1947, because of what is said to be the worst famine in Russia since 1922, the Soviet announced, according to the New York Times of February 6, 1947, the demobilization of six new age groups in order to help in the "battle for a good harvest and the abolition of rationing." The Washington Post of February 6, 1947, commented, "Informed sources said there will be very few soldiers over 22 in the Russian Army when the new demobilization order is carried out."

"Another overlooked point in Stalin's speech (in February 1946) was from a practical viewpoint more important than the first. The Soviet Union hopes, he said, eventually to produce 60,000,000 tons of steel annually. Only then, he added, could the homeland be considered 'guaranteed against all possible eventualities'—that is to say, wars. But 'that will take three 5-year plans, if not more.' In other words, by the hardest kind of toil, Russia aspires to make, in 1961, two-thirds as much steel as the present capacity of the United States. Stalin would be 82 by then. But he probably does not expect to live long enough to see Russia guaranteed against all 'eventualities'—and hence not long enough to be able to launch an aggressive war against the United States, even if he so desired."

"More than 7,000,000 Red Army soldiers were killed by the Germans and their allies and 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 civilians. * * * More than 800,000 square miles of Russia were occupied by the Germans and their allies. It was only a tenth of the U. S. S. R. but it held a third of Russia's population, and its devastation meant the loss of half the Soviet coal mines, half the electric power, three-fifths of the iron mines and about half the steel and machinery industry. What the Russians liberated was for the most part a desert of worthless rubble with its great cities from 30 to 90 percent destroyed. * * * Four million people in the Ukraine alone would have to live in caves or lean-to's made of wreckage for another 2 years. All together 6,000,000 dwellings and buildings which provided what was very poor housing to 25,000,000 people were 'consumed by fascism' as the Russians say."—Why We Don't Understand Russia, by Edgar Snow, Saturday Evening Post, February 15, 22, 1947.

"Aggressive war by the Soviet Union is not probable for at least a decade, considering the present condition of industry, agriculture, reconstruction, and national morale. * * * Reconstruction has been slow, granted its great extent. In 1946, in parts of the Donets Basin, the great industrial area laid waste by the Germans, it appeared as though the Germans had been gone for 3 days instead of 3 years."—Drew Middleton, former New York Times Moscow correspondent, New York Times, February 2, 1948.

Ernest C. Ropes, recently retired Director of the U. S. S. R. Division of the United States Department of Commerce, sees no immediate threat from Russia. He declared that, for economic reasons, Russia was in no position to launch an aggressive war in less than 25 years.—The Washington Post, September 19, 1947.

"The Soviet Union is in no position to support a global war, and no other nation in the world is in a position to support one, either."—General Eisenhower, addressing the National Press Club, February 5, 1948; reported in the New York Times, February 6, 1948.

"In accordance with article II of the United Nations Charter, the Soviet delegation submits for the consideration of the General Assembly the following proposal:

"(1) In the interests of consolidating international peace and security and in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Organization, the General Assembly considers a general reduction of armaments necessary.

"(2) The implementation of the decision on the reduction of armaments should include as a primary objective the banning of the manufacture and use of atomic energy for military purposes.

"(3) The General Assembly recommends to the Security Council achievement of the objectives set forth in the above-mentioned paragraphs 1 and 2.

"(4) The General Assembly calls upon the governments of all States to render every possible assistance to the Security Council in this responsible undertaking, the accomplishment of which conforms to the establishment of stable peace and international security and also serves the interests of the people by lightening their heavy economic burden caused by excessive expenditures for armaments which do not correspond to peaceful postwar conditions.

"The adoption of the decision on a general reduction of armaments and the banning of the manufacture and use of atomic energy for military purposes will, indeed, respond to the pacifist strivings of our peoples and will contribute to the development of international cooperation. In conclusion, permit me to express confidence that this proposal of the Soviet delegation will have the support of all the United Nations."—V. M. Molotov, in the United Nations, October 29, 1946.

"* * * general disarmament is essential in order to reduce military budgets * * * without which it is impossible to lighten the burdens of taxation borne by populations who will be unable to carry the load for long without complaint. * * * A general reduction of armaments should embrace all countries and cover all forms of armaments. * * * The opinion was expressed at the General Assembly that the initiative of the Soviet Union, in the matter of reduction of armaments, was appropriate, since she had a powerful army. * * * It is also a matter of reducing naval and air armaments, the size of which is now in certain cases quite inappropriate to peace conditions. * * *

"The Soviet Government has proposed that the General Assembly should pass a resolution recognizing the necessity of a general reduction of armaments. We do not think that the General Assembly could at this moment take a detailed decision on this question. It should, in our opinion, recommend the Security Council to work out appropriate concrete instructions. The passing of a recommendation by the General Assembly should be the starting point. * * *

"If we agree in principle with the necessity for strict international control, we should also be able to reach an agreement on the concrete matters relating to control over the prohibition of the use of atomic energy for purposes of war, and over the implementation of the decision which will be taken on the general reduction of armaments.

"The Soviet delegation accordingly submits a supplement to the proposal on the general reduction of armaments:

"To insure the adoption of measures for the reduction of armaments and prohibition of the use of atomic energy for military purposes, there shall be established within the framework of the Security Council * * * international control operating on the basis of a special provision which should provide for the establishment of special organs of inspection for which purpose there shall be formed—

"(a) A commission for the control of the execution of the decision regarding the reduction of armaments.

"(b) A commission for the control of the execution of the decision regarding the prohibition of the use of atomic energy for military purposes."

"The Soviet delegation thinks that this proposal provides a basis for the solution of the problem of control and inspection."—Molotov, in the United Nations, November 28, 1946.

14. BRIEF SUMMARY—EFFECTS OF WORLD WAR II AND WORLD PREPARATIONS FOR WORLD WAR III

"The 57 Allied and Axis Nations involved in the Second World War lost more than 15,000,000 soldiers and sailors and other military personnel, according to a report by Secretary of State George C. Marshall, released today.

"* * * Marshall stated that the full cost of the war 'either in intrinsic values or in intangibles' would never be known.

"Among the losses difficult to appraise, he stated, are casualties among civilians, losses caused by the displacement of populations; 'the long-term effects of devoting the major portion of the world's over-all capabilities for a period of years to the objectives of destruction,' and loss in the destruction of homes, industries, and means of livelihood of millions of people, which 'probably represented a greater monetary cost factor than the support of armed forces.'

"The total cost to the principal belligerents in military personnel 'killed and missing in battle exceeded 15,000,000 * * *. The very considerable costs to the smaller countries, particularly Poland and the nations in southeastern Europe, added hundreds of thousands more to the total.'"—Article by Gen. George C. Marshall for the Encyclopedia Britannica, reported in the New York Herald Tribune, November 3, 1947.

'The New York Times, on May 12, 1947, published a survey by Hanson Baldwin of the world's military strength.

United States: "The budget being discussed in Congress includes $11,256,000,000 for arms," or 34 percent of the total budget.

Russia: Military budget is "67,000,000,000 rubles, about 18 percent of the total budget. The unofficial rate of exchange, 12 rubles to a dollar, which represents fairly accurately the purchasing power of the dollar in Moscow, would reduce the Soviet military budget for this year to $5,561,000,000."

Naval strength: The world's total tonnage in the five principal categories is 6,680,000 tons. The United States possesses (in active and reserve fleets) 3,800,000 tons, or well over half. * * * not even Britain is a close second. The United Kingdom, with more than 1,500,000 standard displacement tons of battle-ships, battle cruisers, aircraft carriers of all types, destroyers, and submarines, is the second sea power of the world.

Russia: Russia has between 396,000 and 487,000 tons, including conquered German and Italian vessels.

Air Force: The United States has approximately 37,000 military planes of all types. * * * "The United States has a clear and major lead in the air and, so far as can be learned, a smaller technological advantage in missiles and other new weapons, an advantage greatly aided by the superiority of our industries."—Hansen Baldwin, New York Times, March 21, 1947.

Russia: Russia has about 25,000 military planes of all types. * * *

Military expenditures by all of the nations of the world for 1947 total more than $27,000,000,000.

15. SENTIMENT FOR INTERNATIONAL DISARMAMENT

A group headed by Senator Elbert Thomas, chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, on November 28, 1946, called upon President Truman, Premier Stalin, and Prime Minister Attlee, "effect and maintain a disarmament pro rata, simultaneously and progressively, of all war weapons except those needed by internal police."

The group pointed out that the United States military budget of $18,300,000 for that year alone is 27 times the appropriations for TVA during the 10 years of its existence.

Among the group issuing the statement were Dr. Karl T. Compton, president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology; William Green, president of the AFL; Senator Millard Tydings; Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, former Minister to Norway; William Draper Lewis, director of the American Law Institute; Philip Murray, President of the CIO; Mrs. Gifford Pinchot; Ewing Cockrell, president of the United States Federation of Justice; William A. Higginbotham, president of the Federation of American Scientists.

"Out of one side of our mouths we talk of world disarmament and out of the other we start a world armament race." Congress is "almost equally divided on the advisability of military conscription."—Letter by Senator Edwin C. Johnson, Colorado, to the President's Commission on Universal Training, December 23, 1946.

The Federal Council of Churches, representing most of American Protestant churches, issued an excellent plan for peace with Russia which appeared in the newspapers of October 19, 1946. John Foster Dulles joined with prominent clergymen of various churches in signing the statement. Among other things the statement said:

"The armament race must be ended. The United States for the first time in its history plans to maintain a large standing army. Our Government seems committed to having a Navy and Air Force which will surpass those of any other nations. It is continuing to manufacture atomic weapons and to develop new scientific methods of mass destruction. The latter activities it shrouds with secrecy.

"The Soviet Union maintains a standing army which no other nation matches. It is inferior to the United States as regards Navy, Air Force, and modern scientific weapons, notably the atomic bomb. Its leaders are striving to make good such deficiencies. They cloak their military establishment with great secrecy.

"The present armament race between the United States and the Soviet Union will, if continued, probably lead to the destruction of both. Such secret competition breeds the suspicion, fear, and hostility which make war inevitable.

"We believe that every effort should be made to apply the provisions of the United Nations Charter for the regulation and multilateral reduction of national armaments. The proposal for an Atomic Development Authority is a good start in that direction. The Authority would provide true world government within a defined area. That functional approach seems practical and susceptible of enlargement to deal with other means of mass destruction besides atomic energy. Our Nation should persist in this course."

The statement also said: "Security is no longer geographic. Soviet and American military strategists seem still to be seeking security in terms of geography. In an effort to catch up with the increasing range and speed of missiles, they would extend further and further the areas over which their nation has military control. Thus, large areas of the world fall within overlapping strategic orbits. Islands of the Atlantic and the Pacific, Germany, the Balkans, the Mediterranean, and Far East and Near East areas are looked upon by one or another as needed for a defense, which to others seem to carry an offensive threat.

"The sharply increased offensive capabilities of modern warfare are such that it is not possible to reconcile a friendly and neighborly policy with such strategic defense as from a military standpoint might seem most effective. Therefore, no nation should allow its action in these matters to be determined by military factors alone. The United States should set an example by renouncing the acquisition of new military bases so far distant from the continental United States and so close to the Soviet Union that the offensive threat is both disproportionate to the defensive value to the United States and also incompatible with a policy designed to dissipate distrust and to increase good will. This principle applies to all nations."

The Chicago Sun, November 14, 1946, quoting a current magazine's statement that "To many people it looks like a choice between disarmament and an atomic war of extinction," editorialized, "Is there really a 'choice' between a war of extinction and anything else? The very fact that the alternatives can be stated in that way is an indictment of our leadership and our popular thinking. For it is the function of leadership to show and of popular thinking to understand that in any decision between disarmament and race suicide the only rational course lies in disarmament."

"A system in which each step to increase one's security threatens that of his neighbor is a system which makes security impossible and war inevitable. Security cannot be attained through national military power."—Father W. J. Millor, Society of Jesus, president of the University of Detroit, in the March 1947 Association of American Colleges Bulletin.

General Eisenhower, testifying before the President's Air Policy Commission on November 11, 1947, said he foresaw no immediate threat of war, "not in the next 2, 3, or 4 years.

"No nation in the world today is in a position to undertake a war of global proportions," he declared.

"The governments of the world will find some way to substitute the council table for the battlefield or within the measurable future civilization as we know it will cease to exist."—Reported in the New York Times, November 12, 1947.

Gen. Douglas MacArthur, commenting on the assassination of Gandhi, said, "That he should die through violence is one of those bitter anachronisms that seems to refute all logic.

"In the evolution of civilization, if it is to survive, all men cannot fail to eventually adopt his belief that the process of mass application of force to resolve contentious issues is fundamentally not only wrong and useless, but within itself contains the germs of self-destruction. Gandhi was one of those prophets who lived far ahead of the times."—AP dispatch from Tokyo, January 31, 1948.

"Many of us who have thought the situation through have concluded that our only salvation lies in the establishment of international morality, a mutual acceptance of the futility of further warfare and a mutual avowal to keep the peace. Three years ago I would have considered such a thought absurd, human nature being what it is. Today I believe it is the only chance for the survival of humankind. Unfortunately this conviction seems not to be shared by the rulers of nations.

"I would have said before the accomplishment of the atomic fission that we might have a world government within the next 500 years. Today I am convinced that we must try to attain it within the next 5 years. That's about all the time we have left."—The Bomb Secret Is Out, by Dr. Robert M. Hutchins, chancellor of the University of Chicago, in the American magazine, December 1947.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you just a word about your own educational background and your profession? Would you be kind enough to tell us briefly about that?

Mr. MALLERY. I haven't had any college education except for 1 year. I have been working in the pharmaceutical industry as a medical copy writer prior to the war. I was a conscientious objector and served as a guinea pig in a starvation diet research project, and now I am back in professional life as a medical copy writer.

Senator DONNELL. Where is your present address?

Mr. MALLERY. I live in Malvern, Chester County, Pa.

Senator DONNELL. What was the college at which you attended?

Mr. MALLERY. One semester at Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., and one semester at Temple University.

Senator VANDENBERG. Thank you, Mr. Mallery.

Mr. A. Stauffer Curry.

STATEMENT OF A. STAUFFER CURRY, BRETHREN SERVICE COMMISSION, CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN

Mr. CURRY. Senator, my name is A. Stauffer Curry. I am a minister of the Church of the Brethren, a religious body of 183,000 constituents, and appear here today at the request of Harold Row, executive secretary of the Brethren Service Commission, the agency of this religious group which administers a widespread foreign relief program and in general is deeply interested in matters relating to international brotherhood and good will. This interest grows out of a religious background of opposition to hatred, bitterness, and conflict between persons or groups of persons whether they be racial, class, religious, national, or international in character. Because of this deep and historical interest in human relations our commission is grateful for this opportunity to make a brief statement on the North Atlantic Treaty inasmuch as we believe there are elements involved which will vitally affect the relations of millions of human beings for decades and perhaps generations to come.

I should like to point out further, in order that our point of view on the treaty may be reflected properly in its total setting, that the Brethren Service Commission has been and is currently administering a widespread relief and rehabilitation program in war-torn countries.

At the instigation of one of our subcommittees, the heifers-for-relief program was developed which resulted in the outright donation and shipment abroad to undernourished and starving families in 14 countries of at least 7,700 dairy heifers, goats, and other livestock. At least 5,000 livestock attendants were procured to facilitate shipment of these and other livestock to foreign ports. Over 3,000,000 pounds of clothing, in addition to vast quantities of food were dispensed through our relief centers in nine countries. Agricultural rehabilitation projects were established in China, Poland, and other countries. Personnel was loaned to various agencies for war-prisoner work. We are currently active in the displaced-persons program. We are presently developing other projects as needs arise, and follow with great interest unfolding developments such as the President's point 4 program. Our mission fields include, in addition to the above-mentioned relief centers, India, China, Africa, and South America where presumably phases of this program may be put into operation.

We are very anxious to emphasize that our point of view on the pact is based upon religious and religious-humanitarian considerations and in no way is remotely associated with political influences either domestic or international. Also, while certain technical factors are referred to in this statement, our reasons for not favoring the pact are basically and fundamentally religious.

DANGER OF MILITARY ALLIANCES

The Brethren Service Commission feels great concern lest the North Atlantic Treaty be a means of stimulating aggression and attack on the part of other nations rather than deterring and discouraging attack. Inasmuch as an extensive arms program has been proposed, our country is functionally entering upon a military alliance of major proportions. Historically, military alliances have served to stimulate counteralliances with resultant arms races and ultimate wars. The history of events preceding previous wars demonstrates that in no way do military alliances offer effective guaranties against war.

Recent major wars were all preceded with systems of military alliances which were incapable of preserving the peace. Very recent history in the Orient indicates that arms assistance programs may be accompanied by, or even be the cause of aggression upon the countries being assisted. At the very time our Nation was sending billions of dollars worth of military aid to the largest oriental nation, it was being attacked by hostile forces. There is direct evidence that the attack was stimulated or at least hastened by our vast shipments of armaments to that nation.

This situation tends to confirm the premise of the group I represent that the threat of the use of force will only encourage aggression. We hold that the pact, with its accompanying arms program, regardless how small the latter, will serve only to arouse fears and suspicions throughout the world, and in the end serve as a stimulant to further strife and bloodshed. Instead of the pact with its military assistance program, we feel that a positive program of international cooperation among all nations should be pursued by our Nation more vigorously than ever before. We believe that the equivalent of the cost of the military assistance programs from year to year should be applied to the expansion of both public and private rehabilitation and reconstruction projects around the world.

RECONSTRUCTION AND REHABILITATION

The spread of certain ideologies across the world is greatly feared by many people of this country. Our commission believes that the best and the only ultimately successful method to stop this spread is through satisfying fully the basic physical, economic, personality, and spiritual needs of war-devastated and other underprivileged peoples. We believe the North Atlantic Treaty not only fails to give these basic satisfactions, but also tends to hamper and retard present efforts in the direction of reconstruction.

WEAKENING OF UNITED NATIONS

Another factor which enters into the point of view of the group I represent is, as we look at it, the obvious weakening and tendency toward undermining of the United Nations by the pact. While technically the Charter of the United Nations allows for certain regional arrangements, functionally the pact is in violation of the underlying spirit of the United Nations. The pact provides for the establishment of an Atlantic Council with a defense committee to implement articles 3 and 5 of the pact. This Atlantic Council would have power to determine when joint action should be taken by signatory nations against an alleged aggressor; the Atlantic Council would also determine presumably when the United Nations Security Council has taken "measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security" after an aggression has occurred. In other words, the Council created by the North Atlantic Treaty would in effect sit in judgment upon the United Nations. This would materially reduce the strength and weaken the effectiveness of the United Nations. Other considerations tending to weaken this international organization could be pointed out, should time permit.

The church body I represent looks with great hopefulness upon the possibilities of world brotherhood through the United Nations. This world organization has had little time to develop fully its possibilities for resolving international difficulties. To do now that which involves even the slightest risk of discrediting or weakening the United Nations is to set the stage for further break-down and perhaps ultimate dissolution of this great organization. We are very strongly in favor of an expanded program for strengthening the United Nations, as a substitute for the pact, by use of the following means: Expansion of the various functional agencies of the United Nations such as WHO, FAO, UNESCO, and the like; the reduction of national armaments under United Nations supervision; more adequate financial contributions by all members to the United Nations; continued effort to remove the factors responsible for the veto; and efforts toward greater acceptance of the International Court of Justice.

MILITARY INFLUENCE ON FOREIGN POLICY

Another, a third consideration in the point of view of those I represent, is the possibility that the pact will intensify the military domination of American life and thought. We would tend to agree with the essence of a pre-Lenten statement issued by 22 nationally known clergymen:

The adoption of the Atlantic Pact means continued stock-piling of atomic and biological weapons, continuance of peacetime conscription, increase of the already colossal arms budget, building a new world spy network, maintenance of military bases around the world, no relaxation in military influence of education, science, industry, and commerce.

Especially are we concerned about the growing military influence in education, science and commerce. No stones should be left unturned in the effort to arrest this trend in American life.

In summary, the Brethren Service Commission believes the objective of arresting the world-wide spread of certain ideologies at which the pact is aimed and the objective of preserving world peace can be achieved by other means than a military alliance. We believe that the pact is not in accord with certain basic tenets of the Christian faith calling for methods of goodwill and brotherhood. We believe in expanding our governmental and private efforts for increased rehabilitation and reconstruction programs; we commend our Government for the economic recovery program already established. We believe that greatly intensified efforts to deemphasize our armament program toward the objective of complete world disarmament offers the only satisfactory solution of the problem of world peace. We commend the successful negotiations which have just led to the lifting of the Berlin blockade; we commend the plans for the forthcoming meeting of foreign ministers and favor the increased use of the method of direct discussion and negotiation. We favor the inauguration of new methods to strengthen the United Nations. As a religious body, we believe finally that the objective of building a permanently peaceful world lies not in the use of military means, but through the encouragement by peaceful means of a way of life whereby mankind can exercise full freedom of his beliefs regarding what to him is his correct relationship to the Supreme Being of the universe.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Curry, the committee is very glad to have your obviously earnest and sincere sentiments.

Senator DONNELL, have you any questions?

Senator DONNELL. You speak of your organization being a religious body of 183,000 constituents. Are they spread geographically throughout the United States or just in one section of the country?

Mr. CURRY. We have churches in, I suppose, all but four or five States. I am not sure of the exact number at the present moment. They are concentrated in Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Kansas.

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

Senator DONNELL. You are a minister of the gospel in that religious body?

Mr. CURRY. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Would you tell us very briefly your educational background?

Mr. CURRY. I am one of these fellows who went to school most of his lifetime. I went to Elizabethtown College in Pennsylvania; then I went to the Methodist Seminary at Westminster, Md., and took a master's degree at Catholic University, and a Ph. D. at the New York College of Education.

Senator DONNELL. Would you mind stating your age for the record?

Mr. CURRY. Thirty-six.

Senator DONNELL. What is your residence at the present time?

Mr. CURRY. I am registered in the State of Illinois. I served on the staff of our church out there until recently.

Senator DONNELL. You referred on page 3 of your statement to a pre-Lenten statement issued by 22 nationally known clergymen. Did you see the testimony or hear the testimony made by Rev. Phillips Elliott, who placed in the record a statement made by quite a number of clergymen?

Mr. CURRY. I had to be out of town yesterday and I have been unable to read that testimony.

Senator DONNELL. I am not certain whether the statement to which you refer was the one he placed in the record. Do you recall whether the statement to which you refer was one on which Dr. Tittle, of Evanston, Ill., is one of the signers?

Mr. CURRY. It is my impression that it is the same.

Senator DONNELL. Would you say that the gentlemen whose names appear upon the statement to which you refer are favorably regarded among the clergymen of the country as being outstanding members of the profession?

Mr. CURRY. Yes; I think very definitely so.

Senator DONNELL. Reverend Curry, do you have a copy of that statement that you would be kind enough, if the chairman is agreeable, to present to the clerk of this committee, not for duplication but if it happens that the pre-Lenten statement to which you refer is a different one, that it might be incorporated in the record?

Mr. CURRY. I will be glad to see that the committee receives a copy. (The matter referred to is as follows:)

DRAFT OF STATEMENT ON ATLANTIC PACT

During this Lenten season in the year of our Lord 1949, the thoughts of Christian people in the United States, as elsewhere, are necessarily often occupied with consideration of the North Atlantic Pact. A study conference under the auspices of the department of international justice and good will of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, recently held, was unable to decide either to support or to reject this proposal. It is appropriate in these circumstances that individual Christians and groups should share with each other their thinking about a step which is generally recognized as the most important in American foreign policy since the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine.

The Atlantic Pact provides for bringing the nations of western Europe and the United States into a military alliance. Some advocates of this step hold that it must not be regarded as anything but a highly dubious and a temporary expedient. They desire that it should be so used and so represented that it may not be a manifestly and aggressively hostile policy but one to be developed or superseded in a constant pursuit of world concord and cooperation. It is the contention of these advocates that under such conditions Europe's fear of a new retreat into isolationism on the part of the United States would be allayed. They believe that building up and pooling the military might of the countries involved and putting Russia on notice that an armed attack on any one of them will be regarded as an act of war against all, will deter Russia from attempting further to extend her power sphere. Thus the countries of western Europe will be saved from Communist domination, and economic recovery and stabilization, based on what may yet be accomplished by an increasing exchange of goods between East and West under the Marshall plan, will become possible in the democratic world generally. It is furthermore suggested that there are forces at work in Russia and in countries of the Soviet bloc, which will before long result in the drastic alteration of the present Soviet policy, provided that a firm and united attitude on the part of the democratic nations against further Russian aggression makes it clear that the men in the Kremlin are not all-powerful and must substantially moderate their course.

Admittedly this is a gamble. It also admittedly means continuance at present of the policy of the cold war in a divided world. This is the crucial and ominous fact, even if we assume that the policy of which the North Atlantic Pact is a part, is purely "defensive", which of course Americans would find it impossible to believe if conditions were reversed and Russians were entering into a military pact with Latin-American nations.

It is hoped, sincerely hoped by many who are as deeply troubled as we are, that this threat of possible resort to war against Russia will end the danger of war; but we need to face unflinchingly and honestly what are the instrumentalities with which the cold war is being waged. The adoption of the Atlantic Pact means continued stock piling of atomic and biological weapons, continuance of peacetime conscription, increase in the already colossal arms budget, building a world-wide spy network, maintenance of military bases around the world, no relaxation in military influence of education, science, industry, and commerce, to say nothing of the periodic waves of national hysteria without which none of these measures could be maintained.

The United States has already gone a long way down this road, and there is ominous likelihood that ultimately it will prove to be a disastrous road. We cannot believe that peace and righteousness will be found at the end if we keep traveling it. Mankind has tried these methods of military alliances and armament rivalries for many centuries. They have led to disaster in the past. Humbly we submit that to depend upon them for deliverance now, after two world wars and in face of the nature of modern war and the character of the weapons which it employs, reveals that men are no longer behaving rationally and have become morally calloused about the diabolical nature of the weapons which nations use today in the defense of their interests and in the pursuit of the values they cherish.

The dilemma in which thoughtful citizens, and especially Christians, now find themselves becomes more complicated and painful with each fresh crisis. It is always impossible to find a satisfying answer to the crisis of the moment taken in isolation. The next step toward ruin can always be made to seem inevitable in the light of the one preceding it; while each time the hope is held out that this will be the last such step and—despairingly—men grasp at that hope. For that very reason it will be a catastrophe of the first order if the American people and their leaders now allow themselves to be content with this one more step on the old road of power politics, armament rivalry, and cold war.

The hour is already very late. It is time to make a decisive turn, to take another and a better road * * *. This means that the American people, as well as people everywhere, need a new sense of direction, a greater moral sensitivity, a new faith and dynamic to drive out the feeling of helplessness which now holds them in thrall. Preeminently it is the Christian Church upon which the responsibility rests to summon men and nations to cast away their self-righteousness and complacency; to call them to deep moral repentance; to allay the fears which are driving them to deeds of madness; and to release spiritual springs for cooperative attitudes and actions. It is for the Christian Church, especially during this Lenten season, to speak the word of peace and reconciliation in the midst of strife, suspicion, fear, and hate.

Were the Christian Church to utter such a distinctive word, and instead of supinely underwriting national policy set about creating a new spiritual climate, new political possibilities might very well in God's providence open up. The American people might give new expression to their generous impulses and turn to feeding and helping foe as well as friend; for so Jesus taught. Quietly and persistently they might practice righteousness and establish equality among all races in their own land, that the democratic way of life might become a shining reality and an example which all peoples might be eager to follow. The American people might then make clear to their Government their desire that American foreign policy should be based upon:

(1) Loyal support and consistent use of the United Nations and its instrumentalities.

(2) A ringing and persistent call therefore for the resumption of serious efforts to secure universal abolition of national military establishments at the earliest possible moment, as an evidence of the earnest desire of the people of the United States to dispel the dense fog of suspicion which now blocks all movement on the road to disarmament.

(3) Unremitting efforts to explore the possibilities of negotiating peace with the Soviet government; and the use to that end, not of fear inspired by our arsenal of atomic weapons, which can only lead to counter-arming, desperation, or a temporary sullen retreat, but of a resolute good will.

Penitently those who sign this statement confess that no less than others they have failed so to surrender themselves to the will of God and so to venture on faith in the power of Christ as to enable the Church, which is the body of that Christ, to speak peace to this weary and troubled age.

Men and women from various parts of the land, however, seeing to what extent human wisdom is frustrated and human power, turned upon itself, has been brought to naught, have asked us to call on Christian leaders and people to set apart a time for prayer and fasting, that our minds and hearts may be purified and wisdom may be given to our people and their government in this critical hour. We are certain that these requests reflect a deep-seated feeling in the hearts of multitudes; and so we heed this exhortation to turn anew to the eternal source of wisdom and peace and to ask all our fellows to do likewise.

We trust that many churches and groups will be moved to set apart special periods for prayer and fasting, individual and corporate. All to whom this message comes will, we feel sure, wish to devote increasing time to daily prayer.

Senator DONNELL. One other point and I am finished. That is this: You make one statement that I am not inclined to think I can agree with you on, and I wanted to ask you your basis for it. You say, on page 2 of your statement, that the pact provides for the establishment of an Atlantic council with a defense committee to implement articles 3 and 5 of the pact. Are you not in error in stating that that defense committee has the power of implementation? In that connection I call to your attention the fact that the concluding sentence of article 9 reads:

The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of articles 3 and 5.

It is power purely of a recommendatory nature rather than implementary nature.

Mr. CURRY. I suppose that is correct, obviously.

Senator DONNELL. That is the section of the treaty to which you refer, at any rate?

Mr. CURRY. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Senator VANDENBERG. Thank you very much. I turn the hearing back to the chairman, who has returned from his meeting with the Finance Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I desire to express my deep appreciation to Senator Vandenberg, who can continue the hearing for the whole day, so far as I am concerned, because I know it would be done in an efficient, able, and satisfactory manner.

You are excused, sir. Thank you very much.

Mr. Cass Canfield, give the reporter your name and business, and whom you represent, and so on.

STATEMENT OF CASS CANFIELD, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS, HARPER & BROTHERS PUBLISHING CO., CHAIRMAN OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, UNITED WORLD FEDERALISTS

Mr. CANFIELD. My name is Cass Canfield, chairman of the board of Harper & Brothers, publishers. I am appearing before you as chairman of the executive committee of United World Federalists, a national organization working for the strengthening of the United Nations and its transformation into a federation of nations.

I feel sure that the committee will agree with me that this is not the time to develop and defend the full position of United World Federalists. Since these are hearings specifically on the North Atlantic treaty, in this statement I shall confine myself to setting forth our views with reference to the treaty. I will be happy to answer any questions members of the committee may choose to ask about the overall position of United World Federalists.

A difference exists between those who support the Atlantic treaty as a program to insure permanent peace and those supporting it as a temporary measure necessary for the defense of this country. I belong to the latter group.

BALANCE OF POWER

It is my opinion that many people delude themselves into thinking that if the Atlantic nations make themselves sufficiently strong, an armed truce between the West and the East can be maintained indefinitely. They place reliance in the long run upon the balance-of-power system.

Such reliance is, I believe, mistaken. The balance-of-power system has never led to a secure peace and, whereas in the nineteenth century a certain elasticity was achieved in the shifting relations between the nations of Europe, a world permanently divided into East and West blocs would be politically more rigid and consequently even more dangerous. Besides, we must bring ourselves to face the unpleasant fact that in the past, when two aggregations of power have continued to arm against each other, and have been unable to settle outstanding issues between them, war has almost invariably resulted.

In testifying here it is surely unnecessary to labor the point of what an atomic war would mean to this country, to civilization and to the people of the entire world. The destruction of life and of real wealth would be beyond calculation. It is generally agreed that democratic government might not survive such a war and that even a modern armaments race, maintained long enough, might lead to a garrison state and endanger both our institutions and our financial stability.

I do not believe there is a difference between us on these points; the great problem confronting us is how we are to preserve the kind of society we cherish and how we are to achieve the indispensable requisite to that end, a just and enduring peace.

WORLD FEDERATION

The organization I represent believes that the answer lies in the institution we have developed ourselves, in Federal Government, which has given the United States economic strength and has proved itself effective in settling disputes arising within the confines of this country. Our Federal Government was achieved only after many difficulties had been overcome and I have no doubt that the development of the United Nations into a world federal system with powers limited but adequate to preserve peace will be even more difficult. However, the task in my opinion is far from impossible and the stakes are so enormous that we cannot afford to abandon the effort.

I hope I have not given the impression of attempting to side track the importance of the treaty and advocate world government as a substitute. In the present state of the world I am convinced that we must be prepared to defend ourselves. And with our strategic frontiers far beyond our geographical ones, the treaty is without doubt essential to our defense. Nothing more needs to be said; this is simply a question of survival.

THE PACT—AN EMERGENCY MEASURE

However, there is, it seems to me, one great hazard in the treaty and in the other elements of the preparedness program. It is that expedients will be confused with objectives; that emergency measures necessary in a time of crisis will be mistaken for long-range policy goals. I hope that the committee will agree that there must be no ambiguity as between expedients and objectives. The pact is more than what is written on the paper which has been signed by the high contracting parties. It is also the frame of reference in which it is understood by the peoples and the governments of the world. I urge that the committee take measures to make it quite clear that the pact is an emergency measure; that the long-range objectives of the United States are to so develop and greatly strengthen the institutions of the United Nations that in all good common sense we can depend on the United Nations for that security which we now seek through competitive armaments, alliances, and the other measures of power politics.

SETTLEMENT OF DIFFERENCES WITH RUSSIA

Therefore I urge that we recognize the necessity of attempting, simultaneously with the implementation of the pact, a realistic, general settlement of outstanding issues with the Russians and the simultaneous amendment of the United Nations Charter so as to transform the United Nations into a limited world government. Neither of these processes should involve a policy of appeasement.

The obvious objection to an attempt at amendment of the United Nations Charter is the likelihood of the Russian objection which could block revision. (This we cannot be sure of until the Russians are approached on the subject.) Another objection is that we might, in the process of trying to change the United Nations, bring about its dissolution and thus wreck the only existing international agency that has accomplished a number of useful things.

Now I want to make entirely clear my strong conviction as to the importance of preserving the United Nations. In the event that the Russians could not be persuaded, after every effort had been made in that direction, to strengthen the organization by amendment, I believe that the next great step should be the formation of a federation of those nations willing to join within the structure of the United Nations. Such a federation would be granted powers limited but adequate to preserve the peace, or at least to do so away beyond the power of the United Nations as now constituted. A partial solution of the problem of war along these lines would be an immense stride forward and it is entirely possible that sometime in the future Russia, out of self-interest, if nothing else, would join a partial federation under proper safeguards and make it global.

It would be absurd to minimize the patience, vigilance, persistence, and intelligence required to carry out the kind of program I have broadly outlined. It would be dangerous to ignore the current unpleasant realities by failing to approve the Atlantic Pact and thus provide for our immediate security. At the same time we can not escape the truth that disaster lies ahead unless world law can be established and made effective through the backing of force. Eventually it is a question of one world or none and we must take the risks inherent in an attempt to achieve safety rather than allow the balance of power system to lead us into another war as it has never failed in history to do.

The CHAIRMAN. I have tried to follow you closely. You favor the ratification at this time of the Atlantic Pact?

Mr. CANFIELD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. You think it is necessary for our defense and so on and so forth?

Mr. CANFIELD. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. We are all devoted to the United Nations. Does not the Treaty in several particulars recognize the over-riding authority of the United Nations?

Mr. CANFIELD. I think it does.

The CHAIRMAN. And does it not express a desire to promote and cooperate with the United Nations?

Mr. CANFIELD. I would agree.

The CHAIRMAN. Most of us agree with you, that it needs modification and amendment, which we will certainly strive to bring about, but you no doubt are aware that there are many difficulties in the way of that procedure.

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman and Mr. Canfield, I notice, Mr. Canfield, in your very interesting statement that you refer to a difference existing between those who support the Atlantic Treaty as a program to insure permanent peace and those supporting it as a temporary measure, and then later in your statement you say:

I urge that the committee take measures to make it quite clear that the pact is an emergency measure—and then finally you speak of it being—dangerous to ignore the current unpleasant realities by failing to approve the Atlantic Pact and thus provide for our immediate security.

You have studied the pact, I assume, personally, have you not?

Mr. CANFIELD. I have, to a certain extent.

Senator DONNELL. I beg your pardon?

Mr. CANFIELD. I have to a degree.

Senator DONNELL. Have you read the entire Treaty?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes, I have.

Senator DONNELL. Would you say, Mr. Canfield, that you have given it thorough and careful study?

Mr. CANFIELD. I would say that in relation to the average private citizen I had, sir.

DURATION OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Canfield, with reference to your designating your support as being in the category of support of the Atlantic Treaty "as a temporary measure," are you aware, I assume, that the period of the Treaty is 20 years?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes. Isn't there a provision for revision after 10 years?

Senator DONNELL. Have you studied the Treaty yourself?

Mr. CANFIELD. I have only read it. I can not claim to be an expert on it.

Senator DONNELL. You say you have only read it. Have you read it more than once?

Mr. CANFIELD. No.

Senator DONNELL. Just once?

Mr. CANFIELD. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. How long ago since you read it?

Mr. CANFIELD. A few days.

Senator DONNELL. Before you prepared this statement or afterwards?

Mr. CANFIELD. That's right.

Senator DONNELL. Which?

Senator DONNELL. Before I prepared this statement.

Senator DONNELL. There is a provision in the treaty, Mr. Canfield, that [reading]:

After the treaty has been in force for 10 years, or at any time thereafter, the parties shall, if any of them so requests, consult together for the purpose of reviewing the treaty, having regard for the factors then affecting peace and security in the North Atlantic area, including the development of universal, as well as regional, arrangements under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

There is not, however, in the treaty any provision for the termination of the treaty until the conclusion of 20 years. Do you recall that?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard that period of 20 years as a mere temporary period within the meaning of your statement here?

Mr. CANFIELD. Senator, 20 years is a long time. However, in the present world situation it seems to me that you have to provide security for quite a period ahead. I am not particularly bothered about this period so long—and I touched on the principal point I am anxious to emphasize—as we make it clear that the pact is an expedient to meet a situation that confronts us, and that we will not let up on the long-term objective of amending the United Nations with a view to establishing world law, effective world law, backed by force. That, we think, is of enormous importance, and it is a matter of emphasis so that both things will be presented at the same time with equal force.

Senator DONNELL. You do agree, however, that a period of 20 years is a period within which many unforeseen events may occur, things that we cannot at this time foresee? That is correct, is it not?

Mr. CANFIELD. That is undoubtedly true.

Senator DONNELL. And the 20-year period is only 1 year less than the period between the termination of the First World War and the beginning of the Second World War. I believe I am right in that, am I not, from 1918 to 1939?

Mr. CANFIELD. That is right.

MILITARY IMPLEMENTATION OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Canfield, you say also in your statement that—we must bring ourselves—

I am quoting—

to face the unpleasant fact that in the past when two aggregations of power have continued to arm against each other and have been unable to settle outstanding issues between them, war has almost invariably resulted.

Have you considered carefully article 3 of the proposed North Atlantic Treaty, which provides:

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Is it your understanding that that involves any idea or contemplation of the arming of these various nations in order to make themselves possess the individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack?

Mr. CANFIELD. I think that is possible.

Senator DONNELL. That is really the only way they could resist armed attack, by preparing by force of arms to resist it, is it not?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes, Senator; but it seems to me the main emphasis on armament is armament of this country.

Senator DONNELL. Do you think that there is any emphasis on the fact that this country is going to assist the European nations to arm themselves?

Mr. CANFIELD. It is certainly being discussed and debated.

Senator DONNELL. And it has been suggested, has it not, already, that as the first appropriation $1,130,000,000 shall be appropriated for purposes of that general type? Am I not correct in that?

Mr. CANFIELD. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. And are you also aware, Mr. Canfield, that the $1,130,000,000 does not at all necessarily represent the actual value of what is going to be sent, but that what will be sent over there may be very much undervalued, and that the $1,130,000,000 may include transportation and rehabilitation costs only instead of the actual valuation of the material itself? You are aware of that fact?

Mr. CANFIELD. I am aware of that, and I would agree with what I would presume would be your point of view, that no diminution should be made in the amount of Marshall plan aid we are now giving for peaceful purposes, peaceful development.

Senator DONNELL. And also you would agree, would you not, that if we enter into this treaty we should comply with every term of it in the letter and the spirit? You would agree with that?

Mr. CANFIELD. I should think that would be the policy of this Government.

Senator DONNELL. And you do agree that the maintenance and development of individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack includes among the measures necessary to be taken the provision of adequate military force with which to resist such armed attack, do you not?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes, Senator. I think you would agree that you would then get into the very difficult area of determining where the attack would be resisted, whether it is possible to arm Europe, the western European nations, effectively enough so that you would maintain a front in western Europe. Those are questions, it seems to me, that should and will be discussed in great detail by military experts. I do not feel competent to pass judgment on that.

OBLIGATIONS TO REARM EUROPE

Senator DONNELL. I appreciate that. But you do feel that any citizen, including yourself, or any such citizen who has carefully considered these matters, is entitled to draw the conclusion, and must inevitably draw the conclusion, that among the means designed to maintain and develop this individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack is the military strengthening of these various signatory countries. You would agree with that, would you not?

Mr. CANFIELD. No; I would not. I would say that that is not necessarily true, that the pact could be made effective by close military consultation between the various countries by integration of staff work and so on.

I am not at the same time saying that giving arms aid to the western European countries to a limited degree is not advisable.

Senator DONNELL. You would be inclined to think, would you not, Mr. Canfield, that the giving of armed aid to some extent to western European countries would be advisable and would be contemplated by the provisions of article 3 which I have read from this treaty, would you not?

Mr. CANFIELD. I should think so, but personally I would oppose it if that meant any diminution of Marshall plan aid for peaceful purposes.

Senator DONNELL. I am not entering into the Marshall plan question; I am entering into the question of our obligations under the treaty.

Mr. CANFIELD. It is a question of men and money.

Senator DONNELL. You mean if it came to a choice of reducing military assistance and continuing with Marshall aid, you would favor keeping Marshall aid at what it is?

Mr. CANFIELD. Keeping Marshall aid where it is now.

Senator DONNELL. You are chairman of the board of a great organization, Harper & Brothers Publishing Co. How long have you been with that company?

Mr. CANFIELD. Twenty-five years.

Senator DONNELL. What was your educational background behind that, if you do not mind telling us?

Mr. CANFIELD. Harvard University.

Senator DONNELL. When did you receive your degree there?

Mr. CANFIELD. 1919.

Senator DONNELL. And what degree do you hold?

Mr. CANFIELD. Not much: A. B. But I went to Oxford, which puts me in a better class.

Senator DONNELL. Were you a Rhodes scholar?

Mr. CANFIELD. No; I was not.

Senator DONNELL. How long did you attend Oxford?

Mr. CANFIELD. One year.

Senator DONNELL. Did you travel on the Continent in recent years?

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. How recently have you traveled over there?

Mr. CANFIELD. Last year.

Senator DONNELL. Did you get into Norway?

Mr. CANFIELD. No; I did not.

Senator DONNELL. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir. We appreciate your testimony.

Mr. Alfred Kohlberg.

STATEMENT OF ALFRED KOHLBERG, CHAIRMAN, AMERICAN CHINA POLICY ASSOCIATION

Mr. KOHLBERG. Mr. Chairman, my name is Alfred Kohlberg. My address is 1 West Thirty-seventh Street, New York City. I am appearing here today as chairman of the board of the American China Policy Association. This association was set up a little over 3 years ago to investigate and study our policy in China particularly.

The first president of our association and its founder was Mr. J. B. Powell, a distinguished foreign correspondent, of Mr. Donnell's State, Missouri, who, unfortunately, passed away 2 years ago, and I believe Mr. Donnell paid a tribute to him in the Senate at the time.

Senator DONNELL. He died under very tragic circumstances at a Missouri University luncheon.

Mr. KOHLBERG. That is correct, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a short statement?

Mr. KOHLBERG. I have no written statement.

Our second president was the Honorable Clare Boothe Luce, of Connecticut, and our present president is Mr. William Loeb, Jr., of New Hampshire and Vermont.

I am also national chairman of the American Jewish League Against Communism, and while I cannot speak for them, I represent their point of view in my statement.

Before stating our position on the Atlantic alliance, I would like to read two sentences from a letter from the Secretary of State to the chairman of this committee. These sentences are [reading]:

The study which has been made of the Bolshevik movement, some of the results of which are furnished herewith, shows conclusively that the purpose of the Bolsheviks is to subvert the existing principles of government and society the world over, including those countries in which democratic institutions are already established. They have built up a political machine which, by the concentration of power in the hands of a few, and the ruthlessness of its methods, suggests the Asiatic despotism of the early Tsars.

That letter, sir, is dated October 27, 1919, from Secretary of State Robert Lansing to the Honorable Henry Cabot Lodge, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate—30 years ago October.

The CHAIRMAN. Is your testimony on the China situation?

Mr. KOHLBERG. No; it is on the Atlantic alliance.

I read those sentences, sir, because we favor the confirmation of the Atlantic alliance by your body, and we favor it because it is a step in the restraint of this Asiatic despotism that threatens to overflow the whole world.

DANGER OF OVEREMPHASIZING EUROPE

We think, however, sir, that it is only a step, and that other steps must follow, such as a Pacific alliance, for example; that we cannot hold back the Red tide only in western Europe. It must be held back from the rest of the world until the day when it may be overthrown, possibly by the peoples who suffer under it.

We, however, feel that there are certain aspects of this Atlantic Alliance that should be further considered. It is the breaking of a 152-year tradition of American foreign policy based on the Farewell Address of President Washington, who advised that we make no permanent alliances with European powers, but should rely on temporary alliances when needed.

We favor this, but we think the reasons for this permanent change in policy should be fully understood by the country, and we think that a full understanding of that would require that we go on further, as we say, to further strengthening of the powers and forces that are holding back this Red tide of Asiatic tyranny, as the Secretary of State called it.

We feel also, Senator, that the Monroe Doctrine and the open-door policy should be considered at the same time, because a change in one section of our traditional foreign policy calls for reconsideration of the other two traditional sections of our foreign policy.

The CHAIRMAN. We have handled the Monroe Doctrine pretty well in the Rio Pact, have we not?

Mr. KOHLBERG. We think that it has been modified in the Rio Pact. It has become a consultative pact, whereas, when stated by President Monroe, he rejected British cooperation in his statement and made it a unilateral statement, and we think the reasons for making it a consultative pact should be more fully explained.

The CHAIRMAN. Have not all the governments of the world acknowledged the strength of the Monroe Doctrine, with the exception of a few intended violations which the United States resisted and wiped out of the way, such as Maximilian in Mexico and the Venezuela claims, and things of that kind? I was under the impression that the Rio Pact was putting into treaty form practically all of the principles of the Monroe Doctrine. We do not relax any. We still adhere to the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. KOHLBERG. That is correct, sir; but there are two parts to the Monroe Doctrine. The first part is the prohibition of extension of territorial possessions by European powers. The second part is the prohibition of extension of any of the systems of government of any European powers. And the Soviet Union is attempting the extension of its system of government in every country of the Western Hemisphere.

The CHAIRMAN. We are resisting that always, are we not?

EXTENSION OF ATLANTIC PACT TO OTHER AREAS

Mr. KOHLBERG. Yes. That is why I say I think the whole subject needs to be covered, rather than just the Atlantic Pact. We are completely for the ratification of the Atlantic Alliance, but we think that we stop too soon in only looking at that; that the rest of the world must be considered all in the same framework.

I appeared before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate last June. At that time I made a statement for our association covering what I have referred to now. In order not to take your time reading it, I wonder if I could put it in the record. It is a six-step program covering the world.

(The paper referred to reads as follows:)

While it is true that the conduct of our foreign relations is the constitutional prerogative of the President, the power of the purse remains with Congress. The signers of the Constitution probably never expected that it would cost $10,000,000,000 a year to conduct our foreign relations. It is my humble opinion that when you appropriate the cash you assume responsibility for results.

What we face is an ideology plus a force. This ideology promises socialism, economic democracy, miraculous medicine, free education, no more exploitation, racial equality and every variety of "pie in the sky." These ideas are for export only. Behind the iron curtain it delivers poverty, the police state, terror, and slavery.

The force is the Communist International, which includes the ever-expanding Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and musters 450,000,000 subjects and slaves, and millions of spies and agents all over the world.

It will destroy us or we will destroy it.

Force can be destroyed by force, but an ideology cannot be destroyed by force alone. It must be destroyed by a better ideology.

We have that better ideology. It is freedom—political freedom, religious freedom, and economic freedom.

I believe that every one of the steps which I am going to suggest is inevitable; that every one of them will in any case be taken the day after war comes; but that, if taken now or in the very near future, war may be avoided.

Step 1.—Congress must declare that world communism has proclaimed the United States its enemy, and itself our enemy. This declaration the Communist hierarchy has officially made a number of times, most particularly in section 1, paragraph 1 of the constitution of the Communist International which proclaims its objectives to be to fight "for the establishment of a World Union of Socialist Soviet Republics," that is, for the conquest of the entire world. In accordance with this declaration, "adhering to, giving aid, and comfort to" world communism would fall under the constitutional definition of treason.

Step 2.—Unrestricted trade relations shall be permitted only with nations entering the alliance outlined in step 3. Trade relations with Communist-controlled nations and areas shall be prohibited. Trade relations with other nations and areas shall be controlled so that no materials which may directly or indirectly promote the war potential of the Communist areas may thereby reach such areas.

Step 3.—American armed aid in case of attack by armed Communists shall be promised to every nation taking the above action on condition that each such nation agrees to extend armed aid under the same circumstances to each of the others so qualifying. No question of the form of government of nations entering such an alliance, whether free enterprise, democratic, monarchical, dictatorial, socialistic, or otherwise shall be given consideration. When thinking of military alliances, we should remember that Russia signed a treaty of military alliance during the war with Great Britain to run 20 years. Since the war she has signed treaties of military alliance with the following former allies: Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and France; also with the following enemy nations: Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, and Finland, all not long since, described as fascist beasts. The alliance I envision would be independent of the UN which we would permit to continue in the hope of a happier day in the dim and distant future, at which time it could be reorganized to fit.

Step 4.—American economic, charitable, relief, or reconstruction aid shall be permitted only to nations entering the alliance provided for in step 3.

Step 5.—Direct military and other aid shall be supplied to dissident elements within the Communist world, exactly in the manner that Russia now supplies such aid to Communist and other dissidents in the free world, as for example in China, Korea, Greece, Trieste, Austria, Germany, Italy, Iran, Finland, the Philippines, and elsewhere.

Step 6.—Diplomatic relations shall be immediately broken with all nations and areas within the Communist world. Such diplomatic relations in the past were presumed to smooth the course of international relations but as now practiced by the Communist nations, only serve to aggravate such relations. Only last April I returned from Japan where the Soviet Union has several hundred employees in its Tokyo Embassy. A few dozen are engaged in diplomatic work. The balance are busy at espionage, propaganda, agitation and intrigue.

All these steps can be taken at once. No one of them is warlike, nor does any one of them (except the rupture of diplomatic relations) go beyond the steps already taken by Soviet communism in its "cold war" on us. Those who think we are now at peace with Russia must consider all these steps to peace—they exactly duplicate Russia's peaceful approaches to us. Those who think we are engaged in a "cold war" with Russia will applaud retaliation confined to the "cold" level. Every one of the above steps, except step 6, is already being carried out in part by our Government, or has been in part proposed, either by the Administration or by Republican leaders of the Senate.

It is a world-wide Monroe Doctrine in a shrunken world. It says, "Stop" to the only Eurasian power able to "extend its territories or political system" in the free world.

If all these measures are taken at once, we will be able to confront the Soviet world with an alliance of free people having at least triple its industrial power and more than double its manpower. Confronted with such an alliance, the Soviet Union will probably not dare to make war and we can rely on time, and the growing dissatisfaction of the 450,000,000 slaves of communism, for the eventual destruction of the Communist dictatorship.

If, in spite of all odds, the Soviet Union, nevertheless, attacked the free world, we would have overwhelming forces on our side not now available to us.

This, I believe, is a plan to make World War III nearly impossible; to bring us victory, instead of stalemate or defeat, if it comes.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

OTHER PACTS

Senator DONNELL. I understand from your statement you favor a Pacific alliance, and I judge you mean of a character similar to that of the North Atlantic Treaty.

Mr. KOHLBERG. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you favor a Mediterranean Pact of like nature?

Mr. KOHLBERG. I would say that eventually yes.

Senator DONNELL. Are there any other pacts that you would favor in addition to the North Atlantic, the Mediterranean, and the Pacific?

Mr. KOHLBERG. In this statement that I put in here, yes. I would say that I do not favor paper alliances. I think that each country that comes into the alliance should clean up its fifth column, so that we would know that no change of prime ministers or change of government could come about that would vitiate it.

Senator DONNELL. With respect to the Monroe Doctrine, that is purely a unilateral doctrine, is it not?

Mr. KOHLBERG. It was.

Senator DONNELL. It does not create on the part of the United States any contractual obligation whatsoever between it and any other nation, is that correct?

Mr. KOHLBERG. That was its original form, but it has been somewhat changed by the Pact of Chapultepec.

Senator DONNELL. The Monroe Doctrine itself did not create any contractual obligation.

That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. Is Dr. Griffith here?

STATEMENT OF DR. H. M. GRIFFITH, VICE PRESIDENT, NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Dr. GRIFFITH. My name is H. M. Griffith. I am vice president of the National Economic Council, with headquarters in the Empire State Building, New York.

In correspondence with the clerk of your committee we understood that we would be given the privilege of making a short statement and then filing a longer statement to supplement it, so I have here a brief statement which I would like to read, and a longer statement which I would like to have inserted in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any duplication?

Dr. GRIFFITH. Not very much, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go ahead.

What is the National Economic Council? What is it composed of?

Dr. GRIFFITH. The National Economic Council is a citizens' organization with members I think in every State in the United States, with a board of directors elected by the members.

I will put into the record a little leaflet which gives the names of our directors and also the purposes of the organization, according to its charter.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL, INC.

Established 1930

WHAT IT IS—WHAT IT DOES

What it is

The National Economic Council, Inc., is an organization dedicated to the preservation of human liberty, including maintenance and invigorating of private enterprise, rights of property, and American independence.

The purposes stated in its charter are:

To stimulate and develop the economic life of the United States and of the several States.

To encourage government, Federal, State, and local, to practice wise economy in public spending.

To urge all persons versed in practical affairs, as well as in other fields of endeavor, to take an active part in public affairs, thereby contributing to the people the benefit of their experience and judgment.

To aid in developing an informed public opinion on the major political, social, and economic problems of the Nation and an understanding by public officials of the importance and needs of private enterprise under our system of government.

To encourage a balanced economy within the United States in conformity with the principles of constitutional liberty.

To stimulate respect for the Constitution and the country's laws.

To stand at all times for the freedom and independence of the United States.

The National Economic Council seeks to protect the interests of taxpayers, to free the individual from unwarranted Government interference, and to guard the American way of life by resolute opposition to all forms of collectivism, including communism, fascism, or any other alien ideology.

What it does

The National Economic Council employs every tested and available modern method to reach actual and potential leaders of public thought, as well as the American people as a whole:

The Economic Council Letter, semimonthly, furnishes fresh, often exclusive information and ideas to thousands of readers, including individuals, corporations, libraries, churches, and colleges and universities.

The Economic Council Review of Books, monthly, keeps defenders of human freedom succinctly and accurately informed of trends in the world of books. These often foreshadow, or cause, public trends. It is brilliantly edited by Rose Wilder Lane.

Action Report, occasionally, to inform readers of council activities and other spot news in the battle for liberty.

Through appearances before congressional committees the council's representatives present persuasively and forcefully, in specific instances, the case for the American system.

Through publication of additional timely pamphlets and books, the council analyzes current problems and exposes unsound situations.

The NEC speakers bureau furnishes, by arrangement, able and informed speakers for pro-American groups and organizations.

The council seeks to do more than to confirm those already persuaded: through its effort many thousands have been awakened to the choice America must make between collectivism and freedom.

Officers: Merwin K. Hart, president; Constance G. Dall, assistant to the president; Ora A. Taylor, vice president; A. Margaret Schmid, vice president and assistant treasurer; McKay Twombly, secretary; Sibylla Schilling, assistant secretary; Glenn G. Munn, treasurer; Helen M. O'Connor, assistant treasurer.

Directors: George Ainsworth, Ira L. Anderson, Reginald Boote, Charles J. Brand, James C. Bronner, S. M. Brown, Walter O. Caldwell, Jr., George H. Cless, Jr., Ernest L. Conant, Dr. George B. Cutten, Constance G. Dall, Charles G. Dawes, D. Boyd Devendorf, Robert B. Dresser, Clarence L. Fisher, Rudolph B. Flershem, J. H. Gipson, Dr. H. M. Griffith, Earl Harding, Merwin K. Hart, Edward A. Taylor, McKay Twombly, Dr. Harrison J. Weaver.

The council is supported by dues and contributions. Contributors include both individuals and corporations.

DR. GRIFFITH. The National Economic Council opposes ratification of this treaty. It does so, first, upon peculiarly American grounds; second, upon grounds of stark realism; and, third, because there is a practical alternative.

NO ENTANGLING ALLIANCES

First: We oppose abandonment of the historic American foreign policy against permanent alliances. That policy, first commended by George Washington, was born of clear insight into the nature of political relationships and awareness of the lessons of human history. If you ratify this treaty, you rescind the Declaration of Independence. American freedom of action will be gone. Surrender of freedom of action may well lead to our death as a Nation.

For the third time in a generation a group of hopelessly confused people is leading the United States into war, step by step, while claiming at each step that the goal is peace. If the goal is peace, this treaty virtually guarantees that it can be reached only after long and bloody war. However sincerely the framers of this alliance may desire peace, the treaty itself, if ratified, makes war inevitable. War is not in the interest of the people of the United States. Popular support for this pact is derived only from the belief that it will avert war. The American people deserve to know the truth as to where they are being led.

BALANCE OF POWER

Second: America stands today at a supreme moment of decision. We dare not deal in phrases and slogans. Unless we achieve stark realism, we may perish.

This treaty abandons both the concepts of collective security and of sturdy national independence. In their place it embraces the philosophy of balances of power. Balances of power are among the oldest of political devices known to history, and of all perhaps most discredited. They do not avert wars. They create an atmosphere in which wars become certain. Only persons ignorant of history will assert otherwise. "Those who are ignorant of the past are doomed to repeat the mistakes of the past." Those now in charge of American foreign policy should not blindly lead us into an ancient folly.

This particular balance-of-power arrangement is folly compounded. It would be of advantage to us in any future conflict only if it added to our own strength such additional strength as to give us overwhelming preponderance of power. It does not do this. It does the opposite. It obliges us to agree to defend what we have not the power to defend. It obliges us to military, economic, and financial burdens which are too heavy for our economy to carry. It involves, in a word, support of "allies" who are liabilities not assets, and consequent fatal overextension of our resources. If we have a will to perish, this is the way to do it.

War, like politics—of which war is only the extension—is "the art of the possible." This treaty commits us to attempting the impossible. It supposes that it is possible for America to be: (1) Policeman to the world; (2) armorer to half the world; (3) financier to half the world. We simply do not have the resources to do these things, and you cannot create such resources by voting to ratify this treaty. They do not exist. If we act as if they do exist when they do not, then we are headed for final oblivion.

It has been argued that since the rulers of the Soviet Union ostensibly oppose this treaty, they fear it. I suggest the opposite. Nothing could be so well calculated to advance their global plans as fatal overextension of our own resources. I suggest that their opposition is designed to push us into the treaty by psychological reaction, not to keep us out. We should not fall for this entrapment.

It has been suggested that the treaty be ratified but that only moderate supplies of arms be given our new allies. This folly would be as great as the folly of overextension. It would awe no potential enemy. It would, rather, mean that the countries of western Europe, one by one, would adapt themselves realistically to the actualities of power politics. Seeing that we are not prepared to give them the minimum necessary for their defense, they would make the best deal possible with the nearest center of preponderant power. All our billions in gifts would then have been wasted. Nor should we be so naive as to imagine this impossible: Human nature being what it is, we cannot buy love or future favor. Mature nations act only from self-interest.

This, then, is our inexorable dilemma: If we ratify the pact and supply less aid than is necessary, in the decisive moment we will find we have no allies. If we try to supply all that is necessary for our allies and their possessions, we overextend ourselves into disaster. Either way, we lose.

ALTERNATIVE TO ATLANTIC TREATY

Third: There is a practical alternative to this treaty. It is not perfect. There is no guaranty of absolute safety in our predatory world. But it is infinitely more intelligent than bankrupting ourselves to create a balance of power which, instead of averting war, will insure war.

- (1) Preserve American freedom of action.
- (2) Root out every Communist and Communist sympathizer from our Government and its agencies, under heavy penalties.
- (3) Make a real Western Hemisphere defense zone. Its outposts should be as far-flung as geography and politics will allow. Bases should be secured at least in Spain. The Iberian Peninsula is probably the only area on the Continent capable of sustained defense. A Western Hemisphere defense zone can be created without the alliance, without national bankruptcy or socialization of our own economy. Such defense is within our means.
- (4) Strip our own economic decks for action by reducing our own Government expense and rejecting the whole Truman program for a socialized, welfare state.
- (5) Recognize that it is not in our power to defend everybody. We do not, with or without the treaty, have power to prevent the U. S. S. R. from occupying most of western Europe if it decides to do so. Even if the U. S. S. R. should occupy western Europe without a general war, the tragedy will not be so great as the alternatives that would follow adoption of the Atlantic Pact. Soviet occupation would not be permanent. Conquerors are normally beaten, not by external force, but by the weaknesses and internal contradictions of their own system. In attempting to engorge both Asia and western Europe, the U. S. S. R. will be trying to digest too much. It will be doing precisely what we are in danger of doing in the Atlantic Pact—overextending itself. Within a few years this will become apparent. It will be the U. S. S. R. rather than the U. S. A. which will be weakening by overexten-sion. And when freedom-loving peoples at last revolt, their case will be infinitely more hopeful than if the Continent had first been blasted by atomic war.

If this strategy is followed, it is probable that we will never have to fight the U. S. S. R. at all. Doubtless they expect and want to rule the world. But they do not have the resources required to conquer and rule the world, unless America first exhausts its power to resist, then falls from within. With a Europe and an Asia in ferment behind them, with their own people restive, the men of the Kremlin would think long before assaulting a unified, homogeneous core of armed power such as we can create in the Western Hemisphere.

If we ratify the treaty, war is inevitable and ruin almost certain. If we reject the treaty and follow the program just outlined, war is not inevitable and may be averted altogether. If it comes nevertheless, we shall be ready, not overextended and weakened by adventures beyond our power. Such a war we could win.

America is earth's last great island of freedom. In this moment of decision we should preserve its freedom, husband its resources, see to its defenses, and humble ourselves in dependence upon Almighty God who "hath made and preserved us a nation."

The CHAIRMAN. You take the place of Mr. Hart, I believe; Mr. Merwin Hart?

Dr. GRIFFITH. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. One or two questions.

Is Mr. Charles G. Dawes, a member of the board of directors, a former Vice President of the United States?

Dr. GRIFFITH. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. And is Mr. Ernest L. Conant a lawyer in New York City, or a professor in one of the universities?

Dr. GRIFFITH. No. You are thinking of the president of Harvard.

Senator DONNELL. No, I am not thinking of him. There was an Ernest L. Conant who practiced law in New York for some years, and specialized among matters related to Cuba and Central American matters.

Dr. GRIFFITH. I cannot answer that with certainty. I think he is retired.

Senator DONNELL. With regard to Mr. Merwin K. Hart, would you tell us very briefly what is his background and education and experience?

Dr. GRIFFITH. He is the president of our Economic Council. His educational background is that he attended the St. Paul School and Harvard University.

Senator DONNELL. What has been his experience?

Dr. GRIFFITH. He has been a lawyer and also in the insurance business and, since 1930, the president of this organization.

Senator DONNELL. Where is he located now?

Dr. GRIFFITH. New York City.

Senator DONNELL. Does he put in all of his time as president of the organization?

Dr. GRIFFITH. Oh, yes.

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

Senator DONNELL. And yourself, Dr. Griffith. I notice you have the title of "Doctor." What is that, a doctor of medicine or a doctor of what?

Dr. GRIFFITH. No.

Senator DONNELL. Just give us briefly your educational background and experience.

Dr. GRIFFITH. I have attended the University of California, University of California Law School, Princeton Theological Seminary; I hold the degrees, since you want to know them, of A. B., LL. B., Ph. D., and D. D.

Senator DONNELL. Have you practiced the profession of the ministry?

Dr. GRIFFITH. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. What denomination?

Dr. GRIFFITH. Presbyterian.

Senator DONNELL. Where and for how long a time did you practice the profession?

Dr. GRIFFITH. For about 15 years in Canada and also in Pennsylvania.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL, INC., BEFORE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE ON THE ATLANTIC PACT, THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1949

THE ATLANTIC PACT

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES

"Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation?—Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground?—Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?" (Washington's Farewell Address.)

To the People of the United States:

We have arrived at a decisive moment in American history. The question involved in ratification of the North Atlantic Pact is this: Shall we, by interweaving our destiny with that of western Europe, surrender American sovereignty? Or, shall the pact be rejected and our independence be maintained?

Let our choice be clear. We can have the pact and surrender American independence. We can keep our independence and reject the pact. We cannot have both.

No matter how skillfully it may be denied, adoption of the pact means we surrender our own right to decide, ourselves, the destiny of the United States. Like most questions raised by the internationalists, this question is purposely beclouded. They do not frankly say now that ratification of the pact will mean the die is cast. But at some future time, they will contend that America is already committed.

ARE YOU TOLD THE TRUTH?

Few news writers will tell the American people the stark nature of this decision. Already you, the people, are in process of being utterly misinformed, as when you are told by men who ought to know better that the pact exists, not to wage war, but to wage peace, which is meaningless.

The pact is a show of force, wherein the gage of battle is flung upon the doorstep of the Kremlin. That peace may be the object of those who fling it down does not alter the nature of the act. In throwing down that gage, we liquidate the experiment in independence begun July 4, 1776. Ratification of the alliance will be the act of repeal of the Declaration of Independence. Our destiny will then depend upon others.

That is the real issue. Let the battle be fought out upon it, not with phony slogans, and phony, misleading issues. Let the maintenance or surrender of American independence be decided on the merits of the case. But let us not surrender our American independence upon the supposition that the alliance will preserve it. If we must walk to the block, let us not go blindfolded.

Now, if ever, the future of the American Republic depends upon achievement of utter realism. And our Nation is today as never before the ark of freedom's foundation in the all-but-universal deluge of our century. If America falls, freedom falls.

If this alliance would help preserve America, we should be for it even if it involved a break with tradition. But it will not help preserve America. Its effect will be the very opposite: it will mean the destruction of America. The pact is a measure neither of intelligence nor necessity, but another crowning evidence of the incompetence and culpable ignorance of those in charge of American policy at the very top level.

WHERE IS THE INTELLIGENCE?

First, let's clear away some underbrush. The good intentions of some supporters of the pact are immaterial. The road to hell is paved with good intentions. Sincerity is no substitute for intelligence. The noblest of men can be killed if he steers his car over a cliff in the naive belief he is on the highway. Mere good intent is no evidence the good intender is a realist.

The Atlantic Pact is a final repudiation of the basic concepts of the United Nations. With this step, America abandons the philosophy of collective security and embraces the philosophy of balance-of-power alliances. No words of UN employees, delegates or anybody else can obscure this fact. All the pious talk about the pact being within the framework of the charter is eyewash, and every informed person knows it.

The National Economic Council has never had faith in the two attempts of our times to guarantee peace through collective security. It was never really collective, and it brought more danger than security. The League of Nations was always more of a net irritant in world affairs than an emollient. The fiction that its failure was due to the absence of the United States from its membership is palpably absurd. Its failure was due simply to the fact that the vital interests of its members were not identical but divergent, and each nation acted to serve what it believed to be its own vital interests—as anybody but an imbecile should have been able to predict.

The same situation developed in the UN, only much more quickly. Collective security is a dangerous illusion so long as divergent interests persist. So-called statesmen who ignore this primary fact are barely competent to be village selectmen.

Today, statesmen of this or smaller caliber who happen to have charge of the fate of millions of people, find these facts pressing in upon them. But they refuse to admit their miscalculation, even while abandoning the whole stupid mess. They have talked about collective security so loud and so long that in the very act of burying it, they tell us that the new pact is within the framework of the charter.

Nor has the National Economic Council any faith in the new balance of power. It is a bankrupt solution offered by bankrupts to conceal their failures.

Alliances to create power balances are about the oldest device known to history. Millenniums ago, Egypt and the various great powers that succeeded each other in the East, habitually built up balance-of-power combinations against each other. They were all designed to preserve peace, and they invariably resulted in war. The balance-of-power philosophy has dogged rulers of nations from the beginning of time, and of all the devices of statecraft it is perhaps the most discredited. The nearest it ever came to success was when in the latter half of the nineteenth and the first fourteen years of the twentieth century, Britain kept the continent of Europe in uneasy balance. But even that apparent success turned into the greatest disaster of recorded history. It gave us the two world wars. So now we are going to try it again!

HOW BALANCE UNBALANCES

The reasons why the balance-of-power theory always fails are simple. It exacerbates irritations between nations by investing every dispute with a graver possible consequence. Each side of the balance grows more suspicious of the other. General wars are made easier to start because, if a nation on one side gets into a dispute with a nation on the other, all nations of both combinations are automatically drawn in. Conflicts, instead of being localized, become universalized. Gasoline, not water, is brown on the fire. Small nations belonging to one combination, emboldened by their alliance with more powerful nations, become truculent. Human nature being what it is, combined with the fact that disputes always arise, makes the final result mathematically predictable. The perfect example of this is how the nations were drawn one by one into World War I over a local dispute between Austria and Serbia. Had Serbia not been under the protection of Russia, and had Austria not been allied with Germany, there would have been no world war in 1914.

Knowledge of such facts by Washington and the other Founding Fathers prompted them to urge their own generation, and their posterity (ourselves) not to enter entangling alliances. Their views were not parochial. They were the result of profound insight into the lessons of history. Nor were they in any essential sense based upon the existence of the Atlantic barrier, as has so often been falsely represented. Washington knew that the Atlantic was no barrier, but a naval highway. Had he not just led a victorious war against an enemy from the other shore? The reason why Washington's advice is different from that of our current statesmen is that those who control our destiny now, are ignoring history. Those who ignore the past are doomed to repeat the errors of the past.

But it may be asked, "If you are against 'collective security' and also against a balance-of-power alliance, what are you for?"

Theodore Roosevelt once said, "Speak softly and carry a big stick." Give no provocation you can avoid but be prepared to fight if you must.

The so-called North Atlantic alliance exactly reverses this sound counsel. We are not walking softly. We are marching to rolling drums. Nor do we have a big stick, though we are talking about getting one.

The atomic bomb, contrary to popular superstition, is not the kind of big stick which military planners need for the alliance. The atomic bomb is a terrifying weapon, and a major factor in all military calculations. But it is a commonplace of present-day military thinking that if the nations of western Europe are to resist the Soviet Union in case of war, and thus be profitable members of the Alliance, they must be "re-armed." That is, entirely apart from the bomb, the armies of our European partners might as well not exist unless they are adequately equipped to offer real resistance to the Russians in the field. For the atom bomb could not be decisive against armies deployed for action.

What degree of rearmament would prevent Russia from rolling to the Atlantic in a fortnight? Military experts say that it would take at least 15 armored divisions and 50 divisions of other types to hold off the Red Army for any considerable time. That is about the minimum, and more would be better.

Equipment for a lesser force would be 100 percent wasted—would be like trying to span a 100-foot chasm with a 40-foot bridge.

NOW, LOOK AT THE BUDGET

What would such adequate rearmament cost? That is a vital question, because there are limits to what the American economy can stand. Even if the idea were sound, we would still have to inquire first whether we have the means to carry it out. Unless we are ready to surrender our liberties to a slave state of our own.

The present cost of equipping one armored division is about $250,000,000. So 15 would cost us $3,750,000,000. That does not include the cost of training personnel, pay and maintenance of men and machines, or ammunition and gasoline. There is a pious hope in Washington that our Allies might supply these items—but we had better forget that. Only our Marshall-plan money now keeps the budgets of the Socialist countries of western Europe in anything resembling balance. How could they shoulder the cost of rearmament?

Yet the armored divisions are only the beginning. Fifty other divisions must be equipped, too. We must provide them with vast quantities of matériel whose cost to us in dollars would be perhaps $15,000,000,000, but whose cost in exhaustion of our own material resources could be disastrous. Most of the equipment would have to come from the United States because western Europe cannot manufacture such items in quantity. Marshall-plan and rearmament requirements for Europe could easily cost 30 to 50 billions during the next 4 years.

This does not take account of the military budget of the United States of America itself, now running above 16 billions a year. If the Atlantic Pact is ratified, with rearmament following on its heels, and if any important part of Mr. Truman's social-welfare program is adopted, the Federal peacetime budget could average 60 billions a year for the next 4 years.

Two urgent questions arise.

First, can our economy support such expenditures?

In our considered judgment, it cannot. Such sums will place a fatal strain on the American economy—which is precisely what Soviet Russia would like to see.

It is true that we spent more during the late war. But the strain of that effort is still being carried by the economy. The new expenditures will merely be added to the strain and depletion of resources resulting from the old effort.

"WE'LL TAX AND TAX"

To get such sums, we must either increase taxes above the point of diminishing returns, or else we must resort to vast deficit financing—confiscation by inflation. Either course would destroy the American Republic. The only way in which the economic machine could function would be by harsh bureaucratic control and operation of industry. That would bring us socialism overnight. We would become, like Soviet Russia or Hitler's Germany, a one-party country. For with 1 to 2 million carefully placed Federal employees added to the more than 2 million already in office, who is so foolish as to imagine the Republican Party or any other party could wrest control from the gang in power in the administration today? Then, by aid of the pending Economic Stability Act, the American people would have become veritably enslaved.

The controls would simply be the use of force to hide the fact that the whole economy is running at a ruinous deficit—a deficit which at some day of reckoning must be paid either in diluted money or in the ruin of Americans who have savings upon which they depend. Control of a deficit-operated economy means only expropriation (that is, stealing) of goods that others have accumulated. The politicians may control, but they will not pay. The people will pay with impoverishment.

Ratification of the North Atlantic Pact, then, followed by the minimum appropriations necessary to give it any chance of being militarily successful, will be beyond the means of our economy. It will also lead straight to state socialism in America. And state socialism will mean an end to liberty for everybody except the bureaucrats.

But let us ask a further question: Will Congress appropriate the money?

Almost certainly it will not appropriate the huge sums mentioned above. It will probably compromise. And if Congress compromises, what will be the result?

Compromise will be disaster compounded. If we give western Europe less than the minimum necessary to hold off the Red Army, we guarantee that at some future date, to be decided by the Politburo alone, western Europe can be occupied. Then, if we have anything left, we shall face the task of again organizing vast armies to retake the Continent for our allies.

But this is precisely what the alliance is supposed and intended to prevent. The peoples of western Europe are not interested in that kind of war, even if victorious. They do not want to be occupied, then liberated. They want not to be occupied. The only reason this alliance interests them at all is that in it they see a hope of avoiding Soviet occupation.

Yet, if we give them less than the minimum that they now request—or demand—they cannot resist occupation.

The leaders of the western European governments may be foggy social theorists, but as to occupation they can be counted upon to be stark realists. The great majority of their people wish to avoid occupation. What will happen if they see that, after all the fanfare and oratory, America does not give them enough to defend themselves? They are almost certain to try to get the best terms they can from the Soviet Union.

To ratify the alliance, then, but not to implement it with vast armament, will infallibly result in throwing western Europe into the embrace of the Soviets. All Marshall plan funds will have been wasted. Whatever armament we have sent will be under the control of those who have entered the Soviet orbit.

WE'D BETTER FACE IT NOW

The alternatives we have set forth are real, and we had better learn to live with them. We can bankrupt our economy to provide western Europe with the minimum necessary, and thereby plunge ourselves irremediably into state socialism. Or, we can give western Europe less than the minimum, and insure that those nations will presently make terms with Soviet Russia.

But the first alternative is not so simple as it sounds. Even if we should make the sacrifices necessary to arm western Europe, we could not be sure of stopping the Soviet Union.

Communist infiltration in western Europe has gone too far for us to count upon an undivided effort from our allies in case war should begin even after they have been adequately armed. There is no guaranty that both Italy and France would not be rent by civil war of such a nature as to paralyze their armies and render them impotent to protect their frontiers. Indeed, such civil war is highly probable.

Even what would happen in Britain is clouded with doubt. The Labor Government there is still supplying both Russia and Poland with implements and machinery essential for war. Infiltration of Communists and Communist sympathizers within the Labor Government is much greater than commonly understood. There is grave reason to believe that in Great Britain, Communist agents could seize or destroy vital communications and power centers and take other action to prevent any effective war effort being launched from Britain.

Who, then, would march against the Soviet Union on the Continent? Would the Red tide be stemmed by the armies of Luxemburg, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Belgium, and Portugal?

Another fact that complicates the rearming of western Europe lies in the power of the Soviet Union itself. Are we so naive as to imagine that the masters of the Kremlin will sit by idle if they see us actually building up preponderant military power in the West?

And it deserves note that in the framing of the Atlantic Pact, Spain has been left out. Yet Spain is potentially the strongest anti-Communist country on the Continent of Europe. The leaving out of Spain is a clear indication that Marxist influences had a powerful say in the framing of the Atlantic Pact, just as they have had in our public affairs, foreign and domestic, for many years past.

TO BOMB—OR NOT TO BOMB

Doubtless Russian cities, in the event of war, would disappear under atomic attack—but what strategic effect would that have? It could not destroy the Red Army in the field. It could not prevent or even slow the occupation. And, after the occupation, would we bomb Paris, Rome, the Hague, Brussels, Copenhagen, or Oslo with atomic weapons? Or London?

There is reason to believe that the Soviet Union has deliberately counted the cost of atomic warfare and decided that its great cities are expendable. But even if we should bomb every important city both in the Soviet Union and in western Europe, we would still have to land and occupy a continent in which frustration, privation, and hatred of us for atom bombing our friends would be obstacles perhaps more formidable than the Red Army. Nor is there any guaranty that the great cities of the United States would escape atomic bombing—which in our case would be infinitely more serious for us than the destruction of Russian cities for the Soviets.

THE AMERICAN ALTERNATIVE

The alternative we propose is not perfect. It is not guaranteed to win in any struggle between us and the U. S. S. R. But in this world there can be no absolute guaranty of safety. We must intelligently do the best we can, keep alert, and place our cause in God's hand.

First. We should preserve America's own freedom of action. The Atlantic Pact should be rejected, no matter how much loss of face some of our bureaucrats in the State Department may suffer.

Second. We should at once and with drastic thoroughness proceed to root out every Communist and Communist fellow traveler from Government service. They should be given a week to resign, and after that should be subject to the death penalty if they have not declared themselves. We should immediately outlaw the Communist Party, take its key personnel into custody, and keep strict watch upon the others. Nothing else will so convince the Soviet leadership we mean business. The firmer we are with Communists and their sympathizers in America, the more respect will the U. S. S. R. have for us.

Third. We should take steps to make real a Western Hemisphere defense zone. Its outposts should be as far-flung as geography and politics will allow. Bases should be secured, at least in Spain, which is probably (with Portugal) the only area in western Europe capable of sustained defense. A sound military defense can be made for the Western Hemisphere without the North Atlantic Alliance, and it will be within our capacity and means. Nor need it result in the socialization of our own economy.

Fourth. We should drastically cut the bureaucracy in our own Government, thus releasing large numbers of persons for productive economic activities as well as reducing Federal expense. We should reject once and for all the whole Truman program for a socialized welfare state. This will be stripping our decks for action.

Fifth. While not being indifferent to the fate of free peoples anywhere, we should become reconciled to the reality that it does not lie within our means or power to see to the defense of everybody. If the U. S. S. R. occupies western Europe, it will be a tragedy. But the tragedy will not be as great for them or for us as the alternatives that would follow adoption of the North Atlantic Alliance.

Nor would Soviet conquest of Europe be permanent. Students of the history of empires know well that the conqueror is normally beaten, not by external force, but by the weaknesses and internal contradictions of the system he himself sets up. In our opinion the U. S. S. R., in taking over Europe and Asia, will be attempting far too much. Within a few years this will become apparent. And when freedom-loving peoples at last revolt against bondage, their case will be much more hopeful than if the Continent had first been blasted by bitter, atomic war.

THE OVERSTUFFED GIANT

Indeed we think that if this strategy is followed, we may never have to fight the U. S. S. R. at all. Doubtless they expect and want to rule the world. But with more than they can digest in Europe and Asia, their conquests will weaken rather than strengthen them. The very rigidity of the Soviet leaders in not permitting the smallest variation from their own blueprints among satellites, can be their undoing. And the existence of a unified, homogeneous core of armed power in our own hemisphere will dissuade them from attacking us if they have two fermenting continents to hold down.

American participation in two World Wars has, on balance, multiplied the evil results of both wars. While we went into the first with the best of motives, and were slyly and deceptively maneuvered into the second, if we permit alien influence to shape our course now, then America is doomed.

She will have been reconquered by those tyrannies from which our ancestors fled the Old World to escape.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Libby, how short is your statement going to be?

Mr. FREDERICK J. LIBBY. I would like 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. You cannot have 30 minutes. We will talk it over with you at the recess.

Mr. Ordower?

STATEMENT OF SIDNEY L. ORDOWER ON BEHALF OF THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF ILLINOIS

Mr. ORDOWER. I have a statement which will take just about 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. We want you to make it short. We have had four or five representatives of the Progressive Party here. We cannot have all the membership. We have had most of them here already. But I do not want to have all of them.

Mr. ORDOWER. I would like to also testify, if I may, as an individual veteran.

The CHAIRMAN. Can't you file your statement and then make a brief oral statement?

Mr. ORDOWER. It won't take long. Couldn't I read it? I came all the way from Chicago, sir. I would appreciate it.

The CHAIRMAN. We want to confirm to the authorities of the Progressive Party that we cannot have every one of their members here to testify. We have had three or four already.

Mr. ORDOWER. It is the first chance I have had to come to Washington in a long time.

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad you came to Washington, of course, but this is not a pleasure trip. This is a business enterprise at the moment.

Whom do you represent?

Mr. ORDOWER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my name is Sidney L. Ordower. I reside at 3446 West Thirteenth Place in Chicago, Ill. By profession I am a radio commentator and I represent the Progressive Party in Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you authorized to represent them and designated to represent them?

Mr. ORDOWER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is the president of the Progressive Party in Illinois?

Mr. ORDOWER. The chairman of the Cook County Central Committee is Mr. George Cermack, and I am the official representative of that organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. ORDOWER. In addition to testifying for that organization against the ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty, I should also like to speak as an individual veteran of World War II.

Perhaps it would be well for me to describe briefly my service during the recent war. In 1940, I volunteered as a private in the Army the first day of the draft and served for more than 5 years in the Infantry, finally being discharged as a captain.

For more than 3½ years I served overseas in England, France, Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, Germany, Austria, and north Africa, and was commissioned in Europe. I participated in five major battles and hold a number of decorations.

I tell you this, not because I look for any special praise for this service to my country, but to point out that I have seen the horror of war first hand. Both my wife and child were killed during the war by a V-2 rocket in England and I tell you, gentlemen, that I want no part of another holocaust, one which will mean misery, suffering, and devastation far greater than anything witnessed in the past.

If this has not happened already, you probably will have official representatives of veterans' organizations testifying in behalf of the North Atlantic Pact. They will tell you that we must prepare for any possible contingency—for war, if necessary, with the Soviet Union.

I do not represent a veterans' organization, but I tell you that the veterans of World War II did not fight the last war merely to waste their lives in world war III. No matter what their political opinions might be, the vast majority of veterans fought for decent homes, jobs, and the opportunity to raise their families in peace, without worrying about an atom bomb falling on their head.

THE ATLANTIC PACT AS A WAR PACT

The Atlantic Pact, gentlemen, is a war pact, not a peace pact. It will create an armaments race which can only result in war. No military alliance in history has stopped war. Its very purpose is to prepare for war.

But let us examine the arguments that the Atlantic Pact is a defense treaty, designed to stop aggression. If this is so, why is it that Norway, which borders the Soviet Union, is a signatory to the pact? If it is a defense pact, how do we account for the inclusion of Portugal, which is not a member of the United Nations and which is headed by a Fascist dictator, Salazar? If it is a defense pact, why is it that even now efforts are being made to bring Fascist Spain into the treaty?

General Omar Bradley gave the answer not long ago. It is a military answer. And Representative Clarence Cannon, the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, also gave the answer on the floor of the House on April 13 when he stated, according to the New York Times of April 14 [reading]:

Moscow and every center in Russia, we must hit within 1 week after the war starts, and it can be done only by land-based planes such as we now have.

With the signing of the North Atlantic Pact we would have ample land bases. We will absolutely demoralize the enemy. We will destroy all his lines of communications. We will blast at the centers of operation, and then let our allies send the army in—other boys, not our boys—to hold the ground we win.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom are you quoting?

Mr. ORDOWER. Representative Cannon.

The CHAIRMAN. Make that clear. Don't confuse that with General Bradley's speech.

Mr. ORDOWER. I am not. This is Representative Cannon's statement.

INCLUSION OF SPAIN

And gentlemen, I must protest the statements made by Senator Connally, chairman of this committee, and by Senator Vandenberg, calling for the resumption of diplomatic relations between the United States and Spain. As one who fought in the recent war, I say that it is unspeakable to think of allying ourselves with Fascist Spain or to give aid and comfort to Franco by resuming diplomatic relations with his Government.

Let us remember that Spain assisted our enemy in the last war. Spain provided a Blue Division to Nazi Germany to fight against our wartime ally, the U. S. S. R.

No matter what our differences with the Soviet Union, only by establishing a firm friendship based on mutual understanding with our wartime allies, and not by negotiating with countries like Portugal and Spain, can we secure the peace of the world.

During the recent war we were taught many things in the Army. In addition to the use of physical weapons, we were also told how to arm ourselves with ideas. We were told, for example, that the only possible way to defeat the enemy was through the unity of the Big Three: The United States, Great Britain, and the U. S. S. R. We were told that only by building a strong United Nations with the unity of the big powers as its core, could we establish an enduring peace. We were told that we must denazify and decartelize Germany if we were to prevent future aggression by that country.

We were told that it was possible to get along with the Soviet Union and other countries with whom we fought, despite such political and economic differences as might exist. We were told that those nations which united against the common enemy during the war could and must unite to preserve the peace of the world. We were told also that the war was fought to defend our democratic way of life and that when we returned home we would have the opportunity of extending democracy.

I contend that these policies of the Army and of our Government during the war were honorable and democratic ones. What has happened to them?

POLICY IN GERMANY

Even while the war was going on there were American officers in high places who talked of the next war with Russia. Even before the end of the war our present policy in Germany was being applied. Instead of denazifying and decartelizing Germany we were putting important Nazis back into power and preventing the breaking up of the huge cartels which were even then envisioned for use in a future war with Russia. The recent report issued by the Ferguson Commission should prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that instead of democratizing Germany and destroying its military potential, we are giving comfort to those same forces who were in great measure responsible for World War II.

Since the end of the war we have been supporting reactionary governments in China, Greece, and Turkey. We have influenced the elections in France and Italy. Through Marshall-plan aid we are making the countries of western Europe dance to our tune instead of giving them genuine aid through the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. You are against the Marshall plan?

Mr. ORDOWER. I am. I am for aid through the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the United Nations any aid they can give?

Mr. ORDOWER. I think if we all pooled our resources we could do it. There is a Commission in the UN, the United Nations Commission for Europe, of which Russia is a member and where there is no veto power, and perhaps that might be the place to discuss the aid. I do not say it is an easy job, but we did not even discuss the granting of aid on a nonpolitical basis in the United Nations, and we now are attempting to create a military alliance which could kill the United Nations and guarantee war.

CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

The best way to judge the futility and madness of our post-war foreign policy is to examine its effects on our everyday needs. Where are the homes that we were promised would be built after the war? Millions of veterans and nonveterans alike virtually walk the streets in search of roofs over their heads. And even today, 3 years after the war is over, we talk of building a paltry number of homes compared to the millions we need to house our families.

What about the millions who are unemployed in America today and can't find work? You probably know that approximately 750,000 veterans are out of work today and that more than 1,000,000 veterans, as of December 1948, used up their unemployment compensation under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act. Even now, unemployment compensation under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act is due to end this July, not only for those who have received it but even for those who have not received any benefits.

Since the end of the war, we have seen unprecedented attacks on the Negro people. Isaac Woodard, a Negro veteran who served his country honorably, had his eyes gouged out shortly after the war, and his case is but one example of the lynchings, beatings, and general denial of fundamental rights which the Negro people have suffered. I wish we had as much concern for guaranteeing human rights for all the people of our country as we claim to have for those who live in eastern Europe.

Instead of fulfilling the mandate given to Congress by the people, we have seen the emasculation of rent control, the sell-out on civil rights, and the betrayal of labor.

But also important is the fact that while we pursue this kind of foreign policy, our civil liberties are slowly but surely being taken from us. Bills designed to control our thoughts and to kill our most fundamental rights are today lodged in congressional committees and have been introduced in State legislatures throughout our Nation.

I might point out that this was the pattern in Nazi Germany—first to establish a police state and then to go to war—with Russia. Are we to follow that pattern here in America? Are we to take this leaf from the tragic book of Germany, Italy, and Japan? I don't believe the people of America want Mundt-Nixon bills, Mundt-Ferguson bills or Broyles bills as they are called in my own State.

POLICY OF COOPERATION

But if we are to stop the militarization of America, the loss of our civil liberties, the tightening of our belts, we're going to have to adopt a different kind of foreign policy, the kind of a policy which will permit us to use the billions we are now spending for military purposes, to say nothing of the additional billions if this pact is ratified, for social welfare programs.

I say we must reject the Atlantic Pact and return to the legacy given us by Franklin Delano Roosevelt. This is what he said [reading]:

We either work with the other great nations or we might some day have to fight them, and I'm against that.

Today we are faced with a preeminent fact that, if civilization is to survive, we must cultivate the science of human relationships—the ability of all peoples, of all kinds, to live together and work together, in the same world, in peace.

The work, my friends, is peace * * * an end to the beginnings of all wars; yes, an end, forever, to this impractical, unrealistic settlement of the differences between government by the mass killing of peoples. * * *

As Roosevelt stated so eloquently, wars are no solutions for the problems of mankind. Military pacts will not provide housing and the other fundamental needs of the people. We must reestablish peaceful, friendly relations between the United States and the U. S. S. R. Then let each nation compete in the most democratic tradition. Let us see which nation can prove the most homes for its people, the finest health and education programs, the fullest employment, the most democratic social, political and economic well-being. Let us build a strong United Nations which will eliminate war and guarantee to the peoples of the world a chance to build a better life for themselves.

Gentlemen, the people yearn for peace. You bear a great responsibility. I urge you to reject this warlike military alliance and to use your influence to start negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union at the highest level. Stalin has offered to sit down with President Truman and discuss our differences. We should accept this offer.

The CHAIRMAN. When did he offer to do that?

Mr. ORDOWER. He did that through Kingsbury Smith.

The CHAIRMAN. Was Kingsbury Smith representing anyone except his newspaper?

Mr. ORDOWER. I recall President Truman made a statement during the election campaign that he would make—

The CHAIRMAN. I did not ask you that. I asked you if Kingsbury Smith represented anybody besides his newspaper.

Mr. ORDOWER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that is the right way, if Mr. Stalin wants a conference, to tell Kingsbury Smith about it, instead of addressing a communication to the President of the United States?

Mr. ORDOWER. I say, sir, that as a veteran of World War II, if Mr. Truman is sincere in his desire to meet with Mr. Stalin, I do not think protocol is the thing that should be considered. I do not say there should be a loss of face. President Truman does not wish to go to Russia. Let them sit down in a neutral capital, Berlin. I do not say we have to accede to everything Stalin says with respect to sitting down, but at least let us meet the offer in some other way.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go ahead.

Mr. ORDOWER. I also urge, gentlemen, that these hearings be extended indefinitely in order to allow the most exhaustive testimony to be presented from all sides, and I strongly recommend support of Mr. Wallace's suggestion in that no action be taken until after the May 23 meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers has been completed.

If we can even begin to secure an agreement on the fundamental problem of Germany, there will be no need for the move now under consideration by your committee.

Mr. Chairman, that is the end of my statement. I thank you for the opportunity of testifying.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Did you deliver substantially these same statements and remarks over the radio?

Mr. ORDOWER. Yes, at one time or another, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That's what I thought.

Did you take an active part stumping and speaking over the radio in the last Presidential campaign?

PROGRESSIVE PARTY PROGRAM

Mr. ORDOWER. I ran for Congress in my own district. I will say this, sir: I have not made this a political statement. I could come here and make a diatribe against the Republican and Democratic Parties. You have already heard political statements. I am speaking not just as one who feels the Progressive Party is the answer to many of the problems we have, but I am speaking as an ordinary citizen as well, as I mentioned once before. I don't wear the ribbons on my breast. That is not my purpose in coming here. But I did participate in it. Yes; I do support Mr. Wallace. I do believe his program is the best kind of program for America.

But I also realize this: That it isn't just the Progressive Party or the people who belong to the Progressive Party who are involved. There are many people who differ, perhaps, as to how we shall achieve the best economic, social, and political living for America. But I think most of the people do not want war, and that is what I am pleading with you for. I believe this is a step in that direction. I hope that perhaps I have tried to get that point of view across, and that I am not just considered as a politician, because, frankly, I am not that. I never participated in politics in my life until after I came home from the Army. The only reason I have is because I think it is one of the ways we may be able to right some of the wrongs in America.

The CHAIRMAN. We applaud your distinguished record, and we applaud your statement that you are against war. We do not want any more war.

Mr. ORDOWER. The question is how to stop it.

Senator VANDENBERG. There can be an honest difference of opinion as to the ways to maintain peace, can there not?

Mr. ORDOWER. Oh, I dare say. If there were not an honest difference of opinion you would not be here and I would not be here in that sense.

Senator VANDENBERG. I mean that those who feel that the Atlantic Pact is the best means of arriving at precisely the result you seek may be just as conscientious about it as you are. You would concede that, would you not?

Mr. ORDOWER. I would like to answer that, Senator Vandenberg.

Senator VANDENBERG. Sure.

Mr. ORDOWER. I believe that there are many people, and I won't make definitions as to who proposed and who initiated it, who believe that perhaps this is necessary, that maybe this is the way to peace. But I also think that there are many people, and I don't care to name names, but I think from reading the press and hearing statements made in the Halls of Congress and by private individuals that there are many people who feel that war is inevitable, and this is the step toward that.

POSSIBILITY OF WAR

The point that I made before, that military alliances have never stopped war, if we believe that a war is justified, as we believe to a certain extent—many of us did; I did. That is why I volunteered for the Army, that it was necessary to go to war with Germany, Italy, and Japan—then you prepare for war, and even the critics of Roosevelt's foreign policy are correct in saying that Roosevelt prepared for what he thought was inevitable.

I do not believe that a war is necessary with the Soviet Union, as I pointed out, despite the differences between our two countries which must be ironed out in an amicable way, in an honorable way, in a peaceful way. I say there is no need for it, particularly when we fought together, and I think that what has happened and will happen, too, is that we will be dividing the world so completely that war will eventually be inevitable, and that we are in a sense resigning ourselves to that kind of fate.

Just to end up on that, when we instituted the Truman doctrine and the Marshall plan we talked of containing communism. That was our philosophy. I do not agree with that particular philosophy, because I think after you get that you get other things. Then what happened? In the inaugural address made by President Truman he pointed out we were not just going to "contain" communism, we were going to fight communism. I do not mean to take his remarks completely out of context, but he did say that.

Even though you talk about developing the backward areas of the world, which I do not believe is a genuine program because it must be administered through the United Nations, it means that eventually you must use military weapons. You ratify the treaty. You have to implement the treaty with arms later on. You implement the treaty with arms and you are going to get a reaction from the Soviet Union. We will start an arms race, and where will it stop? That is the point I am making, and I think the crux of the whole issue, sir, is that there is a difference today as compared to going to war with Germany, with Italy, and with Japan, emphasizing that there are differences between the United States and Russia. I use those two countries in the main, but that we can, we have to try to, iron out those differences.

I do not believe this is the way. Particularly, I do not mean that I am taking Russia's side, but Russia looks upon this as an aggressive move. Well, if Russia is going to look upon this as an aggressive move, we are going to get other reactions to this kind of policy from her.

POSSIBILITY OF HONEST DIFFERENCE OF OPINION

Senator VANDENBERG. I think I understand your point of view. The question I asked you was quite simple and did not involve a complete reiteration of your argument. I have no disposition in the world to argue with you, because this is not the proper forum for it. I was simply suggesting to you that in your main objectives I would substantially agree. I do not think war is inevitable. I believe in a live and let live world. But I happen to think that there are substantial reasons for believing that the process of the proposed North Atlantic Pact is the surest and safest and simplest way of arriving at those results. I was only asking you whether you would concede to those who held that view the possibility of being conscientious about it.

Mr. ORDOWER. Oh, of course. Obviously there are many people who do, and I did say before, however, that I believed that perhaps some do not.

Senator VANDENBERG. I understand. And I only want to make this further comment on your reference to the restoration of the exchange of Ambassadors with Spain.

SPAIN AND THE ATLANTIC TREATY

Anything I have said on that subject is predicated on the fact that I do not believe that the withdrawal of ambassadors and the maintenance of all other diplomatic relationships is at all conclusive with respect to anything, and that it is rather a handicap to us. I do not think we would have been making any progress at all in Moscow if Ambassador Smith had not been there for the last 2 or 3 years. I think we have made some progress as a result of it. I am not in favor of the entry of Spain into the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. ORDOWER. I am glad to hear it.

Senator VANDENBERG. So I hope you can find some consolation in your criticism of the Senator from Michigan with respect to that aspect.

Mr. ORDOWER. I realize, and I hope I did not mean to imply, that you were for Spain coming into the pact. As a matter of fact I read your statement very carefully, and I realized you pointed out that this did not necessarily mean we agreed with the Government.

I would have this difference, sir, that there is a difference between having an Ambassador in the Soviet Union and having an Ambassador in Spain. Perhaps the difference may not be so acute as I see it. The difference goes back to the original argument I made, which I believe must be emphasized.

Senator VANDENBERG. I do not think you need to repeat it because I remember it very very well.

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

Senator DONNELL. What were your education and other experiences before World War II?

Mr. ORDOWER. Before World War II, so far as schools are concerned, I was a graduate from Trinity College in Hartford, Conn., and also studied dramatics and received my master's in economics from Syracuse University. Before the war I worked in radio and the theater, specialized in documentary works, education, and the presentation of ideas.

Senator DONNELL. Would you tell us, please, over what radio stations you have been serving?

Mr. ORDOWER. Before the war I did broadcast over the Columbia Broadcasting System, NBC both in New York and Syracuse, WSBL; out West, in Los Angeles, over the Don Lee studios. Since the war I have been to a great extent a radio commentator, although for a time I was executive secretary of the American Veterans Committee in Chicago. I want to emphasize that I do not represent that organization here, in case anybody gets down my neck. There is a difference of opinion between my position and that organization, of which I am a member. For the most part I have been a radio commentator on WJJD, which is an independent radio station in Chicago, and WAIT. I have broadcast from others individual programs, but the longest stretches have been on both those particular stations.

Senator DONNELL. Will you tell us, please, for the record, your age?

Mr. ORDOWER. I am 31.

Senator DONNELL. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

I may say just one word, supplementing what Senator Vandenberg said about the Ambassador to Spain.

AMBASSADOR TO SPAIN

We do not send ambassadors to foreign countries for their benefit. We send ambassadors there to represent the interests of the United States, to keep abreast of what is transpiring in that particular field, and that particular government, and to represent our business people who are trying to do business there. In no sense is the sending of an ambassador to a country an approval of its government. We had ambassadors in Japan when it was an imperialistic kingdom; we have had ambassadors in Russia under the Czars and under the present regime. We are not sending them over there as compliments, or to make nice courtesy calls. We are sending them over there to represent the United States and to serve the United States, and, as pointed out so well by Senator Vandenberg, we would not have had the relationship that we now have with Russia had it not been for our ambassadors there, including General Smith. He has accomplished a great deal toward adjusting the relationships.

So that my belief that we ought to have an ambassador in Spain is in no sense an approval of the Spanish Government. I do not approve of it. I do not approve of it at all, any more than I approve of a lot of governments to whom we have sent ambassadors. I have made no expression of any desire that it should be included in the Atlantic Pact. It is not in the pact. That is pretty good proof that they did not want it in the pact.

I wanted to submit that for the record.

All right; thank you very much.

Mr. Durr, how long is your statement?

Mr. DURR. It will take me about 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. We are pressed for time, and we are trying to cut short the hearings as much as we can, consistent with a full development of all sides. I notice Mr. Libby beaming over there. We will hear you, Mr. Libby. We hear you every time we have a hearing, so I suppose we have to hear you again.

Mr. DURR. I think we have a presentation of the kind that has not been made here before.

The CHAIRMAN. I was wondering if you could not put your statement in the record and you discuss it orally within a shorter period.

Mr. DURR. I will try to cut it down as much as I can, but I think to have a logical presentation I will have to follow it pretty closely.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Durr?

STATEMENT OF CLIFFORD DURR, PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL LAWYERS GUILD, ACCOMPANIED BY JOSEPH CROWN

Mr. DURR. I now live at a place called Seminary Hill, in Alexandria, Va. I am a member of the bar, now practicing here in Washington. Until June 30, 1948, I was a member of the Federal Communications Commission, and before that I was assistant general counsel of the RFC and general counsel of Defense Plant Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you reappointed as a member of the Federal Communications Commission?

Mr. DURR. I was tendered a reappointment, but I declined.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. We will go along and see how far we get.

Mr. DURR. I am appearing here as president of the National Lawyers Guild and appear here on behalf of that association.

The views I shall express on questions of policy were approved at the national convention of the guild in February 1949. The views I express on legal questions are based upon a memorandum of law prepared by our committee on international law and relations, copies of which I will now hand up to your committee and ask that it be incorporated in the record of this hearing.

The National Lawyers Guild has given its active support to the United Nations from the time of its organization. Our consultants were at the San Francisco Conference, which gave birth to the United Nations. We have been constant in our belief that, whatever its limitations, it is the best instrument yet devised to help in the peaceful settlement of disputes and in the maintenance of peace. We have supported those measures we believed would serve to strengthen the United Nations, and opposed those measures which seemed to us to move in the opposite direction.

CONSISTENCY OF PACT WITH CHARTER

We were glad to find in the text of the North Atlantic Pact, and the supporting statements which have been issued, assurances that all provisions of the proposed treaty are in accordance with and in furtherance of the provisions of the Charter. However, as a bar association, we felt that, in view of the grave importance of the pact to the peace of the world, we should study the question whether in fact and in law, the pact was consistent with the Charter and the basic legal principles which are its foundation.

Our careful study of that question has led us to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the assertions made to the contrary, the pact, in fundamental respects, violates salient provisions of the Charter. It is my purpose now to summarize the argument which is made in greater detail in our memorandum of law.

RESPONSIBILITY OF SECURITY COUNCIL

Under the Charter, the Security Council has primary responsibility for maintaining international peace. By article 24 the member states agreed to this. By article 39 the Security Council is vested with authority [reading]:

to determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression.

By articles 46 to 48 the Security Council is endowed with authority to take enforcement measures to deal with threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression. Article 53 expressly provides that [reading]:

no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without authorization of the Security Council.

Since a regional arrangement may not take enforcement action without prior authorization of the Security Council, obviously no individual state or any group of states may take enforcement action. Otherwise the restriction of article 53 would be meaningless.

The CHAIRMAN. You are quoting article 53. That does not include the provisions of article 51, does it?

Mr. DURR. Those are different provisions. I will discuss article 51, too.

In our view, the conclusion is, therefore, indisputable that if the measures contemplated by the North Atlantic Pact involves enforcement action, the pact cannot be squared with the provisions of the Charter. The central question is whether the action contemplated under the pact is in fact enforcement action, or something else.

Article 5 of the North Atlantic Pact reads in part as follows [reading]:

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, * * * will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Article 6 of the North Atlantic Treaty provides [reading]:

For the purpose of Article 5 an armed attack on one or more of the Parties is deemed to include an armed attack on the territory of any of the parties in Europe or North America, on the Algerian departments of France, on the occupation forces of any Party in Europe, on the islands under the jurisdiction of any Party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer or on the vessels or aircraft in this area of any of the Parties.

RIGHT OF INDIVIDUAL OR COLLECTIVE SELF-DEFENSE

In the foregoing quotation of article 5 of the pact, we have omitted certain words. These words characterize the action contemplated thereunder as being [reading]:

in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations—

Article 51 provides [reading]:

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

Manifestly the inherent right of self-defense recognized in article 51, cannot be created by agreement or treaty. Senator Connally, in the Senate debate in June 1948, on the Vandenberg resolution declared that [reading]:

the right of self-defense is not derived from something on paper; the right of self-defense is inherent.

The CHAIRMAN. You agree to that, do you not?

Mr. DURR. Yes, sir; I agree to that absolutely.

Characterizing the contemplated activity as falling within article 51 does not make it so. Whether such action does fall within the contemplation of article 51 is the main legal question with which we are here concerned.

Having in mind the Security Council's paramount responsibility for maintaining international peace, it seems clear to us that article 51 merely recognizes that a member state which is subjected to an actual armed attack will resort to arms to the extent necessary to defend itself. Even in such a case while the state attacked may have to decide initially the action to take, its decision must be submitted to review by the Security Council. In the Legal Basis of International Relations, published in Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Volume 255, January 1948. Yuen-li Lian, Director of the Division on the Development and Codification of International Law, United Nations said [reading]:

It is granted that in the first instance a state attacked by an aggressor may have to decide whether or in what measure the occasion calls for self-defense. But the initial decision must be submitted to review by the criteria of international law.

Article 51 also recognizes the inherent right of collective self-defense.

RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE LIMITED TO ACTUAL ATTACK

In our view this right, recognized in article 51, must be so near in content to the resistance by a state to an actual attack upon itself as to be almost indistinguishable. To be characterized as an "inherent right" of "self-defense," there must, in our view, exist the situation of an actual armed attack upon a member state which has such a relationship to another state that it is reasonably apparent and inevitable that the attack upon the second state will follow immediately or almost immediately after the armed attack upon the first state.

To apply any other meaning to the terms "inherent right of * * * collective self-defense" is to nullify to obvious intent of these words and to destroy the paramount authority of the Security Council in matters of threats to the peace, breeches of the peace, and acts of aggression. We believe that the kind of situation contemplated is quite clear. France, for instance, would have the inherent right of collective self-defense in the case of an armed invasion in force by a powerful state in Belgium. In the case of a similar invasion upon Mexico or Canada by a powerful state, the United States would undoubtedly have the inherent right of collective self-defense.

The reason why an inherent right of collective self-defense is recognized in the Charter in such situations is that the second member state, although not attacked, stands in immediate danger of armed attack growing out of an armed invasion of a neighbor state, and there would not be time for the Security Council to consider the matter or to take appropriate action.

COMPARISON OF ARTICLE 51 TO ARTICLE I (10) (4) OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION

The concept of the inherent right of collective self-defense has its counterpart in article I (10) (4) of the Constitution of the United States authorizing a State of the Union, without the consent of Congress, to engage in war in case of actual invasion or in case of "imminent danger as will not admit of delay." This provision declares [reading]:

No State shall, without the Consent of Congress * * * enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

In case of actual invasion, a State of the Union is authorized, without the authorization of Congress, to engage in war. It seems to us that this parallels the inherent right of individual self-defense recognized in article 51 of the Charter. In case of imminent danger not admitting of delay, a State of the Union can enter into an agreement with another State or with a foreign power, or engage in war, without authorization of the Congress. This provision of our Constitution has now become pretty much obsolete because of the arrangement of our society, but it did have very great application in the early days when the States were scattered and communication and transportation facilities were quite limited. The latter parallels the inherent right of collective self-defense. But article 51 does not permit the use of armed force under the pretext of acting in self-defense, or in cases where it does not clearly appear that an attack on the State concerned is so imminent as to permit no delay.

Sometimes in murder cases you have the plea of self-defense with the story that the deceased was reaching for his hip pocket when the defendant pulled out his gun and shot. Sometimes the deceased did have a gun in his hip pocket, sometimes it is found that he has nothing there but a wallet. It is a pretty dangerous thing to let an individual determine whether he is acting in self-defense. That is a matter to be adjudicated.

RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE LIMITED TO CASE OF AN ARMED ATTACK

To say that application of armed force by the United States in the case of every armed attack on the territory of any signatory or its vessels or aircraft anywhere in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer, is justified by inherent right, under article 51, or, in fact, constitutes self-defense, is wholly untenable. Unless it can be shown that attacks of such a nature will actually or almost certainly, be followed immediately and inevitably by an attack upon the United States, no logical or valid reason appears why, in such a situation, the alleged threat of aggression should not be brought immediately to the attention of the Security Council for appropriate enforcement action. Otherwise, to permit the second state or a group of states to act without the authority of the Security Council, would undermine totally its paramount authority to deal with threats to the peace and acts of aggression, and obliterate the distinction which the Charter makes between "enforcement action" and "self-defense."

In our view, the concept advanced by the pact that the United States has the legal right to apply armed force if for example, a Norwegian vessel should be fired upon in the Arctic Ocean, or a Portuguese plane should be attacked by Spain, is fraught with the greatest danger. If the inherent right of collective self-defense recognized by article 51 extends across the Atlantic Ocean, from the United States to the Mediterranean and the Arctic Ocean, or can be expanded to such lengths by agreements between individual states giving them the legal right to decide individually that an armed attack has occurred, and that the application of armed force is legally justified, then a European state could legally and with full justification under international law make the same decision with respect to an armed attack on the territory, or aircraft, or ships of any state in the Near East, the Far East, or even in the Americas. Thus the whole world could be staked out for individual armed action. We cannot see what significant authority is left to the Security Council in such a situation to deal with threats to the peace and acts of aggression. Moreover, the entire foundation of the new international law created by the Charter of the United Nations would be nullified.

DEFINITION OF AGGRESSION BY SECURITY COUNCIL

Before the Security Council was created, the traditional tendency in international law was to define aggression by formula, and without regard to the total historical and factual situation. Hence even Germany, which started the Second World War, claimed that its activity was not aggressive, but defensive. By the Charter it became the mission of the Security Council, not to "define" aggression, but to determine the existence of aggression in accordance with a legal method based on the concreteness of the background and circumstances surrounding each particular situation. The legal method of the Security Council thus represents a new development, responding to the failure or absence of preexisting legal methods for determining aggression.

It is significant that the United States delegation to the San Francisco Conference opposed amendments which sought to define aggression. The report of former Secretary of State Stettinius on the results of the San Francisco Conference stated [reading]:

One of the most significant lines upon which debate concerning the liberty of action of the Council proceeded, was that which concerned the proposed inclusion in the Charter of provisions with respect to determination of acts of aggression. * * * The United States delegation believing that the acceptance of such a concept was most undesirable played an active part in opposing the amendments. The Conference finally agreed that even the most simple and obvious cases of aggression might fall outside any of the formulas suggested, and, conversely, that a nation which according to a formula strictly interpreted could be deemed the offender in any particular instance might actually—when all circumstances were considered—be found to be the victim of intolerable provocation.

The significance of this advance will be appreciated when it is recognized that if the signatory states can validly define an armed attack against a state, as they do in the North Atlantic Pact, other states must acquire the same legal right of supplying their own definition.

The definition of "armed attack" contained in article 6 of the pact includes an attack on vessels and aircraft, and "an armed attack * * * on the occupation forces of any party in Europe." A minor incident could thus be made the legal basis for plunging the world into another war. A zonal border fracas in Berlin for instance, involving a shooting by a trigger-happy border guard, could thus provide a "valid legal basis" for world conflict, under the terms of the pact.

Vesting exclusive authority in the Security Council to determine whether a breach of the peace or an act of aggression had occurred, who was responsible therefor, and what kind of action should be taken to remedy the wrong, was intended to avoid just such senseless situations as this. But the pact would vest in each of the signatories the right to go to war in precisely such a situation. This result would set back incalculably the cause of peace and the rule of law in international relations.

There are other respects in which the pact violates provisions of the Charter.

NONMEMBERS OF UNITED NATIONS IN THE PACT

A mere reference to the contents of article 51 of the Charter quoted above shows that, in any case, the inherent right of an individual or collective self-defense arises only "if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations." Portugal and Italy are not members of the United Nations. They are signatories to the North Atlantic Pact. Yet under article 5 of the pact, if an armed attack occurs against these states, the United States undertakes to take military action if it deems this advisable. This is claimed to be justified by the provisions of article 51, which by its express terms, applies only to an attack on a member of the United Nations.

REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS AND THE CHARTER

It is our understanding that the North Atlantic Pact is alleged to be such a "regional arrangement" as is recognized by the Charter of the United Nations. The Charter imposes certain restrictions upon the existence of regional arrangements as set forth in article 52. That article recognizes that such regional arrangements may be established "for dealing with such matters * * * as are appropriate for regional action," and further provides that such arrangements and their activity shall be "consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations."

In a discussion on the Vandenberg resolution you cited article 52 of the Charter and then said, "I wish to stress the words 'as are appropriate for regional action.' I do not wish to see regional groups formed which may weaken a parent body, the United Nations, but if there are matters which are local, which are peculiar to the particular region, there is no reason why the nations in that region should not form a regional arrangement, because in a sense the overriding authority is still there, and it would probably have the right to determine whether or not the action proposed was appropriate to regional action."

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that that is wholly aside and apart from article 51? Article 51 recognizes the right of individual or collective self-defense; now, the article you are speaking of discusses the settlement of local matters within a particular region.

Mr. DURR. Article 51 and article 52 are, of course, entirely different provisions. Article 51 relates to the collective right of self-defense, but this pact has been referred to as a regional arrangement, and it is our contention that if it is regarded as a regional arrangement, it does not seem to us to fit within the definition of regional arrangements contained in article 52.

Article 54 of the Charter provides that [reading]:

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Yet, under article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty, provision is made only that—

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council.

The North Atlantic Treaty does not provide that all "activities in contemplation" shall be reported to the Security Council.

SECURITY COUNCIL AND ATLANTIC DEFENSE COUNCIL

The pact, under article 9 thereof, establishes a council to consider matters concerning the implementation of the treaty; and the council—shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of articles 3 and 5.

The activities and decisions so contemplated which may seriously affect international peace are not required to be reported to the Security Council under the terms of the North Atlantic Treaty although article 54 of the Charter requires that the Security Council—be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements.

The CHAIRMAN. That simply refers to matters of local character, that they are subsidiary to the United Nations, but still vested with authority to undertake to adjust them, and as they progress along they are supposed to report them from time to time to the United Nations.

Mr. DURR. Yes, sir; under the regional provisions. The United Nations Council is supposed to be informed, as I understand it, of all arrangements or activities in contemplation by the regions, whether they are moving immediately or whether they merely contemplate moving.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. DURR. Article 51 of the Charter likewise provides that all measures taken by members [reading]:

in the exercise of the right of self-defense shall be immediately reported to the Security Council.

Nonetheless, the North Atlantic Pact limits the reporting to the Security Council solely to measures taken as a result of an armed attack, and not to reporting measures anything short of an armed attack.

THE PACT—A VIOLATION OF THE UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

The Charter is the supreme law governing international relations. The Charter expressly provides, under article 103, that [reading]:

In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail.

All members of the United Nations are required, under article 2 (2) of the Charter to [reading]:

fulfill in good faith the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the present Charter.

Hence, no member of the United Nations can properly enter into an international agreement whose obligations conflict with those under the Charter. The Senate of the United States should, therefore, not ratify the North Atlantic Treaty which conflicts with and is not in accord with the Charter of the United Nations. That is our legal interpretation.

The members of the National Lawyers Guild as lawyers are concerned with the legal questions raised by the North Atlantic Pact. As citizens they are, like all other people, concerned with the questions of policy it raises, for they are vitally interested in the maintenance of peace.

We believe that effectuation of the pact will not contribute toward the establishment of a durable peace. On the contrary, we have the firm conviction that adherence to the Charter and its underlying principles affords the best assurance of a lasting peace.

DANGER OF MILITARY ALLIANCES AND REARMAMENT

In founding the United Nations, the old practice of military alliances among the great powers and of erecting powerful blocks of states confronting each other in armed hostility, was decisively rejected in favor of an international security system. Former Secretary of State Stettinius made this very clear in his report to the President on the results of the San Francisco Conference. A quotation from the report is contained in our present memorandum, which we have handed you.

The North Atlantic Pact reverts to the old method of military alliance which heretofore has always led to fierce world hostility, armaments races, and ultimately, to war. As Dr. Herbert V. Evatt, president of the General Assembly of the United Nations recently said before the Foreign Press Association [reading]:

The League of Nations failed to prevent the Second World War solely because some of the governments which belonged to it let down the League of Nations and preferred to resume the great game of power politics. This must not happen to the United Nations. * * * The peoples of the world have faith in the United Nations. It is their chief instrument in the struggles to create a world based upon justice. Nothing else is a substitute for it; nothing else can be a substitute for it.

I would refer you also to the report, The Security of the United States and Western Europe, prepared by the drafting committee of the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace, which is the research affiliate of the American Association for the United Nations, wherein it is said, with respect to the proposed "union of the Atlantic community" [reading]:

An Atlantic union with the United States, Great Britain, and France, at its core * * * even if confined to the North Atlantic * * * would in fact be so large a part of the world that the Soviet Union might counter by the utmost preparations on its part, thus increasing the tension in the bipolar world. * * * The instability of the world and the insecurity of the nations might be increased and a new chain of events might be initiated which would result in world war III. * * * The emphasis upon more limited guaranties and the centering of discussions of security matters in more limited institutions would weaken the world's interest in universal procedures for maintaining international peace and security for all under the Charter.

Even John Foster Dulles, who now supports the pact, said as recently as March 8, 1949, referring to the proposal to include Norway as a signatory to the pact [reading]:

it would indeed involve a high tribute to Soviet leaders to assume that under these circumstances they would exercise more self-control than would our people under comparable circumstances, as for example, if the Soviet Union had military arrangements with a country at our border.

And Secretary-General Trygve Lie of the United Nations warned [reading]:

No regional arrangement can ever be a satisfactory substitute for the United Nations. If people generally began to accept alliances as substitute for genuine, world-wide collective security, then the hope of a lasting peace would be greatly endangered.

In our view, the hope for peace cannot rest upon mere accumulations of military power. This road has almost invariably led to war. Why should we now suddenly believe that it will contribute to the maintenance of peace?

STRENGTHENING THE UNITED NATIONS

We firmly believe that the best hope for peace lies in support for and strengthening of the United Nations and its principles and purposes. What is necessary is to wage a fierce and ceaseless effort to resolve the differences which now divide the world. This is a difficult road, but the alternatives at best involve an exhausting armaments race which will impair the economic well-being of the world, and at worst, lead to war with consequent immeasurable human suffering and destruction.

It is fitting to recall the words of Secretary of State Byrnes, in his book, Speaking Frankly, pages 313, 315, 316 [reading]:

There is too much talk of war and too little of peace. * * * Too much is at stake for us to lose our patience. Negotiating with the Soviets may affect the nerves of a few statesmen but another world war would more seriously affect the lives of millions of people. We must continue our efforts to develop through the United Nations a common law of nations to provide definite and agreed standards of conduct. It must rest upon something more than rules, something more than force, and something more than fear. It must be made to rest upon the growth of a common fellowship, common interests, and common ideas among the peoples of the world. * * * I remain confident that we can achieve a just peace through cooperative effort. * * *

RESOLUTION OF NATIONAL LAWYERS GUILD

The National Lawyers Guild on February 21, 1949, at its recent convention held in Detroit, unanimously adopted a resolution which declared in part as follows [reading]:

The revitalization of cooperative relations among the great powers and especially between the United States and the Soviet Union, points the path to peace.

This is the will of all peace-loving humanity. It was voiced in the resolution adopted (unanimously) at the Paris session of the General Assembly where, on the initiative of Mexico, the Assembly made an appeal to the great powers to compose their differences and "to redouble their efforts in a spirit of solidarity and mutual understanding to secure in the briefest possible time a final settlement of the war and a conclusion of all peace settlement."

The guild resolution stated [reading]:

This approach will afford the most effective assurance of a durable peace and a vigorous United Nations organization and obviate resort to military alliances, avoid the heavy impact of armament expenditures, and make possible the advance of the living standards and social welfare of our people and of all peoples throughout the world.

The validity of this approach, it seems to us, is attested to by the recent accord reached on the lifting of the Berlin blockade. The road to this vital result was paved by discussion between representatives of our country and the Soviet Union, leading to the agreement to convene the Council of Foreign Ministers to discuss the entire German situation. Such negotiations are in accord with the obligations assumed by member states under article 33 of the Charter. If accord can be reached on so difficult a situation as the Berlin blockade, we believe it should be equally possible on the other issues confronting the great powers.

EFFECT OF TREATY ON UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that in the Atlantic Pact there are several declarations that we support the United Nations and are in conformity with the views of the United Nations?

Mr. DURR. It is our contention that those are self-serving declarations and that the declarations themselves are in conflict with the United Nations Charter.

The CHAIRMAN. This committee wholeheartedly favors the United Nations Charter. We ratified it overwhelmingly in the Senate. We are for it, and we continue to support it and to improve it. However, you know of the difficulties and the hazards that have already taken place in international affairs with respect to the modification of the Charter; do you not?

Mr. DURR. Yes; I am totally aware of the difficulties. But it is our contention that the difficulties will be increased rather than minimized if we begin to start a pattern of what amounts to alliances outside of the United Nations; that we will merely create blocs which will work without the United Nations or even in the United Nations. The blocs will already be formed and will make negotiation and objective consideration of the problems far more difficult.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the attitude of the Lawyers Guild that you are opposed to ratification?

Mr. DURR. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

RIO TREATY AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Senator VANDENBERG. I simply want to ask you, Mr. Durr, whether you would make the same legal argument against the Rio Pact?

Mr. DURR. No, sir; I would not. I think the Rio Pact does extend the idea of the regional organization considerably, but nevertheless here we have an area which historically has been treated as having common interests and recognized as such since the Monroe Doctrine. Moreover, when you come to the Rio Treaty you also have a recognition of article 51, which is a recognition of the inherent right of collective self-defense. I am not sure if, in the exercise of that right of collective self-defense, the United States, even under the Rio Treaty, would be warranted in deeming an attack upon, let us say, the extreme southern part of Argentina as an attack upon the United States calling for immediate action on our part. The question is still there: Is this an exercise of the right of self-defense? That is inherent.

It seems to us that article 51 is merely recognizing what was already inherent, and making it clear that the nations were not surrendering this inherent right. The right of self-defense, as we contend, means that there must be an immediate and very probable danger to the country invoking that right unless it is attacked itself.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Durr, you refer in your statement to the fact that the views which you express therein on questions of policy were approved at the national convention of the Lawyers Guild, which I understand was held at Detroit, Mich., on or about February 21 of this year.

Mr. DURR. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You state further that the National Lawyers Guild at its recent convention unanimously adopted the resolution you have read.

Mr. DURR. That is part of their action.

Senator DONNELL. I wanted to ask you if you could tell us, please, whether that resolution was framed and presented to the convention by one of the regular committees of the National Lawyers Guild.

Mr. DURR. Yes, sir; it was.

Senator DONNELL. Was it a large committee? Do you have the membership right there before you? Will you insert that in the record? May Mr. Durr do that, please?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

MEMBERSHIP OF INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMITTEE

Mr. DURR. There are about 35 members. Here are some: Mr. Joseph Crown, who is here with me, a lawyer from New York; Prof. Alexander N. Sack, formerly with the Academy of International Law at The Hague, professor at New York University; Osmond K. Fraenkel and Benjamin Algase, New York lawyers; Martin Popper of New York; Mitchell Franklin of the Law School of Tulane University; Carey McWilliams of Los Angeles; G. Leslie Field of Detroit, Chase Kimball of Boston, and Harry Lamberton of Washington. That is only some. There are about 35 on the committee.

Senator DONNELL. You will insert the entire list in the record?

Mr. DURR. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Will you tell us when the resolution was presented to the convention whether there was a discussion by the members of the convention on the floor?

Mr. DURR. It was presented. I was not present at the time of the discussion. I will ask Mr. Crown, who was there.

PROCEDURE OF ADOPTING RESOLUTION

Mr. JOSEPH CROWN. Our ordinary procedure is, on any matter of this kind, for the original statement to be prepared by the committee on international law. It was circulated to every member of the committee, and on the basis of comments and suggestions was then submitted to the convention. It then went before the resolutions committee. There there was debate, and I should say that there were extended hours, as this was one of the high points in the actual convention.

Then came finally, after extensive revision, but I should say unanimous accord on the ultimate formulation, submission to the delegates of the convention. There was a preliminary paper which consumed an hour and the discussion on the subject consumed more than an hour. And so it was ultimately adopted.

Senator DONNELL. First there was the formulation of the resolution by the Committee on international law and relations, which resolution in turn was submitted after having been offered in the convention to the resolutions committee for its consideration. Before the resolutions committee there was extended debate. Thereafter, subsequent to material changes in the resolution, or at least changes—how material I do not know—the resolution was submitted back on the floor of the convention, is that correct?

Mr. CROWN. That is true.

Senator DONNELL. And at the time of its submission on the floor of the convention, are you able to state from personal knowledge approximately how many delegates were present?

Mr. CROWN. I would say that the debate at that point was about after 10 in the evening, on Sunday night, and I should judge there would be more than 100, maybe 125, delegates at least at that point.

Senator DONNELL. Was the resolution actually debated on the floor that evening?

Mr. CROWN. Yes, it was seriously debated. There were diverse opinions and points of view presented. There were only some few dissents.

Senator DONNELL. I note Mr. Durr's statement said the resolution was unanimously adopted. Should that be amended, in view of your statement that there was some dissent?

Mr. CROWN. We are referring there to the resolution by the general assembly.

Senator DONNELL. I am talking now about the resolution that gives the policy which you state, which Mr. Durr states was approved at the national convention, and on which his views herein expressed this morning are based.

Mr. DURR. To avoid confusion, I might point out that there is a quotation contained within the Lawyers Guild resolution adopted at the general assembly. This resolution which we quote was adopted unanimously at the general assembly.

Senator DONNELL. I do not want to prolong this unnecessarily, but I want to be clear and have the record clear. You say the views you express on questions of policy were approved at the national convention of the guild in February 1949?

Mr. DURR. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. How was the action of that national convention on those questions of policy initiated? Was that the committee on international law and regulations?

Mr. DURR. Yes, sir; that is right.

Senator DONNELL. And then the process occurred that you have described, namely, that it was considered first by that committee which formulated a preliminary resolution. That in turn was submitted to the convention, which referred it to the committee on resolutions.

Mr. DURR. That's right.

Senator DONNELL. The committee on resolutions then reconsidered the matter, made changes in it after extensive debate, and approved for recommendation to the convention the resolution so changed, and then on the floor of the convention the resolution came up and was acted upon with only a few dissenting votes. Is that correct?

Mr. DURR. That is correct.

Of course, this statement of mine has not been approved by the convention, but it is within the policy.

Senator DONNELL. You believe the statement correctly represents the policy enunciated by the national convention through the process indicated?

Mr. DURR. Yes, it does.

Senator DONNELL. In the second place you say that the views you express on legal questions are based on a memorandum of law prepared by your committee on international law and relations. That is the same committee?

Mr. DURR. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And it is the one that consists of about 35 members?

Mr. DURR. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. And I got from your statement that copies of that memorandum of law you will hand to the committee, and that will be incorporated in the record of this hearing.

Mr. DURR. That has been done.

Senator DONNELL. Has it been ordered to be incorporated in the record of the hearing?

The CHAIRMAN. Is it along the lines of your testimony?

Mr. DURR. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as I am concerned, it may go into the record. (Document entitled "Memorandum of Law" reads as follows:)

Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, In the Matter of the Legality of the North Atlantic Treaty Under the Charter of the United Nations

MEMORANDUM OF LAW

(Prepared by the Committee on International Law and Relations, National Lawyers Guild, Clifford J. Durr, president, Washington 6, D. C.)

THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT: ITS LEGALITY UNDER THE UN CHARTER AND ITS IMPACT ON PEACE

The North Atlantic Pact poses issues of grave importance to the peace of the world and the fate of the United Nations. As a bar association we are deeply concerned with the maintenance of the rule of law in international relations and the strengthening of the new international law created by the Charter of the United Nations. As citizens we are vitally concerned with contributing our utmost toward the maintenance of peace.

Our examination of the North Atlantic Pact has led us to the conclusion that, notwithstanding assertions to the contrary, the Pact in fundamental respects violates salient provisions of the Charter, and will not contribute toward the establishment of a durable peace. The National Lawyers Guild is of the firm conviction that adherence to the Charter and its underlying principles of negotiation, concurrence, and cooperation afford the most effective assurance of a lasting peace.

I. THE LEGALITY OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT UNDER THE UN CHARTER

1. The Security Council has primary responsibility for maintaining international peace, under the Charter agreed to by all members of the United Nations.

The general security system established under the Charter vests paramount authority in the Security Council in matters of international peace and security. Article 24 of the Charter provides:

"In order to ensure prompt and effective action by the United Nations, its Members confer on the Security Council primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security, and agree that in carrying out its duties under this responsibility the Security Council acts on their behalf."

The Security Council is thus the representative or mandatory of the totality of the members of the United Nations.

Under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Security Council is vested with exclusive power "to determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression" (Art. 3.) The Charter endows the Security Council with the power of taking enforcement measures to deal with threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression (Arts. 42-48).

Enforcement action is within the exclusive authority of the Security Council. The Security Council may utilize appropriate regional arrangements for enforcement action under its authority. But, expressly prescribes Article 53 of the Charter, "no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council."<sup>1</sup> Since a regional arrangement may not take enforcement action without prior authorization of the Security Council, obviously no individual State or any group of individual States may take enforcement action, for otherwise the restriction of Article 53 would be meaningless.

2. The Pact fails to recognize the supremacy of the Security Council in enforcement action

Despite the express prohibition against the taking of enforcement action by a regional arrangement without the prior authorization of the Security Council, each party to the North Atlantic Pact undertakes to take on its own initiative whatever measures, including the use of armed force, it decides upon, if an armed attack occurs on any one of the parties.

"1. The Security Council shall, where appropriate, utilize such regional arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority. But no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council, with the exception of measures against any enemy state, as defined in paragraph 2 of this Article, provided for pursuant to Article 107 or in regional arrangements directed against renewal of aggressive policy on the part of any such state, until such time as the Organization may, on request of the Governments concerned be charged with the responsibility for preventing further aggression by such a state.

"2. The term enemy state as used in paragraph 1 of this Article applies to any State which during the Second World War has been an enemy of any signatory of the present Charter."

The sole exception from the rule that enforcement action is within the exclusive authority of the Security Council applies to measures which may be taken against former enemy states, such as Germany or Japan. Individual governments or regional arrangements can take individual or collective measures against Germany or Japan without the prior authorization of the Security Council. The North Atlantic Pact is not directed primarily against renewal of German aggression, nor is any specific reference made thereto. Hence, in the event of a threat to the peace, or a breach of the peace, or an act of aggression by a state other than an enemy state, the measures to be taken to restore or maintain international security can be determined only by the Security Council and not by the parties of the North Atlantic Pact (even if the Pact qualified as an appropriate regional arrangement).

The Security Council could prevent the parties to the North Atlantic Pact from taking military measures. As was said by Dunward V. Sandifer of the State Department:

"* * * the proviso that no enforcement action should be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without authorization of the Security Council would permit the Security Council to prevent action being taken by such agencies on their own initiative" (Jan. 27, 1945, Dept. of State Bulletin, p. 147).

Under the Pact, the parties thereto undertake the following commitments:

- a. To "maintain and develop" their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack" (Art. 2);
- b. To consult if "the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened" (Art. 4);
- c. To consider an armed attack on any one of the parties as an attack against all and to take such individual and collective action, including the use of armed force, as each party considers necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area (Art. 5).

Since the essence of the North Atlantic Pact is the asserted right of its signatories to undertake military and other measures without the prior authorization of the Security Council, the Pact does not conform with and, in fact, violates the Charter of the United Nations. The supremacy of the United Nations is fundamental. As was stated in Secretary of State Stettinius' Report on the San Francisco Conference:

"* * * the Security Council could utilize regional arrangements for enforcement action, provided that such enforcement action should be undertaken only when authorized by the Council and that the latter should be kept fully informed of all action taken or contemplated under regional arrangements or by regional agencies. It was recognized that the Council must have a general authority over regional security machinery in order to prevent such arrangements from developing independently and thus possibly pursuing different ends. In other words, this provision was intended to coordinate the function of a regional grouping with those of a general organization and at the same time establish the final authority of the latter." (Hearings, Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on the Charter of the United Nations, 79th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 96-97 (July 1945).)

5. The inherent right of self-defense, recognized in Article 51 of the Charter, does not authorize the United States to use armed force in the event of an actual armed attack against a European state; a priori, the inherent right of self-defense cannot be invoked where no armed attack has occurred.

The Pact<sup>1</sup> endeavors to escape the obvious inconsistency between the commitments undertaken thereunder and the paramount authority of the Security Council in matters of enforcement action by characterizing the contemplated action as coming within the self-defense provisions of Article 51 of the Charter. Article 51 provides:

"Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security."

Manifestly the inherent right of self-defense, recognized in Article 51, cannot be created by agreement or treaty. Mindful of the Security Council's paramount responsibility for maintaining international peace, Article 51 merely recognizes a provisional right of self-defense inherent in cases of actual armed attack. The exercise of the right of self-defense must be confined to legitimate use and <sup>1</sup> Apropos the rearmament program envisaged thereunder is the statement of Sir Edward Grey, British Foreign Secretary at the time of World War I, who summed up the lesson of that war in these terms:

"Great armaments lead inevitably to war. If there are armaments on one side, there must be armaments on the other side."

"The enormous growth of armaments in Europe, the sense of insecurity and fear caused by them—it was these that made war inevitable. This, it seems to me is the truest reading of history, and the lesson that the present should be learning from the past in the interest of future peace."

Article 5 of the North Atlantic Pact provides:

"The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area."

Secretary Acheson has stated that if one of the nations covered by the Pact is subject to armed attack, "we would be bound to take promptly the action which we deemed necessary to restore and maintain security in the North Atlantic area."

is subject to review by the Security Council as to whether the acts claimed to be in "self-defense" were justified.<sup>24</sup>

Article 51 recognizes that if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, it has the inherent right of individual self-defense.

Article 51 also recognizes the inherent right of collective self-defense. Thus France would have had the inherent right of collective self-defense with Belgium in case of an armed attack by Nazi Germany on Belgium. In case of an armed attack upon Mexico or Canada by a powerful State, the United States would have the inherent right of collective self-defense where the United States was in imminent danger of immediate attack. The inherent right of collective self-defense arises where a State, although not attacked, stands in immediate imminent danger of attack growing out of an armed attack upon a neighbor State. To apply any other meaning to the term "inherent right of * * * collective self-defense" is to nullify the obvious intent of these words, and to destroy the paramount authority of the Security Council in matters of threats to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression.

To say that application of armed force by the United States in the case of an armed attack on the territory of a signatory or its vessels or aircraft anywhere in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer<sup>25</sup> is justified by inherent right (under Art. 51) or, in fact, constitutes self-defense is wholly untenable. Manifestly it cannot be shown that attacks of such a nature will actually be followed immediately and inevitably with an attack upon the United States.

If the inherent right of collective self-defense could be expanded by written agreements, the application of the same logic should give rise to the legal right of a state—not signatory to the North Atlantic Pact—to use armed force in the Near East or Far East or even in the Americas in the case of an attack by any state upon another state or its vessels or aircraft in those areas, merely by executing an agreement to that effect. Thus, the entire foundation of the new international law created by the Charter of the United Nations and the Charter of the Nuremberg Tribunal which tried the Nazi war criminals would be nullified.

The concept of the inherent right of collective self-defense has its counterpart in Article 1 (10) (4) of the Constitution of the United States authorizing a state of the Union, without the consent of Congress, to engage in war in case of actual invasion or in case of "imminent danger as will not admit of delay." Said provision declares:

"No State shall, without the Consent of Congress * * * enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

In case of actual invasion, a state of the Union is authorized, without the authorization of Congress, to engage in war. This parallels the inherent right of individual self-defense recognized in Article 51 of the Charter. In case of imminent danger not admitting of delay, a state of the Union can enter into an agreement with another state or with a foreign power, or engage in war without authorization of the Congress. The latter parallels the inherent right of collective self-defense. But Article 51 does not permit the use of armed force under the pretext of acting in self-defense.

Prof. Hans Kelsen, dealing with this point, has noted: "The action on the part of the States which are not attacked but only assist the attacked State against its aggressor is not exactly 'self-defense'" (55 Yale Law Journal 1008). Thus,

<sup>24</sup> The concept of self-defense under Article 51 has been analyzed by Yuen-li Liang, director of the Division on the Development and Codification of International Law, United Nations, who stated:

"* * * unless self-defense is confined to legitimate use—as the French term 'légitime défense' necessarily imports—it is most liable to abuse, and history furnishes innumerable instances where an aggressor has attempted to justify its aggression in the name of self-defense. Instead of contributing to the clarification of the concept of self-defense, international lawyers have increased its nebulous character by identifying it with the so-called right of self-preservation and sanctifying it by appealing to natural law. This concept is further confused by the claim that each state is its own judge in the determination of the legitimacy and the justifiable extent of its action taken in self-defense."

"It is granted that in the first instance a state attacked by an aggressor may have to decide whether or in what measure the occasion calls for self-defense. But the initial decision must be submitted to review by the criteria of international law" (Yuen-li Liang, "The Legal Basis of International Relations," Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 255 (Jan. 1948), pp. 29–30).

assuming an armed attack on a Latin-American republic, the Soviet Union, a great power located in another hemisphere, would not have the inherent right of collective self-defense.

Assuming, hypothetically, an armed attack against Luxembourg or the Netherlands or Norway, the United States would not possess an inherent right of collective self-defense. The use of armed force, in such a situation, would constitute not an exercise of the inherent right of collective self-defense, but rather an enforcement action (which under the Charter cannot be undertaken without authorization of the Security Council). Nor is this affected by the provision of the North Atlantic Pact (Art. 5) that "an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all." The inherent right of self-defense arises from realities and cannot be created (noninherent) by agreements or stipulations. Senator Connally, in the Senate debate in June 1948 on the Vandenberg Resolution (S. Res. 239) (which the North Atlantic Pact implements) declared that "the right of self-defense is inherent; it does not depend upon any constitution or statute or international agreement * * * the right of self-defense is not derived from something on paper; the right of self-defense is inherent" (Cong. Rec., Vol. 94, Part 6, 80th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 7821).

Moreover, the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense is in no way enlarged or changed by the creation of an appropriate regional arrangement. Senator Vandenberg in the Senate debate on the Vandenberg Resolution so conceded:

"I do not think the self-defense right asserted in Article 51 is changed in any aspect as a result of the organization of the regional group. * * * I do not conceive that the powers and privileges of Article 51 are changed or enlarged in the slightest" (Cong. Rec., cited, p. 7803).

The "inherent" right of self-defense cannot be established by a "premeditated, preconceived, formally entered into regional military alliance."

"It is hardly possible to consider the right or the duty of a non-attacked state to assist an attacked state as an 'inherent' right * * *" (Kelsen, 55 Yale Law Journal, p. 1009).

It is clear, therefore, that the "long-range, premeditated, preconceived, formally entered into regional military alliance" embodied in the North Atlantic Pact does not sanction the use of armed force by the United States in case an armed attack occurs against a European State, notwithstanding the purported attempt to do so by the terms of the Pact under the guise of the inherent right of self-defense recognized in Article 51 of the Charter. As this is the core of the North Atlantic Pact, the Pact is manifestly inconsistent with the Charter of the United Nations, contravening the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security and undermining the general security system established under the Charter.

4. The North Atlantic Pact usurps the power of the Security Council and fails to conform to salient provisions of the Charter

Article 54 of the Charter provides that "The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security." Yet, under Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty, provision is made only that "Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council." The North Atlantic Treaty does not provide that all "activities in contemplation" shall be reported to the Security Council.

The Pact, under Article 9 thereof, establishes a "council" to consider matters concerning the implementation of the treaty; and the council "shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5." The activities and decisions so contemplated which may seriously affect international peace are not required to be reported to the Security Council under the terms of the North Atlantic Treaty although Article 54 of the Charter requires that the Security Council "be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements."

* Cf. Statement of Senator Pepper made during senate debate on Vandenberg Resolution: "Under article 51 the right of self-defense is asserted simply as an inherent right which may be asserted by those who are the victims of the attack. But certainly the Senator from Florida had not contemplated that the recognition of the inherent right of self-defense which, according to the context of article 51, suggests something like a sudden and emergent attack which might involve the element of surprise and the necessity of an immediate response before access could be had, possibly to the Security Council, and before the Security Council could act—ever envisioned a long-range, premeditated, preconceived, formally entered into regional military alliance * * *" (Cong. Rec., cited p. 7803, June 11, 1948).

Article 51 of the Charter likewise provides that all measures taken by members "in the exercise of the right of self-defense shall be immediately reported to the Security Council." Nonetheless, the North Atlantic Pact limits the reporting to the Security Council solely to measures taken as a result of an armed attack. No such limitation is intended in Article 51 of the Charter.<sup>4</sup>

The North Atlantic Pact presupposes the validity of a unilateral determination by the members of the alliance that a particular state is an aggressor, potential or actual. But such "unilateral" determination would usurp the power of the Security Council. In permitting individual or collective self-defense against "an armed attack," Article 51 does not at all derogate the exclusive power of the Security Council under Article 39 to declare "the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or an act of aggression."

The North Atlantic Pact not only seizes the power of the Security Council, but also repudiates the legal method of the Security Council. Before the Security Council was created, the traditional tendency in international law was to define aggression by formula, and without regard to the total historical and factual situation. Hence even the fascist aggressors, who initiated the Second World War, claimed that their activity was not aggressive, but defensive. By the Charter it became the mission of the Security Council, not to "define" aggression, but to determine the existence of aggression in accordance with legal method based on the concreteness of the background and circumstances surrounding each particular situation. The Security Council determines the existence of aggression concretely on the basis of the entire factual situation, much as a jury gives concreteness to the concept of due care or fault on the basis of the entire factual situation. The legal method of the Security Council thus represents a remarkable development, responding to the failure of preexisting legal method for determining aggression.

The significance of this advance will be appreciated when it is recognized that if the signatory states can validly define an armed attack against a state, as they do in the North Atlantic Treaty, other states must acquire the same legal right of supplying their own definition. Since the definition<sup>5</sup> of "armed attack" contained in Article 6 of the Pact includes "an armed attack * * * on the occupation forces of any Party in Europe," a zonal border fracas in Berlin, involving a shooting by a trigger-happy border guard, would purport to provide a "valid legal basis" for a world conflict, under the terms of the Pact. Vesting exclusive authority in the Security Council to determine whether a breach of the peace or an act of aggression had occurred and who was responsible therefor was intended to avoid situations such as this. But the Pact purports to vest in the signatories

<sup>4</sup> Cf. Statement of James Reston in New York Times, April 22, 1949 (p. 10, cols. 4-5):

"The Administration's request for armaments for the North Atlantic nations, the formation of a joint plan of defense for the North Atlantic region, decisions about the supply and exchange of weapons—all these are, according to some members of the Foreign Relations Committee, 'measures taken by members in exercise of this right of self-defense' * * *."

"Therefore, they assert, the United States should either report them to the Security Council under Article 51 of the U. N. Charter, or stop arguing that this treaty is abiding by the letter and spirit of the Charter."

"Moreover, this argument continues, Article 54 of the U. N. Charter is also relevant. This article states: 'The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.'"

"Thus, the Secretary of State is being asked, are the North Atlantic pact nations not obliged to report to the Security Council when they consult with one another under article 4 of the North Atlantic treaty?"

"Since the purpose of the pact is officially stated to be one of maintaining peace and security in this region, are its members not obliged by both articles 51 and 54 to report all 'activities undertaken or in contemplation' to the Security Council?"

"For the purpose of Article 5 an armed attack on one or more of the Parties is deemed to include an armed attack on the territory of any of the Parties in Europe or North America, on the Algerian departments of France, on the occupation forces of any Party in Europe, on the islands under the jurisdiction of any Party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer, or on the vessels or aircraft in this area of any of the Parties."

the right to go to war in such a situation. This result would set back incalculably the cause of peace and the rule of law in international relations.<sup>1</sup>

5. As the inherent right of self-defense under Article 51 of the Charter applies only in the case of an armed attack against a member of the United Nations, the Pact violates the Charter since it applies to Portugal and Italy which are not members of the United Nations

This point is self-evident from a mere recital of Article 51 of the Charter, which declares:

"Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security."

Portugal and Italy, which are not members of the United Nations, are, however, signatories of the North Atlantic Pact. Yet, under Article 5 of the North Atlantic Pact the United States, as a signatory, agrees that if an armed attack occurs against any of the signatories (including Portugal and Italy), it will take action (military or otherwise) "in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations." But, under no circumstances, can Article 51 be invoked in the case of an attack upon nonmembers of the United Nations. This underscores the fundamental inconsistency between the North Atlantic Pact and the Charter of the United Nations. It demonstrates the clearest violation of the Charter.

6. Since the signatories to the Pact embrace countries in two hemispheres separated by the Atlantic Ocean, there is a grave question whether it qualifies as a "regional arrangement" under the Charter. The propriety of the Pact should be submitted to the Security Council

Specific limitations are imposed upon the existence of regional arrangements as set forth in Article 52 of the Charter, which provides:

"1. Nothing in the present Charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations."

It will be noted that the Charter does not authorize all arrangements between nations. A regional arrangement must be one which is, in fact, "appropriate for regional action" and such regional arrangement and its activities must be "consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations." Senator Connally, present chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who now supports the North Atlantic Pact, last year argued against the formation of regional organizations which might weaken the United Nations and alluded to the point that the United Nations had the right to determine whether a proposed organization was appropriate for regional action. In the Senate debate on June 11, 1948, on the Vandenberg Resolution, after citing Article 52 of the Charter, Senator Connally said:

"I wish to stress the words 'as are appropriate for regional action.' I do not wish to see regional groups formed which may weaken the parent body, the United Nations. But if there are matters which are local, which are peculiar to the particular region, there is no reason why the nations in that region should not form a regional arrangement, because in a sense the overriding authority is still there, and it would probably have the right to determine whether or not the action proposed was appropriate for regional action. * * * I would not want to encourage the formation of regional organizations which might weaken or sap the energies of the United Nations itself, because our objective in establishing the United Nations was to establish a strong, purposeful, and wise central body to preserve the peace of the world" (Cong. Rec., Vol. 94, Part 6, 80th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 7821).

<sup>1</sup> It is significant that the United States delegation to the San Francisco Conference opposed amendments which sought to define aggression. The Report of former Secretary of State Stettinius on the Results of the San Francisco Conference stated:

"One of the most significant lines upon which debate concerning the liberty of action of the Council proceeded was that which concerned the proposed inclusion in the Charter of provisions with respect to determination of acts of aggression. Various amendments proposed on the subject, including those of Bolivia and the Philippine Commonwealth, offered a list of sharply defined eventualities (such as invasion of, or attack on, another state, interfering with its internal affairs, etc.), in which the Council would be bound to determine by formula not only the existence of aggression but also the identity of the aggressor. . . . The United States Delegation, believing that the acceptance of such a concept was most undesirable, played an active part in opposing the amendments. The Conference finally agreed that even the most simple and obvious cases of aggression might fall outside any of the formulae suggested, and, conversely, that a nation which, according to a formula strictly interpreted, could be deemed the offender in any particular instance might actually—when all circumstances were considered—be found to be the victim of intolerable provocation." (See Hearings on the United Nations Charter, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, 79th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 89 [July 1945].)

Since the Charter limits the existence of regional arrangements to those which are "appropriate for regional action" ("local," in the words of Senator Connally), there is a grave question whether the North Atlantic Pact—associating the United States with countries stretching across the Atlantic Ocean, and embracing Norway, which has a common border with the Soviet Union on the Arctic Sea, and Italy, located in the Mediterranean—is "appropriate for regional action." * In view of the grave question presented, the North Atlantic Pact should be submitted to the Security Council for its decision as to whether the Pact is "appropriate for regional action" and its provisions and contemplated activities "consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations." The Pact should not be undertaken unless approval thereof has been secured by the Security Council. It is important that the Pact actually conform "in every particular with the Charter of the United Nations." **

7. Since the North Atlantic Pact violates the Charter which is the supreme law, the Senate should not ratify the Pact

The Charter is the supreme law governing international relations. The Charter expressly provides, under Article 103, that "In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail". As was recently stated by Dr. Herbert V. Evatt, Australian Minister for External Affairs and President of the United Nations General Assembly, in opening the spring session of the Assembly:

"The Charter provides, as you all know, that all other obligations which individual nations or groups of nations may accept must be subordinated to and must be in accordance with those set forth in the Charter of the United Nations." *

All members of the United Nations are required, under Article 2 (2) of the Charter, to "fulfill in good faith the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the present Charter." Hence, no member of the United Nations can properly enter into an international agreement whose obligations conflict with those under the Charter. The Senate of the United States should, therefore, not ratify the North Atlantic Treaty which conflicts with and is not in accord with the Charter of the United Nations.

II. THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT WILL UNDERMINE THE UNITED NATIONS AND NOT CONTRIBUTE TOWARD THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A DURABLE PEACE

In founding the United Nations, the method of military alliance among the great powers was rejected and an international security system was chosen as the means of maintaining peace. It is fitting to recall the following passage from the Report by Secretary of State Stettinius to the President on the Results of the San Francisco Conference which evolved the Charter of the United Nations:

"We realize, in short, that peace is a world-wide problem and that the maintenance of peace, and not merely its restoration, depends primarily upon the unity of the great powers.

"There were theoretically two alternative means of preserving this unity. The first was through the formation of a permanent alliance among the great * Senator Malone, of Nevada, observed during the Senate debate on the Vandenberg Resolution:

"At the time this part of the Charter was adopted, it was generally believed—and there was no other explanation ever given—that regional agreements would apply only to nations in close proximity one to another, or to nations in the same hemisphere. The only one ever mentioned at San Francisco in which the United States would participate was the Chapultepec Agreement for the security of the Western Hemisphere. * * *

"Now the administration * * * is to extend the meaning of the phrase 'regional agreement' to cross the Atlantic Ocean and bring Europe and the United States into the same region. This is factually untrue.

"The effect will be to make the Rhine the frontier of the United States" (Cong. Rec., cited, p. 7811).

** Secretary of State Acheson, in his radio address of March 18, 1949, stated that the Pact was "carefully and conscientiously designed to conform in every particular with the Charter of the United Nations."

powers. This method might have been justified on narrow strategic grounds, but it would have been repugnant to our traditional policy. It also would have contained elements of danger because it might well have been interpreted as a menace by nations not party to it. Accordingly, this method was rejected.

"The second method was through the establishment of a general security system based upon the principle of sovereign equality of all peace-loving states and upon the recognition of the predominant responsibility of the great powers in matters relating to peace and security."<sup>10</sup>

The North Atlantic Pact reverts to the method of alliance which was rejected by the United States in favor of the establishment of a general security system as created in the United Nations organization. It is well to recall that the Locarno alliance and similar compacts contributed to the undermining of the League of Nations.<sup>11</sup>

In opposing the Vandenberg Resolution (S. Res. 239) calling for the progressive development of regional arrangements, Senator Pepper, in a Senate debate on June 11, 1948, pointed out that regional military arrangements would lead to the reestablishment of military alliances incompatible with the United Nations, peace and collective security. Senator Pepper observed that the Chapultepec Treaty involving the Inter-American states "suggests a pattern for setting up in the world regional arrangements which would mean that the world would be divided into three military alliances, one in the Soviet sphere, one in western Europe, and one in the Western Hemisphere. Then, instead of having a dynamic and dangerous and rampant nationalism, it is proposed that we progress to the same sort of thing in regionalism" (Cong. Rec., Vol. 94, Part 6, 80th Cong., 2d Sess., p. 7803).

The impact of the projected North Atlantic Pact on the peace of the world and on the United Nations has been succinctly stated in a report, "The Security of the United States and Western Europe," prepared by the Drafting Committee<sup>12</sup> of the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace, research affiliate of the American Association for the United Nations. In discussing the proposed "union of the Atlantic community," the report declares (pp. 17-18):

"It is to be feared that such an arrangement might in fact augment the bi-polar character and the political instability of the world. An Atlantic Union with the United States, Great Britain, and France, at its core * * * even if confined to the North Atlantic excluding the distant dominions and the Latin American countries still it would include most * * * of the military power outside the Soviet bloc * * * it would in fact be so large a part of the world that the Soviet Union might counter by the utmost preparations on its part, thus increasing the tension in the bi-polar world."<sup>13</sup> * * * The instability of the world and the insecurity of the nations might be increased and a new chain of events might be initiated which would result in World War III.

<sup>11</sup> Cf. Statement of Dr. Herbert V. Evatt, President of the United Nations General Assembly, before Foreign Press Association:

"The League of Nations failed to prevent the Second World War solely because some of the governments which belonged to it let down the League of Nations and preferred to resume the great game of power politics. This must not happen to the United Nations. * * * The peoples of the world have faith in the United Nations. It is their chief instrument in the struggles to create a world based upon justice. Nothing else is a substitute for it; nothing else can be a substitute for it" (New York Times, April 6, 1949).

<sup>13</sup> Cf. Statement of John Foster Dulles made before the third National Conference on Churches and the World Order on March 8, 1949:

"So far as it is humanly possible to judge, the Soviet government, under conditions now prevailing, does not contemplate the use of war as an instrument of its national policy. I do not know any responsible high official, military or civilian, in this government or any government, who believes that the Soviet state now plans conquest by open military aggression.

"It can be assumed that the Soviet state would use the Red Army if its leaders felt that their homeland was imminently and seriously menaced. That is why in our statement on Soviet-American relations made two and one-half years ago we (the churchmen) said that the United States should not seek military bases so close to the Soviet Union as to carry an offensive threat that is disproportionate to defensive value.

"That is why our fellowship with the peoples of Western Europe, and particularly of Scandinavia, ought not to seem to bring United States military might directly to Russia's border.

"It would indeed involve a high tribute to Soviet leaders to assume that under these circumstances they would exercise more self-control than would our people under comparable circumstances, as, for example, if the Soviet Union had military arrangements with a country at our border" (New York Herald-Tribune, March 9, 1949, p. 10).

"Either a simple guaranty of Western Europe or American entry into a North Atlantic Union would tend to weaken the United Nations. The emphasis upon more limited guaranties and the centering of discussions of security matters in more limited institutions would weaken the world's interest in universal procedures for maintaining international peace and security for all under the Charter. Even if the terms of the Charter were observed and the machinery of the United Nations were utilized for giving effect to commitments under such an arrangement, the focus of world attention would be turned toward the relative power of the competing groups and away from the general obligations of the Charter and the machinery of the United Nations."

This report concluded that "an exclusive guarantee, alliance, or regional arrangement which is so powerful as to be, in fact, beyond control of the United Nations * * * is contrary to the spirit of Chapter 8 of the Charter" (Chapter 8 deals with Regional Arrangements).

The Charter of the United Nations, in rejecting the method of military alliance, did not sanction the creation of rival organizations of states hostilely confronting each other. The Charter manifestly does not offer the legal means for its own destruction.

On February 11, 1940, Secretary General Trygve Lie warned: "No regional arrangement can ever be a satisfactory substitute for the United Nations. If people generally began to accept alliances as substitute for genuine, world-wide collective security, then the hope of a lasting peace would be greatly endangered."

CONCLUSION

ADHERENCE TO THE CHARTER AND ITS UNDERLYING PRINCIPLES OF NEGOTIATION, CONCURRENCE AND COOPERATION AFFORD THE MOST EFFECTIVE ASSURANCE OF A LASTING PEACE

The United Nations remains the best hope for peace. We must make a reality of the determination of the peoples of the United Nations, expressed in the preamble of the Charter, "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind."

War is not inevitable. The trend to war must be arrested. It is fitting to recall the words of former Secretary of State Byrnes, in his book "Speaking Frankly" (pp. 313, 315, 316):

"There is too much talk of war and too little of peace. * * * Too much is at stake for us to lose our patience. Negotiating with the Soviets may affect the nerves of a few statesmen but another world war would more seriously affect the lives of millions of people. We must continue our efforts to develop through the United Nations a common law of nations to provide definite and agreed standards of conduct. It must rest upon something more than rules, something more than force, and something more than fear. It must be made to rest upon the growth of a common fellowship, common interests and common ideas among the peoples of the world. * * * I remain confident that we can achieve a just peace through co-operative effort * * *."

The National Lawyers Guild on February 21, 1949, at its recent convention held in Detroit, unanimously adopted a resolution which declared:

"The revitalization of cooperative relations among the great powers and especially between the United States and the Soviet Union, points the path to peace."

"This is the will of all peace-loving humanity. It was voiced in the resolution adopted [unanimously] at the Paris session of the Geneva Assembly where, on the initiative of Mexico, the Assembly made an appeal to the great powers to compose their differences and 'to redouble their efforts in a spirit of solidarity and mutual understanding to secure in the briefest possible time a final settlement of the war and a conclusion of all peace settlements.'"

The Guild resolution stated:

"This approach will afford the most effective assurance of a durable peace and a vigorous United Nations organization and obviate resort to military alliances, avoid the heavy impact of armament expenditures, and make possible the advance of the living standards and social welfare of our people and of all peoples throughout the world."

The course thus proposed undoubtedly reflects the will of the American people. It is the course our Government should follow in the interests of peace and of the United Nations.

Respectfully submitted,

NATIONAL LAWYERS GUILD,
CLIFFORD J. DUBB, President.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you very much, Mr. Durr.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. We are very much obliged to you.

Was the resolution adopted by the Guild after the treaty had been made known to the country?

Mr. CROWN. The statement which was the basis of the report here was prepared after the text of the North Atlantic Treaty was published to the public. The convention of the Guild which dealt with the principles as had been declared in the North Atlantic Treaty took place at the end of February.

The CHAIRMAN. That was before the treaty was signed.

Mr. CROWN. Before the treaty was signed, but where we discussed the basic principles. Thereafter, when the State Department released the text of the proposed treaty, at that point an analysis was made of it, and it was that analysis of the actual text which was submitted to all the members of the International Law Committee and, I should add, also submitted to each member of the National Board of the Lawyers Guild for his consideration on the basis of the actual text, which was, of course, signed on April 4.

The CHAIRMAN. That was after your convention had adjourned?

Mr. CROWN. That is true.

Senator DONNELL. Has there been action taken by any official committee of the Lawyers Guild on the subject matter of the North Atlantic Treaty since the text of it was made public?

Mr. CROWN. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. What action has been so taken?

Mr. CROWN. After the text had been released to the public an analysis was made, and that analysis, which was the core of the memorandum of law and the statement that Mr. Durr presented, was then circularized to each member of the International Law Committee and to each member of the National Board, so the action was taken on the basis of the actual text of the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. So this memorandum of law, consisting of some 20 or 21 pages, prepared by the Committee on International Law and Relations, was prepared after the text of the treaty had been submitted to the members of the Committee on International Law and Relations?

Mr. CROWN. Yes. As you will see, citations are made from the actual text and actual provisions of the North Atlantic Treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Libby, come around.

We are glad to note your presence, as we have so many times before.

Mr. Libby, we are very much pressed for time. I was wondering if you could not insert your statement in the record and comment on it orally. It will save us much time.

STATEMENT OF FREDERICK J. LIBBY, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, NATIONAL COUNCIL FOR PREVENTION OF WAR

Mr. LIBBY. I will do that. I have been sitting there thinking how glad I am that this legal evidence that the North Atlantic Pact is illegal under international law was presented fully. I would much rather you would hear that than hear my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. We have heard that.

Mr. LIBBY. I hope you will take it to heart, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. We will give it consideration.

Mr. LIBBY. I will summarize my statement. I will trust you to read it at your leisure afterward.

REASONS FOR OPPOSITION TO TREATY

First, I urge you not to ratify the Atlantic Pact, and for three reasons:

1. Because it is a war pact and not a peace pact.

2. Because it does not increase the security of the United States, as is claimed, but lessens our security without giving security to Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. Is one of your complaints that we ought to give Europe more security than the treaty provides?

Mr. LIBBY. I am complaining that we are taking away our security without giving security to Europe. I am thinking of our security first, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. You complain that it does not give enough security to Europe. Do you favor giving more?

Mr. LIBBY. I am in favor of taking a different approach to Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent, Mr. Libby?

Mr. LIBBY. I state it at the top there, and I thought that was one thing where I could cut, because you have already said that I have been here frequently. My name is Frederick J. Libby. I am executive secretary of the National Council for Prevention of War.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a salaried man, I suppose?

Mr. LIBBY. Modestly.

The CHAIRMAN. You give all your time to this purpose?

Mr. LIBBY. I give all my time to it, and have for 28 years.

The CHAIRMAN. We applaud your desire to prevent war.

Mr. LIBBY. And you share it, I know.

I had a letter from you recently which I greatly appreciated, but it was not quite along the line you will find at the top of page 2 of my statement.

DANGER OF MILITARY ALLIANCES

When Senator Vandenberg was debating with you and others the lend-lease bill, which you supported on the ground that it would lead us toward peace, Senator Vandenberg said [reading]:

My greatest fundamental objection to it is that it invites and authorizes the President of the United States to enter the continental arena of "power politics," which has been the curse of the Old World and the cradle of its incessant wars for a thousand years; invites and authorizes him to become power politician No. 1 of this whole, mad world. * * * I am opposed to any of these politics, Mr. President, which would needlessly threaten to drag us into war, when we are still officially saying that we intend to stop "short of war" and when this very legislation is being labeled "peace." I freely concede that our whole status today is precarious, but that is no reason why we should make it more so.

The CHAIRMAN. That was said some years ago. That was said by Senator Vandenberg many years ago, and the world has progressed and changed and developed so radically since that time.

Mr. LIBBY. For the worse.

The CHAIRMAN. You can insert "for the worse" if you want to, but I do not see that that is pertinent to this inquiry.

Mr. LIBBY. Well, what he said with regard to the Lend-Lease Act can be said with still greater force in condemnation of the Atlantic Pact, except for one very important qualification. Once you commit our country irrevocably to the military alliance, the President ceases to have the control he now has of our foreign policy. We give up our independence of action. The military capital of our half of the world moves from Washington to Fontainebleau or somewhere else.

Now, then, I will not go over the whole case here.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope not.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ARMAMENT RACE

Mr. LIBBY. But I would like to call your attention to the dates at the bottom of page 2, indicating that Russia is not solely responsible for the arms race in which we are involved:

May 1945: President Truman announced that the United States will maintain air and naval bases anywhere in the world that suits our interest.

The CHAIRMAN. We were still at war at that time, were we not?

Mr. LIBBY. Yes. Then I will give you October.

October 1945: President Truman in his Navy Day speech announced that the United States proposes to maintain "supremacy on land, on sea, and in the air." The war was over then, Mr. Chairman.

In March 1947, President Truman proclaimed the "Truman doctrine" to "contain" communism, declaring that we would aid any country with our economic and military resources in preventing the spread of communism, whether the country is threatened from within or from without.

Then, last summer, there were synthetic war scares and a budget for the Armed Services of unprecedented magnitude in peacetime.

Confronted with this record, no fair-minded man would say that our Government is without any responsibility for the arms race in which we find ourselves and of which the Atlantic Pact is the latest development.

The latest slogan on which the pact and the foreign policy of the past 4 years are based is "Peace through strength." Formerly it was "The Russians will recognize nothing but force." David Lawrence described our policy last year in the United States News as "to scare Russia or prepare to fight Russia." Mr. Louis Johnson, our new Secretary of Defense, in addressing your committee a few days ago, said much the same thing when he declared that—

From the military viewpoint, the basic objectives of the treaty are to deter war and to attain maximum military effectiveness in war, if war cannot be prevented.

Senator VANDENBERG. May I interrupt you? In your chronology you very carefully omit all of the repeated efforts that the Government of the United States has made in the United Nations and through its instrumentalities to seek universal disarmament and to control international traffic in arms, do you not?

Mr. LIBBY. I come to that later.

Senator VANDENBERG. Oh, all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Referring to Secretary Johnson's statement, you are for that, are you not? Are you not for that?

Mr. LIBBY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Talking about that statement, don't you want to prevent war if you can?

Mr. LIBBY. That half of it, but the second half, no.

The CHAIRMAN. If it comes, though—if war was to come—don't you want to be ready for it?

Mr. LIBBY. The second half of that statement is what tends to bring on the war, as I shall show.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; hurry along.

DANGERS OF ARMS RACE

Mr. LIBBY. Now, gentlemen, an arms race is not the road to peace. At best it can result in the unconditional surrender of one of the contestants or in a prolonged armed truce while both sides prepare for war, as we seem to be doing now. At worst it results in the war which it has made virtually inevitable.

Here at this point I will not read the whole statement of Earl Grey of Falden, the former British Foreign Secretary, which you will find in his memoirs entitled "Twenty-Five Years (1892-1916)," in which he gives his interpretation of how World War I came about. [Reading:]

More than one thing may be said about the causes of the war, but the statement that compromises most truth is that militarism and the armaments inseparable from it made war inevitable. Armaments were intended to produce a sense of security in each nation—that was the justification put forward in defense of them. What they really did was to produce fear in everybody. Fear causes suspicion and hatred; it is hardly too much to say that, between nations, it stimulates all that is bad and depresses all that is good.

I will skip the rest, and go on to the next page.

Dr. Rudin pointed out that there were two safety valves that were operative in Europe during this period and that the British navy played only a minor role and during only a part of this long period. The safety valves were the free movement of peoples and the relatively free movement of goods. Sixty million people, Dr. Rudin said, emigrated from Europe during this century. This was one safety valve. The other was the free trade policy which Britain introduced and popularized. Coupled with the industrial revolution which came conveniently to prevent unemployment, conditions of misery and want were prevented from becoming causes of war.

Summing up this point, the Atlantic pact is a war pact because it heightens the tension between the United States and Russia, and relies upon winning an arms race with Russia as the foundations of peace. History is strewn with the pitiful wrecks of nations that have followed this will-o'-the-wisp of "Peace through strength," and you, who are now guiding our destiny, should ponder the record.

WEAKNESSES OF THE TREATY

It would be superfluous for me to rehearse the arguments that have been offered you by Secretary Acheson and Gen. Omar Bradley, and repeated in varying forms by other witnesses. Briefly, they are that we add to our population, for a possible war against Russia, the populations and resources of the western European nations and their colonies; assure to ourselves air bases not far from Russia's borders; and assure also, what seems very important to General Bradley, a bridgehead where we can land our troops without the losses suffered on the beaches of Normandy.

Superficially these points would seem to be valid, but when you examine them serious doubts will trouble your minds.

First will be your doubt about the part which the Communist Parties of France, Italy, and perhaps Belgium are going to play in a possible war with Russia. They constitute a quarter of the population of France, and being largely workingmen from the cities, will constitute at least a quarter of the French Army. They permeate the French Government, as we were reminded recently, when we learned that M. Joliot-Curie, a man in the strategic position of membership in the French Atomic Energy Commission, is a Communist. You can't help wondering whether, in putting our new weapons into the hands of the French armed forces, you are arming our allies, or as has happened so recently in China, our enemies.

A similar situation faces you in Italy, where the powerful influence of the Pope and the Catholic religion has been unable to prevent the spread of communism. Togliatti, the Communist leader, has become one of the most powerful forces in the nation. Aided by widespread unemployment and consequent misery and want, the Communist Party, although it has lost some ground lately as the result of the Marshall plan, confidently expects millions of recruits if ever a depression hits the United States, cutting off our economic aid.

Under the peace treaty, Italy is forbidden to rearm beyond a negligible figure. Yet Italy is one of the nations with whose security our security is to be indissolubly linked.

EXTENSION OF UNITED STATES RESPONSIBILITIES

General Bradley alluded before your committee to the fact that in future "our frontiers of collective defense lie in common with theirs in the heart of Europe." An attack on any of them, from Norway in the north to Italy in the south, will be an attack on the United States. Will Russia know whether the French Communists and the Italian Communists mean what they say when they declare that they will not fight against Russia? When the pinch comes will they fight loyally under our banner? You don't know, and this is one of the points at which doubts assail you.

Nor can you forget what a troublesome salient Berlin has been. You wonder whether Norway may not prove to be equally dangerous as the eastern border of our area of commitment. They tell us that the pact changes nothing in our real commitments, but you can't help wondering whether, without the pact, you would feel obliged to plunge the world into its final war with bacteria and atom bombs, without even taking time for consultation, if a Russian airplane were shot down over Norway or if a band of Russian soldiers crossed the Norwegian border.

As you sit of an evening pondering whether you are justified in extending the border of our responsibility to the heart of Europe, you must wonder also whether the prime ministers of the 11 countries that are to be associated with us in this military alliance will be wise and responsible men without exception during the almost infinite period of the next 20 years of turmoil. I say "without exception," because it will take only one of them, who is irresponsible, or stupid, cocky, with a chip on his shoulder, to plunge us into a fatal war.

You are proposing nothing less than to give our blank check to each of 11 quarrelsome, bankrupt governments, pledging our honor that we will come to their aid with all our resources and our manpower, if they are attacked.

When we remember that Britain's blank check to Poland in 1939, in the form of a pledge just like this, that if Poland resisted Hitler, Britain would come to Poland's aid with all its resources, led Joseph Beck to refuse to negotiate with Germany over the controversial Polish Corridor and on that issue brought ruin to the world. Such reflections, I should think, would be disquieting to you who carry this great responsibility.

You can't help remembering also, because it is recent history, that nations sometimes welch on their treaties, as Britain and France welched in 1938 on their treaty with Czechoslovakia and as all the signatories of the Atlantic Charter, including ourselves, have welched on its political and economic obligations. Will this pact be kept when so many pacts are falling by the wayside?

ECONOMIC RECOVERY AND REARMAMENT

Still another doubt would be justified. Since communism is already mighty in France and Italy, how do you make France and Italy secure from communism? What will the guns you are going to furnish, to Communists and non-Communists alike, do to ward off communism from these badly divided countries? President Truman, in the appendix to his announcement of the Truman Doctrine, used a sentence which should have been its text but wasn't. He said: "Communism thrives in misery and want." Should not our attack be, then, on misery and want?

Secretary Acheson and General Bradley agree that the European nations will furnish "between $6 and $7 for each dollar this country puts into the military aid program." Were you aware that the European nations have such abundant resources that they can match us 6 to 1? To be sure, we are told that our $1 in military aid will in reality pay for $10 worth, since this is a bargain-counter arrangement, with costly equipment marked down to 10 cents on the dollar. But how long will the European nations be able to keep up this expenditure at 6 to 1? And where has their sudden wealth been hidden? And where is their manpower to come from, if it is not to come from their factories and farms, which are essential to the continued production of their wealth?

DEFENSE LINE IN EUROPE

I saw in yesterday's papers that you, Mr. Chairman, assured Mr. James Warburg that you have no intention of "stringing any army along the Rhine, the Oder or the Elbe." Senator Vandenberg indicates that he thinks the program "does not contemplate any Maginot Line defense"; and that it "does not contemplate any substantial increase in troops."

Gen. Omar Bradley, however, in his testimony before your committee said [reading]:

Plans for the common defense of the existing free world must provide for the security of western Europe without abandoning these countries to the terrors of another enemy occupation. Only upon that premise can nations closest to the frontiers be expected to stake their fortunes with ours in the common defense.

That General Bradley is interpreting correctly the expectations of our prospective allies has been made very plain in the press. The French, in particular, have warned us that they fear American liberation almost as much as they do Russian occupation. In other words, they expect from the pact precisely what General Bradley expects, namely, that an impregnable line will be established somewhere to the east of France.

One can't help asking your committee, in view of this conflict between your two most influential members and the Army Chief of Staff, which is the correct interpretation of the pact? Will you guarantee that General Bradley is mistaken? And if he is correct in saying that the eastern border of the extended United States must be made impregnable to protect the border peoples and prevent the necessity of later liberating the survivors of a Russian occupation, what is it going to cost us in equipment and manpower?

WEAKENING EFFECT OF TREATY

Summing up our second point, this military alliance does not increase the security of the United States but lessens our security, because it admits to our allied fortress and even to our allied army a large percentage of Communists who have pledged themselves not to fight on our side against Russia; because Norway is a dangerous salient which we cannot defend; and because the pact is a blank check, a guaranty for 20 years that, regardless of the stupidity or the cockiness of the foreign ministers of eleven governments, we will protect them from the consequences of their folly if they are attacked, without even asking for consultation.

The pact gives no security to Europe from communism because misery and want will increase under the pact. It will not guard Europe's frontiers from Russian invasion unless the United States is prepared to pay an impossible price.

THE ALLIANCE WILL COST US FAR MORE THAN WE CAN AFFORD, AND IT THREATENS US WITH ECONOMIC RUIN

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have gathered from newspaper reports that the Senate and even your committee, which has usually been unanimous in recent years, are divided on the question of whether our country can afford, on top of its other financial obligations, to "implement" the pact for the coming year with the military equipment it calls for. The value of this equipment is estimated at somewhat over $1,000,000,000, but with the understanding that the same equipment has cost us ten times as much, and with the further understanding that the army insists that it be replaced, which would cost us even more than the figure at which it was originally bought.

It is no wonder, gentlemen, that this problem is giving you a bad headache. If you ratify the pact and fail to implement it, it will be merely one more scrap of paper and western Europe will feel badly let down. But if you implement it, you will either have to raise our taxes in the teeth of diminishing incomes or launch our country on a new era of deficit spending, which you know would be economically dangerous.

PEACE PROGRAM AS ALTERNATIVE

An alternative policy that I would call adequate must meet the three tests by which the North Atlantic military pact stands condemned:

1. It must be a peace pact and not a war pact.
2. It must increase the security of the United States and at the same time increase the security of Europe.
3. It must strengthen our economy and, as far as possible, the economy of all nations.

Any program that will pass these three tests must be built upon the principle of "peace through international cooperation," not "peace through strength." While the United Nations as now constituted is an attempt to combine power politics with peace, as I testified before your committee when the UN Charter was under consideration, it will necessarily be our starting point, because it is all we have. In developing it, our aim must be to strengthen its Assembly at the expense of the Security Council and implement adequately its many agencies for "peaceful change," always remembering that "peaceful change" and not the maintenance of any status quo is peace.

The second absolute in a true peace program will make progressive world disarmament rather than progressive world rearmament its clear and sincere objective. I have not been satisfied with our Government's use of the rigid Baruch plan, for international ownership and control of the sources of atomic energy, to prevent progress toward world disarmament. The Baruch plan, if it had been presented by Russia, would not, I think, have been accepted by the Senate. American insistence upon that or nothing has prevented negotiation of a disarmament program such as Russia has proposed.

The third essential of an adequate alternative policy is provision for world reconstruction, with a united Germany serving as our bridge for trade between the east and the west instead of being used as a bone to be picked and fought over by both east and west.

Finally, since my purpose is only to be suggestive rather than comprehensive in this brief statement, not only Russia but the United States must get out of its head the fixed idea that the other nation is solely to blame for our failure to get on together. Our Government has been trying "either to scare Russia or to prepare to fight Russia." It is time we outgrew this puerile and hopeless policy, and the equally puerile fear of Russia which our armed services have deliberately created in their own interest.

"One world or none" is no figure of speech. The supreme enemy of mankind is not Soviet Russia but war. Peace is the only security for all nations.

40 FAULTS FLAW ATLANTIC PACT

(By James Finucane)

PROPOSED ALLIANCE COULD NOT DELIVER PEACE OR SECURITY

The proposed North Atlantic Military Pact would be another blunder in American foreign policy because:

1. It would globalize the discredited Truman Doctrine, which has broken down in China and Greece.

2. It would by-pass our proper role as a heavily contributing partner in peaceful world affairs, and recast us as a gun-toting Caesar, imposing a Pax Americana.

3. It would make us accomplices of the four leading colonial powers at a time when three of them should be under world-wide moral condemnation for their performances in Indonesia, Malaya, and Indochina.

4. It would supply us and the Russians with easily available pretexts for interventions and counterinterventions all over the world.

5. It would alienate from us the plain people of Europe and Asia, who are sick of the army way.

6. It would fatten the military caste here and abroad and enable them to batten upon their fellow citizens for years longer.

7. It would set up a virtual boycott of traditional neutrals such as Sweden and Switzerland, whose wisdom has been demonstrated in the two recent World Wars.

8. Making the Rhine the first line of defense would sacrifice Germany, including the Ruhr, to Russia.

9. It would commit United States energies to freezing the status quo, however unjust, all over the world.

10. It would make it possible for Bevin, Queuille, or even Queen Juliana, to fumble United States troops into another international blood bath.

WOULD FURTHER DESTROY EUROPEAN HOPE OF UNITY

11. The pact would increase the disunity of Europe, subdividing the split-off western half into pact and nonpact splinters.

12. The alliance would be politically unreliable, as Britain and France are already formally allied with Russia.

Britain could ideally return to her traditional policy of playing two powers against each other, to our disadvantage.

13. Subconsciously, the French would fear that the Americans and British would fail to send planes as they did in 1940. And repeat Oran.

14. Subconsciously, the British would feel the French, with millions of Communists, might surrender too soon, as they did in 1940.

Wouldn't the Communists in France and Italy turn our weapons against us?

15. It would make it unmistakable that Russia is being encircled by enemies.

PACT DOES NOT HOLD WATER AS MILITARY PLAN

16. The pact would expose us to the mistakes and vulnerability of our allies. Luxemburg, with a population the size of Jersey City, is a charter member of the proposed pact.

17. The pact proposes to arm 45 miscellaneous western European divisions, to do a job which Hitler failed to do with 240 divisions.

18. To be more than a proper shield, these troops would need to be backed up with a huge American conscript force.

No wonder the Army is asking Congress for 837,000 men in H. R. 1437. And is readying UMT up its sleeve.

19. This would add the danger of "hollow shell" overdeployment to our existing peril of overcommitment.

20. Our quest for air bases as near the Russian border as possible reveals our purpose to launch, at the outset of hostilities, an immoral strategic bombardment of Russian cities with weapons of mass destruction.

RUSSIANS VIEW PACT AS ATTACK ON THEIR COUNTRY

21. The pact could not be counted on to deter the feared Russian aggression. Rather it might invite it, in defense against our threat. Norway and Finland already feel the cold breath of intensified Russian interest.

22. Feeding, clothing, and drilling 2,000,000 "cheap infantrymen" would put a terrific unproductive drain on food and fabrics, and deprive needy civilians of those same items. (We use the word "division" for a division-unit, including supply and overhead through all the rear echelons, totaling 50,000 men.)

23. Equipping the European air force with its first contingent of 4,500 jet fighters and 4,000 jet bombers would aggravate existing shortages of metals and fuels.

ECONOMIC COSTS NULLIFY MARSHALL PLAN PROSPECTS

24. What this will mean to the impoverished peoples of Europe in increasing tax burdens is seen by the Netherlands budgeting 100,000,000 guilders for western military union in 1949.

25. With all these military emphases, the proposed pact would disillusion Europe about United States economic aid. Europeans would feel they are being used instead of helped.

26. The pact would discourage new nonmilitary business enterprises, and precipitate a flight of capital to the United States. Bankers don't invest in a haberdashery on a battlefield.

27. The pact obviously knocks the Marshall plan schedule for European recovery by 1952 into a cocked hat.

28. The pact would mean another complete whirl in the viciously ascending spiral of armaments competition.

29. At home, the pact might be a shot-in-the-arm for United States business now, but it would principally benefit our still bloated war industries which must face a peacetime economy eventually—unless * * * ?

30. This would make the inevitable business adjustment worse when it comes, unless war is invoked to use up the accumulated arms inventory.

VIOLATES SPIRIT AND INTENT OF UN CHARTER

31. The proposed pact would mock the spirit of the United Nations Charter, while paying lip-service to the letter. It would ignore the basic purpose of the UN, expressed in article 1, section 1: "to bring about by peaceful means * * * adjustment * * * of international disputes."

32. Instead, it would take advantage of the exceptional conditions of Article 51 to undermine the world's hopes.

33. The Alliance would attempt to give by indirection a moral commitment that could not legally be given under the Constitution.

34. Starting with any border incident, the pact could make automatic national suicide for the signers a matter of honor. Modern war is now suicide.

35. The pact would attempt to treat the symptoms of world disorder by repression, rather than to remove the causes by negotiation.

36. The pact, as advertised, would have two objectives: To scare the Russians into not fighting; or, should the Russians choose to fight anyway, to "win" the next war. The stakes are too heavy.

NEGLECTS THE MORE EXCELLENT WAY STILL OPEN TO US

37. The pact is, in short, the tragically distraught stratagem of policy-makers who have either misconceived, or shut their eyes to, most of the basic problems confronting America. Russia is only one of our problems.

An overcrowded Germany, an obsolescent Europe, an awakening Far East, and a universal social ferment, would still confront us if Russia ceased to exist tomorrow.

38. Even if it worked as its missionary proponents fondly hope, the pact would launch America on a barracks century, and condemn our coming generations to universal sentry duty.

39. It would stifle the creative activity of spiritually free civilian minds and fix our souls from infancy at bayonet point against the other half of the world.

PAX AMERICANA—HATE, RUIN, AND WAR

(By Frederick J. Libby)

A Pax Americana, to take over the role of the defunct Pax Britannica, is fast emerging as the administration's idea of "peace, freedom, and plenty." For 100 years, from 1815 to 1914, after seven wars with France, the British Navy "ruled the waves" almost unchallenged. No major wars disturbed this British peace.

Why shouldn't our country now have its turn and maintain an American peace for the next century? Peace rests on power—so the argument runs—and we have it. Our planes can rule the air. Our Navy rules the seas. And when we have forged the North Atlantic Military Alliance, and have armed our allies with American weapons and established American air bases at strategic points throughout their territory, we shall be dominant on land also, because as long as our resources last, our productive capacity will continue to be incomparable.

POWER THE TRUMAN DREAM, PEACE AS BYPRODUCT

So we shall be secure, and able to bestow "peace, freedom, and prosperity" on the smaller nations that are amenable to our beneficent will. Ultimately, of course, the UN will assume responsibility; but that is a long way off.

If this is not the dream which President Truman has cherished ever since he told the world on October 23, 1945, that the United States intended to maintain supremacy "on land, on sea, and in the air," it would be difficult to interpret his policies since that decisive speech. Power, dominant power, is obviously the goal of our "bipartisan" foreign policy, with peace as a desirable but incidental byproduct.

Remembering that President Truman and Dean Acheson, and even that mighty man, Secretary Forrestal, are our servants and not our masters, that they have no power except what the American people choose to lend them for their brief periods in office, let us scrutinize their program with the same care that we would give the work of any other employees, to see whether this is what we want.

NAVY PLAYED SUPERFICIAL PART IN 100-YEAR PAX BRITANNICA

The alluring hope of a Pax Americana, based on our military power, goes back to a misinterpretation of the Pax Britannica. Historians say that the British Navy is given too much credit.

Dr. Harry R. Rudin, professor of History at Yale University, in a recent address in New York pointed out that the relatively free movement of peoples and of goods that prevailed during that century of industrial revolution was mainly responsible for the long peace.

FREE MOVEMENT OF GOODS AND PEOPLES MADE PEACE POSSIBLE

On the one hand, there was Britain's free-trade policy which stimulated freedom of trade between nations. On the other hand, we had the two Americas wide open to immigrants. Sixty million people emigrated from Europe during this period, Dr. Rudin said, the majority going to North and South America.

Since "peaceful change" is the sine qua non of peace, it was these two safety valves that made this long era of peace possible. Our militarists, who imagine that American guns and American planes can give the world what British free trade and the hospitality of the Americas produced, are terribly wrong; and they are misleading the President.

Nor will the "bold" Fourth Point of the President's Inaugural Address, which looks to the exploitation of backward areas in Africa and elsewhere, furnish a sufficient outlet for the overflowing exports and populations of Europe, unless a fundamental change takes place in the prevailing attitudes of men. A world divided and subdivided by hates and fears will never achieve peace or freedom or prosperity.

ROOTS OF REVOLUTION UNTOUCHED IN LATIN AMERICA

To illustrate how fundamental is the difference between what we are doing now and the building of a durable peace, suppose we take a look at Latin America. The conservative quarterly review, Foreign Affairs, for January 1949, contains an article entitled "Roots of Revolution in Latin America" by Donald Marquand Dozer, which pictures what the writer calls "factors making for a violent change:"

"Almost everywhere opulent minorities flaunt their riches before a 'melancholy sea of illiterates.' * * * It is difficult to name other areas of the world in which so few have so much and so many have so little. * * *

NATIONAL WEALTH IN FEW HANDS

"Approximately 90 percent of the national wealth of Colombia is controlled by 3 percent of the population. In Argentina, 15 families own one-tenth of the entire land area of Buenos Aires province; and the same families have land-holdings throughout the nation amounting to 7,000,000 acres. In Chile 0.3 percent of the total number of landed proprietors own more than 52 percent of all the farm land of the nation. In Venezuela, fewer than 3 percent of the landed proprietors own more than 70 percent of the land.

"In Mexico, a similar concentration of landownership, under which in 1910 only 1 percent of the Mexican people owned 70 percent of the country's arable land, was a powerful factor in causing the epochal revolution which broke out in the year.

AGRICULTURAL LABORERS REVOLTING RISK ONLY A DAY'S POOR WAGE

"The overwhelming majority of agricultural laborers in the 20 countries of Latin America, all of them agricultural, live under oppressive conditions of peonage, sharecropping, and in some cases even unconditional slavery. As the Secretary-General of the Organization of American States, Dr. Alberto Lleras Camargo, said recently: 'There are millions of inhabitants without a home or an organized family life, without schools, without land, without even personal belongings. Their only risk in joining a revolutionary movement is the loss of the following day's wages.'"

GUNS FOR LATIN AMERICAN ARMIES NO CUBE FOR HUNGRY BELLIES

President Truman is supporting the demand of our brass hats that we strengthen the military arm in each country of Latin America as a safeguard against the spread of communism! The alternative policy which we are advocating would be to include Latin America in the benefits of the Marshall plan, with a view to industrialization and the consequent raising of the living standards of the underprivileged masses.

The inevitable result of the brass-hat program has already been a succession of revolutions in country after country, with more to follow.

Don't forget that "communism thrives in misery and want." American guns only accentuate the misery and want.

DURABLE PEACE REQUIRES REMOVING CAUSES OF WAR

Just as our arming of Latin America instead of industrializing it is intensifying the pressure for revolutionary communism in 20 countries, so Morgenthauism in Germany and the Cairo agreement concerning Japan have laid the foundations for future wars in Europe and Asia. The silly notion that prewar nationalism in Germany was due to our failure to make the Germans realize that they had lost World War I and that the nationalism of Japan could be "contained" in future by driving the Japanese back to their four islands and disarming them there, without removing the economic causes of their Nationalist movements, is still cherished in influential quarters. They will be taught their mistake in due course of events unless we correct it.

JAPAN OVERFLOWED FOLLOWING EUROPE'S LEAD

Japan overflowed on to the continent of Asia because her four islands are incapable of giving a decent living to her growing population, which increases at the rate of 700,000 a year.

Her militarists unfortunately were able to point to the way Britain and other European countries had met the same problem by imperialist expansion and conquest. As our New England secretary, Mark Shaw, pointed out in Peace Action for September 1945, Great Britain had added to itself an area 140 times its own size; Belgium an area 80 times its size; Holland, one 60 times its size; France, 20 times its size; Portugal, 22 times its size. Was it strange that the militarists of Japan were able to convince the Japanese people that they should emulate the example of their "betters"?

WORLD DOMINATION BRINGS HATE, RUIN, AND WAR

What will be the fruits of a Pax Americana? Can we reasonably expect peace, freedom, and prosperity to grow on this tree?

The first fruits already are mutual recrimination, suspicion, and fear. Our Government is "setting the Scandinavian countries against one another." The Senate is "welching," "Would the French fight?"

How about freedom? The President has already given us fair warning that, to carry out his program, we must forfeit freedom and become what I would call a police state. UMT for our youth, price and wage controls for industry and labor, "work or fight" laws to be automatically imposed in the first emergency, and even the tapping of our telephone wires by any Government agency that wants to spy on their fellow citizens—this is not freedom. For free-born Americans it would be slavery.

But if the program brings peace? It will not bring peace. An arms race is not peace. An armed truce between two blocs of nations is the opposite of peace. A state of increasing tension, which our pursuit of "supremacy on land, on sea, and in the air" assures, will bring no peace, no freedom, no prosperity, but universal hate, universal ruin, and a war of extermination.

TO IGNORE SPIRITUAL FORCES IS UNREALISTIC, SAYS DE JOUVENEL

A French writer, Bertrand de Jouvenel, in the European supplement to Human Events for January 19, 1949, after a brilliant diagnosis of the state of Europe today, concludes with certain reflections which we are not accustomed to expect from a popular French journalist:

"From country to country and within the same country, the continental Europeans detest each other for past evils, real or imaginary. To many Europeans, the German is an invader and the oppressor of yesterday. But also one's own compatriot is possibly an 'informer,' either of the occupation period or of the epuration period, or again an informer in posse under the coming dispensation of communism or reaction."

After speaking feelingly of the King of England's broadcast on Christmas Day and the "reign of love" in England which it revealed, M. de Jouvenel continues: "It is this reign of love which must be extended to all western Europe and which must prevail over the disruptive forces of hatred if the new political formation is to take shape. A constitutional body is futile if it has no soul."

"Whoever speaks of spiritual forces risks classification as unrealistic. But in truth nothing can be more unrealistic than to expect western union to be achieved by political means and under the motivation of a common interest. * * * Our interests rather oppose than unite us. We compete for the grant of American dollars; we compete for the procurement of raw materials."

CONVERSION A TASK FOR THE CHURCHES

"Nor will even the most vital interest unite us: that of common defense. For if Soviet attack is feared by a majority, it is hoped for by a strong minority in both France and Italy. And this minority sees national defense as a plot to destroy the fatherland of all workers. Reason by itself is powerless to overcome the resistance of prejudices and vested interests. There must be a sense of fellowship."

"The problem then is far less a problem in constitutional adjustment than it is a problem in conversion. And that seems to be a matter for the churches and the intellectuals. * * * A major failing of our times is an exaggerated belief in historical trends, which blinds us to the power of a good man."

THUMB-NAIL ANSWERS TO PACT SUPPORTERS

(By Frederick J. Libby)

The Government claque is literally "getting away with murder" in its arguments in behalf of what we regard as the crowning folly of this postwar period, the North Atlantic Military Alliance. President Truman himself is leading the pack with the calm assurance of "world peace within 2 years," as the fruit of the Truman doctrine and this its latest development. Frankly, this smacks too much of the assurance given the American people by President Roosevelt "again, again, and again" that our sons would "not be sent to fight on foreign soil."

Brief and concise answers to the specious arguments that are being circulated in support of the pact are here brought together. They are stated with "thumb-nail" brevity.

1. THAT ITS PURPOSE IS "PEACE"

When in history did an arms race bring peace? Viscount Grey of Fallodon, Britain's Foreign Secretary in the period when World War I was hatching, relates in his autobiography Twenty-Five Years (1892-1916), volume II, chapter XIX, page 53, how an armament race in search for security made World War I "inevitable."

"More than one thing may be said about the causes of the war, but the statement that comprises most truth is that militarism and the armaments inseparable from it made war inevitable." (Send to us for the full text of the quotation.)

2. THAT THE PACT WILL GIVE WESTERN EUROPE SECURITY FROM INVASION

No more than the Maginot Line gave France security! And for the next two years, not even that. What security can the piling up of armaments ever give from epidemics caused by bacteria or from atom bombs?

Which individual country will be made more secure by this intensification of Russia's insecurity? Will Norway sleep better nights if it harbors provocative American air bases always threatening Leningrad and Moscow? Will Germany be rearmed in contemptuous defiance of all our recent agreements? Or will the inhabitants of the Ruhr feel safer perhaps with the neutrality which Norway scorns?

Will the peoples of western Europe really expect to be protected from invasion by Russia and her satellites at every point in that long border that runs from Norway's North Cape to Italy's Achilles Heel, and is there some magic secret in a military alliance that will protect nations like France and Italy from Communists within?

3. THAT THE PACT ADDS TO THE SECURITY OF THE UNITED STATES

Every military alliance is a blank check given by each participant to each of the others, which can be cashed by any of them virtually at will. Twelve poverty-stricken, jealous nations, some of them, like France and Italy, with big Communist minorities in every phase of the national life including the Army, will get from us just such a blank check as Austria had from Germany in 1914, which a pugnacious minister cashed and started World War I. More recently, Joseph Beck, of Poland, had a similar blank check from Britain, under the supposed protection of which he defied Hitler over the disputed Polish Corridor and precipitated World War II.

This pact is a 20-year contract, which pretends to give stability to a period of unpredictable political and economic upheaval. No sane businessman would sign a private contract committing him for 5 years, pact or no pact. Who knows how many pig-headed warmongers are going to occupy responsible posts in the 12 governments that will have in their pockets a key to America's security?

No, if this pact is ratified by the Senate, you and I will not know security again.

4. THAT THE PACT IS "PURELY DEFENSIVE"

Will Russia know? And are we ourselves sure, after all the big talk that leaks out of the Pentagon as to the advantage that will come to the nation that strikes first?

Is there not grave danger that a minor incident on the long border between east and west would press the button that would wipe out our civilization?

The Kremlin has good reason to remember what we like to forget, that the United States, Britain, France, and Japan united in the invasion of Russia immediately after World War I. Would it be surprising if there lingers in Moscow enough suspicion of our noble motives in arming the west against the east possibly to tempt the masters of Russia not to risk waiting too long?

5. THAT IT IS "ALL RUSSIA'S FAULT"

The prevailing propaganda line is that our misdeeds are "all Russia's fault." It is hard to see how Russia could have been more provocative than it has been, but our provocativeness has fully matched Russia's since the promulgation of the aggressive Truman doctrine.

The USSR and the United States of America are engaged in a furious game of power politics, with world domination for either capitalism or communism as the prize. The United States relies on its military and economic superiority. Russia relies on its fifth columns to win by exploiting the universal misery and want, now causing unrest in a score of countries and bound to become intense if we "go broke."

Our Government must accept major responsibility for the dangerous arms race of the past 4 years, since Russia is militarily weak. The strategy of the Truman doctrine and the Atlantic Pact plays into Russia's hands in the long run, since it increases the misery and want in which communism thrives.

6. THAT THERE IS "NO ALTERNATIVE"

We touch here upon the fatal weakness of a militarized government, such as ours is today. It thinks only in terms of force. "The Russians recognize nothing but force" is military thinking, and when it becomes the mainspring of our foreign policy, it leads automatically to an arms race and ultimately to war.

Our readers would gather from the newspapers the impression that Secretary Acheson determines our foreign policy and is responsible for the Atlantic Pact; but such is not the case. Our foreign policy is determined by the National Security Council, in which four secretaries from the Department of Defense heavily outnumber the Secretary of State.

TWO ALTERNATIVES

There are two alternative lines of policy, both of which avoid the provocativeness of the Atlantic Pact:

First, to halt the arms race and stabilize war expenditures by agreement at the present figure, enormously excessive though it is.

Second, accept in substance Russia's proposal that we work out together a plan for world-wide reduction of armaments.

Simultaneously with the lessening of tension which either of these policies would bring about, the practicability of a Big Four conference to settle our most burning differences should be persistently explored.

Wouldn't it be risky, you ask, to trust Russia without a system of inspection? Yes; both countries would be taking risks. But it would not be so risky as the mounting tension occasioned by the present arms race. Both countries are now adding to the tension by maintaining expensive spy systems. Even these could serve the purpose of preventing false alarms by keeping their governments informed of the same facts which would be learned through inspectors.

7. THAT EUROPEAN RECOVERY REQUIRES INCREASED MILITARY PROTECTION

Protection from whom? Russia is not preparing to overrun western Europe. If it were, the Atlantic Pact would be 2 years too late. Winston Churchill says that America's possession of atom bomb has been the protection of western Europe since the war. Have Europe's military leaders lost their faith in it?

As for ourselves, we think the evidence is conclusive that the diversion of effort from reconstruction to armaments, from butter to guns, in Greece and Turkey and the Middle East and Latin America and China has been the fatal blunder of the Truman administration, a transfer which the pact is bound to accentuate. Our fundamental rivalry with Russia is in the economic field; and we can't afford to waste our limited resources in huge unproductive expenditures.

8 THAT THE PACT STRENGTHENS US

If arming the North against the South would have strengthened the United States of America in its period of ideological conflict in the 1850's, then it can be argued that arming the west against the east now will strengthen the United Nations. It is preposterous.

9. THAT THE COST OF THE PACT IS LESS THAN THE COST OF ANOTHER WAR

Obviously. So what? The cost may be less than our annual bill for chewing gum, which is one of the Army's favorite comparisons. But since this military alliance against Russia makes war more probable and perhaps "inevitable," the comparison is without point.

The real question is whether our economy can carry the cost of arming western Europe in addition to our other burdens, a question which Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, President Truman's chief economic adviser, answers in the negative.

In an off-the-record speech in the Pentagon on April 6, Dr. Nourse declared to an audience of industrialists, publishers, labor leaders, and others that the arming of Europe, if undertaken, must be at the expense of our own military machine. More than that, since the present international tension may continue for a long period, Dr. Nourse cautioned his hearers against sacrificing our economic preparedness to the military and thereby giving "fuel to the development of a fifth column in our midst." France alone is said to want $15,000,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will recess until tomorrow at 10:30 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 1:30 p. m., a recess was taken until 10:30 a. m., Friday, May 13, 1949.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

---

FRIDAY, MAY 13, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to adjournment on May 12, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), Green, Vandenberg.

Also present: Senator Donnell.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will come to order.

Mr. Bernart Weitzer, national legislative representative, Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, before the first witness starts I want to clear up a matter in the record yesterday.

Dr. H. M. Griffith, the vice president of the National Economic Council, testified, saying that the National Economic Council opposes ratification of this treaty. He also presented the personnel of his council and its board of directors.

CHARLES G. DAWES' POSITION ON ATLANTIC TREATY

At page 855 of the record Senator Donnell asked Dr. Griffith [reading]:

Is Mr. Charles G. Dawes, a member of the board of directors, former Vice President of the United States?

Dr. GRIFFITH. That is correct.

The implication of this context is obviously that former Vice President Dawes joins the National Economic Council in its opposition to the pact.

In order to be quite sure of Mr. Dawes' attitude I wired him. His reply is as follows:

I favor the North Atlantic Pact.

Senator DONNELL. I may say no implication was made or intended to the effect indicated by Senator Vandenberg. I had no knowledge of the attitude indicated by Mr. Dawes, but I had in mind that inasmuch as he was listed as one of the members it was perfectly proper to inquire whether or not he was the former Vice President of the United States.

Senator VANDENBERG. There is nothing that I have said that carries any such implication. I am very glad the Senator from Missouri emphasized the name. I think the Senator from Missouri was totally justified in believing that when the witness presented his board of directors and said that his organization was opposed to the pact I think the implication obviously was that General Dawes was opposed to the pact, and my correction is not a correction of the Senator from Missouri, but it is a correction of the implication left by the answer of the witness.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you, Senator.

I may state, however, that while it is entirely possible that the conclusion might be drawn from the membership of an individual on the board that he is for the statement presented by a member of a particular organization, I think it does not follow that each individual member of a board of directors may favor the action taken by the council. It is entirely possible. There may be a difference of opinion on the board. At any rate I do not in any sense mean to indicate that I had any knowledge or thought as to what the position of Mr. Dawes was. I did not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not think when a witness presents a statement and says his organization is for it and gives the board of directors that he ought to tell the committee those who are for it, in fairness, and keep clear the issues? I am not attaching any blame to the Senator from Missouri. It was perfectly plain that the introduction of the board of directors and all of the implications of the statement indicated that the members of the board were supporting his view, and that he was representing the board in the view that he had expressed. I think it is entirely proper for the Senator to introduce this statement and make it clear. I am surprised at Dr. Griffith leaving a gap that wide open in his testimony.

Senator DONNELL. I think Senator Vandenberg's action in communicating with Mr. Dawes is highly commendable, and I am very glad he did so, for two reasons.

In the first place, I think the Senator is quite correct that an implication could be very well drawn, and I am not so sure, on reflecting back into my own mental processes yesterday but what I probably did, in my own mind at least, have presumptions placed that every member of that board was favorable to the testimony given. I do not know that I consciously analyzed the situation as fully perhaps as I am right now. I remember that when I saw his name it instantly occurred to me to inquire whether or not it was the former Vice President of the United States.

May I conclude this statement by observing further, as I have in substance already done this morning, that I do not think it would have been proper for me or anyone else to make a statement or to draw a conclusion as to the attitude of Mr. Dawes individually merely because he was on that board, because he might have been upon the minority or there might have been differentiations in his opinion. Nevertheless I think the implications to which Senator Vandenberg refers not only could be drawn but perhaps were in my own mind to some extent, and I think his inquiry was proper.

The CHAIRMAN. I think there was a clear implication in the minds of all the committee members present that Mr. Dawes opposed the treaty. But that has been cleared up, and I am glad of it.

(The following statement was made by Senator Donnell at the beginning of the afternoon session, with the request that it be placed at the point of similar discussion in the record of the morning session.)

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, may I have the indulgence of the committee for a very short statement?

Mr. Chairman, this morning Senator Vandenberg made reference to that portion of the testimony yesterday on page 1706, which related to Mr. Charles G. Dawes. I asked the question, "Is Mr. Charles G. Dawes, a member of the board of directors, a former Vice President of the United States?", to which Dr. Griffith replied, "That is correct."

I made a statement this morning, and in fact made two statements, Mr. Chairman. I have been somewhat disturbed over that matter, and I have been trying to think back as best I can what my own motives were in asking that question, and I considered it in my judgment, I think, as I now see it, that they were twofold, and I wanted them in the record: To ascertain if the Charles G. Dawes who is mentioned in the leaflet which Dr. Griffith presented is the Charles G. Dawes who was Vice President of the United States; second, that if he is the same, to emphasize by my question in the record the fact that he is a member of the board of directors of an organization whose representative opposes ratification of the treaty.

Mr. Chairman, I think that from that fact the inference could be reasonably drawn, and I think I was conscious of it at the time and am yet, that Mr. Dawes opposed ratification.

I do not, however, think, Mr. Chairman, that his membership on the Board is at all conclusive, and I think that Mr. Vandenberg has rendered a very real service in apprising Mr. Dawes of the question which was presented to him and presenting here his response.

I wanted this to go on the record, because I did not feel satisfied with the condition of the record this morning.

I thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, Senator. That will be printed in the record.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF BERNARD WEITZER, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATIVE, JEWISH WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. WEITZER. On behalf of the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America I am happy to express our appreciation to your committee for the privilege of presenting the reasons for our support of the North Atlantic Pact which you are considering to protect peace and our security.

RESOLUTION SUPPORTING ATLANTIC TREATY

The authorization for our support is carried in a resolution voted unanimously by our national executive committee, March 27, 1949, at its meeting in Atlanta, Ga., as follows [reading]:

Whereas, as an earnest of its intention to preserve the peace of the world and the security of our own and other nations, who, twice in this century have been engulfed in war on a global scale, our Government has proposed the adoption of a measure to insure the mutual security of the governments and peoples of the North Atlantic region; and

Whereas, the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America, an organization of American veterans bound by its constitution to strive, in peace and war, for the extension of freedom, justice, and political and human rights to all peoples everywhere, considers the proposed North Atlantic Pact to be essential to the maintenance of peace and security of the United States of America, and those freedom-loving nations who have signified a desire to join with our Government in a mutual stand against any potential encroachment on the liberties all hold dear: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Jewish War Veterans of the United States of America, on the basis of a unanimous recommendation by its national executive committee, to memorialize the Congress of the United States of America to vote its approval of the proposed North Atlantic Pact without delay, thereby reaffirming decisively our country's determination to challenge any possible threat to the peace of the world and the security and dignity of our own country and those who adhere to the principles we cherish.

As a veterans' organization, we believe that we have a special interest in peace. Our members have had first hand experience of war. Our membership includes veterans of wars dating back to the Spanish-American War. The last surviving member of our organization who served in the War Between the States, died only 4 years ago. Our members know war. They want no more wars, for themselves nor for their children. And above all, they desire that the destruction of war be kept away from our country.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF THE TREATY

The North Atlantic Pact now before you will serve as a deterrent to war and we believe that it will prevent war and safeguard our country from war. Essentially, it is a pact for peace, a pact in which twelve peace-loving nations have joined to deter aggression. And so long as an aggressor is deterred, there is opportunity to prevent war.

Had there been such a treaty as this, prior to World War I and World War II, it is likely that the aggressors would not have dared war, and if war had come, the aggressor's defeat could have been achieved in less time and a lower cost in lives and in treasure.

As its text shows clearly, this treaty to protect peace envisages military action only if an aggressor has already launched an armed attack upon one of its member nations. These nations, except militarily weak Portugal, are democracies and hence are incapable of preparing and launching an aggressive war. Such preparations, as Hitler demonstrated, now require a major national effort lasting many years and including rapidly expanding armaments and extensive restrictions and controls, guns instead of butter, and tanks instead of automobiles. Unlike dictatorships, democracies cannot take such steps without the consent of their peoples.

This pact is no synthetic, artificial structure, but a natural outgrowth of community interest and generated by a pressing need. It demonstrates that democratic peoples can learn the bitter lessons of history and can translate that knowledge into provident action. Neither World War I nor World War II would have engulfed humanity if the nations joining this pact had accepted similar agreements before 1914 and 1939. Those two wars began because the aggressors hoped that Great Britain would not actually risk her life to assist their initial victims and because they felt confident that the United States would remain neutral, even at a heavy sacrifice of our national security. Our country has paid a terrible price for its past unwillingness to cooperate effectively for peace and the consequent necessity to cooperate with all its power in war. The American people are showing now, by the support of this pact, that they have too much sense to follow that road again.

NEED FOR TREATY

This treaty would not have been negotiated if there had not been a pressing need. That need has been made clear to all thinking people by the events of the last 4 years, by the actions and threats of Communist leaders, by the westward surge of Communist power toward the Atlantic, and by the fears which have gripped the western peoples most immediately exposed to attack.

Your committee saw the danger and foresaw the action necessary to meet it and to preserve peace when it approved the Vandenberg resolution, adopted by an overwhelming vote of the Senate on June 11, 1948. The North Atlantic Pact is the flowering of that resolution. Not only the American people but also the peoples of the entire North Atlantic area are indebted to this committee for that resolution—and I might add that the peoples of Soviet Russia and its satellites will some day realize that they, too, are indebted to your committee for this resolution.

It is no less clear now than it was last June that the peaceful peoples must stand together if they expect to deter aggression. We Americans learned in our earliest years as a nation that in union there is strength. Dictators know that as well as democracies. However extensive their ambitions may be, totalitarian leaders will draw back from war when they know that to embark upon it means to confront superior power and thereby incur not only defeat but their own destruction.

Without this pact, we and our children would face a much dimmer prospect of peace. Arm as we might, our country could not expect alone to attain a power position equivalent to that of the entire North Atlantic area. By a huge expansion of military appropriations which would place a crippling burden on our economic system, we might, perhaps, attain an equivalent position in terms of planes and divisions. But, even then, we could not achieve alone the strategic situation which the nations joining in this pact together possess, a situation which permits defense in depth, which provides a means of bringing our striking power to bear effectively against aggression, and which furnishes an assurance that if war should come, victory will be won more surely and more cheaply than it could be by the United States alone.

RISKS OF ACCEPTANCE

There may be some risk in accepting this pact, as there was a risk in adopting the Marshall plan and as there is a risk in any action taken in the dangerous world of today. But that risk is small indeed compared to the risk entailed in rejection of the pact. Even delay may be costly.

If, in spite of all, an aggressor should launch an armed attack and we deem it necessary to use "armed force to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area," the joint action of the member nations will shield each member including ourselves. With the pact, we can feel more confident that we will never again have to face another D-day and the horrors of a Normandy Beach.

With or without the pact, our occupation responsibilities in Germany and the existence of American forces there would involve us automatically, for many years to come, in any war launched by an aggressor on western Europe. Without the pact, such a war would be much more likely. Failure to accept the pact now would actually promote such a war. If it developed while western Europe was still weak and while our defense and theirs were not coordinated, western Europe might be overrun by the aggressor. We know from very recent experience both the cost in blood and treasure of repairing such a catastrophe and the cost to our future security of failing to repair it. The pact is a direct and very practical means by which the peace-loving peoples of North America and western Europe can avert such dangers, disasters, and costs.

COMPLEMENT TO ERP

The North Atlantic Pact is an essential complement to the European recovery program, essential because recovery cannot proceed effectively in an atmosphere of lack of confidence and paralyzing fear. The European recovery program, for which we testified, has been in progress only one short year, but it has already more than paid its way. In that year the tide has turned throughout the western world. The Communist threat inside western European countries has decisively decreased. These countries are already stronger, more stable and tempting targets for direct or indirect aggression. One striking result of this favorable tide is the lifting of the blockade of Berlin.

In continuance of this favorable movement lies our best hope of attaining the peace sought by all men of good will. The ratification of the pact will give this favorable movement new and powerful impetus, will insure that it shall not be interrupted and reversed. Its continuance promises to bring us, within a relatively short time, relief from our present burden of armament costs as western Europe becomes able, through our help, to make a greater contribution to the security of the North Atlantic area.

The pact will make more certain that the resources of western Europe will be available for the defense of our security instead of having those resources at the disposal of an aggressor as they were during Hitler's war on the world. The national security is always of primary concern to veterans' organizations, not only our country's security today but also its security in the years to come. It seems evident that the North Atlantic Pact will be a powerful safeguard of the future security of the United States.

INCREASING UNITED STATES SECURITY

Our great cities are already exposed to one-way air attacks across the North Atlantic or Arctic Oceans. But few Americans lose sleep from fear of such attacks today because we all know they could inflict only limited destruction with bombs similar to those used in the recent war.

Authoritative estimates, such as that of the President's Air Policy Commission of January 1948, indicate that a potential enemy may possess atomic bombs in quantity by perhaps as early as 1952. When that time comes, an enemy will be in a position to inflict exceedingly serious destruction upon our cities and industrial centers by surprise, one-way air attacks. If the United States had then to confront such an enemy alone, the ever-present threat to our principal eastern and middle western cities and to the millions of Americans who live in them would be one such as American families have never experienced before.

A government bent on world domination might then see an alluring road to its objective through the crippling, at a propitious moment, of vital elements of our war capacity by a sudden atomic attack. It would know, as we all know, that American industry proved to be a decisive factor in both World Wars. It might decide to concentrate on its most dangerous enemy first, as we decided in the recent war to defeat Germany first.

When this pact was ratified and the nations of the North Atlantic area stand together in collective defense, such an aggressor government will know that it cannot seek to cripple one of them without involvement in war with the others. It will know that it cannot concentrate upon one but must engage all. It will know that it cannot choose to fight only a long-range air war, but must also fight a short-range air war and a large-scale land war. Thus the North Atlantic Pact will serve directly to deter atomic aggression, to circumscribe the atomic menace which looms a few years ahead and to safeguard our cities and our country from atomic attack.

Although this pact is so clearly defensive, it is by no means a purely negative instrument. For its members and for the greater part of the world, its results promise to be both positive and constructive. For its members it will promote peace, security, confidence, hope and prosperity. Because of the place they hold and the role they play in our world today, these beneficial results will extend widely, across every ocean and to every continent.

For many centuries the signatories of this pact have between them played the foremost role in the creation of our modern civilization, in the development of free institutions, democratic government and modern industry, and in the elevation of the ethical and material standards of humanity. Today they possess most of the world's industry and conduct most of the world's international trade. This pact, by contributing so directly to the peace, security, and collective action of so important a part of the world, will give powerful impetus to the forward progress of all mankind. As Americans, we are proud that so provident and constructive a step had its beginning in your committee and has been initiated by our State Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee thanks you very much for your very able and splendid contribution. We want to thank also your organization, the Jewish War Veterans of the United States, for its strong position in this resolution.

Mr. WEITZER. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

SENATE RESOLUTION 239 AND THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Weitzer, I notice that you state that this committee saw the danger and foresaw the action necessary to meet it and to preserve peace when it approved the Vandenberg resolution adopted by an overwhelming vote of the Senate on June 11, 1948. You are not under the impression, are you, Mr. Weitzer, that by the adoption of that resolution in 1948 the Senate was binding itself in any sense to adopt or ratify a treaty of the type which is here presented to the Senate?

Mr. WEITZER. Oh, no. I think that Senator Vandenberg had in mind the possible need for regional agreements within the United Nations, and proposed at that time that such a thing might be possible, but I do not consider that there was any specific agreement that was in mind at that time—certainly not this one. I do not think that this particular agreement had yet come into anybody's mind.

Senator DONNELL. And do you not feel that the Senate should be in any sense estopped from acting negatively upon this treaty by reason of its approval of the Vandenberg resolution of last year?

Mr. WEITZER. Oh, no; not at all. I just simply considered that a very fine idea which Senator Vandenberg proposed to the Senate and the Senate adopted, but I don't believe that by adopting that resolution they in any way foreclosed the possibility of giving very careful consideration to any agreement which might be proposed that happened to be in harmony with the general tenor of that resolution.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard the implementation of this treaty by sending arms and other military material to Europe as essential to the success of the treaty?

Mr. WEITZER. I am not enough of a military man to say that it is essential, but it seems desirable to me that we should aid in the defense of those countries, and I think that the General Staff and the Senate, the law-making bodies of the country, will decide that. I will say it is desirable. I am not enough of a strategic expert to say that it is absolutely essential.

I think what is needed should be done. What is needed in order to assure the defense of those countries should be done. I think the lessons particularly of World War II, where Hitler was able to seize all of the resources of western Europe and control the coast of Europe, imposed on us a military burden that we ought to try to avoid if some other aggressor should similarly get the idea that he could conquer the world.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. You say that the North Atlantic Pact now before this committee will serve as a deterrent to war, and that your organization believes that it will prevent war and safeguard our country from war. Is it your thought, Mr. Weitzer, that Russia will, if we may use that specific illustration, realize that it would be impossible, if this treaty were effected or ratified, for it to successfully overrun Europe again?

Mr. WEITZER. I believe they will realize it. That does not mean that in some moment they might not make a mistake.

Senator DONNELL. By the term "again" I am not meaning that Russia has overrun Europe before; but would they realize that Europe could not be successfully overrun?

Mr. WEITZER. I think the experience of the last war should certainly convince anybody that if the nations in this group were prepared to move jointly when such a danger threatened, and immediately when such danger threatened, the opportunity to overrun Europe would be a costly one to attempt to seize, and probably could be stopped.

Senator DONNELL. You used the word "immediately." I take it that that same thought as to the importance of immediate action is illustrated by article 5 of the pact, which obligates the parties "forthwith" to take action therein mentioned.

Mr. WEITZER. That is exactly what I mean.

Senator DONNELL. Do you consider, Mr. Weitzer, that Russia would be very seriously deterred from this war unless there were sufficient military force in Europe organized and ready to meet her which would repel her and make it impossible for her to overcome the country and simply leave the country subject to future slow liberation?

Mr. WEITZER. I do not think that she would be deterred today or tomorrow. But unless war should come within the next year or so, which I believe nobody expects, over a very short period of time the military strength of Europe would grow to a degree that Russia would recognize that with what we did in the Berlin airlift we could probably put enough force over there to halt a rapid march across Europe.

Senator DONNELL. And the military strength of Europe, you think, would require implementation to some extent, at any rate, by this country, in order to bring it up to the point that it would act as an effective deterrent?

Mr. WEITZER. I think so, for the next 2 or 3 years, at any rate.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a lawyer, sir?

Mr. WEITZER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You talk like a lawyer, and talk like a good one.

Mr. Gilbert A. Harrison, national chairman, American Veterans Committee.

STATEMENT OF GILBERT A. HARRISON, NATIONAL CHAIRMAN, AMERICAN VETERANS COMMITTEE

The CHAIRMAN. You are the regular representative of the American Veterans Committee, are you?

Mr. HARRISON. Senator Connally, I am the national chairman of the American Veterans Committee, elected by the members of our organization at our last convention in November 1948.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a paid position or just an honorary position?

Mr. HARRISON. It is a full-time paid position for just 1 year. I am Gilbert Harrison, chairman of the American Veterans Committee, an organization consisting of members in every State who are honorably discharged veterans of the Second World War.

Delegates to the last annual convention of AVC, held in Cleveland, Ohio, during the last week of November 1948, approved the following statement [reading]:

American economic supplies are supporting the joint planning of western Europe in the organization for European recovery. American military supplies must be extended on lend-lease principles to support the joint planning of western Europe for its defense. The defense of western Europe should be further secured by American participation in a North Atlantic Alliance formed solely for defensive purposes and strictly in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations Charter for regional agreements. America is already committed by resolution of the Senate to this program. It should be promptly implemented.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF THE TREATY

The accent of AVC's statement is on defense. In our judgment that is the accent of the North Atlantic Defense Treaty. It follows the pattern developed by the 20 nations which signed a treaty of alliance in 1947 at Rio de Janeiro. The purpose and form of both these regional agreements are consistent with the United Nations Charter.

Article 5 of the pact establishes the solidarity of the Atlantic community and serves notice to any would-be aggressor that an armed attack on any one of the nations, regardless of its size, will be an attack upon all.

Article 4 serves warning that the signatory powers will consult and consider retaliatory action in the event that the Soviet Union interferes militarily in the internal affairs of the non-Communist west.

The pact, if implemented, can insure that nations which have aggressive Communist minorities shall not lack police power adequate to protect the security of the state against possible insurrection by that minority.

These provisions, and others in the pact, seem to us to be justifiable defense measures which have their risks but which are made necessary by recent world events. No effort to create security for the west is without risks.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE TREATY

The pact has been the object of severe criticism from several directions, and we are certain the committee has taken note of these criticisms.

It has been denounced as a "threat to peace." On the face of it, however, the pact is clearly a threat to the peace of no power except one which might foolishly initiate a war. The alliance, it is true, could become a "threat to peace" if the foreign affairs of the western nations were in the hands of men who had abandoned all hope of ever reaching working agreement with the U. S. S. R. or who were positively planning an aggressive war against the U. S. S. R. Such is not the case. This pact cannot be fairly described as a "threat to peace" unless one believes that any obstacle placed in the path of Russian ambition is a "threat to peace."

Skepticism of the North Atlantic alliance has also been expressed by our isolationists who seem to prefer that America once more defer until the last and worst possible minute whatever collective, defensive action may unhappily be required. Their view of security is as unrealistic as that of a child who runs into a closet and locks himself in at the first warning of fire in the house.

AVC is further aware of the criticism of some who suggest that no effort to maintain peace can be successful, and that any expenditure which may be required to reinforce this pact is money thrown down the drain.

But an inspection of past policies and predictions of the Soviet leaders does not, to our way of thinking, present convincing evidence that the U. S. S. R. plans to impose its will on the world by force. It seems reasonable to assume that the Russian leaders will be especially reluctant to engage in military adventures if they know that any such action will lead to an immediate, head-on collision with a determined, coordinated and well-equipped opposition.

A final class of critics of this treaty believe that America's only effective answer to the Communists lies in economic aid to impoverished people, and that a defensive military alliance is therefore unnecessary and even provocative.

NEED FOR SECURITY AND CONFIDENCE

This plausible but only partly accurate argument that economic stability is the only defense against Soviet communism leaves out of account the genuine political insecurity which is felt by nations of western Europe within striking distance of Russian military power. How can we expect the people of western Europe to work diligently on the establishment of stable economies, on the construction of factories, power plants, homes, if these same people are living in fear that an aggressive attack from the east may soon destroy all they have built?

The current policy of our country, including the pact now before you, expresses our recognition that non-Communist Europe must gain confidence that not only can it solve, with our aid, its economic problems, but that it need not relinquish its self-esteem and traditional independence because of its proximity to the Soviet Union.

If the North Atlantic Pact is ratified, the Congress will be asked to appropriate funds with which to bolster the military defenses of friendly nations. It may be that funds invested in this line of defense should enable us to reduce expenditures for defense on other fronts. But I wish to emphasize that if we withhold material aid which can be spared for a common-defense program, we shall have misled our friends. We cannot overlook the fact that the pact has already been approved by nations much closer to the Soviet Union than is the United States, and that their willingness to cooperate with us in the search for limited, defensive security involves as great, if not greater, risks for them as for us. These nations could not, as Mr. Marquis Childs has pointed out—politically speaking, have taken those risks without the hope and even the assurance of tangible help toward greater security.

THE ATLANTIC PACT—NOT THE WHOLE ANSWER

In conclusion, AVC is not suggesting that the Atlantic Pact or the military aid program are America's only, or even primary line of defense. The fundamental Communist, and therefore Russian, challenge to our security is still the Communist confidence that we are incapable of maintaining high production and employment. If we fail to refute that theory, neither the Atlantic Pact nor any other military measure can give us security. Our strategy in foreign policy must therefore, and does, include an attack on those economic and social ills which weaken the resistance of free peoples and leave them helpless before the Communist onslaught.

We wish further to emphasize that the military-aid program like the pact, must not be permitted to serve aggressive purposes. We regard it as self-evident that no arms should be supplied any nation which uses its military power, as have the Dutch in Indonesia, to flaunt the authority of the United Nations and aspirations of colonial peoples for self-government.

In our opinion the Atlantic Pact buys time—time that can be used to renew our efforts to strengthen the United Nations and to work through that organization toward the ultimate security of some form of world government with limited but adequate power to prevent aggression. The pact may have the effect of increasing the real fears of the Soviet leaders, but such fears can and must be dissipated by policies which scrupulously avoid provocative actions which might finally persuade the Soviet that it is in immediate danger of attack.

The American Veterans Committee approves of this pact and would favorably regard additional measures by which our Nation can help establish a peace throughout the world from which freemen have nothing to fear.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee thanks you very much for your able and clear statement.

You refer to the fact that several of the other Nations have ratified the pact. You refer, no doubt, to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and France, particularly?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And possibly others?

Mr. HARRISON. I believe it has been ratified by others.

The CHAIRMAN. I think so too.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. Very briefly.

SENATE RESOLUTION 239 THE TREATY

Mr. Harrison, in the resolution you set forth as having been adopted in the last week of November 1948, at your last annual convention, occur these two sentences [reading]:

The defense of western Europe should be further secured by American participation in a North Atlantic alliance formed solely for defensive purposes, and strictly in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations Charter for regional agreements. America is already committed by resolution of the Senate to this program.

What resolution is that to which you refer?

Mr. HARRISON. I believe that the delegates were referring to the Vandenberg resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think this is an accurate statement in your testimony, that America is already committed by resolution of the Senate to the program of participation in the North Atlantic alliance of the type mentioned in the resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. There, Senator, it would be a question of personal judgment, and I am sure honest men would disagree. I believe most of the delegates there did assume that the implication of the Vandenberg resolution was in line with the North Atlantic Defense Treaty, but I am also sure that one could say, and defend the position, that the two are quite separate. In our judgment they are part of the same, however.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Harrison, I am not at all attempting to contradict the conclusion which you have drawn as to the Vandenberg resolution and what it says, but I do recall, if I might, to your attention, and ask whether or not I am correct in this, that the clear, unmistakable statement of Senator Vandenberg, particularly in response to inquiries by Senator Malone of Nevada at the time the resolution to which you refer was being debated, and then confirmed later on the 14th of February of this year by Senator Vandenberg, is to the effect that the Senate is entirely free to take any action it desires on this treaty, and is not in any sense committed by the resolution to the program of participation in the North Atlantic alliance. I am correctly stating it, am I not, so far as your best understanding goes?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, Senator, I am perfectly happy to take the interpretation of you men as to the relationship between these two things. My only thought would be that the very serious tragic needs of the present are their own justification for the North Atlantic Defense Treaty had there been no previous resolution.

Senator DONNELL. If I have misstated Senator Vandenberg's position I am sure he will correct me immediately on it, and I want him to do so. I pause for any correction that he may desire to make, if I have mistaken his position.

Senator VANDENBERG. There isn't any doubt about the position we all took in connection with the Senate resolution, which I am happy to say the Senator from Missouri supported.

Senator DONNELL. I did.

Senator VANDENBERG. It was the outlining of a philosophy of action, and it was clearly stated that every man who voted for it was completely free to decide for himself ultimately how he wanted to implement the philosophy of action.

Senator DONNELL. And I take it that I am correct, am I not, Senator, in saying that America is not committed by the Vandenberg resolution to American participation in a North Atlantic alliance of the type mentioned in the resolution quoted by Mr. Harrison here this morning.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think the witness himself answered that question with complete accuracy when he said that it is up to the conscience and judgment of each Senator, and any Senator who would think that he had no commitment is certainly entitled to stand upon that position.

Senator DONNELL. If I am not mistaken, the Senator, in response to an inquiry from myself on the 14th of February, of this year, very clearly indicated that it is still his [Senator Vandenberg's] opinion that no Senator is bound by the Vandenberg resolution to vote in favor of the North Atlantic Treaty.

Senator VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct, and I depend, so far as I am concerned, upon the current wisdom of the Senate, and I still have hopes that my friend from Missouri, whose wisdom usually is so sound, will justify my expectations.

Senator DONNELL. I thank the Senator for his pleasing statement.

The CHAIRMAN. May I say that I regard the Vandenberg resolution as a statement of principle, a statement of philosophy, which did not directly commit any Senator to any particular pact or any particular action, but that it was a clear implication that the Senate subscribed to the principles therein stated, and would bear those principles in mind in considering any future action.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to join in the hope of Senator Vandenberg that the Senator from Missouri will at last see the great white light and will yield to it and go along with us.

Senator DONNELL. I appreciate very greatly the solitude and very kindly expressions of my good friends who have just spoken.

COMPARISON WITH RIO TREATY

Mr. Harrison, you mention just a little in your statement that the North Atlantic Defense Treaty follows the pattern developed by the 20 nations which signed a treaty of alliance in 1947 at Rio de Janeiro. Have you examined that treaty yourself?

Mr. HARRISON. I have, sir, although I cannot claim to be an expert on that treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall that article 20 of that treaty contains this language [reading]:

Decisions which require the application of measures specified in Article 8—and I may interpolate that among the measures specified in Article 8 is use of armed force—shall be binding upon all the Signatory States which have ratified this Treaty, with the sole exception that no State shall be required to use armed force without its consent.

Do you recall that provision in the Rio pact?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Harrison, you speak about the importance, or rather the reasonableness, of assuming that the Russian leaders will be especially reluctant to engage in military adventures if they know that any such action will lead to an immediate head-on collision with a determined, coordinated and well-equipped opposition. Am I correct in understanding that the immediacy of the collision, the immediacy of the opposition, is a very important element in constituting a deterrent against Russia?

Mr. HARRISON. I would say, sir, not only the immediacy, but the fact that the Russians would be under no illusions as to whether they could get away with something without going to war. They would be deterred, I think particularly by the knowledge that there is a commitment on the part of the west to resist, in a total way, any attempts once again to impose the will of any large nation on smaller nations.

Senator DONNELL. I was particular directing your attention to the language in your statement, "immediate, head-on collision," et cetera, and you do regard the fact that Russia would realize that she would be confronted with an immediate collision is of very great importance in determining whether or not the North Atlantic Treaty would be a deterrent to war or would not.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir. Then we would have to decide what we meant by the word "immediate." I mean very simply, if my understanding of this treaty is correct, the nations all have agreed to institute a collective defensive action. I, of course, understand that the declaration of war is, under our Constitution, a matter for determination by the Congress of the United States. However, I would assume that the Russians would understand that the Congress of the United States would have bound itself to make such a declaration in the event that the Soviet Union showed that it was engaged upon aggressive action.

Senator DONNELL. In what manner would the Congress of the United States have so bound itself?

Mr. HARRISON. I would have assumed, sir, through the alliance of the United States with the other nations of western Europe in this North Atlantic Defense Treaty.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROCEDURE IN RATIFICATION

Senator DONNELL. Do you understand that the House of Representatives takes any part in the ratification of this treaty?

Mr. HARRISON. That is not my understanding, but they would, I assume, take part in any program of military aid.

Senator DONNELL. This treaty, however, will go into effect so far as the United States is concerned upon its ratification by the Senate without any necessity of action by the House of Representatives. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HARRISON. I believe so, sir. The same course would apply to implementing the treaty signed at Rio de Janeiro, and I have not heard any criticism of the agreement made there.

Senator DONNELL. So by your statement that you understand Congress will have bound itself you do not mean that the House of Representatives will have taken any action in approving this treaty?

Mr. HARRISON. Other than through the action taken in support of the military aid program, I would assume not.

Senator DONNELL. I am not talking about the military aid program. I mean to say this, that this treaty will go into effect upon ratification by the Senate, will it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And it is not necessary to secure any action by the House of Representatives in order that the treaty shall be ratified. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir. I would only say that I would also assume, as Senator Vandenberg did, not only the collective wisdom of the United States Senate in carrying out what had been established as American policy, but also the collective wisdom of the House of Representatives.

Senator DONNELL. I am not sure that I understand quite the applicability of the remark that you have made, but the point I was addressing myself to was this: You said that you understood that Congress would have bound itself, and then you said in response to a further question that you understood that that binding would have been effected by the ratification of this treaty, and I was simply pointing out, as I understand you and I agree, that the ratification of the treaty is by one branch of the Congress and not the two branches of the Congress. I am correct in that, am I not?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; but I have always assumed from the limited knowledge that I have of American Government that where the Constitution provides for American policy being determined by only one branch, that is American policy, not the policy of the United States Senate.

Senator DONNELL. Perhaps you may have had that assumption but I return again to the question as to whether or not you understand that this treaty will go into effect when the Senate ratifies it.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, I do understand that, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And you do not understand that the House of Representatives has any part or parcel in the ratification of the treaty. I am correct in my understanding?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, that is correct, according to our Constitution.

ACTION IN THE EVENT OF AN ARMED ATTACK

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Harrison, in article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty, it provides that each of the parties agrees that it will assist the party or parties attacked by taking forthwith such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force.

May I present this illustration to you: Suppose that some military action of a very pronounced aggressive character should occur; we will say for illustration that Russia should send a large force, hundreds of thousands of men, into Norway, we will say, and at the time that that action was taken Congress was not in session, and it would take several days before the session should occur, and in the meantime the President would be advised by his military counselors that instant, or, to adopt the language in your statement here, immediate, action would be necessary and advisable in order to prevent Russia just pouring over Europe and taking charge of her within a few days. Is there any doubt in your mind as to the power of the President to go right ahead and take action before Congress comes back here?

Mr. HARRISON. There is very great doubt in my mind, sir. I say once again that I am not an expert, but I believe it is correct to say that, regardless of any provisions of this treaty, the power to declare war is a congressional power. When I refer to immediate action I am talking about the reality that moves the Soviet Union, which is not a foolish, impulsive, or deluded nation, but which is very much impressed by power and the threat of power, and my point of view is that if the Germans had been aware in 1938 that there would be concerted military opposition to any move of aggression, I do not think the question of a day or two or three which it would take to assemble the Congress would have mattered. I am talking about delays and evasions that would convince the Soviet Union that it could have its way without war, and this says you cannot have your way without war. Aggression is banned.

PRESIDENTIAL POWER

Senator DONNELL. Of course, the question that I asked you was simply as to whether there was any doubt as to the power of the President to go ahead under the circumstances I have cited without Congress coming together, and I understood you to say that there is serious doubt on that.

Mr. HARRISON. There is serious doubt as to whether the President could declare war without the Congress, if that is what you mean.

Senator DONNELL. I did not mean that, and that is not what I asked. Nobody can declare war except the Congress. That is the Constitution, and it is perfectly clear. The question I asked was whether there was any doubt in your mind as to the power of the President, under the circumstances I have cited, to take immediate action by sending bombers or whatever he thinks is necessary over there to repel that attack, or whether he has to wait until Congress comes together and debates the question as to whether war should be declared or declares war without any debate.

Mr. HARRISON. That certainly is a subject to which I would not give a definitive answer, and I think the answer ought to come from those who would be responsible for making the decisions at the time.

Senator DONNELL. Do you remember, Mr. Harrison, at the time of the First World War, as I recall it, Belgium was overrun within a very few days. Do you recall that?

Mr. HARRISON. I do, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Of course, we all realize the atomic bomb has come into existence long subsequent to the situation in the First World War, and, indeed, was not utilized until the conclusion of the Second World War. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. And the atomic-bomb situation might, in your judgment, might it not, necessitate much more rapid, quick, and immediate action on the part of this country to prevent onslaught and overrunning of Europe than the situation which existed before the atomic bomb was in existence. Is that not correct?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir, for your very fine statement.

Mr. Elliott Newcomb, national executive director, AMVETS.

STATEMENT OF ELLIOTT H. NEWCOMB, NATIONAL EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF AMVETS

Mr. NEWCOMB. AMVETS, American Veterans of World War II, was incorporated by act of Congress July 23, 1947, and since its earliest days has held that world peace is its first major objective.

At our national convention in 1948 the following resolution was passed [reading]:

Continued support of the Marshall plan and encourage the 16 Marshall-plan European nations which have completed an economic pact to join the military pact completed by five of these nations, Belgium, Netherlands, Luxemburg, Britain, and France, and enter into a defensive military arrangement with the United States.

It was further resolved:

To encourage the development of regional pacts for collective self-defense in accordance with article 51 of the United Nations Charter and as contemplated by the Vandenberg resolution adopted by the United States Senate on June 11, 1948 (S. Res. 239).

The above resolutions clearly indicate the wholehearted support by AMVETS of the North Atlantic Treaty and all that it envisions in the way of military commitments and provisions of arms to implement it.

It is also clear as we look back through the resolutions of AMVETS from its inception that the World War II veterans as represented by AMVETS realize it is their primary responsibility to make certain that their every effort shall be behind proposals to keep this country from repeating the mistakes of history and especially those following the First World War. History has demonstrated that the United States cannot ever again hope to remain aloof from the march of events in other lands; that when human freedom is threatened by aggressor nations, the United States must help defend those freedoms. For to paraphrase one of your greatest Americans, the world cannot exist half slave and half free.

It is therefore a matter only of practical reality to proclaim our support and commitments in advance. The nations bent on enslaving human beings may think twice before embarking on evil enterprises and will be under no illusions as to the position of the most powerful country in the world will take.

NEED FOR PACIFIC PACT

But the Atlantic pact is not enough. Once before we looked on Europe as our far most important problem and as a result suffered an almost disastrous attack in the Pacific. We had to spend billions of dollars and thousands of American lives as a terrible penalty for our lack of alertness and perspective in the Pacific.

The veterans of World War II who fought their way from Pearl Harbor across the jungle islands of the Pacific to the mainland of Japan, who saw their comrades fall at Tarawa, Iwo Jima, Guadalcanal and in the Philippine Islands and myriads of other jungle hells cannot sit idly by and feel that Europe is our only problem.

The results of an intelligent aggressive foreign policy in Europe are clearly evident. The Truman Doctrine, the Marshall plan, the Atlantic Pact, these are already producing practical results. Communism has been contained in western Europe and is being forced even to retreat, as witness the collapse of the blockade of Berlin.

The same firm policy in the Pacific should logically produce similar constructive results.

AMVETS asks that the United States speedily enact and implement the North Atlantic Treaty and then proceed immediately to a Pacific pact with those nations of the Pacific who see the wisdom of mutual security pledges similar to those which have already made the North Atlantic Pact a new beacon of hope for permanent peace.

It may be true that countries in the Pacific have less to offer than European nations as a quid pro quo in the establishment of regional defense. But we also know that the march of the aggressor nation across the Pacific must ultimately mean then United States will have to fight again for freedom. Let these aggressors know in advance that we stand behind the rights of free nations everywhere in the world. The Pacific nations will be able to resist the pressures of slave ideologies with greater courage and knowledge under the circumstances no less in the Pacific than in the Atlantic.

As the red tide sweeps across China, as ships are fired on in the Yangtze River, as slavery once again begins to engulf a great nation, we must see the deadly parallel—the very same danger that only a few years ago ignited world conflict. Only by a consistent policy of firmness can we now contain the same threat.

We know that this hearing is held to discuss the North Atlantic Treaty, but we think that it should be discussed and ratified with full knowledge that it is only part of the problem, that a similar regional pact for collective self-defense must be applied to the rest of the free world in the Pacific before we can settle down safely to the long-range task of permanent peace.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much, the committee does, for your statement.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. You are excused, and thank you, sir.

Is Mrs. Loretta Falsey, national Legislative chairman of the American War Mothers, present?

Mrs. FALSEY. Yes, sir.

STATEMENT OF MRS. LORETTA FALSEY, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE CHAIRMAN, AMERICAN WAR MOTHERS

Mrs. FALSEY. We are a group, a large group, chartered by Congress in, I believe, 1923, and the World War II mothers were admitted in 1943. I am their national legislative chairman. We are affiliated with the Women's Patriotic Conference for National Defense, which is composed of 35 organizations. Once a year we come to be instructed by the Congressmen and Senators, and what we say we get from you, in a way.

I was not going to make any statement on the North Atlantic Pact because its need seemed so self-evident, but when reading of the projected letting down of the Berlin blockade I felt that it was a maneuver, so to speak, to stymie or at least delete some of the force from the North Atlantic Pact. I was afraid they would get the American people saying, "Well, why bother? And it costs so much." And you know that can go on for days and days until the correct moment is past.

So, well vested with all my people's approval and carte blanche, I wish to put our organization on record as being for the North Atlantic Pact, wherever it may lead, through the wisdom of our Senate, and if any future events should bring it into Congress, where naturally they will have to raise the money for this, I assume that they will understand that they have our fullest support.

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN WAR MOTHERS

I have 550 active legislative chairmen under me, and I have so much writing to do that I have it printed and put in a magazine which is mailed all over the United States.

We are much opposed to pressuring our good Congress. That we wish understood from the very start. We deplore the fact that the Nation's business has so much of a back-door gossipy thing to it. I think it depletes the dignity of our great national policies to have so much paltry, paltry opinion given. We have in our National Capital gentlemen from the States who come to Washington, and gradually they have become the core and heart of the entire universe, and with that in mind I come here with a great deal of temerity and a great deal of respect, and all of my women were thrilled to death to think that I could come to speak before men who are truly trying to lead the world out of its self-made morass. It actually has brought on its own troubles.

Just in little Connecticut we have among our membership two mothers with eight sons in the war. That will give you an idea of how our total suffering was. You go through travail of that kind, and, our country being nonempire building, we came home. The only way we can make our influence felt in the world is to make it like our country in this way: We are so strong nobody dares attack us, not through love of us, not through fear of us, perhaps, but because they think it is pretty unwise, and if we make it unwise to attack small nations in Europe, and later small nations in Asia, I think we will have succeeded and put an end to thousands of years of inevitable wars.

The American War Mothers are waiting to change their title from American War Mothers to something else, and we hope this is the very dawn of such a hope. We are definitely on record as being in favor of it, and we hope there won't be too much talk about how much it costs, because it cost American mothers more than anyone can compute.

I thank you gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. We are very much obliged to you. Your organization is for the ratification of this treaty?

Mrs. FALSEY. Definitely; unqualifiedly.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you for your very fine statement.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Mrs. Alexander Stewart, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom.

STATEMENT OF MRS. ALEXANDER STEWART, WOMEN'S INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE FOR PEACE AND FREEDOM

Mrs. STEWART. My name is Mrs. Alexander Stewart, 625 Fullerton Parkway, Chicago. During the congressional session I am in Washington most of the time following legislation of concern to the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. As president of the United States section of the WILPF, I represent one national section of an international organization having sections and members in 34 countries. The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom is one of the nongovernmental organizations given consultative status B by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

In order that you may have in the record a statement of the principles and policies of this organization, I am including the statement adopted at our annual meeting in Hartford, Conn., just last week:

PRINCIPLES

The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom was founded in 1915 in the midst of the First World War. Jane Addams became its first international president and held this office until her death. Throughout its history the league has maintained a policy and a program consistent with the ideas of its founders. As an international and an interracial organization, its aim is to work by non-violent means for the establishment of those political, economic, and psychological conditions both at home and abroad which can assure peace and freedom.

POLICIES

The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, United States Section, believes in the cooperation of all groups and nations in establishing just law and social well-being as a foundation for international and domestic peace. We believe that the most effective means by which free people may maintain free institutions lie in a positive program which will safeguard human rights, enrich human living, and utilize material resources for peace.

STATEMENT ON ATLANTIC PACT

As an international organization, many questions arise in our minds concerning the North Atlantic Pact. One of the important questions is, "What will be the effect of the pact on the United Nations?"

At the annual meeting we adopted this statement [reading]:

Throughout the 34 years of its existence, the League has stood for a strong international organization, functioning democratically within the framework of law, as essential to lasting peace. We hope that the UN represents the first stage of such an organization and as such we give it our full support. We believe that the present weakness and inadequacy of the UN is due in large part to the climate of fear and distrust within which the member states struggled for their national objectives. The urgent task of today is to create the climate in which the states will cooperate to strengthen international organization, and as rapidly as possible, transform the UN into a world government.

Loyalty to the UN demands acceptance and implementation of its decisions by the member states. The record of the United States in this regard is unsatisfactory. The European recovery plan almost entirely by-passed the UN. The Atlantic pact is a further blow to the health of the UN, among other reasons because it deepens the chasm between the West and the Soviet Union and involves a return to balance of power, instead of collective security within the framework of the UN. Urgent attention should be given to securing UN control of armaments and the provision of a UN constabulary, so that the community of nations may not become the victim of national policy.

The League has long supported international cooperation on both a regional and world basis, but has maintained that regional unions should be structures for economic and political cooperation and not military alliances. They should grow from within and not be imposed from without so that their character would represent the views and trends of their constituent parts. We therefore oppose the direction that has been given to European Union by the North Atlantic Pact and the arms bill.

We believe that the North Atlantic Military Alliance will interfere with the constructive work of the European recovery program and by diverting men, money and strategic materials necessary for economic recovery to military purposes will delay, if not prevent entirely, the coming of the day when Europe will be back on its feet. Adequate reconstruction and rearmament cannot co-exist. Judging by past experience, when the choice has to be made between allocating strategic materials to the necessities of daily life or to the needs of a military alliance, the latter stands to gain at the expense of the former.

MEETINGS OF THE WOMEN'S INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE

It has been my privilege to go to Europe twice since the end of World War II, and it is my plan to go again this summer. Our organization held its tenth international congress in Luxemburg in 1946 when our women came together for the first time since 1937 when they met in Czechoslovakia. This was a deeply moving experience that I shall never forget, when these women met for the first time after 9 years during which many of them had been in prison or concentration camps, or had lost families and personal possessions. Still they met united by the theme, "A new world order." They were challenged by the words of our honorary international president, Emily Greene Balch, Nobel Peace Award winner, who said:

This is a new chapter in the history of the Women's International League in which the members would continue to be pioneers as long as it is needful.

Last summer in Geneva, I served as one of two consultative members of the United States section to the international executive committee. The opening day, July 7, 1948, I clipped from the front page of the Paris edition of the New York Herald-Tribune an article by James M. Minifie, the headline of which read, "Europeans, United States, confer on defense. Major move is due in the cold war. Western union meeting on Vandenberg plan studies America's role." The article went on to describe the Vandenberg resolution, which passed the Senate on June 11, 1948, and suggested the beginnings of what we now call the North Atlantic Pact. This article implied that we were asking how many millions of dollars the Western Powers could put into the rearming of Europe, and were suggesting that the United States would foot the rest of the bill, which we are now discovering will probably be several billions of dollars over a period of years.

The last three sentences of the article are especially revealing [reading]:

This would almost certainly take into account the practicability of the United States furnishing lend-lease materials and equipment to build up the military forces of the western alliance. The proposals ultimately worked out are scheduled to come up for decision about the time the next Congress assembles in January. They would then be a leading "must" on the agenda of the Eighty-first Congress.

COST OF REARMAMENT

I wish I could adequately portray, Mr. Chairman, the reactions of the women present. Remember that many of them had spent months or years in prisons and concentration camps, or had lived under occupation. I believe our organization was the first organization to speak out against the North Atlantic Pact and the accompanying arms bill. They spoke as women to women out of the agony of seeing so much of what they had struggled to try to create, a world of peace and freedom, destroyed. They said in effect to us, "Are you in America insane? Do you think that Europe can put millions of dollars (it is now estimated in billions) into a rearmament program when we still do not have enough to eat, when we still do not have sufficient clothing, and when we have not begun to rebuild the millions of homes, hospitals, schools, and churches destroyed during the war? We will go back to our governments and say to our leaders that together we must find another way to solve our problems. * * * We believe that this plan means increasing the tensions between east and west, and that it will weaken, if not ultimately destroy, the United Nations, because it means the arming of nations within the United Nations against each other. We believe that it was never the real intent of the UN Charter to arm nations within the UN against each other. We fear Russia, but we fear also the day when our manpower, money, and resources will be taken from the European recovery program, which has just begun, and used for rearmament.

Gentlemen, you have had many distinguished witnesses before your committee—high governmental officials, military experts, leaders of many organizations—whose experience has been wide and whose sincerity I do not question. Some of them have been proponents, some have been opponents, of the North Atlantic Pact. However, as I have listened to them or read their testimony, I have been struck again and again with the emphasis so often put upon military weapons, rather than the processes of reason, understanding, reconciliation, government, and law, as a solution, stop-gap or long-run.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. If a nation makes an armed attack on you with arms in its hands, how are going to argue with it?

Mrs. STEWART. We have a period now when there is choice, isn't there, Senator? I think both Russia and we have a tendency to put all the blame on the other nation. Each side blames the other, and makes it more or less solely responsible. Actually there is an area of freedom of choice left to work for peace on other than military lines.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no freedom of choice if a nation has an armed attack made on it by another nation. What choice has it, except to lie down or fight? I am talking about the event of an armed attack, and that is the only time this treaty is effective, when a nation makes an armed attack on you. What are you going to do, say, "Wait a minute; I want to argue about this"?

Mrs. STEWART. I would have to answer in two ways: Whether you have attacks or not, if some major nation of Europe is involved, or our interests are involved in some country, whether it is a small or large country, the chances are that we would go to war. But we do have a period now.

The CHAIRMAN. We are meeting in Paris, trying to iron out these things in peace. They are going to meet on the 23d.

Mrs. STEWART. I approve of that. Our organization has always urged a meeting at top levels, and also at the nongovernmental level between people, leaders of church, education, farm, business, labor, and so on. We would say that would be one of the processes to use now.

The CHAIRMAN. We are using it now.

Go ahead, though, with your statement. I won't interrupt you any more.

Mrs. STEWART. It seems to me that we have not squarely faced the fact that the primary problems of Europe are economic, psychological, and political, and not military. We are in danger of trying to solve them by military procedures which cannot answer the need.

UNIVERSAL DESIRE FOR PEACE

May I illustrate? I should like to record some of the reactions I got in Europe as I visited several countries and talked to the common people—teachers, ministers, youth, mothers, social workers, some officials—about their hopes and fears. I was as far east as Czechoslovakia both in 1946 and 1948.

As an ordained Methodist minister myself, I preached in several churches in Prague in 1946 and went back to visit them in August 1948. A meeting was arranged in Prague sponsored by the Methodist women, YWCA, and WILPF, so that my husband, the Reverend Alexander Stewart, and I might speak. We discussed our common problems and discovered many areas of agreement and understanding. Questions were asked and even criticisms offered of some of their Government's policies. But the significant thing was that there was an earnest expression of a desire to keep in touch with us. The chairman, who is a very responsible person and whom I have known for a number of years, said:

You are doves of peace who have come from America. We want you to carry back our good wishes to the American people. Tell them we believe we can find ways of working together. Tell them that we want to be a bridge of understanding between east and west, not a battleground for a futile war. Tell them we believe that, given time, and if Russia and the United States can ease the tension between themselves, we can work out satisfactory solutions to our problems.

As our international summer school in Schiers, Switzerland, where young people and adults joined to study the meaning of democracy, peace, and freedom, we had long and searching discussions. One day a Danish youth, distressed by the bitterness and futility of his World War II experiences, expressed his despair over creating the will to peace in the midst of so much preparation for war. Now I can bear disillusionment among adults, but it is hard to see it so wide-spread among youth—(though I can understand why it might be so). I appealed to these young people to go back to their countries and help create the conditions for peace and freedom, citing things we were doing in America. One of them questioned me by saying:

What does your former Governor Earle of Pennsylvania mean when he says, "What America should do is go around the world with an atom bomb in one hand and the Cross of Christ in the other and let the nations decide which they want dropped upon them?" We do not think that sounds very peace loving.

I answered by telling them of the peace planes that flew from California to Washington, D. C., last year; the peace train that started from the west coast; the 138 ministers who dropped everything in response to a telegram to come to Washington to discuss alternatives to war, and the many thousands of letters that Americans had written expressing faith in another way than war.

When I had finished a Czech youth rose and said:

You are a different voice of America than we have heard before. We did not know there were so many people in America who really cared.

There were numerous experiences like this—an outpouring of hopes and prayers for peace—while more billions of dollars are being spent on the latest weapons of mass destruction and more youth are put under arms in peacetime. Some place, some time the trend will have to be reversed. The greatest danger lies in preparing for war instead of preventing war.

In Germany I was asked to broadcast to the German women in German. The woman broadcaster was particularly interested in two things about me, which she said would mean much to the German women—the fact that I was an ordained minister, since women have very little or no official position in the German church, and the fact that my work in Washington had included active opposition to peacetime conscription. She said that the German women felt that universal military training had been one of their causes of wars and the growth of militarism. They would be glad to know that the American women were aware of this, and doing something politically to prevent a similar development in America.

A frequent question that has been asked in this country is, "Have pressures been put on other countries to join the North Atlantic Pact?"

NORWEGIAN REACTION TO THE PACT

Last January, our United States section received a cable during our midwinter national board meeting in Delaware, Ohio, saying:

Norwegian section Women's International League for Peace and Freedom against Atlantic Pact. Will split Scandinavia and the Norwegian People. Means vote of censure to U.N. Can you help us?

NORWEGIAN SECTION, WILPF, ALNAES, Chairman.

We have been investigating this. I quote from a letter of April 19, 1949, from Oslo, signed by Aasny Alnaes, president of the Norwegian section of the WILPF, whom I met at Geneva [reading]:

Before joining the North Atlantic Pact the three Scandinavian countries tried to form an Inter-Scandinavian pact of defense, trying in this way to rest independent of the policy of the big powers. While this pact was discussed and tried to be established, we had news from America that the United States would not sell arms to Scandinavia if Scandinavia did not join the Atlantic Pact. This is what has officially been said of pressure here in Norway and, of course, we cannot give other facts than the official ones.

The Scandinavian people were led to believe that if they did not sign the pact, they would be ineligible to buy arms from the United States.

This is at least one example of the uneasiness of some non-Communist citizens in Norway who certainly got the impression through their own press that the United States would deny shipment of arms.

Some of you may have seen the article in the Washington Post during February 1949, announcing the fact that 1,500 Norwegians demonstrated outside the Parliament building against the signing of the pact. One of the banners carried read, "We want peace—not east, nor west."

The leader, Miss Marie Lous-Mohr, our international co-chairman, is a school teacher who refused to follow Hitler's edict and spent 28 months in Grini concentration camp, 18 of them in solitary confinement. I well remember her statement to us at Luxemburg in 1946, when without bitterness or resentment, she said, "We must not dwell upon the tragedies of the past. We must go back into the schoolroom and teach the children and youth to build bridges of understanding and friendship between the nations."

I wish to have put in the record the report of the Norwegian section on the problem of Norway's joining the Atlantic Union, contained in the international letter No. 18, mailed from the WILPF International Headquarters, 12 Rue du Vieux-College, Geneva, Switzerland.

(International letter No. 18, referred to, is as follows:)

[Contained in the international letter No. 18 mailed from Women's International League for Peace and Freedom—International Headquarters, 12 Rue du Vieux-College, Geneva, Switzerland]

REPORT OF THE NORWEGIAN SECTION ON THE PROBLEM OF NORWAY'S JOINING THE ATLANTIC UNION

The preliminary work of our foreign department regarding the question if Norway would like to have an invitation from the United States of America to join the Atlantic union has been carried out very silently, and if you had been in Norway a month ago, you would have thought that everybody would like such an invitation. But when the question became acute through the conferences between the three Scandinavian countries, people began to realize at last what was going on.

Swedish newspapers then began to deal with the problem of a defensive Scandinavian union, and it turned out that the three Scandinavian countries had different opinions regarding the background and foundation of such a union. Sweden claimed that it ought to be a Scandinavian union without connection with the Atlantic union, while Norway was of the opinion that our geographical position (Norway lies on the Atlantic) made us dependent on the Atlantic union, and that we are especially dependent economically on the United States of America and cannot procure the necessary armaments without her help. Denmark is also absolutely in favor of a Scandinavian union, and worked cleverly to bring together the different points of view of Sweden and Norway.

The Norwegian section of the WILPF sent a note of protest to the Government, pointing out that the people of Norway had not been thoroughly informed of the negotiations and claiming that, in accordance with the democratic principles of our Constitution, no decision regarding a military union with the United States of America can be taken before all its consequences were put before the Norwegian people to give them the opportunity of discussing the problem.

In order to give the people the chance of such a discussion, the Norwegian section of the league arranged a public meeting with a prominent speaker for the Atlantic Union and one against it. The meeting was crowded, and a number of prominent men spoke against the union, among them Professor Leiv Kreyberg (whose pamphlet, The Biological Effects of the Atomic Bomb, has been distributed by us). At the meeting one of the representatives of the Labor Party of our Parliament also spoke against the Atlantic union, and it turned out that there was a strong division of opinion among members of the Labor Party in the Parliament as well as in the Government itself. After the meeting, there was a vivid discussion in all the newspapers as well as everywhere where people met, and we were said to have "incised the abscess."

To proclaim our own opinion, the Norwegian section, in cooperation with the Norwegian Peace Council and the Norwegian Group of War Resisters, called a meeting in one of the biggest picture houses at Oslo, where six prominent speakers spoke against the Atlantic union. It turned out to be of overwhelming interest, and, with more than 1,300 against 50 votes, the following resolution was passed:

"To the Norwegian Government:

"We oppose Norway's joining the Atlantic union because we believe that this step will enlarge the cleft between east and west and thereby increase the danger of war; because it will spit Scandinavia as well as the Norwegian people; because it will mean a vote of censure to the UN.

"We are of the opinion that Scandinavia ought to lead the way to a peaceful settlement of all international conflicts and strengthen the United Nations.

"If the negotiations with our Scandinavian neighbors, on a common basis, should not be successful, the Norwegian people must be given time to get thorough information so that Norway's next move on her problem of defense will be well considered.

"We were informed that the most we could obtain at the moment was a delay of the decision concerning the Atlantic Union. The negotiations with our Scandinavian neighbors were not successful. Sweden was not involved in the Second World War and believes that, by leading a policy of strict neutrality, she will manage not to be involved in a contingent world war, and that joining the Atlantic Union will increase the danger that all Scandinavian countries may be involved in a contingent war.

"Fortunately, however, the Norwegian Government has decided that more background material must be procured before a decision can be taken on the question if Norway would like to have any invitation.

"Another very strong reason for not wishing to join the Union is that Norway has common borders with the U. S. S. R., and that we fear that such a Union will be a provocation against a country with which we have never been at war.

"As long as Norway has been a free country, our policy has been that of absolute neutrality. We were occupied in the Second World War because of miscalculations, and we cannot see why we should attach ourselves to any of the big powers now, thus giving up every chance of conducting our traditional policy of neutrality.

"These are some of the reasons for which we believe it will be a great danger for our country to join the Atlantic Union. Later, after the other aspects of the problem will have been dealt with, I will send you a supplementary report, but hope that this will give our coworkers a picture of what is going on in Norway. We would like our American and British sections to deal with the questions and to see how they can help us.

"AASNEY ALNAES."

Mrs. STEWART. I would like to mention a sentence out of that statement. She comments on the preliminary work of their foreign department, somewhat like yours. She says [reading]:

The preliminary work of our foreign department regarding the question if Norway would like to have an invitation from the United States of America to join the Atlantic Union has been carried out very silently, and if you had been in Norway a month ago, you would have thought that everybody would like such an invitation. But when the question became acute through the conferences between the three Scandinavian countries, people began to realize at last what was going on.

Then, further along, she speaks about the meetings that she held, in which there was great division of opinion among members of the Labor Party in the Parliament as well as in the Government itself. After the meeting there was quite a bit of discussion in all the newspapers as well as everywhere where people met, and we were said, because the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom had initiated the discussion, to have "incised the abscess," which, I think, is a rather interesting term about a thing that means so much to people.

Then they held a meeting where about 1,400 people attended, and 1,300 voted against the pact and 50 for it, and they passed a resolution which I am putting in the record. The last sentence which I would like to quote from that is:

Another very strong reason for not wishing to join the union is that Norway has common borders with the U. S. S. R., and that we fear that such a union will be a provocation against a country with which we never have been at war.

OTHER REGIONAL PACTS

Then I would like to comment on one other thing before closing, and that is, "What are some of the alternatives?" I did want to ask a question about the possibility of other regional pacts. I understand from this book here on the Atlantic Pact, by Hoskins, of the Legislative Reference Service, which contains a chapter on "Proposals for Other Regional Pacts," that if this pact is ratified it means further pacts.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nobody who has any authority to make any such statement as that.

Mrs. STEWART. This is from the Legislative Reference Service.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not matter who it is from. It has no authority to speak for the Congress, the Senate, the President, or anybody else.

Mrs. STEWART. I hope very much this is not going to be. I hope very much we will find a substitute for the present North Atlantic Pact, but it makes here a rather significant statement that I think American people ought to know, that a Mediterranean Pact at least is being discussed, as the North Atlantic Pact was discussed all fall.

The CHAIRMAN. We are discussing the North Atlantic Pact now. We are not going out talking about what we are going to do 10 years from now.

Mrs. STEWART. This sentence suggests:

Although a Mediterranean Pact has not passed beyond an early stage of discussion, it is difficult not to suppose that some kind of defensive arrangement for parts or all of that area will receive attention once the North Atlantic Pact is an accomplished fact.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the statement of one man, supposed to be in the Legislative Reference Service. He is not in the Congress of the United States, he is not the President of the United States, but, of course, you are glad to pick up any crumb there that would indicate opposition to the present Treaty. We are just discussing the North Atlantic Treaty now.

Mrs. STEWART. Of course, Senator, isn't the fact that 12 countries are included in the North Atlantic Pact going to raise questions? Others are asking to come in.

The CHAIRMAN. We always have questions raised.

Mrs. STEWART. Doesn't it also mean that there may be the danger of countries outside either the Russian orbit or ours wanting to get in?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course they may, but that does not mean we are going to do it.

IMPLEMENTATION WITH MILITARY MANPOWER

Mrs. STEWART. Then, another point I should like to take up for serious consideration is the implementation in terms of troops. There is still uneasiness and confusion as to what is implied. For example, Capt. B. H. Liddell Hart, former military editor of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, and one of Britain's outstanding military analysts, in the New Republic for February 14, 1949, after giving his estimate of the current military strength of the pact countries, comments on what he thinks the military defense of Europe would require. If the military strength of Europe is to be built up, according to Captain Hart, it would probably mean a considerable increase in the number of professional soldiers to form operational forces either by the incorporation of Germans into the western union forces or by stationing a large American land force permanently in Europe.

Would this also mean permanent peacetime conscription in the United States?

The WILPF, United States section and internationally, has opposed the conscription of youth and would call your attention to this added implication commonly overlooked by many.

ALTERNATIVES TO THE PACT

What are the alternatives to a North Atlantic Pact as a means of insuring peace?

We have already suggested a number of them as we have asked these questions. They may be summed up in these three points, similar to those in our letter to the New York Times, April 18, 1949, and the Washington Post, April 17, 1949.

1. The building up of democracy in our own country through adequate housing, educational facilities, health programs, and safeguards for civil rights and civil liberties at home and abroad.

Justice William O. Douglas, of the United States Supreme Court, advocated the adoption of a "positive aggressive program" to fight Soviet ideology both domestically and abroad, the New York Times of February 19 reported. He said [reading]:

The real victory over communism will be won in the factories and rice fields of the world, rather than on the battlefields. * * * The fight against communism depends for its ultimate success on the people of the various nations, not on their governments.

2. Using the United Nations and its specialized agencies, FAO, WHO, ITO, and so forth, to their fullest capacities for cooperative policies to meet the economic and cultural needs of the world's peoples. If we were saved the expense of arming ourselves and our allies, we could afford to carry out the President's proposal for building up the undeveloped areas of the world.

3. Supporting the United Nations Assembly's proposal for world disarmament under international law.

We believe that such a positive program would bring hope and courage to the world's people and usher in a new era of peace and prosperity for all the nations.

Gentlemen, your committee has a great responsibility, and you are conscientiously trying to find a solution to the world's ills. As you weigh the best way to assure security, may you remember these "strugglers for peace"—the common people of the earth who will be the victims of atom bombs, germs that know no national boundaries, guided missiles, and stellar platforms. They are the ones about whom De Noy wrote in Human Destiny. He has suggested that through the long steps upward from one-cell life to many-celled life, from plant to animal, from animal to consciousness, from consciousness to conscience—the uncomfortable nonadapting ones that kept struggling and wouldn't give up were the ones to effect the transitions.

The women of the WILPF are not alone in this struggle for peace. Countless other women and men share with them a determination to find a way other than the North Atlantic Pact and its accompanying arms bill to meet present world needs.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for your statement. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. You are excused.

Mrs. Jane Hayford, of WOMAN, Inc., of New York City.

How long is your statement, Mrs. Hayford?

Mrs. HAYFORD. About 5 minutes.

STATEMENT OF MRS. JANE L. HAYFORD, DIRECTOR OF WORLD ORGANIZATION OF MOTHERS OF ALL NATIONS

Mrs. HAYFORD. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen, my name is Jane L. Hayford. I am here to testify concerning the North Atlantic Treaty in behalf of WOMAN, Inc., the World Organization of Mothers of All Nations.

Our chairman, Miss Dorothy Thompson, would have been here to testify on our behalf, but since she is in Europe, I represent her.

SUPPORT FOR TREATY AND PROPER IMPLEMENTATION

The necessity for firm, swift, united action of peace-loving nations to avert the rising threat of a third world war justifies the North Atlantic Treaty. We, therefore, favor the ratification of the treaty, even though we are far from being satisfied with it. There exist certain grave deficiencies in the treaty, which we hope will be remedied when the treaty is implemented. The treaty as it now stands may lull the peoples of the United States and Europe into a false sense of security—an American Maginot line. Furthermore, by excluding Russia from the pact under any conditions, the treaty merely intensifies the atomic threat and the armament race, and fails to offer any solution other than eventual war.

Many feel that the North Atlantic Pact is but a military alliance and even a menace to peace. But after viewing the possibilities inherent in it we can see it if properly implemented, as the nucleus for the strengthening of the United Nations, setting up under article 51, not only a defense mechanism for collective security but also a world pact under a higher law—a law against aggression and preparation for aggression—with a court of justice to interpret that law, and a police force to enforce it.

Humanity has twice in this twentieth century attempted to establish an effective international authority to restrain aggressors. We must not repeat in the structure of the Atlantic Treaty the same tragic errors that wrecked the League of Nations and now paralyze the Security Council of the United Nations. For the third and perhaps last time there exists a historic opportunity for the United States to help create through the Atlantic Treaty now, and subsequently through a revised United Nations, an international organization of irresistible spiritual, legal, and military authority, so designed that no peaceful nation, whatever its form of government, may be excluded or threatened; and that no government may be permitted to arm for aggression or attack a divided world with any chance of success.

WOMAN, Inc., together with many other national organizations, feel that the answer to the weaknesses in the treaty does not lie in defeating the Atlantic Pact but in implementing it, and placing it on a more effective plane of action.

We therefore urge the Foreign Relations Committee to include in its report on the North Atlantic Treaty two recommendations dealing with its implementation:

First, we urge the establishment within the Atlantic Pact of a workable, veto-free defense authority with its own volunteer emergency force to meet armed attacks.

REVISION OF UN CHARTER

Second, we urge WOMAN's demands for the revision of the United Nations Charter so as to make the Atlantic Pact unnecessary, eventually. These specific demands are:

1. Abolition of the veto in defined matters of aggression.
2. Effective control of atomic energy and quota limitation of all other important weapons.
3. Establishment of an international police force. We prefer to revise the United Nations Charter, with Soviet Russia, if at all possible, in accordance with articles 108 and 109; but should Russia veto these proposals for revision of the United Nations Charter, then our Government should move under article 51 of the UN Charter to extend the Atlantic Pact into a world pact, under a proper world authority and backed up by an international police force.

I am a mother of four sons, and I feel that I express the opinion of the great majority of mothers, as well as of our organization, when I say that we want to make it clear to all that we are opposed just as emphatically to a preventative war against Soviet Russia as we are opposed to appeasement of Russia. The American nation must complete her historic mission, twice attempted, and we must help establish in our world of atomic power and power-politics chaos a world authority under a higher law, with a world judge and a world policeman against aggressors everywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. You are for the pact?

Mrs. HAYFORD. I am for the pact if implemented.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand your statement.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. You are excused.

Mr. Charles LaFollette, representing Americans for Democratic Action.

You are a former Member of Congress, are you not?

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. I am a former Member of Congress from the Eighth District of Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be glad to hear your statement.

STATEMENT OF HON. CHARLES M. LaFOLLETTE, REPRESENTING AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. My name is Charles M. LaFollette. I am here today to present the views of Americans for Democratic Action on the North Atlantic Treaty. Americans for Democratic Action is, as you know, an independent political organization dedicated to the achievement of freedom and security for all people everywhere. We believe that all forms of totalitarianism, including communism, are incompatible with these objectives. We welcome as members of ADA only those whose devotion to the principles of freedom is unqualified.

ADA is aware of the great complexities of international problems and we do not claim that we have all the answers to the troubles which beset the world. We have given our full support to the major objectives of American foreign policy. But we have insisted that the strength and prosperity of this Nation must be used primarily to restore the social and economic health of a broken world. We have a deep faith in this country's capacity to reach and maintain a level of full employment and full production which will insure our continued prosperity and enable us to fulfill our promises and obligations to the democratic nations of the world. We recognize that the progress of economic and political aid to other nations cannot succeed except in an atmosphere of personal and national security; that we must help the world achieve freedom from fear.

SUPPORT FOR TREATY AND IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION

We favor the ratification of the Atlantic Treaty. We believe that the pact must be given substance by the subsequent approval of military assistance. But we insist that economic and political aid must be our first line of defense.

Four months ago I resigned as United States military governor of Wuerttemberg-Baden and I would like to first make a few observations on the question of the relationship of the North Atlantic Pact to Germany. Naturally the whole question of the pact arose after my return to this country. But I feel that I know the German people well enough to gauge their reactions both in military and political terms.

It is not too wild or reckless prediction on the outcome of the Paris Conference to assume that if there should emerge a united Germany Russia will not agree to including it within the Atlantic Treaty any more than we will permit it to join the Comintern. If a situation comparable to the status quo should emerge, western Germany would not want to join in the treaty, and there would be no valid reason why the treaty nations should want to include it.

It seems reasonable to believe that if Russia burst out of the Comintern, she would not make a piecemeal thrust to the Rhine, but would surge toward the North Sea or Atlantic coast. We—not Germany—would be her ultimate goal if the Soviet is bent on destruction of a conflicting ideology and our political and economic system. If we accept this premise, then the Atlantic Treaty, implemented to permit the signatories to increase their military strength, would be tremendously reassuring to the Germans. The pact, given substance by military aid, would force Russia to weigh carefully the great cost of a thrust beyond the Rhine. Why overrun Germany, which would neither provide protection from defensive counterbombing nor achieve a result valuable enough to justify a war?

EFFECT OF TREATY ON GERMANY

As to the political effect of the pact on Germany, if I were a German, I would consider that the ratification of the treaty not only gave me my greatest chance to win freedom from aggression, but that it proved that objective of the United States is to strengthen, preserve, and foster the development of democratic living.

The ratification of the treaty must be coupled, however, with an occupation policy which would convince the Germans that we mean what we say about democracy. We must prove to the Germans who want a democratic Germany that our policies are directed toward the development of equal economic as well as political opportunity. Our policy must not be so reactionary that it will either subject the German workers and farmers to domestic exploiters and totalitarians or drive them into the Communist camp in a desperate escape from such exploitation.

FREEDOM FROM AGGRESSION

Americans for Democratic Action believe that the North Atlantic Pact is a logical step in the development of a foreign policy which gradually took shape following President Roosevelt's famous speech of October 5, 1937, calling for a quarantine of the aggressors. In that speech President Roosevelt enunciated the right of all nations to freedom from external aggression.

I think it is proper to interpolate here that a position in favor of the ratification of the pact was taken by the convention of Americans for Democratic Action held on February 10 of this year. Of course, I don't make the implication that there might not be individual members who might not agree with the majority action, and for that reason I feel, as a member—I am not on any official body—that I am justified in saying that an overwhelming majority of the members are in favor of the position which you find in my statement.

Perhaps the first and certainly most dramatic postwar application of this principle of the right of all nations to freedom from external aggression was the undertaking of the Greek-aid program. We regret that the objectives of that program have not been fully achieved, primarily because we have failed to press for essential reforms in Greece. But ADA is fully in accord with the principle of freedom from aggression of which that policy is based and with the European recovery program, which has supplied the basis for a positive and constructive United States policy in Europe.

We have vigorously opposed those who have challenged every step in the development of United States foreign policy as a deliberate attempt to bypass the United Nations. We believe that the American people have come to recognize the source of this kind of inspired criticism. It is also interesting to note that the chief critics of the pact are the extremists of the left and right—the natural enemies of democracy in all parts of the world.

UNITED NATIONS AND THE PACT

On the other hand, the pact is strongly supported by the vast majority of the trade-unions and non-Communist liberals. It is our conviction that the pact is in clear conformity with both the spirit and the letter of the United Nations Charter.

It must be recognized that the United Nations is not a global panacea. Its limitations must be faced. Most of the UN's difficulties can obviously be traced to the intransigent position of the Soviet within the UN councils. While our essential policies must not be directed against the Soviet Union or any other nation, we cannot ignore the realities and the tragic consequences of Soviet intransigence.

The United Nations has not succeeded in establishing an international police force nor has it been able to set up a system of international control of atomic energy.

Meanwhile, as we have advanced the frontiers of democracy through economic and political cooperation with western Europe, we are forced to the conclusion that freedom and economic stability are difficult if not impossible of attainment in countries which live in constant fear of Soviet aggression.

It is clear that the policies of the United States have produced some change in Soviet policy. Whether it is a change in policy or simply a shift in strategy remains to be seen. But the United States can be justly proud of its patient pursuit of a formula to ease grave international tensions and lessen the terrible hostilities which threaten to divide the world into two sullen camps. To abandon our policies is unthinkable. We cannot even afford to temporize. Any serious indication of uncertainty and indecisiveness on the part of Congress would reassure the U. S. S. R., aggravate the fears of the western European nations and seriously jeopardize our economic aid program.

No one could deny that these policies involve a calculated risk on the part of the United States. But the risk of allowing a demoralized Europe to shift for itself is too frightening to contemplate.

It is our firm belief that American foreign policies, including the pact and the proposed military assistance program are defensive in character. They will allay the fear of aggression in large areas of the world and thus make way for the expansion of democracy and economic freedom. They will mitigate the genuine fears of many nations that they may again have to rely on "liberation" by a distant and unpredictable ally.

Under no circumstances, however, should the emphasis be shifted from the economic to the military phase of the assistance program.

Any reduction in the level of economic aid would undermine the faith of millions of Americans in the democratic and peaceful objectives of United States foreign policy. It would strengthen the Soviet's propaganda weapons in Europe and alienate our democratic allies throughout the world.

We earnestly hope that the Congress will act promptly and decisively to carry out the twin objectives of economic security and political freedom by speedy ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty.

If there are any questions, I will be glad to answer them.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. I have no questions, except I think Mr. LaFollette's testimony is very important because of his official connection with internal German affairs.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I believe that I have accurately reflected what I think the Germans who want peace, and there are many of them, would feel, that they would feel greatly more secure by the ratification of this pact than they do at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. From your experience and service in Germany, do you or do you not believe that the bulk of the German people prefer democracy rather than communism or totalitarianism under Russian direction?

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. Of that I don't think there is any question. I think that they need some help in operating the democratic system, but I certainly do not believe that they want communism, and I think I am positive in saying that there is a great fear of Soviet aggression, at least in western Germany.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much, Mr. LaFollette, for your fine statement. We are delighted to have it.

Senator Donnell?

NO RELIANCE ON LIBERATION

Senator DONNELL. One question, Mr. LaFollette. I notice in the part of this statement which was placed into the record but not read this language, and I want to ask you just what you mean by it. You say:

It is our firm belief that American foreign policies, including the pact and the proposed military-assistance program, are defensive in character. They will allay the fear of aggression in large areas of the world, and thus make way for the extension of democracy and economic freedom.

Then this sentence immediately following is the particular one to which I direct your attention in connection with the others:

They will mitigate the genuine fears of many nations that they may again have to rely on "liberation" by a distant and unpredictable ally.

Will you tell us just what the "liberation" is to which you refer there?

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. Yes. I think, Senator Donnell, that in the first World War, in which I served as a sergeant of infantry, certainly the Belgians and northern France were liberated, which means that they were fought over twice. In this war all of France, certainly north of Cotentin Peninsula, Belgium, and Holland were liberated. They were fought over twice.

What I think these countries are interested in, and what I think my country is interested in, is that you don't have to land on coasts in another war and go through the process not only of fighting back from a coast, but the unfortunate psychological condition of destroying some of the property of your allies.

Senator DONNELL. May I inquire, Mr. LaFollette, whether or not you had in mind the fact, and by the use of the term "liberation" that in the last World War there was a conquest by our enemy of certain territory, and thereafter there was a slow process of liberation of that territory, and that you think that the people in Europe have a fear of having a duplication of that at the instance of another enemy, but nevertheless a taking of possession of these European nations and the only relief to come therefrom being the slow process of a slow liberation of the territory so encompassed by the aggression? Is that the thought you have in mind?

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. I think you have expressed quite well the thought that I had in mind.

AMOUNT OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE NEEDED TO DETER

Senator DONNELL. If that be correct, and I thought that that was what you meant, it is important, therefore, is it not, that in the implementation of this treaty there be provided sufficient power of matériel, or whatever the military power may be, to prevent Russia from actually taking possession of these countries of Europe, thereby avoiding the necessity of an occupation by the enemy and a slow process of liberation? Am I not correct in that conclusion?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Senator, of course, the question of the implementation is to follow subsequently, but I must say that from reading of the experiences of nations in having pacts I am convinced that a pact without adequate implementation is not a deterrent against an aggressor. I think an inadequately implemented pact might lead an aggressor to think that we did not mean it, and the whole purpose, I feel, of these nations who want to live free is to serve notice to the world and to that specific section of the world which might feel that it needed to extend its philosophy all over the world that you cannot do this without great cost. And to that extent, from having in my youth possibly been a believer in what is generally felt to be pacifism of a description, I have reached the opinion that a pact of democratic nations which must go to their people before they can act, defensive in character, adequately implemented, is a deterrent against war and a step toward peace.

Senator DONNELL. And the fears of many nations which you mention as in your opinion to be mitigated by the American foreign policies would be all the more mitigated if those nations knew that such implementation was going to be put behind the pact as would make it impossible for Russia ever to take possession of Europe again.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Yes, and that includes the people of the United States. In other words, as I look at this pact, this is a security pact for the United States just as much as it is for Norway or any nation in it, because twice in my lifetime when a nation has surged to the coast of the North Sea and the Atlantic coast the American people have become aware of the fact that that was a threat to their continued existence as a free nation.

Therefore, it seems to me that we are acting in our own interest, and it is only in our own interest that the American people, the President of the United States, the Senate of the United States, act. When we put ourselves in the position by evidencing our capacity to work with other nations, nations 'way back beyond the coast, we have an effective deterrent against war. That is my feeling, and I believe that it is the feeling of the organization for which I speak. I must put that limitation on it, because now to some extent I am answering you with my own personal feeling.

Senator DONNELL. I understand, yes. Then the fears of the European nations who are signatories to this pact would not be mitigated to the utmost unless the implementation of this treaty were sufficiently great to make it perfectly clear to Russia that Russia could not successfully plan to overrun Europe. I am correct in that, am I not?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Yes, Senator. I am a good enough lawyer and so are you; I will answer your question categorically and say "Yes," and then I will ask you to let me add again that I think the interests of the American people and the fears of the American people are equally at stake, otherwise I would not be in favor of this pact.

Senator DONNELL. I did not mean at all to obscure the American part of it.

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. I did not want to avoid your question, either.

Senator DONNELL. And you have answered it very frankly and very interestingly. But the point I was getting at—I was leaving out for a moment, America. I have no objection to your including it. I want to get perfectly clear your meaning.

MITIGATING FEARS OF ANOTHER LIBERATION

You say these American foreign policies will mitigate the general fears of many nations that they may again have to rely on "liberation" by a distant and unpredictable ally, and the point I am getting at, and limiting it for the moment solely to the European signatories, is—did I understand you to say that the fears of those European nations will be mitigated in that they think that this pact is going to provide adequate implementation of the pact to prevent Russia from overrunning Europe and thus leaving Europe crushed and only to be resuscitated by the slow process of liberation? I am correct in my understanding?

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. I think you have made one of the finest arguments in support of ratifying the pact that I have heard, Senator. Yes, you are absolutely right, and with what you have said I agree.

May I add, too, that I think what we are trying to do is to give the peoples of Europe, and as I have said in my prepared statement, the peoples of Germany, a chance to revive their economies and their ways of living so that they can become democratically strong. As you have assurance and as there is mutual working together, then you can devote your attention to the development of your economy and the development of the democratic method of operating without looking over your shoulder all the time for fear that someone is going to grab you.

That is why I think the pact is an excellent element of an American foreign policy as presently enunciated, with which I am in complete agreement.

Senator DONNELL. How long were you United States military governor of Würtemberg-Baden?

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. Senator, I answer that by saying that I went there December 15, 1947, and left Germany on January 19, 1949.

Senator DONNELL. You were there 13 months?

Mr. LaFOLLETTE. Yes, sir, until January 19, 1949. Prior to that I had been a prosecutor in charge of prosecuting the members of the German Nazi Ministry of Justice in a proceeding at Nuernberg for 1 year.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. LaFollette, have you looked into the question as to what quantity of either matériel or manpower or both would be necessary in order to make it impossible for Russia reasonably to expect that she would be able to overrun Europe in the event of a quick attack by her? I mean, how much implementation opposed to her would be necessary to make it reasonably certain that she couldn't get across and take possession of Europe?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. No, Senator, I have not. I think that is a matter that lies strictly within the competence and the intelligence and knowledge of military people.

May I put one limitation upon that question, if you do not mind? Senator DONNELL. Certainly.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I do not believe that we have to use the word "impossible" to make this pact, implemented, serve as a dead line. I think we have to make it strong enough that there is a strong probability of extreme cost.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Then, on that basis, you measure what would be necessary.

AMOUNT NEEDED TO INSURE EUROPE AGAINST ATTACK

Senator DONNELL. I think your amendment is proper, and I am glad you submitted that amendment to my statement. You have not, I assume, given attention to the question as to how much either in men or matériel would be necessary to make it reasonably probable that Russia would not be able, by a quick attack, to overrun Europe?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I know very well that I would be attempting to put myself in the position of an expert witness who is not an expert, and any lawyer would take me apart if I did. No, that is not within my province, Senator.

Senator DONNELL. It is a fact, is it not, that in France there is very much less manpower than there was at the beginning of the World War, or at least there was much less manpower at the conclusion of World War II than there was at the beginning?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Yes. The French lost people through slave labor, largely, and they also lost people through the last phase of the war, largely through slave labor and through run-down health conditions which prevailed under German occupation.

Senator DONNELL. And in order to rebuild France properly it would be advisable to make available as large a proportion of its manpower as possible in the actual building up and rehabilitation physically of France. That is correct, is it?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I think that is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Do you have any information as to the probable number of soldiers that France or any other one of the 11 other signatories than ourselves could put into the field without unduly interfering with the rehabilitation process to which I refer?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. No. I have no knowledge of that, nor do I have enough expert knowledge of the modern methods of war to know whether or not with modern instrumentalities of war you necessarily have to have the same manpower that you did under conditions of war previous to this time. You see, without knowing anything about new weapons, I naturally do not know how many men would be needed.

THE ADA

Senator DONNELL. I can well see the correctness of your viewpoint. I wanted to ask this question, and I hope you take no offense at it. That is about the organization of Americans for Democratic Action. You refer to it as an independent political organization. Is it independent in the sense that it is nonpolitical? You said "independent political organization." Just what do you mean by the term "independent?"

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I would use the term "independent" in saying that it does not file candidates for office, it has no precinct committeemen—at least that is what we have in Indiana—it has no county chairman, it doesn't run any candidates as such. That is what I mean. It certainly is interested in political results.

Senator DONNELL. Do its members consist entirely of members of any one political party, or are the members scattered among various political parties?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Senator, I would say that they are scattered. To be perfectly honest with you, I would say probably that when its members vote, more of them vote the Democratic ticket than any other. I think that is a fair statement.

PROVISION FOR WITHDRAWAL OR EXPULSION

Senator DONNELL. I notice that you say that all forms of totalitarianism, including communism, are incompatible with these objectives, which I understand to be the achievement of freedom and security for all people everywhere. Have you observed anything in the North Atlantic Treaty which would permit either the voluntary withdrawal or expulsion of any member of the community created by the treaty in the event that member should become a Communist nation?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I am not sure, but I think that practical considerations can always vary the provisions of this instrument. If you have reference to something that you believe precludes it, I must confess that on the specific language I am sure you are much better informed than I.

Senator DONNELL. I don't know about that. You may be far better informed than I am. I assume, Mr. LaFollette, that you have studied it, and I am confident you have. Have you observed anything in the North Atlantic Treaty that provides that if a nation shall become a Communist nation it shall be subject to expulsion by reason of its becoming a Communist nation?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. If you will give me just a second, is there not a provision that says that the parties to the treaty shall consult if there is danger to their internal stability or their internal form of government? With that consultation I think you could reach almost any conclusion, or the signatories could, if that danger became an existing fact.

Senator DONNELL. I do not recall the provision. There is article 4 [reading]:

The Parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the Parties is threatened.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I think that is pretty broad language. "Political independence" to me is pretty broad language.

Senator DONNELL. This pact is created and brought into existence by 12 signatories, is it not?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. And no signatory could be expelled from it without the consent of all signatories, including itself. That is correct, is it not, Mr. LaFollette?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I am not so sure that I would say that, in view of the language with reference to political independence and security. A signatory whose territorial integrity and whose political independence had become so jeopardized that it might not exist in the form in which the signatories found it, could not at least no longer be considered an operating member of the operating pact. That is a little involved, but I think you know what I mean.

In other words, I think it would be a threat to the integrity of other signatories if the political independence of one was seriously affected so that it was felt that its political actions were determined by the considerations of a power from beyond its national borders.

Senator DONNELL. I will put it this way, Mr. LaFollette: There is nothing which expressly says that a nation may be expelled for any reason?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. There is nothing which expressly spells it, but I do not believe there is anything which necessarily precludes the possibility within the framework of the pact.

Senator DONNELL. Is there anything in the pact which tells how many nations must act in order to expel, and in the absence of such a provision would it not be necessary that all the signatories, including the prospective expellee, must consent?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. No, I do not think that is correct, Senator, because in any group very often a person or a body or a group of members who might be expelled for no longer being in conformance with the purpose of the organization would not often consent to being expelled. In other words, they do not consent to it ever. If I were thrown out of the Masons I would not consent to it.

Senator DONNELL. At any rate there is a provision, however, as you doubtless realize and know, of course, in the particular organization to which you refer for expulsion of members and everybody who goes in knows he goes in subject to that, but waiving the argument, and I am not criticizing you for presenting your views, there is nothing which expressly says that a nation may be expelled for any cause whatsoever. I think I am correct about that.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. I think that is correct. May I add that I think there is nothing which expressly includes it or implicitly excludes such a possibility.

Senator DONNELL. If you were drawing a contract as a lawyer and desired to provide some means by which one of the parties to the contract might be excluded from participation in it, you would say so expressly, would you not?

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Senator, I wonder if you would relieve me from answering that, because I might be passing judgment upon other lawyers. I would not like to do that.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you for a very interesting and able statement.

Ex-Congressman Hamilton Fish, of New York. State to the reporter your name and background.

Mr. FISH. The name is Hamilton Fish, former Member of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. How many years were you in the House?

Mr. FISH. Twenty-four years. I served with you on the Foreign Affairs Committee a quarter of a century ago.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. I remember very much our association in the House. I am glad to have you, Mr. Fish.

STATEMENT OF HAMILTON FISH, FORMER MEMBER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. FISH. At the outset of my remarks I desire to congratulate Chairman Connally for urging full diplomatic recognition of Spain. It is sheer humbug to maintain an American Ambassador in Soviet Russia, the most despotic and tyrannical government in the world, and refuse to send an Ambassador to Spain. What is sauce for the Communist goose is sauce for the Fascist gander.

COMMUNIST AIMS

While Soviet Russia is conducting a cold war against us and directing Communist expansion by propaganda, revolution, and force throughout the world, Spain is on our side against world communism, the most evil force in the world, but is powerless to promote fascism beyond its borders. How long will Secretary Acheson abuse the patience of American people in relation to China and Spain? As a result of our ignoring of the Wedemeyer report, China is being turned over to world communism and the rest of Asia will fall like a ripe plum. Within the next decade, when Soviet Russia is prepared and has a supply of atomic bombs, I predict she will start world war III and unleash at least 2,000,000 highly trained Chinese soldiers for marching on the Suez Canal and to fight at Armageddon.

Attainment of world-wide communism is still the guiding policy of the Red plotters in the Kremlin at Moscow. The Communists throughout the world have never deviated since 1917 from their fundamental objective of achieving world communism. I quote from the Communist Manifesto by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, which is the bible of all Communists [reading]:

In short, the Communists everywhere support every revolutionary movement against the existing social and political order of things. In all these movements they bring to the front as the leading question in each case the property question, no matter what its degree of development at the time. The Communists disdain to conceal their views and aims. They openly declare that their ends can be attained only by the forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions. Let the ruling classes tremble at a Communist revolution. The proletarians have nothing to lose but their chains. They have a world to gain.

To that extent, Mr. Chairman, I admire the Communists, because throughout the world, whether in London, New York, Peking, or Tokyo, all have the same ultimate objective of bringing about world communism.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not mean you favor it; you just admire their methods.

Mr. FISH. I admire them because they are consistent in their views, far more consistent than Republicans or Democrats, who make their party platform one day and begin to forget about it the next. Every Communist believes in world revolution.

I have not the time, Mr. Chairman, to go back to the report we made when I was chairman of the Committee of the House to Investigate Communist Activities and Propaganda. When Mr. Foster, then and still the head of the Communist Party, came before the committee he admitted, under affirmation or oath, that they were in favor of bringing about a world revolution, that they were against our republican form of government, that they did not believe in the American flag but in the Red flag, and owed allegiance to Soviet Russia. It is all in this book that I gave you.

SUPPORT FOR TREATY

As a former noninterventionist leader in Congress, and proud of it, as every statement we made has been vindicated many times over by time and events, I find myself now compelled, because of the rotten mess we made of it in Europe, to urge our joining the North Atlantic Pact as a peace measure in defense of the remaining free nations of Europe against Soviet aggression. Having helped to wreck and ruin half of Europe we have certain moral obligations toward the nations of western Europe, including Germany, not to let them be swallowed up, one by one, by the Red octopus. In addition, our own national security is involved with half the world already Communist. The place to stop the Red armies is at the Elbe, and the time is now.

May I pause and digress there a moment to commend and congratulate Senator Vandenberg for calling attention not only of Europe but of the American people to the fact that this pact does not necessarily safeguard a large part of western Europe from invasion. It is merely a step in the direction that makes defense possible, and probably for the time being will hold up any attack by the Russian armed forces.

Of course, although the Elbe may be, theoretically speaking, our first line of defense, everyone knows that the Russian Army, if they did attack, would easily overrun the Elbe and our first line of defense would be the Rhine, and they might overrun that. That is why I am so anxious that we should fully recognize Spain and have Spain, if not a partner, a direct partner, in the pact, at least a silent partner or one that would cooperate with the purpose of the pact, because the Pyrenees may become a rampart of defense for western Europe.

NEED FOR A DEFENSIVE ALLIANCE

Let us be realistic. The Russian Communists have a definite plan of world revolution and armed conquest. The Marshall plan is merely a relief and rehabilitation measure providing food and equipment for Europe. It does not protect or defend the free nations of Europe from Soviet armed aggression. It does not achieve security for ourselves or any other nation. Without the North Atlantic Pact our foreign policy is useless and bankrupt. The Marshall plan is nothing more than a paper blockade, and as ineffectual. It opposes a paper curtain to the iron curtain. It neither frightens, checks, or defeats the Communist plan for world revolution and conquest. It assumes that the nations receiving our gifts automatically increase production and acquire moral force and physical power to withstand the Communist colossus. No nation ever restored its stability and strength by depending on hand-outs. That can only be done by their own efforts and hard labor, but even then a defensive military alliance is necessary.

The Communist aggressors fear and respect only military might. We should immediately reinforce the Marshall plan by the North Atlantic Pact together with Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, Holland, Norway, and Denmark. If I had my way Spain would also be included. It should be done at once so that there will be no doubt of a united military front of all western democratic nations and Spain to oppose and crush any attempt by the Red army to violate the peace of the world by overt acts of aggression in western Europe.

It is their only chance to survive as free nations. Let them pool their armed forces under a single general staff. Once the Communist armies overrun Europe it will be the end of Great Britain and we will be confronted with an aggressive and militant Communist Europe and Asia. The Communists are on the march in China and will probably overrun all Asia within a few years. Our own security is at stake and if western Europe falls before the Communist juggernaut it would leave us almost alone to wage an irrepressible war with world communism.

Although world communism is on the march in Europe and Asia, it is not inevitable here. It must be stopped. It can be stopped.

The words of Patrick Henry apply today more than ever before:

Is life so dear, or peace so sweet as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery?

That is the paramount issue in the world today—freedom and democracy, or slavery and totalitarianism. There can be no compromise between freedom and slavery, nor between communism and fascism.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity of coming here.

The CHAIRMAN. We are very glad indeed to have you, sir.

Mr. FISH. I am happy to be here, and want to congratulate you on your efforts to put through the North Atlantic Pact as a peace measure in defense of the security of the free nations of Europe and of our own national security.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much, Mr. Fish. We greatly appreciate your coming here, in view of your background and experience in Congress and in public affairs.

Mr. FISH. If I might add, Senator, not many years ago, when I was chairman of the Committee to Investigate Communist Activities, and even since then, I was denounced as a Red baiter and a witch burner for telling the American people that the Communists throughout the world had only one main objective, and that was world revolution by conquest, beginning with propaganda and following it up by infiltration and then force and violence, and that has been true since 1917. It was true in 1930 and it is just as true today.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much.

Mr. Ely Culbertson is not here. We will pass him over.

Mr. Donald Henderson, of the Food, Tobacco, Agricultural, and Allied Workers Union.

STATEMENT OF DONALD HENDERSON, PRESIDENT, FOOD, TOBACCO, AGRICULTURAL, AND ALLIED WORKERS UNION, CIO

Mr. HENDERSON. My name is Donald Henderson. I am president of the Food, Tobacco, Agricultural, and Allied Workers Union of America, CIO.

My union has sent me here to oppose ratification of the Atlantic Pact, on the ground that it is a real and present threat to peace.

The CHAIRMAN. You say your union has sent you here. You don't mean the whole membership. You mean the officials?

Mr. HENDERSON. The international executive board of my union.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. All right.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have just returned from a month in France, where I had the honor of being one of the principal spokesmen for the American delegation at the World Peace Congress in Paris.

While in France I met with workers and spoke at several workers' meetings. These were rank-and-file workers, not just top leaders.

Without exception they told me that the working people of Europe will not take part in an aggressive war. They will not tamely submit to such a war being fought on their soil. They will resist such a war with every means at their command, including armed resistance.

PROVOCATIVENESS OF THE TREATY

A war of aggression will bring civil war to all Europe.

This was told me by workers regardless of their political party affiliation or lack of it. It is not a question of sympathy to the Soviet Union or the United States. The people of Europe have had enough war and they are determined to have no more.

The Atlantic Pact, especially when backed up by a huge program of arming reactionary European governments, will go far toward bringing about such a war. This is the opinion of not only the workers of Europe, but also of the plain rank and file of worker in America, too. Unfortunately, he is seldom consulted on such matters, but the American worker, like his European brother, does not want war, and fears that war will come.

The people of Europe see the world already divided into two armed camps. They feel convinced that certain groups in the United States are trying to provoke a war. They do not think that the Soviet Union is trying to provoke war. They feel that the common people of all Europe and of the United States as well want peace.

The Atlantic Pact does nothing to break down this feeling. On the contrary, the signing of the pact and its consideration now by the Senate confirm the feeling that war is the objective of certain very powerful groups in this country and their junior partners in certain governments abroad.

I speak at some length about these matters because I learned them at first hand during my stay in France. My stay was admittedly brief, but I did have the advantage of meeting and talking with the rank and file while I was there. This is an advantage not always granted to officials of the State Department.

The newspapers here did not adequately report the meeting of the World Peace Congress. They did not mention a meeting of the World Federation of Trade Unions which I also attended.

The CHAIRMAN. The CIO is now not a member of and is opposed to the WFTU.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is not quite correct. It is true the secretary-treasurer of the CIO, James Carey, walked out of the last executive meeting of the World Federation of Trade Unions, but there has been no official action taken by the CIO on its affiliation as yet. That matter has to come before the next national executive committee meeting of the CIO, which takes place next week. At that meeting next week I assume they will take some action one way or the other.

These two meetings I attended represented a total of something like one billion people, including some of the peoples of Asia and Africa.

WORLD PEACE CONFERENCE IN PARIS

For the first time in my life, I saw 500,000 people trying to get into a mass meeting of the Peace Congress. The stadium in Paris held 130,000. The half million came from all over Europe, by train, by bus, by caravans, on bicycles, on foot.

Every one of these people came to Paris with one single thought in mind—there shall be no more war. They will resist a new war with every means at their command, up to and including civil war.

Any responsible observer will tell you the same facts. They will also tell you that the Atlantic Pact is regarded by all except certain government officials in western Europe as the most serious danger to peace since Munich.

So much for the feeling of the people in Europe. Since this is an international treaty affecting them as well as ourselves, we cannot afford to shrug it off as the opinion of foreigners.

I told the World Peace Congress delegates that, I quote, "The American workers will not easily be drawn into an aggressive war." That statement stands. Yet there is great fear in our country, fear that war may come despite protestations of our policymakers.

The present easing-off in the German situation has dispelled some of that fear, but it remains.

ATLANTIC PACT AND FEAR OF WAR

The Atlantic Pact nourishes that fear. The huge arms outlay that follows such a pact adds not only to the fear but also to a sense of insecurity, especially among workers.

They see the staggering cost of arming Europe taken out of their living standards. They see the cost of living shooting up as more and more of the Nation's wealth is put into arms production. They see the inevitable result of posing guns against butter—which is plenty of guns, little butter and the probability of a big depression, if not a shooting war, as the inevitable result.

REARMAMENT AND DEPRESSION

The American people are sincerely devoted to peace. This is not just a matter of sentiment. It is a matter of hard, pork chop facts. War brings not only death and destruction to its immediate victims. It also brings unemployment, lower living standards, chaos and misery to the common people. No one can be deceived for very long by the false prosperity that comes from war preparations—particularly when 5,000,000 workers are already unemployed and millions more are living in the shadow of the lay-off.

The Atlantic Pact is a long step in the preparation of war. Followed by huge arms building, it is a long step toward a new and far more frightful depression in this country. Pyramiding arms instead of producing goods and services for people destroys real wealth, does not create it. We cannot throw away our cake and have it too.

Yet this is what follows the Atlantic Pact, as surely as night follows day. The Atlantic Pact comes in the door and social security, housing, health, education, and all the social needs of this country, fly out the window. It is even said now that we cannot raise minimum wages to $1 or 75 cents an hour because "defense" needs are too great. The infamous Taft-Hartley law stays on the books, but the Atlantic Pact, we are told, must be passed in a hurry.

UNITED NATIONS AND THE PACT

The American people had great hopes for the United Nations. They still do—but the Atlantic Pact will knock the props out from under those hopes if it goes into effect.

The United Nations was built on the unanimity of its strongest members. This is the real meaning of the Security Council with the so-called veto power—that the strongest powers must be in agreement in their relations with each other if peace is to be maintained. You cannot have it any other way, and the United States insisted on the unanimity rule just as strongly as any of the other leading powers did.

But the Atlantic Pact destroys the unanimity rule. Under its provisions every signatory power is forced to go to war automatically if war breaks out.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to challenge that statement, "automatically," that is not true.

Mr. HENDERSON. I refer you to article 5. There is no choice, either for us or any other nation that signs and ratifies this pact.

The Security Council, where the powers meet as equals, is destroyed by the Atlantic Pact. The Atlantic Pact wipes out the only safeguards that the nations have been able to erect for peace.

The claim that the Atlantic Pact is merely a "regional" agreement is absurd. You cannot make an agreement that covers the whole western Europe and takes arms and military bases right up to the borders of another powerful state and still insist that it is merely regional.

Let me take an illustration from collective bargaining. When a union wants to make an agreement, looking to industrial peace, we try to deal with the employers alike. We don't single out certain ones and say arbitrarily you are good and we'll team up with you against the other fellows. We try to get them all in under the same terms. We try to get and we give equality of treatment for all. Any other approach brings cut-throat competition and conflict, just as the Atlantic Pact now threatens to do.

The way to peace is still through agreement, not through splitting the world into two armed camps. The current agreement on the Berlin situation and the coming meeting of the foreign ministers proves once again that the agreement road is still open.

The common people on all sides of the Atlantic, the Pacific and the other oceans, want peace and they will have peace.

PROGRAM FOR PEACE

To insure peace, we urge this action now before it is too late:

1. Scrap the Atlantic Pact.

2. Let the great powers meet as equals with the guns checked outside the door.

3. Above all, turn to the United Nations, where the powers can meet as equals and where decisions on the future of the world are taken in unanimity and full agreement by all.

This is the way of peace. The way of the Atlantic Pact and the inevitable pyramiding of arms upon an exhausted world is the way to war.

The CHAIRMAN. You went to France as a delegate to this World Peace Conference?

Mr. HENDERSON. As a representative of my union yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that a lot of Frenchmen and others that were there said that they would not fight if they had a war, is that right?

Mr. HENDERSON. Against an aggressive war.

The CHAIRMAN. An aggressive war? There is no aggression in this treaty. It is a peace treaty.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think, Senator, an aggressive war, in the mind of the ordinary person in Europe, is a war in which they are in the middle, in which two great powers are having a fight and they are the ones that are the victims.

AGGRESSIVE WAR AND THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Do you agree with the views of those Frenchmen and others that have made public statements that in the event of a war against Russia they would not fight?

Mr. HENDERSON. If I were a European—

The CHAIRMAN. I am not asking you that. You are an American. Do you agree with the view that if we had a war with Russia you would not fight?

Mr. HENDERSON. If we conducted an aggressive war against any nation I would not fight.

The CHAIRMAN. This is not an aggressive war. This is purely a defensive pact. Have you read it?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have read it. I do not claim to be an expert on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a lawyer?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not a lawyer, I am a labor leader. I think it leads toward war.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose Russia should make an armed attack on one of the signatories to this treaty, and as a result of that the United States got into the war. Would you support that war?

Mr. HENDERSON. I think an armed attack by any nation on another nation deserves resistance.

The CHAIRMAN. You would fight?

Mr. HENDERSON. An armed attack on any nation by another nation.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the purpose of this treaty is, to prevent that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not understand it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. I do.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. I simply wanted to ask Mr. Henderson whether he disagrees with the statement issued on March 20, 1949, by the CIO, which asserts "The Congress of Industrial Organizations is happy to go on record as a firm supporter of the principles and purposes of the North Atlantic Pact"?

Mr. HENDERSON. I disagree. The international executive board of my union disagrees, and the international convention of my union disagrees.

POSITION OF NATIONAL CIO

Senator VANDENBERG. What is the relationship which would indicate the relative importance to be assessed to your statement and the statement made by the CIO on March 20? Would you give me an indication of which one carries how much weight?

Mr. HENDERSON. Their statement represents a majority of the national opinion and policy of the national CIO. I express the opinion of my own international union, which has certain autonomous and democratic rights to determine our own policy as laid down by our membership and our constitution. I am not speaking for the national CIO; I am speaking for my own international union.

Senator VANDENBERG. What puzzles me is that when the national CIO speaks, for whom does it speak?

Mr. HENDERSON. It speaks for those who, on such questions, agree with its policy. The majority of my membership, and I believe the great majority of the rank and file in most unions, do not agree with that expression of policy. We have a disagreement, which is not very rare.

Senator VANDENBERG. Did your union support the Marshall plan?

Mr. HENDERSON. It did not, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. Did the tenth constitutional convention of the CIO in Portland in November 1948, approve the Marshall plan by resolution?

Mr. HENDERSON. It did, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. Does that have any authority?

Mr. HENDERSON. That expresses, therefore, the national policy of the CIO; that is correct.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Your union is sort of an outlaw union.

Mr. HENDERSON. Our union is a minority as compared to this question.

The CHAIRMAN. You recognize Mr. Carey as being an official of the CIO?

Mr. HENDERSON. He is the secretary-treasurer of the national CIO, with whom I disagree most violently on many issues.

The CHAIRMAN. I am speaking about this issue. I would not want to get out into the wide fields of your disagreements.

Mr. Carey appeared in support of this treaty.

So you do not represent the views of the national; you are just representing the views of your one union?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Although the rest of the CIO are permitted to go their own way?

Mr. HENDERSON. I think I represent the views, not officially, of many rank and file members of many of the CIO unions.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no doubt about that.

Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Henderson, how many members does the Food, Tobacco, Agricultural, and Allied Workers Union of America, CIO possess?

Mr. HENDERSON. Approximately 100,000.

Senator DONNELL. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand in recess until a quarter of three this afternoon.

(Whereupon, at 1:20 p. m., a recess was taken until 2:45 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS

(The committee reconvened at 2:45 p. m., at the expiration of the recess.)

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. Richie, Moorestown, N. J. All right, Mr. Richie. Give the stenographer your name, your residence, your business, and so on.

STATEMENT OF DAVID S. RICHIE, MOORESTOWN, N. J., FORMER STAFF REPRESENTATIVE OF THE AMERICAN FRIENDS SERVICE COMMITTEE IN POLAND AND FINLAND

Mr. RICHIE. My name is David Richie of Moorestown, N. J., a life-long resident of Moorestown, N. J. My occupation is as secretary of the Friends Social Order Committee of Philadelphia, but I do not represent them here. I am speaking entirely as an individual.

The CHAIRMAN. Staff representative? What do you mean by that?

Mr. RICHIE. I was sent by them as their representative. I would like to make that clear. That I have spent 22 months in Europe as the staff representative of the American Friends Committee during the past 3 years, but I am not on their staff at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Go ahead with your statement.

Mr. RICHIE. I want to first say that I am really very grateful for this opportunity and really proud to live in a country where the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is willing to listen to an absolutely unknown individual simply because he has a concern. That is something to be proud of and I am glad. I have been in Poland and Germany and other countries where that would never be, and young people feel pretty helpless to say what they think is important.

I have had this privilege of participating in international voluntary work camps along with young people of many different nationalities, of many different ideologies—Communists, Socialists, ex-Nazis, ex-Fascists, and all shades in between—and have found that in working together with them for the purpose of helping other people, we have found a great unity, a sense of recognition that there is only one real enemy of all of us: War, reliance upon threat of war, of armaments, and that we must all strive to work toward peace. I am completely convinced that there is a better way than reliance upon the North Atlantic Pact. I am completely convinced that we can win the peace we all want, we can win the ideological competition between American democracy and Russian communism without the tragedy of atomic war and without resorting to military alliances and increasing armaments.

In spite of my respect for all those who place confidence in armaments, I am convinced this military alliance and lend-lease armament program seriously threatens to defeat the very purpose for which it is intended, to promote the peace of the world. I must try to tell you why.

REKINDLING OF HOPE FOR PEACE

The one absolutely universal desire of all the people of all Europe is for peace for all the world. Anything which contributes to rekindling in the hearts of Europeans, hope that permanent peace will be achieved, contributes to the victory of democracy over communism. Anything which contributes to the almost universal fear and despair and cynicism in Europe contributes to the victory of communism and the defeat of democracy.

It is my conviction that the threat of communism is not primarily a military threat. Russia with its 14,000,000 casualties in the last war and with its most densely populated and most industrialized area, equivalent to all of the United States east of the Mississippi ruthlessly devastated by the German invasion is not threatening a military invasion of the United States or of Europe. What Russia is threatening to do is to take advantage of the bitter despair of the millions of poverty-stricken and hopeless people, particularly throughout Germany, France, and Italy and to use this despair to create opportunities for local Communists to seize power. This is what they are now doing successfully in China, in spite of our $2,000,000,000 military lend-lease program there.

My appeal to every Senator, to every Congressman, to every American, is to put our faith in those acts and policies which rekindle hope and faith in the future in the hearts of Europeans. There is almost universal predisposition on the part of eastern Europeans as well as on the part of western Europeans to want to believe in America and to follow our leadership. America's generous contributions to UNRRA, our millions of CARE packages and direct-mail food parcels, and our original offer of Marshall-plan aid to all of Europe have seen to that.

THREAT TO MARSHALL PLAN

Actually the degree of economic recovery that the various nations of Europe have made with our assistance has contributed immeasurably to the decline in popular favor of communism in each of these nations, and this decline, in my opinion, is a fact.

However, the struggle has not been finally won and the overburdening of these convalescent economies with armaments constitutes a serious danger to the success of our construction program. I urge all-out Marshall-plan aid without armaments as the surest way to win the common industrial worker, the coal miner and the peasant of France and Italy particularly to faith in a better way than communism. We must offer houses and tractors and consumer goods, not rifles or tanks or machine guns, if we are to offer these common people hope.

SUPPORT OF UNITED NATIONS

Secondly, I urge all-out support of the United Nations as the agency to which millions of Europeans will give support if given any real encouragement. We cannot claim to be doing so when spending $1,000 on armaments for every $1 we spend on the UN. However, we can do so, we can support the UN and achieve every objective we hope to gain by the North Atlantic Pact. We can unite all the nations desiring a mutual defense pact under the UN. We can unite all the nations wanting a world police force under the UN. We can unite all the nations wanting economic recovery, and military disarmament under the UN. We can win the confidence of the people of Europe and the world that we are the champions of peace but we must recognize that our tremendous armament program simply does not inspire this confidence today.

It was said, indeed, to be asked again and again in Poland, "Do the people in western Europe fear war as much as we do? Do the people of America really want war?" Or to be told in Finland, "No, David, there is no hope of peace, not until you in America have suffered."

I asked young people in almost a dozen other countries of Europe—Italy, Switzerland, France, and England included—if they agreed with this Finnish work camper and the answer was always the same. They wanted to believe there was hope but they really did not have hope. But we can change that pessimism and I still have faith that we will.

EXTENSION OF CIVIL RIGHTS TO COLORED RACES

The third plank in an all-out constructive program to win the world competition with communism is a program to win the loyalty of the 1,500,000,000 colored people throughout the world not now aligned with either group. Here, too, they want to believe in the principles of equality and liberty enunciated in our Declaration of Independence but they know us only too well as a Nation of hypocrites. Every effort we make to practice what we preach in terms of fair-employment practices and equal opportunity for every American minority is worth more than millions of dollars of armaments in freeing the world from the threat of communism.

DANGER OF REARMAMENT

Finally, every non-Communist European, and that is the vast majority of them, would urge me to urge you, for our own sakes as well as for their own, to find a better method of avoiding another disastrous depression than by ever-increasing armament expenditures. Hitler has proved that way to be the way of death. We must realize it before it is too late.

Economic prosperity purchased at the price of totally unproductive militarization of America and all our allies is a false prosperity and can only lead to bankruptcy if it does not lead to war. We must find the ways by which our total abundant productivity can be harnessed for the welfare and security of the millions of common men throughout America and the world. It can be done.

England and the Scandinavian countries are pointing the way. They are wiping out the slums, they are wiping out disease, they are expanding public education, they are expanding every form of social security. This is the way to overcome the threat of communism, this is the way to win the peace.

There are, no doubt, risks involved, but certainly not any greater risks than the risk of armaments. In fact, in my opinion, it is the only way to win the peace. A military alliance and armament program can only undercut and block this road to peace—it cannot supplement it. We cannot breed hope and fear at the same time. World cooperation for the good of all is the only way because it is the only way that is in harmony with the fundamental laws of this universe which simply require us to learn to cooperate together for the good of all or perish.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. Senator Green, any questions?

Senator GREEN. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much. What is your present business?

Mr. RICHIE. I am now with the Friends Social Order Committee, a Philadelphia committee that is active in organizing voluntary work camps, helping young people, to help tenants to improve their homes and thereby get an education of the problems in America.

The CHAIRMAN. Your activities are in this country, not in Europe?

Mr. RICHIE. Yes; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Thank you very much.

STATEMENT OF FREDERICK C. SMEDLEY, ATTORNEY, WATERBURY, CONN.

Mr. SMEDLEY. My name is Frederick C. Smedley. I am an attorney from Waterbury, Conn., appearing as an individual citizen.

Mr. Chairman and Senators. I do not wish to oppose ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty. Under present circumstances, I believe it is a necessary action and might be helpful in preventing a recurrence somewhere else of such events as took place in Czechoslovakia last year.

A UN CONFERENCE FOR DISARMAMENT

It is conceded on all sides that the pact is a gamble, subject to all the hazards that have historically been inherent in military alliances. What I want most respectfully, but with all the fervor of my being, to urge upon you is, in effect, that in recommending that we take that gamble, you also recommend that we hedge our bet by accompanying our ratification of the pact with the simultaneous passage of a resolution calling for a UN conference to draft a convention enacting universal disarmament down to a police and coast-guard level, under every conceivable sanction to insure its strict enforcement everywhere, every day, against everybody, from heads of state down.

I have placed copies of a draft of such a resolution before you and I ask to have one inserted in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. We will put that in the record.

(The resolution referred to reads as follows:)

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President is authorized and requested to suggest that the United Nations, in a manner approximating the procedure so successfully used by the International Labor Office in procuring agreement among many competing nations on labor matters, call an international conference for the purpose of preparing a draft convention enacting complete national disarmament, except for domestic police forces and coast guards for maritime nations, both of which shall be of limited size, equipment, and field of operations according to territory, population, and coastline they are to police; together with all necessary international controls and means of insuring its rigid enforcement against any individuals who may attempt to violate it; such convention to be submitted to all national legislatures for immediate passage, but not to become operative until it is universally adopted and coming into effect simultaneously for all nations and all territories, territorial waters, ships and airplanes under their jurisdiction.

Mr. SMEDLEY. I make this suggestion because I am deeply conscious of the propaganda blasts that have already emanated and will continue to emanate from those sectors of public opinion which do not agree with our democratic way of life, to the effect that the pact is a capitalistic, imperialistic, warmongering plot, designed to isolate and destroy the peoples' democracies.

PSYCHOLOGICAL EFFECT OF A DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL

To the well informed minority of the world's population, those claims appear absurd, but I submit that to the uninformed and deliberately misinformed majority they are sufficiently credible to justify our taking every step we can to discredit them, in order to prevent our losing another battle in the war for the minds of men that is now going on in the world.

I believe our asking for such a conference at exactly this juncture of events could not be kept hidden from that vast majority. I believe it might well inspire a worldwide groundswell of public opinion demanding that our proposal be carried through to fruition.

I have placed before you a short pamphlet entitled "What Are We Waiting For"? In it I have attempted to appeal in simple language to ordinary people everywhere for action by them in every way open to them to make their governments insure their security, by all of them at the same time, abolishing the means of preparing for or conducting warfare.

I commend it to your perusal at your leisure as an example of the type of positive propaganda for real security, stability, and democracy in which we could engage if the Congress adopts such a resolution as I propose.

Recently I wrote Dr. Kluckhohn, the eminent director of the Russian research center at Harvard University and asked what in his opinion would be the effects if the pamphlet were to be translated into Russian and circulated among the Russian people by every means that might be used for that purpose. He replied:

I suspect that if it were translated and widely distributed in Russia the effect would be very useful.

I do not believe I have to take much of this body's time in demonstrating that, having offered to renounce completely all atomic weapons if others will do the same under effective guaranties, we should be even more willing, if not anxious, to do the same thing as to all other weapons, in some of which we are at a disadvantage vis-à-vis certain other nations or combinations of nations.

That argument was made far more cogently and eloquently than I can make it by your own colleague, Senator Tydings, when he introduced his Senate Joint Resolution 95 in the Eightieth Congress.

ADVANTAGES OF A DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL NOW

I do want to emphasize that our at this time proposing the draft convention procedure for achieving complete disarmament, to come into effect only on universal adoption, would give our foreign policy certain advantages it now lacks, as follows:

1. The conference drafting the convention would channel all the mutual suspicions and antagonisms of its members into the constructive use of strengthening the provisions of the convention for sanctions to insure enforcement of all its provisions. Unlike a treaty, the convention, once it becomes operative by universal adoption, would be self-executing, with all domestic law-enforcement machinery, as well as any necessary international machinery, behind it.

2. Any nations not agreeing to the convention at the conference would face the possibility of becoming isolated as other nations adopt it, leaving them alone preventing the convention from coming into effect, not an enviable position before public opinion.

3. The whole process is the essence of democracy, and the lesson of how to make their governments accede to their most urgent desire, that for peace and security, would be learned by the peoples of the world in the process. It offers what nearly everyone wants most, and shows them how to get it by their own efforts and in their own generation.

4. Aiming directly at total disarmament gets away from the necessity of fixing quotas for each particular nation in relation to others, thus eliminating all questions of pride and prestige.

5. The natural interest of each individual in freeing himself from the possibility of having to go to war and from the certainty of having to be burdened with high taxes for war preparations, can be appealed to without the likelihood that he will feel he is weakening his country, since his decision is only effective if, as, and when the people of all other countries do likewise.

6. In placing reliance for enforcement on public opinion as well as natural and international agencies that operate at the behest of interested individuals and agencies and against offending individuals, and in not coming into effect until public opinion favors it everywhere, and so is alert everywhere to the dire necessity of rigid enforcement, it would be possible to eliminate the most dangerous elements of modern warfare—atomic bombs, cosmic rays, poison gas, disease germs, crop destroyers, and whatever else has been, is being, or may in future be, devised by man capable of destroying life and the means of sustaining life—which seem incapable of effective regulation by treaties alone.

7. It permits us to take the offensive morally and politically, which is much more effective and less expensive than being on the defensive strategically and militarily.

8. It would vastly increase the prestige and possibility of complete success of UN by removing national forces, the existence of which is an ever-present threat of national defiance of UN.

The stakes in this game of international politics are stupendous. I think I have suggested an excellent bet that we should not overlook in it, and I hope you will agree that the same time we ratify the North Atlantic Pact is the time that we should make this other bet.

SUPPORT FOR TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. Are you for the treaty, or opposed to it?

Mr. SMEDLEY. I am for it as a necessary temporary expedient at the moment, but I think there are other things we should emphasize.

The CHAIRMAN. The only thing we have before us at this time is the treaty, so you are for ratification?

Mr. SMEDLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In the hope that hereafter we will continue other measures to bring about the ideas which you have expressed—

Mr. SMEDLEY. Of course, I have said that I hope we ratify the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

STATEMENT OF W. A. HUNTON, SECRETARY OF THE COUNCIL ON AFRICAN AFFAIRS

The CHAIRMAN. How long will you require?

Mr. HUNTON. About 5 or 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Give the clerk your background.

Mr. HUNTON. My name is William A. Hunton. I am a resident in Brooklyn, N. Y. I am secretary of the Council on African Affairs in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. What private business are you in?

Mr. HUNTON. This is my job, as secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. Secretary on the Council of African Affairs?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a native of this country?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Go ahead.

Mr. HUNTON. On behalf of the executive board of the Council on African Affairs, an independent, private, nonprofit organization concerned with protecting and promoting the interests of the people of Africa and with providing Americans with the truth concerning the status and struggles of Africans and other colonial peoples for economic and political freedom, I wish to express strong condemnation of the North Atlantic Treaty and urge its repudiation and defeat.

In the first place, the North Atlantic Treaty would create in place of the one-world system, for which the United Nations was established, a two-world system, based upon the false and suicidal assumption that these two worlds cannot possibly live together in peace. Thus will be provided the psychological basis for what has been called a preventive war, actually a war to create a new one-world pattern according to the wishes of the signatories of the North Atlantic Treaty.

COLONIAL POLICIES AND THE TREATY

It should be carefully noted that the North Atlantic Treaty is a compact of all those powers, with the sole present exception of Spain, which today hold hundreds of millions of colonial peoples in subjection throughout the world.

Great Britain is a prison house of colored peoples, held in bondage under an oppressive colonial system in Asia, Africa, and the Central and South American countries. The Netherlands holds in bondage nearly 80,000,000 people in the East Indies and in South America. The French Government exploits millions of people in its African and Asian colonies.

Belgium holds the people of the Congo in bondage. Portugal exploits millions of Africans. The United States Government, with its "gold and silver" double standard in Panama, its economic and political hegemony in Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and Liberia, its complete domination of the people of Hawaii and recently acquired islands of the Pacific, its newly established fund for investing in the exploitative enterprises of other colonial powers, is today the most powerful colonial power of all time. Finally, even the Government of Italy is currently struggling to get the United Nations—with the support of the other signatories—to reestablish its dominion over Libya and Samoliland.

The very governments which are committed by the pact to live in peace with all peoples and all governments are in fact today engaged in wars to maintain their domination over peoples of Burma, Malaya, Indonesia, Madagascar, and Viet-Nam.

In these colonial areas lies the real threat to world peace. Colonialism has been and continues to be a major cause of the world's wars. The North Atlantic Pact is designed to perpetuate this evil instead of erasing it.

Today Africa is the last continental stronghold of colonialism, and for that very reason its people face new and intensified forms of exploitation and oppression. But Africans, no less than Asians, are determined that their continent and its resources shall be developed for the benefit of the people who inhabit it, instead of being utilized for the economic and military designs of European and American imperialists.

While the published terms of the North Atlantic Treaty do not specifically include Africa, except for the one territory of Algeria, there is every indication that in actual practice the people of Africa, who have had no voice in this matter, would be expected to play their role in the war plans of the North Atlantic Pact countries.

ARTICLE IV AND COLONIAL POLICIES

The North Atlantic Pact, article IV, commits the signatories to consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the parties is threatened. And United States Secretary of State Dean Acheson, interpreting the pact for the press, has stated that—consultation does not preclude action.

Referring to this same article IV, Belgium's foreign minister, Paul-Henri Spaak, on March 18 said that—consultation between the signatories could also take place in case of an incident occurring outside the geographical areas of the pact, if one of the parties considered its security involved (New York Times, March 19).

Thus we may assume that if the people of Nigeria or the Gold Coast, for example, should attempt to revolt against British rule and set up a government of their own choosing, this could be interpreted by the Governments of Britain, the United States, or any other of the signatories to the treaty as a threat to Britain's territorial integrity and security, and all of the parties to the treaty would consequently be called upon to take joint action in crushing the revolt of these peoples by force of arms.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE AND COLONIAL WARS

Further, the Brussels Treaty nations, which include Britain, France, the Netherlands, and Belgium, have proposed that the United States furnish military equipment to them as a group to be distributed by them in accordance with their joint defense plans.<sup>1</sup> These defense plans obviously embrace the overseas territories belonging to these countries.

Are we to hope that the United States Government, which granted credit loans and Marshall-plan funds to the Dutch, British, and French Governments, thereby enabling them to prosecute their wars against the national liberation struggles of peoples under their dominion, will now withhold military equipment and other assistance from its Atlantic Pact allies for their use in attempting to stem the march of colonial peoples everywhere toward freedom?

Indeed, there is danger that American troops may be called upon to assist, either directly or indirectly, in safeguarding imperialist interests in Africa and Asia. The then Secretary of the Army, Kenneth C. Royall, in early March, in reporting to the House Appropriations Committee the fact that several western European nations had made—insistent requests for additional American troops—on the European Continent, supported this demand, stating that no one would want to—risk our destiny in war on the ability of the nations of Europe or Africa or any point in Asia.

Without their assent and in contradiction to the principles of the United Nations Charter, the Africans' homeland is rapidly being converted into a military arsenal—a base for war.

One of several reports to this effect is contained in the United States News-World report on February 27, 1948:

Africa now is busting with the biggest boom in its history. Feeding the boom, right now, is the military planning of Europe and the United States. Africa is to become a huge base for armed operations into Europe if trouble comes with Russia.

It is this same preoccupation which apparently dictated the United States delegation's position on the disposition of the former Italian colonies—a position which the Council on African Affairs and many other organizations among the American people have condemned as a reactionary and dangerous solution.

THE TREATY AS A THREAT TO AFRICA

According to the New York Times of November 26, 1948 [reading]: considerations of military strategy that were discussed and decided on at a meeting of high military officers in Washington about 2 weeks ago have determined the attitude that the United States delegation here has adopted on the question of the Italian colonies, diplomatic circles said today.

The United States has secured the right to establish at Monrovia, Liberia, with no time limits whatever specified—such naval, air, and military facilities and installations as may be desired by the Government of the United States.

It has secured access to bases in Libya and other colonies, and is giving technical and other assistance by means of Marshall-plan-fund allocations in the building of communication lines linking the network of African bases together.

The United States also, according to a New York Herald-Tribune correspondent, January 7, 1949—has a "gentlemen's agreement" with France whereby American planes can use north African bases.

The same correspondent reported that—

French Africa, from the Mediterranean coast south to the Belgian Congo, more than 2,000 miles away, has been grouped into a coordinated defense area for the first time. This unprecedented arrangement is expected to facilitate implementing of the North Atlantic Pact.

In view of all these facts it is clear that the North Atlantic Treaty will not only bring nearer the danger of war with the Soviet Union, but will also be an immediate and serious threat to African and other colonial and subject peoples ruled by the treaty signatories.

POSITION OF NEGRO AMERICANS

Were the North Atlantic Pact in fact what its preamble purports to affirm, namely, a treaty committing its signatories to safeguard the freedom and promote the well-being of their peoples and to preserve the peace, then Negro Americans could give it their full and unconditional support. But, speaking as a Negro, I can say that we have had no small share of experience with language which affirms what actions deny.

The language of the Bill of Rights and the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments is precise, unequivocal, majestic; yet everyone knows that this language is not in accord with reality, with the real status and conditions of the Negro citizens of the United States.

Democracy begins at home. Let the colonial powers, parties to the treaty, grant freedom to the peoples whom they hold in bondage. Let the United States Government answer the demands of Negro Americans for the right to vote, for the right to work according to their abilities, for the right to live where they choose, for the right to live without fear of lynchings—for the right to live as Americans.

There can be no peace imposed by force of arms. The only enduring peace is that founded upon the freedom and equality and fellowship of all peoples.

Because it is an instrument for war, not for peace; because it means additional hindrance and not assistance to the freedom struggles of oppressed peoples everywhere, I respectfully and most earnestly urge the Senate's rejection of the North Atlantic Treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. We are glad indeed to have your statement.

MEMBERSHIP OF COUNCIL ON AFRICAN AFFAIRS

Senator DONNELL. May I ask a question or two?

You stated that the Council on African Affairs is an independent, private, nonprofit organization. How large an organization is that and how is it financed?

Mr. HUNTON. It is financed by contributions from friends and members and by sale of its literature, monthly bulletins, pamphlets, and other publications dealing with Africa.

Its membership has consisted of those elected to membership by the body and therefore is not a large organization but does include representatives of churches, schools, trade-unions, and other major organizations and institutions, Negro and white.

Senator DONNELL. Are they scattered throughout the country?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Or just in one section?

Mr. HUNTON. National in scope.

Senator DONNELL. Are you able to tell us approximately how many members there are?

Mr. HUNTON. Upward of 200.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. You are excused.

The Committee will take a recess until 4 o'clock, so the witness will have to come back. We have to go to the Senate.

(A recess was held.)

AFTER RECESS

The CHAIRMAN. We are sorry that we had to interrupt the hearing. There was an important matter on the Senate floor.

STATEMENT OF DR. JOE T. THOMAS, PRESIDENT, THE UNITED CONGO IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION, INC., DETROIT, MICH.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Joe T. Thomas, can you get along with 5 minutes?

Dr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, 5 minutes.

Dr. THOMAS. I can get along with 3.

The CHAIRMAN. How long?

Dr. THOMAS. Three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Change your figures, Mr. Clark; make it 3.

You are very accommodating and we thank you.

Dr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we thank the committee for giving us permission to speak against the United States joining the North Atlantic Pact with the Belgian Government because such an alliance with Belgium at this time would compel the United States to go to war to defend Belgian slavery in the Belgian Congo.

Our position for reestablishing the Congo Free State as an independent sovereign nation is endorsed by both branches of the National Baptist convention with a membership of 6,500,000 American Negroes: the general conference of the C. M. E. Church, the Church of God and Christ, the Scottish Rite Masons of the United States, and our membership of 25,000 members.

These 6,000,000 Negroes are backing the United States against Russia and all her enemies.

THE TREATY AND THE BELGIAN CONGO

We do not believe American democracy can be twin to Belgian slavery in the Belgian Congo. This great Nation founded upon the great moral principles of freedom, justice, and democracy has waged many wars to perpetuate the great democratic principles and moral obligations assumed by our forefathers who founded this cradle of liberty. These moral obligations compelled rebellion against Great Britain and establishment of this democracy where all men might be free and equal.

This obligation brought a civil war that freed the slaves in the United States and set the fires of freedom burning in the hearts of all the people of Central and South America, in Haiti, and Santo Domingo, and they freed themselves, and slavery was abolished in all the Americas.

It was natural for this great Nation to wage war to free Cuba and the Philippines and to join the Allies in World Wars I and II so freedom might have a chance to spread to all people all over the world.

MORAL PRINCIPLES BEHIND WORLD WAR II

Grounded in the great moral principles of our fathers, our great President Franklin D. Roosevelt, Secretary of State Cordell Hull, and Hon. Tom Connally and Senator Vandenberg, and their coworkers converted the Allies to these moral democratic American principles, and they organized the United Nations for freedom, justice, and democracy for all people, large and small, who aspired toward self-government.

I can still hear the voice of President Roosevelt ringing over the radio proclaiming that this war is being fought for freedom, justice, and democracy for all people, large and small, who aspire to rule and govern themselves.

I can still hear the bombers as they flew across the ocean to supply our forces so they could stop the smashing German forces that enslaved Europe and were storming at the very gates of Buckingham Palace in Great Britain.

I can still see millions of American men and women coming out of factories where they worked to make ammunition of war to help win the war for freedom, justice, and democracy.

We won the war, we freed the world, and we restored stolen territories to native people so they might have freedom to rule themselves. We drove the Germans out of Belgium, we freed the Belgian people, and we gave Belgium back to the Belgian people. We forgot that Belgium was holding 14,000,000 African Congolese slaves and nearly a million square miles of territory of the Congo Free State, illegally called the Belgian Congo.

We forgot President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull. We forgot that American soldiers fought and bled and many of them died to free Belgium from German slavery. We forgot we fought so freedom might come to all nations who aspired toward self-government.

CONDITIONS IN THE BELGIAN CONGO

I do not believe we can forget that Belgian atrocities in the Congo Free State shocked the civilized Christian world. Belgium cut off arms and legs of natives too old to work to intensify Belgian slavery. The Belgian Government cut the breasts from pregnant native women too heavy with child to work. The Belgian Government is still murdering native Congolese in the Congo.

During the San Francisco Conference in 1945, while the United Nations Charter was in the making, a group of natives struck for a raise from 25 cents a day for 10 hours' work and refused to work until they got 50 cents a day. The Belgian Government murdered the strikers with lend-lease machine guns from American lend-lease airplanes. The Belgian Government has violated every provision of the Berlin Act and convicted herself of criminal conversion and made herself unfit to be permitted to handle the Congo Free State.

The Belgian Government has no intention of educating the native Congolese toward self-government. Belgium spends less than 1 penny per annum per capita on the education of the children of the 14,000,000 Congolese slaves the Belgian Government is now holding in the Belgian Congo. Just last year Belgium sent out a financial report that Belgian Congo has taken the Belgian Government out of the red, and Belgium had made millions in profits out of the Congo, but Belgium has not appropriated a penny of this vast sum toward the education of the Congolese children.

Here is Belgium's answer to the United Press when Mr. Spaak was asked just what Belgium intended to do about turning Belgian Congo over to the United Nations. This was just after we had freed Belgium from German slavery and had given Belgium back to the Belgian people. I quote Mr. Spaak, Prime Minister of Belgium [reading]:

The Belgian Government can see no future day when the Congolese will be capable of self-government; therefore, the Congolese will have to remain under Belgian rule indefinitely.

Great Britain is practicing democracy in her crown colonies and protectorates and is spending millions of dollars a year educating natives toward dominion self-government in Africa and spreading democracy which will prevent communism in her colonies. The Belgian Government is too poor to give the natives a chance and must resort to slavery and murder to hold the Congo. The Congo under Belgium is a ripe field for communism.

PROGRAM FOR THE BELGIAN CONGO

As a measure of international defense, the United Nations should take over the Belgian Congo and join Great Britain in the great human development of Christianity, freedom, and democracy in Africa and prevent the spread of communism in Africa.

Freedom from slavery and restoration of stolen territory to native people and their heirs was decided on the battlefields of Europe, Asia, and Africa in World War II, and it was signed with the blood of our fallen heroes who died for freedom, justice, and democracy. They knew democracy could not be twin to slavery.

Our allied courts have tried, convicted, and executed murdering leaders of land-grabbing nations of World War II, but they forgot and looked over Belgium, a nation that is just as guilty of murder and land grabbing as Germany and Japan and should not be permitted to hold the Belgian Congo, the Mandates of Urundi and Ruanda, nor any other territory in Africa.

The United Nations should bring the Belgian Government into court and try her for violating the Berlin Act, for murder, criminal conversion, and holding human beings in slavery.

I cannot believe all the great nations of the world have united to defend Belgium, a murdering slave-holding nation. Of course, Belgium is a member of the United Nations and the North Atlantic Security Pact, but she is guilty of robbery, murder, and holding slaves and is unfit to be a member of the family of civilized nations and the North Atlantic Security Treaty. Belgium is violating the mandates of our honored dead who died on the battlefields of Europe to free Belgium from German slavery.

Judas was a member of the great Christian fraternity of Jesus; but he betrayed our Lord and hanged himself. We do not expect the Belgian delegates to hang themselves, but they are guilty because they represent the Belgian Government and to save their faces, they must voluntarily turn Belgian Congo and the mandates of Ruanda and Urundi over to the United Nations, so the family of democratic nations can have clean shirts.

In defense of the widows and orphans of our heroic dead, who gave their lives so democracy might get a chance to function in the world and for the existence of the human race, we ask for plain, simple justice and freedom for the 14,000,000 slaves Belgium is now holding. Reestablishing the Congo Free State by the United Nations will determine the future conduct of other nations, and communism cannot say the United Nations permitted Belgium to hold stolen territory and 14,000,000 Congolese slaves in Africa.

In defense of moral decency, the decision of the United Nations must be freedom of the Congolese and restoration of the Congo Free State as an independent sovereign nation under the Congo Free State flag.

HISTORY OF BELGIUM CONGO

The following great European nations and the United States met in Berlin in 1884 and enacted the Berlin Act. They are: Great Britain, Germany, Russia, France, Turkey, Greece, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Austria-Hungary, Luxemburg, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Belgium, the United States, and some lesser European states.

They recognized the Congo Free State as an independent sovereign nation and appointed Belgium administrator over the Congo Free State to educate the Congolese toward self-government.

But instead, the Belgian Government enslaved the Congolese and murdered 30,000,000 natives who would not submit to Belgian slavery in the Congo. At that time this was the greatest mass murder in the world's history and can only be topped by Germany's mass murder of 65,000,000 white people in Europe during World War II.

In 1884, the Berlin Conference appointed Belgium administrator over the Congo Free State to educate the Congolese toward self-government, but Belgium violated every provision of the Berlin Act, enslaved the natives, and in 1906 she annexed the Congo Free State as a Belgium slave colony over our protest which we filed with each of the signatories of the Berlin Act and the World Court at Geneva, Switzerland; but they did not give us a hearing.

We, the civilized heirs, did not sell Belgium our territory, we did not give Belgium our land, and Belgium did not acquire our territory by conquest; therefore, by all the practices of civilized nations, the territory now illegally called the Belgian Congo belongs to the native Congolese and to us, the heirs residing in the United States and citizens of the United States of America.

UNITED NATIONS AND THE CONGO

We, the civilized heirs to the territory, hereby file complaint against the Belgian Government and ask the United Nations to appoint the Government of the United States our new administrator. As long as Belgium is permitted to hold slaves in Belgian Congo and have jurisdiction over our territory, the Congolese are a threat to democracy and ripe for communism.

We do not believe the United Nations should drive the Congolese into the family of communistic satellite nations; and freedom for the 14,000,000 Congolese and the reestablishment of the Congo Free State will win the Congolese for democracy.

I do not believe the United Nations were organized to perpetuate human slavery; we believe the United Nations is the greatest moral force of nations because it was founded upon the world's greatest human principles—freedom, justice, and democracy.

Therefore, we believe the moral integrity of the United Nations will come before the bar of justice with clean hands and free the 14,000,000 slaves the Belgian Government is now holding in the Belgian Congo and reestablish the Congo Free State and launch a new democracy in Africa which in times of war will be valuable as an aid to the democracies, for then we can mobilize an army of 2,000,000 soldiers to fight with the democracies of the world and keep the democracies living.

We believe the United Nations should have this opportunity to reestablish the Congo Free State as an independent sovereign nation under the Congo Free State flag and set a new pattern for human justice in Africa.

CONDITIONS IN THE CONGO

I wonder just how long can the Christian civilized nations keep their eyes shut to this disgrace to democracy. How long can they stand and hear Congolese slaves cry? How long will they hold back and block democracy and shut the sunlight from the blue sky?

Belgium does not permit American missionaries from Negro denominations to enter the Belgian Congo and establish missions and churches to help Christianize and educate the native Congolese, and this prevents the spread of Christianity in Belgian Congo. Belgium spends less than 1 cent per capita on native education.

During the 64 years Belgium has had jurisdiction over the Congo State, the Belgian Government has not educated one native Congolese doctor of medicine, no dentist, no druggist, no engineers, no geologists, no electrical engineers, no lawyers, and no presidents of schools—not even a common school teacher—and no trained nurses. Belgium is preventing Congolese education so she can profit on slave labor. Congolese Americans are blessed with the great privilege of being permitted to participate in building American civilization.

Here in the United States, Congolese Americans have many medical doctors, dentists, druggists, 50,000 school teachers, hundreds of businessmen, hundreds of trained mechanics, hundreds of successful farmers, many presidents of schools, colleges, and universities, scientists, soldiers of distinction, great musicians and artists, over a million home owners, over 1,000,000 churches, and a million trained ministers of the gospel and thousands of workers under the civil service working for the United States Government and in the county and city governments.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A CONGO FREE STATE

The United States has given the Congolese living here a chance. We believe reestablishing the Congo Free State will prevent the spread of communism in Africa. This new Negro nation in Africa will be a new forward step in human achievement for the United Nations and set a precedent for freedom for all people, large and small.

If that is done, all the participating nations of the North Atlantic Pact can face communism with clean hands, and the United Nations will have a real opportunity to set in operation the Charter of the United Nations and demonstrate to communism that democracy is real and fits black folk into moral concepts of freedom, justice, and democracy for all people who aspire toward self-government, both large and small.

Our position fits in with President Truman's inaugural address. I quote:

The old imperialism exploitation for foreign profit has no place in our plan. What we envisage is a program of development based on the concept of development of democratic fair dealings. All countries, including our own, will greatly benefit from a constructive program for the better use of the world's human and natural resources.

Only by helping the least fortunate of its members to help themselves can the human family achieve the decent, satisfying life that is the right of all people.

We do not believe democracy can be twin to Belgian slavery in the Belgian Congo. Democracy means freedom, liberty, and justice. The only twin in the world that can be matched with Belgian slavery in the Belgian Congo is Russian communism.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE CONGO

We Congolese-American heirs, descendants of the Congolese and citizens of the United States of America, contend that our property is subject to the jurisdiction and the protection of the United States. The United States should take a protectorate over our African territory and control the world's greatest supply of uranium and prevent Russia from taking over our property. If Russia did take over the Congo, she would wreck the British in all Africa and communize Africa and spread communism to Central and South America and become a menace to the democracies of the world.

To prevent this impending crisis, at the International Aviation Conference in the Stevens Hotel at Chicago in 1944 we, the owners, heirs, and descendants of the Congolese residing in the United States and United States citizens, gave the United States the right to establish airfields and military stations in the Congo Free State, illegally called the Belgian Congo, and to keep them as long as the United States needed them.

We, the heirs of the Congolese, did not sell or give Belgium our land, and Belgium did not acquire our territory by conquest. Therefore, by all legal processes of civilized nations the property belongs to us, the legal heirs, and the native Congolese people. We have a legal right to give the United States the right to establish airfields and military stations in our territory.

Belgium is still murdering Congolese persons and should not be permitted to participate in the Marshall plan and use United States lend-lease funds to help perpetuate slavery in the Belgian Congo. Therefore, we ask the Foreign Relations Committee to amend the North Atlantic Security Treaty so Belgium will not participate in any United States funds appropriated for the North Atlantic Security Pact until Belgium has voluntarily relinquished all claims of jurisdiction over the Belgian Congo and the mandates of Ruanda and Urundi and turn these colonies over to the United Nations.

We ask the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to recommend that all previous provisions of old leagues of nations and world courts which granted Belgium jurisdiction over the Congo Free State and permitted Belgium to annex the Congo Free State as a Belgian slave colony be reconsidered and that the Congo Free State be reestablished as an independent sovereign nation under the Congo Free State flag.

We respectfully ask the committee to recommend that the United Nations appoint a commission to take over the Belgian Congo and the mandates of Ruanda and Urundi and reestablish the Congo Free State as an independent sovereign nation under the Congo Free State flag supervised by the United Nations.

At the International Aviation Conference in 1944 we Congolese living in the United States and citizens of the United States granted the United States Government the right to establish airfields and military stations within the Congo to keep the Russian Government from going in and taking over our territory. As you know, the Congo State produces a great supply of uranium, from which we get the atomic bomb. She produces 90 percent of the radium of the world. She has copper fields 250 miles long and 50 miles wide. She produces diamonds next after South Africa.

This valuable territory should not go into the hands of Russia. We believe that the Belgian Government is too weak to hold it; and we, the heirs of that territory, ask the United States to take a protectorate over it and control the world's greatest supply of uranium.

The CHAIRMAN. We certainly thank you very much. You are the president of this United Congo Improvement Association?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that a corporation, or just membership?

Mr. THOMAS. We are incorporated.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you give all your time to this?

Mr. THOMAS. All my time to this particular thing.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Ely Culbertson. How much time will you need?

Mr. CULBERTSON. Last time at the Democratic Convention you said you would give me 5 minutes, and I said, "I double that," but I would not double it this time; I will try my best.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. It is late, and there are not many members here, so we would like to conclude as soon as we possibly can.

STATEMENT OF ELY CULBERTSON, CHAIRMAN OF THE CITIZENS COMMITTEE FOR UNITED NATIONS REFORM, INC.

Mr. CULBERTSON. My name is Ely Culbertson, and I am here representing the Citizens Committee for United Nations Reform, of which I am chairman.

We favor the outright ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty. The gigantic propaganda machine of the State Department has left but little choice and little time for the country and the Congress in this matter. We must either ratify the treaty as it is or else find ourselves in a position opposing our Government's effort against the Communist threat.

IMPERFECTIONS OF THE TREATY

We realize only too clearly the imperfections and even the grave defects of the treaty. For instance, the only specific thing in the otherwise misty treaty is the provision in article 10 that admission of new members to the treaty can be made only by the unanimous consent of its signatories.

Now, Luxemburg, which is one of its signatories, is a very fine nation; and its capital city of 60,000 population is a lovely little town. But I submit that it is utterly ridiculous to permit Luxemburg thus to veto the policy of the United States of America in matters that may well prove to be vital to our national interests. We have been already vetoed to a frenzy by Russia, and we have had enough.

I hope that I am wrong in my understanding that the hidden purpose of this provision was to make doubly sure that Spain be barred from participation in the Atlantic Pact—on the grounds, so eloquently stated by Secretary Acheson, that the habeas corpi of totalitarian Spain and totalitarian Russia are not in the same class.

There are other and more serious sins of omission in the North Atlantic Treaty. I am sure that millions of Americans, and many Senators, too, would agree with my wistful wish that there were more brain and more teeth in the treaty.

Once again, the State Department missed a God-given opportunity to create, through the treaty, not a clumsy, hasty and uncertain tool of power politics, but a more noble and far more practical instrument against aggressors.

SUPPORT FOR TREATY

In spite of these obvious defects of the treaty, we favor its immediate ratification because we favor the principle of lawful and militant defense by peaceful nations against the greatest threat in history—the double threat of atomic and Communist bombs.

Fortunately for the United States and the world, the treaty is so vaguely constructed and so replete with double talk that an enormous amount of good can be done after the ratification of the treaty, provided it is well implemented.

ASSUMPTIONS UNDER THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT

There are three basic assumptions that we must keep in mind in connection with the whole purpose and implementation of the Atlantic Pact:

First, the fact that today and during the next 2 or 3 years at the most, the atomic and industrial power of the United States and her natural allies is virtually irresistible.

Therefore, some of the previous testimony that you have heard here to the effect that if the Atlantic Treaty is not ratified immediately there will be war within a year is sheer nonsense. The Moscow Politburo, although at times obliging will certainly not do us the favor of committing military suicide by starting a war before they accumulate some atomic bombs of their own. If Soviet Russia wanted to overrun Europe they would have done so, with far greater chances of success, in 1946, 1947, or 1948.

The Moscow rulers indeed believe that the third world war is inevitable and desirable, but in their own time and with their own strategic surprises.

Second, any settlement now with Soviet Russia that does not include guaranteed international control of atomic energy, the elimination of the back-breaking load of the armament race, and the restoration of the illegally occupied territories would be an act of disguised appeasement, inviting atomic catastrophe a few years later. Time is no longer the ally of the United States.

Third, the Communist Politburo does not and never will understand any language other than the language of inexorable and superior military force. Therefore, the only way to avert the third world war is by implementing the Atlantic Pact in such a manner that the Moscow rulers will be faced by the lawfully organized, collective power of all peaceful nations—a power of such overwhelming strength and united determination that the Moscow rulers will find it to their best advantage to agree without delay or double talk to just and reasonable conditions for guaranteed world peace.

I understand that an important bipartisan group of Senators are now preparing a resolution for a specific implementation of the North Atlantic Treaty in connection with its ratification. The resolution will call for:

INTERNATIONAL CONTINGENT TO REPEL ATTACK

1. The establishment, in cooperation with other member states, of an emergency defense force, to be called the international contingent, to operate in defense against armed attack either independently or as auxiliary to the national armed forces of participating member states.

This international contingent—a balanced land, sea, and air force—shall be recruited from volunteers who are citizens of smaller sovereign states: that is, states not possessing their own large military establishments. It will be a highly trained, well-paid professional force, owing its allegiance to the Atlantic Defence Authority. It will be stationed in western Germany or other critical points in Europe. Its use and operations shall not limit the constitutional safeguards of member states nor commit them to the use of their own national armed forces.

At least half of the total of money, goods, and lend-lease armament appropriated by the United States Government in accordance with article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty shall be expended to help equip and maintain the international contingent of volunteer professional troops.

The organization and command of the international contingent shall be vested in the Atlantic defense authority, or defense committee provided in article 9 of the North Atlantic Treaty. The defense committee shall consist of seven delegates, as follows: United States, two; United Kingdom, one; Canada, one (giving two for the British Commonwealth); France, one; Italy, one (giving two for the Latin Europeans); and other smaller member states, one.

The defense committee shall act upon an affirmative vote of six out of seven members.

The defense committee shall establish, subject to its control, a high command for the international contingent, and appoint its commander in chief.

Now, the advantages of this Atlantic contingent are obvious. I believe it will be extremely popular with the American people and the British and French people because it will save lives. It will save many American lives and French and British lives by distributing the load of sacrifice among the smaller nations, too, who number 400,000,000 people in this world.

Secondly, this international contingent, which will be, in effect, a superbly equipped professional body, hand-picked from the smaller nations all over the world, will be a natural ally and an auxiliary force for the United States and other armed forces stationed in Germany under the control of the Atlantic Defense Committee.

It will eliminate the fear of France of being once again conquered before they are eventually liberated.

Even today—and I can predict that in the future—there will be a great deal of trouble on that account. The French, like many other European nations, do not want to be liberated any more. They want to be saved from invasion, and this force could be stationed as shock troops, without requiring the stationing of several hundred thousand, if not half a million troops, as is now the case with many French states.

REVISION OF THE UN CHARTER

Now, in addition to this international Atlantic contingent, the resolution by the Senate group will assert that a fundamental objective in the implementation of the North Atlantic Treaty shall be to seek without delay the revision of the United Nations Charter so that (A) the paralyzing veto right of an aggressor shall be removed; (B) the rising threat of the atomic catastrophe be averted, and the back-breaking load of the armament race be lifted; and (C) an effective but tyranny-proof international police force be established to support the decision of a workable Security Council and World Court.

In the event that a permanent member vetoes these urgent, just, and indispensable revisions of the UN Charter, under its article 108 then, under its article 51, the resolution will ask that the Atlantic Pact be extended into a world pact, with the Atlantic international contingent extended into a world international contingent; so that a world collective front of all peaceful nations, in possession of overwhelming atomic and military power, shall be established, based on the principle of enforceable law against aggression or armament for aggression.

We believe that the majority of the American people and of the Senate are opposed to a preventive war against Russia just as emphatically as they are opposed to appeasement of Russia. We believe that only by firm action now, through specific implementation of the North Atlantic Treaty, can we avert the third world war later.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, very much, Mr. Culbertson.

We have noted and are acquainted with your activities in international affairs, and we applaud you for your great public interest and your views.

Mr. CULBERTSON. Thank you, Senator.

Senator DONNELL. I would like to ask Mr. Culbertson a few questions, Mr. Chairman, if I may.

FINANCES OF CITIZENS COMMITTEE FOR UN REFORMS

Mr. Culbertson, are you appearing here for the Citizens Committee for United Nations Reform?

Mr. CULBERTSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. What is that organization, and who finances it?

Mr. CULBERTSON. The citizens committee is a nonprofit membership organization. It contains 2,000 members. It contains 7,000,000 members of other organizations who have endorsed the same plan as advocated by the citizens' committee for the revision of the United Nations, called the plan ABC, which was introduced last year by a group of 16 Senators in a concurrent resolution.

This citizens' committee is financed by voluntary donations, and when there is not enough money—and that is usually the case—by donations out of my bridge earnings.

Senator DONNELL. Do you mind telling us approximately the annual budget of the committee?

Mr. CULBERTSON. The annual budget of this citizens' committee varies between 40 and 100 thousand dollars a year.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Culbertson, perhaps I am incorrect, but I rather gathered from some of your language here that you are not particularly enthusiastic over this North Atlantic Treaty. Am I correct in that conclusion?

Mr. CULBERTSON. You are quite correct, Senator. I think a far better treaty could have been drawn up.

NO ALTERNATIVE TO RATIFICATION

Senator DONNELL. I understood you to mention that there has been a gigantic propaganda machine of the State Department, and that machine leaves us no alternative but to ratify the pact?

Mr. CULBERTSON. That is correct, Senator.

In the past, the State Department, although pretending to solicit the opinion of thinking Americans, has carefully avoided doing so. They work in the darkness and when they prepare their own rather hasty plans they launch them with such a fire as take it or leave it.

Senator DONNELL. Did you read in the newspapers the account of the ceremonies here when the pact was signed on April 4?

Mr. CULBERTSON. Yes, I did. But may I say, Senator, that this reproach applies only to the State Department. It never applies to the Senate and House of Representatives and their bodies.

As a matter of fact, the only chance we ever had to be heard in public was thanks to the courtesies and to the democratic spirit of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee. I want to make it absolutely clear.

Senator DONNELL. Am I correct that you base, in large part, your conclusion that you favor the outright ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty on the fact that this gigantic propaganda machine of the State Department has left us no alternative?

Mr. CULBERTSON. It has left us no alternative, except either to accept it or to suffer terrific consequences of a moral nature with our natural allies in Europe.

Senator DONNELL. I say, in large part, therefore, you base your conclusion of favoring the outright ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty on this condition that has arisen out of this gigantic propaganda machine of the State Department. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. CULBERTSON. Yes, Senator, you are largely correct in that understanding.

IMPERFECTIONS OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Culbertson, in connection with my suggestion that, I judge, you are not highly enthusiastic over the North Atlantic Treaty, I observe such language as this in your statement: You speak of "the imperfections of the treaty and even the grave defects of the treaty." You speak of it as being "the otherwise misty treaty."

You refer to the fact that it is utterly ridiculous to permit one country, which you name, to veto the policy of the United States of America. You speak of "the hidden purpose of that provision." You mention the "sins of omission in the North Atlantic Treaty." You express the "wistful wish that there were more brain in the treaty." You express a similar wish that there were more teeth in the treaty.

You refer to the fact that the State Department, as you judged it, missed an opportunity to create not a clumsy tool of military alliance, but a more noble instrument, et cetera. You express a similar thought that the State Department has lost a God-given opportunity to create not an uncertain tool of military alliance. You speak of "these obvious defects of the treaty." You mention that the treaty is so "vaguely constructed." You refer to it as being so "replete with double-talk."

I judge from all those, added together or separately—or to adopt the language of the treaty, I believe, "collectively or individually"—that I am quite correct, am I not, in the conclusion that your enthusiasm for this treaty might be bounded within rather narrow limits: That is correct, is it not?

Mr. CULBERTSON. It is bounded within very narrow limits, but I have hoped that through the implementation of this treaty we would achieve something far more substantial, something with teeth and something with far more brain, thanks to the Senate and the House.

PROPER IMPLEMENTATION OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. And the implementation to which you refer, at least in large part, is that which you understand an important bipartisan group of Senators are now preparing a resolution to effect?

Mr. CULBERTSON. Not only this group of Senators, but any group that advocates a step forward. We are in favor of all of them.

Senator DONNELL. I understand that you do regard this proposed resolution, that to quote your statement, "an important bipartisan group of Senators are now preparing" is a very important step toward the proper implementation of the treaty.

Mr. CULBERTSON. Indeed I do, Senator. I also regard your activities as valuable, and I want to express my admiration.

Although I entirely disagree with many of your opinions, I want to express my admiration for your courage and for your fortitude in standing here and bringing up clearly and specifically our commitments in that vital matter.

I think the people of America will be grateful for it, although your act is not popular now; though it does not matter.

Senator DONNELL. I appreciate very much the comment.

Mr. CULBERTSON. We will benefit from you and everybody, and, of course, including Senator Connally, the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that tribute, Senator, deserves a similar tribute to Mr. Culbertson.

Senator DONNELL. Yes, I feel myself that Mr. Culbertson is showing a very fine spirit of public service in giving us the benefit of his views and I am greatly interested in his views. In fact Mr. Culbertson did me an honor some weeks ago to drop in at my office one day—

Mr. CULBERTSON. It was an honor.

Senator DONNELL. And go into these matters to some extent at that time.

DANGER OF WAR

Now I judge that you are not convinced that all the arguments that have been introduced in favor of this treaty are valid. I am referring particularly to your point that some of the previous testimony you say that the committee has heard here to the effect that—

If the Atlantic Treaty is not ratified immediately there will be a war within a year is sheer nonsense.

Mr. CULBERTSON. Sheer nonsense. Also, Senator, sheer hypocrisy is the statement that this treaty will bolster and strengthen the United Nations. This treaty is an admission of the total and complete failure of the United Nations to operate as an international agency for peace and security.

Senator DONNELL. I might add in that connection that your view as to the hypocrisy concurs exactly, even to the choice of the term, with the views suggested by another witness a few days ago who called attention to two hypocrisies of which the one you have mentioned is just one.

Mr. CULBERTSON. So I am not alone.

Senator DONNELL. No; you are not. You may not want to answer this question—you probably would prefer not to mention names—but I recall that Judge Gerard, a man of great distinction in public service, is a gentleman who came to us the other day and submitted his view that—and I am going to quote your language—not that he submitted it in the same language but it was the substance of it—“If the Atlantic Treaty is not ratified”—I do not know whether he said “immediately”—“there would be war within a year.”

That was his view as I recall it. You do not concur with that view regardless of who may have submitted it?

Mr. CULBERTSON. I do not concur, and, furthermore, many others have intimated that unless we ratify the Atlantic Treaty we are going to have a war with Russia, and I say it is sheer nonsense.

INTERNATIONAL CONTINGENT

Senator DONNELL. I want to call attention in the record to one point that I think is quite ingenious—and I mean no disparagement by the term “ingenious”—because it intrigued me when you mentioned it in my office: This provision for the the defense committee to consist of seven delegates, while you didn’t mention it here today, contains obviously the provision which preserves the veto of the United States, because the defense committee shall act on an affirmative vote of six out of seven members and there cannot be six unless the United States votes; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. CULBERTSON. It preserves the veto of the United States and the British Commonwealth, and not the Europeans; that is correct. At the same time it does not permit one nation to oppose the will of the majority.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Culbertson, there is a bell ringing which indicates a vote, and we are going to have to leave, I take it. I just want to conclude with this observation, and I take it this is your expression, your view, you believe that only by firm action now through specific implementation of the North Atlantic Treaty can we avert the third world war later?

Mr. CULBERTSON. I do.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you very much, Mr. Culbertson.

The CHAIRMAN. Your view is that though you think you could have written a better treaty, one more desirable and all that, still you are for the ratification of this treaty?

Mr. CULBERTSON. I am for ratification of this treaty without reservation or conditions, but I do not think I could have written a better treaty. I do believe that the Senate could implement the same treaty in a far better way.

The CHAIRMAN. We are going to implement it later. We cannot implement it in the treaty now.

Mr. CULBERTSON. We want to prepare for it now, and I want to thank you, Senator Connally, for your great courtesy, and I appreciate your democratic spirit.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

We will recess now until Monday.

Mr. CULBERTSON. Thank you, Senator.

(Whereupon the committee, at 5:30 p. m., recessed, to reconvene Monday, May 16, 1949.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

MONDAY, MAY 16, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment on Friday, May 13, 1949, at 10:30 a. m. in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee), presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), George, and Green.

Also present: Senator Donnell.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Come around, Mr. Brown.

STATEMENT OF HARVEY W. BROWN, INTERNATIONAL PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS

Mr. Brown. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am Harvey Brown, president of the International Association of Machinists.

I have come here to urge Senate ratification of the North Atlantic treaty. This international agreement is an expression of the desire of the 300,000,000 people in the North Atlantic community of nations for peace and security. It is an essential part of our campaign for peace, our battle against war.

COST OF WAR

Twice in one generation humanity has suffered the scourge of war. The total military cost and property damage of World War II has been put at $1,347,891,463.084—a fantastic sum. But far more shocking than the material cost of war is the ghastly toll in precious lives. Bear with me for a moment while I read these stunning figures: In World War I there were 22,104,209 casualties, 52.3 percent of the total mobilized forces. The dead numbered 5,152,115; the wounded, 12,831,004; and 4,121,090 were reported taken prisoners or missing. In World War II the number of military and civilian dead were estimated at 22,060,000, four times as great as in World War I. The number of wounded in World War II was estimated at 34,000,000, nearly three times as great as in the First World War.

As wars become bigger and more bitter, they may lead to the eventual destruction of the human race. Remember that in World War II only two atomic bombs were dropped. Can the human mind grasp the havoc and destruction of future atomic warfare? Will anyone even remain to count the dead?

I am sure that you will agree with me that no price is too high to avoid another war.

The tragic experience of two world wars has at last taught us that, in the face of an aggressor, peace on earth must be achieved through a show of strength, not weakness. Never again must an aggressor nation be given the opportunity to pick off democratic countries one by one. We must not again abandon the countries of western Europe to the agony of enemy occupation.

NO ISOLATION FOR THE UNITED STATES

If the history of the last two great wars teaches us anything at all, it teaches us that the United States cannot escape becoming involved in a major European conflict unless it is possible to avoid the conflict itself. Toward this end, the 12 nations who signed the treaty are resolved to "unite their efforts for collective defense and for the preservation of peace and security." Such united action, together with the military, economic, and human means to do so, should eliminate any false hopes on the part of any potential aggressor that he could succeed in his ambition to divide and conquer.

In the past, the aggressors have relied chiefly upon American isolation. Fortunately, isolationism is a dying creed. We cannot permit the security of the United States to be endangered by allowing the entire European continent to come under the domination of a single power or group of powers hostile to America. In World War II, the Allied Powers lost continental Europe before the United States joined actively in the fighting. To regain it, we had to launch the most dangerous and costly amphibious assault in the history of mankind.

Today, in spite of the strides of the western nations toward economic recovery and toward economic, political, and military cooperation, the nations of Europe still find themselves in a weakened condition as a result of the destruction and privation of war. This affords a golden opportunity for a new aggressor.

OBSTRUCTION TO PEACE

When VJ-day came, we thought that peace and stability would return to the world. We did not, of course, expect that the end of the fighting would automatically settle the painful problem brought on by the war. Even if there were unity among the allies of World War II in the search for a just and honorable peace, there would be many obstacles to overcome before reaching the goal. But we hoped that with patience and care we could attain peace in a reasonable time.

But winning the peace has become even more difficult than winning the war because one single bully among the nations has not only refused to cooperate in the achievement of a just and honorable peace, but, sad to say, has sabotaged the efforts.

Let us be frank about it. The Soviet dictatorship has obstructed all attempts at bringing peace to a shattered world. The democratic nations have tried to find a firm basis for peace by negotiation and agreement. Many conferences were held in the four corners of the earth. Though the few agreements that were obtained left much to be desired, they offered some basis for peace. But the Kremlin regime has repeatedly ignored and violated the agreements.

We had hoped that the United Nations would succeed to build a world order based on law and not on force. Most of the countries of the world have joined the United Nations. Most of the members support it and endeavor to make it stronger and more useful.

RUSSIAN AGGRESSION

However, the U. S. S. R. has staged a veto marathon at sessions of the United Nations, thus destroying its effectiveness as an instrument for peace.

Bear in mind that in the 4 years since the end of the war the Red army was used as the means for establishing Moscow-controlled Communist dictatorships in Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Hungary. It was only a little over a year ago that Czechoslovakia's free, democratic government was overthrown by a Communist coup.

It is clear that in the case of a new aggressor, as in the case of Nazi Germany, control of the European Continent, once achieved, would merely serve as the first step in the grand strategy of an attack on Great Britain and then on the United States and the whole Western Hemisphere.

ECONOMIC RECOVERY AND THE TREATY

How can we avoid such terrifying possibilities from becoming horrible realities? The North Atlantic Treaty as a complement to the European recovery program is the answer. The treaty and the ERP are both necessary to achieve a stable, prosperous, and peaceful world. The economic recovery of Europe will be aided by the feeling of greater security which the treaty will spread among the ERP countries. Likewise, the treaty requires a successful ERP as the basic foundation upon which its security must rest.

A little over a year ago I appeared before your committee in support of the European recovery program. While in Europe as a member of the Anglo-American Council on Productivity, I saw the benefits of the European recovery program. But we know that all of our gains can be lost unless we join for our mutual self-protection.

The essential purpose of the treaty is to maintain and strengthen the way of life of the North Atlantic community of nations. This thought is well expressed in the preamble to the treaty, which reads:

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded upon the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law.

PREVENTIVE EFFECT OF TREATY

The essence of the treaty is recognition of the fact that an armed attack on any of the North Atlantic nations is, in effect, an attack upon them all.

By confronting a potential aggressor with a preponderance of military, economic, and spiritual power, the North Atlantic Treaty will increase the prospects of peace. We all know that our firm and determined policy in Berlin has resulted in the lifting of the blockade. This was accomplished primarily by American pilots, American planes, and American dollars. The power and might of the United States is needed to translate the North Atlantic Treaty from a noble document to a living reality. I agree with our President that had such a treaty existed in 1914 and 1939, it "would have prevented the acts of aggression which led to two world wars." Need anything more be said?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Brown, your office is here in Washington, is it?
Mr. BROWN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been connected with the International Association of Machinists for some years, have you not?

Mr. BROWN. I have been connected with the Grand Lodge of the Machinist's Union for 28 years, and 10½ years as international president.

The CHAIRMAN. You have testified before committees here from time to time?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, I have.

The CHAIRMAN. I remember your having been before the committee. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. Will you just supplement that statement with an indication of what the International Association of Machinists is? As I understand it, it is not related to the other large labor organizations, but is an independent organization.

Mr. BROWN. We are not affiliated with any of the other labor movements for the time being.

Senator VANDENBERG. What is your membership?

Mr. BROWN. About 625,000. We have agreements with over 12,000 employers.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green, do you care to ask any questions?

Senator GREEN. I did not hear the witness. I have no questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator VANDENBERG. It was a very fine statement.

Mr. BROWN. I want to thank the committee for permitting me to appear.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Charles F. Boss, Jr., representing the Methodist Church.

Is this your statement [indicating pamphlet entitled "Toward One World"]?

Mr. BOSS. That is a statement adopted by the commission. I shall not read all of it. Much of it I can omit. I will call attention to certain paragraphs and items.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us who you are.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES F. BOSS, JR., EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, COMMISSION ON WORLD PEACE OF THE METHODIST CHURCH

Mr. BOSS. My name is Charles F. Boss, Jr., the executive secretary of the Commission on World Peace of the Methodist Church, whose headquarters are in Chicago, Ill.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a minister, are you?

Mr. BOSS. I am a minister. I have been full time in this particular position for 14 years. I was with you, sir, and pay tribute again to you and Senator Vandenberg for your work, at San Francisco. I put in full time there.

The CHAIRMAN. I recall that.

Mr. BOSS. We were all interested in that field.

We do not speak for the whole Methodist Church. Do not assume that we do. Nor do we speak for the 14 bishops who released the statement in the press Saturday in Washington, and in the New York Times of yesterday morning. I would call attention to the fact that the 14 bishops who signed that statement constitute a minority of the Council of Bishops. That is, it is 14 out of 35 active bishops.

The CHAIRMAN. You represent both the North and the South?

Mr. BOSS. Indeed I do.

The CHAIRMAN. They have become unified, have they not, except in opinions?

Mr. BOSS. The opinions are not confined to South against North, always, but rarely.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not mean on sectional lines. I mean the church is united but they still differ in their opinions, as you point out with the 14 bishops.

Mr. BOSS. That is right. We believe in a democratic church, and rights of opinion. Subsidiary organizations may take and do take the actions which are theirs, but we have an official place in the church, as has the board of education, the board of missions, and therefore the right to speak. But we do not assume that we speak for everyone in the church.

(Statement on the international situation adopted by the Commission on World Peace of the Methodist Church, Chicago, Ill., May 2, 1949, appears in the record as follows:)

TOWARD ONE WORLD

(Statement on the international situation adopted by the Commission on World Peace of the Methodist Church, Chicago, Ill., May 2, 1949.)

The Commission on World Peace cannot but be gravely concerned over the trend of international events. Member states of the United Nations who collaborated with patience and persistence in winning the war are now tragically divided over provisions for preserving the peace. To some extent, this should have been anticipated. Collaboration between allies in war is an essential but temporary expedient. It is concerned with military strategy, the objective of which is military victory. War tends to postpone the grappling with real causes of war and subordinates efforts to resolve the issues of permanent peace.

Since mistrust, provocative propaganda, conflict of policy in occupied countries, and insecurity—accompanied by a swiftly mounting arms race—continue to plague mankind, the Christian church is morally obligated diligently to exert itself to promote conditions conducive to a just and peaceful solution of the issues between nations. Unless agreements are reached, mankind, against its will, may drift into the destruction of civilization.

In this situation Christians need not be discouraged or feel that there is nothing they can do. The long-range program of peace-making including the laying of moral and spiritual foundations in prayer and world brotherhood, the relief of human suffering, the support of international cooperation, the increase of economic justice, and other courses set forth in the General Conference statement on the Conditions of Peace are still open to us. (See Discipline of the Methodist Church, 1948 (par. 2025.)) In addition, certain other positive courses of action are called for in the present situation.

J. War is not inevitable

Wars are essentially bred in the attitudes and motives of men. No nation on earth now desires war. If attitudes of suspicion, vindictiveness, and fear can be kept down and corresponding attitudes of understanding, good will, and mutual concern built up, no nation can be thrust into war. The basic answer to the present war hysteria is found in Christ the Reconciler, and in the doing of what He taught regarding "the things which belong unto peace." To this end we urge—

1. That through preaching, teaching, and worship the churches do everything possible to combat the present antagonism toward Russia, making it clear that the Russian people, largely helpless under their dictators, are not to be identified with the Soviet Government. Church members should be led to realize that we have many millions of fellow Christians in Russia and that, whether or not of the same household of faith, we are all made equally in God's image and are brothers one of another.

2. That church members be urged to make a calm and objective appraisal of the merits and defects of communism, such as is to be found in the report of section III of the Amsterdam conference Findings and Decisions; and that the churches, without espousing communism, do all in their power to counteract the present hysterical fear of communism which is leading in America to the suppression of free speech and the misjudging of many liberal movements. Communism cannot be fought by imitation of its own methods.

II. The Marshall Plan

We reaffirm our support of the foreign aid program and urge its larger and more efficient use for building up the peacetime economies of European and Asiatic nations, in order to supply the basic necessities of normal existence, to insure full employment and the achievement of a normal balance of trade, and to serve as the most effective bulwark against communism.

III. Economic strengthening of undeveloped nations

We urge the full implementation of the fourth objective stated in President Truman's inaugural address, which advocates the sharing of American technology with peoples living in less well-developed areas of the world. This we do both out of a Christian concern for the welfare of the peoples involved and because such economic development of lands in which hunger and want now prevail will tend toward the economic stability of every other land.

IV. Human rights

We believe it to be the will of God as revealed in Jesus Christ that all men should have equal rights and be treated as persons of equal dignity, regardless of race, color, creed, or economic status. This is required both in fulfillment of the Christian gospel and as a safeguard to the peace of the world.

1. We commend the United Nations for its adoption of the declaration of human rights and urge its ratification by the United States Government.

2. Also, we urge the churches to study this declaration and consider ways of implementing it in their communities. The church itself must become an all-inclusive fellowship in Christ, without distinction of race, color, or class.

V. The United Nations

It is our conviction that the United Nations must be the keystone of our international policy. Agreements and actions which lie within the scope of the Charter should be routed through the United Nations. Bilateral arrangements by nations should be in harmony with the Charter and should further the general international welfare.

New efforts should be initiated to secure the common consent of all 58 member nations of the United Nations to refrain from invoking the unanimity rule (i. e., the veto) in actions involving pacific methods of solving problems related to the peace of the world, as in cases such as Israel, Pakistan, and Indonesia.

VI. Reduction and control of armaments

We believe the United States should take the lead in efforts to secure agreement on a universal and simultaneous reduction of armaments through the United Nations.

We urge the United States to continue with patient efforts to secure an acceptance of a plan of international control of atomic energy along the lines recommended by the last General Assembly.

VII. Co-operation with the U. S. S. R.

There should be no evasion of the fact that the frequent use of the veto, the extension of Soviet spheres of influence, the curtailment of free expression within Russia and nations closely related to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the blocking of peace treaties in the foreign ministers' conferences, the Berlin blockade, religious persecution which has shocked the sensibilities of western nations, and other incidents, have made cooperation with the U. S. S. R. extremely difficult. These acts we believe to be neither politically nor morally justified. Sympathy rather than condemnation is in order for the statesmen who have tried unsuccessfully to work out a settlement. Nevertheless, we believe that the time for negotiation and attempts at reconciliation of differences is not past and that, before the spirit of Christian good will, no "middle wall of partition" can finally stand. We therefore urge our Government—

1. To use every effort to terminate the "cold war" and to refrain from threats and vituperative language in all public statements.

2. To use the radio and any other channels that may be open to assure the Russian people of the friendship of the American people.

3. To facilitate cultural and religious interchanges between Soviet and American leaders.

4. To keep open the channels for diplomatic negotiation even when the results may not be immediately rewarding. The alternative is war.

VIII. The militarization of the United States

We reaffirm the statement of the General Conference of 1948: "We recognize the need of national defense. When nations rely primarily on military force, both the spiritual and economic foundations of peace are undermined. Fear and suspicion increase the danger of hostility; the diversion of wealth to this channel withdraws it from the constructive pursuits of peace."

We therefore look with grave apprehension on certain current policies, believing them to be contrary both to the Christian way of life and the true grounds of national security. Among these are peacetime conscription, in whatever form it may take; colossal military appropriations which encourage the armaments race and absorb the major portion of our national budget; the spread of propaganda to make such appropriations acceptable to the public, thereby encouraging hysteria, suspicion, and ill will; the control of political policy largely by military rather than civilian leaders; military influence in education, science, and industry; the stockpiling of atomic and biological weapons; the maintenance of military bases around the world; foreign policy which bypasses and therefore weakens the United Nations. We urge the members of our churches, both as individuals and groups, to declare their opposition to such policies, as occasion may arise, to their Congressmen and to the President of the United States. For the primary goal of Christians is not military defense but the establishment of peace and world order.

IX. The North Atlantic Pact

We cannot ignore the momentous issues for peace involved in the proposed North Atlantic Pact. Confusion still exists as to exactly what implementation of the pact is proposed. Under present circumstances, the manner of implementation contains important trends toward peace or war. Equally sincere statesmen and Christians differ on the probable results of the proposed pact. The chief proponents of the pact claim that—

1. The pact is a proclamation to Europe and to the world of what is an established fact—namely, that the people of the United States are no longer committed to a policy of extreme isolationism, but to a policy of international responsibility;

2. The United States views its security as inseparably related to the security of western Europe;

3. The announcement of this policy by the United States will constitute a deterrent to any nation which might resort to aggression to gain its ends. It is contended that this clarification of United States policy is essential to a safe and early settlement of the German problem, and necessary for the successful revival of European economy under the Economic Recovery Program;

4. Since the nations seem unready for a universal approach, much progress toward universal agreement and ultimately federal world government can be accomplished in the interim by expanding the areas of cultural, economic, and political unity through regional pacts, under terms which are provided for in and are consistent with the United Nations Charter.

There are, however, grave dangers lurking in the possible implementation of the pact and in its application in international policy.

1. While the Charter of the United Nations makes provision for the formation of regional agreements, as between the United States and the Latin American republics, there is little likelihood that a pact mainly directed against a member state can have any other effect than to weaken the United Nations and increase the tension and conflict which have hitherto hampered its effectiveness.

2. The Truman Doctrine, which the pact parallels on a larger scale, has not succeeded in stopping communism in Greece or bringing peace to that country. It has resulted rather in the enlargement of Russian spheres of influence.

3. The military rearming of western Europe would make staggering demands on our already overburdened economy, thus precipitating the danger of economic collapse, and would divert to military ends funds much needed for humanitarian relief. The Marshall plan provides much more security against the primary danger in western Europe, the advance of communism by infiltration.

4. There is no guaranty that American arms furnished as military implementation of the pact will not be used to suppress uprisings of nationals in such lands as Indonesia and Indo-China, and thus become a support to western imperialism.

5. The psychological effect of the pact cannot be other than to increase Russian fear of imperialistic aggression, as would be the case in the United States if the U. S. S. R. were to establish military bases in Latin America. There is grave danger therefore, that it may actually serve to precipitate rather than to avert war.

In view of these considerations we feel bound at this time to withhold support of the North Atlantic Pact. We urge that it be given full and free discussion by the American people before it is acted upon by the Senate of the United States.

We call upon the church to continue to proclaim with clarity and moral vigor the love of God for all men in all nations and the availability of His Spirit in all efforts to create peace with justice and brotherhood among men. No one knows what the future holds, or whether another war may yet engulf humanity. But of this we can be confident, that this is our Father's world. The Lord is our keeper, and in His will is our peace.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. Boss. I want to say also, sir, that I am coming here to interpret the position of the church, and not with a view to attempting to solve the political dilemma in which you men find yourselves and in which the Senate finds itself.

I shall omit the reading of all the introductory section on page 1 and will endeavor to take the headings, then, and bring out certain points, and then read specifically certain paragraphs dealing with the matter of our present policy.

We take the view in the commission, as indeed I think our whole church does, and you do, that war is not inevitable.

THE COMMISSION ON WORLD PEACE

Senator GREEN. May I interrupt, Doctor, to ask a question, whether these are your personal views, or have these been adopted by the organization?

Mr. Boss. Thank you. I should have brought that out. These have been adopted in this 27-member commission, on which there are 6 bishops, one representing each jurisdiction. It has been adopted by a vote of 24 with 3 members abstaining. Of the 6 bishops elected by the Council of Bishops to serve on this commission, five out of the six were favorable, one abstained from voting.

Senator GREEN. What is the commission?

Mr. Boss. The commission is an official body of the Methodist Church, elected by the church, by the general conference, by the Council of Bishops, and the jurisdictions of the church, just as is the board of missions.

Senator GREEN. What is the commission appointed to do?

Mr. BOSS. It is the Commission on World Peace of the Methodist Church.

Senator GREEN. And they are appointed to consider and make a report?

Mr. BOSS. They certainly are. This is their report on this particular issue. It is a regular board of the church. We meet from time to time, and part of our responsibility is the consideration of our international situation, of the way to peace, the policies with respect to peace. I have appeared before this committee and other committees here many times in these 14 years.

Senator GREEN. Then the commission was not appointed for this specific purpose?

Mr. BOSS. No, sir; not at all.

Senator GREEN. For the Atlantic Pact? That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. BOSS. No, sir. It met and released its statement on May 2. It was nearly a unanimous vote of the commission.

No nation on earth now desires war. May I say, sir, that I come also with two and a half months in Europe, in which I was in, as well as the western nations, Poland, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Germany. Both years I have conferred at some length with General Clay, with some members of cabinets, as in Poland, with church leaders and other civic leaders in all these countries, so that I have something of a personal field with regard to the background, and this statement, therefore, is not merely academic.

The CHAIRMAN. You were over there on an official mission?

Mr. BOSS. I was sent on a peace mission for the church. It was primarily, of course, a mission to the church, but it gave opportunity for these contacts that I have referred to.

I believe that in none of these countries I was in was there evidence of war, and I believe with General Clay and General Keyes that for some time in what might be termed the immediate future there is not a threat of war. However, when we look down the years, it is all a gamble.

The CHAIRMAN. You were for the Marshall plan, I believe?

SUPPORT FOR MARSHALL PLAN

Mr. BOSS. I think you will find that we are very strongly for the Marshall plan. We reaffirm our support of the foreign-aid program and urge its larger and more efficient use for building up the peacetime economies of European and Asiatic nations. We urge the full implementation of the fourth objective stated in President Truman's inaugural address, which advocates the sharing of American technology with peoples living in less well-developed areas of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. That issue is not at present before the committee.

Mr. BOSS. No; that is not an issue. I am merely saying that it is in this kind of framework that the action we take is there.

We believe it to be the will of God as revealed in Jesus Christ that all men should have equal rights and be treated as persons of equal dignity, regardless of race, color, creed, or economic status.

SUPPORT FOR UNITED NATIONS

I know this is the mind of the committee and the Government also: It is our conviction that the United Nations must be the keystone of our international policy. Agreements and actions which lie within the scope of the Charter should be routed through the United Nations. Bilateral arrangements by nations should be in harmony with the Charter and should further the general international welfare.

New efforts should be initiated to secure the common consent of all 59 member nations of the United Nations to refrain from invoking the unanimity rule in actions involving pacific methods of solving problems related to the peace of the world.

We hope the United States, Mr. Chairman, will take the lead in the next meetings of the United Nations to secure a new agreement at this point. Perhaps the Foreign Ministers will help us.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is pretty much of that opinion.

Mr. BOSS. Thank you.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is part of the Senate resolution of 1 year ago.

Mr. BOSS. I know that.

Senator VANDENBERG. And part of the proposals which the Government of the United States has presented for the agenda of the United Nations.

Mr. BOSS. We give it our support, our very hearty support, and I think you can count on active backing from our church in that respect.

We believe the United States should take the lead in efforts to secure agreement on a universal and simultaneous reduction of armaments through the United Nations.

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT

We urge the United States to continue with patient efforts to secure an acceptance of a plan of international control of atomic energy along the lines recommended by the last General Assembly.

The CHAIRMAN. Right there let me intervene. On this matter of reduction of armaments, do you favor a reduction by percentages? If you reduced it only by percentages, relatively, you would have the same overwhelming armament you have now.

Mr. BOSS. I think the Soviet proposal at that point was rather unrealistic. We do propose that a plan be set up that would involve justice.

Senator GREEN. You apparently divide armaments on the one hand and atomic energy on the other. Do you exclude the atomic bombs from the armaments?

Mr. BOSS. No, sir; but the matter is being dealt with separately in the United Nations. For that reason, perhaps, you have to make separate approaches. They are all a part of armaments, of course.

Senator GREEN. You think they all ought to be reduced?

Mr. BOSS. I think that the problem of solving the international control of atomic energy is a slightly different problem in its technicalities from the problem of reduction of conventional armaments, and since there are separate commissions at the present time in the United Nations, I think this was the best way the commission knew to state the matter.

Senator GREEN. It would probably be very easy to get a general agreement that the United States should reduce its atomic bombs. But would the United States agree to it?

Mr. Boss. I do not think the problem is one of reducing atomic bombs. I think the problem is one of an effecting plan of controlling the development of atomic energy and its applications for normal production purposes or power purposes, and on the other hand the control of it to prevent it from becoming manufactured for war purposes.

Senator GREEN. Do you think the country should reduce its production of atomic bombs unless the other nations reduce their armaments?

Mr. Boss. We have suggested here the principle we would follow, that it should be a universal and simultaneous reduction. Unless we do get international agreement, I think it is unrealistic to consider what one nation should do with regard to it. No nation is going to modify its own affairs very much until we come to some plan of security on an international basis.

Senator GREEN. I think that is a very laudable aspiration, but suppose the Soviet Government says, "We are not going to reduce our armament unless you reduce your atom bombs"?

Mr. Boss. I think probably these two committees do, in a sense, work together. Some of the same people are on both, and it is inevitable that they do their thinking with regard to the general plan of finding a way to security.

Senator GREEN. Suppose you were one of those people. What would be your attitude of mind?

Mr. Boss. I should try to make progress in both committees, stick to the United Nations, and give it the fullest support and muster all the strength for the universal approach that I could.

Senator GREEN. Suppose you were no more successful than we have been in the United Nations.

LEADERSHIP FOR PEACE

Mr. Boss. Then I should keep on going persistently until I died, because I think the alternative to some form of international security is war, and that means the destruction of our civilization in a day of atomic bombs. That is the position I should take. It is a tough problem. It is a difficult one. But is there any alternative to continuing to grow patiently persistently, month after month, until somehow we succeed? That is, I think, the thing we are trying to say in our paper. It is a hard course. It wears our patience. It irritates us; it provokes us. That is what we have to do for the sake of the world. The United States can give leadership. We must give it, not in the direction of opening up the gulfs that make for war, but a continuous, patient effort that tends gradually to make the world better.

I supported the air lift. I checked it nights as I lay in my bed, hearing the planes go over. I think that was the kind of step, taken patiently, nonprovocatively, a dramatic thing, that finally won out.

Senator GREEN. I agree with you we should continue this patient, unrelenting effort to come to an agreement, but meanwhile what are we to do, nothing?

Mr. Boss. Oh, no. I think there are a great many things we can do. We suggest here some things we can do.

Senator GREEN. I am discussing your point VI.

Mr. BOSS. I think we have to keep on moving, but I do not think that the proposition is hopeless. I think we have a great deal of hope. I think the United Nations has made tremendous progress. I do not think it is time to desert it. I think we must give it our full support.

Senator GREEN. We are legislators, and while we may be in favor of unremitting persistent efforts in reaching an agreement, in the meanwhile are we to do nothing? I do not see that you cover that point.

Mr. BOSS. Perhaps we do in a couple of things I have here later. Would you mind holding it and coming back to it? I do have some specific things.

COOPERATION WITH U. S. S. R.

VII is cooperation with the U. S. S. R. There should be no evasion of the fact that the frequent use of the veto, the extension of Soviet spheres of influence, the curtailment of free expression within Russia and the nations closely related to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the blocking of peace treaties in the foreign ministers' conferences, the Berlin blockade, religious persecution which has shocked the sensibilities of western nations, and other incidents, have made cooperation with the U. S. S. R. extremely difficult. These acts we believe to be neither politically nor morally justified. Sympathy rather than condemnation is in order for the statesmen who have tried unsuccessfully to work out a settlement. Nevertheless, we believe that the time for negotiation and attempts at reconciliation of differences is not past and that, before the spirit of Christian good will, no "middle wall of partition" can finally stand. We therefore urge our Government:

1. To use every effort to terminate the cold war and to refrain from threats and vituperative language in all public statements.

2. To use the radio and any other channels that may be open to assure the Russian people of the friendship of the American people. I see there is a suggestion this morning in the paper of other means that might be used to reach the Russian people.

3. To facilitate cultural and religious interchanges between Soviet and American leaders.

4. To keep open the channels for diplomatic negotiation even when the results may not be immediately rewarding. The alternative is war.

Senator GREEN. Is this the time you would like me to renew my question?

Mr. BOSS. I think if you would hold it through the things which we suggest a little further, I shall be very glad to come back to it, if you please, because I think we do have something we would like to say on that.

NEED FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

The general conference, and this means the entire church, and this, too, was practically a unanimous action, recognizes the need of national defense. When nations rely primarily on military force, both the spiritual and economic foundations of peace are undermined. Fear and suspicion increase the danger of hostility; the diversion of wealth to this channel withdraws it from the constructive pursuits of peace.

We therefore look with grave apprehension on certain current policies, believing them to be contrary both to the Christian way of life and the true grounds of national security. Among these are peacetime conscription in whatever form it may take; colossal military appropriations which encourage the armaments race and absorb the major portion of our national budget; the spread of propaganda to make such appropriations acceptable to the public, thereby encouraging hysteria, suspicion, and ill will; the control of political policy largely by military rather than civilian leaders; military influence in education, science, and industry; the stockpiling of atomic and biological weapons; the maintenance of military bases around the world; foreign policy which bypasses and therefore weakens the United Nations. We urge the members of our churches, both as individuals and groups, to declare their opposition to such policies as occasion may arise, to their Congressmen and to the President of the United States. For the primary goal of Christians is not military defense but the establishment of peace and world order. Note that I said the primary goal.

Now, we have this to say with regard to the North Atlantic Pact:

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF THE TREATY

We cannot ignore the momentous issues for peace involved in the proposed North Atlantic Pact. Confusion still exists—it did when this was adopted—as to exactly what implementation of the pact is proposed. Under present circumstances, the manner of implementation contains important trends toward peace or war. Equally sincere statesmen and Christians differ on the probable results of the proposed pact. The chief proponents of the pact claim—and perhaps I can just sketch this, because you know this story well.

First, we have moved, and our church has moved, from sometime isolation to a sense of international responsibility. I think what has happened in our church is representative of the Nation. We are very clear at that point.

Second, is a statement that the security of the United States is inseparably related to the security of western Europe. I think the members of our Commission are fully realistic about it and know that once you become involved in a war in Europe the old possibilities of our just being completely out are gone, especially with our economic involvements in Europe now.

The announcement of this policy will constitute a deterrent to any nation which might resort to aggression to gain its ends. We would recognize in the Commission the possibility of a short-time function, but a continuation of this seems to us to make for a divided world instead of a united world. We recognize there is a certain gamble in this at that point. Since the nations seem unready for a universal approach, much progress toward universal agreement and ultimately Federal world government can be accomplished in the interim by expanding the areas of cultural, economic, and political unity through regional pacts. We think there are some dangers in that. We know that men like the two Senators here themselves want to pull this whole thing into the universal approach, nevertheless we think the policy we are embarking upon now does contain grave dangers.

DANGERS IN THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

We think these dangers are in the implementation of the pact, particularly, although we were unable ourselves to say at this time that we would support the pact.

1. While the Charter of the United Nations makes provision for the formation of regional agreements, as between the United States and the Latin-American Republics, there is little likelihood that a pact mainly directed against a member state can have an other effect than to weaken the United Nations and increase the tension and conflict which have hitherto hampered its effectiveness.

2. The Truman doctrine, which the pact parallels on a larger scale, has not succeeded in stopping communism in Greece or bringing peace to that country. It has resulted rather in the enlargement of the Russian sphere of influence.

I may call attention to the fact that the first announcement of it was in terms of relief and economic rehabilitation and reconstruction of the villages. Actually the reports which have been made of the Greek appropriations show the majority of those funds have gone for military purposes. The President has already announced that he is going to ask for $200,000,000 more for the same purpose, to be used militarily in Greece and Turkey.

3. The military rearming of western Europe would make staggering demands on our already overburdened economy, thus precipitating the danger of economic collapse, and would divert to military ends funds much needed for humanitarian relief. The Marshall plan provides much more security against the primary danger in western Europe, the advance of communism by infiltration.

4. There is no guaranty that American arms furnished as military implementation of the pact will not be used to suppress uprisings of nationals in such lands as Indonesia and Indochina, and thus become a support to western imperialism.

The CHAIRMAN. You say "become a support to western imperialism." Do you charge that the United States is engaged in imperialistic tactics?

Mr. BOSS. No, sir. I think the heart of our country has always been opposed to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why do you say "become a support to western imperialism"?

Mr. BOSS. I think perhaps it would have been more correct to say "western European imperialism." That is what was intended. We did not intend to involve the United States at that point.

5. The psychological effect of the pact cannot be other than to increase Russian fear of imperialistic aggression, as would be the case in the United States if the U. S. S. R. were to establish military bases in Latin America. There is grave danger, therefore, that it may actually serve to precipitate rather than to avert war. That is, as we look at it in the long run.

WITHHOLDING SUPPORT FROM TREATY NOW

In view of these considerations we feel bound at this time to withhold support of the North Atlantic Pact. We urge that it be given full and free discussion by the American people before it is acted upon by the Senate of the United States.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that in this position we have said "at this time" because we recognize possible change of events. It is our conviction that we have something of a gamble here and that only on a short-term basis can we justify some of the things involved in it, because we want steadily, as a church, to hold before ourselves the steps which unite the world. It is possible during a particular period, by tremendous military force and economic force and power, to perhaps have an ascendancy in the world over another group. But events change, conditions change, and a divided world leaves us pretty much where we have been, except it is organized differently, just as the Allies organized differently in World War I and World War II.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. BOSS, do you discriminate and distinguish between "withholding" support of the North Atlantic Pact and "opposing" the North Atlantic Pact?

Mr. BOSS. Yes, I do, and I wanted to bring that point out. I am glad you asked the question.

Our commission did not authorize an all-out attack upon this policy. We did feel that because of these dangers and our lack of knowledge of the implementation procedures that we would have to withhold our support at that time, but we have not authorized an all-out opposition to this. I think we should bring that out quite fairly and frankly.

MILITARY IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. That could mean that with the further development of the program and prospectus and the adequate disclosure of the purely defensive characteristics of the undertaking that you might ultimately come to the point of view that something of this nature is necessary?

Mr. BOSS. Of course, that is possible, but I would think, in the light of the discussions of the commission, that if they had known that it was moving over into the sort of armament implementation which was being taken, possibly, at least, they might have taken a position in opposition. I think the opposition within our commission is much more aimed at the type of implementation which on a power basis can keep a divided world, and may not minister to a successful approach universally through the United Nations, than perhaps through the constructive phases of the Atlantic Pact, which have been named, and we recognize that certain of those constructive phases are there. I think that is our position.

Senator VANDENBERG. On the basis of the implementation proposed, to which you refer, and without expressing any personal opinion with respect to it myself, would it not seem to you that the proposed implementation program is so totally limited that it virtually consists only of putting the existing forces in being into greater military sufficiency and gearing them together for a common defense? Would it be humanly possible to turn a program of $1,000,000,000 of military assistance, scattered among the 11 other nations, into anything remotely approaching an aggressive character?

Mr. BOSS. That is a technical problem. Our commission did not consider that point with regard to, you say, a billion or a billion and a half or two billion dollars. It looks like a lot of money to me personally. The armament budget of the United States, when you total it up in the billions, looks pretty big to us, but I think I would not be able to give a technical statement.

I think our fear, Senator Vandenberg, is at the point that if we continue with what is essentially a war technique and the organization of power against communism, rather than to use the methods which really stop the ideas of communism, with constructive alternatives, economically, with means of preventing infiltration with the recognition of the united approaches and lifting the standards of living and preventing misery and unemployment—speeches of that sort, on which communism thrives—that we will more and more, especially if we move into some unemployment, tend to push into the field of increased armaments, increased military, larger armies, rather than finding these constructive solutions which we think are invited in such developments as the Marshall plan and bringing up the standards of other countries through the sharing of technology and constructive methods. We do not believe that primarily power prevents the spread of communism. We think it has to be met head-on with ideas, and it is capitalizing on our mistakes and the weaknesses and the miseries of the world.

SUPPORT FOR TREATY WITHOUT IMPLEMENTATION

Senator VANDENBERG. Let me put the question a little differently, because I am really interested in your point of view. If there were no supplemental implementation program contemplated at all, would you be in favor of the North Atlantic Pact?

Mr. Boss. I think most of it I would be in favor of; yes, sir. I am speaking for myself, now, because the Commission did not face it exactly as you have stated it.

Senator VANDENBERG. As I read what you have to say in behalf of the Commission, it seems to me that that probably would be a fair interpretation of the attitude of the Commission.

Mr. Boss. Yes. At the time Mr. Bohlen spoke to us from the State Department at Cleveland, he was unable to give us any information or evidences or anything of the sort, nor had this been released, this implementation program, until rather recently. We met just 10 days or so ago.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is precisely my point, Mr. Boss. If we start on the premise that we would agree with the North Atlantic Pact, without implementation, then the subsequent question simply becomes a question of fact, does it not, whether or not the implementation is entirely and completely within the nonaggressive character set out in the pact itself?

Mr. Boss. I think that process, however, that it seems to gear more into the technique of a continued cold war—we can see that if the Soviet Union and the eastern states of Asia lack the atomic bomb and such weapons, we can at points coerce them. That is what the airlift did. They tried to hit straight through center every time, and thought they would bull their way through, and the defense shifted and put something else in there that blocked that, and they have had to back off now to see whether they can make any gains around end or by forward passes. But if this fits in, say, a 20-year period—that is what is discussed, with the possibility of reviewing it in 10 years—a 20-year continuation of the possibility of the cold war, with the possibility of developments in the Soviet Union, it might cause them to use some of the contacts we have used. We think we have to keep at this problem, as you men did at San Francisco, staying with it until we are able to get a more realistic view on the part of the Soviet Union, and in a sense force cooperation; but we think that that has to be the end. The alternative to our successful influence in the United Nations and the revision of the United Nations looks to us down through the long years as opening the possibility for a terrible war, and none of us wants war.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, none of us wants war.

Mr. Boss. I know that.

OBSTRUCTION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. You said earlier in your statement that it might endanger the idea of one world. Didn't we try at San Francisco to establish machinery for one world, in a sense?

Mr. Boss. Yes. That is, we set up the techniques and facilities through which the nations could reach agreements.

The CHAIRMAN. We did that on the theory that the great nations would cooperate and go along the same route. Has that happened?

Mr. Boss. No, sir. I think partly, since I have at least on one occasion preceding the war been in a good bit of that eastern section of the world that is now unable to cooperate, in that we have very deep differences in our history and our outlook on life and our ways. We are dealing with many peoples who are so far removed from what is commonplace with us that I think we have to give it a little time if we are going to find the two groups understanding each other and working together.

The CHAIRMAN. In the face of the fact that on 30 different occasions one nation has by veto blocked and hindered and delayed and postponed the efforts of the United Nations to secure peaceful processes, the prospects along that line do not seem to be very hopeful, do they?

Mr. Boss. No. I think it is only when they fail to hit through center that they try tackle or something else, and they may eventually have to admit diplomatic defeat and find some other way of cooperation.

INCREASING UNDERSTANDING

The CHAIRMAN. In your ambition to have one world, would you have us just abandon our position and go along with them?

Mr. Boss. No, sir. I think the way that this matter of world federal union or something of the sort can be arrived at—well, I use this illustration in teaching in our own groups. When a man comes to a hospital, sick, and he wants good health, but he is ill in a good many different spots in him, you can't just write a general prescription and give it to him for general health and then expect him to get it. There are a great many points of disagreement in the organic system, and you have to find where the difficulties are and diagnose those and treat them. It may be the heart and lungs and stomach and something else are wrong all at once, and I think we have to follow the process we are using in finding how to solve the problem at different points.

But I do make a plea for extending very greatly our efforts at understanding. I think often retaliation, instead of a process of reconciliation—the gospel of Christ, which in a sense I suppose motivates our American life as much as anything else can do, is a gospel which fits into the doctrines of cooperation and into techniques of reconciliation, and it is those that I hope we can keep at work.

Human beings do mellow under a real process of reconciliation. I don't think we can accept everything they put forward just in order to make peace in the family. You can marry people and have a complete federal union, and supposedly govern it, but people differ and you have to take disagreements as they come and work on them. But I think something of the spirit and attitude and technique of reconciliation has to sort of continue to be in the fore and motivate us rather than the sense of "Well, we have done everything we can; now we have to keep the cold war going" until possibly we have actually split our world or our United Nations, which, as you suggest, is the best one world we have at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, in your desire to get one world and that sort of business, you would not take the position that every time this intransigent nation would propose something you would say, "Well, we can't get a world union unless we go along. We have to have one world; we have to agree"?

Mr. BOSS. No, no. I don't agree that what we should do is just to let them take advantage of the Berlin situation, push us out of Berlin and Frankfurt. I agreed with General Clay. He happens to be a Methodist, so that helped a little in getting good contact.

The CHAIRMAN. Did that warm up your view of international relations, the fact that he was a Methodist?

Mr. BOSS. I had a view of international relations before I knew he was a Methodist or knew General Clay.

ARMAMENT AND ARTICLE 3 OF TREATY

Senator GEORGE. Mr. BOSS, I am interested in your logic. I do not think you can read article 3 of this treaty without reaching the definite conclusion that we are committing ourselves to armaments, and not to disarmament.

Mr. BOSS. It is articles 3 and 5, sir, that bother us.

Senator GEORGE (reading) :

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of the treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

Now, there might be a difference of opinion as to what the purpose of arming is. We might insist, and I think most of us do insist, that we contemplate arming for purely defensive purposes and not for any other purpose. But you certainly cannot read in this treaty any commitment to disarm; but on the contrary, for 10 years here is a definite, direct commitment to armament. Don't you agree?

Mr. BOSS. Yes. That is the reason our Commission said we could not at this time approve the Atlantic Pact.

Senator GEORGE. I might not agree with your premise, so far as that goes, but once you concede your premise that the only way out of this thing is through disarmament, this North Atlantic Pact does not contemplate disarmament, but on the contrary it specifically binds us to armament for 10 years and thereafter we take another look at the whole thing.

And then, if you look at article 9 of the treaty :

The parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented, to consider matters concerning the implementation of this treaty. The council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of articles 3—

which I have already read—

and 5—

which I do not find it necessary to read.

What I am desirous of calling to your attention is what your whole logic points away from this treaty, although you may concede as a practical plan that under existing conditions in the world you may have to modify your own premise and your own conclusions. It certainly commits us to armament.

Now, as to what we are going to be asked to do, while we have an outline of it, a vague outline, there is nothing very definite about the outline of what we are going to do to implement this treaty and to carry into effect articles 3 and 5, particularly. On the contrary, that is to be determined by the council and by machinery that is set up by the council and such subsidiary bodies as may be created, and those bodies will carry an immense weight in determining what we will be called on, at least, to do. I do not say that we will do them, because I do recognize that certain autonomy is reserved to the United States.

DANGER OF REARMAMENT

Mr. Boss. You have interpreted, of course, in your way, and excellently, the points where danger is lurking that cause us to feel that we could not come out for the treaty. We recognize that there are a number of constructive things that can be done within this group.

Senator GEORGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. Boss. We recognize also that the United States of Europe might be an aid to world peace, just as the United States of America we hope is going to be the leading force for peace through the United Nations, so that there was a mixture, you see, of those things. But you have put your finger on the thing that caused us to sit back and look back into history, into the history of wars, and to look ahead for 10 or 20 years, to see that if we become too deeply involved in that process we may not put our full strength in the United Nations, and that is the reason the Commission took the action it did by a nearly unanimous vote.

Senator GEORGE. I have much sympathy with you when it comes to the implementation of this treaty. I know it can be implemented in such a way as to change its peaceful, defensive character, and that will all depend on what the nations do, and in a large measure it will depend on us. I merely want to call attention to that. I have heard so many witnesses here who emphasize the peaceful character of the whole thing, when we are right in the very teeth and face of a direct obligation to maintain our armament for 10 years without any let-up. Thereafter there might be some let-up.

Mr. Boss. May I add, Senator George, that the difficulty is, we do not see in much of this conventional armament process any real defense against attack. No one has yet figured out how you defend yourselves against jet planes or atomic bombs, and if we have a preponderance of power we might have a generous attitude toward the use of this sort of thing as a general defense, but actually if the going gets a little harder attitudes might swiftly change, and they would change if they felt that a preponderance of power or an equalization of power was coming east of the iron curtain.

That is where the great danger of war lies. Implementation of armaments to the *n*th degree is like fighting the old wars over again instead of facing this new situation, looking into an atomic age, which we must do now.

I thank you for what you have said, because it has helped in interpreting it.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

SCOPE OF NATIONAL DEFENSE

Senator GREEN. Mr. Boss, I would like, if you will, to clarify the position that you call "militarization of the United States", your point VIII. You quote from the general conference: "We recognize the need of national defense * * *", but then you emphasize the point that that is not a primary but a secondary purpose. Along those lines, however, you limit various forms of national defense or amounts of national defense.

Now, someone has to determine it. There may be 100 different points of view. Some people may think that a thousand men is enough, others 100,000 men, other 1,000,000, others 10,000,000. And even the experts may differ. But under our form of government it is left, is it not, to Congress to determine that?

Mr. Boss. That is correct, sir.

Senator GREEN. So why should you lay down certain prohibitions as to how that general purpose is to be carried out, as has been declared by your conference?

Mr. Boss. We do that because the church itself has fundamental views of life and of society and the social organization of the world. We believe we live in a moral universe, with moral laws that are derived from the reality of God and from His continual purposes. His continual love for men, mankind, and the operation of His universal laws. When we see repeatedly in history the disaster which has come upon people such as it did come upon the whole world in the Second World War, through the organized national sovereign purposes which states develop, and the means which are used, and then witness at the close of it two swift actions which gave us just a little glimpse at the beginning of what another war would be, we do not see much hope for mankind in a world which almost divides between the great mass of eastern Europe and Asia and the West, using these weapons.

We do not believe that any of this today really constitutes defense of our Nation or any other nation. We think this is the way to great disaster for the world. That is the reason we did this.

Senator GREEN. Do you think that the First World War or the Second World War, so far as we are concerned, the United States of America, came about because we had too much defense or because we had too little defense?

Mr. Boss. I think it came about, as Woodrow Wilson said, largely because of certain economic conflicts which had arisen, and our involvements in the economy of Europe, and we are much more deeply involved in the economy of the world. I don't think it came through having much or little defense.

EXTENT OF DEFENSE NECESSARY FOR NATIONAL SECURITY

Senator GREEN. I thought you attributed it to the fact that we had too much defense, that that was the trend of your argument.

Mr. Boss. I do not think the United States fundamentally has been militaristic, and, as I said to Senator Connally, I do not think we are imperialistic, but we are now involved in oil and steel and everything else all over the world, and unless we take the lead in bringing the forces of the world through the UN to prevent an open conflict in a divided world, victor and vanquished both are going to suffer. The victor doesn't come out of this unscathed because he is good or virtuous or because he has larger armament. He comes out of it depleted and destroyed, if not to the extent, near enough to the extent, of the vanquished to make it a terrible thing to have to contemplate.

Senator GREEN. I agree with you that we cannot rely on military defense alone, but since the conference appreciates the necessity for national defense and expresses its belief in it, it seems to me that it might be left to the Congress, under our form of government, to design the extent of that defense and the kind of that defense.

Mr. Boss. Having been in the committee which was involved in this, I may say, sir, that a majority did not want that in at all. That was put in, and the word "military" was definitely left out by the group itself, because, while it was agreed that the defense of the Nation was the defense of values we all stand for, the question of the whole method of defense was not one upon which the state of the church committee and the general conference, the committee being composed of about 125 or 150 people, would have been able to have agreed upon. For that reason the recognition that there are values in the United States to be defended was put in and means of defense was left out, and even the military defense.

Senator GREEN. Yes, but then here in your statement you attempt to implement the idea by stating certain kinds of defense which you do not think the Congress should adopt.

Mr. Boss. That is correct, sir.

Senator GREEN. Should that not be left to the Congress to determine? If you once admit that there should be national defense—

Mr. Boss. Yes, sir, but we think Congress, in determining it, should consult everybody who has any valid opinions to give and that is what you are doing in this committee.

Senator GREEN. Congress does attempt that. That is what it is doing in connection with this pact.

Now, many witnesses for whom we have respect, and no doubt for whom you have respect, have declared to us in no uncertain terms that the adoption of this pact will help to prevent—it can't guarantee it, but it will help to prevent—a third world war. We have gone so far as to say that if we had had this pact we would not have had the Second World War and possibly not the First World War. If so, it seems to me your reasoning must lead to conclusion in favor of the pact.

Mr. Boss. No, sir. As I said at the beginning, I could only come here to interpret the position of the commission. We recognize that you and the other Members of the Senate have the responsibility, and a very grave responsibility, for determining the final issues. We will continue to pray for you, whichever you do.

Senator GREEN. We will reciprocate, I assure you.

Mr. Boss. You have the decision to make. We cannot make the decision. All we can do is to give our point of view and develop it and to answer your questions and to do so humbly and reverently, but when we have done that, you have to act.

Senator GREEN. That is why I am trying to get your point of view. I am trying to find out the logical conclusions from what you have said.

Mr. Boss. That is correct.

Senator GREEN. When you say you recognize the need of national defense, evidently they did not wish to go against national defense in a military sense, but they did not want to commit themselves to it, perhaps. If it is left uncertain, who must decide, if not Congress? That is my point.

Mr. Boss. Yes. If we brought the whole statement of the general conference, you would find it completely committed to the United Nations; you would find it believing that the processes of negotiation and reconciliation must continually be applied; you would see that it asks for the means of developing better understanding between the nations; that it emphasizes the cultural and economic steps which we can take.

That is, I think the United States now stands in the place where we do have a recognition of strength among the nations. I think we have the great moment of history when the United States can give the leadership for creating a peaceful world.

Senator GREEN. To apply that to the Atlantic Pact, do not those thoughts run through the whole Atlantic Pact?

Mr. Boss. With the exception of the points Senator George brought out, which we think are the points where the dangers lie in the pact.

Senator GREEN. There may be danger. I am not saying that. But in the pact itself those thoughts permeate it. So it seems to me that you cannot hesitate to endorse it. You may later decide that you do not like the way in which Congress has implemented it, but that is another question.

Mr. Boss. I know, but the commission looked ahead and it at least took the rumors of implementation, and for that reason felt it was not ready to approve the pact. We did not care to come out and call upon the whole church to take a position of opposition to it. That is where we stand.

The CHAIRMAN. Just one question.

Mr. Boss. Yes, Senator Connally.

The CHAIRMAN. In the last part of your statement, you say:

We urge that it be given full and free discussion by the American people before it is acted upon by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. Boss. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. From your reading of the papers and from your observations, do you not concede that this committee has been undertaking to go fully into the matter and give everybody that knows anything an opportunity to speak?

Mr. BOSS. Yes, sir. I am sure our whole commission would unite in thanking you and expressing appreciation for opening this thing widely, as you have certainly done for me this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. We appreciate your statement.

Mrs. Clifford Bender, who is representing another branch of the Methodist Church. It is the woman's division of Christian service of the Methodist Church. Is that correct? You represent both branches of the Methodist Church, I assume, north and south?

Mrs. BENDER. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recognize this organization that has just spoken as a part of the Methodist hierarchy?

Mrs. BENDER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

STATEMENT OF MRS. CLIFFORD A. BENDER, ON BEHALF OF THE WOMAN'S DIVISION OF CHRISTIAN SERVICE, THE METHODIST CHURCH

Mrs. BENDER. Thank you for the opportunity to appear. I am going to cut my time so as to save your time.

My name is Margaret Bender. I live in Leonia, N. J. I appear this morning as a member of the department of Christian social relations and local activities of the woman's division of Christian service of the Methodist Church.

The CHAIRMAN. You are authorized to speak for them by some action of this body?

Mrs. BENDER. For that department; yes, sir.

ALTERNATIVE ACTION TO THE PACT

On March 22, 1949, the following action was taken by the executive committee of the woman's division of Christian service:

In order to achieve world security by common efforts the woman's division recommends the following:

1. That the Senate allow ample time for the discussion and full hearings on the North Atlantic Defense Pact and possible alternatives.

2. That the United States take the initiative in proposing as an effective alternative to the pact, consideration of a general security agreement, under article 51 of the United Nations Charter, which would be open to all members of the United Nations.

3. That the United States propose a full-scale conference at the earliest possible date on German and Japanese treaties.

4. That continued efforts be made to reach agreement on the international reduction of armaments and control of atomic energy.

5. That the United States make increased appropriations to the United Nations and provide for full participation and support of specialized agencies, such as the International Trade Organization, Food and Agriculture Organization, etc., and the International Children's Emergency Fund.

6. That there be full cooperation of the United States through United Nations agencies, for the promotion of greater economic and social well-being throughout the world.

7. We continue to oppose a policy of commitments to foreign military aid. Such a policy will hinder economic recovery through diverting manpower, machines, and materials for defense purposes; provoke fear, and stimulate an arms race on the part of the Soviet Union. Also such a program of foreign military aid, plus our national rearmament program, would substantially increase our United States budget, and threaten our domestic economy.

We recognize that opinions of equally sincere statesmen and Christians differ on the probable results of the proposed pact. While we would be in accord with the objective sought by the proponents of the pact, that of—detering aggression and establishing the sense of security necessary for the restoration of the economic and political health of the world (Secretary of State Dean Acheson)—

we believe that all responsible citizens must consider the possible dangers as well as advantages of pursuing this policy. And we must continue to think of alternatives.

UNITED NATIONS AND THE PACT

While it is true that basic mistrust, fear, provocative propaganda, conflict of policy, and insecurity have tragically divided the world and caused stalemates in the United Nations, we believe that this organization offers the chief hope for world peace.

Already the efforts of the United Nations and its related agencies have prevented war and stopped aggression at several points, and have laid the foundations of a peaceful world in the economic and social fields. It is a place where all the nations of the world may meet, expose issues to the light of public opinion, and seek out areas of agreement and compromise. Notwithstanding the imperfections, the United Nations provides techniques for the peaceful settlement of disputes, if the necessary moral and spiritual conditions can be met.

Is the pact a desirable addition to American foreign policy? Will it be effective where the United Nations has been ineffective? Is the pact consistent with the United Nations? Will it strengthen the United Nations?

While the pact is legally permitted by the Charter of the United Nations, we believe that such arrangements are contrary to the spirit of the United Nations.

Freda Kirchwey writes in the April 9, 1949, issue of the Nation :

Article 51 of the Charter recognizes the right of member nations to defend themselves against armed attack, individually or collectively, until the Security Council has taken measures to deal with the emergency. But article 53 provides that no enforcement action shall be taken by any regional agency "without the authorization of the Security Council," and article 54 says that the "Council shall be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements * * *". The text of the pact ignores these detailed provisions; instead it states that the signatories will act "forthwith" in case of armed attack upon a fellow member and will then report action to the Security Council.

The pact further states that members will stop action when the Security Council takes the necessary steps to restore the peace.

The signatories thus tend to become judges in their own case; they decide the problem of aggression and the aggressor without standards being laid down or procedures defined. They are free to act without mediation, and become the judges of the adequacy of the United Nations Security Council's actions. Does not the pact, in fact, deny United Nations jurisdiction on action regarding aggression, or at the least, fail to spell out the relationship?

In spite of the statement in the preamble of the pact that the parties to the treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and practices of the UN Charter, there is likelihood that the prestige of the UN will be endangered, and that confusion will be created in the minds of member nations by the fact that article 2 binds the signatories to educational and economic activities which are clearly within the scope of United Nations agencies, without spelling out the relationship.

CONSISTENCY OF TREATY WITH CHARTER

Despite the repeated assurances that the North Atlantic Treaty is consistent with the UN Charter, the treaty tends to overshadow and bypass the United Nations in its procedures, expenditures, and the loyalty of member nations.

The size and importance of the nations signing this agreement causes it to overshadow the UN because it includes three of the five permanent members of the Security Council, all of the major colonial powers, and represents more than 50 percent of the world's industrial capacity. The five nations that are outside the pact might possibly feel insecure because of the wealth, power, and prestige of the pact signatories.

The UN budget, furthermore, compares tragically with the sum contemplated for military assistance to the treaty countries. The total UN budget is $33,469,587 and the United States contribution, $18,115,260. The proposed sum of $1,130,000,000 in military assistance to treaty countries is over 60 times the amount we spend on the UN and over 30 times the UN budget. And the United States is spending over 900 times its contribution to the UN on its own Defense Establishment.

There is grave danger that the UN may splinter into armed camps, and that the UN will decline in prestige. The pact may widen the gulf between the east and west, cause Russia to make countermoves, and lessen the chance of finally reaching a universal security system under the UN.

In offering the Atlantic Pact as a substitute for what we feel to be the declining faith in the UN's ability to prevent aggression on the part of the vulnerable nations of western Europe we are gambling on our ability to make this substitute faith a sure one.

In spite of all efforts expended to popularize the pact, there are still grave doubts as to whether the people of the countries involved have actually been able to make this transfer of faith. In Norway, for example, there are indications that the popular fear of being caught in a war has not been alleviated by the pact. This is especially serious because of Norway's proximity to Russia.

MILITARY ALLIANCES AND THE BALANCE OF POWER

History indicates that the most that can be achieved by military alliances is a temporary balance of power, while they eventually give rise to increasing insecurity and a menacing armaments race, ending in war.

Blair Bolles, writing in the New Republic, February 21, 1949, states:

The twentieth century diplomatic boneyard is littered with dead defense treaties that failed their purpose. They did not prevent the outbreak of war, and once war came, they did not always insure victory.

The necessary concomitant of the pact is the arming of Europe. It is difficult to imagine that this step will not provoke more tension, fear, suspicion, and a swiftly mounting armaments race.

There is not, however, evidence to prove that armaments of themselves protect a civilization. The historian Toynbee has pointed out that of the 16 civilizations which have fallen in recorded history, 16 were strongly militarized. The crisis of a civilization, he concludes, comes not in the test of its military strength, but in the way in which it summons its moral resources to meet a great challenge.

The next two decades may well be our great chance to show the mettle of our civilization. The task of making it possible for two conflicting ideologies to exist in a peaceful world while their adequacy to the needs of their people is tested by time seems an almost impossible one at the moment, but a nation with economic, technological, and human resources that we possess might be capable of rising to this emergency, as it has risen in the past to wartime emergencies.

EFFECT OF TREATY AT HOME AND ABROAD

In this day of shrinking distances and accelerating communication, the speed with which political and military events shape up makes it impossible to guarantee that arms provided to signatory nations will not be used against those whom they were intended to protect, as has been the case with China, or even against us.

What will be the effect on recovery at home and abroad? These new expenditures added to the $15,000,000,000 already appropriated for defense purposes would tend to increase inflation and the tax burden, and might lead to wartime controls and growing restrictions on the freedom of American people.

Though it is claimed that it is not the intention to build up large armaments that would interfere with economic recovery, it is difficult to see how the increasing of military production in western Europe could help but curtail seriously civilian production. If scarce resources, machinery, and manpower are diverted from peacetime production to armaments, needed restoration of factories, agriculture, homes, and so forth, will be delayed. Delay of economic recovery may cause communism to spread.

ADMINISTRATIVE DIFFICULTIES IN THE TREATY

There are a number of points in the proposed pact where practical administrative difficulties will appear with increasing force as the pact gets under way. The difficulty of a decision as to what constitutes a necessity for going to war is perhaps the primary one of these. For instance, if a Communist revolution occurs in a signatory country, is that to be interpreted as an aggressive act on the part of Russia or as an internal matter? It is interesting to note in this connection that actually more of the acts of Russian aggression during the last few years have been of this type than of the marching-army type. The long-term provisions for keeping the pact in existence may also cause difficulties unforeseen at this point. For instance, if a nation—say France—should go Communist, would it be desirable to keep her in the pact? There is no provision for expelling a member in the present pact.

Article 4, which calls for the consulting together of the parties to the pact whenever a threat of aggression is believed to exist, and article 9, which establishes a council of member nations, need much more clarification. The defense committee and "such other subsidiary bodies" which are also suggested in article 9, offer alarming possibilities for the piling up of cumbersome machinery and duplication of UN functions.

It also seems that the provision for unanimous approval of new nations seeking entry to the pact is as unworkable as any of the difficult provisions of the UN Charter. We might not stay a unanimous group after the crisis seems to have passed.

It seems quite possible, therefore, that we are attempting to escape the problems of the UN by setting up another type of organization which will eventually be confronted by those same problems in no less degree, instead of facing the issue in the United Nations squarely at this point.

While there is no single easy answer to the present world crisis and the threat of totalitarian or Communist expansion, there are areas in which our Nation can work vigorously.

FULL SUPPORT OF UNITED NATIONS

1. Full cooperation, adequate support, and strengthening of the UN. It is our conviction that the UN must be the keystone of our foreign policy. Agreements and actions that lie within the scope of the Charter should be routed through the UN.

The break-down of the UN would make impossible that gradual development of mutual trust which can only be achieved by working together and which is the only logical and reasonable way in which a gradual surrender of sovereignty in some areas can be secured. Our only hope of developing such a world morality as is called for by the Charter of the UN is in a continuing development of situations in which we can work together and in which the value of each surrender of sovereignty becomes obvious in concrete form to the nations involved. For analogy note the frontier town where everyone has complete sovereignty which he gradually surrenders in an effort to get greater safety and more services for himself until he shows no unhappiness at what he has relinquished—only pleasure in the improvement of his life. He does not mind that he cannot set a machine gun up on his lawn to defend himself; he is content to obey quarantines, and so forth. Similarly, Russia might conceivably at a future date be willing to trade some of her sovereignty for greater security from disease and a better standard of living if she was as sure as our ex-frontiersman is that her personality would be protected.

PROMOTION OF ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL WELFARE

2. Maximum cooperation by the United States, preferably through UN agencies, for the promotion of greater economic and social well-being throughout the world. We must continue to act on the belief that the best way to stop the spread of communism is to help rehabilitate themselves. The major problem of Europe is not military; it is economic and psychological. We reaffirm our support of the United States economic cooperation program and urge its larger and more efficient use through UN agencies—

In order to supply the basic necessities of normal existence, to insure full employment and the achievement of a normal balance of trade, and to serve as a more effective bulwark against communism.

We urge the full implementation of the fourth objective stated in President Truman's inaugural address which advocates the sharing of American technology with people living in less well-developed areas of the world. This we do both out of a Christian concern for the welfare of the peoples involved and because such economic development of lands in which hunger and want now prevail will tend toward the economic stability of every other land.

There is growing recognition that economic well-being is a necessary foundation for world peace and security. The UN has made a good beginning in attacking basic world-wide problems. The long-term program of improving food, trade, health, and literacy must have increased appropriations, and only in an atmosphere of trust in the UN can these appropriations be secured. If UN prestige is damaged to any degree, nations—such as the Scandinavian countries—which are really making heroic national sacrifices in order to do such work as the tuberculosis campaign for school children in Europe, will feel that their effort is useless.

The threat of mass starvation can probably be averted only through a united world effort. Possible solution lies within the scope of the Food and Agriculture Organization's activities. The FAO, because of the lack of funds, cannot undertake more than a fraction of the projects requested. Likewise much of the program contemplated for technical assistance to underdeveloped countries could be carried on most effectively and efficiently by such UN agencies, were their budget and personnel enlarged.

It is a fallacy to think that any major world problem can be attacked unilaterally in this day of interdependence. Soil erosion in Australia, forest fires in Maine, irrigation projects in Iran are inextricably tied into the food and health potential of the world; it is impossible to find solutions on a unilateral basis.

SETTLEMENT OF OUTSTANDING ISSUES WITH RUSSIA

3. Since the administration points out that there is no threat of immediate or early war with Russia should not the present time be used for determined and persistent effort to end the cold war and to seek flexible negotiations with the Soviet Union on issues outstanding between the countries—patiently seeking common goals and mutually acceptable compromises?

The Cleveland Study Conference on the Churches and World Order urged that—the avenues of formal negotiation between the Governments of the United States and the Soviet Union must be kept open, and the way should be cleared for informal conferences between unofficial religious, educational, business, labor, and cultural groups of both nations. * * * We believe that the method of tolerance that is basic to conference will enable each to learn from the other, and give opportunity for the extension of this method on which peace in a world of contradictory ideology depends.

4. We urge full-scale conferences at the earliest possible date on German and Japanese treaties.

UNIVERSAL REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

5. The United States should campaign vigorously and persistently for the universal reduction of armaments, subject to adequate international inspection and control. Flexible negotiations for the control of atomic energy must be continued.

FOR A UNIVERSAL SECURITY SYSTEM

6. Only a universal security system backed by an effective force can provide true collective security. We suggest that the United States attempt to get the Atlantic Pact accepted as a part of the United Nations structure under article 51, opening it freely to all who wish to join, and providing for the placing of contingents at its disposal for use in case of aggression, with the decision as to when that aggression exists to be made in some way through the General Assembly, perhaps utilizing the Little Assembly at times when the General Assembly is not in session, but arranging it so that the decision will be made by a simple two-thirds majority of the members of the United Nations.

Used wisely, this pact might be the means of bypassing the Security Council veto so effectively that a modification of the use of the veto might be easily secured. Such issues as the veto are fundamental and must be faced before world confidence is lost.

To the pessimistic who fear that Russia would walk out of the United Nations, let us point out that we have said that again and again about areas of disagreement—for instance, the Little Assembly—and Russia remains a member of the United Nations. Such a facing of issues would bring a torrent of abuse and perhaps such a gesture as Russia made when she left the World Health Organization, but at the worst it could hardly make the situation more difficult than it is.

The primary question facing us is whether we are to put our ultimate faith in the force of arms or in the process of reason. We share the fears engendered by belligerent acts and attitudes of the Soviet Union, but we still feel that a Christian Nation we must continue courageously to explore every possibility of constructive action in the framework of the United Nations before returning to the balance of power strategy.

The alternative of the pact and the arms program cannot at best be looked upon as anything but an inferior alternative. Before an easy acceptance of the pact as the "best under the circumstances we must take time to examine with patience and realism and imagination all alternatives and amendments that could bring it closer in line with the stated objectives of the pact—that of "strengthening the United Nations, deterring aggression, and establishing the sense of security necessary for the restoration of the economic and political health of the world."

POSITION ON RATIFICATION

The CHAIRMAN. On the whole then, are you for or against ratification?

Mrs. BENDER. That is an extremely difficult question to answer. I am for modification of the treaty and its subsequent adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. You realize that the modification would have to be taken up by all the 11 other nations, do you not?

Mrs. BENDER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. You would not ratify it now; you would postpone it and wait to see if we could renegotiate the treaty?

Mrs. BENDER. I would not hastily ratify it; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. So you are against it.

Mrs. BENDER. In substance, no.

The CHAIRMAN. In substance, no?

Mrs. BENDER. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not against it?

Mrs. BENDER. No. I believe that with modification—

The CHAIRMAN. We do not have the modification here. I mean just as the matter stands now, are you for ratification or oppose it?

Mrs. BENDER. Without further adjustment and change in it I would be opposed to its adoption at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you speak for your organization when you say that?

Mrs. BENDER. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Did it pass on that question?

Mrs. BENDER. The executive committee has passed the resolutions which I read.

The CHAIRMAN. So the main body—

Mrs. BENDER. The interpretation of that is my own.

The CHAIRMAN. The main body of your organization did not pass on that?

Mrs. BENDER. The duly elected representatives of the main body, in executive committee, passed on it.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that. But that does not answer my question. The main body never passed on it.

Mrs. BENDER. You mean did the million and a half women in the women's division vote on it individually? They did not. They elected the people who passed on it.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY AND THE UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. You say you oppose military commitments and foreign military aid. By that do you oppose aid to Greece?

Mrs. BENDER. In principle; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In principle? I do not know what you mean by "principle." Do you favor aid to Greece or not?

Mrs. BENDER. Not as unilateral action.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the only kind of action we can take ourselves, is unilateral action. Are you opposed to military aid to Turkey?

Mrs. BENDER. As unilateral action; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think we ought to wait and get the other countries in the world to join us?

Mrs. BENDER. I think it should be done through the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. The United Nations did not do it. It had a chance to do it.

Mrs. BENDER. I do not think we explored that sufficiently.

The CHAIRMAN. You want to think of alternatives. That means the abandonment of this treaty and the negotiation of some other kind of treaty?

Mrs. BENDER. No; it does not mean the junking of it. It would mean the amendment of it. I think our suggestion is for a clear amendment.

CONSISTENCY OF TREATY WITH UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. You speak continually of the United Nations. Does not this treaty, in a number of places, state its view that we want to cooperate with the United Nations, this treaty is being made in subordination to the overriding authority of the United Nations, and that we hope to strengthen the United Nations? Is that not all through this treaty?

Mrs. BENDER. We have mentioned that that is what is stated. We have also pointed out the points at which we think it would actually tend to undermine the prestige.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not agree, then, that this treaty in a number of places affirms its loyalty to the United Nations?

Mrs. BENDER. I agree that it affirms its loyalty. But I feel in practice it actually would work to the disadvantage of prestige.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you recognize this claim of loyalty but you do not believe it is going to be loyal?

Mrs. BENDER. It is not a question of believing it is going to be loyal. It is a question of foreseeing what the actual result will be, which is extremely difficult to do.

The CHAIRMAN. You say: "Is the pact consistent with the United Nations?" Is it not specifically stated in the treaty that it is being urged under article 51 of the United Nations Charter?

Mrs. BENDER. We said in our statement that we believed it was technically in accord with article 51, but that it was not in accord with the spirit of the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. You say "In spite of the statement in the preamble," and so on, there is the likelihood that the prestige of the United Nations will be endangered and that there will be confusion created in the minds of the United Nations.

Mrs. BENDER. That is right.

INCLUSION OF NORWAY IN THE PACT

The CHAIRMAN. You speak of Norway. You question Norway's sincerity in joining the pact. You say:

In Norway, for example, there are indications that the popular fear of being caught in the war has not been alleviated by the pact. This is especially serious, because of Norway's proximity to Russia.

Is it not a fact that Norway's Parliament ratified the treaty by an overwhelming vote?

Mrs. BENDER. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke about your committee being elected by the people, and so on. Is not Norway's Parliament elected by their people?

Mrs. BENDER. Yes. There are two questions involved there.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question involved at all except the one that I asked you, and that is: did not the Parliament of Norway overwhelmingly ratify this treaty?

Mrs. BENDER. The answer to that question is "Yes." I would like to point out though, that the problem that worries me—

The CHAIRMAN. You are not in the Norwegian Parliament. I asked you about the Parliament. You agree that the Parliament did overwhelmingly ratify the treaty?

Mrs. BENDER. Yes. I would like to point out though, that that is not the problem that worries me. The problem that worries me is the choice of alternatives that was presented to the Norwegian Parliament at that point, and the feeling of the people of Norway which at any point could change the decisions and faith in its Parliament.

I think Norway, confronted with a definite worsening of world trust in the United Nations, which was partly brought about by the discussion of the Atlantic Treaty, had very little alternative except to accept the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. They had the alternative of not ratifying the treaty, and the other alternative was to ratify the treaty.

Mrs. BENDER. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. So they considered the alternatives.

ACTION IN THE EVENT OF A COMMUNIST COUP

You refer to a Communist revolution in a country that is a member of the pact, and what is to be done about it. If there were a country that turned Communist, is it not entirely probable and likely that that country would not cooperate any further with the members of the treaty?

Mrs. BENDER. I just am confused at that point. I do not see what the treaty says about what you do, and I would like that further clarified.

The CHAIRMAN. I am just asking you, if a country turned Communist, is it not probable that they would decline, from then on, to cooperate with the other members of this treaty?

Mrs. BENDER. That might be so. Then what do we do? Do we compel them to?

The CHAIRMAN. We will get to that a little later. If they refused to cooperate and not to carry out the treaty, would not the other powers to the treaty not cooperate with them, and let them fade out, let them leave, withdraw, or do whatever they please to do?

Mrs. BENDER. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that not logical?

Mrs. BENDER. I do not know just what would happen in such a situation.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know for certain, but I think I know that.

That is all that I have to ask, I believe.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for your views on this matter.

Mrs. BENDER. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Ewing Cockrell, president, United States Federation of Justice. How long a statement do you have, sir?

STATEMENT OF EWING COCKRELL, PRESIDENT, UNITED STATES
FEDERATION OF JUSTICE

Mr. COCKRELL. A very short one. I have only what might be of interest to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. What is this federation?

Mr. COCKRELL. To promote the successful measures of law administration, the things that work.

The CHAIRMAN. Sir?

Mr. COCKRELL. To promote the successful measures of law administration, the things that work.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members have you?

Mr. COCKRELL. We originally started with 5,000. There is just a national council now.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a council?

Mr. COCKRELL. Ten or twelve.

The CHAIRMAN. So all the authority of this organization is now vested in this council, is that right?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir. I have had to do all the work.

The CHAIRMAN. So after all, you are the council?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am the working member. I may say, we have organized with the endorsement of Chief Justice Taft, Vice President Dawes, Speaker Longworth, and the majority and minority leaders of the Congress on both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. Your organization has shrunk from 5,000 to you?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, not exactly that.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Go ahead.

Mr. COCKRELL. We are working to supply information, to support the American bipartisan peace enforcement policy of President Truman, the United States Senate, and members of this committee particularly. That is our primary work at this time.

I have 10 statements here that I will make one at a time and be glad to answer any questions that you have.

THE TREATY AS AN UNPRECEDENTED STEP

The North Atlantic Treaty, instead of only an incident in the cold war, is an unprecedented step in American and world history. Of all the agreements in modern history to resist aggression in Europe where it is most apt to occur, this one appears to be the most effective yet made.

Its basic character is that today it is the only such agreement among governments to resist force with force that surely binds all such governments.

It is made by the largest number of militarily powerful states that ever joined in advance to resist with armed force, if deemed necessary, an attack upon them.

As preparation for defense against attack in Europe and involvement of the United States, it is superior to any treaty ever submitted to the Senate since the defeat of the Versailles Treaty provisions of the First World War.

It is the only agreement by the United States that it will resist with force, if need be, an attack on European states that would endanger the security or welfare of this country.

It is the only agreement even by all the European states, who have been so repeatedly attacked, that they will hereafter defend each other.

It provides more of the essential first need of peace than all the other proposals put together ever submitted by all governments in the United Nations in its whole history—to wit, the essential of force to defend the peace.

It is the only official notice in advance by the United States to potential aggressors that it will resist their attack and do so enough to overcome it.

It is the only agreement ever officially proposed to Congress that carries out in part the strong, repeated declarations for world peace enforcement made by the President, by the Senate, and 12 individual members of this Senate committee.

To carry out the treaty, Congress and the President are given the extreme range of freedom of action. They have only one limitation. That is that their action shall be what they think will succeed, not action they deliberately think will fail.

The official record on these 10 assertions is plain. A number of them are self-evident or well known. Others that should be stated are the following:

ABILITY OF UNITED NATIONS TO FUNCTION

(a) Lack of UN agreements or proposals for peace:

All pending United Nations proposals for force to maintain peace have, instead of providing such a force, presented three blocks to that maintenance.

That is the result of what Senator Connally mentioned, that they have taken no cognizance, as yet, of the change in the conditions when the Dumbarton Oaks provisions were made, and now: (1) Any state can refuse to furnish any such forces. (2) Even if all furnished, they are too small to prevent war by any of the three great powers now able to wage it. (3) Even if made large enough, their use by the United Nations can be vetoed by any one of the five permanent Security Council members.

To be specific: Suppose the Soviets and all other United Nations agreed today to all the provisions proposed by any government or all governments to maintain peace. The Soviets could then attack all the 12 states in the Atlantic treaty and at the same time legally block the Security Council from using any UN forces, even of the same 12 states to defend themselves against such attack.

(b) United States obligations under the treaty:

These obligations boil down to one thing; that is, for "such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area." What kind of action and how much are solely what may be judged necessary by the Congress and the President, acting under the constitutional powers of each.

FLEXIBILITY OF OBLIGATIONS

The treaty contains no agreement to defend any state. The best assistance to Norway, if quickly overrun by the Soviets, might be to leave it alone until final victory is achieved elsewhere.

There is no agreement to send troops at all anywhere. If Congress, the President, and military men thought best, our assistance might be almost wholly by air and arms to other nations, or any way that Congress and the President thought best at the time.

The legal obligations on the Congress and the President are so little as to make it almost worthless. But there is one moral obligation that makes American agreement supremely valuable to Europe and a peace-loving world. That is that the action taken by us, and others, is to be what Congress and the President deem necessary to restore security of the North Atlantic area. And that obligation on an American Congress and President will bring everything needed for final victory in any war, if war must come.

Right here, I would like to cite as a fine statement of that position the statement of Senator Taft, nearly 6 years ago:

The principal aggression on the League of Nations is how to use our armed force to prevent aggression in the other parts of the world. Insofar as Europe is concerned I believe the only obligation should be the secondary obligation after the council of Europe has made every possible effort and failed.

Many will object to any such undertaking, but I believe within carefully defined limits we should take an active part in maintaining peace. I see no loss of sovereignty in a treaty binding us to send our armed forces abroad on the finding of an international body.

Being sovereign, we could refuse to keep our promises. Being Americans, we would not refuse.

This treaty is fine, and still has not caught up with Senator Taft's announcement of 5 or 6 years ago, that we should send troops abroad on a finding of an international body.

Nothing happens under this treaty, except what the individual Members of the Senate and House and the President deem necessary. It is a very fine treaty, gentlemen, in the way in which it has been drawn.

The extreme extent to which it goes, as I have said, is unprecedented, the only thing yet that says we will go far enough to maintain peace, and yet how much we do, what it has done, is all up to the individual Members of the Senate and the House and the President, provided it is what they deem necessary.

PEACE POLICY OF THE SENATE

This treaty is the first step to provide force to carry out the peace policy of the Senate, the President, and the American people to prevent war. The treaty now makes a fitting occasion for Congress to announce this policy to the world and at the same time to strengthen the treaty by declaring it a first step toward a maintained universal disarmament if the Soviets will so agree.

Nobody could be entitled to precedence over this committee to lead in this announcement. Twelve of its thirteen members have already led in declarations for such a strong international force. Senators Connally, George, Thomas of Utah, Tydings, Pepper, Green, Vandenberg, Wiley, Smith, and Lodge—and Senator Truman—voted for or favored the Connally resolution for "international authority with power to prevent aggression and to preserve the peace of the world," November 3, 1943.

Eighty-five members to five voted for that, and I think everybody on this committee, who was in Congress at that time, voted for it, or avored it, and Governor Hickenlooper favored it later in a declaration which was gotten up.

Senators Green, Thomas, Truman, and Governor Hickenlooper joined in a separate declaration for the same force in 1944. Senator Tydings' resolution, January 28, 1946, was for a similar international force and world disarmament, and it was immediately endorsed by Senators Taft, Fulbright, and Smith. Senator Vandenberg gave such a policy the supreme place in men's lives when he called "an approach to mutual disarmament incomparably the greatest of movements for the common good" if there be "summary disciplines against bad faith"—February 8, 1947, and repeated in substance February 10 and April 25, 1949.

General Eisenhower and Dr. Karl T. Compton and a majority of the President's Commission on Universal Training also gave the same supreme place to the same policy in 1947.

What I think would be of help to this treaty, to the whole country, and to the whole world, would be for this body, the Senate, or the President, to state or adopt a simple resolution like this:

INTERNATIONAL POLICE FORCE

That the bipartisan peace policy of the American people, Congress and the President is for an international force able to maintain world peace and disarmament and, if any state refuses to join in it, for the necessary world rearmament by the other states for protection against its possible aggression.

That the North Atlantic Treaty and all action under it is to be considered as one step to carry out this policy of, first, world cooperation for universal, fully maintained disarmament and peace, or, second, world cooperation for defense against aggression.

That such international force is:

1. The one for which Senator Truman and 84 other senators voted against 5 opponents, on November 3, 1943, for—the establishment and maintenance of international authority with power to prevent aggression and to preserve the peace of the world.

2. The one with the same international authority contained in a declaration of ten peace fundamental policies in which Senator Truman again joined with 65 other Senators, Representatives, Governors, United States judges, former ambassadors, and others on June 22, 1944 (and as printed in the Congressional Record of June 21, 1945, copy annexed).

3. That which is in the resolution for maintained world disarmament of Senator Tydings of January 28, 1946, which was then endorsed in substance by Senators Taft, Fulbright and H. Alexander Smith.

4. The one in the declaration of President Truman on December 2, 1946 for "a sufficient police force for United Nations to maintain the peace of the world" and then "world disarmament."

5. That which is able to maintain the "practical formula for disarmament and the outlawing of war," expressed by Speaker Martin January 3, 1947.

6. That of the former chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Senator Vandenberg, for "summary disciplines against bad faith" of the great powers in "the utmost limits of disarmaments," as expected February 8, 1947 and repeated February 10, 1949 and April 25, 1949.

7. That which will carry out President Truman's declaration for "atomic energy to be placed under international control and on a practical realistic basis that means the control will work," and that: "The fearful power of atomic weapons must be placed behind the reach of any irresponsible government or power-mad dictator," as he so expressed October 14, 1948.

8. That which is in the statement of President Karl T. Compton in 1947 for "universal, progressive disarmament under conditions which will safeguard every nation against threat of military aggression by others," endorsed by him, the chairman and a majority of the members of the President's Commission on Universal Training and by Harry Woodburn Chase, chancellor, New York University; Arthur H. Compton, chancellor, Washington University (St. Louis), Nobel Prize winner in physics; Robert C. Clothier, president, Rutgers University; Joseph E. Davies, member Commission on Universal Training, former Ambassador to Russia; Harold W. Dodds, president, Princeton University, member Commission on Universal Training; Ernest W. Gibson, Governor of Vermont; Truman K. Gibson, member Commission on Universal Training, former civilian aide to Secretary of War, attorney at law, Chicago; George William McClelland, president, University of Pennsylvania; F. D. Patterson, president, Tuskegee Institute; Daniel A. Poling, president, International Society of Christian Endeavor, member Commission on Universal Training, editor, Christian Herald; Charles Seymour, president, Yale University, United States delegate at peace conference, Paris, 1919, former exchange professor at Universities of Brussels, Ghent, Liege, and Louvain; Charles E. Wilson, president, General Electric Co., member Commission on Universal Training; J. Strom Thurmond, Governor of South Carolina; Donald B. Tressider, president, Stanford University.

9. That which has been endorsed in substance by Secretaries of State Byrnes and Marshall, Secretary of War Patterson, ex-President Hoover, Presidential nominees John W. Davis, Alf M. Landon, and Thomas E. Dewey, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, and many other American leaders.

We commend an invitation to all governments to join in a like statement of peace policy.

IMPORTANCE OF DISARMAMENT

With this commendation, we submit the following expressions of the supreme place in the life of mankind given to such a force and disarmament by the following:

General Eisenhower speaks of "agreements whose universal acceptance will one day eliminate the need for armed forces." And says:

Attainment of no other goal could add so much to the tranquillity and prosperity of all mankind (January 17, 1947).

Senator Vandenberg calls—an approach to mutual disarmament incomparably the greatest of movements for the common good (February 8, 1947).

President Compton and 14 associates state:

The inestimable gain to all peoples of the world which would be achieved if a general disarmament program could be put into operation would seem to make this the supreme goal of international effort.

If desired, the following could be added to the resolution:

For the terms of the universal disarmament the resolution to comment (or "submit to the consideration of the United Nations") the proposals of the Soviet Union of 1928-32 for: Universal disarmament down to internal police, to be effected simultaneously by the reduction of all weapons of all states by equal percentages, by an international commission acting by majority vote of all participating states, with the commission to have "every facility for the full investigation of all branches of the activities of the state, of public associations and of private persons 'concerning the observance' of the disarmament 'undertaking,' with each state to make violations of the agreement 'a grave offense against the states.'"

That resolution, if you wanted to, could contain in it its own proof, to recite the declaration first of the Connally resolution, then the President's statement of 1946 for sufficient police for the United Nations to maintain the peace of the world, and then world disarmament. But the force comes first.

The same sentiments were expressed by Speaker Martin, as expressed by Senators Vandenberg and Truman, that no power-mad dictator or aggressive government could take possession of atomic energy plants.

Every proposal on atomic energy in the United Nations now spreads atomic energy facilities over the world, and professes that it cannot stop their use by any adverse government.

I will be glad to answer any questions, by Senator Donnell expressly, or anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe you are a son of a former Senator, Francis Cockrell of Missouri, who served in the Senate?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir; for 30 years.

The CHAIRMAN. You have some distinguished relatives in Texas?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir; I have.

The CHAIRMAN. Red Cockrell, of Dallas, and another Cockrell at Abilene?

Mr. COCKRELL. Uncle Bart served two terms in Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Joe Cockrell was the Dallas lawyer?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. A very distinguished lawyer.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what they tell me.

The CHAIRMAN. A very able man.

Mr. COCKRELL. He was the son of Uncle Bart.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. I was not here to hear much of Judge Cockrell's testimony, but I wonder if the record shows that he himself was a member of the circuit bench of the State of Missouri some years ago?

The CHAIRMAN. That does not show.

Senator DONNELL. I would like to have that shown.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be glad to have that show.

Senator DONNELL. I do not have any questions to ask the judge.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am here primarily for two reasons. One is that this is a first step to carry out the policies that you men have enunciated and expressed, and the President. It is the first one that provides for force.

In the second place, it is a very fine job in itself, the way in which it provides the extreme limit of force, if necessary, and leaves that up to the Senate and to the House and to the President to decide what it shall be.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you, very much. We are glad to have your testimony.

Mr. COCKRELL. Thank you.

(The declaration of peace fundamentals from the Congressional Record mentioned by Mr. Cockrell follows:)

[From the Congressional Record, June 21, 1945, p. 8524]

The CHAIRMAN. Bishop Walls?

STATEMENT OF BISHOP WILLIAM J. WALLS, BISHOP, AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH

Bishop WALLS. I am Bishop William J. Walls, bishop of the New York, New England, and Pennsylvania conference of the church, and United States and Africa, and parts of South America.

The CHAIRMAN. You are the bishop of the Second Episcopal District, African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church?

Bishop WALLS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Bishop WALLS. As an American, whose peculiar people have always made their loyal contribution to the Nation's cause, I feel grateful for this privilege of citizenship accorded me by this august committee.

COLONIAL POLICIES AND THE PACT

Like others, we seek the peace of the world and security of our own beloved America. The North Atlantic Pact, in the judgment of many of us, contains seeds of very grave import, and none more so than its implication for colonials. The situation, bad as it is in the colonies, will be approved and involved in permanency among the colonial nations signatory to the pact agreement.

For instance, if America pledges herself, as the pact provides, to engage in armed force without qualification on this issue, she will be bound to defend any pact nation against any group seeking release or redress of the usurping nation in colonial territory. Had that condition obtained in Palestine, the Jews would have been considered at war against America when they set up the Israeli Government and resisted England's occupation.

What is more, our own American Colonies could not have been helped by France, as we were in the American Revolution, without involving other nations to go to war with us, which would have defeated our cause of freedom.

It is evident that we intend, by the pact, to contain Russia against attack or invasion upon the nations of freedom. What answer can we, the greatest nation of freedom on earth, give to Russia and the world when they hold up slavery, brutality, and even torture of colonials as a picture nestled in the so-called freedom compact, and say, "This is what your capitalist nations stand for."

In Africa alone, 72,320,000 native people, inhabiting a territory of 4,033,858 square miles, live in bondage, made more terrible by centuries of British deception, exploitation, and terror.

It is common knowledge that another of the signatories, the Netherlands, holds in bondage nearly 80,000,000 people in the East Indies and in South America.

A third signatory to the pact, the French Government, continues its attacks on the people Viet Nam and exploits millions of people in its African and Asian colonies.

A fourth signatory, Belgium, holds the people of the Congo in bondage; that is, Belgium and Congo are sufficient.

A fifth signatory, Portugal, controls the destinies and arrests the development of some 9,000,000 Africans in Portuguese Guinea, Congola, Mozambique, Cape Verde Islands, São Tome, and Principe.

A sixth signatory, Italy, is currently struggling in the United Nations—with the support of the other signatories—to partition Ethiopia and reestablish its domain over Libya and Somaliland.

A seventh signatory, our own Government of the United States, maintains a "gold and silver" double standard for its white and Negro employees in Panama and has recently acquired islands in the Pacific, and anticipates with satisfaction the profitable prospect of increasing investments in the exploitative enterprises of other colonial powers. Through the power of its wealth in a near-bankrupt world, our Government itself is fast being tempted to become a colonial power.

It is a matter of historical record that all these colonial powers, all of them members of the so-called North Atlantic community of nations, subverted the mandate system of the League of Nations into an instrument which, far from effecting the gradual elimination of colonialism, actually provided a legalistic cloak for strengthening it.

COLONIAL POLICIES OF SIGNATORIES

It is a matter of record that these very governments have nullified in practice and—in the current debates regarding former Italian colonies in Africa wrested from Africans by the bloodthirsty vandals of our late enemy, Mussolini—seek to continue to nullify the trusteeship provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.

One has only to remember that the expenditures of the Netherlands in their outrageous war against the Indonesians exactly equaled the amount of American taxpayers' money granted the Dutch under the Marshall plan, to realize what may eventuate under the pact.

We face the dismaying prospect of American substance, American arms, and American boys being used to put down the democratic stirrings of peoples who seek today to accomplish the independence and freedom which our forebears could only win in a bloody revolution 173 years ago.

Such a prospect of serving as instruments for holding back the march toward colonial freedom is not a pleasant one to Negro Americans.

I realize it may be said that the terms of the pact limit its application to a territory one of whose boundaries is the Tropic of Cancer, and that the bulk of Africa of which I have made especial mention is excluded from this area.

It is sufficient, however, to note that "By their deeds ye shall know them." The colonial powers which have signed the pact are notorious for their disregard of written commitments. For centuries their pledged word has meant nothing if it interfered with their profitable exploitation of helpless people.

But the darker peoples of the world, living in the main in colonial slums, are no longer helpless. They are pressing their demands for equal status as world citizens. They are demanding the right of self-determination. They are insisting that the riches of their lands accrue to the security of their inhabitants and not to the profits of absentee overlords who despise their culture and abuse their hospitality.

A truly democratic America must show by deeds to the colonial peoples throughout the world and to the Negro people and other minority groups in our land that our Nation understands that there can be no security for any nation or people unless there is freedom and security for all peoples everywhere.

WORKING FOR PEACE UNDER THE UNITED NATIONS

This we can demonstrate best by working and building for peace diligently through the United Nations, which we helped to found under the leadership of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

I do not enter into the intricacies of that instrument, but I have the feeling that many others have, that it can be applied and adjusted to any sort of emergency that might arise.

Because it is my firm belief that the North Atlantic Pact does not in fact do this, I join with those who call for the rejection of this instrument of our foreign policy. As a churchman, who loves his church, his Nation, and its people, I express to this committee my profound conviction that only a covenant that is suffused with the love of Christ's teaching, "Love thy neighbor as thyself"—I know how far this is from practical policy, but I bring this in as a standard that we must keep sight of—can indeed bring to America and to the world the peace which all peoples everywhere work, struggle, and fight for so passionately.

For these reasons, the United States Senate is called upon to reject the North Atlantic Pact, as an honored pledge of this Nation to resume the path to peace, phrased by another great American, Theodore Roosevelt, by "speaking softly and carrying a big stick."

FREEDOM FOR COLONIAL PEOPLES

We should do this also as a signal of our intention to promote the freedom of colonial peoples and extend civil liberties to American Negroes at home.

As a Christian minister, I cannot do other than warn that the chief means for us, as a Christian nation, for defense is the practice of brotherhood, justice, and equality among citizens and nations. I believe it is possible to avoid war with any nation if we cease to think war and cultivate peaceful relationships in spite of the recalcitrance of any one of them.

God has always aided us to victory, and I believe always will, without involving ourselves in dangerous international-league systems, which carried the ancient nations, from Egypt to Greece, down to their ruin.

A pact is no stronger than its weakest nation; and we who join it inherit the weaknesses of the most offending nation.

May the good Lord deliver us from dependence on compacts and save us to dependence on righteous acts.

I may add there, if it becomes necessary in the judgment of the wisest of the nations who, from the inside, may know things that we on the outside do not know, to enter any sort of pact of the kind, may it not be in the wisdom of the Senate, and of this great committee, to do so with reservations protecting ourselves from defending the colonial system, and if possible it would not be necessary for us to be committed to an arms program that will tax our people to carry on warfare for other peoples in their capricious undertaking, such as the Balkans always practiced, and maybe always shall.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, very much, Bishop. It is a very fine statement. I want to say that I sympathize very deeply with the colonial peoples.

However, would the rejection of this treaty be of any benefit or assistance to the colonial peoples?

Bishop WALLS. I believe so. I believe if it were done so, with the understanding that the United States regards that as one of the chief features for rejecting it, that it would cause them to mend their ways, the colonial nations, to become fit to be in a pact of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything in the treaty which binds us to do anything internally for a signatory? Is it not all directed at armed attack by one nation upon another nation?

Bishop WALLS. There is nothing in the treaty that binds us to interfere with the other nations' internal affairs.

But, as I have intimated here, it is very dangerous to join up with nations that have weaknesses, to invite us to protect systems that are contrary to our great national tradition.

AMERICAN ACTION TOWARD COLONIAL PEOPLE

The CHAIRMAN. I do not agree with you there. I do not think the treaty does anything like that.

You speak of the United States aiding the colonial system. Is it not true that at the end of the Spanish-American War that the United States, if it had desired, could easily have incorporated Cuba within our system; and did we not, on the other hand, free Cuba and give her assurance of protection for a long period of years?

Bishop WALLS. That is very true, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not also true that in the Philippines, which we acquired as a result of the Spanish-American War, that we have given them independence and freed them from any colonial control of the United States?

Bishop WALLS. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that not illustrate the American attitude toward these things, that we do not favor colonialism?

Bishop WALLS. The American attitude now may not necessarily be bound by its former attitude that it seems to have had, just as we have changed on the Washingtonian advice of not being involved or entangled in foreign alliances, and on other such American differences from international situations.

When we go out in these complexities, we may expect to be involved in things we did not anticipate, and we are suggesting here that we should enter it with caution, if we enter it at all, and with certain protection against being involved.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that the United States, in the case of the Philippines, since the war, has passed legislation giving them loans and paying their war losses and all that sort of business, even though it is free and independent of the United States?

Bishop WALLS. I wish to be understood, Mr. Chairman, that I am not indicting the United States colonialism, or even imperialism. I say she is tempted. She has a strain of temptation in that direction. And if she enters these compacts, this compact with these other offending nations, that she will have more and more temptation and less and less defense to remain out.

Do you not think so, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think there is any temptation, in the face of our record, and the temper of our people. We are not going to embrace these colonial policies of other nations at all.

Bishop WALLS. Mr. Chairman, I think the main objection we have here is giving sympathy and maybe support—there is support; it involves support—to the colonial system; because we do not stand against it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think this entire committee stands against it. As a matter of fact, however, you have already admitted, there is nothing in the treaty that obligates the United States to do anything within a country.

It is only as a resistance to aggression or armed attack by one nation upon another.

Thank you, very much, Bishop.

Bishop WALLS. You will notice that I have said here, as a firm hope, that if we entered such a pact we would make reservations that would protect ourselves from seeming, even, to be in sympathy with colonialism.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions, thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Bishop.

Bishop WALLS. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Linfield, Young Progressives of America, New York City. How long is your statement, sir?

STATEMENT OF SEYMOUR LINFIELD, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, YOUNG PROGRESSIVES OF AMERICA

Mr. LINFIELD. A few pages, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How many is that?

Mr. LINFIELD. Seven.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the fact that we have heard quite a number of representatives of the Progressives, we hope you will not be too long, because we have their views. I do not suppose you want to conflict with any of the views that have gone before.

Mr. LINFIELD. I shall try not to repeat.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the Young Progressives? Is that a different organization?

Mr. LINFIELD. Yes, sir. It is the independent young people's organization, independent of the Progressive Party, although subscribing generally to its principles and program.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I thought. You are aligned with the Progressive Party.

Mr. LINFIELD. We are organizationally independent of them.

The CHAIRMAN. You elect your own officers but believe in their doctrine?

Mr. LINFIELD. In their general program and policies; yes. The young people of this country who will be asked to underwrite the proposed North Atlantic Military Pact, even with their very lives, have not yet been heard by this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. We are hearing them now. We are hearing them in you.

Mr. LINFIELD. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. You represent all the young people of the United States, I assume, in your statement.

Mr. LINFIELD. I speak, as you know, Senator, for the Young Progressives of America, and only for that organization.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. LINFIELD. The Young Progressives of America is an independent young people's organization—a large number of whose members are veterans of the past war—an organization which, by its deeds, cherishes the memory of the great Franklin Delano Roosevelt. It appears before your committee this morning to respectfully present its views concerning the proposed North Atlantic Military Pact.

REVIEWING QUESTIONS OF THE TREATY

After 2 weeks of testimony by the architects and supporters of the pact, including certain distinguished members of this committee, five major questions remain unanswered, their character spotlighted by hearsay, evasion, or silence:

PROOF OF SOVIET AGGRESSION

First. Does the Soviet Union threaten the national integrity, the national interests, the national existence of the United States? We have anxiously awaited the proof that the Soviet Union bases its internal or external policies on the premise that war is necessary or desirable; that the Soviet Union has entered or proposes to enter military alliances directed against our country; that the Soviet Union has built or seeks to build military bases on our borders, or that it has engaged or seeks to engage in military action against our country; that Mr. Dulles, a spokesman for our foreign policy, was wrong when he stated in Cleveland on March 8, 1949, before the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America:

So far as it is humanly possible to judge, the Soviet Government * * * does not contemplate the use of war as an instrument of its national policy.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you here as an apologist for the Soviet?

Mr. LINFIELD. Certainly not, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead, sir.

Mr. LINFIELD. If you will permit me to complete my statement—

The CHAIRMAN. Go right along.

Mr. LINFIELD. I shall be glad to answer any questions that you may have. I continue quoting from Mr. Dulles:

I do not know any responsible high official, military or civilian, in this Government, or any government, who believes that the Soviet state now plans conquest by open military aggression.

That is from the New York Herald Tribune, March 9, 1949.

No such proof has been offered by any witness before this committee. Without such proof, the major reason for the pact urged by its proponents fails. What then remains is a military alliance directed against the Soviet Union, directed to accomplish the very ends from which it ostensibly seeks to protect us.

COMPATIBILITY OF PACT WITH UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

Second. Does the pact, as the Wall Street Journal has stated, "nullify the principle of the United Nations"?

We have anxiously awaited proof that this pact, covering all the land from the Aleutians to the Mediterranean, from the Arctic to the Tropic of Cancer, is a regional agreement under article 52 of the Charter of the United Nations, or that it is authorized by article 51 of the Charter which preserves the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations.

Reliance upon article 52 has apparently been abandoned; for, if this be a regional agreement, enforcement measures would require Security Council approval under article 53, the very procedure which the architects of the pact seek to avoid.

The proposed pact certainly does not square with article 51, which applies only in the event of an armed attack.

The fact is that the proposed North Atlantic military pact violates the plain provisions of the Charter itself, for it would destroy the supreme power of the Security Council to determine the existence of aggression and threats to peace.

We speak here not as lawyers, but as young Americans who on the very day that the United Nations was born in San Francisco sealed the pledge of world peace there made by embracing the first Russian patrol on the Elbe. The GI's who fought on three continents, and the young people who recognize that the Charter of the United Nations and faithful fulfillment of its obligations is the only guaranty of peace, will not take kindly to its destruction.

These two major arguments, here briefly presented, all of deep concern to the people generally, have already been earnestly pressed before this committee by other witnesses, and apparently already rejected. However, there are three additional questions, all of vital importance to the young people of this country, which have to date been evaded by supporters of the pact.

IMPACT OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE ON UNITED STATES DOMESTIC PROGRAM

First. What is the cost in dollars of the North Atlantic military pact, and what will its ratification mean to the working and living conditions of the young people of the country? This question is of urgent importance to almost 3,000,000 unemployed young people; almost 1,000,000 young people who will leave school to enter the labor market this year; millions of young Negroes who are Jim-Crowded from decent jobs; millions of young women who must work to live; millions of young farmers who are confronted by the dead end of mortgaged farms and share cropping; millions of young people who want to continue school but must instead try to support their families; millions of veterans who live doubled and tripled up; and millions of young people who cannot afford adequate medical care in this richest country of the world.

This is the condition of young America, and we ask: What is the cost of the pact; how will it affect these conditions?

COST OF ARMS IMPLEMENTATION

Secretary of State Acheson has told us that that proposed North Atlantic Military Pact is inextricably tied to its arms implementation. However, he and other Government spokesmen have refused to state publicly the total cost to the American people of the arms program for western Europe.

When Mr. Wallace testified before the committee on May 5, the respected Senator from Michigan is reported to have stated during the course of the questioning that he had not yet been informed of the total cost of the program. Why do supporters of the pact fear to reveal to the American people, who will have to pay it, the total cost of the pact? Why do they want the American people to give them a blank check?

The State Department, in its "peace paper" of May 15, placed the arms cost for western Europe for the coming year at $1,130,000,000. We have also been told that $452,000,000 of this is in surplus arms valued at 10 cents on the dollar—arms which the committee was told on April 21 by Colonel Johnson that the National Military Establishment expects to have replaced. This $452,000,000 means at least $4,520,000,000. But replacement will be at higher prices and more expensive models.

Said the United States News:

Europe in the first year is to get $4,520,000,000 of United States arms, written down to $452,000,000 to calm taxpayers. Replacement cost of arms to be given might be around $8,000,000,000.

Even this, however, the State Department tells us is only an interim program, with programs for subsequent years to be later revealed. Western European signatories of the pact candidly indicate to their people that the total cost of arming western Europe will run to a minimum of $30,000,000,000. The American Government should be no less candid with the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. Where did you get that?

Mr. LINFIELD. This, sir, is from a report of the meeting of the Brussels Union, where it was stated that the signatories to the Brussels Union are of the opinion that they must have 36 to 70 divisions, and they estimated that the cost of arming, at a minimum, each of these divisions would be between 200 and 400 million dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. That did not envisage any contributions by the Europeans. You are putting it all on the United States?

Mr. LINFIELD. No it apparently did, because, as I recall, Secretary Acheson, or one of the early governmental spokesmen before this committee, state that, for each dollar that the United States would contribute, the governments of western Europe signatory to the pact would be expected to contribute $6 to $7 of their own for arms.

IMPACT OF ARMS PROGRAM ON UNITED STATES ECONOMY

Dr. Nourse, of The President's Committee on Economic Advisers, stated on April 7 that our economy, if it is to avoid a sharply lowered standard of living, cannot spend more than $15,000,000,000 for arms, the amount already authorized by Congress. Arms for western Europe is over and above that.

The $15,000,000,000 arms budget is already taking its tragic toll of young Americans. Mounting unemployment, increased speed-up, increased discrimination and denial of civil rights in industry, in the community, and on the campus; no decent housing, inadequate funds for education, a dead end to social welfare—this is the price now being paid by the young people of this country. This is the current American translation of "guns and not butter."

The additional expenditure of tens of billions of dollars for arms will take an even more tragic toll of the working and living conditions of young America. There will be that much less money for houses, for veterans' benefits, for social security, for education, for health. It will bankrupt American youth, further aggravate its unemployment, and torpedo its opportunities for marriage and a decent family life. It offers even more billions of profits for the monopolists of American industry; it offers only insecurity and unemployment for American youth itself. We therefore ask the supporters of the pact: What is the cost in dollars of the North Atlantic Military Pact, and what will be the effect of its ratification on the working and living conditions of the young people of this country?

SENDING AMERICAN TROOPS OVERSEAS

Second. What will be the cost in American lives of the North Atlantic Military Pact? Has our Government made a commitment to send American troops to Europe, and, if so, for what purpose?

Young Americans are entitled to an answer before the pact is recommended for ratification, for it is our young people who will be this country's military ambassadors.

To date, the State Department has coyly avoided a direct reply. Why? The answer is suggested by the reported testimony before the committee of my former commanding general, General Bradley.

The general indicated that American military thinking views the pact as stationing American troops in the heart of Europe to "defend" the nations of western Europe. The general knows that during the past war we never had more than 70 American divisions in the combat areas of western Europe; that Hitler's 300 divisions could not stop the Russians; that, if there is war, 70 divisions would only make a Dunkirk of all western Europe. If this be the plan, then sober people must characterize it now as reckless adventurism, which will sacrifice the future of America, its young people.

If troop commitments have already been made by our Government under the proposed North Atlantic Military Pact, its reason must be sought in the statement of the semiofficial spokesman of the State Department, James Reston. In the New York Times of March 1, he said:

The executive branch of the Government is convinced that some of the western European nations must have military aid not only to defend themselves against external aggression, but primarily to bolster their police powers against their own Communists.

Secretary Acheson further confirmed this purpose in his March 18 press conference and in the State Department white paper of March 19. The State Department "peace paper" of May 15 finally indicates with bluntness the first purpose of arms for western Europe to be the establishing of "individual and collective military strength adequate to control internal disorders."

Therefore, young America should be bluntly told: This pact means you will be sent to Europe to keep tottering, undemocratic governments in power. You will fight young Greeks to protect a king they do not want. You will confront young Frenchmen who will not permit their country to be despoiled or sold by De Gaulle or any Quisling. You will confront young Italians to protect a government which has already made one and a half million of them unemployed. You will look down the barrel of an M-1 at the young men and women of Europe, who with their own blood sealed friendship with us but a few short years ago in heroic resistance against the common enemy.

Young America is entitled to a full and honest answer to these questions before ratification of the proposed pact is recommended by this committee.

INTERNAL REVOLUTIONS AND THE PACT

Senator VANDENBERG. Where do you find in the pact any suggestion of the use of American manpower, or American intervention, in respect to internal revolution?

Mr. LINFIELD. The evil of the pact, Senator, is not in the words of the proposed North Atlantic Pact. It lies in the fact—and has been made abundantly clear—that this pact is tied to arms implementation, and tied, above all, to a policy which, as the State Department paper released last Saturday finally states bluntly, is directed to—and again, if I may quote—"the establishing of individual and collective military strength adequate to control internal disorders."

Senator VANDENBERG. What has that to do with our responsibility to engage solely in resisting armed attack, which must be an external thing before we move in? I just do not follow your logic. I just do not believe that it is fair that you suggest that there is anything in this program which is going to require young America to be sent abroad to fight, to maintain any internal government abroad. I do not believe there is anything even remotely involved of that character.

Mr. LINFIELD. Unfortunately, Senator, the logic is not mine, but that of the architects of the pact. To date, as you know so well, no statement of any governmental spokesmen, notwithstanding the tie-up of the proposed pact to the program of arms implementation, and the clear statement that the latter involves necessary military force to suppress, as it is called, internal disorder, has bluntly stated that American troops will not follow American arms to western Europe.

I am sure that any effort on your part, sir, to propose an amendment on the Senate floor to bar the sending of American troops to western Europe under the pact, under the arms program to implement it, would receive the most wide-spread support.

Senator VANDENBERG. Now you have moved under the broad area of the obligation to resist armed aggression. I can conceive of a situation where, if you have World War III, the Lord only knows where we will all be fighting.

Mr. LINFIELD. That is true.

Senator VANDENBERG. But it seems to me that at this particular point you are, in your own language, bluntly telling the American youth that under this pact he is headed for service in the internal suppression of revolution in Europe. I just do not believe that is so.

Mr. LINFIELD. I am sure that many, Senator, would be glad to have an explicit statement from the State Department that such is not the case.

AMERICAN TROOPS IN EUROPE

Senator VANDENBERG. This question has been raised before. It has never been put in quite the, shall I say, extravagant language that you used. But it has been raised, and I think there ought to be a very definite answer to it, because I think the very definite answer is "No," and if that is the answer I do not see any reason why it should not be definite.

Mr. LINFIELD. That is exactly the position that I am taking, sir.

MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

In the committee hearings on April 27, the question was asked, "* * * Are we going to be expected to send substantial numbers of troops over there [western Europe] as a more or less permanent contribution to the development of these countries' capacity to resist?". Secretary Acheson replied that the answer to that question was a clear and absolute "No."

The treaty does not relate to strictly internal disorders. It is concerned with resisting an armed attack on any of the signatory governments. An internal revolt not aided and abetted by another state would not be an armed attack within the meaning of the treaty. Whether or not external assistance to such a revolt would constitute an armed attack would depend upon the nature and extent of such assistance. This determination, however, would be the responsibility of each individual government and would be made in light of the existing situation.

Senator VANDENBERG. You are going a little further than that, because you are assuming that the answer is "Yes."

Mr. LINFIELD. No. It has been our experience during a number of years of war, sir, that where there are American generals and American planning staffs, American GI's do not tarry far behind. At the present time, in Fontainebleau, there is American participation in the Combined Chiefs of Staff, which will become official, assuming ratification of the North Atlantic Pact by the Senate.

Senator VANDENBERG. I have no quarrel with you for raising the question. Any question that anybody wants to raise about this thing ought to be raised, because it ought to be liquidated in advance. If I am quarreling with you at all, it is because you have answered it in advance "Yes" and I have answered it in advance "No," and I think we should both wait for the official answer.

Mr. LINFIELD. I am sure that any reservation which would be voted by the Senate along this line—that no American troops have been committed or will be committed under the North Atlantic Military Pact—would be the most firm answer that could possibly be given to this charge.

USE OF AMERICAN TROOPS IN INTERNAL DISORDER

Senator VANDENBERG. Again it seems to me you are changing the area which I am discussing. I say that if World War III results, Heaven only knows where the American troops will have to go. The area of our discussion is whether or not there is anything in this pact, or contemplated by this pact, which will send American manpower to Europe to control internal disorder.

Mr. LINFIELD. That is exactly the question, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. And that is the one to which I say the answer is "No" and you say "Yes." I agree that we ought to find out. I think you are wrong, and you probably think I am wrong.

Mr. LINFIELD. I am sure, sir, that the North Atlantic Military Pact is not viewed as a military alliance for World War III, and therefore I cannot most heartily subscribe to the framework in which you have placed the question, with which, of course, I concur. And that is whether under this pact commitments have been made; and if so, for what purpose?

DEFENDING DEMOCRACY AT HOME

Third. Who do proponents of the pact speak with such vigor of our defending democracy overseas, when they do little or nothing to bring it about here?

We ask this, a vital question for the young people of America, in the spirit of the economic bill of rights proposed to Congress by Franklin Delano Roosevelt on January 11, 1944.

Democracy means a useful and remunerative job in industry. But this Congress has turned its back on young workers, on the millions of young unemployed.

Democracy means strong unions to protect young workers. This Congress has refused to repeal the Taft-Hartley law.

Democracy means the raising and selling of produce at a return which will give a decent living. This Congress, with severe impartiality, has no less turned its back on young farmers.

Democracy means civil rights, equality of opportunity, no poll tax. This Senate, in this session of Congress, has shamefully vetoed civil rights.

Democracy means care for its veterans who defended our country with their lives. This Congress remains undisturbed by the approach of July 25, 1949, when the 52-20 provisions of the GI bill of rights expire.

Democracy means decent housing, decent health facilities, the opportunity for marriage. This Congress has legalized rent gouging, refuses to build houses, and does nothing for the health and leisure of our young people.

Democracy means the opportunity for adequate high-school and college education, open to all, in a climate of academic freedom. This Congress is unconcerned about the education of young people—unconcerned with the maintenance of freedom on the American campus.

We therefore ask again, "When will Congress pass such an economic bill of rights? When will this Congress defend democracy—here in this country?"

The coming meeting of the foreign ministers in Paris opens but 1 week from today. We greet this conference because its very convening is a victory for all peace-loving people, because we know that it is taking place against the wishes of the warmakers; because we know that there will be no hot war as long as our Government negotiates around the same table with the Russian Government.

The people of this country, especially its young people, expect much of our delegation to Paris. They expect that no obstacles born of narrow interests will be permitted to block successful negotiations for a unified and democratic Germany, along the lines of the Potsdam agreement signed by President Truman, Prime Minister Atlee, and Premier Stalin.

The five major questions with respect to the proposed North Atlantic Military Pact, respectfully presented to this committee, cast an ominous shadow over the meeting of the foreign ministers. The North Atlantic Military Pact, initiated by our Government, is a dagger pointed at the heart of the conference which can only undermine the chances of its success.

POSTPONEMENT OF RATIFICATION

We, therefore, respectfully urge the committee to accept the proposal first made by Henry Wallace that the proposed ratification of the pact be withheld pending the outcome of the Foreign Ministers' Conference in Paris. Any effort to rush the pact through to ratification at this time can only be interpreted by young people the world over, including young Americans, as a lack of faith in the Paris conference.

The proposed pact is a snare and a delusion for American youth. This committee could best defend the interests and lives of young Americans only by completely rejecting the proposed pact.

The CHAIRMAN. You, in your statement, make the charge of what the cost will be, first in money, and then in lives, if we ratify the pact. What would the cost of a third world war be, in money; do you know?

Mr. LINFIELD. I would assume, Senator, trillions and quadrillions.

The CHAIRMAN. What would it cost in lives?

Mr. LINFIELD. I assume your life, as well as my life, would be in direct jeopardy, as well as the lives of tens of millions of others.

EFFECT OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. Is not this treaty, at least in the views of its proponents, aimed at preserving the peace and preventing World War III, with all of its cost in blood and treasure?

Mr. LINFIELD. My only quarrel, sir, is that in my opinion, and in the opinion of the organization which I represent, it will accomplish the diametrically opposite result.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Wallace, you mean. That is what you mean when you say the views of "my organization." You mean Mr. Wallace's views.

Mr. LINFIELD. No, sir. I do not. I mean the views of the Young Progressives of America.

The CHAIRMAN. You cite Mr. Wallace's views here with approval, in several places.

Mr. LINFIELD. I refer only once to Mr. Wallace's views.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all you need to refer, if you adopt them all. You say Mr. Wallace's views. That is what I am getting at.

Mr. LINFIELD. I do not in any way disassociate myself from the testimony which, as reported, Mr. Wallace made before this committee on May 5.

The CHAIRMAN. You are for it all, of course. That is what I am assuming. What is your business, outside of this organization?

Mr. LINFIELD. I am the executive director of this organization, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a lawyer?

Mr. LINFIELD. I am an attorney.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you work at your attorney's business or work mostly at this?

Mr. LINFIELD. I am an elected official of the Young Progressives of America.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a salaried man?

Mr. LINFIELD. I am, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are here in that salaried capacity?

Mr. LINFIELD. On behalf of my organization.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you a member of Mr. Wallace's staff during the last election? Did you take an active part?

Mr. LINFIELD. During part of the campaign; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The last part?

Mr. LINFIELD. Sir?

The CHAIRMAN. The last part?

Mr. LINFIELD. No. From the date that the Young Progressives were first launched, at a delegate convention of over 2,000 in July 1946, for the past year I have been on the staff of the Young Progressives of America.

The CHAIRMAN. On a salaried basis?

Mr. LINFIELD. On a salaried basis; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You started to work when the salary started?

Mr. LINFIELD. No. I started to work before the salary started, sir.

UNITED STATES OBLIGATION IN EVENT OF A REVOLUTION IN A SIGNATORY

The CHAIRMAN. I wish that you would take this treaty and put your finger on the line or on the clause, or anything else which obligates the United States in anywise to intervene in the domestic affairs of any signatory to the treaty, with regard to internal disorder, internal revolution, or internal disturbances of any kind. Where is that?

Mr. LINFIELD. I have stated, sir—

The CHAIRMAN. You have the treaty there?

Mr. LINFIELD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Put your finger on that. I want to see where you are talking about it.

Mr. LINFIELD. I should be glad to attempt to answer your question, sir. In reply to the question asked before, by the Senator from Michigan, I indicated that the quarrel is not with certain of the clauses of the proposed North Atlantic Military Pact but that the North Atlantic Military Pact is tied to its arms implementation, and that it is part of a policy, the policy of the cold war.

The State Department has explicitly stated—Secretary Acheson on the 18th of March, the State Department White Paper on the 19th of March, and now the State Department Peace Paper on May 15—that the purpose of the arms, the primary purpose is to make it possible to repel internal disorder.

The CHAIRMAN. I am talking about the treaty now. I want you to put your finger on the treaty, not what somebody said about it. You are complaining now at what is in the treaty, but you are complaining of what is not in the treaty.

Mr. LINFIELD. I am seeking to point out, sir—which I believe must be pointed out, because we have been told that, sir, by the State Department—that the arms implementation can not be separated from the pact. There is nothing in the pact, in the words of its clauses, which obligates the United States to go into Europe to suppress internal disorders.

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad to hear you say that, because it is contrary to what you have been contending all the time.

Mr. LINFIELD. I must disagree with that conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. I knew you would. What about the Young Communist League? When did you quit that, if you did quit it.

Mr. LINFIELD. I was never in the Young Communist League, sir, and I resent very strenuously, any effort to change the purpose of this testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not want to change the purpose of this testimony. I apologize to you if I am wrong, but we have some evidence somewhere that the Young Progressives of America is the new name of the former Young Communist League, and will be in straight-line opposition to the pact.

Do you know about the former Young Communist League? You know about it, do you not, even though you were not a member?

Mr. LINFIELD. My impression is, sir, that—at least so I was informed after I was honorably discharged—that some time at the beginning of the war the Young Communist League disbanded.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the war?

Mr. LINFIELD. Some time at the beginning of the war. I may be wrong in this, sir. At least that is my information.

The CHAIRMAN. So that your organization is not the new name for the Young Communist League?

Mr. LINFIELD. Absolutely not.

The CHAIRMAN. How many members—

Mr. LINFIELD. Excuse me, sir. As your inquiry at the beginning of this discussion solicited, in terms of reply, we are a young people's organization, subscribing to the program and policies of the Progressive Party, although organizationally independent of it.

The CHAIRMAN. When you say the purposes and views of the Progressive Party, you mean the views and policies of Mr. Henry Wallace, do you not?

Mr. LINFIELD. I mean the program and policies as determined at elected convention of the Progressive Party in Philadelphia at the end of July 1948.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. LINFIELD. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Paul L. Rhoads. Whom do you represent, Mr. Rhoads?

STATEMENT OF PAUL L. RHOADS, SECRETARY, PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. RHOADS. I am the secretary of the Progressive Party in central Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Are we not going to have any witnesses here who are not Progressives? We have had five or six. We would like for somebody to represent them and not have every member of the party as a witness.

Mr. RHOADS. Will the Senator excuse me if I say that I represent a part of the organization which might be compared with the Daniel Boone aristocracy? The Pennsylvania Dutch section of this country yields farm interests that certainly will bear looking into in regard to the North Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. We do not want to discriminate against the Dutch or the farming industry, so go ahead. By the way, the Dutch enter this treaty.

MR. RHOADS. Many citizens of Berks County in Pennsylvania and myself are opposed to the North Atlantic Pact for the following reasons:

REASONS FOR OPPOSITION TO TREATY

We believe that the North Atlantic Pact can serve only to pollute public opinion on the question of American-Soviet relations. It will prolong the hostile attitude between America and Russia which is costing American workers their jobs, their civil rights, and their American integrity as it appears to a majority of the world's peoples.

We believe that the military-defense program which is presumably to accompany the North Atlantic Pact will kill any hopes Americans and western Europeans have of social-security programs, adequate housing programs, and improved systems of education.

We believe that American industrialists and their representatives in our State Department are developing a mania against communism which in practice only produces more Communists, as in Greece and China.

We believe in the workability of the United Nations Organization because we want it to work, because we want peace. We urge our Senators to oppose the ratification of the Atlantic Pact and to oppose all forms of American foreign policy which seeks to protect the invested wealth of industrial tycoons even at the cost of human lives.

We believe that the inclusion of Italy and Portugal in a regional pact for peace betrays the proclaimed purpose of the North Atlantic Pact. The United Nations recognize Italy as the former enemy of democracy which in the future accordingly shall be deprived of its war-making potential. The signatories to the pact would apparently restore military strength to Italy so that she can fulfill her obligations under the pact. Portugal is not a member of the UN but is considered worthy of membership in the pact: this is also a defiance of the spirit and letter of the United Nations.

We believe that if western Germany were to be enlisted into the North Atlantic alliance, Russia would be forced to register a protest with the UN on the grounds that Germany is again being equipped with a military potential, and is being involved in a treaty which conflicts with the United Nations Charter.

We further believe that the Atlantic Pact, with its cordial consideration of our World War II enemies in unwarranted terms of their defense against aggression (presumably of Russian origin), has further helped to hack to pieces the UN and hopes of world peace. It seems to amount to Hitler and Mussolini having won the war, since they, too, fought Russia and what they presumed was Russian communism in their own countries; or at least Hitler and Mussolini or their ideology have enlisted the democracies in their fight against communism. This was all they could have desired while still in power.

We believe that the North Atlantic Pact will continue the degradation of a majority of the world's citizens by its attempts to maintain strong defenses against the constructive organizings of these same world citizens. The more than 350,000 unemployed in Pennsylvania are being degraded daily by our Congress' failure to enact legislation for human welfare. The Second World War and their present unemployment has set them to wondering if there is not something truly rotten in Denmark, and in Great Britain, Italy, Canada, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxemburg, Norway, and the United States and the rest of these Atlantic Pact countries.

We believe that the Atlantic Pact military expenditures will certainly mean higher taxes to the American wage earners. Dr. Nourse, of the Council of Economic Advisers, told us this recently and he was repudiated by President Truman. Earlier in his budget message President Truman said that more military spending would be ruinous.

The citizens of Berks County, Pa., want peace: they want the UN kind of peace which raises the dignity of all nations and all peoples. We want to feel secure about atomic energy being put to peacetime uses; we want to give jobs to every human who is capable of exerting himself or herself constructively. We want to bear our responsibilities toward all living things on earth, knowing that we have done everything possible to preserve the spiritual and physical dignity of man.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a paid representative of your organization?

Mr. RHOADS. I am not.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. RHOADS. I have been called an idealist.

The CHAIRMAN. You have some occupation, do you not?

Mr. RHOADS. I am a bookkeeper for a restaurant-equipment outfit in Reading.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. Do you have any questions, Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No, sir; thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. You may be excused.

Mr. RHOADS. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Pirinsky? The committee does not expect to hear you. You are not an American citizen. You are a foreigner, and I suppose you represent some foreign interests. But I understand you wanted to protest.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE PIRINSKY, EXECUTIVE SECRETARY, AMERICAN SLAV CONGRESS

Mr. PIRINSKY. Yes, sir. Would you permit me?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir. You cannot go on. I have consulted the members of the committee.

Mr. PIRINSKY. Just 1 minute?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not our policy to hear foreigners. Where do you live, what is your country?

Mr. PIRINSKY. I live in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. I know, but of what country are you a citizen?

Mr. PIRINSKY. I am not a citizen of any country because I have not renewed my citizenship. I used to be a citizen of Bulgaria. I was born in Macedonia when the country was under Turkey.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a citizen of Bulgaria?

Mr. PIRINSKY. No, sir. I am not. I have not renewed my citizenship.

The CHAIRMAN. For the present we will have to decline to hear you, because it is the rule of this committee not to hear foreign witnesses. I have consulted with the committee and that is their decision.

Mr. PIRINSKY. Will you just let me say that I feel that the committee, by this ruling, is violating the constitutional rights of no citizens—

The CHAIRMAN. You have no constitutional rights. You are not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. PIRINSKY. I understand that no citizens have the right to express their views on domestic and foreign problems.

The CHAIRMAN. This committee is sovereign unto itself. We hear whom we please. So I will have to excuse you, sir.

Mr. PIRINSKY. All right, sir. I protest.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Protest. You have already protested. We are protesting against hearing you because you are not a citizen.

Mr. PIRINSKY. I tried twice to be a citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. Sir?

Mr. PIRINSKY. I tried twice to become a citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. And you were rejected? There must have been some reason why you were rejected. I do not care to argue with you. You are excused.

Mr. Howe? How long is your statement, Mr. Howe?

STATEMENT OF REV. LEE A. HOWE, PRESIDENT OF THE BAPTIST PACIFIST FELLOWSHIP, WEBSTER, N. Y.

Mr. HOWE. Eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. You are president of the Baptist Pacifist Fellowship?

Mr. HOWE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the Northern Baptist Church?

Mr. HOWE. The Northern Baptist Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the convention adopt your views, or are you just expressing your own views?

Mr. HOWE. The convention has not acted on the question at all, and I would not be speaking for them at any rate. I represent a small group within the convention.

The CHAIRMAN. You have it headed here as if you represented the whole group. Be as brief as you can, because we are running over-time now.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

This statement is being offered as expressing the general position of the Baptist Pacifist Fellowship, a group of Baptists, predominantly clergy, from all parts of the Northern Baptist Convention and numbering about 500.

The CHAIRMAN. You said a while ago you were not speaking for the specific fellowship. Now you say you are.

Mr. HOWE. I said I was not speaking for the convention.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the body that rules it; is it not?

Mr. HOWE. In the Baptist denomination there are many organizations, independent organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Your group represents 500?

Mr. HOWE. Approximately.

The CHAIRMAN. How many Baptists are there in the United States?

Mr. HOWE. I will have to confess my ignorance as a Baptist. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. You know there are a whole lot more than 500.

Mr. HOWE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. A great many churches have more than 500 members in the local church.

Mr. HOWE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. You want to express the views of 500, as I understand it.

CONTAINMENT OF SOVIET PHILOSOPHY

Mr. HOWE. We base our opposition to the North Atlantic Pact primarily on the ground that it is another attempt to contain an idea by force or the threat of force. The only effective way to stop the spread of an idea, we believe, is to confront it with a better idea. History is strewn with the vain attempts of men to silence a thought by killing the man who holds the thought, or imprisoning him.

We are as opposed to the totalitarian philosophy and freedom-denying practices of Soviet communism as are the defenders of the North Atlantic Pact. We have no desire to see either the philosophy or the practices spread any further. We would like to see the philosophy and practices defeated within those areas where they are now in force. We are opposed to these totalitarian ideas as found in Spain as well as in Russia and Russia-dominated countries. But we are convinced that to try to isolate or restrict the philosophy and practices of totalitarianism by military coercion or the threat of force is not only futile but will, in the long run, encourage and spread the ideas and methods we wish to defeat.

That there are far-reaching military implications in this pact Mr. Omar Bradley, Army Chief of Staff, clearly indicated when, testifying in favor of the pact, he declared to this committee, according to the Time's report, "Our frontiers of collective defense lie in * * * the heart of Europe." He also went on to indicate that the pact was only a step leading to the next step, which would be the furnishing of arms to the other members of the pact. In fact, as has been declared time and again, the pact will be of little value unless it is implemented by such military support.

I am here to say this: We cannot stop the spread of communistic ideas by a military alliance or the threat of the use of military power. Others may legitimately question the military wisdom of sending arms and supplies to countries which, in the event of war, might very possibly be quick and easy victims of Russia; and raise questions about the necessity of supplying men from this country along with the arms; others may debate the constitutionality of a pact which would seem to place our Nation in the position where we can find ourselves at war without an act of Congress; and others may stress the apparent defeat of every nation in an atomic war. I am here to say one thing: We cannot stop communism or the spread of communistic ideas by a military alliance or the threat of the use of military power.

MILITARY ALLIANCES AND CONTAINMENT

For example, the last war was fought to stop and to eradicate the totalitarian ideas and practices of Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy.

We, with the cooperation of totalitarian Russia, defeated both Germany and Italy. But the totalitarian ideas and practices are more widespread now than they were before the war, it seems to me. The economic dislocation, the failure to solve economic problems, the killing off of many of the finest of the youth of all countries, the use of totalitarian techniques and reliance upon force—these make inevitable, no matter who wins the war, the kind of chaos and thinking which encourage the spread of totalitarian ideas. Thus we have large numbers of people in Europe and Asia accepting communism as the way to solve their problems. Another war, even with the defeat of Russia, might witness the triumph of totalitarian doctrine on a world-wide scale.

We have been told that this pact, and the implementation which will follow, will prevent war, and that much I have said is therefore beside the point. If this pact prevents war, it will be one of the first times in history, as I remember history, that a military alliance has ever kept nations at peace for long.

Moreover, a willingness to rely upon war, or the threat of war, in international relations, tends to weaken our support of such peaceful channels of solution as the United Nations; to transfer our economic support from such policies as the Marshall plan to an intensified armament race; to give the peoples of Europe not the security the pact is designed to give them, but rather a sense of insecurity as they see two great powers, increasing their military might and apparently ready to rely upon arms rather than upon discussion.

COMBATING TOTALITARIANISM WITH DEMOCRATIC IDEALS

If we are to prevent the spread of the ideas and practices of totalitarianism, whether those ideas be found in Russian, Chinese, Spanish, French, Argentinian, or other American minds, we must combat them with the ideas and practices of democratic philosophy. This means that we must give our support to every measure in this country which makes our Nation more democratic, as for example, in the spreading of civil rights to all people in all parts of the nations; that we must help the peoples of Europe to find economic security, and a sense of freedom from the threat of war, and do so without depriving them of any of the freedoms we associate with democracy; and it must also include progressive reduction of armaments.

It will be told that this is idealistic and impractical, that we must fight fire with fire, that there is no possibility of talking any other language than that of force when dealing with a nation which puts so much of its confidence in military might. Speaking as a realist, I contend that we cannot defeat an idea by winning a military war; that we do not fight fire with fire, we fight it with water; that Satan is not cast out of Satan; and that to talk with Russia only in the language which Russia uses best is to fail to educate Russia or the rest of the world in the language which must be used if we are to have peace.

In saying this, I believe I have the support of great numbers of Christians and I know I have the support of many of the church leaders who attended the study conference on the churches and world order in Cleveland, March 8 to 11 of this year. That conference, while they took no final action on the North Atlantic Pact since the text was not available, made these, among other statements:

No defensive alliance should be entered into which might validly appear as aggressive to Russia, as a Russian alliance with Latin America would undoubtedly appear to us. * * * Regional pacts may make for common security and welfare provided * * * they pursue this interest in ways that do not jeopardize world community. * * * Regional military alliances are, of course, no substitute for the relief of human distress.

History indicates that the most that can be achieved by military alliances is a temporary balance of power, while they easily give rise to menacing armament races ending in war. The tragedy of our times calls for heroic efforts in new directions. We must increase our efforts for the universal reduction and control of armaments, and, more, we must launch "bold new programs" looking to the general elevation of living standards throughout the world, and the assurance of a fair chance in life to all men regardless of race, color, creed, or nationality.

The North Atlantic Pact is not a "bold new program."

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir. You do not want to see another war; do you?

Mr. HOWE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The purpose of this treaty, according to our view, is to try to prevent another war. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. You are excused.

Mr. HOWE. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The next man is Mr. Peters, who will take 5 minutes, I believe he said.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT H. PETERS, JR., OF SPRINGFIELD, PA., FOR PEACEMAKERS

Mr. PETERS. Yes, sir. My name is Robert H. Peters, Jr., and I am a student at Swarthmore College. I have spent a year and a half in the Army on an enlistment, was discharged in 1948.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you speak for yourself or for an organization?

Mr. PETERS. I speak for an organization.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the organization?

Mr. PETERS. The organization is Peacemakers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Peacemakers?

Mr. PETERS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that local to Swarthmore?

Mr. PETERS. It is a national organization, with headquarters in New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Swarthmore is a Quaker university; is it not?

Mr. PETERS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. I have high respect for the Quakers. They are a great people. Go right ahead.

Mr. PETERS. Peacemakers represents approximately 500 people who take a radical pacifist position. The organization as such advocates civil disobedience as individuals see fit to practice in accordance with their conscience. More than 50 members of the organization of draft age have conscientiously refused to register under the draft act and are now in prison as a consequence of having taken that action.

The first part of my statement, which I will not read but summarize, points out what Peacemakers considers to be irrelevant arguments as to the Atlantic Pact.

It considers irrelevant that the Atlantic Pact will be inexpensive because, indeed, if the Atlantic Pact achieves what it states it will do, it would be very cheap at half the price.

INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY AND CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

Peacemakers is an organization representing an increasing number of persons who believe that the only real solution to the fundamental problems of our time—economic, political, social—lies within the individual. Only insofar as each person becomes aware of his ability and responsibility within his community, his country, and his world, will there be peace in our time and, more important, the freedom and security which are the sine qua non of a peaceful society. Peacemakers is devoted to the principles of individual freedom, and to non-violence in every aspect of life. Far from Tolstoian passive resistors, we are aware of the economic and political implications of civil disobedience as manifested in the Gandhian movement in India. We remember the use of noncooperation as a military weapon by the people of the Ruhr in the 1920's. Such techniques have been social forces in our own history, the Boston Tea Party, the Underground Railway.

Our conviction that the essence of democracy is individual responsibility combined with open and nonviolent resistance to injustice has led more than 50 Peacemakers of draft age, as I previously mentioned, to conscientiously refuse to cooperate with the Selective Service Act of 1948. Most of these men are now in prison. I make these remarks to give you an understanding of our organization and to indicate that our opposition to military force and the philosophy of diplomacy which the Atlantic Pact embodies is not empty talk, but rooted in a way of life, and in our day-to-day activities.

CRITICISMS OF THE TREATY

There is not one of us here who disagrees with the purpose of the North Atlantic Pact, insofar as the purposes are outlined in the preamble. The question is whether the pact will, in fact, achieve those ends.

1. There are those who consider the treaty incompatible with the UN Charter (especially articles 51, 52, and 53). Some of these persons favor the treaty, others are opposed to it. Each in turn, and according to his acuity, seeks and finds legal loopholes. Peacemakers agrees with Secretary of State Acheson that this is essentially not a legalistic question, for if the pact were indeed to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area, it would necessarily be a bulwark to the UN.

2. There are those who worry that the treaty violates Anglo-Russian and Franco-Russian pacts of 1942 and 1944. It seems strange that some who hold this position are trained observers of diplomacy, yet who have not learned that treaties are a reflection of the present situation, that they will carry through time only inasmuch as they are flexible or the situation remains static. Thus the Monroe Doctrine was more or less strictly interpreted for a century and only recently, with developments placing our eastern security boundary, we are told, first at the Atlantic Ocean, then at the Rhine, and just recently at the Elbe, do people come to realize that political doctrines and treaties, like all things, must keep up with the times if they are to survive.

3. There are those who complain about the cost of the pact and the projected arms aid to Europe. Peacemakers wonders that a Government spending thirty billions of a forty-billion budget on war-incurred expenses—past, present, and future—could not find a place for one or two billions in the name of peace—if the pact really offered promise of this.

The Peacemakers, who are now refusing to pay income taxes which are devoted to war preparations, would be among the first to offer money and services for a truly constructive peace program.

4. Finally, Peacemakers has a little sympathy for the Russians who complain that the North Atlantic Pact would violate the already many time Soviet-mutilated Potsdam and Yalta agreements as it has for the Americans who proclaim the unconstitutionality of the pact. These persons would do well to remember that a strengthened UN or world government has, and will, necessitate far broader interpretations of constitutional provisions than the extremely agreeable "action as (each) deems necessary" clause in the North Atlantic Pact.

CRITICISM OF THE OPPOSITION TO THE TREATY

Peacemakers offers these arguments against opponents of the pact in order to clarify its own position. We consider such opposition specious and irrelevant, for it neglects the fundamental question of whether the pact will fulfill its purpose and what, in fact, it will really accomplish. It is on these basic issues that Peacemakers challenges the Atlantic Pact.

THE PACT AND COMMUNISM

I. The Atlantic Pact is an attempt to check and halt communism. Peacemakers submits that the pact, its long and short run effects, the philosophy which engendered it and will probably accompany it in the future, is fallacious. The pact will strengthen communism in its stronghold, Russia, in its outlying satellites, and in the rest of the world. I know that I, were I a Russian youth, no matter how I should dislike or distrust Stalin and the Politburo, could not fail to be impressed, during the past 3 years, by the way in which the United States led western powers were doing just what Stalin and Marxist thinking predicted would—economically, politically, militarily.

I should feel toward the atom bomb the apprehension the Americans were made to feel about Czechoslovakia. Talk of United States arms flowing into Europe would arouse in me the anger that Americans felt toward the Berlin blockade. How long will it take us to realize that when we defend ourselves, it necessarily looks like aggression to the Russians, and when they defend themselves right back, it seems from our side as though they were aggressing. Senator Jenner has rightly said that the pact would make us no new friends and might alarm our potential enemy. Senator Taft, I understand, feels that sending arms to Europe is going too far, that it might be interpreted as an act of hostility by the Russians. What does he, and what do you think the Atlantic Pact itself must look like from the other side? And our toying with Fascist Spain? And our recent decision to end Japanese reparations to speed their recovery as a barrier against communism? Russia made a so-called peace offer earlier in the year. We do not make treaties outside of the UN, we said to Stalin. He probably was not fooled, but I am more concerned about the peoples of the world who might have agreed with us then, but who now see us, on our own initiative, proposing to operate beyond the bounds of the Charter. There are Europeans, and Russians, who are coming to believe that we do not really want to end the cold war, and I do not know how we are going to convince them that we do as long as we continue our about faces.

What we must realize is that a big stick policy is not going to scare away or stave off communism. It will find a big stick of its own and shake it right back at us. China and southeastern Asia are looking more and more like a mighty big stick.

THE PACT AND SECURITY

II. The Atlantic Pact, while purportedly holding back communism, is at the same time an attempt to bring peace, security, and stability to the North Atlantic area.

Peacemakers considers it ill-advised statesmanship which thinks that an armaments race is going to bring peace to the world. During the last 4 years, possessing the atomic bomb, we have been immeasurably stronger than Russia, but we have never stopped trying to be still more powerful. What will happen when Russia, too, has the atomic bomb? We might consider whether action now, international control at the cost of a compromise, might not be wisest policy. In an armaments race it is always later than we think. The Atlantic Pact will not stop the race—it is but one of the measures taken by one of the contestants.

Peacemakers feel that one of the most dangerous trends today is the increasing distance between governing and the governed, but an accompanying increase in influence by the former. The secret negotiations of the Atlantic Pact, and the recent legislation put through Congress with a request for minimum discussion are examples.

Such things are expedient, but expediency is not a measure of freedom. The point is not our advantage of the totalitarian countries, but rather the fact that we have less liberty today than we did a year ago and that we will probably have less tomorrow than we have today. I, and other individuals, representing organizations, may talk with you around a table, but Peacemakers is alarmed that the Atlantic Pact, both here and abroad, is essentially a treaty which vitally concerns people, but is being negotiated by governments among governments. You have recently read in the New York Times of the Indian statesman who said that plows and not guns would stop communism in Asia. The people of Europe are more afraid of another war than they are of communism. And I am not convinced that the people of this country believe that our boundaries are now on the other side of Paris—or that saying that they are is the way to peace.

THE PACT AND SECURITY

In the last analysis Peacemakers feels that the pact will not diminish but only increase the support for communistic governments abroad, and tends to support the kind of measures which lead to authoritarianism here at home as well as in the rest of the world. I refer to the measures necessitated by the continued stock piling of atomic bombs and biological weapons, to the continuance of peacetime conscription, huge military expenditures, the support of undemocratic countries as bastions against communism.

More allies and bigger guns has never prevented a war. At best it means a postponement until both sides are more capable of destruction. More important than this is a fundamental psychological reality. For the past 4 years we have been seeking national security. Since the bomb exploded over Hiroshima, only insecurity has increased. Attempts to produce peace by threat, violence, and counterviolence seem necessary but we end up more fearful than ever. All the guns this country can built will not make us, or the Europeans any safer. They fear the Russians, they are dependent upon us, and they dislike equally the walls of this vise. The Atlantic Pact means more pressure, not a relaxing of the military and psychological squeeze. Every time President Truman says we will drop an atomic bomb if necessary, the American people feel no false joy, for they realize that we can expect only similar treatment from the enemy.

In a very real sense, gentlemen, the Atlantic Pact is the atom bomb of the cold war. It is as ultimately futile a departure from the UN and peace as nuclear fission is from gunpowder; as far as human security and happiness is concerned. It will delineate more clearly than ever the split between east and west, and make it harder than ever to bridge. Henry Wallace and his friends urge that ratification of the treaty be postponed beyond the meeting of the foreign ministers. It follows that cooperation may be expected at the meeting. Peacemakers feels it extremely unwise to think that brandishing a ratified treaty will make agreement here, or anywhere else, more possible.

In summary, then, the Atlantic Pact is the closest thing to a battle cry and the farthest from a peace offering that has yet taken place since World War II. Peacemakers therefore considers it anything but a sign of progress or a goal to be desired.

From what we know of history, the only effect such a move will guarantee is a countermeasure. Instead of giving a breathing space for a real peace settlement, such a show of power as the Atlantic Pact only increases the tensions on both sides, necessitates measures which limit the freedom we are trying to protect and maintain, strengthens the enemy instead of making him weaker, and destroys us as we are forced to become more like him. However defensive it may seem to us, the Atlantic Pact will sow the seeds of violence and power, and our harvest shall be fear and hate.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, young man. You may be excused.

Mr. PETERS. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Carolyn Hill Stewart.

STATEMENT OF MRS. CAROLYN HILL STEWART, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mrs. STEWART. I am a housewife in Washington, D. C. I represent no organization. However, as the mother of a son of 5, I feel that I represent the unorganized mothers of America.

Under the North Atlantic Pact, the United States of America is to become the political and military ally of certain European nations among whom are Britain, France, and the Netherlands. Britain, France, and the Netherlands are nations having colonial possessions in which the urge of the native peoples for self-determination and freedom from exploitation have flared already into sporadic rebellion and open warfare. The Dutch are even now at war with the native peoples of Indonesia while elsewhere in Asia, in Africa, and the East, the rumble of dissatisfaction with the status quo gives warning that further and more volcanic eruptions are to be expected in these so-called unenlightened or backward areas of the world.

THE PACT AND COLONIAL POLICY

On May 14, 1949, the State Department's release on the arms aid corollary to the North Atlantic Pact stated that "defensive strength in the hands of nations of peaceful intent does not lead to war." The past and present record of Britain, France, and the Netherlands when faced with the desire for freedom by native peoples long subject to their domination is bloody and cruel and reveals that the peaceful intent of these signatory countries is in inverse ratio to the degree of their desperate self-interest and tenacity of their grip upon the lands and lives of these native peoples.

Prior to these hearings on the North Atlantic Pact, our newspapers carried the announcement that certain signatories of the pact, among them Britain, France, and the Netherlands, would ask jointly for American armaments under the North Atlantic Pact. Assuming this statement to be true, it follows, therefore, that arms for any one of these nations will be arms for all.

Any pretense of refusing arms aid to, let us say, the Netherlands would be farcical while arms were being sent those nations party to the Atlantic Pact and their own joint arms agreement. Any sanctions invoked by the United Nations against any one of these nations could be aborted unless directed against them all.

In its May 14th release the State Department made it clear, also, that "aggression" as used in the North Atlantic Pact would be defined as covering internal communistic revolutions as well as outside attacks. Thus do we find those who ratify the pact committed to interference in the civil affairs of member nations and their colonial possessions subject only to a "gentleman's agreement" that the red label be applied first.

QUESTIONS ON THE ATLANTIC PACT AND COLONIES

In view of the aforementioned matters, we of the United States need ask ourselves these questions:

1. Is it possible under the North Atlantic Pact and its arms aid corollary to prevent the defensive weapons of western Europe from being used against the native peoples of Indonesia, Indochina, Africa?

2. As possible coadministrators with Britain, France, and Italy of lands raped by Italy prior to World War II, as advisers, administrators, and military occupants of areas unsettled by World War II, as dispensers of the European recovery program, of Greek and Turkish aid, with the ratification of the pact and its arms aid corollary, do we not become a colossus astride the world? Are we not, then, so hopelessly entangled and so completely indentified with the Caesars, the Napoleons, and the Kiplings of this world that we are rendered utterly ineffectual as active champions of freedom and democracy for all peoples?

3. Will not the entanglement and indentification which becomes definite and official with the ratification of the pact and the passing of its arms aid corollary force the exploited, dominated colonial peoples of the world to turn to Russia and communism as the only hope of succor?

4. Even when the native peoples of colonial possessions receive neither internal nor external aid from Russia, will not our own need for self-justification lead us to echo blindly the cry that any strong native movement for freedom or for change in existing government is Communist-inspired, Communist-dominated?

(a) Are we not forced, therefore, into a protective pattern of lip service to our ideals of freedom and democracy while we supply arms to those who can and will use them to suppress freedom and democracy in vast areas of the world? However beautiful our present intentions, do we not become, then, the greatest liars and hypocrites the world has ever known?

5. Is the taking of sides in a civil war or the military support of an undeclared war on native peoples any less a war than that which might conceivably take place between a western European nation and Russia?

6. Is it not probable that the gravest danger of war lies not in Europe, but in Asia, Africa, and the east?

If there be among us men with the vision of the Prophet Isaiah and the wisdom of Solomon who can assure us that we have a special dispensation from God that will protect us from the blunders of ignorance, prejudice, incompetence, avarice and greed within ourselves; and, if these men can say with authority that this divine providence will lead these nations of peaceful intent to use the defensive guns we give them in offensive action against no peoples' struggle for freedom—then, let us ratify the North Atlantic Pact and pass its arms aid corollary straight away.

If these latter day Isaiahs and Solomons can further assure us that the questions I have asked are intellectual or emotional meanderings that have not and will not arise in fact nor be answered in our sons' consciences and blood, then, indeed, let us act with speed amid prayer and rejoicing.

THE PACT AND WAR

But if there are no Isaiahs and no Solomons, and if our only assurance is to be found in collective huddling, the power and weight of arms, and the peaceful intent of nations of known frailty, then let us ratify the pact and pass the weapons fully realizing that we do so, not as a show of strength but as a revelation of fear and weakness.

Let us ratify the pact knowing that the end of this act is not peace but war—declared or undeclared—the price of this act, not the dollars and cents, but the years through which we the peoples of the world must pass until we have faced issue by issue those problems we now deny or evade. Let us act knowing that we will pay our debt of blood and turmoil, of divided consciences and confused loyalties until some people, somewhere, sometime win through to the strength to be found only in positive action inspired by and directed to extending to all, the freedom and democracy we now profess.

The CHAIRMAN. As the treaty stands, are you for ratification or opposed to it?

Mrs. STEWART. Opposed.

UNITED STATES COLONIAL POLICY

The CHAIRMAN. Speaking of colonial areas, the United States has no colonial areas. At the end of the Spanish-American War, did we not decline to take—and we could have—Cuba within our control, but that we gave Cuba her freedom and guaranteed her freedom?

Mrs. STEWART. At the end of the Spanish-American War we had not considered ratifying the Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all, if you cannot answer the question any better than that.

Mrs. STEWART. We had not.

The CHAIRMAN. I know that. I just asked you if that was a fact.

Mrs. STEWART. It is a fact.

The CHAIRMAN. That we did give Cuba her freedom and guaranteed it for many years?

Mrs. STEWART. We did.

The CHAIRMAN. In the case of the Philippines, which was our possession and our territory, did we not voluntarily liberate her and give her her independence.

Mrs. STEWART. We did. But I would like to say this: I do not speak here of what we did at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. I know.

Mrs. STEWART. What is to happen in the future is not necessarily—

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know anything more about the future than the rest of us do.

Mrs. STEWART. That is why I raise these questions.

The CHAIRMAN. You judge the future by the past. Has not the United States, since World War II, passed legislation that aids the Philippines, grants them homes, war damages, and a lot of other legislation that shows our sympathy for what might have been termed a "colonial area," but which we did not recognize as a colonial area?

Mrs. STEWART. But does our sympathy assure the colonial peoples of the sympathy of Britain, France, and of the Netherlands?

The CHAIRMAN. You cannot put your finger on anything in the treaty that says anything about intervening with the internal affairs of any country?

Mrs. STEWART. It is not the things that are written that we have to fear; it is the things that are not.

The CHAIRMAN. What are we ratifying? Something that is written or not written? Are we reaching in the air and ratifying it? The treaty is in writing, before you. You know what is in the treaty. You read it; you understand it. We are ratifying the treaty. We are not ratifying your imagination.

Mrs. STEWART. But in a document in which the wording is so written that it can be interpreted by later groups of people to mean a different thing—

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the case with this treaty. I thought you said in one of your statements here that you had not made up your mind.

Mrs. STEWART. Since the State Department release of Saturday, May 14—

The CHAIRMAN. On April 28 you said, in a statement made at that date, that you did not know how you stood, whether you were for it or against it.

Mrs. STEWART. Since the State Department release of May 14 I have made up my mind.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mrs. STEWART. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will recess until 10:30 tomorrow morning.

(Thereupon, at 1:50 p. m., the committee adjourned, to reconvene Tuesday, May 17, 1949, at 10:30 a. m.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

TUESDAY, MAY 17, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to adjournment on May 16, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), Green, Fulbright, Vandenberg, and Wiley.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emerson.

How long is your statement, Mr. Emerson?

Mr. EMERSON. Six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is commended to the attention of all other witnesses.

STATEMENT OF E. A. EMERSON, MIDDLETOWN CITIZENS COMMITTEE, MIDDLETOWN, OHIO

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Emerson, you represent the Middletown Citizens Committee, Middletown, Ohio?

Mr. EMERSON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell what your business is and where you live, and give your name to the reporter.

Mr. EMERSON. My name is E. A. Emerson. I am acting as honorary chairman of the Middletown Citizens Committee, of Middletown, Ohio. That is a small city of about 35,000 lying about 30 miles north of Cincinnati.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a citizens' committee on what, just a general committee to which they refer everything?

Mr. EMERSON. This committee was organized, Senator, early in 1946 to arouse public opinion for strengthening the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. EMERSON. There are Middletowns in all parts of America, and I imagine a good deal like the one I speak for. Our particular committee has had the formal support of the citizenry of Middletown in very complete measure. I list at the back of this statement 34 organizations which have formally approved the committee's program, and I believe its membership represents a good cross section of a representative small city in the Middle West.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. EMERSON. There are 167 granite crosses in our cemetery to the Middletown boys killed in World War II. There are about half that number erected to the local boys killed in World War I. Just 3 years ago, in May 1946, the citizens of Middletown, assembled in town meetings, decided that they did not wish to repeat three times in one lifetime the same tragic mistake. Twice they had sat on the sidelines while their country drifted into war. This third time they saw the same drift developing again. They decided that this time they want to be on their feet doing something about it.

We started raising local sentiment in favor of putting teeth in the United Nations so that it could do the job it was set up to do.

STRENGTHENING THE UNITED NATIONS

We discovered very early that the only real obstacle in the way of that reasonable course is the destructive and effective sabotage of the Kremlin dictators. Our community commenced to awaken to the fact that in some way that implacable Kremlin sabotage of world peace plans had to be stopped. (In 1946 that feeling was not as general in Washington as we hope it is now.) Our efforts to arouse an awareness to this fact in our part of the country spread faster and farther than we had expected, aided by some very helpful counsel from Members of the Senate and, of course, aided to a very great extent by the continuing vicious attacks of Vishinsky and other Kremlin spokesmen, and by the killing vetoes the Kremlin imposed on 30 UN majority decisions.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt you there and ask you a question? You say "aided by some very useful counsel from Members of the Senate." Do you mean the Senators from Ohio?

Mr. EMERSON. We had discussions with Senator Taft; also the privilege of a conference with Senator Vandenberg.

The CHAIRMAN. I am speaking about Ohio. I know Senator Vandenberg; he is all right. Were your Senators for it or against it?

Mr. EMERSON. I am unable to say at this moment. They were for our program of strengthening the United Nations at the time we presented it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator VANDENBERG. I would like to say that I have not discussed the Atlantic Pact with Mr. Emerson or his associates, but I have been long interested in the very unique adventure which the Middletown Citizens Committee represents, and I highly commend its patriotic purpose and its anxiety to do something in behalf of practical citizenship and patriotism.

Mr. EMERSON. Thank you, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a very laudable enterprise if you can work it out.

Mr. EMERSON. I am just back, Senator, from an extended trip in South America, and I have not had an opportunity to see Senator Taft since my return. I hope to soon.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Bricker is also from your State.

Mr. EMERSON. Yes. He was with us Sunday, but we did not have a chance to discuss this.

Our community expressed itself in 1946 through its citizens' committee's pamphlet, Crossroads Middletown, as believing firmly that disaster will overtake our American way of living unless the democratic powers take the initiative from the Kremlin dictators and use initiative against them in the critical years immediately ahead of us.

A program for doing this is outlined in this present pamphlet which the citizens of Middletown published at their expense this year and which I have asked Mr. O'Day to place on your desks and enter for the record. This is the third one Middletown citizens have published.

As stated in this pamphlet entitled, "Who Called a Spade a Spade in 1948?" Middletown believes the Atlantic Pact is the immediate means of stopping the sabotage of the Kremlin dictators, and in strengthening the UN so that it can keep our peace. We also point out our belief that as the pact countries arm themselves for their own mutual self-defense they should take steps to strengthen the United Nations itself so that eventually it will be the United Nations and not the North Atlantic countries that will police world aggressors.

Our group feel that one point has not been sufficiently stressed in statements on this subject, namely, that the Kremlin dictators must be stopped before they acquire their atom bomb plants. After they have acquired their supply it will be too late, because in addition to atom bombs they will also have one other invaluable weapon that we can never equal—the ability to move swiftly without forewarning and to attack us by surprise and deceit. This consideration we feel is all-important. It means that to be effective, our action must be now.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

The Atlantic Pact, we believe, offers us the only basis possible for prompt action. Through the Atlantic Pact, properly supported and implemented, the Kremlin dictators can be faced by a weight of defensive strength great enough to make it manifest that a Russian attack against that combined strength would lead to sure defeat.

If this fact is established and then dramatized to the Kremlin dictators and, even more important, also to the Russian people, we feel it entirely probable that either the will or the ability of the men in the Kremlin to act aggressively can be curtailed and their present determination to equal us in the colossally expensive effort of atomic bomb production can be blunted or turned aside.

We have heard much talk to the effect that we should stop the threat of Soviet communism by the use of ideas rather than the use of strength. We know no place where communism has really become dangerous except where it was supported, directly or indirectly, by the use or threat of Soviet military strength. In our opinion, it is the Kremlin's military might that we must check. Only then can our good ideas and ideals have a clean soil in which to grow. Only then can the United Nations act as the peacemaker we all intended it to be.

Few Americans want a preventative war—and no Americans want the horror of atom-bombed American cities. We are inevitably drifting toward one or the other of these disasters unless we take the one alternate course open to us now.

The first and all-important step is to ratify the Atlantic Pact. We earnestly urge that you do so.

THE PACT AND THE CHARTER

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much for your very fine and splendid statement. I want to say, however, that strengthening and modifying the United Nations Charter has long been the objective of most of the members of this committee, if not all of them, as well as the Senate. A resolution which the Senate passed in 1948 had as one of its objectives to strengthen and improve the United Nations, and when we met at San Francisco and adopted the Charter it was with the theory, at least, that the great nations would cooperate in making the United Nations Charter work. Of course, you are familiar with the fact that for 30 times the purposes of the United Nations have been vetoed, arrested, and prevented by the action of a single power.

Mr. EMERSON. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. And we are still bent upon that purpose. The fact that we endorse and adopt this particular North Atlantic Pact in no way lessens our responsibility and desire to improve the United Nations Charter itself, and throughout the North Atlantic Pact, if you recall, it is over and over stressed that the North Atlantic Pact is not to be in conflict with the United Nations but supplementary thereto and as an aid, in a way, to the activities of the United Nations. Is that not true?

Mr. EMERSON. It is. And as we studied this subject, Senator, it seemed to us very definitely that the North Atlantic Pact is the implement which can again put on the main line the United Nations that was derailed by the Soviet vetoes, and this pamphlet of ours, which you may have an opportunity to glance through, which was published early this year, develops one plan that we have worked out for the Atlantic Pact to react on a strengthened United Nations. In essence our idea would be to so implement that Atlantic Pact that it can operate on a majority-decision basis, where the UN cannot. As the Atlantic Pact is made to operate successfully, its strength can then be welded into the structure of the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. We want to do that. We have undertaken to do that insofar as we can in this treaty. Of course, it is not all-encompassing.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No question.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wiley?

Senator WILEY. I am sorry I wasn't here to hear all of your statement. I have no questions.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much. We think you had an admirable paper and represent the views of your citizens very faithfully and clearly.

Mr. EMERSON. Thank you, Senator. I will be glad to so report.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection we will put the statement of the witness in the record.

(Statement, Who Called a Spade a Spade in 1948? appears in the printer's copy of this record, as follows:)

WHO CALLED A SPADE A SPADE IN 1948?

MIDDLETOWN DID * * * IT STILL DOES. LET'S GET ACTION * * * IN 1949

The Berlin blockade is just one example of Russian aggression. Daily our gallant airmen supply Berlin with the necessities of life over Moscow's vicious blockade. At this writing, 37 of our men have died—meeting that threat—and western Berlin's factories work only part time. Our airlift is not the final answer.

An effective world authority is the answer. We have the beginning of such an authority—it is the United Nations. Middletown's goal, from the beginning, has been a strengthened United Nations. Now with Russia starting its fake peace offensive it is more important than ever that we must make it work for peace throughout the world—rather than allow indecision to lead to defeat.

HERE IS HOW * * * IN '49

I. Strengthen the United Nations through regional arrangements

The Charter of the United Nations must be strengthened so that aggression will be stopped. A United Nations so strengthened necessitates veto limitation in matters of aggression, international control of armaments, including scientific weapons, and the establishment of an effective International Police Force.

Amendment to the Charter is the goal. Unfortunately it is clear that this cannot be accomplished now. The Soviet Government has stated plainly that it will block any attempt to modify the veto; it already has vetoed the United States' proposal on atomic energy control. It has used the veto over 30 times to block majority action.

Containment of Soviet Communist aggression is not enough. We must now take the initiative! In 1949 we must no longer bemoan our weakness. We must talk of our determination—of our moral, economic, and military strength.

Let's use the provisions of the present Charter to gain the revised Charter of the future.

Under article 52 of the Charter, regional arrangements are specifically permitted for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security, provided that such arrangements are consistent with the purposes and principles of the UN. What could be more consistent with those purposes and principles than to establish a world organization that can control aggression?

So * * * let's use article 52.—Our State Department should use its influence to:

1. Speedily establish regional alliances of free peoples who wish to remain free. Of most immediate concern is the formation of the North Atlantic Alliance, which would at first include the United States, Canada, and the nations of western Europe. The Pan American Union already is established. These or additional groups might include the Scandinavian nations, the Mediterranean nations, a Middle Eastern bloc and the states of South Africa.

2. Secure the establishment by these groups, separately and possibly together, of a charter that would contain the three necessary provisions now lacking in the United Nations Charter. Concentrate particularly on the establishment of such a charter by the North Atlantic Alliance in which is centered the greatest strength in the world today. The three recommended provisions would be:

- (a) Make decisions on aggression by a vote of two-thirds of the members—no veto. Aggression and preparation for aggression would be defined and interpreted by an International Court of Justice.<sup>1</sup>

- (b) Establish minimum arms production quotas. Adopt the United States' proposals for international control of atomic energy to become operative when all nations have joined. Guarantee the proper working of these systems by positive international inspection.

- (c) Establish an effective tyranny-proof world police force to consist of an independent active force under the direction of the alliance and a reserve force made up of the national armed forces of the member states. Each member would contribute a specified number of armed units and equipment to the world police force. The world police force would be used as a shock force on the spot in Europe or elsewhere and perhaps could act as occupation troops in the western zones of Germany. The national armed forces would back up the world police force when needed in order to throw the full power of the alliance against any aggressor.

3. Endeavor to get other nations and regional groups to join with the North Atlantic alliance in order to form a world-wide organization to oppose aggression.

4. Simultaneously, the North Atlantic Alliance would go before the General Assembly of the UN to review its complaints against the Soviet Union. It would point out the immediate aggression in Berlin where thousands of persons would be starving or taken over by the Communists were it not for the North Atlantic group airlift. Other indictments (listed on inside of back cover) would be enumerated.

Call on the General Assembly to declare the Soviet Union an aggressor and a threat to peace, its Berlin blockade an "armed attack." A vote of the nations of the world would be requested.

The North Atlantic Alliance would declare that it would be bound by the vote of a two-thirds majority in the General Assembly.

5. If this vote should declare Russia an aggressor or a threat to peace, the alliance would announce its intention, in the interest of the rest of the world, to oppose Soviet Communist expansion. The alliance would guarantee its mutual self-defense, under article 51 of the Charter, by taking effective police action against the aggressor, and in the name of the UN<sup>2</sup>—whenever and wherever it becomes necessary.

6. The alliance would guarantee to the peoples of the world that the UN Charter will be amended to include the three strengthening provisions included in the alliance's own charter whenever the Soviet Union will agree to such provisions.

Realistic—yes.—At present we are threatened by an increasingly dangerous aggressor.

Intelligent action is required to curb this aggression and threat to peace—soon.

We know from bitter experience that the Kremlin understands only one philosophy—superior force.

The procedure outlined here would enable the gathering of the maximum force to stop the aggressor while this police force still has a monopoly on the weapon that can best convince the aggressor he must comply peacefully.

The Kremlin would know that the free nations of the world are united in their desire to stop aggression by peaceful means if possible but determined to use police action if necessary.

II. The Marshall plan has been effective; let's continue it

American dollars and goods must continue to help Europeans rehabilitate Europe. Self-sustaining economies will be the strongest bulwark against Communist expansion and for the preservation of free institutions.

1. Our aid must be carefully administered so that it continues as a means of recovery rather than a subsidy or relief measure.

2. Encourage investment of private capital abroad and offer technical advice to increase industrial and agricultural production.

3. Make more clear that the Marshall plan is a means of preserving free institutions and peoples by giving courage and help to the strong-hearted while creating envy and suspicion among those countries subjected to the whip of Moscow. Eventually their growing discontent will lead to a desire to actively cooperate in the overthrow of their oppressors in the Kremlin.

III. Counterattack on the propaganda front

Battle with all our might the flood of lies and treacherous propaganda of the Communists.

By getting the truth into Europe—

1. Encourage and support the continuance and growth of the Voice of America.

2. Publicize everywhere the Soviet violations of agreements.

3. Penetrate the iron curtain by pamphlets, newspapers, votes of the United Nations Assembly, radio, word of mouth.

4. In every way possible, entice willing and freedom-loving peoples away from the Russian sphere.

5. Publicize the postwar benefits of a free and strong America.

6. Drop 1,000,000 copies of the Sears, Roebuck catalog in Russia, Poland, Rumania, Hungary, and Yugoslavia.

7. Supply our comrades in this propaganda battle with the best of our technical know-how, publicity, and advertising genius, etc.

8. Encourage the bolstering of morale among individual Europeans by adoption of European cities by American cities.

9. Carefully censor American movies produced for world consumption. We want other nations to understand the true American way of life.

10. Educate our own people to our world responsibilities.

<sup>2</sup> Actually, effective police action cannot be taken under the Charter without the affirmative vote of all the 5 permanent members of the Security Council. The Russian veto blocks such action. In order to stop aggression now we are proposing that the North Atlantic Alliance Act, until §6 above can be effected, on a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly rather than the required unanimous vote of the permanent members of the Security Council.

IV. Talk from our strength

Keep America strong.

But $15,000,000,000 per year for defense is a tremendous burden to our free economy.

So we must use our present military, political, and economic resources to call a spade a spade—while there is time.

We are strong.

Our Air Force, Army, and Navy are prepared. We have the A-bomb and our Air Force is capable of flying it to any part of the earth.

Let's talk from strength instead of weakness.

Let's use our strength effectively by joining the North Atlantic alliance—now.

Our strength must be the backbone of the alliance until the aggressor is stopped. Then a strengthened and revitalized United Nations can keep the peace.

THE CASE AGAINST THE SOVIET DICTATORS

Repeated breaching of nonaggression pacts—Finland, Poland, Esthonia, etc.
Invasion of Iran.

Dismemberment of Manchurian industry.

Plundering of Poland and Germany.

Active support of guerrillas in Greece and revolutionists in China.

Fomentation of strikes and treason in Italy, France, Turkey, Greece, Colombia, Paraguay, United States.

Failure to return war prisoners as agreed.

Blatant misuse of the veto in the Security Council.

Infiltration of Czechoslovakia—Remember the fate of Jan Masaryck.

Only negative vote to the United Nations "bill of rights."

Berlin blockade.

Coercion of the Scandinavian countries.

Religious persecutions and attacks on religious leaders—Hungary's Cardinal Mindszenty and Bishop Lajos Ordass; Bulgaria's protestant ministers.

Apathy is as killing as an atom bomb.

The choice [of peace or war] is still yours.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Thomas J. Reardon, of Hartford, Conn. How long is your statement?

Mr. REARDON. I would say about 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Reardon. Tell the reporter your name, your business, where you reside, and whom you represent.

STATEMENT OF THOMAS J. REARDON, UNITED STATES CONSTITUTIONAL DEFENSE FOUNDATION, HARTFORD, CONN.

Mr. REARDON. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

May the blessings of Almighty God enlighten our minds and move our hearts to know and to do rightly.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not told us yet whom you represent.

Mr. REARDON. I represent the United States Constitutional Defense Foundation. My name is Thomas J. Reardon. I am a sinner and whole citizen of these United States.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee: I request you to place me under oath because of the nature of my opposition to the North Atlantic Pact and the charges I am about to prefer. I will waive my right to refuse to answer any question the committee sees fit to ask me, whatever the consequences are.

The CHAIRMAN. We assume you will testify without an oath as well as you would with one. It is not the custom of the committee to put witnesses under oath. You have your obligation to your conscience and we are willing to accept it.

MR. REARDON. I say that for a very pertinent reason. People have come before committees in this Congress, and when they were asked questions they refused to answer because it might incriminate them.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand.

MR. REARDON. They were very strong on their civil rights, but they were very short on their civil responsibilities, and that is the important part.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go right ahead.

MR. REARDON. I am here to discharge my full civil responsibilities in the common defense of the United States and our Constitution that insures my civil rights that I am exercising here and now with your permission.

In my statement you have Material A, entitled "The Clue to the Fundamental Human Error." I will come back to that later.

Material B: Attorney General Tom Clark's classification of subversive activities, Washington, April 27, 1949.

Second in the classification, trying to "alter the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means."

The second is equally as deadly and destructive of liberty as the first; more cleverly disguised and is far more successful in altering our concept of government. Direct evidence of the success of this domestic enemy activity I will leave with you, and it happened in Hartford, Conn.

Material BB and C: Power journalism, power politics, and power radio played a major part in its success in Hartford. It has now been approved by the superintendents of our schools and it will now become part of the instructional course of citizens of the United States.

Material D, E, F, and G: With a shout of emergency! The ever-existing threat and everexisting potential danger is defined as positive.

Then the false doctrine based on this premise follows with the campaign of fear, hate, and cheer.

Supporting a bipartisan foreign and domestic policy by resolutions.

The Fulbright resolution, the first bastard document; then the Connally resolution and then the Vandenberg resolution.

The Fulbright resolution and Connally resolution, the forerunners of the great fraud, the United Nations, admitted a failure by all, including President Truman.

Material H, HH, and I: The Vandenberg resolution, the forerunner of another fraud, positively doomed to failure because of the false concept inherent in the premise it is based on. The proper classification of both documents proves that by constitutional processes the Senate or the Congress of the United States has no right of action on such documents.

THE PACT AND THE CHARTER

The United Nations document is a warrantee deed conveying the territorial possessions of 59 nations to 5 nations.

The Atlantic Pact document is of similar nature, but in conflict with the first document. We have nothing to gain and all to lose as parties to both documents.

This state of affairs stems from our disregarding the advice of our forefathers, particularly the advice in George Washington's Farewell Address, and following the false doctrines from Monroe to Truman that involved us in the Spanish-American War, the First World War, and developed the incident that involved us in the Second World War and will involve us in future wars.

This revolution in our history of foreign affairs has altered the form of government of the United States by unconstitutional means. That's positive.

Note our oath of allegiance to our flag as citizens of the United States and your oath as officers of our Government. And then note the oath of allegiance to the United Nations. Then there will be another oath to the Atlantic Pact, another probably to the Pacific Pact, whittling away our independence. No man can read the oath of allegiance and then for 1 minute support our supporting these documents.

I owe no allegiance to the United Nations, the Atlantic Pact, or other documents that divide that allegiance with other nations and their concepts of government.

Now we get to the conflict in the world today. The conflict in this world is a conflict of concepts, and there are only two concepts. One is based on heredity and the other is based on environment, and our forefathers in denouncing the concept of government that they were subjects of did not compromise. They could have, and remained subjects. But they didn't compromise. And then they insured that liberty in the Constitution of the United States, and you had better get this straight. That is an irrevocable law, no matter what shout of emergency you give.

In this little leaflet, Material A, you find a most important event. It is this guidance in finding the fundamental human error, and it happened in Hartford, in a sermon, March 20, 1949, in Hartford, Conn., and I am quoting from the sermon:

The last state of anyone who compromises with evil will always be worse than that which preceded it.

This is not merely a Christian belief; it is writ large in the history of men and nations.

The tables of experience shout it forth from every page.

It is self-evident that it is a falsehood that men or nations can better their state by compromising with evil.

How true this all is. And here is the part that takes it out of theology and into the world of materialism. Just across from St. Joseph's Cathedral in Hartford, Conn., where the Very Reverend Monsignor Hayes delivered this sermon on March 20, is the Aetna Life Insurance Co. Now, in classifying investments in the investment field, insurance comes first in their classification. Let's examine what is the substance and fundamental behind that security. It is because of their strict adherence to the tables of experience. And then let's follow the table of experience in our compromising, and the condition of the United States today shows that each compromise that we have made has caused our condition to become worse than that which preceded it, and from an economic standpoint, I came to Washington in 1939 and spent time with the experts on Senator O'Mahoney's committee to prove to him very positively the cause of the collapse of '29 and the correction that could be made in the method of valuation in the Federal Reserve Bank, and that same false method of valuation continues, and from time to time I have brought that to the attention of Congress and presented bills that would have corrected that error.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me interrupt you to say that unless you stick to the subject or to your statement, you are going to exceed your 12 minutes.

Mr. REARDON. I have some more left.

Now for the Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. That's better.

Mr. REARDON. When Mr. Bemis, a professor of Yale, on April 3, over WITC, and Mr. Morgan Beatty on April 4 over WITC, stated their conclusions on the Atlantic Pact, it was self-evident the professor and the commentator did not know the special responsibility of an officer in our Government, and this is a special responsibility. He must be able to point to a sentence in the Constitution that gives him authority to act and defend the Constitution of the United States against foreign and domestic enemies.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF TREATY

We, the people, cannot suspend any of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States by constitutional processes. And I quote from a decision in 1865 by Mr. Justice David Davis of the United States Supreme Court in the Ex parte Milligan case:

No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government.

So the challenge today to us is, as God has given us liberty let us keep it, and enemy activities, the domestic enemy activities, are those who propose to alter our Government by unconstitutional means, and that only can happen by presenting documents before you for consideration that have no business to be considered when you give a proper classification of the document.

For that reason alone—I don't expect you to remember, Senator—when I testified before the Foreign Relations Committee, at the end of my statement you said "Thank you, Mr. Reardon. We will certainly look into the unconstitutionality of it." If you had looked into it, Senator, you would find that there is no process, no constitutional process, to have that document before you, because the concept involved in it, and those associated with you—you have fifty-odd associates—and the concepts of government that you are joining hands with were very positive that it would be a failure, and the fact is, the veto power was in there and is there yet and will continue to be there so any theory of strengthening that pact through any other pact—let's get that out of our heads. Let's admit the failure.

But there is only one course, and we have done this. We have had experience with corridors. We have the corridor in Berlin, and the first act that led to the blockade was the criminal negligence on someone's part who gave the plates that we printed our currency with to Russia, and that currency issue is there yet. Now we are building a corridor in New York, an international corridor, whereby subversive activities, foreign enemies, can come to American soil, and you have no means of blockading it.

Let's stop that before we go any further. You have appropriated $75,000,000. Stop it before it goes any further.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. REARDON. Save America.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

(The statements referred to by Mr. Reardon are on file with the committee.)

The CHAIRMAN. Stanley Nowak, former State senator of Michigan.

Whom do you represent; where do you live; and what is your business?

STATEMENT OF HON. STANLEY NOWAK, FORMERLY STATE SENATOR OF MICHIGAN

Mr. NOWAK. My name is Stanley Nowak. I come from Detroit, Mich. In my city, over half of the population is of foreign birth.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent? What organization?

Mr. NOWAK. About 17 of the different national groups of European origin banded together several weeks ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you segregate in your approach to national problems the foreign-born from the American-born? Why do you do that? Are you not all Americans?

Mr. NOWAK. No; we do not segregate them.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not all Americans?

Mr. NOWAK. We are all Americans.

The CHAIRMAN. You live here. You make your living here. You live off the people of the United States. Do you in these political alignments cut your crowd off over here as those of foreign birth, and the American citizens over here as of another birth?

Mr. NOWAK. No, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go ahead.

Mr. NOWAK. If you will permit me, I will finish what I was trying to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. Very good.

Mr. NOWAK. These groups organized what is known as Nationality Councils for Peace, and asked me to come before your committee to present their views on the North Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. This is the foreign view, now, the view of these foreign groups?

Mr. NOWAK. No, sir. They are all Americans, and they consider their view to be an American point of view.

The problems created by the North Atlantic Pact affect intimately the lives and welfare of all of the American people. First and foremost, of course, is the question of war or peace. But no aspect of the lives of our people or the functioning of our Government can escape certain consequences of the pact. Deep and serious constitutional questions, such as the right of the Congress of the United States to declare war, are involved. The basic civil rights of the American people are concerned. The standard of living of our people, whether there will be homes and food and jobs for all or whether we will have less of the necessities of life in order to be able to make more armaments, is deeply involved.

I request an opportunity to appear before your committee not so much to ask you questions about the North Atlantic Pact as to present to you some of the problems that vex and concern the people back home in relation to the pact. These are questions that concern the people. They are also questions that must be answered by every Member of the United States Senate before he casts his vote for approval or rejection of the North Atlantic Pact.

DEFENSE AND REARMAMENT

1. We are told that this is a defense measure, but how do we justify saddling the war-weary peoples of Europe with a new arms race when all real authorities agree that the Soviet Union has neither the intent nor the power to attack?

The CHAIRMAN. Of what country are you a native? Where were you born?

Mr. NOWAK. I was born in Poland.

The CHAIRMAN. Part of Russia at one time?

Mr. NOWAK. Before 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. You were born there in what year?

Mr. NOWAK. In 1903.

The CHAIRMAN. You were born in 1903?

Mr. NOWAK. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are a Pole by nationality?

Mr. NOWAK. I was a Pole by nationality.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a citizen?

Mr. NOWAK. I am. I served in the Michigan Senate for 10 years. I would have to be a citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

OTHER QUESTIONS ON THE ATLANTIC PACT

Mr. NOWAK. 2. How can we explain this pact as a defense of freedom when Portugal, governed by a dictator who does not permit freedom of religion and other basic freedoms, is a signatory of the pact?

3. How can we explain to the two-thirds of the world which is colored and to 15,000,000 American Negroes that this is a pact in defense of democracy when we are providing military aid to governments engaged in warfare against colonial peoples?

4. How do we justify more billions for arms when the futility of military measures against social and political ideologies has been demonstrated in China and Greece?

5. I know that Secretary Acheson has said that the pact will not deprive the Congress of the constitutional power to declare war. If we reserve the right to discuss and debate a declaration of war in our Congress, how do we view the obligations of the European governments under the pact? Are they permitted legislative discussion and debate? If we alone reserve the right not to go to war, then does not the pact become a device for our use of European manpower?

6. How do we explain to millions of Americans of Eastern European origin that the pact is for the defense of western civilization? We Americans of Polish and Slavic origin find it difficult to distinguish between Hitler's Aryan concept and Churchill's western civilization.

How do we explain western civilization as ending at the Polish and Czech borders? How do we explain Nazi industrialists returned to power as defenders of western civilization and our former allies as peoples against whom we must arm?

I can tell you that western civilization, whatever that phrase may mean, was built with the arms and backs and brains of millions of Eastern Europeans and peoples from Africa and the Orient who will not accept the racist notion of Anglo-Saxon superiority enunciated by Churchill and other fathers of the North Atlantic Pact.

7. How do we explain to people abroad and to people at home Mr. Acheson's revealing phrase "the European members of the American community" which he used in describing the European signatories to the North Atlantic Pact? Americans of foreign birth or extraction owe their complete loyalty to this country, but I don't know a single American of Irish, French, British, or Scandinavian origin who wouldn't be angered by the thought that the land of his origin is now considered to be a colony.

8. How do we interpret the phrase "political independence" in the pact? American newspapers were shocked when the Czechoslovakian cabinet was reshuffled, constitutionally, to exclude certain parties. This was described here as a loss of political independence. Our press was not shocked when the State Department had earlier excluded Communist parties from the cabinets of France and Italy. If Communists were to regain places in the French and Italian Governments would this be considered a threat to their political independence?

Also, does a member nation have to invite assistance or could we and the British and Belgians, for example, rush troops into France if the French Communists should win an election and form a government?

9. Are we to subvert the Constitution of the United States and transform our Government from a civilian into a military government by placing in the hands of the military the power to make decisions that will irrevocably commit us to war?

10. Recently a distinguished Member of the United States Senate, Senator Edwin Johnson of Colorado, stated that if the cold war were stopped the American economy would collapse. Is this true? Is this the reason for our continued and developing armaments program? Is it true, as this statement implies, that we are definitely committed to a war program?

11. How can we explain to the people of my own city of Detroit, 50,000 of whose families are now living doubled up and who need a minimum of 8 public housing projects costing only $78,000,000, that the Federal Government is preparing to spend $460,000,000 each week for the cold war, but only $225,000,000 all of next year for slum clearance and low-cost housing?

12. More than 20,000 children in my city of Detroit alone go to schools which are now more than 50 years old or attend only half days because of overcrowding. How can we explain to their parents that we can afford $460,000,000 each week for a cold war but that the $300,000,000 the Federal Government will spend all of next year for education does not permit the construction of the 79 new schools needed in Detroit?

13. In that part of Detroit with by far the largest population, there is more space devoted to cemeteries than to parks and playgrounds. How can we explain to the people there, as elsewhere, the expenditure of $24,000,000,000 in support of a program that will assuredly create still more cemeteries and no additional playgrounds?

14. How can we explain to my neighbors and to Senator Vandenberg's constituents in Detroit why it will take 25 years, at the present rate of progress, to build a civic center, when its total cost is less than the Federal Government is spending for militarization and war each week?

15. The Berlin air lift cost hundreds of millions of dollars. Now that the blockade has been lifted, it is no longer necessary, but we have been told that it will be continued anyway. How can we explain to the people of Detroit, who, according to the city plan commission, need four district health centers and a larger tuberculosis hospital, the continued expenditure of millions of dollars for an air life which is no longer needed?

16. How can we explain to the more than 5,000 laid-off tool and die makers in Detroit, yes, and to the 5,000,000 unemployed in our country, that our policy of refusing to trade our machine tools and equipment, the products of our industries, with the countries of eastern Europe really serves American interests?

BURDENS OF THE PACT AND PEACE

These, gentlemen, are some of the questions relating to the North Atlantic Pact that concern the American people, the people who are being called upon to shoulder the immediate financial burden and the potential military burden of the pact. Growing numbers of these people are alarmed that the real reasons for the formation of the pact are revealed in statements such as that of Secretary Johnson; and they are wondering if the real need is simply that of supporting our economy, why that purpose cannot be achieved by the expenditure of $24,000,000,000 on schools and hospitals and homes, rather than on tanks and planes and atom bombs.

Can prosperity be purchased only at the price of war?

Cannot prosperity be achieved and maintained with our country and the world at peace?

This is the question that is uppermost in the minds of our people. I know that it is a question that is beginning to concern you, too. I hope that our Government has learned from the experience of other governments that efforts to insure prosperity at the risk of peace have resulted in the loss of both.

I propose that we Americans stop talking about a war and instead take immediate steps toward assuring peace and harmony among the major nations of the world by sending a peace mission to the Soviet Union and the other eastern European countries to negotiate the resumption of trade relations and to discuss the major differences which are now keeping us apart.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a former member of the State Senate of Michigan?

Mr. NOWAK. I was.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not now?

Mr. NOWAK. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you resign?

Mr. NOWAK. I did not run in the last election.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a good way to get out of it.

Mr. NOWAK. Senator, if I may, I was elected five times from that district, and I decided to run for Congress. I did not get the congressional nomination, but I feel confident that if I had run for the Senate I would have been reelected.

The CHAIRMAN. You run better for big jobs than you do for little ones; is that it?

Where do you get this $24,000,000,000 that you say this treaty will require us to expend? Where do you get that?

Mr. NOWAK. A very prominent, and shall I say very conservative, publication, the United States News-World Report several weeks or a month ago devoted a lengthy article and quoted extensively from what I believe a reliable source, pointing out that our cold-war policy, from the time it started, in a period of 3 years, will cost us approximately $24,000,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Do you believe everything you see in print?

Mr. NOWAK. No; I don't believe everything; no, Senator. But this article was convincing to me.

The CHAIRMAN. You believe it only if it agrees with your views; is that right?

Mr. NOWAK. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg, any questions?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. I was interested in the various faults that you find in conditions here now, most of which an attempt is being made to correct. But, on the whole, since you draw such a dark picture of conditions, do you not yet believe that our Government is the best in the world?

Mr. NOWAK. Positively. I am of the opinion that our Constitution and our form of government, in my humble opinion, are the best in the world, and I have utmost loyalty to it, and my criticism of events in this statement is not in our form of government nor of our Constitution, but of the present trend to war.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND THE PACT

Senator GREEN. Yes. But then, if you believe our Government is the best in the world, as you say, do you think there ought to be any limit on the amount that we spend to defend it?

Mr. NOWAK. If our country is in danger by any foreign aggressor, in my opinion, we should spend everything to defend it. But my contention, Senator, if I may conclude, is that there is no such danger at the present moment and that there is no need for that expenditure.

Senator GREEN. In that opinion you apparently differ from those of the governments of these nations who are signatories to the Atlantic Pact, who apparently believe that there may be danger of attack because the pact is made in order to defend against aggression. Is that not true?

Mr. NOWAK. Yes; I differ with them.

Senator GREEN. You differ from those who represent the governments of all these countries?

Mr. NOWAK. Yes, sir.

Senator GREEN. It is a question of opinion.

Mr. NOWAK. That is correct.

Senator GREEN. And you are setting yourself up against those who are in control of these various governments?

Mr. NOWAK. That is correct.

Senator GREEN. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; that is all. Go ahead. We will excuse you, Senator.

Senator GREEN. Mr. Chairman, before you call the next witness, I may state that Senator Fulbright came in and was unable to stay, but he asked me, in his absence and in his behalf, to ask for permission to have printed in the record of this hearing a communication in the Washington Post of February 20, 1949, relating to this pact.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

[From the Washington Post, February 25, 1949]

A LETTER TO THE EDITOR

A COMMUNICATION

The proposed Atlantic Pact raises grave issues of high policy for the United States. It is extremely difficult for any nation to lay down precisely the conditions under which it will commit itself now to use armed force in the future. Such problems must be faced squarely by those who have the responsibility for conducting our foreign affairs.

These issues are far too important for anyone to take refuge in the comfortable but erroneous theory that they need not be faced because our Constitution does not legally permit them to be faced. Whether the United States should give any commitment to use military force, and upon what conditions, are very hard questions indeed. But the questions are questions of policy and not of legal power. It is clearly demonstrable that the United States is legally under no greater disability than any other sovereign nation to make a solemn commitment with another state that each will use armed force to repel an attack on the other.

The debates in the Constitutional Convention, the provisions of the Constitution itself, and the subsequent conduct of this Nation have clearly established the following:

1. The President and the Senate are authorized to enter into treaties of alliance with other nations involving commitments to defend each other against invasion or attack.

2. The President, as Commander in Chief of the armed forces, has the power to make war to the extent necessary to repel sudden invasion or attack. What constitutes an invasion or attack is for the President to determine, either in advance by a formal declaration of policy such as the Monroe Doctrine or by the making of a treaty with Senate approval, or at the moment when it occurs. Throughout our history, all three methods have been used to extend our concept of what constitutes an attack on the United States.

3. When and if the President makes war to repel an attack, the Congress has the power to declare war in support of this act, or not to do so as it sees fit. Whether the President acts pursuant to a Senate-ratified treaty or on his own initiative, Congress is, of course, under strong moral compulsion to stand behind him. But, despite the position in which Congress would thus find itself, the framers of the Constitution never indicated that the legal power of the President and the Senate to take such action is or ought to be limited.

I

One of the major purposes for creating the Union was self-defense. The Constitution attempted to give the most ample powers necessary for this purpose. As Hamilton said, "The means of security can only be regulated by the means and the danger of attack. They will in fact be ever determined by these rules, and by no others. It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation."

In the minds of the framers, an important means of self-defense was the power to make treaties of alliance involving solemn commitments between nations to defend each other against attacks by third parties. The constitutional debates do not indicate that the treaty-making power was to be limited to such innocent topics as commerce, navigation, or the standard of weights and measures. The whole flavor of the intense discussion of the treaty-making power in the Convention debates and in the Federalist Papers shows full appreciation of the fact that treaty making involved great powers that could be used to save the Nation.

Solemn treaty commitments to defend others against attack or invasion were not unknown to the framers of the Constitution. Under the Articles of Confederation, the United States in 1778 entered into a treaty with France for this very purpose, guaranteeing to the King of France, against all the world, his continued possession of French territories in North America. Article VI of the Constitution specifically reaffirmed this obligation to France by providing that "all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land."

This pledge was made in the very same document which gives to Congress the power to declare war. It proves specifically that, in the minds of the framers, considerations might exist—and, in fact, did exist under a treaty already made—which would morally oblige the Congress to declare war.

Similarly, article IV, section 4, of the Constitution states that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government and shall protect each of them against invasion." Here again is a specific commitment, contained in the Constitution itself, that under certain considerations the Congress is morally obliged to exercise its power to declare war in order to protect the States against invasion.

It was because treaties were recognized to be such grave affairs that the framers debated at great length whether the President alone should be allowed to make them, whether the Senate alone should be allowed to make them, and whether the approval of the House of Representatives should be required. In support of the proposition that the approval of the House should be required, it was argued that treaties were the supreme law of the land and binding on the Congress and should, therefore, be approved by the entire Congress in advance.

The argument was rejected after James Madison had pointed out in the debates "the inconvenience of requiring a legal ratification of treaties of alliance for the purposes of war." The conclusion is inevitable that, in committing the treaty-making power to the President and to the Senators, the framers knew they were giving to these men, and to these men alone, the power to commit the United States to make war to the extent of repelling attacks against our treaty allies.

II

The Constitution states significantly that the Congress shall have power to declare war. An earlier draft had given the Congress the power to make war, but "make" was changed to "declare" during the debate of August 17, 1787, on motion of James Madison, of Virginia, and Elbridge Gerry, of Delaware, for the specific purpose of leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks. The change was supported by Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, on the ground that the Executive should be able to repel and not to commence war.

It has never been contested that the President has the power to use armed force in order to repel invasions or attacks. This means that the President has the power to make war, even though Congress has the power to declare war.

The President's power to use military force to repel an attack has been exercised on numerous occasions in our history, the most recent, of course, being the Sunday of Pearl Harbor. When the Japanese planes began shooting on our fleet, the Navy did not have to wait for instructions from Congress before shooting back. Significantly, when the President subsequently asked Congress to declare war, he asked for a declaration that since the Japanese attack on December 7 "a state of war has existed." The Congress thereupon resolved that "the state of war * * * which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared," and authorized the President to employ the entire resources of the Government to bring the conflict to a successful termination.

Since the President can himself repel an attack, the crucial question is what constitutes an attack. This is a political question for the President to decide. It is not a legal question. The Prize Cases (2 Black 635 (U. S. Sup. Ct., 1862)).

Throughout our history, it has been the policy of our Presidents to regard an attack against the vital interests of the United States in the same manner as an attack against its physical territories. In 1823, President Monroe declared that "any attempt on the part of other powers to expand their system to any portion of the Western Hemisphere is dangerous to our peace and safety" and "the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

In 1904, Theodore Roosevelt obtained Senate approval of a treaty which said categorically that "The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama."

President Wilson asked for war against Germany in 1917 on the ground that Germany had committed repeated acts of war against us, even though these acts had been committed far from our shores. In 1922, Secretary of State Hughes signed the Nine-Power Pact, with Senate approval, in which we gave a commitment and obtained similar commitments to respect the territorial integrity of China.

In 1941, President Roosevelt authorized American naval craft patrolling out to the middle of the Atlantic to "shoot on sight" when German naval vessels were encountered. In 1947, President Truman requested and obtained Senate approval of the Rio Pact, which stated the principle that an attack on any American state would be regarded as an attack on all the American state. Today, the President and the Senate are considering whether, when, and how to announce that an attack against western Europe will be regarded as an attack on the United States.

It thus appears that our Presidents (and the Senate) have steadily broadened our notions of what constitutes an attack and that they have employed the treaty-making procedure, just as President Monroe employed his famous message to Congress, as a useful means of defining, for the benefit of other nations, precisely what we would regard as an attack on ourselves. And once the President has decided that an attack has been committed, this legal power to repel that attack with armed force is clear. For example, if an attack is committed against an American nation—defined in the Rio Pact to be an attack against the United States—the President, if he thinks the situation requires, has clear power to repel such an attack by armed force, before asking Congress to declare war.

When the situation permits, any President will undoubtedly prefer to consult Congress first. But there may not be time to indulge this choice. "There frequently are occasions when days, nay, even hours are precious," said John Jay in 1788. "As in the field, so in the Cabinet, there are moments to be seized as they pass, and they who preside in either should be left in capacity to improve them."

III

When the President finds it necessary to repel an attack without waiting for Congress, it is, of course, for the Congress to decide whether to follow that action by a declaration of war pledging all the resources of the Nation to a military conclusion of the dispute. The Congress can decide that the President acted hastily or improperly, and decline to declare war. Or, as has always proved true in the past, it can decide that he acted properly and back his action by a declaration of war.

The problem does not become essentially different when the President's action in repelling an attack is taken pursuant to a treaty commitment rather than in the absence of any such commitment. The President has power to repel an attack, treaty or no treaty. Once the President has exercised this power, the Congress is under strong compulsion to support him, treaty or no treaty. In this respect the treaty itself makes little difference. In either case, the Congress can be compelled to take action only by its own conscience. There is no national or international tribunal which can force it to support the President.

It is apparently true that Congress has never failed to take legislative action required by a treaty commitment. A serious and inescapable question of policy therefore arises each time the President and the Senate consider whether and how to engage the good faith of the United States in any treaty commitment to repel an attack against another nation. But the question is not one of legal power under the Constitution.

The President and the Senate have the power to make such treaties and the President has the power to use armed force to carry them out. While the making of such a treaty creates the possibility that Congress may be confronted with a fait accompli, it also creates the possibility that a potential aggressor may be deterred from attacking. It can hardly create the second possibility without creating the first. That is the nub of the problem—not whether the President and the Senate can take action, but whether they should take action, and of what kind.

When the Constitution was being debated many people argued that the powers of making treaties and repelling attacks were too great to be lodged in the President and the Senate. It was pointed out that these powers might be abused and that officeholders might be corrupt or inept. But the framers expected the President and the Senators to be men of the highest character and achievements, fully capable of facing and making great decisions. "With such men," to quote John Jay again, "the power of making treaties may be safely lodged." This argument was accepted by the American people in 1789. Nothing in our past or current history indicates that their judgment was erroneous.

WASHINGTON.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. John Brickajlik.

STATEMENT OF JOHN BRICKAJLIK, SELLERS, PA.

The CHAIRMAN. How long is your statement?

Mr. BRICKAJLIK. I have just an oral report of my viewpoint on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent?

Mr. BRICKAJLIK. I am a farmer from Bucks County. I am a member of the Farmers' Union, and I am a farmer and interested in food and our soil. I feel that our Nation should not send arms and guns and bullets but should send food which we can produce here. We can produce food.

I have been a farmer ever since I was 14. I am a man of 28 today. And our problem is not raising food, it is marketing, trying to get it to the people who can use that food, and trying to give it to them.

USE OF MONEY FOR REARMAMENT FOR OTHER PURPOSES

I appreciate food. When I grow it, when I go out in the field and see it grow, I appreciate it. But what hurts me is, will somebody use that food instead of letting it go to waste? I feel about the North Atlantic Pact, instead of having that pact, we should send food instead of guns and tanks, and so forth.

The farmers in our area are concerned about the tax issue. The North Atlantic Pact is going to cost us money. For every billion there will be 5-percent increase in taxes, and 5-percent increases in taxes are getting burdensome. Right now I know it is getting tough going for a lot of us. As a good example, there are a few sheriff's sales around already.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you pay a Federal income tax?

Mr. BRICKAJLIK. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. You are doing pretty well.

Mr. BRICKAJLIK. I hope I can continue that way. It is getting burdensome already. Another 5 percent for every billion to be spent on the North Atlantic Pact will be more burdensome to us, and it will deprive us of some of our conveniences at home. A lot of farmers don't have running water; a lot of them don't have baths. And the worst thing is, our soil is being washed away. I know on our own farms, if we had a little more money we could improve ourselves, and thanks to the conservation program we have in this country we are gradually improving it, but it is still not to the best advantage.

In our country there are still a lot of one-room schoolhouses, with no running water at all. Why is not some of that money spent there?

My kid brother goes to school, and I went to school, and we didn't even have a well there. We took water from a neighboring farmhouse. The water had never been tested. That was the State's fault, but I think the Federal Government has a lot of interest in it. And I feel that the money that we are spending for the North Atlantic Pact the people would appreciate better, and there would be better harmony here, and we would love one another better, if spent for the improvements of life, not to go out and destroy somebody. If I was a European myself and somebody would send guns and bullets, I wouldn't really feel right. I don't even feel right now, as far as police protection, and so forth.

So all I can say is a few words. I took a day off from my plowing to come down. They asked me to come down. I try to do my part as a citizen to express my simple views.

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad you do.

Mr. BRICKAJLIK. I was here when I was on a graduating trip in 1940. It is just a pleasure for me right now to be here, and I never thought I would see the day when I would testify. I feel that just these small views I have expressed—the money spent—is worth while. On the North Atlantic Pact let us try to spend it for better things than tanks and guns and give food and try to improve our soil. We were fortunate that we had big crops a few years, but what will happen if drought comes and people are hungry?

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Have you any questions. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. We respect your views.

Mr. G. Burton Parshall, how long is your statement?

Mr. PARSHALL. As long as you tell me.

The CHAIRMAN. Do not put it on us.

Mr. PARSHALL. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes is all right.

Tell the reporter your name, your business, where you live, and whom you represent.

STATEMENT OF G. BURTON PARSHALL, FRIENDS SOCIAL ORDER COMMITTEE OF PHILADELPHIA

Mr. PARSHALL. My name is G. Burton Parshall. I live in Primos, just outside of Philadelphia. I am a life-insurance salesman; treasurer of the Friends Social Order Committee of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends. The social order committee has authorized me to make a statement for the committee.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

We, as the name indicates, are concerned with the study of all the questions which we feel go into the making of a better social order, and as a result of those studies we feel that the problems in the world which are leading us into difficulty today are not being tackled in exactly the right way. We feel that the essential trouble in the world is a racial problem, an economic problem, and a problem of political suppression of minority groups.

We feel that there are some 2,000,000,000 colored people in the world who for centuries have been given to believe that the white people were superior, and that today, with our modern means of communication—radio, telegraph, motion picture, and so forth—these people are being brought to the point where they are no longer satisfied to look on white people as a superior race. They feel that they have their place in the sun just as anyone else does, and we have the job of recognizing that fact and helping them, not only here in our own country but all over the world, to attain a full, free, independent life, with full and civil liberties.

We also feel that the problem is one of economic inequalities, and that certain nations in the world, through their superior ability and aggressiveness, have built up themselves to some extent at the expense of colonial nations. They have, it is true, helped those nations to some extent, but to a large extent they themselves have gotten rich at the other nation's expense, and nations are no longer willing to have that happen. The individual inhabitants of these nations want a share of the world's goods.

In this world picture, we have two forces competing for the good will of these people. We have communism and we have the United States with its capitalistic system. We, as the social order committee, which is composed essentially of business men, like the free enterprise system and like the capitalistic system, and we want to maintain it, and we feel that with some adjustments within our system at home and abroad the system can be maintained, but if we are unwilling to make these adjustments, that the trend all over the world as well as at home is toward some form of socialism.

So it seems to us that the problem is not one of combating communism but it is a problem of relieving these conditions all over the world: racial intolerance, economic inequality, political suppression, and trying to do away with a basic disease so that communism cannot flourish, and if we do those things we think we will then defeat communism.

If we spend $20,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000 on defense and only $5,000,000,000 on economic aid, to us it seems like paying $5,000 for a home and then spending $20,000 for fire insurance. We would recommend that we reverse the procedure and that we spend this money on economic aid. It would keep our factories busy for untold years and it would satisfy people's wants instead of aggravating them, and it would raise conditions all over the world so that communism would no longer have the excuse that it has now to get the people stirred up and to say "We have a solution," because we feel that we here in America have a better solution, but that right now we are not doing too good a selling job.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. Then you do believe in spending some money for insurance?

Mr. PARSHALL. Frankly, as an individual I do not. I am perfectly willing to put my own dependence on moral law and doing away with any defense.

Senator GREEN. Your illustration called for that.

Mr. PARSHALL. We have to recognize that most people in the country do not agree with us Friends, consequently when we are speaking in public we have to try to temper what we say by that fact. If I ask a person to come entirely over to my side they would think I was crazy, so I ask them to come half way.

Senator GREEN. You really believe there should be no insurance?

Mr. PARSHALL. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. I have very high regard for the Friends and their organization. They are very great people.

Mr. Farmer, how long is your statement?

Mr. FARMER. I have a statement that is a little too long to read, but I am prepared to make a brief oral statement and file this. I was informed by Mr. O'Day that witnesses were requested to be very brief, but that they could file any accompanying statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent?

Mr. FARMER. I represent myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Yourself?

Mr. FARMER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not here, then, to represent some organization?

Mr. FARMER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Tell us who you are and what you do, what your business is, and so on, and your background. Give it to the reporter.

STATEMENT OF FYKE FARMER, NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. FARMER. My home is in Nashville, Tenn. My name is Fyke Farmer. By profession I am a lawyer. Two years ago I gave up the active practice of the law to devote my time to working for world government, and I am here today to give the committee my views regarding the North Atlantic Pact because of my interest in the establishment of world government.

The CHAIRMAN. We haven't primarily before us the world government idea. We have the North Atlantic Pact. If you can show any relationship between the two, we will be glad to hear you briefly.

Mr. FARMER. That is the point. I think there is no relationship between the two, and for that reason—

The CHAIRMAN. You think there is no relationship between the two?

Mr. FARMER. Between the North Atlantic Pact and the ideal of world government. I think they are two opposite things.

The CHAIRMAN. We are dealing now with the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. FARMER. And I oppose the Atlantic Pact because I am for world government. I believe we can abolish war through world government, but that the North Atlantic Pact is a step in the wrong direction.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me interrupt you. Do you believe that if we reject the Atlantic Pact we will have world government right away?

Mr. FARMER. Not by rejecting the pact, but by doing the positive things that we must do to get world government.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

STEPS TOWARD WORLD GOVERNMENT

Mr. FARMER. Now, answering your question more specifically, I think the thing that we must do to get world government—that is, the first step to world government—is what has been done in my own State, in Tennessee. The Tennessee Legislature, which has just adjourned, enacted a law providing for an election at the regular election the first Thursday in August 1950, to elect delegates to a constitutional convention to meet in Geneva in 1950, three delegates representing the people, and this law was drafted in accordance with a uniform plan which, if followed in other States, would result in the people of the United States electing one delegate per million population, 131 delegates, to meet in a world constitutional convention to formulate a world federal constitution. Other nations would be invited to send their own delegates, chosen by the people.

That is what I am for. That is what I believe we must do to remove the threat of war, to abolish war by law, to establish the world government.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you one of the delegates?

Mr. FARMER. I am a candidate. We have not had the election. We will have the election in 1950.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you desire to be a delegate?

Mr. FARMER. I have announced I am a candidate.

The CHAIRMAN. Who elects the delegates?

Mr. FARMER. It is just like you run for anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it a popular vote?

Mr. FARMER. It is by popular vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Governor appoint or the legislature select, or what?

Mr. FARMER. No. They will be elected at the regular election the first Thursday in August 1950. Candidates, according to the law, for the office of delegate, to have their names placed on the ballot or in the voting machines, would have to get nominating petitions signed by 500 registered voters, and have that petition filed with the State board of elections 30 days before the election, and the people vote on the delegates.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go ahead.

CONSISTENCY WITH PRINCIPLES OF UNITED NATIONS

My reasons for believing that the North Atlantic Pact is not the right thing at this time are that I think that it is inconsistent with the principle of the United Nations. I realize that the State Department and members of this committee have expressed the view that it is consistent, and that a statement has been inserted in the treaty to that effect, that it is consistent with the United Nations, but saying it is and putting a clause in it does not make it so.

The principles of the United Nations Organization, as expressed in the Charter, or one of the basic principles, is that force will not be used save in common interest, and that force will not be used except under orders of the Security Council where there has been a determination of aggressor, a breach of the peace or a threat to the peace.

The organization of the combination of governments, members of the United Nations, for the use of military force, independent of any decision or independent of submission of the question to the Security Council for determination, it means to me is palpably a violation of the fundamental and basic principle on which the United Nations was set up.

We have not got the case of an armed attack. There has been no justification sought to be made for this pact on the ground that there has been an armed attack or that there is an immediate danger of an armed attack which would give rise to the right of members, under article 51 of the Charter, to defend themselves in case of an armed attack. Neither do I think that the proposed treaty and the implementing arms legislation amount to a regional arrangement within chapter VIII, because, as I read the Charter of the United Nations, regional arrangements must be subordinate to the authority of the Security Council and they must be formed for the purpose of dealing with a matter that is appropriate to a regional arrangement.

MILITARY ALLIANCES AND UN CHARTER

The object and purpose of the North Atlantic Pact, as I read the statements, the policy statements for the President and the Secretary of State, are to form a combination for the use of force by threat, not actual use of force, independently, not in subordination to the Security Council or the United Nations. The situation which gives rise to the formation of this pact, the difference between one group of nations led by the Soviet Union and the other group of nations led by the United States of America, certainly it seems to me is not a matter of such nature as it can be appropriately dealt with by the formation of military alliances. If the western side of this dispute has the right, under the Charter, to organize a military force for the purpose of threatening the other side with overwhelming force, by the same token the other side has the right to form a combination for the use of military force to threaten the western side with their overwhelming force.

The CHAIRMAN. A while ago, when you were discussing the regional arrangement, what about article 51? You skipped that.

Mr. FARMER. I said that in my opinion that had no application, because article 51 is limited to the case of an armed attack.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what this treaty is dealing with, armed attack.

Mr. FARMER. There is no armed attack that has occurred.

The CHAIRMAN. After the armed attack is over there is no use bothering about it. After they have submerged you and conquered you and killed a lot of your citizens—

Mr. FARMER. But the purpose of the United Nations was to settle all disputes.

The CHAIRMAN. I am asking about article 51.

Mr. FARMER. Which must be read in context with the whole Charter, and the whole object and purpose of the United Nations was to settle all disputes by peaceful means, and the Charter defines what are peaceful and pacific means, and the formation of a military alliance is not defined, and I respectfully insist that it could not be considered a peaceful means. It is a martial means.

Now then, the second point that I wish to make, and it is elaborated in the statement which I would like to file and ask the committee's permission to file as a part of the record, relates to the pact as regards the Constitution of the United States.

CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY FOR TREATY

What is the constitutional authority, if I may ask the committee a question? What power, under the Constitution, gives the President and the Congress the right to make this treaty, and appropriate money to furnish arms to these other treaty members?

The CHAIRMAN. You ask us that question?

Mr. FARMER. If I may.

The CHAIRMAN. The Constitution of the United States vests in the United States, a sovereign government, the right to deal with foreign nations and to make treaties, and the President of the United States under the Constitution, is in control of our normal diplomatic relations with other people. It would be a very weak sovereignty that could not make treaties and assume obligations with regard to foreign nations. That is the answer, in my judgment.

Senator Vandenberg, do you want to add anything?

Senator VANDENBERG. No.

Mr. FARMER. Is there any limitation upon that power?

The CHAIRMAN. I am speaking about this particular treaty. I haven't time to go all over the whole category of things that might occur. We discourage witnesses from covering all the earth. We would like to stick to the treaty when we can.

Mr. FARMER. Well, the point that I wish to make, I assumed that that was the reason or the idea behind it, that there was such a power of sovereignty, which I believe is not recognized by constitutional authorities. That is, that even the power of the President and the Congress in the matter of foreign relations is subject to the Constitution.

Now, granting that the President has the power to propose treaties and make treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and assuming that the President would have the power to make the treaty with any foreign governments to settle disputes by pacific means, and to prevent war, I think the question arises under the Constitution whether this treaty can be carried out without violation of the Constitution.

OBLIGATION FOR IMPLEMENTING LEGISLATION

An essential part of this program or this alliance is the implementing arms legislation. The treaty is to be for a 20-year period. Secretary Acheson told this committee, according to press reports, that there will be an obligation on the part of the Congress of the United States, if this treaty is made, to appropriate money, to furnish arms and assistance to these foreign governments. That means for 20 years. He says that is an obligation of some sort, more, I suppose, of a moral obligation than a legal obligation, but it is a recognized principle of constitutional law and international law that where a treaty is made that is not self-executing and the Senate approves it, that that does entail some kind of obligation on Congress.

Senator GREEN. I think either the newspaper account or your view have misrepresented Mr. Acheson's statement. He said there was an obligation to do something, and that in all probability that would be decided to be what we should do, under certain circumstances, but there was no specific obligation to render any military assistance; that that was in the discretion of the Congress, but that force of circumstances would probably result in their rendering military assistance. That is very different from your statement that there was an obligation to do that. There was simply an obligation to do something.

Mr. FARMER. I have not seen the text of his statement. I have only read newspaper accounts.

Senator GREEN. Assuming that my statement is correct, would it not change your argument?

Mr. FARMER. I think not. I think not, because I think that the general public realizes that this is an armament program. We already have the ERP program.

Senator GREEN. That is a mistake on the part of the public, then.

Mr. FARMER. I think that is what all the talk has been about for several months, that it is not enough.

Senator GREEN. That is because the critics are seeking to find some foundation for their criticism. They say that certain things might be done under this, and therefore we will criticize the pact because they are not prohibited.

Mr. FARMER. I realize that there is not in the treaty, and I have not seen the proposed legislation for furnishing arms. I have not seen a draft of that. I do not know whether it has been published or not. I understood such legislation was being prepared, but I have not seen it.

I realize very well, Senator, that in the treaty itself there is no specific obligation on the part of the United States Government to send arms to any particular government for 1 year, 2 years, or 20 years. But if the treaty amounts to a military alliance, where these countries agree to stand together and our Government is to help them—

Senator GREEN. Your first statement contradicts your second. Your first statement shows it is not a military alliance.

Mr. FARMER. I do not think you can separate the treaty from what the whole tenor of the conversation has been.

If economic assistance was what we had in mind, we have the ERP program, and there is no need for the North Atlantic Treaty. I do not think the public is wrong. I think the general public realizes, and I think Congress realizes, that this is a military scheme.

Senator GREEN. If they do say that, it is a misnomer. What they mean is that that may be the result of the circumstances, very naturally. In case of an act of war on the part of a foreign nation toward us, we do not have to go to war, we do not have to use military force. There are other sanctions which can be employed, but probably we will want to use military force. But that is in the decision of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FARMER. I think that the matter of the power of the Congress to declare war after we have sent a great supply of arms to other governments is a matter about like the power of Congress to grant letters of marque and reprisal, if I may say so.

Senator GREEN. You must know that sanctions have been imposed many times before an act of war and there has been no war.

Mr. FARMER. I realize in the past these ideas of balancing power and formation of military alliances have been depended upon as a means of keeping the peace. I think it was Churchill who said, when he was First Lord of the Admiralty before World War I, that the way to have peace is to be strong enough to win any war that occurs, and two world wars have not shaken that formula that he has. But I submit that that is false, because if you have a world divided into two armed camps, each trying to keep the peace by being stronger than the other to make war, then you have a physical impossibility and therefore the only alternative to this present situation of conflict is that it will disrupt the United Nations, divide the world into rival military alliances armed for war to keep peace, not to make war but preparing for war in order to make peace.

I say the alternative to that is the development of the United Nations into world government.

DEFENSE AND AGGRESSION

Senator GREEN. Your mistake, it seems to me, is that you confuse the preparation to defend against war and the preparation to make war. This pact is not a preparation to make war. It is a preparation to defend against an attack.

Mr. FARMER. But under modern conditions, Senator, it is not possible to make a distinction between defense and aggression. At the San Francisco Conference, I believe, if I am not mistaken, Senator Vandenberg was the United States delegate at Subcommittee 4 of Commission III, and the Bolivian delegation proposed to insert, did they not, Senator, a definition of aggression, and that was defeated. The United States delegation stood with the other nations that opposed the insertion of such a definition, and the statement appearing in the official minutes of the Conference shows that the grounds upon which that objection was based were that it is impossible to draw the distinction between aggression and defense, and that the acts and conduct that from one side's viewpoint are defense from the other side's viewpoint may be a provocation for war.

Senator GREEN. It is true of many other phases of human thought. It is impossible to draw the exact line of demarcation, yet you know there is a line somewhere. There is a distinction between right and wrong, and you cannot draw the line between them that there is between the animal kingdom and the vegetable kingdom, yet you know there is a difference, and there is a line of distinction.

Mr. FARMER. But if you have to wait until the war comes to draw that line and say, "This thing was aggressive and not defense," to wait and sit in judgment on perhaps the defeated, the vanquished, in the war, then we are not able to prevent war.

My point is that in advance, looking forward, we are not able to make such a distinction. And we could not, in our own country, make such a distinction. If Tennessee and Kentucky were trying to keep the peace by Tennessee maintaining an army and Kentucky maintaining an army just for defense, I am pretty sure that some hostilities would occur, all for defense. So that under our system we have abandoned those notions and have set up a system for the enforcement of law through courts.

Senator GREEN. But you are not abolishing State police for that reason.

Mr. FARMER. No, no; but that is a kind of a small force. They are constabulary.

Senator GREEN. It is the same thing in theory.

Mr. FARMER. No; this is quite different. If Tennessee and Kentucky and Arkansas and Mississippi decided that there was danger from Ohio and Michigan and Nebraska, and the best thing they could do would be to build up a military force to prevent an attack from being made, that would be disruptive of our system of government. We don't have that. Our police force in Tennessee, our State guard, is just purely for internal policing. It is not susceptible of being used for any attack outside of the State, and could not lawfully be used that way.

Senator GREEN. A fire department is a defensive and not an offensive organization. It is to put out fires. Suppose two adjoining towns each had a fire department. Could they not enter into an agreement that they would come to the rescue of each other in case of a fire breaking out?

Mr. FARMER. Frankly, I do not see the analogy between the fire department and military forces.

Senator GREEN. You are trying to prove that this is unconstitutional?

Mr. FARMER. The fire department has no relation to warfare, to violence. It is just for putting out fires.

Senator GREEN. That may be, but the same theory applies.

You are trying to prove it is unconstitutional, are you not?

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF TREATY

Mr. FARMER. And I never quite got my point over, and that is this: This treaty is for 20 years. It is expected by these other governments that the Government of the United States over this period will come to their assistance, mutual assistance and mutual aid, with arms; yet, by the Constitution of the United States, article I, clause 8, Congress is prohibited from appropriating money for armies, even our own Army, for a longer period than 2 years.

Senator GREEN. You are ignoring the fact. It has been stated categorically that there has been no agreement to supply arms to these countries, and you are ignoring that fact. Does that not affect the constitutionality?

Mr. FARMER. I do not think I am ignoring the fact. I do not think it is a fact that is so much expressed as it is implicit in the scheme.

Senator GREEN. We may wish to.

Mr. FARMER. Could I have permission to file this statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you may file it.

(Statement entitled "What's Wrong With the North Atlantic Pact?" was filed with the committee.)

The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask you, do you give all your time to this world-government organization?

Mr. FARMER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. You said you had retired from the practice of law?

Mr. FARMER. I would not say "retired." That is not quite the right slant. Except for winding up two or three cases that were pending when I quit, I am devoting full time to this.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you get a salary?

Mr. FARMER. No, sir. I get anybody who wants to help me. I take their contributions.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you get a good many contributions?

Mr. FARMER. Not enough.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg, have you any questions?

Senator VANDENBERG. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You are excused.

Reverend Cotton, how long is your statement?

Reverend COTTON. My full statement will require 30 minutes. I do not know your time for lunch, so I state it will be about 30 minutes for the full statement.

The CHAIRMAN. We cannot guarantee that you will get a full 30 minutes, so you will have to wait.

George Hartman, chairman of the War Resisters League.

Mr. RICHARDS. Professor Hartman was unable to come, and I have been asked to take his place. My name is Edward C. M. Richards.

The CHAIRMAN. How long is your statement?

Mr. RICHARDS. A couple of pages. I suppose I can get through in 5 minutes, maybe 10.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Give the reporter your name, your business, whom you represent, and any other background you care to submit.

STATEMENT OF EDWARD C. M. RICHARDS, WAR RESISTERS LEAGUE

Mr. RICHARDS. My name is Edward C. M. Richards.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you live, Mr. Richards?

Mr. RICHARDS. I live on a farm outside of West Chester, Pa. My address is R. D. 3, West Chester, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent?

Mr. RICHARDS. I represent the War Resisters League, of which Professor Hartman is the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. RICHARDS. My name is Edward C. M. Richards and I live on the farm that I operate outside of West Chester, Pa. I have come here as representative of the War Resisters League, of 5 Beekman Street, New York City.

The War Resisters League is a section of the War Resisters International, which has its headquarters in England, with sections in many countries over many parts of the world. The War Resisters League is convinced that war is a crime against humanity and is therefore opposed to war in any form, under any circumstances, and for any cause whatsoever. In presenting this testimony for the league, I do so for the reason that in the league's judgment the North Atlantic Defense Pact is in reality a war measure, and would, if ratified, make for war and not for peace. Being opposed to war, as such, therefore, the War Resisters League is opposed to the North Atlantic Defense Pact.

The War Resisters League opposes the North Atlantic Defense Pact for many reasons. I shall speak upon only some of them, viz:

COMPATIBILITY WITH UN CHARTER

1. The diplomatic language used in the North Atlantic Defense Pact might lead the unwary to imagine that it is consistent with the Charter of the United Nations, a careful reading of the document shows this is not the case. The real purpose of the pact is to form a military alliance among the 12 nations involved, such military alliance being aimed at the Soviet Union and its satellite nations. Soviet Russia is an important member of the United Nations. It is quite clear that under the Charter of the United Nations there is no place for the organizing of one group of member nations in a military alliance which deliberately threatens with war another group of United Nation members. Yet that is just what the North Atlantic Defense Pact does. The proof of this lies in the fact that neither Russia nor any of its satellite nations have been asked to join in the Atlantic Defense Pact. If the supporters of the Atlantic Defense Pact wish to prove that the pact is not aimed at Soviet Russia, let them invite the Soviet Union to join in signing the document. Until this is done, the War Resisters League cannot believe that the North Atlantic Defense Pact is not outside of and contrary to the fundamental purposes and Charter of the United Nations, and is just another in the age-long list of futile, costly, provocative, military alliances which during the past 50 years have repeatedly led Europe and the world into ever-increasingly destructive wars.

MILITARIZATION OF UNITED STATES

2. The War Resisters League has followed the progress of the militarization of the United States and the growth of the influence of military minded men in determining the foreign policy of the United States Government. The North Atlantic Defense Pact is the crowning folly to date of this militarization. It, however, has this value in that it lays bare the naked reliance of its supporters upon armed force and war. In article 3 of the pact the signers agree to "maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack." Translated into everyday English this means that the signers agree to keep their armed forces as large as they are at present, and also to enlarge them and to help each other in this enlargement. The result would mean not only an arms race among the signers, but a constantly growing threat to those nations in the world who are not signers. History shows that such armament races end in war, destruction and collapse. For this reason the War Resisters League is opposed to the North Atlantic Defense Pact.

COST OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

3. The tentative cost for the first year of the operation of the North Atlantic Defense Pact plus military aid to Greece and Turkey, and so forth, has been stated as approximately $1,450,000,000. This huge sum would be in addition to the stupendous military budget demand of $16,000,000,000. In the light of the findings of the Hoover Commission as to the waste of taxpayers' money by the armed services, the miserable citizen, who is to supply this added cash out of his fast-shrinking savings, may well cry out in protest. Even if it was assured that no waste was to occur, the spending of all this money to supply guns and military equipment to assorted foreign countries is fantastic.

The United States spent such sums on shipping arms to China and today much of such military equipment is in the hands of the Chinese Communists. What is to prevent the same thing from happening under the North Atlantic Defense Pact lend-lease plan? The War Resisters League raises its voice in protest against the whole idea. It is strongly against the North Atlantic Defense Pact for financial reasons. It is opposed to handing the armed services money to finance Operation Rathole via military lend-lease to Europe.

The fundamental difficulty faced by our Government today is that its foreign policy has been too much determined by military-minded men. Military-minded men know how to win a war. They have shown clearly that they do not know how to make peace. What is needed is a basic shift in attitude, seeking to establish trust and confidence between nations. It is confidence and trust and simple honesty that are the foundations of peace. Under the influence of military-minded men our Government has been acting on the basis of establishing peace on a foundation of fear and threats. Peace cannot be established in that way. The North Atlantic Defense Pact is a "show of force," a threat. The War Resisters League is convinced that its greatest contribution to peace today is to urge you gentlemen of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to oppose the ratification of the North Atlantic Defense Pact.

WAR IS NOT A SOLUTION TO ANY PROBLEM

The CHAIRMAN. Your organization is against any kind of war at any time, anyhow?

Mr. RICHARDS. Yes. We feel that war in itself is destructive. It doesn't produce the results hoped for.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose this country should be invaded by a foreign nation and war made upon us. You would oppose our going to war to resist it?

Mr. RICHARDS. That is right. We feel that in the long run it would not result in the good that we had hoped for. For instance, an illustration is the great Civil War, the War Between the States. There it happened, almost a hundred years ago, and you know and I know that you can go down to South Carolina and Mississippi and still find people who are bitter against the "damned Yankees."

The CHAIRMAN. You can find some up North that are bitter against the "damned Southerners."

Mr. RICHARDS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a one-way street.

Mr. RICHARDS. Oh, no. I am not blaming the South a bit, not at all. Half of my people are from the South, so that does not enter. But what I am saying is that the result of the Civil War was that we won the victory, but there has been this tension ever since, even in our own country, and we contend that if we had not used that method of war we could have settled the slavery business down there peaceably and we would not have had all this tension.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you are probably right about some of that. But, for instance, the Confederate Army invaded Pennsylvania. They resisted and fought the battle of Gettysburg. If you had been living at that time you would have said to the southerners, "Come on and take Pennsylvania; we aren't going to fight you"?

Mr. RICHARDS. I happen to be another Quaker. You heard one this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. I have heard a good many here.

Mr. RICHARDS. I happen to be another one.

The CHAIRMAN. I respect the Quakers. I think they are a great people, but I just want to get your viewpoint. Suppose an army comes over and invades the United States and captures the Capitol and the White House and all that. You would not be in favor of resisting them at all? You would just say "Come on"?

Mr. RICHARDS. No; I would not say "Come on." Not at all. Don't misstate that.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't want to misquote you.

Mr. RICHARDS. We have had in the world today an excellent and very striking little text that has come to us in Philadelphia recently. We have had the demonstration of a whole nation that was able to get its freedom without war, the case of India. Now, of course, the circumstances are very complex, and I will not endeavor to go into it, but the sum of it is that a man that I know has recently been to India, and he has just returned, and on his way back he stopped over in Germany. He has had a chance to visit with Prime Minister Nehru and a lot of the other people in India, and when he got to Germany he was asked by the United States military government if he would not talk with a group of young men who had been trained in the Hitler youth movement, trained as Nazis, and this fellow said he started to talk to these Nazis, and they got so interested in it that when 12 o'clock midnight came they wouldn't stop, and they kept him talking there until 4 o'clock in the morning, and the reason for that was this, that these boys had all been trained with the idea that the world was going to be made better by means of force and violence, and here this fellow came along, fresh from India, saying that a better world can be made by nonviolent means. It was so new that these Hitler boys were completely intrigued with it, and they kept him up until 4 o'clock in the morning asking questions about how it had been done in India.

The answer to your question is that there are other means of resisting attack, resisting aggression, than trying to fight with guns.

ATTACK ON PEARL HARBOR

Senator VANDENBERG. For example, what would you have done at Pearl Harbor?

Mr. RICHARDS. In the first place, I would not have allowed, if I had had any say, the situation to get to that point.

Senator VANDENBERG. That would have been a good idea.

Mr. RICHARDS. I would have stopped, for instance, the shipment of scrap iron to Japan for all of those years that that took place, helping Japan to start the war in China. I would have stopped that. I would have said, "It isn't the thing to do. We don't want to help Japan doing that."

Senator VANDENBERG. There is much to be said for that, but you confront a fact: An attack at Pearl Harbor. What would you do?

Mr. RICHARDS. As I said, I would not have let it happen. If it had happened, I would not have precipitated it.

Senator VANDENBERG. All right. We would not have precipitated it, but we would have tried to stop it. It happens. What would you have done?

Mr. RICHARDS. I would not have gone to war about it.

Senator VANDENBERG. What would you have done?

Mr. RICHARDS. I would have immediately endeavored to get a peace conference started between Japan and the United States, immediately.

Senator VANDENBERG. But this attack is coming down out of the sky on Sunday morning. Now what are you going to do on Sunday afternoon? Are you going to fight back, or are you not going to fight back?

Mr. RICHARDS. The first thing to do would have been to try to pick up the pieces of the people that were injured and try to get them in the hospital, of course. But so far as the authorities were concerned, to my mind the thing to do was to try to prevent it going any further, which would mean by trying to get together and form a peace conference with the Japanese.

Senator VANDENBERG. You would not have fought back on Sunday afternoon and tried to protect what was left?

Mr. RICHARDS. No; I think that was a mistake. That, of course, meant going right ahead at the war business.

To put it in a personal matter, if somebody comes up and slaps my face the natural and human thing which anybody would feel would be that you would slap him back and hit him. But there is something in the idea of not doing so. There is, of course, a long Quaker tradition. The Quakers have managed to live for a long time and they have done a lot of good in the world, and they do not believe in this fighting business. They believe there is a better way. I think there is something that you gentlemen might well consider.

Senator VANDENBERG. I do not disagree with that at all, my friend, and I have the profoundest respect for the Quaker position. I had never understood, however, that the Quaker position would accept an attack such as occurred at Pearl Harbor without any resistance at the moment to try to salvage any part of the situation.

Mr. RICHARDS. Now, wait a minute. If I may say this, Senator, I don't take it upon myself to speak as a representative of American or world Quakerism. When you get on this subject, all I can do is to tell my own personal ideas as a Quaker.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is all I am asking about.

Mr. RICHARDS. And as I said, I think that the thing that would have been hardest to do, undoubtedly, but most effective and most constructive, would have been to call a peace conference immediately, and try to settle the difficulty without a continuation of the war. I will grant you it would be very difficult, but I think that in the light of the present world situation it is a real idea, and Ghandi's work there I think has given us a real lead.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you one question. You say you would have called a peace conference with Japan. Didn't we have a peace conference with Japan at that very moment going on here in Washington? Didn't Japan have two of her diplomatic representatives here and, pending their discussions, was not the attack made?

Mr. RICHARDS. So far as I have been able to delve into the historical record as shown by Dr. Charles Beard's book, President Roosevelt and the Coming of World War, 1941—I don't know whether you have seen that—

The CHAIRMAN. Don't you know, though, that those two representatives of Japan were here in conference with the President and the Secretary of State and protesting armament and all that, and at the very moment Japan was preparing to commit murder at Pearl Harbor? Isn't that so?

The CHAIRMAN. Then that peace conference you are talking about would have been useless and hypocritical in that the Japanese were not indulging in taking peaceful means but were bent on conquest and murder and all of the ravages of war. Is that not true?

Mr. RICHARDS. I think you are overlooking something. Wait a minute. I want to say this, if I might. These people who were representing Japan here, talking peace, were not being met with the right attitude by the Americans. The whole thing was a tricky shifting around, dodging in and out, and there wasn't a frank, honest, open desire to settle it. It was tricky.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you reflect upon everything that our people did to try to adjust this matter, and you are boosting the Japanese who were here with words of peace on their lips and a dagger in their hands.

Mr. RICHARDS. I do not agree with that, Senator. I am not boosting the Japanese at all, not a bit, not a particle. Rather, I am criticizing the whole crowd, both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, that is all.

Do you have any more questions?

Senator VANDENBERG. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. We will excuse you. Carry back our greetings to the Quakers. We respect them and have a great affection for them.

I will hear one more witness and then we are going to recess. Mrs. Robert Harrison, of Memphis, Tenn.

STATEMENT OF MRS. ROBERT R. HARRISON, GLEN RIDGE, N. J.

Mrs. HARRISON. Aren't you hungry?

The CHAIRMAN. I am hungry for information.

Mrs. HARRISON. I hope I may give you some.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent?

Mrs. HARRISON. A world citizen's point of view. That is what my attitude is.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not represent any organization?

Mrs. HARRISON. Just myself and my own opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Your own views and your own opinion?

Mrs. HARRISON. That's right.

The CHAIRMAN. You live in Memphis, do you?

Mrs. HARRISON. No; I am a resident of Glen Ridge, N. J. I was born in Tennessee, and the correspondence between Mr. O'Day and myself has been carried on from Memphis, my old home town.

The CHAIRMAN. How long is your statement?

Mrs. HARRISON. My statement is an oral statement. I lost my "specs" on the way driving from Memphis, and I borrowed some magnifying glasses, so I haven't written it. I promised Mr. O'Day I would give a written record, but I haven't been able to.

The CHAIRMAN. You may speak and you don't need to write it. He will take your statement down.

Mrs. HARRISON. I have a telegram here which I sent, unsigned, to the President, on April 4, when he was in Secretary Acheson's office with the others who signed the North Atlantic Defense Pact. Twenty-four hours before that pact was signed I was alone in my home in Glen Ridge, and because of certain convictions I had I got on the train and came down to Washington and tried all day long in this Senate Office Building to get one lone Senator to listen to what I had to say.

One year ago in January, feeling I was ignorant as to what I should know as an American citizen or as a world citizen, I decided that the place to get information was at the place of attack by most of the people of the world. You people have my sympathy, you Senators and that Congress and our Government, and I sort of feel as if I want to have a part at clearing up the misunderstandings which exist between so many peoples of the world, and our Government.

OPPOSITION TO PACT

I believe in the Constitution and I believe that you Senators and our Government believe in it. Now you will want to know, "What do you think of the Atlantic Pact?" Perhaps you are thinking at this moment that I am getting off the subject. What has this got to do with your attitude with regard to the North Atlantic Pact? If I read to you my telegram, which is all I had to voice my opinion and attitude toward the pact at the time I was helpless to do anything about the pact, it will show my feeling. This telegram I got yesterday from the main office. I came here. I had gone up to the main office, sort of feeling that perhaps there would be a difficulty, because these people here in this building told me there perhaps would be difficulty even getting it out of the files of the Western Union. I went up myself to the Western Union office.

Now, Mr. O'Day, may I say just before I read this, was the only person in 1½ years in your Foreign Relations Committee room in the Capitol who listened to me and gave me a chance.

The CHAIRMAN. You had not been here a whole year and a half, had you, before you got to see Mr. O'Day?

Mrs. HARRISON. I had been coming down. I had been here on four trips to Washington on my own. This was the fourth trip, and today makes the fifth day.

To the President, Mr. Truman, and to those signing the Atlantic Pact, care of Mr. Acheson, of the State Department, Washington, D. C.:

In the name of God, in whom many in America and the world trust, in the name of the freedom-loving peoples of the world, I send you this message. These freedom-loving peoples of the world are looking to our way of life proving superior and better than Russia's communistic way. Russia's way is ruling by force. That very same military force the Atlantic Pact expects to use if and when necessary to protect only about a quarter of the world's population. Please do not sign this pact just now. If you do, you will be signing the death warrant of democracy, No. 1; No. 2, the death warrant of the United Nations; No. 3, the death warrant of the power of the United States to protect the democracies of other countries as well as her own. Our Government cannot protect itself except by force of arms, which is undemocratic.

THE VOICE OF THE FREEDOM LOVING PEOPLES OF THE WORLD.

I dare to sign that and today I dare to stand before you as a volunteer—I am to sit before you—and to volunteer as an ambassadress of peace. I have been living in Korea, China, and India for 24 years. My family has been receiving from the Orient our very life. Now, because I have received so much from my own country, my own native land for 30 years before I was chosen to represent a group who asked me to go out and teach our way of life, because I married out of this group and into the business world I now stand before you, not only as an American citizen but as a citizen of the world, because my family, you see, began in Korea. Our children were born in Seoul, they have been educated in the system of British and American schools in China, and in India, so don't you see my point of view is a point of view which is no longer that of only a person who has been receiving his life or living in this country all of his life, but may I say that I see a danger in the Atlantic Pact as discriminating against three-quarters of the millions of the peoples of this earth who want to be free from the very same thing that we wish to be freed from, which is the type of life that will destroy the "four freedoms?"

FEAR—THE BASIS OF THE PACT

I see in this Atlantic Pact, because I have been studying mass psychology, the psychiatrists' point of view, the psychologists' point of view, and all of these attitudes of mind which they say will defeat an individual's success, and I see in this Atlantic Pact there is an element of fear which is the basis of the very pact itself, and because we are afraid we are taking this try and this organ and we are using it, and there is good in it, Senator. I am not fighting against the good that it may do to secure a few people in Europe, but I wonder if we aren't making a mistake, we in the American Government who represent the democracies and are trying to free the world and make the world secure. I am wondering if an alliance will not cripple us and handicap us in the future. I am wondering if it is not a short-sighted policy which is going to make trouble for us in the future.

WORLD TRADE AND COMMERCE

For instance, I have been out of the business world for 26 years. My husband is still out there. He is in Siam now. All right. What we need for the prosperity of our America and the world is commerce and trade, is it not? All right. Let's look at this Atlantic Pact. We have been talking about sanctions and what we could do as a government in case we wish to use this method of sanctions. And perhaps we would not have to go to a war if there was a war in Europe. But suppose three-quarters of the millions of the world would decide to join with the Communists?

Now, at the present time, India has just become an independent country. We don't know how India is going. We do know that a type of communism is in China which is a Moscow-controlled communism. China is an old friend. She depends, and has depended, on our faith. Somehow or other I feel we should, perhaps, with regard to China just now, do as we have done in previous times with exiled governments, continue to give China confidence, this little tiny remains of the Republic of China, if we could just somehow or other give them courage or some support or some help.

All right. Now India. If India remains nonviolent, if these other countries remain friendly toward us, well and good. We do not know what would happen if the other countries of the world would become so tied up and blocked as China is today. We have needed China's business in the past. Is that not so, Senator? Will we not need India's business? And will we not need these other businesses? But in China, I understand, we have crippled ourselves so with regard to getting over to North China—if I am mistaken please correct me—on transportation that we cannot do business. Therefore we are willing to come out of China and have nothing more, and leave them to the Communists, because we can no longer make money out of China.

All right. Suppose other countries become so that they can't do business? What then is going to happen to our trade and commerce? So don't you see from that point of view, as one who is and has received all of her light, you see, from the Orient, that I am speaking from that point of view of trying to look into the future and speak for a world organization which will make collective security of all the countries?

So what is good for us—trade, commerce, education, all of those things that will build for peace, build a relationship on which we can build a new world of peace and brotherhood.

IMPORTANCE OF OTHER AREAS

It seems to me that we are not quite on the right way to this cementing of relations of all the peoples of the world. In a democracy, as in a family, if we are to save our family from some outside enemy, each member of that family must be loyal, must work together and cooperate for the mutual good and welfare of that family. So, as a family of nations, how can we be interested as an American Government, which should be an arbitrator, a peace maker, working not only for Europe. Yes, the North Atlantic Pact is all right. Let us work with and cooperate with Europe, but what are we going to do? We have a Pacific Ocean on the other side. Are we going to be silent with regard to what is going to happen on the Pacific Ocean? If we could only now, at this present time, begin to talk about a Pacific Pact. And, you know, saving the face of the Oriental is a serious thing, Senator. Are you listening?

The CHAIRMAN. I am listening.

Mrs. HARRISON. I was in Japan in 1924 when the Exclusion Act was made a law. My husband said, "Don't go out in the street today, dear. You might be subject to some insult."

I said, "But please, may I go out, because that is the only way I can learn and see what the reaction is?" I have a passion for learning to understand other peoples of the world, to see what their points of view are. So I made an excuse of going to the bank, and I went and did some banking that morning.

The Japanese businessmen were lined ahead of me and, according to their custom, this noise that they make and their courtesy of bowing, the first thing I knew, instead of being at the end of the line I was at the cashier's window, and so apparently, you see, Japan was going to accept this European, this foreigner, and not let her know really how they felt, slapped in the face and insulted.

But do you know what happened immediately after that? I was asked to teach English to the families at Keijo University. Do you know that the Government of Japan at that time began to send out the best brains and the best minds, families, and they supported those families to live over in Germany, to learn how the Nazi military tactics were to be carried on in case of war. They came back, all of them, and helped Japan to become our No. 2 enemy.

Senator, I am sure none of you men here have forgotten, and I surely know how serious it is to insult an oriental, to make him lose face.

Well, I don't think any of us like to lose face, and I believe we can save our face now before the world. I know all those things. I have been living out there. I know what they are saying against us. And I will fight these people who just talk against us without knowing facts.

But here is what I would like to beg of you. Let's do something now that will save the face of America, of the American Government and of the American people, and save the other peoples of the world who are afraid of us. Give them something that will no longer make them afraid of us and therefore our enemies, and that will precipitate them into some sort of scheme or something whereby they will become our enemies.

So let us try, and I seem to feel that there is a way, now, if we would talk about another organization. I know we cannot do what we want to do with the United Nations on account of the veto. Couldn't we very cleverly do something in a world organization which will be perhaps regional pacts. Let's have one, the North Atlantic Pact. We need it. It is right. All right, let's have an Oriental Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you for the North Atlantic Pact?

Mrs. HARRISON. For everything in the Atlantic Pact that will build for peace.

POSITION ON THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. You are the judge of that. Are you for the Atlantic Pact or against it?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not a whole 100 percent for it, because I think—

The CHAIRMAN. What percent are you for it?

Mrs. HARRISON. I am the worst mathematician in the world. I don't know how to make that percent really honest. I want to be honest. I want to be sincere. I know we are accused of dishonesty and insincerity, and I am not avoiding your question and I am going to answer it. Insofar as the Atlantic Pact preserves the peace of the world and defends democracy, I am for the Atlantic Pact. Does that answer you, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, I think so—in a way.

Mrs. HARRISON. Do you want to ask me another question?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I do not want to ask you any.

Mrs. HARRISON. May I ask you one?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; you may.

Mrs. HARRISON. I am not so convinced that the basis for the Atlantic Pact is altogether democratic. I am against anything that isn't democratic. But tell me—maybe I am not informed about it. But do you know whether or not this European Pact, may I call it?—

The CHAIRMAN. No; you may not call it that.

MOTIVES BEHIND THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Mrs. HARRISON. All right, the North Atlantic Defense Pact—would you tell me if it is in some way trying to secure what the military people and military forces are going to depend on in the next war, which would be oil?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh—

Mrs. HARRISON. I hear all these criticisms about it. I am asking you, could it be that they are trying to protect the Arabian pipe line? I don't know. I wonder. There must be something. You see, in all history back of every war it is said that the citizens within the country betray the country before an outside enemy comes in to conquer us and betray us. I can't tell you how much I want this question answered. I know I was in Tientsin—

The CHAIRMAN. That is all very interesting about Tientsin, but let's get on with this subject. We are talking about this treaty now.

Mrs. HARRISON. I know we are.

The CHAIRMAN. We are trying to.

Mrs. HARRISON. And that is what I am trying to get at. I want to ask you a question with regard to business. You see, I don't want us to be betrayed by some group within our America that has selfish interests, and because of its power are a united group who have been the ones who have signed the Atlantic Pact. Don't you see what I am getting at?

The CHAIRMAN. No, I don't.

Mrs. HARRISON. Would you be interested to ask me a question, then?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I have asked you one question and you didn't answer it. I asked you, were you for the pact or against it. You do not seem to have made up your own mind. You are here to advise this committee whether we ought to ratify this pact or reject it. You refuse to tell us which side you are on. You are for the Koreans and the Indians and the people over in Asia, but I want to talk about this treaty.

Mrs. HARRISON. Don't you realize that I am first and foremost for my country of America?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes; that is true.

Mrs. HARRISON. When you have lived outside of the country you appreciate your own country more when you get back and you will be willing to sacrifice and go to more sacrifices.

The CHAIRMAN. I have never been abroad but what I was glad to get back to the United States of America.

Mrs. HARRISON. I have my first home in 16 years. I just now bought it, and you can't know how much I appreciate for the first time in 26 years being a citizen. So, Senator, I am just trying to find out if a group, or if there is not a danger of a certain group, misinterpreting us or, well, I would say, destroying our heritage. Could it be that now, with this North Atlantic Pact, we might be selling our birth right, which is the heritage of democracy, for a mess of pottage?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mrs. HARRISON. That is what is concerning me so much.

The CHAIRMAN. You asked me that question. My answer is "no." It is to protect democracy. It is to protect the peoples that believe in democracy and protect their independence and their security.

Mr. HARRISON. But only over here on the Atlantic Ocean, and we have a Pacific Ocean here too.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand. We can't do it all at once.

Mrs. HARRISON. Don't you think it would be wiser now if we were to have a Pacific Pact?

The CHAIRMAN. I think we had better stick to our last until we get through with this job. All these questions about "Let's go over beyond here" are beyond what we are trying to do. We are trying to find out about this Atlantic Pact. You don't seem to know whether you are for it or against it, so you are not of much help to the committee when you do not know your own mind.

Mrs. HARRISON. I told you, please, awhile ago, when you asked me, that I was for it insofar as it would protect the democracies of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what it is designed for.

Mrs. HARRISON. A world government and world peace. I am for it if it does that.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what our purpose in mind is.

Mrs. HARRISON. I want to be sure it is going to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. We do not know what the future is going to hold.

Mrs. HARRISON. We have to make ourselves secure for the future, and we have to know whether or not this North Atlantic Defense Pact is going to secure our future, Senator. That is all I am concerned about.

The CHAIRMAN. We think so.

All right; thank you very much for your testimony.

The committee will take a recess until 2:30.

(Whereupon, at 12:45 p. m., a recess was taken until 2:30 p. m. of the same day.)

(The committee reconvened at 4:30 p. m. at the expiration of the recess.)

The CHAIRMAN. Joseph L. Bradford?

Mr. BRADFORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long is your statement?

Mr. BRADFORD. Three or four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent, where do you live and what do you do?

STATEMENT OF JOSEPH L. BRADFORD, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mr. BRADFORD. My name is Joseph Bradford. I represent no organization. I live in Philadelphia, 1625 Walnut Street. I just took the day off from work to come down and tell the Senate committee why I am in opposition to the North Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. We will be glad to hear you. Go right ahead.

Mr. BRADFORD. I am a machinist by trade. I have been a workingman all my life and all my life I have been active in trade-unions and in everything that affects unions. And being interested in unions, naturally, I am interested in the things that affect my fellow workingmen and the people of my country.

I am for peace and for everything that will help keep the peace between our country and the world; therefore, I am against the North Atlantic Pact and its entangling alliances.

I was a sincere and constant supporter of our late President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, primarily because of the benefits and gains that the workingman was able to obtain during his administrations. And I do not propose to sit idly by and keep my mouth shut when I look around me and see everything that we gained during Roosevelt's administration go down the drain. Since Roosevelt's death everything he stood for and I stand for has been abandoned. It was his efforts to bring about victory over the enemy and lasting peace for the world that took him to Yalta. It was at Yalta that the Three Great Powers met and agreed to work together after victory. The North Atlantic Pact voids the Yalta agreements and divides the world in two. Roosevelt showed the world that the United States and Russia could work together in peacetime as well as in wartime. The North Atlantic Pact provides for a military alliance that excludes Russia and therefore destroys all the efforts of Roosevelt whose policy for world peace was founded upon cooperation with Russia.

REARMAMENT AND THE TREATY

If the administration and the pact supporters are sincere in their belief that this is a peace pact why then does not the administration have the intestinal fortitude to tell the American people that along with this so-called peace pact goes the expenditure of untold and unknown billions of dollars for arms? We have already appropriated over $15,000,000,000 for arms and rearming and if we continue spending most all of our income for arms, how are we going to get the things that every American workingman is vitally interested in?

In the city where I live, housing conditions are terrible. Unemployment or the fear of unemployment is affecting almost everyone I know. Factories are beginning to shut down and throw their employees on the street with no place to turn. Most everyone I know is asking, "Are we in the beginning of another depression like the dreaded depression of 1929? Are the bread lines and soup lines coming back again?"

Tell me, Senators, how is it that we can spend billions on arms but become so miserly when it comes to providing money for the things that people need so badly today? We need billions, not millions, for public works that will provide needed employment for the unemployed. We need billions, not millions, for the over one-half of our population who are ill-housed, and at the same time provide jobs at decent pay for the unemployed.

If I could only convince you Senators, to stop spending billions upon billions for arms and spend a goodly part of that to meet the people's needs here at home; then you would make democracy work. Let's stop this war spending and spend for peace and we will have peace and not pacts that breed war.

I think I speak for the untold millions who want peace and, therefore, I urge you in all humility to reject the North Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a war veteran, aren't you?

Mr. BRADFORD. No, sir. I did not serve in this war.

The CHAIRMAN. In any war?

Mr. BRADFORD. In neither war, that is right.

The CHAIRMAN. You got a job?

Mr. BRADFORD. I have a job.

The CHAIRMAN. You are complaining about unemployment. You have a job, haven't you?

Mr. BRADFORD. I had it when I left yesterday. The plant I am working in has laid off 40 people last Friday.

The CHAIRMAN. They didn't lay you off?

Mr. BRADFORD. Not me.

The CHAIRMAN. You laid yourself off.

Mr. BRADFORD. I took today off to come down here.

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad you came. You are getting satisfactory pay, aren't you?

Mr. BRADFORD. I am not complaining about that. But I have an interest in the people. That is why I am down here.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a sort of a missionary for others. But I am talking about yourself. You are getting along all right, you are getting satisfactory pay, and you have a job, is that true?

Mr. BRADFORD. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you do?

Mr. BRADFORD. I am a machinist.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind?

Mr. BRADFORD. I work in a tool room, making tools and dies.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. BRADFORD. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Tittman.

STATEMENT OF A. O. TITTMAN, KEW GARDENS, N. Y.

Mr. TITTMAN. Mr. Chairman, Senators, I am glad that I again have the opportunity to present to you my views; this time on the proposed "North Atlantic Security Alliance," as I did over a year ago on ERP.

I represent the Voters Alliance for Americans of German Ancestry the thousands of readers of my brochures and probably the wishes and opinion of many American citizens who, all propaganda of interested sources to the contrary, are still isolationists at heart but cannot make themselves heard.

The North Atlantic Security Alliance commits the American people to something about which they know little. It is, therefore, audacious to claim that they are in favor of it. An old-time Gallup poll might give the clue. Certain it is that 99 percent know little or nothing about it while 999 per thousand won't even go to the trouble to inform themselves. The greater, therefore, is the duty of those who have informed themselves to point out the dangers to the American people inherent in this pact.

This so-called defense treaty betrays a total lack of historic and geographic knowledge, and it is not difficult for its enemies at home and abroad to point out its unreliability. It is nothing but a document designed to perpetuate by force for its participants their territorial possessions, including those which can only be termed "loot" or "allocation," now the polite word for it, acquired through aggressive war, for an alleged waging of which most of the former German Government were executed.

GEOGRAPHIC SCOPE OF TREATY

Even the title is misleading. It is called the "Atlantic" Treaty, and in article 12 it speaks of "peace and security in the North Atlantic area," while in article 6 it includes "the Algerian departments of France" and "attacks on vessels or aircraft in this area of any of the parties." By no stretch of the imagination do these Algerian departments belong to the Atlantic. They are in the Mediterranean and belong in a Mediterranean pact, but they were probably included on France's insistence. Now let's examine a little closer the case of France. These Algerian departments which we are called on to protect, by force of arms, if necessary, are French only through armed French aggression. Their conquest began about 100 years ago, but was not completed until 1870 to 1871, when the Algerians rose in rebellion. The more recent conquests in Morocco do not seem to be included, although they border on the Atlantic, albeit not the North Atlantic. Are they supposed to be part of the "Algerian departments"?

Well, the French hold on north Africa is already challenged by the Arab League, and Abd-el-Krim, the famous Berber leader, now in Egypt, who fought the French so long, has vowed that he would devote the rest of his life to the liberation of Algeria and Morocco from the French. Behind Abd-el-Krim stands the Arab League, already antagonized by us through our pro-Jewish partisanship. Are we to protect the French conquerors of Africa against the liberation of these regions?

Then there is Alsace-Lorraine, German since the days of Caesar. 'The French stole some parts during the Thirty Years' War when Germany could not defend her territory. Strassburg fell into their hands through treason in 1681. Other parts did not fall into their hands until the French Revolution, including Muehlhausen, which until then belonged to Switzerland. The people are to this day German speaking, and all town names are German. The Rhine never was the frontier between France and Germany until French aggression made it so in the south. The racial and historic boundary ran along the top of the Vosges Mountains. East, everything was German, and west it was "Welsh" (French). When Marshal Weygand unveiled the statue to Marshal Turenne in Thann in 1932 he said, "Turenne was the first Frenchman to make Alsace French." What was it, then, before?

Turenne and Melac were the two French generals who devastated the Palatinate, blew up the wondrous Heidelberg Castle, and caused the German emigration to Pennsylvania. Incidentally, Germany never received reparation for this act of vandalism. But this treaty guarantees to France rich lands which don't belong to her historically, racially, or linguistically, and which she took by conquest. And what about the 100-percent German Saar which Secretary Marshall so glibly and precipitously handed over to the French without even consulting the wishes of the inhabitants? Is the Saar also protected by this treaty? Have we become a nation of prison wardens?

Then there are the lands in the Pas de Calais, east of Calais or Kahlen. There live 300,000 Dutch-speaking Teutons. When we once crossed from Dover to Calais, an English couple commented on the fairness of the porters. "Well, they are Germans," the husband said. Farther west there is Brittany whose people still talk their old British (Welsh) and can converse with the Welsh of Wales in their common tongue. There is quite a movement for national independence there. Still farther west we get to Biarritz, not a very French-sounding name. These Basques would like nothing better than to be reunited with their brothers in Spain. In the south around Perpignan we find Catalans, the same as in Barcelona, Spain, also with their own language which is neither French nor Spanish. Are we to guarantee to France all these possessions? The American people also deserve to know if this pact is to be valid in case, with De Gaulle at her head, France were to become a dictatorship.

THE TREATY AND THE ENTENTE CORDIALE

The proposed treaty of alliance is a pact for war like the Entente Cordiale. I have lived in England when Stanley Baldwin renewed it. I then told my British friends that while I had believed that never again would Britain and Germany fight each other, another war and Britain's participation was now assured. "Oh, that is only for defense," they said. But Britain not only wanted war herself; Churchill also talked France into the proper frame of mind to follow suit and honor her pact. So both declared war on Germany on September 1, 1939, and I heard both declarations over the radio in London at that time. It will be remembered that Baldwin resigned and handed his mess over to Chamberlain on a plea of ill health. But it killed Chamberlain while Baldwin was knighted and, I believe, is still alive.

Like the Entente Cordiale this is a war pact, and as our future allies are pitifully weak, unenthusiastic and unreliable, the whole weight would again fall on us, and our losses, bloody and otherwise, would far surpass those in the last war. Such a war would probably bankrupt us and turn us into a second-class nation. It might even end white predominance at home and result in our mongrelization.

Has Mr. Acheson ever considered what it would cost to be constantly prepared and which of the two sides could stand such tension longer? The Russian private gets the equivalent of about 10 cents a day, and he lives on the country. The American soldier gets at least $3 a day and his wants are much greater. Besides, in the matter of intervention and logistics, Russia, next-door neighbor to Germany would be there long before we or our allies could do anything effective.

GERMANY AND THE TREATY

What then should be our policy? We should certainly abandon our over-all policy toward Germany, written by Mr. Acheson when Assistant Secretary of State and our guide all this time. I called attention to the existence of this over-all policy but do not know if the Senate acquainted itself with it. The aim of that policy was to keep Germany fettered. It is not a policy written in the interest of a durable peace. It is punitive and destructive and the occupation statute and Ruhr control as well as other features prove that we are still following it. Mr. Acheson, it is said, is a fairly recent American. His father was a British-born clergyman, his mother a Canadian heiress. It should, therefore, not surprise you if some of us don't like Mr. Acheson's deck of cards. Not that he uses supernumerary aces but because there are too many Jacks in it—Union Jacks.

Before this last war Germany was the buffer against Russia, against Asia. She was the main support for Britain's balance of power. Unless we aspire to that prop ourselves, we should restore that balance by rearming Germany. She is the only country that would make a worth while ally, and she was never considered a threat by us until Britain turned her wrath on her. It is generally admitted that the Germans are the best soldiers in the world, and it is also said that without the 500,000 Germans and 300,000 Irish in the Union armies the North could not have won. Besides, German militarists and Junkers were very welcome here at the time, and the map of Gettysburg reads like an Almanac de Gotha. Nor did the South turn down German militarists at that time. Heros von Borke, a giant of a man and adjutant to General Johnstone, through his service and intrepidity, made a name for himself and became an almost legendary figure. Von Massow, in Mosby's cavalry was another. He later became commander of a Prussian Army Corps, but he returned for Confederate reunions and remained loyal to his friends and the Confederacy all his life.

The way to make of Germany a willing ally is to do away with all these restrictions, to take an interest in her recovery, not in her destruction. That's what General Clay meant when he said that the "punitive phase is over" and "construction should begin." Dismantling should stop absolutely. German lands should not be given to avaricious neighbors. The so-called Deutsche mark, which we imposed on Germany, should be valued at around 20 cents so that Germany could again sell in foreign markets. It was arbitrarily valued by us at 30 cents, far too high. No wonder the industrial exhibition in New York was a "complete flop" as Walter Winchell joyously announced. It has risen from a retail price in New York of 8 to 17 cents. Why we don't know, but some people here are making fortunes out of this rise. Personally, I would favor tying currencies of all major nations this side of the iron curtain to the dollar, as the pound has been tied for years. That largely maintained the British economy. Such a step would certainly increase western solidarity and recovery.

It is time that all this racial persecution and discrimination were stopped. In the long run it certainly pays to create just and decent imponderables. The Golden Rule applies everywhere, even among animals. A badly treated dog will fear but never love you, and an elephant with a grudge only bides his time to get even with you. It is not exactly fair either, this "stomping" on the down-and-outer, as we have been doing, especially as it concerns a country of our own, the white race.

In view of the fact that the German people without their stolen eastern provinces cannot support in their rump state the indigenous population, much less the 10 millions or so of the 15 to 20 millions that survived the unbelievable atrocities accompanying their expulsion and furthermore that these new boundaries are not confirmed or recognized, many Germans even now would side with the west if the return of these, to them, indispensable lands were held out to them because they hate communism. They have experienced it, and it is said that even German Communists have been weaned away from this perverted ideology through the conduct of the Red armies. Although I am aware of the leanings of the National Geographic Magazine, I am nevertheless surprised that on their new map of Europe accompanying the June number, it has accepted the Polish-made borders as final, has put the ancient German names in territories occupied by the Slavs in brackets but given fanciful Polish, Russian, and Czech names, freely invented, the place of honor. These names never existed before because no Slavs lived there. Is this an attempt to justify Slav claims to these stolen German lands? And why should a magazine accept a temporary occupation as final?

Most of the witnesses, I believe, have dwelt on how far this pact involves us, but I doubt if many or any have gone into its causes.

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE TREATY

Fundamentally, this treaty is to safeguard the integrity of Britain and if possible to reestablish her former European hegemony. Certainly the indispensability of Britain to us has become, through constant propaganda an axiom of our rulers, a fetish. But its direct cause is the result of the crazy, unconditional-surrender demand of Roosevelt and Churchill. That tragic, inhuman policy prolonged the war and brought about the complete destruction of Germany, creating a vacuum which the nearest strong power would fill, and that power was Red Russia. As a matter of fact, Russia was invited to come as deeply as possible into the heart of Europe, and our armies were withdrawn from large Germanic territories already occupied by them in favor of the Reds. That was a dreadful betrayal of western civilization and of the white race, for do not be deceived into thinking that the advance of the half-Mongolian Red hordes into Germany caused white eclipse in Europe alone. This betrayal also caused the retreat of the Caucasian race in many other parts of the world and with it the enhanced prestige of the colored or pigmented races. Not many here may be informed that Russia, after systematically exterminating the Baltic whites, has settled in their ancient lands and especially in East Prussia Mongolians from far off Asia, thus destroying all the culture of the white race in those parts.

This fateful development could have been halted if our Government had taken an intelligent, just, charitable, and far-sighted view of the situation instead of obeying the clamorers and whisperers among the millions of vindictive Shylocks in this country, who were not satisfied with the holocausts of Hamburg, Dresden, Wuerzburg, and nearly all larger German cities, who were not satisfied with the disappearance of one-third of the unfortunate expellees, with the stripping of present and past German wealth, but demanded unending punishment. Even now these strata are not satisfied, as the activities of the so-called Society for the Prevention of World War II of New York prove. This society, more properly called Society for the Extermination of the German People, financed from secret quarters on a tremendous scale, charging no dues, floods the country with its outpourings of insatiable hatred under the leadership of one E. Anselm Mowrer and is in large measure to blame for keeping open the wounds of war and preventing a decent settlement. This organization contains many leftists and refugee foreigners and can hardly be called an American society. Years ago I asked the House Committee on Un-American Activities to investigate this outfit, but it was not done.

The British General Fuller, in his recent book, has this to say about the unconditional-surrender policy which made possible the destruction of Germany:

Object of war is not slaughter and devastation but to persuade the enemy to change his mind. "Strategic bombing," politely so-called, was not only morally but militarily wrong and politically suicidal. One only has to look at central Europe to see this. In Germany the net result of the bombing of the cities was appalling slaughterings that would have disgraced Attila.

I am not at all happy over the thought that our country took the leading part in this insane, senseless, wholesale destruction and in the murder of millions. What will future generations say about our responsibility on viewing the ghastly ruins of the once peerless German cities, ruins that will prevail long after we are all dead, after centuries? Attila and Genghis Khan will certainly be superseded by the names of the men responsible for this unbelievable abomination.

POLICY TOWARD GERMANY

Instead of inventing all kinds of novel procedures, like trial on ex post facto basis of the German Government, confiscation of assets in Germany, abroad and even in neutral countries, dismantling and dynamiting of factories, "allocations" of coal, timber, potash and scrap, slave labor of PW's, et cetera, all things that violated every precedent and could have been legalized only through inclusion in a treaty of peace, we should have helped to heal the wounds of war and made peace years ago, as always has been done heretofore. Then there would have been less friction with Russia and the danger of a new war would not have existed. I think that our statesmen know that their conduct has not been conducive to peace and that it is one reason why they don't want to terminate the occupation. In 1871, after the end of the Franco-Prussian War, it was largely held here in America that France was not responsible for the acts of Napoleon III and should go scot-free, and this in spite of the fact that the French National Assembly practically unanimously voted for war and that the whole of the French people was in favor of it. But when Germany was compelled to go to war with Britain and France after they had declared war on her, no punishment for resisting aggression against her can be severe enough. Such is the illogicalness of "public opinion."

It is said that every war has in it the seeds of another war unless the vanquished is exterminated or treated with moderation. Abraham Lincoln believed in moderation, or he would not have said:

with charity for all and malice toward none.

Would that our country had produced another Lincoln in our time. After the Napoleonic Wars there was a long period of peace because the interests of the vanquished French were so considered that Talleyrand was said to have emerged the victor from the Congress of Vienna.

STATUS QUO AND THE TREATY

This new treaty certainly turns us away from our real destiny, makes us the guarantor of the status quo everywhere, and propels us into channels full of hidden obstacles and pitfalls. Far more momentous than the Monroe Doctrine, it will, if adhered to, involve us in about every quarrel, and who will say that disputes will not arise again or do not exist right now? There is war in China, in the Dutch and French colonies of Asia. The Palestine war has been settled temporarily until one side has caught its second breath. There is race tension in South Africa. The peace of Russia's satellites is forced. Northern Ireland is a bone of contention. Distribution of the ex-Italian colonies contains dynamite. Ethiopia is on the alert. In central Europe there is peace; the peace of the graveyard. It is quiet because one side is disarmed, starving, and powerless to move, unable to assert even its most primitive rights. Tinder everywhere. Plenty of prospects for Uncle Sam. And the Atlantic treaty is supposed to subdue all such conflicting interests through force of arms. Might makes right after all, it seems. A far cry from what the United States once stood for—the friend of all and enemy of none. That is what the one-worlders have gotten us into. Wars can be averted only by reconciling as far as possible conflicting aims and ambitions and by restraint. Where is the permanent peace promised to us?

ABANDONMENT OF TRADITIONAL POLICY

Primarily responsible for the state of affairs are President Roosevelt and the 17 millions which, according to repeated Gallup polls were for active intervention. Not responsible are the 83 percent consistently opposed to active intervention. Responsible also is our system of Government which gives the Executive too much power, and lets him prepare for any war he wants to engage in. Already when a boy my grandmother told me that "every 4 years we elect an absolute monarch," other forms of dictatorship not being thought of at that time. When the country was founded, executive prerogatives were tailored to the figure of Washington. If the Secretary of State were chosen by the Congress and responsible to it, we would then have a better right to call ourselves a democracy which, in a political sense, we are not.

The present situation is the result of our meddling in Europe, the erroneous belief that Britain is our first line of defense when in reality she has been the cause of our involvement and we are her defense. The Frankenstein of Red Russia is the child of Roosevelt and Churchill. The record of our new allies does not justify optimism. Britain proved in two wars her inability to win, even with all her European allies. France showed she has become a minor nation. Italy would not defend her African empire and not even her home country. She let the Germans fight for her. Even against tiny Greece she made no headway until the Germans turned the Greek flank. The Dutch and Belgians have no taste for war. Besides, Holland is entirely and Belgium one-half Teutonic in race and speech. But there remains Luxemburg.

I know that tiny state. It might provide a corporal's guard. Some of these countries have strong pro-Russian minorities. These are our allies that Mr. Acheson counts on to defend "our frontier on the Rhine," to hold it until we are ready. A recent rumor has it that the west Germans are slated to provide the light infantry with which to absorb the Russian shock, but that would depend on the Germans. At present they are in no such mood. At present the saying in Germany is said to be, "Ohne mich," that is "without me" or "leave me out." So it is all left to Uncle Sam, as before. Give us the tools, the manpower, and the leader, and we will finish the job and make the V sign. But a fine opportunity to complete the destruction of the German people by making their country our battleground. They won't be evacuated like the South Sea Islanders.

SITUATION IN GERMANY

I had just come to the end of this paper when I received from Germany an air letter, dated May 3. It is from one of the 15 to 20 millions who on account of the Potsdam agreement were brutally and without any compensation driven from their ancestral homes where their families had been for centuries, in some cases from time immemorial and longer than the Slavs. They were driven off their homes in any kind of weather, compelled to leave everything behind. Many were thrown into the rivers which became choked with bodies. Others were soaked with oil and set afire. Children were brained on sidewalks and walls, daughters and wives were raped innumerable times, abominations which nobody has punished.

The writer of this letter is a real "Junker," an aristocrat of the old school. Four years ago he was a millionaire with a 2,000-acre farm, highly productive, fitted out with all the latest machinery. Today he is a pauper, and I am sending him food parcels. His 74-year-old father and 72-year-old mother were brutally murdered by the Russians; his married sister was raped many times by Poles so that she committed suicide like so many other abused folks. Are you aware that in the regions overrun by these foul and bestial invaders there were over 2,000,000 abortions? But we are not behaving much better. In Munich alone there are said to be over 1,000 mulatto babies. This policy of sending Africans into the cradle of the white race and mongrelizing it is another all-time low of policy, engineered by the enemies of the Caucasian race.

But what will interest you most in this letter is in relation to the proposed treaty. I quote in literal translation:

According to the latest news it looks as if the Soviets would return parts of Silesia, even at the cost of fooling the often-fooled Poles, who are now beginning to leave Silesia. Where there is smoke, there is a fire.

Is this Russian bait? If so, we had better look out, or they will get more Germans on their side. Even a return to a wilderness where once were their productive farms would be the only escape for many Germans. I have here the photograph of the former home of my correspondent. It dates back to 1567, and all that time it has been in his family. It has been plundered, and defiled by these unspeakable barbarians and partly destroyed. Yet he would return to it although he would have to rebuild the rest of his life. And he is but one of many.

Lincoln once said that this Union cannot endure half slave and half free. That also applies to Europe as a whole and to Germany in particular. If we do not free the Germans, someone else will, or the Germans will free themselves. They certainly will choose that side which gives them a chance to live. My correspondent thinks that in case of a Red attack the German Red police of the Soviet sector would pour into the western zone, liquidate all the people that their Red bosses did not like and terrorize the others into submission, and that would mean the complete bolshevization of Germany and making of her another Red satellite. That goes to show that the rearming of Germany is a necessity if we do not want to see her in Russian arms. If she is to be rearmed, it had better be done by us and soon.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Tittman.

Mr. TITTMAN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF SCOTT KEYES, ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF ECONOMICS, PENNSYLVANIA STATE COLLEGE, STATE COLLEGE, PA.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Scott Keyes, State College, Pa. How long will it take you, Mr. Keyes?

Mr. KEYES. About 8 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead. We welcome that kind of a witness. What chair do you occupy?

Mr. KEYES. Assistant professor of economics.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent in this hearing?

Mr. KEYES. I am speaking as an individual. I also have a statement from the Peace Committee of the State College Friends Meeting, which I have been asked to transmit to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, go ahead.

Mr. KEYES. I have a prepared statement, and I will read excerpts from it.

I wish to comment on only two questions: First, whether the pact, by its very nature, can achieve its own purposes; and second, the relation of the pact to the United Nations.

THE PACT AND PRESERVATION OF THE PEACE

With regard to the first question, I think it is a fair and a hopeful thing to say that we are all agreed upon one larger objective—the attainment of peace. The proposed treaty itself, and Secretary Acheson's defense of it, both stress this objective repeatedly. Nevertheless, in view of the long record of failure of armed preparedness as a means of preserving peace—in view of the positive record of armaments races culminating in war, the question of whether the pact can achieve its purpose must receive the careful attention of the committee.

As Secretary Acheson has pointed out, no one can say with certainty that the pact will succeed in its purpose. Likewise, no one can say with certainty that it will not achieve its aims. Nevertheless, there are good grounds for believing that it will not achieve its own objectives because of the very logic of the circumstances.

The pact has been developed in response to tensions that exist in the world today. These tensions arise out of differences of opinion on certain basic social, economic, and political issues. They can only be eliminated by the admittedly difficult process of negotiation, seeking constantly to widen areas of agreement, and to narrow areas of disagreement. When one group of nations, therefore, undertakes rearmament, and establishes machinery for joint military planning, such action must inevitably call forth parallel action elsewhere. It takes two sides, each of somewhat comparable strength, each believing in the justice of its cause, to create tension in the first place. In the process of the armaments race, the belief grows, however erroneous it may be, and however eloquently and sincerely the several foreign ministers of the respective countries plead their peaceful intentions, the belief grows that the die is irrevocably cast for war.

Thus the elimination of the tensions, the only basis upon which peace can be established, becomes difficult, if not impossible, and war, the very occurrence the pact seeks to avoid, almost inevitable.

There is another sense, also, in which it is questionable whether the pact can or will achieve its own larger objectives. The purpose of this pact is not merely to achieve peace; it is to preserve the free institutions which are part of the cultural heritage of the signatory nations. Yet, we must ask ourselves very frankly whether these free institutions can be maintained in the midst of an armed society. National defense, in these days of atomic warfare, as the President's Committee on Universal Military Training pointed out so clearly 2 years ago, is a far-reaching concept. Not only must the Nation have armed forces ready for instant action; it must likewise be prepared industrially, socially, scientifically. It must carry on, also, extensive intelligence operations at home and abroad, to promote its own philosophy in other countries, to learn of the actions of potential enemies, to counteract espionage, to prevent the infiltration of subversive ideas.

The effects of these needs of national defense on our social and economic institutions are plain. Economically, the needs of national defense stimulate that concentration of control over business and industry which the Federal Trade Commission and Senate investigating committees tell us is destroying the very system we seek to maintain. Governmentally, the needs of national defense lead to situations such as that in Washington today, where secret military organizations conduct operations of unknown scope and magnitude with budgets which are not matters of public record. Scientifically, the needs of national defense lead to a barren preoccupation with the problems of warfare. Socially, the needs of national defense lead to increasing interference with civil liberties—that phase of our society on which we pride ourselves most highly. Increasingly, people who out of an honest concern for the welfare of their country question any social or economic policy find themselves regarded as subversive, as traitors, frequently being deprived of their livelihoods.

Where is the logic of this situation? Do we preserve our free institutions by turning our own and our neighbors' countries into armed camps; by promoting the concentration of economic control which is destroying free competitive enterprise; by increasing the magnitude and scope of secret operations in the Government; by increasingly violating civil liberties, and instilling fear into all who would protest? Furthermore, if our objective is to encourage the growth of civil liberties in nations outside the pact, can we hope to accomplish this aim by a policy of military containment, particularly in view of the effects of such a policy in our own free society? These questions will, I hope, receive your earnest consideration.

THE PACT AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Secondly, I should like to comment briefly on the relationship of the proposed pact to the United Nations. On this matter I speak with diffidence, recognizing that some of the members of this committee were among the architects of that organization. Nevertheless, every person who believes, as I do, heart and soul, in the cause of the United Nations has a responsibility to examine to the best of his ability the contention which has been made repeatedly that the proposed North Atlantic Treaty is consistent with the spirit as well as with the letter of the United Nations Charter.

We are told that the Charter recognizes the importance of regional arrangements consistent with its purposes and principles. Can the proposed treaty be said in the largest sense to fit this definition? This, I think, is a debatable point. For better or for worse, the Charter establishes an association of nations which can only function effectively when its principal members are on friendly terms with each other. The regional arrangements which are recognized in article 51 and the several articles of chapter VIII must be construed in the light of this fundamental prerequisite of the organization as a whole. Thus, any regional arrangement by which some members arm themselves against other members is not consistent with the basic philosophy of the organization. By their solemn ratification of the Charter, the several nations have not only expressed their intent to make such a step unnecessary but have made it out of keeping with the spirit of the organization. The rearmament that is countenanced is against former enemies which are not members of the United Nations. Furthermore, any arrangement which divides the members into armed camps only renders it more difficult to achieve in practice the unanimous agreement of the major powers which, for all its shortcomings, is the one principle which makes an international organization possible at this stage in the world's development. Pursued to its logical conclusion, any other argument culminates in the ultimate question whether the United Nations can and should continue to exist, and I cannot believe that the American people are willing even to entertain the thought of abandoning their participation in that organization.

The very fact that the proponents of the treaty have been at considerable pains to square it with the United Nations—and I am not making any charge of bad faith—indicates, I think, the deep-seated concern the American people have for the success of the United Nations. Finally, I think our people will also become increasingly disturbed if they find our Nation committed to continue spending more per day to maintain our own and other military establishments than the United Nations is spending per year to achieve peace.

In view of these arguments, therefore, that there are grave doubts whether the pact can, by the very logic of the circumstances achieve its own larger objectives of attaining peace and protecting our free institutions, and that it is inconsistent with the larger philosophy of the United Nations. I respectfully urge that the members of this committee recommend the rejection of the proposed North Atlantic Treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Keyes, you are a war veteran, I assume?

Mr. KEYES. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You haven't been in either the First or Second World War?

Mr. KEYES. No, sir.

CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES

The CHAIRMAN. You speak here of the terrible conditions that exist in this country at the present time. You say—the effects of these needs of national defense on our social and economic institutions are plain, economically the needs of national defense—and so forth—

destroy the very system we seek to maintain.

Is it not true that today we have the largest national income we have ever had, with the exception of a slight decline?

Mr. KEYES. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that indicate prosperity and commerce and industry, or otherwise?

Mr. KEYES. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. So in that respect you haven't any complaint with the United States Government?

Mr. KEYES. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What about the government that you are particularly complaining about? What have we done that is so terribly wrong?

Mr. KEYES. What government am I complaining about?

The CHAIRMAN. I thought you were talking about conditions here at home.

Mr. KEYES. I am pointing out what I believe to be the inevitable consequences of the defense policy.

The CHAIRMAN. You go beyond that. You say:

Governmentally, the needs of national defense lead to situations such as that in Washington today where secret military organizations conduct operations of unknown scope and magnitude which budgets are not a matter of public record.

Mr. KEYES. I had in mind there the Central Intelligence Agency.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't call that a big outfit, do you?

Mr. KEYES. I don't know. Its budget is not a matter of public record and its operations are not a matter of public record.

The CHAIRMAN. Congress knows what it is doing when it appropriates for it. You don't believe in an intelligence agency?

Mr. KEYES. I don't like to see agencies in the Government whose budgets are not matters of public record.

The CHAIRMAN. You can't draw a dime out of the Treasury unless you have a record of it. You ought to know that. You are a professor of economics.

Mr. KEYES. Is their budget found in the Federal budget?

The CHAIRMAN. I don't know that it is published, but it is certainly known to Congress, as the representatives of the people. Were you active in the last political campaign?

Mr. KEYES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What ticket were you for?

Mr. KEYES. Progressive ticket.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Wallace?

Mr. KEYES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought you sounded like Mr. Wallace. That is all. Thank you very much.

Mr. KEYES. Thank you, sir.

I have here the statement of the State College Friends Meeting which I have been asked to furnish.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the Friends' organization?

Mr. KEYES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a member of them?

Mr. KEYES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I respect your beliefs in that regard if not in this.

Mr. KEYES. Thank you, sir.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

MAY 16, 1947.

To the Members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate:

The proposed North Atlantic Treaty presents to each of you the need for a decision of momentous importance for the future of our country and of the world. This treaty represents the furthest departure to date from our traditional relation to European affairs, as well as from the course we had hoped to pursue after the recent war. Even more, it raises the question in which each member of your committee must answer in his own mind and conscience—whether the proposed action will enhance or weaken the possibility of a just and lasting peace.

As a help to your thinking, the State College Friends Meeting would like to set forth briefly its considered judgment on this matter.

Underlying our attitude is one of the basic tenets of our society—exemplified so eloquently in the life and work of the founder of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania—that of the universal brotherhood of man. Different people may arrive at such a tenet by different routes. But however arrived at, once accepted, it leads to a peaceful environment in which understanding and mutual adjustment become possible among individuals.

Such a philosophy is applicable to nations fully as much as to individuals. The Society of Friends has stated its conviction time and again that no plea of necessity or policy, however urgent, should divert our Nation, or any nation, from a fundamental reliance on the power of love in the conduct of its affairs. Collectively, we in the State College Friends Meeting desire to say to all the world as we say to each other—as William Penn used to say so continuously and with such humility and such deep conviction—"I am your friend."

With respect to the proposed treaty, we are concerned for many reasons. First, looking at it as the latest in a series of steps of increasing gravity taken by those whose concern for the national security has led them to place reliance on the threat of force more than on peaceful persuasion and arbitration, we believe that it does not work in the direction of true national peace, which is the only means by which true national security can be achieved. Rather, by raising fear and suspicion in the minds of those outside the pact, it increases international tensions, rivalries, and frictions, and calls forth parallel actions elsewhere which further confound the initial hostility. It is of little consequence to urge the peaceful intentions of the signatories; to point out that the treaty will only come into operation if an aggression is committed or seriously threatened. The treaty itself establishes machinery for joint military planning and for rearmament.

In view of the tensions which today exist among nations, these developments can scarcely fail to lead others to believe, even if erroneously, the die is cast irrevocably for war. Thus the elimination of the tensions, the only real basis upon which peace can be established permanently, becomes difficult, if not impossible; and war, the very occurrence the pact seeks to avoid, almost inevitable.

Similarly, we believe that the attitudes and actions embodied in the treaty prejudice other and larger negotiations aimed at a settlement of the basic problems out of which the present international differences arise, and render a genuine meeting of minds difficult, if not impossible. Although it may be argued legalistically that the treaty is not in violation of the provisions of the United Nations Charter, the more germane question is, does the treaty contribute to the achievement of the objectives of that Charter? Article 3 of the treaty, calling for increased armaments, is certainly contrary to those objectives of the United Nations Charter which seek a reduction in armaments. The fundamental objective of the Charter being peace, we seriously doubt that the treaty can be relied upon to assure peace.

While our concern arises chiefly out of religious considerations, we believe it is also in point to observe that some who examine the treaty even in terms of its own strategic conception find it questionable. Realistically it represents a calculated risk involving two considerations: (1) That the unity demonstrated among the members will deter Soviet aggression; and (2) should Soviet aggression occur, that the obligations contained in the pact would assist in making military forces available in addition to our own.

Regarding the first risk, the course of events since the termination of the war has demonstrated that the "get tough" approach has only brought increased intransigence on the part of the Soviet Union, and the pact may contribute to the final breach between east and west—which can have no other consequence ultimately than war. Likewise, regarding the second risk, events in Europe since the recent war raise serious question whether all the members can deliver on the obligation to produce unity in their respective countries adequate to repulse an aggressor. We cannot ignore the fact that conflicting ideas are involved, and ideas do not halt at national boundaries. Thus, in some of the areas upon which we would depend, we could conceivably have to go it alone, or with limited support against internal opposition. Such considerations suggest the greater realism of a peaceful approach to our difficulties.

We would recall to your attention the parallel difficulties William Penn faced in founding this Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in a new and potentially hostile land. Where other colonies found themselves involved in frequent wars with the Indians and remained armed for their security, Pennsylvania remained unarmed and at peace because of Penn's policies of friendliness, tolerance, complete honesty, and peaceful arbitration of disputes. As a practical administrator, Penn took the seemingly greater risk. History proved his wisdom in doing so. That history might well be reviewed for the lessons it holds for us today.

We conclude, therefore, that the security of our own country and the peace of the world are not advanced by the proposed treaty, and we urge most strongly that you vote against its ratification and use the influence of your committee to bring about its defeat.

On behalf of the State College Friends Meeting:

JOHN H. REEDY,
Secretary, Peace Committee.

STATEMENT OF CURTIS P. NETTELS, PROFESSOR, CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The CHAIRMAN. Dr. Nettels? How long will you take, Doctor? You are not going to read all that, are you?

Mr. NETTELS. No, sir. I have two statements, one about 17 minutes and one about 4 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you not cut that 17 minutes to 10, and give us the 4?

Mr. NETTELS. I will give you the 4; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Go right ahead.

Mr. NETTELS. If the Atlantic Pact were described in terms of its likely effects, its preamble might properly read: "A treaty to repeal the Declaration of Independence, to subvert the Federal Constitution, to weaken and impoverish the United States, to strengthen Soviet communism, and to intensify the danger of our involvement in a Pacific war which we would have to fight alone, without allies, and in a weakened condition."

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all it does?

Mr. NETTELS. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean it does not do anything else besides that?

Mr. NETTELS. That is the beginning.

EFFECT OF THE TREATY

The pact is a negation of our national interests. It asks us to pour out our substance to western Europe, where the danger of attack is nonexistent, and to ignore—for the present—the area of real peril across the Pacific.

It calls upon us to endorse and confirm two treaties of two major powers that bind them not to assist us in a major war. It requires that we sanctify two treaties that are directed against ourselves. It compels us to mutilate the sovereignty and independence of the Nation and thereby to expose it to a process of disintegration.

It will enfeeble the Nation by impairing its Constitution, its historic policies, its integrity, its traditions, and its spirit of self-reliance. It invites us to oppose a hostile force by sapping the Nation's strength, by undermining the national institutions and by devitalizing the national spirit.

It will gain us ill will from all states outside the pact, but it will not gain us any real allies, or any effective aid from the member states. We will be isolated in the world, and obliged to carry on alone an extended contest, in a denationalized and debilitated condition.

We will be left with a national shell, with a set of national burdens, and an expensive military facade. Our resources will be depleted for the benefit of those who are pledged not to act with us against a potential enemy.

The policy which the administration has followed since October 1945 is, in its effects, a pro-Russian policy. It avowedly seeks to check or contain Russia by using the wealth of the United States for the benefit of allies of Russia that are pledged not to act against Russia.

Under this policy, the strength of Soviet communism has grown. Two major victories for it have been won in Czechoslovakia and China. Although the policy has not stopped or contained communism, it has implicated the United States deeply in a very costly contest.

Our bill for the cold war may amount next year to $24,000,000,000. Throughout the world the opposition is increasingly directed against and focused upon ourselves.

We are now asked to go into the Atlantic Alliance and thereby to extend the policy that hitherto has failed to accomplish its intended results. We are asked to meet an adversary by arming and subsidizing his allies and by depriving the Nation of its principal sources of strength.

If the Senate ratifies the pact, it will commit us to an indefinite continuation of the present contest. The threatened drain on the Nation's resources and vitality is incalculable. We will prepare for the contest by impairing everything that has given the Nation its strength—its Constitution, its historic policies, its integrity, its traditions, its spirit, its sovereignty, and its independence.

That so much must be sacrificed for the present policy is decisive proof that it is a negation of our true national interests.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it will destroy the Declaration of Independence?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And destroy the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. NETTELS. I think it will seriously impair the Constitution; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say it will "subvert the Federal Constitution"?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your statement?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And "weaken and impoverish the United States"?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. "Strengthen Soviet communism"?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And "intensify the danger of our involvement in a Pacific war, which we would have to fight alone without allies in a weakened condition"?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You believe all those things?

Mr. NETTELS. Absolutely.

ANGLO-SOVIET AND FRANCO-SOVIET TREATIES

The CHAIRMAN. You say "it requires that we sanctify two treaties that are directed against ourselves"?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What are they?

Mr. NETTELS. The British-Russian Treaty of Friendship and Alliance of May 1942, and the French-Russian Treaty of Friendship and Alliance of December 1944, both of which contain the clause binding Britain and France not to enter into any alliance or any coalition against Russia.

The CHAIRMAN. You read the treaties?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Does this pact bind us to go against Russia?

Mr. NETTELS. No, sir. It endorses these treaties. It endorses, confirms, and renews these treaties.

The CHAIRMAN. We do not say anything in the treaty about that, do we?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir. Article 8 says something to the effect that nothing in this treaty, the Atlantic alliance, conflicts with existing international agreements between a member of the Atlantic alliance and a third state.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the declaration, though, of the nations affected. It says that they affirm, in the treaty, that they have no obligations with any other nation that would conflict with their obligations under the pact.

Mr. NETTELS. That means the Atlantic alliance is consistent with the British-Russian alliance and the French-Russian alliance.

The CHAIRMAN. Not necessarily.

Mr. NETTELS. Mr. Bevin, in Parliament, in speaking on the ratification by Parliament, said specifically that the Anglo-Soviet alliance stood, and that he hoped this treaty, the new treaty, would provide better conditions for the British-Russian alliance to operate in.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Bevin was here and signed this treaty. You know that.

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And when signing it, he proclaimed what was in it, which was that they had no treaty with any other nation which would conflict with this treaty.

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir, that is right. The Atlantic alliance does not conflict with the Anglo-Soviet alliance. It confirms it; it renews it.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not agree with that. We do not confirm that. You speak of two great Soviet triumphs and one in Czechoslovakia. Did you approve of that?

Mr. NETTELS. No, sir, I did not, decidedly not.

The fact remains that the German militarist Von Moltke, commonly called the greatest strategist after Napoleon, called Czechoslovakia the bastion of Europe, and said that the power that controlled the country, the land that is now Czechoslovakia, would have the strongest position in Europe.

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

The CHAIRMAN. You are a full professor, are you?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In charge of the economics chair in Cornell University?

Mr. NETTELS. Professor of American history; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Professor of American history at Cornell University?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you occupied that chair?

Mr. NETTELS. Five years.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask the professor a few questions, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, indeed. Go ahead, Senator Donnell.

Senator DONNELL. Professor Nettels, you say you have been a professor of American history at Cornell University for 5 years?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. What was your educational background and experience prior to that time?

Mr. NETTELS. I attended the University of Kansas as an undergraduate; I attended the University of Wisconsin as a graduate student, and received the degrees of B. A. and M. A. at Wisconsin.

I began teaching at Wisconsin at that time, and was there for 23 years.

Senator DONNELL. In what department?

Mr. NETTELS. In the department of history.

Senator DONNELL. Was Dr. Glenn Frank the president while you were there?

Mr. NETTELS. He was president part of the time while I was there; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Go right ahead with your experience, for the 23 years you were teaching at the University of Wisconsin.

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir, I spent 1 year in London as a fellow on the Guggenheim Foundation.

Senator DONNELL. What year was that?

Mr. NETTELS. 1928.

Senator DONNELL. Go right ahead.

Mr. NETTELS. I went to Cornell, as I say, 5 years ago. I was visiting lecturer of history at Harvard University, 1937-38, I believe. I taught at Columbia.

Senator DONNELL. Are you a full professor?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Have you taught American history most of the time that you were engaged in this college graduate work?

Mr. NETTELS. English and American history.

DEPARTURE FROM TRADITIONAL FOREIGN POLICY

Senator DONNELL. Will you tell us, Professor Nettels, whether you regard the North Atlantic Treaty as a distinct departure from anything that the United States has ever entered into by way of foreign policy in the past?

Mr. NETTELS. I regard it as a drastic revolutionary change.

Senator DONNELL. For what reason do you regard it to be drastic and revolutionary?

Mr. NETTELS. I think it incorporates the United States in a new super state. I think it blends, reunites the United States with Britain and western Europe.

Senator DONNELL. Have you studied in considerable detail the proposed North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. NETTELS. I read it several times, yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. If I am not mistaken, in fact I know, although I did not hear you participate in it, I knew you were on the platform of Town Hall. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And you debated that question over a Nationwide broadcast under the auspices of the Town Hall?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. What position did you take in that debate? Were you opposed to the pact or in favor of it?

Mr. NETTELS. I opposed it, on the ground that it confirms and renews the British-Russian alliance, which binds Britain not to enter into any alliance or coalition against Russia.

Senator DONNELL. You have examined the history back of this treaty, I take it, that is to say, the matter of the negotiations and what has led up to it, and the vetoes by Russia in the United Nations of that type?

Mr. NETTELS. I have read a good bit about the international situation since October of 1945.

Senator DONNELL. Have you formed an opinion as to whether or not bringing into existence of the North Atlantic Treaty was primarily due to the vetoes that Russia interposed into the operations of the United Nations and in the Security Council?

Mr. NETTELS. I have no opinion on that subject as to what actually motivated the formation of the Atlantic Pact.

Senator DONNELL. In the preamble to the pact, there is one sentence that has been mentioned quite frequently in connection with the testimony here, namely, that the parties to the treaty—and then I begin the quote—are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law.

Would you tell us, professor, whether or not you regard Portugal as being in the class of countries—as presently administered, at any rate—which are founded on the principles of democracy?

Mr. NETTELS. No, sir. I do not believe that Portugal is a democracy, in our sense of the word.

MONROE DOCTRINE AND THE PACT

Senator DONNELL. We have it sometimes mentioned in the testimony here that this treaty was, in a way, a development out of the Monroe Doctrine. I do not recall any specific mention, but I have heard it from time to time; different people said it. Whether it was in the testimony here, I cannot vouch.

Do you regard this treaty as analogous to the Monroe Doctrine?

Mr. NETTELS. Not in any sense.

Senator DONNELL. The Monroe Doctrine is a unilateral doctrine?

Mr. NETTELS. It is.

Senator DONNELL. There are no contractual relations entered into by the United States with any other signers?

Mr. NETTELS. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. I am speaking of the Monroe Doctrine. The North Atlantic doctrine is a contractual doctrine, in which 12 nations sign as to various things provided for in the contract?

Mr. NETTELS. That is right.

COMPARISON WITH PAST MILITARY ALLIANCES

Senator DONNELL. You spoke of having taught English history also?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Have you had occasion to examine into the language of different treaties made in the past between different nations, language of alliance treaties?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir; I have.

Senator DONNELL. This does not intimate at all, by this question, and I am not at all intimating even indirectly, that this is a treaty of aggression. I am asking you, professor, whether or not you have observed that the treaties generally made, military alliances between other countries separate from this treaty, have expressed themselves on their face to be treaties of defense, or have they customarily expressed themselves to be treaties of offense?

Mr. NETTELS. I know of no treaty which expresses itself as a treaty of aggression, or intended aggression.

One example is the British-Japanese Treaty of Alliance of 1902.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE PACT

Senator DONNELL. Professor, you stated that you think this treaty will subvert the Federal Constitution.

Would you amplify on that, please, as to why you think it would effect that result?

Mr. NETTELS. In the first place, I think it will deprive Congress of the power of declaring war, within the scope of the treaty.

It defines an attack on these 11 countries, foreign countries, as an attack on the United States. If the United States is attacked, Congress has no choice but to declare war.

Senator DONNELL. That is, as a practical matter, you would say that if this country were attacked by a material number of troops of some other country, that the only course of action that would be left to Congress would be to declare war, is that correct?

Mr. NETTELS. That would be my position if I were in Congress; if the United States were attacked, we would have no choice but to declare war.

Senator DONNELL. And the provision to which you refer in the North Atlantic Treaty is that in article 5, in which the parties agree that "an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all"?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. From which, I take it, you judge—if I am correct, please state so, or if I am incorrect—you draw the conclusion that if an armed attack, not necessarily a small handful of troops but a material attack by, say, 100,000 troops, upon one of the signatories to this treaty should occur, you would consider that there is a contractual obligation that we are obligated to treat that attack as if it were an attack on the United States. Is that correct?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir; for instance, if an attack on Belgium, as in 1914, should be reenacted, it would be an attack on the United States; and the United States would, therefore, be obligated to declare war on the aggressor.

EFFECT ON TREATY OF A COMMUNIST COUP

Senator DONNELL. Professor, have you had occasion to examine into the facts presently existing in Italy or France as to the number of Communists in those two nations?

Mr. NETTELS. The last figures I saw on France indicated that about one-quarter of the people voted the Communist ticket. Whether that means they were all Communists, I presume—I presume that does not mean they were all Communists by any means, but they certainly must have been very sympathetic to communism.

Senator DONNELL. Do you have some information about Italy, as to the percentage of persons in Italy that are either Communists or voting Communist ticket?

Mr. NETTELS. My impression is that it is about 30 percent.

Senator DONNELL. Do you find anything in this treaty which either directly or inferentially provides that if a nation should become a Communist nation that it could be expelled from the community of nations formed by the treaty?

Mr. NETTELS. I saw no such provision, no arrangement, for getting a member out of the alliance.

Senator DONNELL. You say in your statement that "the pact is a negation of our national interests," that "it asks us to pour out our substance in western Europe, where the danger of attack is non-existent, and to ignore, for the present, the area of real peril across the Pacific."

Tell us, please, whether or not you mean by "pouring out our substance to western Europe" the implementation of the pact, by matériel and various expenses of that type?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes. As I interpret the pact, it commits us to the program of mutual aid for 20 years. It says "this shall be continuous."

Senator DONNELL. And effective?

Mr. NETTELS. And effective. It commits us to establishing a joint military establishment. I do not recall the exact words, but it says something about uniting the efforts for defense. It sounds to me very much like we are going to create an international military establishment, in which the armed forces of the United States will be merged.

That is the way I interpret it.

Senator DONNELL. Professor, have you given this treaty what you consider a sufficiently thorough study to enable you to express the opinions that you have given here today, or have you just studied it casually?

Mr. NETTELS. I have studied it carefully, I would say.

Senator DONNELL. Have you lectured upon this subject elsewhere than over the radio, or have you written, if you have not lectured—

Mr. NETTELS. I have written a good many letters on the subject. I wrote one letter to the New York Times, which was printed, about a column and a half. I think it was printed February 9.

That letter was made the basis of a leading editorial in the Chicago Tribune soon afterward.

I have written some letters to the Washington Post, to the New York Herald Tribune, some other newspapers. The Gannett newspapers have published several letters that I have written on the subject.

Senator DONNELL. And has the Washington Post, and also the Herald Tribune, published your letters?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

DURATION OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. You spoke of this being a 20-year obligation. Do you find anything in here by which there is any provision for terminating the obligation, under the treaty, in less than 20 years?

Mr. NETTELS. There is a clause with reference to reconsidering it after 10 years.

Senator DONNELL. That is consulting together "for the purpose of reviewing the treaty."

Mr. NETTELS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. I mean, however, is there any provision by which the obligations existing under this treaty may be terminated in less than 20 years except by mutual consent of all parties?

Mr. NETTELS. I regard it as a 20-year treaty essentially.

Senator DONNELL. Is there any further proof you can think of that should be pointed out which would give your views with respect to this treaty? Any other argument or any other point that you would like to call attention to while you are on the stand this afternoon?

WORLD FEDERATION AND AMERICAN POLICY

Mr. NETTELS. I would just like to say this, in conclusion: That my interest in this arose from my study of the early period of American history, the period of the American Revolution. During the past 20 years a new school of historians has arisen which is called variously the revisionist school, or the imperialist school, that attacks and repudiates the American Revolution, discredits the American cause, and thereby, of course, denies to the United States a valid title as an independent nation, since our title from nationhood derives from the struggle for foreign independence.

I note today there is very extensive propaganda in favor of an actual political union of the United States with Great Britain, and countries associated with Britain traditionally, and I thought it highly important that three of the outstanding witnesses before this committee—Mr. Clayton, Mr. Roberts, and Mr. Patterson—are heading an organization for the purpose of bringing about an actual, real, political union of the United States and Great Britain.

SENATOR DONNELL. You are not favorable, I take it, to such a union?

MR. NETTELS. I am very strongly opposed to it.

ENTANGLING ALLIANCES

SENATOR DONNELL. Professor, every once in a while somebody will say that notwithstanding the fact that George Washington advocated a policy of no alliance, no permanent alliance with other nations, that we have outgrown the conditions of those days, or we have changed conditions, perhaps more fairly stated, and that therefore, today, that warning would have no applicability.

Would you tell us whether or not in your judgment, from what you have observed, there are reasons today why we should go into this treaty which would overcome the reasoning of both Washington and Chief Justice Marshall, for that matter, back at that time?

MR. NETTELS. I do not see any justification for this treaty which would, in any way, replace or supersede the counsel of the Farewell Address. After all, when Washington wrote the Farewell Address he had had long and intimate association with foreign nations. His career began, his military career began in connection with the British and the French, and especially from 1775 on until the time he wrote the Farewell Address he had had intimate relations with the major European powers. And I think the principles of the Farewell Address are just as sound today as they were in his day, with the possible exception, perhaps, that you could not put so much emphasis on remaining aloof from Europe.

I presume we are more deeply involved in Europe.

SENATOR DONNELL. Do you think, even if we are more deeply involved with Europe, even though the space has been annihilated in large part by the airplane, that we should surrender the view that Washington took that we should not enter into contractual obligations with these nations, or do you think that—

MR. NETTELS. Temporary alliances to meet extraordinary emergencies, I think, is the phrase of the Farewell Address.

SENATOR DONNELL. One of our distinguished Senators, in delivering Washington's Birthday Address, I observed, drew from the Farewell Address the conclusion that this pact is expressly authorized by Washington; that is, would have been expressly approved, because he said this is a temporary alliance. Would you regard, within the ordinary acceptance of the term, a 20-year contract to be a temporary alliance for extraordinary emergencies?

Mr. NETTELS. No; I do not think that is what Washington had in mind. If there is an extraordinary emergency it certainly arises from Russia. That makes the Atlantic alliance contradictory because Britain and France are pledge both to enter into a coalition or alliance against Russia.

INVOLVEMENT IN EUROPEAN JEALOUSIES

Senator DONNELL. What do you think of this point that has been brought out by at least one witness, very forcibly, I thought, a few days ago? If we enter into this agreement with 11 other nations, and agree that an attack upon any one of them shall be considered an attack upon ourselves, that we immediately subject ourselves to all of the idiosyncrasies and the enmities and jealousies that may exist against any one of the 11 other signatories, so that, for illustration, if signatory X shall have trouble or a ruler who shall be litigious or warlike-minded, that we would, by this signature, become contractually obligated in a war that we might never get into, might never find the necessity of getting into, if we had not entered into such contractual obligation?

Do you care to comment on that general point?

Mr. NETTELS. I had not thought about that particular point. But it does seem to me that this treaty will not gain us any friends outside the circle of the alliance, especially if it is going to commit us to this mutual aid, continuous mutual aid for 20 years, which we do not give to anyone else.

I do not think we will get any friends outside the alliance through this treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Do you or do you not think there is merit in the proposition that by signing up a contract with 11 other contracting parties, that we are exposing ourselves to the jealousies that may exist against it, against every one of these other parties, I mean, that we are exposing ourselves to all of the contingencies that may arise from ill temper or bad judgment on the part of its government over a long period of years, and that from that standpoint it is very unwise for us to enter into a contractual obligation for such a length of time?

Do you think there is merit or not in that view?

Mr. NETTELS. I have not thought over that point. I imagine, however, that something like that would occur, perhaps, that we might incur enmities that are directed against our associates in the alliance.

Senator DONNELL. At any rate, today we are not subject to these contractual obligations; if we ratify this treaty, we are. There can be no doubt about that. That is true, is it not?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know Prof. Edwin Borchard of Yale University?

Mr. NETTELS. Only by reputation.

Senator DONNELL. Will you tell us please, what is his reputation?

Mr. NETTELS. His reputation is that of a scholar, a sound scholar in the field of, I believe, international law.

Senator DONNELL. Is he a man of wide experience along those lines, according to his general reputation?

Mr. NETTELS. I do not know him personally. I would not want to comment on that.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

I think that is all, Mr. Chairman. I want to thank both the chairman and the professor for permitting me to examine you.

ATLANTIC UNION AND GREAT BRITAIN

The CHAIRMAN. You made a statement about Justice Roberts and former Secretary Patterson and Mr. Clayton. You said they advocated before this committee an alliance with Great Britain. Was it not true that they did not confine it to Great Britain, that they said a sort of world arrangement among the democratic countries?

Mr. NETTELS. Yes. I interpret that—

The CHAIRMAN. You interpret that plain language, and it does not say an alliance with Great Britain alone. Your statement is that they were going to line up with Great Britain alone.

Mr. NETTELS. I do not think I said Great Britain alone.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not say alone?

Mr. NETTELS. I said United States and Britain. That would necessarily, of course, include all the British-speaking dominions, and the new plans which include some of the western European countries.

The CHAIRMAN. It would exclude everybody that you did not mention, would it not?

Mr. NETTELS. I beg your pardon?

The CHAIRMAN. I say it would exclude everybody except those you mentioned. Their statement was all the democratic countries.

Mr. NETTELS. Yes. That includes Britain. It means a union with Britain.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not mean a union with Britain at all. It means an alliance with Britain and all the democratic countries. You seem to be just prodding at Britain all the time.

Mr. NETTELS. Because, Senator, you will agree that our relations with Britain are especially intimate and important, will you not? We were, originally, possessions of the British Crown. Certainly on occasion it involved—the events leading to World War II are involved in World War II.

You remember the time when Britain was fighting alone, and Mr. Churchill's great orations, and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, I remember that.

Mr. NETTELS. You would not deny the importance of Britain and Canada.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly not, but I would not by the use of that term exclude everybody else.

Mr. NETTELS. I did not mean to.

The CHAIRMAN. But you did mean it, or you would not have said it.

Mr. NETTELS. No, I said he favors a reunion of the United States and Britain. They presumably favor bringing in some non-English-speaking countries, but that does not preclude the fact that it involves a reunion with Britain.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you read their testimony in the record?

Mr. NETTELS. I read accounts of it.

The CHAIRMAN. And you did not read that.

Mr. NETTELS. I read newspaper reports of their organization, and the statement that they regard the Atlantic alliance the Atlantic pact, as a step toward a formal political union.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. If you had been as accurate in your other statement as you were in that I would agree with you. Do you want this long statement of yours published in the record?

Mr. NETTELS. I would like to have it if I might.

The CHAIRMAN. We will publish it in the record.

Mr. NETTELS. Thank you.

(The statement referred to follows:)

THE ATLANTIC PACT

PREPARED FOR DELIVERY BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, MAY 17, 1940

(By Curtis P. Nettels)

I do not believe that the Atlantic Pact is an aggressive military alliance or that it is an instrument of so-called American imperialism.

However, the pact is considered in the context of our relations with Soviet communism. A serious situation appears to be taking shape in the Far East. During the coming year, American taxpayers may be called upon to contribute $24,000,000,000 for the cold war.

If the pact were described in terms of its likely effects, its preamble might properly read: "A treaty to repeal the Declaration of Independence, to subvert the Federal Constitution, to weaken the United States, to strengthen Soviet communism, and to intensify the danger of a war in which the United States will have to fight alone, without allies, and in a weakened condition."

Two of the states to be included within the pact, France and Great Britain, are long-term allies of the Soviet Union, bound and pledged by solemn treaties, until 1962 and 1964, respectively, not to take effective action against Russia.

Reference is made to the following clause in the British-Russian treaty of 1942 and the French-Russian treaty of 1944:

"Each high contracting party undertakes not to conclude any alliance and not to take part in any coalition directed against the other high contracting party."

Thus, both Britain and France are pledged not to give effective aid to the United States, if we should become involved in a major war.

The Governments of Britain and France have repeatedly affirmed the validity of their treaties of alliance and friendship with Russia. The Atlantic Pact, in article 8, declares that the pact is not inconsistent with those treaties. The pact therefore endorses, confirms, and renews two treaties of Russia which bind two major powers not to give us effective aid in a major war.

In the words of Washington's Farewell Address, " * * * It is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another * * *. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure * * *."

The pact will strengthen Russia by strengthening the allies of Russia—allies that are pledged not to take effective joint action against Russia. By strengthening the allies of Russia, the United States will surely weaken itself.

It is proper to reflect upon the meaning of the British and French alliances with Russia. Britain and France have been making alliances for 400 years. Their treaties with Russia were made when the character of communism and the nature of the Russian state were well understood. They were made by the most experienced statesmen of Britain and France. Is it conceivable that such statesmen would make, in ignorance and carelessness, a solemn commitment to Russia for 20 years? From the terms of the treaties one is forced to infer that their authors foresaw, at the end of the war, an American-Russian contest, and that they arranged things as far as possible, to assure the neutrality of Britain and France.

The treaties were made when the United States was a wartime ally of the two states. There was absolutely nothing in the war situation in 1942 or 1944 which obligated Britain and France to bind themselves for 20 years, not to act in concert with the United States against Russia. In this sense, the treaties are directed against the United States, since they prevent us from securing effective allies against a possible enemy.

If there is doubt as to the meaning and effect of the British-Russian alliance, one might call to mind the history of the British-Japanese alliance of 1902 to 1922.

The British-Japanese treaty of 1902 provided that if Japan should become involved in war with another state, Britain would remain neutral. This treaty, therefore, set forth the principle that is asserted in the British-Russian treaty of friendship and alliance of May 1942.

Under the cover of its alliance with Britain, Japan gained strength rapidly. The first fruit of the alliance was the Russo-Japanese war of 1904-5, whereby Japan acquired Russia's leases in China. In 1910 Japan annexed Korea. Entering World War I as Britain's ally, Japan seized the German islands in the Pacific and held them thereafter as the mandatory power. In 1915, Japan made its notorious 21 demands on China, at a time when China was powerless to resist. The program of the 21 demands set the stage for Japan's attacks on Manchuria and north China in the 1930's.

The growth of Japanese power, under the cover of the British-Japanese alliance of 1902-22, resulted in increased tension and enmity between the United States and Japan. By 1922, Japan had become a threat to our security. By the time of Pearl Harbor, Japan had become a formidable foe. The United States was obliged to carry practically all the Japanese end of World War II.

The fruits of the British-Russian alliance are comparable to those of the British-Japanese alliance. Under the cover of the former, the strength of Soviet communism has grown, precisely as Japan gained strength in the days of the British-Japanese alliance. Czechoslovakia and China represent two major victories for Russia—victories unmatched by comparable gains of anti-Communist forces. No effective resistance to Soviet communism can be organized, on an international basis, as long as Britain is an ally of Russia, pledged not to act with other states against Russia.

The Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor was an indirect result of the British-Japanese alliance of 1902-22. Yet only 5 months after Pearl Harbor, Britain entered into a similar alliance with Russia. By virtue of Pearl Harbor, we are now deeply involved in Japan. The fortunes of Japan are interwoven with those of China. By reason of the British-Russian alliance, which we are asked to endorse and consecrate by ratifying the Atlantic Pact, we are isolated in the Far East. Are we to withdraw from Japan? If we remain, what are we to do? Are we to adopt a pro-Communist policy and thereby strengthen and extend communism in the Orient? Or are we to adopt an anti-Communist policy and thereby incur the risk of clashes and incidents that may involve us in an exhausting and ruinous war?

Under the British-Japanese alliance, Japan gained strength. Eventually, the United States had to defeat Japan alone.

Under the British-Russian alliance, Russia is gaining strength. Will that lead to a new Pacific war? If so, will the United States again have to fight alone? The answer given to that question by the British-Russian alliance of 1942 and the Atlantic Pact is an emphatic "Yes."

In a second Pacific war, we may not have China as an ally. In all probability, Japan will be a source of danger and weakness—an additional drain on our resources.

The Atlantic Pact is not necessary. It presumes that western Europe will be attacked by Russia. But Russia has never attacked, or tried to attack, any country now included within the pact. Russia's national interest and historic policy have not been to dominate western Europe. Several nations there, including France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Britain, are already united in the Brussels pact, pledged to mutual aid in case one is attacked by an aggressor. Together, these states command immense resources and territories. They are not merely small states; they are extensive imperial powers. An attack on them would not be a trifling matter, even for Russia. Most important: the United States has now made it clear that it will not acquiesce in acts of ruthless military aggression against independent nations; 1917 and 1941 mean far more as a deterrent to aggression than could possibly be meant by Senate endorsement of two treaties that bind Britain and France not to enter into any alliance or coalition against Russia.

If one accepts the thesis that Soviet communism seeks to dominate the world, then one must put faith in certain statements of Communist leaders, notably Stalin and Lenin. If faith is given to such statements, must not equal faith be given to the views of those leaders as to the means by which communism is to attain world dominion? Neither Lenin nor Stalin has advocated military attack by a Communist state as a means of establishing Communist regimes. Both have asserted that communism would come through internal revolution and civil war. Such has been the reality in the two principal theaters of Communist success—Russia and China. The chief danger of communism at present is not in Britain-western Europe but in the Orient.

But the Atlantic Pact makes no provision for the Far East. Its effect may be to intensify Communist pressure in that quarter. For 50 years we have been unable to ignore the Orient. World War II really began in 1931 in Manchuria. We became fully involved as result of the Japanese-German-Italian alliance and Pearl Harbor. The present advance of communism in China may make our position in Japan, Korea, and the Philippines increasingly precarious. It is possible that we may suffer one disagreeable incident after another, until we may have to retreat in disgrace or accept a challenge of war. Are we to permit Japan, with its industrial capacity, to fall within the Communist orbit? If we should become involved in a war in the Far East, the great British and French empires (strengthened by our aid) would be pledged not to help us. Such pledges would bear the stamp of our own approval, should the Senate ratify the pact.

Reliable reports state that the British have permitted their port of Hong Kong to be used as a base of supply by Chinese Communists and as a nerve center of Communist activities in China.

The menace of the pact arises because it will gain for us no certain allies and because it is likely to inflame our relations with Russia, and thereby to intensify the danger of a Pacific war. It will increase the risk of our having to fight a major war, without allies.

In the meantime, the pact is certain to have a weakening effect on the United States, in all respects.

First, it will cause the peoples of western Europe and Britain to relax, under the assurance that they are guaranteed protection by the United States. The pact offers them another Maginot line.

Second, it will lull Americans with a false sense of security, by fostering the delusion that Britain and France are our full-fledged allies, whereas in reality they are the allies of Russia.

Third, the pact will be a source of economic weakness to the United States. By committing us to the support of two allies of Russia, plus many other states, it will waste our resources and labor in fruitless war production. Such unproductive outlays will impoverish a large part of the American people and increase tensions at home. The pact commits us, for 20 years, to a program of aid for the benefit of 11 foreign states. The threatened drain on the Nation's wealth, resources, and vitality is incalculable, and may prove to be disastrous. The pact will surely prolong the cold war. Since we are now spending for that about $24,000,000,000 a year, we may expect the Nation to be impoverished by nearly $500,000,000,000, during the lifetime of the pact.

Fourth, the pact is most dangerous because it threatens to deprive us of our main source of strength—the Nation's independence. It incorporates the United States, as an inferior member, into a new community. By defining an attack on any member state as an attack on the United States, it makes this country a mere extension westward of Britain-Europe. By committing us to contribute to the economic well-being of 11 foreign states, it implies that we are joined with, and obligated to, such states in a way that we are not joined with, and obligated to, others. It will gain us ill will from all states that are excluded. It tells the nonmember states that they are of slight importance to us—unworthy of the aid which we are to bestow so freely upon our favorites.

"The Nation," said Washington in the farewell address, "which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest."

The pact will undermine our national institutions. It will subvert the Constitution by depriving Congress, in principle, of the power to declare war. If one power of Congress may be mutilated, then so may another, and another, and another. If the Constitution is lost, the Nation will disintegrate. The pact itself provides for an unlimited usurpation of the powers of Congress. It proposes to erect a new Atlantic council. Are we to have but 1 vote in 12 on this council? Operating behind closed doors, such council will be beyond the control of Congress. It is to have unlimited powers to create subsidiary bodies. Since the pact provides for common action as to defense, economic well-being, and civilization, the council will have the power to create bodies that may act on any subject. Actions of such bodies will enjoy the sanction of a treaty made under the authority of the United States; they will become the supreme law of the land. Congress will become an important rubber stamp. It will legislate under the duress of the fait accompli.

The pact requires that we abandon the historic policies of the Nation and substitute therefor a new policy utterly alien to our traditions. We are asked to forsake the unbroken practice of 149 years—the practice of abstaining from peacetime military alliances. We are asked to reject the wisest counsel of the farewell address—that which warns against habitual favoritism and habitual animosity toward particular nations. The pact calls upon us to endorse, to confirm, and to renew two treaties that bind two major powers not to give us effective aid in a major war. It invites us to tell Britain and France that we approve their pledges not to aid us in a major war. The pact sanctifies two treaties of Russia which proclaim Russia to be a virtuous state. Senate approval would therefore endorse and consecrate all actions of Russia prior to the ratification of the pact. Such a step, taken in the name of resisting Russia, would be a self-defeating contradiction. It would not be the act of an independent nation. The pact is a negation of our national interest. It is a death warrant of the independence of the United States.

Already, several leading sponsors of the pact are pressing for a formal political union of the United States with Britain-Europe. This kind of propaganda can only denationalize and devitalize the United States. Many people appear today to be taking refuge in a vague, misty sort of internationalism, hoping that by some miracle of wishful thinking they may be spared the effort of defending the Nation's heritage. Such an urge to sacrifice the national heritage betrays an attitude that nothing is worth preserving. If long indulged in, it will make the Nation a listless prey of its enemies.

Although the pact will deprive us of the strength and spirit of an independent nation, it will leave a national shell, a set of national burdens, and an expensive military facade. By reason of the British-French-Russian alliances, we will continue to be isolated. Through the pact we will pour out our substance to western Europe, where the danger of attack is nonexistent, and ignore the Far East—the area of greatest peril. In the process, we will antagonize all countries outside the circle of an invidiously conceived "civilization."

We ought to seek the good will of all nations. And, essentially, we must rely upon ourselves. We ought to renew the strength that flows only from the spirit of independence. The Nation is our only sure and certain means of safety and protection. How dangerous, then, it is to vitiate the national institutions, to divitalize the national spirit, to impair the Nation's Constitution, to trifle with the Nation's independence, and to throw aside the historic policies that have long served us so well. "Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground?" Why sacrifice the Nation's heritage in order to favor two allies of a presumed enemy? In time of stress, how senseless it is to weaken, to impair, to jeopardize our only sure and certain means of safety and defense!

Cooperation with all nations in efforts to keep the peace need not divest the Nation of its protecting cover of sovereignty and independence. A renewed emphasis on the national spirit of self-reliance need not express itself in the accents of war. It is our truest national interest "to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations."

STATEMENT OF REV. J. PAUL COTTON, CLEVELAND, OHIO

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Cotton? You have testified here several times before, and you say you want a half hour?

Mr. COTTON. Whatever time you think the importance of the material requires.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. I will give you 10 minutes.

Mr. COTTON. Here is my statement for the record, which can be followed by the Senators who are present.

I am Rev. J. Paul Cotton, of Cleveland, Ohio. I am here to present this message. I have a few copies of my printed article which are available to the press. I previously have given a few copies of my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a pastor of a church?

Mr. COTTON. No; I am not a pastor of a church.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your occupation now?

Mr. COTTON. I am occupied as a checker in an ice-cream plant. I am an ordinary worker.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a checker in an ice-cream plant?

Mr. COTTON. Yes, sir.

I shall try to prove today that this pact should be rejected because it is unconstitutional, for it provides that we commit ourselves in advance to a war about which we know nothing, and considering the nature of these nations we could never be sure in advance that it constituted a real threat to our security.

The Russian aggressions are simply another name for our past mistakes, and this alliance is designed to meet a Russian technique that does not exist. Rather than checking Stalin, it plays right into his hands by promoting an armament race with the resulting hindrance to European recovery. It undermines the authority of the United Nations. There is no indication that Russia wants war, but war may rather be provoked by this pact.

If there are any questions in this material, which I may not have time to cover, I will try to answer them at the close.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

SENATE RESOLUTION 239

Mr. COTTON. The newspapers of the country, apparently accepting wholesale the propaganda of the State Department have asserted that just because the Senate adopted the Vandenberg resolution 64 to 4 it was a foregone conclusion that they would ratify this North Atlantic Military Alliance.

But one part of the Vandenberg resolution only approved the idea of regional alliances and promised association with them without defining what that association meant. Most of them thought they were only voting moral support; not a military alliance. Hence it was hastily voted.

The CHAIRMAN. You talked with them all?

Mr. COTTON. Senator Vandenberg himself on the day it was considered declared, of his resolution:

It declines automatically military alliances. It declines all peacetime renewals of the old, open-ended lend-lease formula. It declines unilateral responsibility for the fate of western Europe.

It is none of these things; it is the exact opposite. * * * It is a paraphrase of the Rio Treaty. It never steps outside the United Nations' Charter. It never steps outside the Constitution of the United States. It never steps outside the final authority of the Congress.

* * * We are proceeding on the theory that the people of the United States and the Government of the United States would not consent to any arrangement which would require us to go to war at the behest of others and without our approval.

I shall seek to prove today that the North Atlantic Alliance is everything that Senator Vandenberg claimed his resolution was not. Senator Connally, that day the Vandenberg resolution was considered, declared:

I would be very reluctant, I may say, to join any other regional organization in the world. It would involve us in difficulties we might not be able to avoid.

Both Senator George and Senator Hatch expressed the belief that they were not voting for a military alliance outside of the Rio Treaty already voted. Senator Hawkes summed up the feeling of that day when he said that when a treaty comes back for ratification "no moral obligation has been created." Therefore, when administration officials go far beyond Senate commitments, this body is perfectly free to turn down such a proposal.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF TREATY

This military alliance, by agreeing in advance for the next 20 years or more to enter any war in which any of these nations are engaged, violates the Constitution of the United States which provides that both Houses of Congress, the representatives of the people, shall have the sole right to determine when our sons shall be drafted to kill and be killed.

Under this pact, either Congress does or does not have the right to decide in each particular case whether the situation requires our entrance into the war. If it does retain this deliberative right, then we have no right to ratify this moral commitment in advance to enter war, for we give the other nations to understand that they can count on us, and then we let them down, and violate our solemn word when the crucial moment arrives.

But if the Congress surrenders its deliberative power to decide and becomes only a rubber stamp, as I believe this pact provides, then we should refuse to ratify a pact that would destroy an essential part of our constitutional rights. Article 5 of the pact says—

The CHAIRMAN. You have 3 minutes more for your statement.

DECLARATION OF WAR

Mr. COTTON (reading) :

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them * * * will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

We need to say at the outset that the whole purpose of this alliance is to guarantee automatic American intervention at once whenever any of these countries suffers any kind of armed attack. The moral commitment is unmistakable. All these nations were solemnly assured by both the President and the Secretary of State that, if the Senate ratified the pact, our entrance into their wars would be guaranteed at once.

I quote from the official interpretation of the treaty, Department of State Publication 3462 of March 1949:

By entering into this arrangement it would recognize the fact that any armed attack upon any nation party to the treaty would so threaten the national security of the United States as to be in effect an attack upon the United States. Under the United States Constitution the Congress alone has the power to declare war. The United States certainly can obligate itself in advance to take such action, including the use of armed force, as it deems necessary to meet armed attack affecting its national security.

The fact that the fulfillment of a treaty obligation, as far as a declaration of war is concerned, depends upon the action of Congress does not inhibit the United States from undertaking the commitment.

Both Houses of Congress for the next 20 years or more then become a rubber stamp, if the Senate ratifies this treaty committing this Nation in advance to enter any war in which any of these nations are engaged.

SURRENDER OF CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

I call attention to the fact that the Senate alone must decide the fate of this treaty, whereas both the House and Senate are empowered to decide upon our entrance into war. No Congress should be allowed to dictate the actions of a Congress 15 years from now. And still more important, no one has the right or ability to tell in advance that an attack upon any of these nations will constitute a threat to our national security during the next 20 years or longer.

There are some who would say that our constitutional rights were preserved by the addition of the words "such action as it deems necessary." But the words that follow are "necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area." In other words, Congress can decide how much money it wants to appropriate to win the war, but it cannot decide whether it wants the war or not.

Any declaration of war it is called upon to make becomes a mere formality. It has already committed itself in advance to enter the war by stating that an attack upon any of these nations is an attack upon the United States.

Article 11, which states that the treaty's provisions shall be carried out by the parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, is probably only lip-service to our Constitution, thus helping it to get to get ratified. But when once the Senate ratifies this treaty, it becomes of binding force.

Senator Robert A. Taft, in a radio address of March 30, 1949, declared that it was not certain that even a formal declaration of war by Congress would be necessary under this pact:

The President of the United States undoubtedly has the constitutional right to use our armed forces against an armed attack on the United States without a congressional declaration of war. Article 5 says that an armed attack against any other nation shall be considered an attack against us. If a treaty can modify provisions of our Constitution, the President might be able to use armed forces without congressional action to protect the territory of one of the European participants against armed attack.

Under article 6 of our Constitution, treaties are given an independent status equal, in some respects, to the Constitution itself, and the Supreme Court has so held in Holland v. Missouri and other cases.

The word "forthwith" in article 5 of the pact suggests such immediate action as only the Executive, as head of the armed forces, can take. I hope you now see how serious is the step you are being called upon to take. If this pact is ratified, no deliberative action remains in Congress to decide whether or not we enter a war, and even if a declaration of war is used, it becomes a mere formality.

Yet such a matter as drafting our sons to kill and be killed is a matter of such importance that each Congress must decide each question on its own merits, and no power of discretion can be transferred to the President of the United States, but it must remain in the hands of the representatives of the people.

OBLIGATION IN EVENT OF AN ARMED ATTACK

But under this military pact United States officials propose to underwrite in advance with the blood of our sons any kind of war in which any of these nations are ever engaged. Article 5 of this alliance does not qualify this armed attack in any way. A nation could provoke an armed attack and still we would be required to go to war. One of these nations could even begin an armed attack on another and still we would be obliged to enter the war on their side.

It would be impossible to change article 5 to meet this objection, for each nation always considers itself the innocent party, and the other nation is always the aggressor nation.

CO-SIGNATORIES OF THE PACT

Consider some of these nations with whom we propose to enter a military alliance, giving a blanket endorsement in advance of all their wars. Italy is one, on the opposing side in both world wars. Portugal, a Fascist nation, is another. How can we deny Spain the same privileged position, when both Portugal and Italy are in?

One of the members of this military pact, the Netherlands, has suppressed a genuine movement for independence in Indonesia with bloody fighting, with its leaders in prison, all in defiance of the United Nations' decision. Temporarily, while this pact is under consideration, the Dutch are behaving just now, but what about the future? For better or for worse, that nation becomes our ally, and probably we shall have to dig deep into our pockets to finance arms to pour into the Netherlands, and then in turn the Dutch use them to suppress freedom in Indonesia.

The French in Indochina are certainly not saints either. Recently, under the security of this pact, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxemburg, France, and the Saar stole 52 square miles of valuable territory from Germany. If Germany ever fights to get back this land, the United States of America will be committed in advance to enter the war to protect the sovereign rights of these robber nations.

Against the protests of the Arab League, Algeria is included in this pact. This means that if ever Algeria, perhaps in union with other powers, attempts to gain its freedom from France, we shall be obligated in advance to shed the blood of our sons to prevent freedom from reaching Algeria.

Is the Senate willing to guarantee in advance that any war in which any of these nations is ever engaged will definitely be the same as an attack upon us and so automatically involve us in war as allies? Bear in mind that it is not only these nations, but if the North Atlantic Pact is adopted there will be a Mediterranean Pact, a Near-East Pact, a Pacific Pact, and no one knows how many more. If any of these nations goes Communist, we will be obliged by the language of the pact to defend their interests just the same.

It is true that Secretary Acheson goes beyond the language of the pact, and declares that if there is a Communist civil war in any of these countries our country will be obligated to defend the existing government. But what if the people of Portugal rise up against their Fascist rulers in the effort to be free? Will we be obligated by this pact to defend dictatorship against democracy?

Yes, the congressional right to deliberation in each specific case must be preserved. No nation has the right to tax people and draft people to enter wars unless they shall have some voice in deciding whether or not to enter such wars. But if this pact is adopted, and some issue arises where I do not wish to see my Nation involved in war, and I telegraph my Congressman, he will reply to me:

There is no use in your writing or sending telegrams to me anymore. Congress has given up its power to decide and has transferred it to the capitals of Europe.

One of the principal arguments used by the official Department of State Publication 3462 for this pact was that "two world wars have taught them that their security is inextricably linked together, that an attack on any one of them is in effect an attack on all." If this statement is true, then why is Russia not included in this pact? For in both world wars Russia was an ally. Italy, an enemy state in both world wars, is now included.

This only goes to show that we cannot tell in advance what the situation will be; therefore, no one has the right to say that an attack on any of these nations means an attack on us. As to our entrance into these two World Wars, many today are questioning the necessity. I simply refer you to the eminent historian, the late Charles A. Beard, who wrote the book President Roosevelt and the Coming of the War, 1941.

COMMITMENT TO DECLARE WAR

But even if the necessity for our entrance into these wars be granted, it does not follow that we will determine in advance that we will always want to intervene. Consider what an ardent supporter of World War II, Senator Claude Pepper, said on the floor of the Senate June 11, 1948:

In World War I and in World War II we made a choice, when we had all the facts before us, to go in. We did not have any alliance like the military alliances that bound European nations together and automatically committed them to war. I am not prepared to see this country, by implication or otherwise, commit itself to the defense of western Europe or any other part of the world in advance, without knowing the facts and circumstances and conditions that would lead us to the terrible mobilization of our mighty strength.

There are safeguards in other arrangements we have signed. In the United Nations, when it comes to the use of armed force our nation has a right of veto in the Security Council. In the Rio Pact, note these words: "No state shall be required to use armed force without its consent." Article 20. In the Rio Pact there was some consideration of our Constitution, our desire to be consulted before we entered a terrible war. But these words of the Rio Pact are conspicuous by their absence in the North Atlantic Pact.

Speaking of the Rio Pact, it is sometimes argued that we have had a successful Monroe doctrine and the proven benefits of this plan should be more widely extended. But let us bear in mind that the Monroe doctrine was primarily directed against these very nations with whom we now plan an alliance. Take a look at the map of South America and you will find there British Guiana, Dutch Guiana, French Guiana—all stolen before the Monroe doctrine came into force.

Instead of agreeing to defend these American nations against the aggression of western European powers, we now propose to give up the Monroe doctrine and put in its place the Truman doctrine which guarantees that we shall go to war whenever most of the nations on the globe are attacked, no matter who attacks and under any conditions.

COMMUNIST AGGRESSION

The reasons given for this new military alliance are that Russia exercises the veto power so much over trivial matters, and has gained so much territory. But let us analyze these Communist aggressions. Is it not true that communism arose out of the ruins of World War I and greatly expanded her territory as a direct result of the victories of World War II, to which victories the United States of America was a mighty, contributing factor?

We must therefore do our best to prevent another war. While regretting the results of the last war, it is no remedy to plunge the world into another to increase the area of fascism or communism. Then when it came to peace settlements, Roosevelt at Yalta and Truman at Potsdam gave Russia everything she asked for on a silver platter. Not only was the Russian veto given on all peace settlements, but in the United Nations Charter the United States consented to the Russian veto in every trivial matter.

The past crisis of Berlin was solely the result of the United States leaders agreeing to a situation where the western sectors of Berlin would be surrounded for 100 miles by Russian-dominated territory. So everything that our leaders object to about Russia is the result of their own planning. They are unwilling to admit their guilt, but instead contrive to get us into yet another war through this pact.

This alliance is designed to meet a Russian technique that, as a rule, does not exist. Their method is not to cross national boundaries with Russian troops after the manner of Hitler. It is to bore from within and to promote civil wars as in Czechoslovakia and China. When conditions become so desperate economically that the people are ready for any change, then Communists take over.

ECONOMIC RECONSTRUCTION

The Marshall plan does to a considerable extent restore these nations toward normal conditions, so that communism today is becoming less serious a threat. Further economic reconstruction will meet the challenge of the Communist strategy where the North Atlantic Pact utterly fails. By promoting an armament race, causing a million or more men to withdraw from active production of goods, we would nullify the effect of the Marshall plan and cause such misery and hopelessness in Europe as to play right into the hands of Stalin.

Countless Europeans are tired of war and of the mental attitude that leads to war. When we, due to our military leadership, hand them guns when they ask for bread, and invite them to beat back their plowshares into swords, we give the Communists a golden opportunity in all of these war-torn nations.

REARMAMENT AND ARMS RACES

This pact does promote an armament race. Article 3 of the pact promises mutual aid, which means principally the United States, to develop their "capacity to resist armed attack." This means, as Secretary Acheson affirms, that "the Senate would have an obligation to approve arms shipments to Europe, if it ratifies the pact."

In fact, President Truman promised arms to the members of this pact. To develop the capacity of these nations to resist any armed attack is no small commitment. Hanson Baldwin says that a—lend-lease program of arms and equipment amounting over a 4- or 5-year period to perhaps $15,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000 is one of the duties expected of the United States when the alliance has been completed (New York Times, December 5, 1948.)

Since then he has admitted it might amount to over $20,000,000,000. When we consider that we shall in peacetime this year go into debt by probably $1,000,000,000, we shall see what an appalling prospect this additional load becomes. This will mean greatly increased taxation, and taxes really come out of the pockets of the common people.

When Russia increases its own armaments and armed forces in retaliation, the European governments will complain that they were promised security by this pact, and we have failed to live up to our promises.

George Marcy, the military critic of Figaro, conservative French newspaper, as reported in the New York Times for January 28, 1949, asserted that it would cost $15,000,000,000 to equip the French army alone. Our own economy would be seriously threatened, not only because of taxes, but because of the lack of steel where even now the shortage is so great as to hamper our production of other goods.

But to encourage other nations now to enter an armament race is to invite disaster. See with what zeal the Communists provoked strikes in France to interfere with the Marshall plan. But for us to hamper production of useful goods by promoting militarism is to do exactly the same, and so overcome the good we have accomplished.

In France 1 out of 4 to whom we would hand guns would be Communist. In China 90 percent of the billions we sent for military equipment was seized by the Communists. Sooner or later we would find that an essential and necessary part of our rearmament program would be the remilitarization of western Germany. So the North Atlantic Pact gives no defense from the usual type of Communist activity, but it does weaken these nations at the very point where Communists are most liable to attack.

The North Atlantic Pact does undermine the prestige of the United Nations by the promotion of military alliances, which have always led to war, just as the League of Nations was undermined. As Senator Pepper so well expressed it last year:

I believe that whatever is a bypassing of the United Nations, whatever threatens to undermine its power or prestige, or authority, is a step backward, not forward, and that we would better support the organization we have, and let time and momentum sustain and succor its strength.

THE PACT AND RUSSIA

The State Department refers to the Russian vetoes and their refusal to come to agreements on vital European matters. But can such a pact as this help the situation? It will rather hinder. It will add to the tension of Russian-American relations and make agreement even more difficult.

Although Russia has been hard to get along with, because she has insisted upon the privileges that our past leadership so freely granted, yet there is no indication that Russia wants war, because her people and economy suffered so badly from the last one. So much is this the case that our militarists are hard put to it to find reasons for getting us excited. Whenever the Russians hold spring maneuvers, we are told they are getting mobilized for war.

Lately these militarists have become so hard up that they have tried to stimulate the imaginations of the people by saying that flying saucers are not a joke. With the western defenses as weak as they are, why has Russia not already made the attack? The only answer that can be given is that whether she is deterred by the atom bomb, or it simply does not fit in with Russian strategy to antagonize the common people by wars of aggression, Russia clearly does not want war.

NORWAY AND THE PACT

But this North Atlantic alliance can cause the war that it was designed to prevent. The presence of Norway in this Pact with the resulting obligation imposed that American guns and American generals had to be used to help strengthen these countries is a threat to Russian security, just as a similar Russian arrangement with Mexico would be a threat to us.

We read that United States representatives promised military supplies to Norway only if she joined the alliance. (New York Times, February 13, 1949.) When American guns and generals so freely used in Greece are also given to Norway, we create an impossible situation for Russia and invite war.

The Christian Century of March 2, 1949, declared:

The real issue is whether a permanent military alliance of this sort, ostensibly within the UN, but acting independently of the UN and against a member nation of the UN, by forging a cordon of steel around that nation and pushing its army, navy, and air bases right into that nation's front yard, will serve peace or breed fear, anger, and war.

The Cleveland meeting of the Federal Council of Churches affirmed:

No defensive alliance should be entered into which might validly appear as aggressive to Russia as a Russian alliance with Latin America would undoubtedly appear to us.

If we enter this military alliance and help western Europe rearm, we present an engraved invitation to Russia to attack, for it will take years to get ready the armies needed for defense. So why not attack before they are prepared? If war is made to appear inevitable, Russia certainly will not wait. So this pact tends to incite the very war it tries to prevent:

PROVOCATIVENESS OF THE TREATY

This military alliance, like all others before it, leads to war. World War I was caused because Germany had an alliance with Austria, and Russia had an alliance with Serbia, so both Germany and Russia were obliged to fight, because of the military alliance. Neither the military alliance of Great Britain with Poland nor the alliance between Hitler and Stalin prevented World War II, but rather encouraged these nations to fight.

In contrast, see how the Israel-Arab conflict was settled. Here there was no alliance of Russian nations supporting Israel, and other nations supporting the Arabs, to keep the war going. If there were, there would have been no desire for peace among either Jews or Arabs. They would have said: "We have powerful allies, so why should we back down from our positions?" But instead the nations shut off the supply of arms, and although the UN has no police force, simply the moral force of world opinion and the persistent efforts of UN officials were instrumental in bringing the conflict to an end.

The present situation does not call for bypassing and snubbing the United Nations, calling it a failure, giving only lip service to it, and putting our trust instead in a military alliance, letting the UN die by neglect. Somehow the past mistakes of our leaders must be corrected. More just peace terms must be made. The United Nations must be made into a real world government.

In the meantime we should use every possible avenue through the United Nations and other conferences to iron out our differences with Russia and come to some agreement.

OBLIGATION TO DECLARE WAR

The CHAIRMAN. Just one question: You say this would force us into any war that any of these other countries might be engaged in?

Mr. COTTON. Not only against Russia, but any nation.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think you are quite fair when article 5 provides:

If such an armed attack occurs—

that means an armed attack on any of these other nations—

each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary.

Does that not leave it to the discretion of each one of the countries to do whatever it deems necessary? Would the United States have to declare war under that article?

Mr. COTTON. The words are "necessary to restore the security of the North Atlantic area." And the words that precede are vitally important in that. They are "an attack upon one is an attack upon all." So automatically it is like an attack on Pearl Harbor.

The CHAIRMAN. What does it mean when it says "an attack"?

Mr. COTTON. I cannot possibly interpret those words. But I want to say that the word "forthwith" does suggest that such immediacy of action must be taken, and only the Executive could do it. It would not remain for a deliberative body to decide.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. No questions. But I would like the record to show at this point that Mr. Acheson himself has defined the expression "as it deems necessary" to indicate the exercise of an honest, genuine judgment on the part of our country, so that a mere arbitrary decision, I take it, by our country, would not be in accordance with the language as it may determine.

I do not know whether this gentleman has seen that language of Mr. Acheson or not.

Mr. COTTON. However, it should be stated that whatever was said before, in fact, whatever was said for the Vandenberg resolution, the important thing is that we have this treaty, and it says certain things, and the nations of Europe have been given to understand that it means certain things. The important thing is not what the Secretary tells us, but what he has told the other nations what this means.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what he told the other nations?

Mr. COTTON. The fact is that they will—

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know what he told the other nations? You say you know all about that.

Mr. COTTON. From all we learn in the newspapers they have been given to understand that their security is assured, because of our entrance into the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You are excused.

Mr. COTTON. Thank you.

STATEMENT OF O. JOHN ROGGE, FORMER ASSISTANT, UNITED STATES ATTORNEY GENERAL

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Rogge, how long will you take?

Mr. ROGGE. I should like, if the chairman please, to make an oral statement, I would say, of 10 or 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you a written paper?

Mr. ROGGE. I have what you would really call notes that will aid me in making an oral statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you get along on 10 minutes? The hour is late.

Mr. ROGGE. I know the hour is late. I will try it in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. You will have to do it in 10 minutes if we say so.

Mr. ROGGE. I recognize that.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope you can get through in 10 minutes, because we have been working hard all day, and we have been working hard every day. We do not get much time to play golf while working on this treaty.

Mr. ROGGE. I appreciate that.

Senator DONNELL. His bite is not as bad as his bark, Mr. Rogge.

The CHAIRMAN. I have not been rough on anybody.

Mr. ROGGE. My residence is 400 East Fifty-second Street, New York City. I have a law office in that city and also here.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom do you represent?

Mr. ROGGE. I am here under my own steam, Senator. I have clients, but I am not here representing any organization. I am here myself, to express my own views, and in conformance with our tradition that American citizens may give their ideas on issues that affect them. And that is why I am here.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead. We will give you 10 minutes orally.

Mr. ROGGE. I am here in opposition to the North Atlantic Pact because I think, in substance, it is a military alliance, and although it may not violate the letter, it does violate the spirit of the United Nations Charter, and in my opinion plays into the hands of communism.

EFFECT OF REARMAMENT ON CIVIL RIGHTS

I think the State Department, through its devotion to discredited doctrines and its resulting failures, has become one of the most effective recruiting agents for world communism. This pact, if ratified, is going to put us and the western European nations on a garrison footing, and any new trend toward a garrison state would mean even further curtailment of basic American freedom which has already been sharply curtailed. That is my No. 1 concern.

I think we have been destroying our best characteristic, and that is our freedom. We already have large armament expenditures. Now they are going to be still larger. I am not reassured at all by an article, for instance, which I saw in the New York Sun of Saturday, quoting an AP dispatch that the State Department declared that the present defenses of western Europe are so weak that they invite military aggression, and proposing for fiscal year 1950, $1,130,000,000 for the North Atlantic Pact countries, and $320,000,000 for Greece and Turkey, making a total of $1,450,000,000.

The drafters of this proposed pact have committed another serious blunder, in my opinion, this time dredging up a military alliance to combat a threat which is essentially ideological, social, and economic. The result of this faulty evaluation will be not only an immediate waste of billions of dollars but will also eventually be as costly a failure as was the mistaken evaluation of the situation in China.

I hold no brief for the Soviet Union. I am interested primarily in my own country and its people. I have been to Europe twice this year, this past year. I spoke at two peace conferences, and I suppose that they were rather heavily weighted on the left-wing side. I know that when I stated that American leaders did not want war, and that the Soviet Union shared much of the blame for the deterioration of international affairs, I received some hisses and boos.

I am convinced that the two systems are in conflict the world over. I do not think we can sit by idly in this conflict and must in fact actively defend ourselves and our form of government against those hostile to it. But I think we are acting negatively rather than positively in this North Atlantic Pact. I think we are putting our worst foot forward.

COMPETITION OF IDEAS

What you have is a competition of ideas, and you do not fight ideas with guns; you fight them with better ideas. We are in competition for the allegiance of men and women in Europe, and I think democracy can triumph. I think our freedom is the best thing that the human race has known to date. I think it can triumph over any other system, but a garrison state is not a democracy, and this treaty, if ratified, will put western Europe on a garrison footing as well as strengthen in this country the military forces which are historically an antidemocratic force.

The Nazis tried guns instead of butter, and it did not work. Should this pact be ratified with its emphasis on arms and might, I think it will fail as miserably as has the Truman doctrine in Greece and the same kind of policy in China. There is just no future in arms expenditures. The State Department, in getting up this Atlantic Pact, has ignored the ghosts of similar alliances and treaties which have never worked before, and which littered up the diplomatic graveyards. And despite all the headlines and speeches about Russian aggression, I do not think the Soviets are a military threat. They are making political warfare, not military aggression, and I am not alone in my opinion on that.

For instance, I see, in a column of David Lawrence, in the New York Sun of May 6, in which he says:

The cry of the Russians that Americans are warmongering has been dismissed heretofore as absurd, but it will be difficult indeed for America to keep on spending $15,000,000,000 a year for armament after Russia calls for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from German soil and carries out, as she doubtless will soon, a complete demobilization of the Red Army.

Or this, from John Foster Dulles, a statement before the Third National Conference on Churches, on March 8, 1949. He said:

I do not know any responsible high official, military or civilian, in this Government or any government, who believes that the Soviet state now plans conquest by open military aggression.

They wage political warfare and the way to fight them is by better politics. They thrive on mass discontent and the way to fight that is to remove the causes of discontent. This treaty in my opinion does neither. It is a dangerous venture which I think has three objectives:

1. Strengthening America's hand in the cold war;
2. Provide international guaranties against reform and revolutionary movements within the member states; and
3. Lay the groundwork for a military coalition for a possible war against Russia.

Insofar as the cold war is concerned I think the majority of Americans are already sick and tired of it. It has cost us dearly. We have inflationary prices, we have artificially created shortages, and the thing I come back to, that troubles me most, is that we, along with it, have been in the process of destroying our right to think as we like and to say what we think.

I am exercising it here, but I would like all Americans free to exercise that.

The CHAIRMAN. They have the same privilege as you have, have they not?

Mr. ROGGE. That is right. But they have been scared, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I cannot unscare them, because you keep scaring them.

POSITIVE APPROACH INSTEAD OF NEGATIVE

Mr. ROGGE. Really, instead, for instance, of the State Department coming along with a negative thing like the North Atlantic Pact, I would like to suggest an idea on the positive side. I would like to suggest, for instance, that they think in terms, let us say, of an idea of the RFC for the new China, in which American businessmen could put their money, have the Government guarantee the principal of it, let us say, and let them invest that money in manufacture in China, so that China could be developed.

That would be a positive approach rather than a negative one as contained in this North Atlantic Pact. The talk about mass discontent, and the clamor for reforms and blaming that on the Kremlin, I think, also does not look at the facts correctly. I think those things in Europe are due to the fact that capitalism has been unable to provide the basic standards of living.

I can say to you that when French workers talk to you about the lack of milk they have no milk. Then when they talk about being cold they are really cold. You cannot blame those things on the Kremlin. I think the two danger spots are France and Italy. And if those people want industry nationalized or if they want large land holdings redistributed, I think they will have to be allowed to do that.

They will have to get the reforms there, and they will have to be allowed to do it in their own way.

The third point, about military coalition for a possible war against Russia, I do not think I have to elaborate on that, beyond reminding that these anti-Comintern pacts have existed before and they have not gotten us anywhere. I think the solution to our problem lies in the United Nations. I think the North Atlantic Pact, for all its talk about carrying out the United Nations, does not do it.

I think it violates the spirit of the United Nations and we should proceed in that way, we should proceed positively, rather than in the negative form of what is in effect a military alliance, because we are going to spend ourselves either into a depression or a war, or both. And I am concerned primarily about all the money that we spend for armament and we are going to spend still more under this pact.

I think it is a negative approach to the world's problems.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. You favor the rejection of the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. ROGGE. Yes; I definitely do.

Senator DONNELL. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you subscribe to the doctrines and policies of Henry Wallace?

Mr. ROGGE. I was a supporter, and I suppose, Senator, you could say an ardent supporter of Henry Wallace in the last campaign. I think that I agree pretty much with his ideas. I am not going to say that I agree with all of them, because I do not know what they are. But he and I are in pretty general agreement, that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Wallace, of course, is against the treaty.

Mr. ROGGE. So I understand. I read that in the newspaper account.

The CHAIRMAN. He testified here against the treaty.

Mr. ROGGE. That is my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. You read his testimony, did you not?

Mr. ROGGE. No; I will have to say I have not had a chance to do that. I am rather busy, a practicing lawyer, and I have had two cases in the last 2 months, one in the Supreme Court of the United States and one in the Supreme Court of the State of New Jersey. My law business takes up most of my time, but I do feel about this pact. I have talked to people from other countries.

I do think that the thing that the Soviet people are conducting, they think they have an idea that is better than ours. I do not think you can fight that with guns. I think you have to fight that with a positive democracy of our own and we are able to do it, but we do not do it in this pact.

The CHAIRMAN. We do not do it all in this pact, of course.

Mr. ROGGE. I do not think we do any of it in there.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not?

THE COLD WAR

Mr. ROGGE. No, sir. It is a military pact, and I think it violates the spirit of the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. You say it is a military pact. As a matter of fact, there is nothing in the treaty that binds us. There is no aggressive action contemplated in the pact, is there?

Mr. ROGGE. Well—

The CHAIRMAN. Do not say "well." Say what you mean.

Mr. ROGGE. Yes. Let us just be honest about this. I think this pact has in mind continuing the cold war against Russia. It says here, for instance, in article 3—

The CHAIRMAN. I am talking about a hot war.

Mr. ROGGE. Yes; and it has that in mind, too. This North Atlantic Pact has as its objective dividing the world into two camps.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they not already divided into two camps?

Mr. ROGGE. Do we have to go still further in that direction by putting it in black and white?

The CHAIRMAN. I asked you a question. We did not divide it. Is it not divided by the action of Russia?

Mr. ROGGE. I think we helped to divide it.

The CHAIRMAN. Has not Russia said she is not going to be content until she controls the rest of the world, and communizes the whole world?

Mr. ROGGE. I do not think she put it quite like that. They have the idea that communism is going to sweep the world. Why do we have to agree with them and set up a military pact? We play into their hands when we spend this much money for arms. I say put it in positive terms, let us put the American businessmen, for instance, to work to help industrialize China.

It may be that Russia has missed the boat in China, too, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all. Thank you. You are excused.

Mr. ROGGE. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. We will meet tomorrow morning for the last day of the hearing at 10:30 in this room. The committee stands in recess.

(Thereupon, at 6 p. m., the committee adjourned, to reconvene Wednesday, May 18, 1949, at 10:30 a. m.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

---

WEDNESDAY, MAY 18, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment, on May 17, 1949, at 10:30 a. m. in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senator Connally (chairman).

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. The committee has some telegrams and communications here on the matter. I will ask the clerk of the committee to read them out so that you can hear them and insert them in the report.

(Telegram and letter approving ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty were read into the record from the following: Mr. William Green, president, American Federation of Labor; the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; United States Junior Chamber of Commerce.)

CLEVELAND, OHIO, May 17, 1949.

HON. TOM CONNALLY,
*Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:*

The executive council of the American Federation of Labor, now meeting in Cleveland, unanimously approved the North Atlantic Pact. The council believes that the pact will serve to promote peace, increase national and international morale, and will serve to make more effective the work of the United Nations. The council urges Congress to approve the pact as quickly as possible.

WM. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, DEPARTMENT OF GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS,
Washington 6, D. C., May 10, 1949.

HON. TOM CONNALLY,
*Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.*

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: The Chamber of Commerce of the United States hopes that your committee on Foreign Relations will recommend strongly that the Senate consent to ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty.

In thirty-seventh annual meeting during the first week of May, the membership of the national chamber adopted a declaration of policy renewing support of the United Nations. The final paragraphs of that declaration urge that the United States Government speedily implement the purpose of national security and universal peace by exercising the powers and privileges under articles 51 and 52 of the Charter. I attach a copy of the complete policy statement on these questions.

The national chamber believes that the North Atlantic Treaty is consistent with the purposes and provisions of the Charter and that it will contribute to the preservation of world peace.

We therefore support it as promoting the security and welfare of our own country.

I should be happy if you would make this correspondence a part of the record of your current committee hearings.

Cordially yours,

CLARENCE R. MILLER.

Enclosure.

[From Policy Declarations of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States approved by the membership on May 4, 1949]

REGIONAL DEFENSE PACTS

Article 51 of the United Nations Charter recognizes the inherent right of nations, singly or collectively, to defend themselves against armed attack, and article 52 specifically provides for regional arrangements among nations in matters of security. States interested in restraining aggression and preserving the peace may therefore organize collectively for these common purposes within the framework of the United Nations.

We therefore urge that our Government, recognizing the destructive impact of the veto power by Russia and its satellite nations, move speedily and progressively to implement the purposes of national security and universal peace by exercising the powers and privileges reserved to all member nations under articles 51 and 52 of the Charter.

We endorse and approve the principles of the Vandenberg resolution passed by the United States Senate on June 11, 1948, and the purposes and principles of the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance entered into with our sister nations of the Americas with whom we have consistently maintained friendly relations. By such agreements the national security of the participating nations can be strengthened and the cause of peace can be progressively advanced.

We urge that similar regional treaties and agreements be negotiated and concluded with the free democracies of Europe and with Canada, and that the Congress extend to all such participating states every reasonable assistance, consistent with our own security and our domestic economy, for the purpose of strengthening defense against aggression or acts of war.

MOBILIZATION FOR PEACE

It is now our hope and the hope of mankind that, by such progressive union of peace-loving nations under the provisions of articles 51 and 52 of the Charter, sufficient strength and power may be mobilized against aggression and such a powerful concert of purpose to keep the peace developed that aggression may be stayed and world peace achieved within the framework of the United Nations. Thus we may preserve the United Nations with all of its beneficial purposes and avoid the destructive impact of continued abuse of the veto power by those nations whose purposes cannot be achieved in a world at peace, and ultimately achieve for our America and for all the world escape from the crushing burdens of national defense.

UNITED STATES JUNIOR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Tulsa, Okla., May 10, 1949.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,

Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: As president of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, I should like to make a statement concerning the Atlantic Pact.

Our organization recently sponsored the largest single group ever to travel over either ocean by air to attend the Junior Chamber International Congress in Brussels, Belgium. The 132 delegates from the United States were thrilled with the progress which has been made in England, France, Belgium, and the Netherlands. Some of our delegates also visited in the Scandinavian countries and were equally impressed with the progress which has been made there. After spending 3 weeks with the young men in these countries which are signers of the Atlantic Pact, we became more convinced than ever that they require and deserve the wholehearted, unqualified support of the United States. I believe that all of us, both here and abroad, regretted the necessity for the Atlantic Pact, but the decision to make this agreement was not one of our own choosing but a requirement thrust upon us by the constant threat of Russia and her satellites.

In our opinion, this is another step toward an eventual world government which members of our organization favor. We do not believe that this pact in any way alters our agreement in the United Nations nor our firm resolve to work for the success of this body.

Sincerely,

PAUL D. BAGWELL, President.

The CHAIRMAN. Reverend Wahlberg?

Tell the stenographer your name and what your business is, where you live, and whom you represent.

STATEMENT OF REV. EDGAR M. WAHLBERG, DETROIT PEACE COUNCIL, DEARBORN, MICH.

Reverend WAHLBERG. My name is Edgar M. Wahlberg and I live in Dearborn, Mich.

Honorable members of the Foreign Relations Committee, first of all, I wish to congratulate the members of this committee and the Senators from my own State—namely, Arthur H. Vandenberg and Homer E. Ferguson—who in conformity with our democratic tradition have provided for an extensive hearing on this most important issue of the North Atlantic Defense Pact.

I have the privilege of representing the social action commission of my own church, a group of ministers and Christian laymen of the Detroit area whose names are attached, the Detroit Peace Council, and the Michigan Council Opposing Peacetime Conscription.

The following statement is my own. The motivation for it is in my Christian faith and basic desire to serve the Prince of Peace. It is my contention that Christianity and its teaching of love for all mankind is the third alternative to the alternatives of appeasement and war.

We believe that no one sincerely desires war. We should do everything to prevent a third world war and the destruction of our way of life. The deepest desire of mankind is peace. The American people desire to maintain a democratic way of life and to lead the way to world security.

Peace depends upon an understanding between the United States of America and the U. S. S. R. and a satisfactory working relationship in a pattern of world responsibility and concern for the people of the world.

Fear and unfriendly acts by both nations have deepened the division between them and have generated hostility. Both nations are burdened with expenditures of a military nature that have endless and exhaustive proportions.

If the present pattern persists, there is danger of a violent war at any time. It is only logical to assume that the present cold war can lead to an outbreak of actual war. Yet a further step is now being prepared in the form of a North Atlantic Defense Pact, to be followed by a huge and costly program of arming western Europe.

We contend that in practice, if past experience is a guide, the very nature of this alliance and the process of rearmament will generate fears which still further rearmament will be needed to allay, creating a mounting spiral of expenditures in which military estimates will prevail over considerations of economic and social recovery. In this way we will be perpetuating the very conditions of misery, want, and dissatisfaction, at home and abroad, which, according to the State Department analysis itself, foster communism and thus play into the hands of the U. S. S. R.

We contend that we must put a general settlement with the U. S. S. R. ahead of the North Atlantic Defense Pact. We feel that the State Department and the administration should provide an answer to this question. We believe that it is preferable to set up standards of conduct rather than standards of geography in which we militaristically divide the world into two warring camps.

THE PACT AND WORLD SECURITY

We are of the opinion that the Atlantic Pact is a second-best attempt to provide for world security. It is not unlikely that a series of regional pacts and agreements will take precedence over the facilities of the United Nations and will in time overshadow the United Nations universal character and aims. It would seem that such arrangements will hamper and further weaken the United Nations. In actuality, the pact is a substitution for the first-best alternative—the United Nations—and will lead to the “bankruptcy of the political and legal system for which the United Nations was created.”

We believe “that it will prove impossible to restore a sense of security regarded by the United States as essential to western European recovery, no matter how much we arm the nations along the Atlantic seaboard, until Russian troops are withdrawn from Germany and Austria.”

Our problem is to relax the tensions which make it essential for us and others to keep troops in Europe. Let us rather demonstrate our good faith in the possibility of the ultimate adjudication of the real difficulties dividing east and west by making a thoroughgoing overture through the United Nations of universal disarmament with the obviously necessary sanctions.

We are deeply convinced that capitalism and communism not only can, but must live together in the same peaceful world. No dispute between the United States and Russia need be resolved by force, and there are no differences between them which in time cannot be settled by peaceful negotiations. We are of the opinion that all of the possibilities for such negotiations have never been fully explored.

We petition for the discharge of our responsibilities as a peaceful Nation to the end that all mankind may be freed from the threat of total war. Confidence in an enduring peace will be created in a series of friendly acts so directed as to bring understanding between the United States of America and the U. S. S. R.

We, therefore, urge you to oppose the Atlantic Pact and the rearmament of western Europe by the United States; and we urge you to give consideration to every genuine opportunity in which it is possible for the United States and the Soviet Union to enter into relationships of understanding and agreement, as regards the settlement of international disputes, and to a speedy end of hostilities as related to World War II and also to the so-called “cold war.” We urge the strongest support of the United Nations and the use of its facilities for world understanding and social and economic recovery and disarmament.

As I have said, Christianity is the third alternative to the tragic pathways of appeasement and war. The sheer hypocrisy of security by preparing for an atomic war faster than any other nation is seen in the desperate way that atomic scientists are trying to get the American people to do some clear, honest thinking about human relationships. This kind of thinking does not call for atomic armaments and the militarization of the West. If we wish to save the world it calls for God's plan for our lives.

The early Christians went into the world with a plan. It was God's plan. Because it was better than the Roman plan and other plans, the people turned to the Christians and laid the foundations for the humanitarian efforts of mankind which led to the expansion of democracy and man's dream to save the world. Man found the stuff for a new world in his divine nature. The power came from God.

We see this in the establishment of our own Nation, the first best democracy on earth. When things were confused in the Constitutional Convention, our forebears recessed to pray. They reconvened and found the way to agreement.

God gave us the world with all its abundance. God gave us life and a nature than can be good and helpful. God gave us Jesus Christ, who more than any other has shown us the way to live. In Christ, we have the teaching of faith and love. We have the power of God and the grace and discipline of prayer. God's plan is adequate. Here we have that added greatness of soul which drives out fear and in which we can work together for the common good.

This is the glory of God's plan for our lives. God made us in His image and through Christ has lifted us to the greatest knowledge known to man. We belong to God in the fact of our birth. Let us belong to God twice in our response to His love and our unhurried love for all the children of men. We pray that our representatives in Washington may implement this universal faith in the support of these universal institutions and values which alone will direct us to world peace, understanding and security.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you a veteran?

Reverend WAHLBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you belong to one of the veterans' organizations?

Reverend WAHLBERG. I belong to the American Legion.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a Legion man?

Reverend WAHLBERG. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; thank you.

Miss Mabel Vernon.

This is the last day of our hearings, and we have a lot of witnesses, and I will have to ask all the witnesses to be brief, because otherwise we can't hear them all. All right; go ahead.

STATEMENT OF MISS MABEL VERNON, DIRECTOR OF PEOPLES MANDATE COMMITTEE

Miss VERNON. The Peoples Mandate Committee, composed of women in all the American Republics, works to abolish war. It has its headquarters at the Hay-Adams House in Washington.

The committee was organized in 1935 and from its inception has advocated peaceful settlement of all disputes and universal disarmament. It has worked and is working to strengthen the organization of American States and the inter-American treaties and conventions designed to keep peace in the Western Hemisphere.

The committee is now concentrating on securing adoption of an international agreement within the United Nations for universal disarmament under international control and for a world police force to maintain peace.

The Peoples Mandate Committee opposes ratification of the North Atlantic Pact and particularly the implementation of the pact by supplying United States arms to the western European nations. The inevitable results of such action would be increased reliance on force, military control of our foreign policy, increased tension between blocs of nations, and overwhelming and continually increasing expenditures for armaments. All of these results belong to the pattern not of peace but of war.

Many American citizens are deeply concerned about the course our Government is taking. All our policies must be directed to preventing another war in which the human race might perish. History shows that military alliances such as that provided by the North Atlantic Pact have not succeeded in preventing war. As one writer puts it, "the twentieth century diplomatic boneyard is littered with dead defense treaties that failed in their purpose."

WAR CAN BE ABOLISHED BY ACTION IN THE UNITED NATIONS

The first step is an international agreement providing sufficient international control to prevent atomic and all other wars and to maintain universal disarmament.

We urge that the American Government and the American people concentrate all their energy on securing such an agreement by the General Assembly of the United Nations meeting in September 1949.

We call on the Foreign Relations Committee to recommend to the Senate a resolution urging on the President that the United States Government sponsor this agreement in the United Nations.

In order to provide effective international control, a comprehensive program must be offered along the lines of the one contained in the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That an International agreement be adopted for the establishment of an International Control Commission, the members of which shall be approved by every member state of the United Nations, and which shall act by simple majority vote: (1) To create and control a World Police Force of Volunteers, with fullest powers of inspection; (2) to supervise the simultaneous reduction of all armed forces and all armaments within each state to police level to maintain internal order; (3) to destroy atomic and all other weapons of mass destruction and prevent their future manufacture.

The International Control Commission provided in the agreement could be created in the following way: Each state of the United Nations lists nominees from all countries who it believes would be acceptable to all the member states. Each state then strikes from all the lists any names of which it disapproves. Those that remain become the members of the Commission. If more are needed, the governments then elect, in any way they agree upon, the numbers required. If there are less than required, new lists are similarly made until the desired number is secured. (This procedure follows the best jury systems of the Anglo-Saxon countries, where each side strikes from a jury list the names it disapproves.)

The International Control Commission would act by simple majority vote. No veto would be allowed to any state.

The World Police Force of Volunteers, with fullest powers of inspection, created and controlled by the International Control Commission, would be composed of men selected for special abilities and qualities who had passed the strictest examination for character, intelligence, and ability. They would be highly paid. In every country participating in the agreement, the World Police Force would have a section made up largely of nationals of that country. Their allegiance would be primarily to the United Nations, and not to their own or to any other national government.

The International Control Commission should have every facility for full investigation of the activities of all branches of the state, public associations, and private persons regarding the observance of the agreement. Atomic scientist inspectors would be included in the forces of investigation.

The simultaneous reduction of all armed forces and all armaments within each nation to a police level to maintain internal order would be made, under the supervision of the International Control Commission, by equal percentages leaving all states in the same relative position at all times during the process of disarmament. The size of the national police force to maintain internal order in each country would be determined by the International Control Commission, and the size of the national police in each country would necessarily influence the size of the section of the World Police Force to be stationed there.

Destroy atomic and all other weapons of mass destruction and prevent their future manufacture is a provision which would completely eliminate all atomic and biological weapons, whether in the hands of local, national, or international authorities.

It will doubtless be stated that Russia would never agree to such a plan, but such a plan has never been offered in the United Nations. Whatever Russia does, it is our responsibility to present the best disarmament program that can be constructed and to work with sincerity and determination for its acceptance. If Russia does not accept it, nothing will be lost. And we will have gained the increased confidence of people throughout the world.

We therefore ask the Foreign Relations Committee when it reports the Atlantic Pact to recommend to the Senate a resolution urging that the President negotiate within the United Nations an agreement providing for effective international control to prevent war and to maintain universal disarmament.

The CHAIRMAN. We have advocated a police force all the time.

Miss VERNON. I know you have. I remember particularly your resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Soviets have prevented us from getting a world police force. The Military Staff Committee will never agree to anything.

Thank you very much. You never have said whether you were for the ratification of this pact.

Miss VERNON. I think I read it. The Peoples Mandate Committee opposes ratification of the North Atlantic Pact, and particularly the implementation of the pact by supplying United States arms to western European nations.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not before us at the moment.

Thank you very much.

Mrs. Agnes Waters.

STATEMENT OF MRS. AGNES WATERS, WASHINGTON, D. C.

[EXCERPTS]

Mrs. WATERS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Mrs. Agnes Waters. I live at 3267 N Street NW., Washington, D. C. I represent myself and millions of mothers who have to supply the cannon fodder for wars, and I appear here against the North Atlantic Pact, and I am also opposed to any arms program or bill to supplement it, or to supply any of the member nations or to supply the so-called United Nations or the so-called Security Council or any other foreign body with our guns and munitions of war, and I am most emphatically against sending any of our armies or navies overseas to aid any foreign nation's war or to police the world. Our soldiers and sailors are not slaves to be placed at the disposal of foreign nations.

I charge that the North Atlantic Pact and every bill or treaty that follows this pact, and every bill or treaty that went before, is a part of an international conspiracy for a world revolution or diplomatic, legislative, and military coup d'etat to overthrow the Government of the United States and every other nation to build a world government for the Socialist Soviet Republics and a Jewish world state. . . .

Ten years ago I stood at the doors of this Senate committee at the hearings on the repeal of the embargo, and I pointed out to all the members of this committee the enemies of this Republic who came in here to testify as witnesses for the repeal of the arms embargo. A few days before I had attended a Communist meeting where I saw and heard them plot and plan for 3 days at round-tables the steps that got us into war. They wrote the blueprints for war and for the overthrow of this Government, starting with the repeal of the arms embargo, and they appointed over 100 witnesses to come up here to put it over.

Their leader and director was Clark M. Eichelberger, the director of the American League for Peace and Democracy, which was afterward raided on September 28, 1939, by the House Un-American Activities Committee, and the files seized which disclosed that over 3,000 officials and other employees of the United States Government were members of the Third International.

Now the same gang is here for this pact, and on the list of the propaganda committee for this pact is the name of Clark M. Eichelberger. I refer to the Atlantic union committee which I charge is a subversive propaganda committee taking the place of the discredited old American League for Peace and Democracy.

The representatives of this Atlantic Union Committee are the chief witnesses and proponents for this North Atlantic Pact. This subversive committee is represented here by its president, former Justice Roberts, by its vice presidents, former Secretary of War Robert Patterson, and former Assistant Secretary, under Secretary of State Edward R. Stettinius, Mr. Will Clayton. And these witnesses are by their testimony all of them advocating the overthrow of this Republic with this pact.

On the statements of these witnesses I demand that this pact be killed.

I charge that this pact is a part of this world revolution, and that it lays the groundwork for a Jewish world state.

It is a diplomatic, legislative, and military coup d'etat.

This is borne out by the testimony of at least four of the witnesses and proponents of this pact right here in this hearing room and I quote from the testimony of Secretary of State Dean Acheson, from the testimony of former Justice Owen J. Roberts, from the testimony of former Secretary of War Robert Patterson, and from the testimony of former Assistant Secretary of State Will Clayton.

First. Secretary Acheson testified that the pact implements the United Nations.

Second. Former Justice Roberts testified as follows:

The Atlantic Union Committee—of whom Mr. Roberts is the president—proposes that, after the ratification of the Atlantic Pact, the President of the United States invite pact sponsors to a Federal convention. Our committee hopes that such a convention would discuss Federal union—world government—of the Atlantic democracies as a means of making the Atlantic Pact work to the full.

And he adds:

The concept of such a Federal union of Atlantic democracies can, however, become a practical reality only if the Atlantic Pact is ratified. I urge you to go forward with the ratification now, and then to move on to consideration of Atlantic union.

Now those are the words of Mr. Roberts for this pact.

If this does not prove that it is a part of a plot to overthrow the Government of the United States of America and all other nations that are parties to this pact, then what does? And there are three more of these witnesses who put their foot in their mouth and said worse; so that anyone would have to be deaf, dumb, and blind not to realize that this pact is a part of a diplomatic and legislative and military coup d'etat.

I charge these four traitors with conspiracy to overthrow the Government of the United States. I hold in my hand a copy of the testimony of former Secretary of War Robert Patterson, now the vice president of the Atlantic Union Committee and who appeared here as one of the witnesses and proponents for this pact. And I quote his words on page 3 of his mimeographed testimony given here on May 9, 1949, as follows:

After the pact has been ratified, the Atlantic Union Committee proposes that the Senate examine the project for Atlantic union as a means of implementing the pact by a firmer union of the people. But first and foremost we urge ratification of the pact.

Now those are the words of the great war criminal Patterson before this Senate Committee for this pact.

I hold in my hand the statement before the Senate hearings of the former Assistant Secretary of State, Will Clayton, now another vice president of the Atlantic Union Committee and who appeared here as one of the witnesses and proponents for this pact, representing the Atlantic Union Committee, and he stated as follows:

This pact will afford time to consider and prepare for the larger enterprise which lies ahead. For this pact is a natural and necessary step on the road to a Federal union. We are in the midst of a world revolution, the implications of which are not yet fully understood. But all of us should now realize that man's victory over time and distance and matter renders completely archaic the present political and economic structure of the world.

and he adds:

the battle of the Middle East must be fought.

Now if this testimony of the witnesses for this pact does not show it up to be an international conspiracy for a coup d'etat to overthrow the Government, then what do you call it?

I demand the arrest of these war criminals and witnesses for this pact.

Former Assistant Secretary of State Will L. Clayton, now vice president of this subversive propaganda committee for the pact called the Atlantic Union Committee, then goes on to testify further along these lines, proving the criminal conspiracy back of this pact. He says:

The United States, having more to lose than any other country, should take the lead in calling a convention of representatives of the nations composing the Atlantic Pact to explore how far they can go in forming a federal union within the Charter of the United Nations.

Now, if that is not suggesting and attempting the overthrow of this Government, then what is it? I demand the arrest of Mr. Will Clayton. It's as plain as day what these traitors are up to with this pact, and that this North Atlantic Pact is to implement the United Nations was testified to by the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson. I demand his arrest; and it is to be followed by the setting up of an international army made up of our materials and men to be supplied by the United States is also an admitted fact. This completes the picture of a diplomatic, legislative, and a military coup to be followed by the battle of the Middle East, according to one of these war criminals, Mr. Will Clayton, who goes on to testify further along these lines of conspiracy and adds that—we have not won the battle of Greece, although we have sunk a billion dollars there, and the battle of the Middle East must still be fought.

Imagine this. Now, if this does not involve a serious conspiracy for war, then what does? Very evidently it's in the cards of these sinister planners to get us into the battle of the Middle East. We got to go save the Jews in Palestine. This is an admission of war crimes planned by these war criminals.

I demand the arrest of these war criminals, the Messrs. Acheson, Patterson, Roberts, and Clayton, under the precedents set at Nuremberg for plotting and planning war crimes against all humanity, but most particularly against the people of the United States of America. I demand their arrest also for conspiring to overthrow the United States and for advocating the overthrow of this Government. . . .

The most arresting statement in the congressional report on Pearl Harbor investigation was this:

In the future the people and their Congress must know how close American diplomacy is moving to war, so that they may check its advance if impudent and imprudent, or support its position if sound.

Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty.

Before the last world war a few leaders of Government managed national policy and foreign policy as if it were a private preserve, and their decisions were announced to the American people after the event, if at all. This sort of criminal conspiracy to railroad us into world wars and world revolutions, for the purpose of building a . . . world state has got to be stopped by the hangman's noose if necessary.

A coup d'etat, in contrast to a popular revolution, is the seizure of full power by a faction in the state. It is based upon the use of official powers already held by the faction and does not depend upon bloodshed, not necessarily so. It Ain't Necessarily So, as tipped off by the music of the Marine Band at the signing of this pact. Just take a look at that map on the Senate hearing-room wall. It's significant that North America is all blacked out.

As states became more modern, more highly organized, more bureaucratic, the anatomy of the state changed and the means of seizing control had to change also. This is taken from the Strategy and Tactics of World Communism, as printed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Eightieth Congress, report of Subcommittee No. 5 on national and international movements, Mrs. Bolton, chairman. And it is known as Supplement 3A, the Coup d'Etat in Prague. Also let me call your attention to the fact that the Department of State in its official publications, notably Department of State Bulletin 508 indicates that it is operating on an international scale, just as if there was no United States of America. It is the United Nations and other international organizations such as this pact and various treaties and world councils, with which it is wholly concerned, not the sovereign rights of this Republic and its sovereign people. Let me remind the State Department that they are still paid by the taxpayers of the United States to look after America, not to serve the world, or to create a world state. But with these Red crackpots and traitors the United States as an official authority is out of the picture. They openly state "We are creating a world." I thought only God could create a world. I demand an investigation of the State Department and the arrest of all Red crackpots and traitors to the United States of America. It's high time we cleaned up our own back and front yards instead of sticking our nose into cleaning up all the rest of the nations, and that includes Russia, too. Let's mind our own business.

What we need here is an American foreign policy, not a world government.

I demand arrests, trials, and hangings of all these war mongers and war criminals, as laid down by the precedent set by the Nuremberg trials. And if you men can't run this Government as it should be run by Americans and for Americans, just get out of those seats and let us women take over.

Nineteen centuries ago, our Lord Jesus Christ anticipated the North Atlantic Pact and similar treaties of internationalists and He said:

When they shall say "peace and security"; then sudden destruction cometh upon them.

The Scriptures are clear that entangling alliances made by the internationalists will not bring peace, but on the contrary, will bring war, war on an international scale. All nations involved in the entangling alliances will be dragged into war.

We send spies to other nations to find out their plans for the future, but we do not spend 5 cents to find out what God wants us to do. We will not make the effort to find out the future of the nations as outlined in the Scriptures.

America and the rest of the nations have turned a deaf ear to God, and are rushing blindly and madly toward the greatest war in all history, toward annihilation, toward an eternal hell.

Get the word out to the people: Fight the pacts, fight the devil. Raise all hell before it's too late to save America!

The pact if ratified will be implemented by a new lend-lease bill to rearm certain European nations. Secretary Acheson on April 27, 1949, admitted as much to the Senate committee.

The first lend-lease bill was enacted in 1941, and it was sold to us by the same wrecking crew in the State Department that is lousy with the enemies of God and America. These liars falsely offered it to Congress and the country as a measure to avoid war. It was masked as a security and peace bill, but when these traitors speak peace, they mean war; they did not fool us mothers. We who know the score fought those bills and every step to war, as today when again these devils are going through the same steps and taking us to war under the same old false pretenses and lies. And this pact also masks the steps to overthrow the Government of the United States of America.

How long, oh, Lord, will you permit these deceivers to live? . . .

There is a great Judgment Day coming. Those of you who have betrayed this country are going to have to give account of your stewardship. Regarding impeachable acts, the House of Representatives in 1868 declared :

We define, therefore, an impeachable crime or misdemeanor to be one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government, or highly prejudicial to the public interest, and this may consist of a violation of the Constitution, of law, of an official oath, or of duty, by an act committed or omitted, or without violating a positive law, by the abuse of discretionary powers from improper motives, or for any improper purpose.

The subversion of the Republic has now proceeded so far as to place in jeopardy the very freedom and independence of the American people; and we may no longer in conscience withhold judgment. The Constitution of the United States was ordained and established not by the President, not by Congress, not by the Supreme Court, but by the people and for the people; and should their civil officers fail them, the people themselves are bound to use whatever means may be necessary to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution. . . .

This pact is illegal, unconstitutional, and a criminal conspiracy, and if ratified by the Senate amounts to treason and compounding a felony. Also creating and precipitating war. I demand the arrest of every proponent, of every witness and of every lobbyist or propaganda committee for this pact. I demand their arrest under the precedents set at Nurnberg for war criminals who plotted and planned war, and under the United States statutes concerning treason and conspiracy and overthrowing our United States Government. More than 10 years ago I warned this Senate against these enemies who have appeared here for every New Deal bill, for the repeal of the arms embargo, for the lend-lease bills, for all the draft bills, for all the "loans" to foreign nations, for all the war powers bills, for the Charter of the United Nations, for the Truman doctrine, for the Marshall plan, for all of the treaties, and now they are here for war again with this North Atlantic Pact. I demand their arrest. I have identified over 3,000 of these witnesses and lobbyists and propagandists over the years I have appeared against them in every congressional committee room, as enemies of the United States of America. They are all linked to the . . . spy rings in the State Department of whom Miss Bentley and Whittaker Chambers testified there are 77 "Red" spy rings alone in the State Department. Yet no arrests, not even an investigation, has been made by this administration. . . .

For more than 10 years I have appeared here before this Senate Foreign Relations Committee and every other congressional committee on Capitol Hill to fight every step to war and every New Deal bill and I have pointed out to you these enemies who have appeared here as witnesses and lobbyists and propagandists for every one of these terrible measures. Yet you have given these "Reds" days and hours to testify and for years you have cut me off with 5 minutes or 10 minutes at the most, and then you had police waiting to drag me out, and often I was dragged out of other congressional committees when I tried to point out that these proponents and witnesses are all enemies of this Republic who are overthrowing the United States, by these legislative coup d'etats and by bloody world wars mass-murdering the best of our beloved people. . . .

Under articles 9 and 10 of the Constitution there are certain inalienable rights reserved to the people, and that is the right of self-government that this North Atlantic Pact takes away.

I fought the Charter of the United Nations in the Senate hearings in July 1945, on the same grounds of criminal conspiracy to overthrow the Government of the United States, and I charged collusion on the part of the signers to that pact. At that time Russia was one of the signers. And the accused Red spy, Mr. Alger Hiss, was the Secretary General of the United Nations Conference in San Francisco. Mr. Alger Hiss was also at Yalta when we gave away to Red Russia the victory our American boys had so bravely won. Mr. Alger Hiss was one of the advisers of President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and he was in the State Department with Mr. Acheson, and Mr. Acheson claims him as one of his very dear friends. He is now with the Carnegie Foundation, which is an institution working to overthrow this Government to build a world state. I pointed out every one of the witnesses for the Charter at that time as enemies of this Republic seeking to overthrow it. The father of the Charter was Leo Pasvolksky of Russia, who was our State Department expert on foreign affairs. . . .

I served with the War Department, United States of America, for 15 months, with the commissioned personnel during the First World War: I was also with the Ordnance Division, United States of America, and later with the Judge Advocate General, United States of America, so I know something about military tactics and I want to say that I believe that the North Atlantic Pact if ratified would be the greatest single military stroke for Russia. Gen. George Washington warned: "Why leave our own to stand on foreign ground?" Great distances, oceans, and intensely cold Arctic barriers, and thousands of miles of cold, barren ice and waste land and sea are today between us and Russia, that's a natural defense barrier between us and Russia but with this pact our United States front line of defense is moved right up to the very borders of Russia, and while we are defending that front line on foreign far-away soil, the enemy plans to come in upon us by way of Siberia and Alaska and Canada. This was disclosed recently in the testimony given before the Supreme Court in New York in the trials of those 12 Communists. And all Russia has to do to wipe us out in Norway is to get the place mined before we can get there. Russia won't need any long distance bombers, or any heavy haul for 3,000 miles.

Do not be deceived or confused by the outward display of opposition to this pact from Russia and the Communists. That is the way they get you to support their plots and their plans like this one here. This is a coup.

Why, if this pact is ratified it becomes the greatest military triumph as well as a diplomatic and bureaucratic coup for Russia. It's a Russian victory.

And the treasonous proponents shrewdly admit the pitfalls and dangerous shoals that even an innocent child could fathom in this pact or trap for war and Red revolution here and everywhere on earth.

Readily they admit it could precipitate a war, and maybe that is what it is designed to do. But why do anything to precipitate a war?

I demand a congressional investigation be made of the forces behind this pact, and I want immediate arrests made by the Department of Justice, too.

The same old gang of one worlders and Red and pink revolutionists are here testifying for this pact, or are lobbying for it or are on propaganda committees to put it over as a defense measure on the people. . . .

This pact is a very dangerous matter, and it seems to me that you who are charged with the general welfare and security of the people of the United States have no business taking any such chances on precipitating another bloody war such as you have been to blame for in the past with these terrible bills and plans for the total destruction of the great Christian nations and civilizations of the world. For what? I ask, for what? This is a part of a world revolution. . . .

The very workings of the pact, and the proponents do not deny it, discloses that the obvious thing is to force us into a shooting war at any price without Congress declaring war. In fact it places the American people in the hands of foreigners who have no interest at all in the lives of our people, and who can get us into war without our consent, and the foreigners are to be our new draft board—the idea—also it practically does away with the Congress of the United States, who can have nothing to say if this pact is ratified by the Senate. This is an outrage against the rights of every citizen of the United States, making us cannon fodder for our enemies, and it places the power to declare war in the State Department and in the hands of aliens.

It seems to me that instead of these vicious pacts, and so forth, if the Congress is acting in good faith the right thing to do is to pass a resolution officially ending the war. . . .

The dangerous thing here and now is that our constitutionally provided checks and balances are fast being wiped out by these bills and pacts and treaties and what-not? Introduced by the Truman administration or the so-called fair deal, which was worse than the New Deal as its galloping communism.

And I want to call the attention of the people of the whole country to the fact that if this pact is ratified as a treaty it becomes treaty law and treaty law supercedes all Federal, State, and local laws, and makes the United States citizen subject to this treaty which constitutes a league of nations, and these member nations can make any rules they please to govern Americans. One of the worst features is the fact that these foreigners can get us into war, and our armies and our materials of war will be subject to their orders! Also this pact implements and sets up a world government within the framework of the already established United Nations organization, and other and even worse treaties are awaiting Senate ratification setting up criminal penalties to be administered by international criminal tribunals where any American can be taken, tried, and executed for violations or charges of violations of these terrible treaties and pacts, and any of our enemies can arrest us! . . .

I want to say that the time allotted to me by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is so limited that I will not be able to present to the Senate all of the facts concerning this diabolical plot. But let me say again that what we got to do is clean up our own backyard right here; never mind about rushing into pacts and treaties and wars and world governments guaranteeing the borders of foreign nations. Why, we can't even protect our own borders. I heard the Attorney General, Tom Clark, testify before the Senate Civil Service Committee that 600,000 potential enemies, alien refugees, terrorists from the sewers of Europe's bloody underground, are pouring over both our Mexican and Canadian United States borders per year, and that is 2,000 per day. An army of "Reds" invading us. And I heard him testify that the Department of Justice is powerless to prevent it—and that was 2 years ago, and nothing has been done! How is this? Why don't our State governors call out the National Guard, or has the National Guard gone to take care of Norway, Italy, England, France, Portugal, Iceland, Greenland, and what else? No wonder the administration cannot take care of the United States of America. We can't stop invasions here. . . .

I am the only woman candidate for President of the United States in 1952. I am no pacifist, but a fighter for the United States of America, the land of my birth and that my ancestors helped to found and fought and died for in almost every war. I am the widow of a veteran of the First World War with the AEF, who was among the first to volunteer and the last to leave. He fought in the front-line trenches at the Battles of Luneville Sector, Toul, Montdidier, Noyon, St. Michel, Aisne-Marne, Meuse-Argonne, and was with the army of occupation in Germany. I am the mother of a veteran of the Second World War, who volunteered and served with the United States Army, Eighth Army Command, General Headquarters, for 2½ years. And I am the proud mother-in-law of two fine American boys who are also veterans of the last World War, having served with the United States Army. But I am not anxious to become the grandmother of a veteran of the third world war; and, in this respect, I would like to prevent war if possible. And I am a grandmother. Let me say again that I am no pacifist but a fighter for the United States of America, and I am an anti-Communist with a record here in the Congress of the United States of America for fighting every Red New Deal bill. I am also known as "Pistol-Packin' Mainma," and I believe in defending my right to live. There is no Red on earth going to take this country except over my dead body, and there are millions of women like myself who stand ready to defend their homes and their country, and those of us who do not have guns have ropes in every little backyard. We stand ready to defend our lives, our liberty, our homes, and the great Republic of the United States of America, and I think that, as an unexpected reservoir of power, the American women will be more effective than all the atomic bombs. Few know of this American power.

Few know that Yankee women can handle a gun, but it is a fact that more women have gone in for pistol practice in the United States than have the men, and some of us are crack shots, and can shoot with both hands, and we know who our enemies are. We stand ready for any outbreaks of Communists. . . .

Therefore, we are not so much concerned about any bloody revolutions here, for we can take care of those and really would make it open hunting here, but what we are concerned about are these "steps," as President Truman calls them. But I call them coup d'états, and I charge that they are engineered by our enemies within our gates, and, indeed, in every key position of this Government, and most especially in the State Department, where the records of the House Appropriations Committee prove that there are more than 108 suspected Communists, 64 of them draw more than $5,000 per year salary. These are enemies.

What we are after is these Red traitors within our gates, not those in far-off lands. It seems to me that we ought to clean out the State Department and all other executive departments before we take any steps like this pact that might precipitate us into a war with Russia, and I would not take these steps like this pact under any circumstances, as it is absolutely unconstitutional and a violation of the rights of the people of the United States of America. It is an illegal act, and it sets up a super world government, implementing and supplementing the United Nations Organization, even to equipping the result of this coup d'état or supergovernment with our arms and our armies. This cannot be done. The American people are very suspicious of these moves or steps, and well may they be suspicious, for practically every witness for this pact is an enemy of this Republic and is out to overthrow this Government to build a one-world state, and most of them are known members of the Third Internationale. This pact and the following steps and treaties are the modern diplomatic methods of world revolution as practiced by both Hitler and Stalin.

The North Atlantic Pact places the decision of war or peace into the hands of our enemies and gives to them the military advantage of time, distance, climate and place. It removes distances that are now in our favor, and brings our front lines right up to Russia. Think of this mischief, this outrage against the lives and liberties of the American people. Our ancestors had sense enough to put distance between us and the hellholes of Europe, Asia, and Africa; yet these traitors destroy all that we have won in peace and happiness in 150 years of American progress. This pact sets the world back a thousand years—aye, to the Dark Ages. . . .

You don't need to go to Russia to clean up these Reds. They are all right here. Then we ought to turn our attention to taking care of America. Our cities are in a pitiful condition of decay, from total neglect. Yet, you are running to Europe with billions of dollars to rebuild what it took 500,000 good American lives and 1,000,000 good American lives and 1,000,000 good Americans wounded; years of blood, sweat, and tears to rip down. . . .

What the world needs is a safe haven of refuge in America, not an America torn by wars in defending the Old World.

What we should do with this great country of ours is to build a richer, greater United States of America, and make it a heaven on earth for our own people, not a hell like this pact is building. Why do you monkey with things that are no concern of ours, and build nightmares of horror for our people, all because some crazy crackpots in the State Department have bad dreams? They ought to be put in St. Elizabeths Insane Asylum, if not arrested, tried, and hanged for their crimes. . . .

In the name of our merciful Lord Jesus Christ, I ask the Congress not to pass this terrible pact for war and world government.

In the name of the Prince of Peace I ask that instead of this vicious pact, that you pass a resolution declaring the war ended; and let this beautiful world and her wonderful people have peace once more on earth.

Yours for America only.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. We will excuse you, Mrs. Waters.

Mr. H. Scherbak, do you have a written statement?

Mr. SCHERBAK. No. I have just a few remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. We will give you 5 minutes.

STATEMENT OF H. SCHERBAK, NEW YORK CITY

Mr. SCHERBAK. I am all out for the pact and I am sure that the fears of the people who have appeared are unjustified.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you for it or against it?

Mr. SCHERBAK. Absolutely for.

None of the witnesses so far has mentioned what is necessary to make it really effective, and I want to say that I know what must be done.

The CHAIRMAN. Give your name and your business and so on to the reporter.

Mr. SCHERBAK. Mr. Scherbak, 25 Broad Street, New York. Industrial consultant and writer on foreign politics.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an American citizen?

Mr. SCHERBAK. I am an American citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. SCHERBAK. In all of the countries in the world it seems to me to make the pact effective it must be made extremely popular with their common people, and that would be done if for every district so-called Atlantic Pact or AP trustees were elected simultaneously who have the duty to propagate the pact and to win support in every direction.

Secondly, in addition to this trustee organization, they have to see to it that the nations understand each other better, and that the English language shall be taught as the second language in the schools of all the cooperating nations who are not British.

The trade associations should be given an AP classification in which all of them agree so that the professionals can meet each other for protocol and so on, and there are dozens of other provisions which have to be made, but which I can put down in the record.

Another thing is that it must be possible to bring all of these nations under America by broadcasts of 15 or 30 minutes, and that cannot be done today because the military maps and the navy maps of these nations are not adequate for broadcasting. Many cities have double names or the same name, and if one is not a well-known city it is practically impossible to develop the source of trouble, so I propose to modify the maps, as I have already discussed with the Arms Committee of the Senate, and they like it. Would your chairman like to see one of those maps?

The CHAIRMAN. All right; you can file it if you wish.

Mr. SCHERBAK. Every part of the world has a certain number.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

HOW TO STRENGTHEN THE ATLANTIC PACT

(Submitted by H. Scherbak, New York, N. Y.)

To win widest support of the Allied Nations, it will be necessary to show what the machinery of the pact will look like once it is set up; how it will operate and how it will be defended against internal and external emergencies.

It is evident that the AP must make itself indispensable not only as a deterrent to war, but through far-reaching continuous business and cultural advantages to all nations concerned. The following measures should bring intense mutual economic interests about.

All AP nations to use English for official communication. It should be a second language taught in France and other non-English-speaking countries. Exchange of professors and students. The English-speaking countries shall teach French as second language.

An AP daily newspaper containing translation of news in the languages of all Allied Nations. AP trade magazines bringing the Allied Nations the progress made in United States, England, and others. A standard classification of trade associations accepted by all AP nations. An AP classification of all professions for easier collaboration of specialists.

An AP central register of the outstanding experts of all AP nations under the numbers of the profession.

A standard classification of government agencies. A central registration of the leading officials. A standard specification of the national interests whether food or shelter, education, health, justice, labor, and more.

An AP organization center which forms AP committees for every outstanding common interest. One such committee will handle AP patent trade-mark interest. Another committee will look into the school books of the AP nations. Another committee will arrange pools of arbitrators.

Arrangement of an AP headquarter and an AP signal system where it will be known for every essential part of the allied nations main characteristics as to economic conditions, factors which cause the disturbance, military conditions, civil defense conditions. For this purpose the Allied Nations and the main parts of their countries will be numbered and subnumbered for easy identification in case action should be necessary against trouble sources or for assistance in case of foreign attack.

Simultaneous election of AP trustees in every important locality whose duty is to win friends for the AP and to win voluntary spade workers for AP projects. There may be in large cities trustees for civil defense, trustees for medical services, and others.

A committee to assist in the drafting of AP master plans for individual war industries; that is, a combination of national master plans.

A committee to facilitate business between the AP nations with a number of subcommittees for currency and barter problems.

A center to register all of those who volunteer work for the AP and receive AP membership cards.

An AP statistical center which will show how satisfactory conditions are in every main district and how these conditions change to be able to tabulate where need and surplus exist.

For mutual defense against internal unrest and foreign attacks or aggression the following matters may be needed:

A signal system using geographical maps with every important locality numbered, to be able to identify it in broadcasts for help.

Registration and control of all laboratories, with fingerprinting of all chemists, to prevent clandestine production of explosives and poison germs.

Coordination of all secret services against communism, neo-Nazis, warmongers, special signal maps showing conditions and danger signs for every important district.

Standard numbering of military units, weapons, and operations for easier collaboration.

Every Allied soldier to know some English. All AP nations to form standby committees of their legislation for immediate action, if necessary.

Laying out of master plans to release vehement economic and moralic pressure against war makers. Coordination of press and radio, churches, business interests for mutual defense.

Prearrangement of arbitration between the AP nations.

POSSIBLE EMERGENCIES FOR THE ATLANTIC PACT

The AP extends the frontiers to be defended by United States to parts of the world which are many thousand miles distant and vulnerable to attack. The United States also through the AP becomes a kind of a trustee for the safety of a number of nations which are very weak in a military sense. Differences among them or great political errors by some of them may involve United States in a world war.

From this point of view it is preferable to realize the following dangers for the security of the United States and that way for the security of the AP nations. Those cited below seem evident.

United States cities could be attacked at any hour by Russian bombers working direct or through Chinese Communists.

One-man submarines, bomb-loaded, can sneak any hour into United States harbors, blow up liners, and disappear.

Explosives can be smuggled into United States harbors on barges any time.

It is doubtful that the United States can fight successfully attack by foreign submarines equipped with schnorkel breathing.

Saboteurs or fanatics can rain fire bombs or poison germs on United States cities at any hour of the day. How many War Asset-sold planes are in the hands or under the influence of criminals, spies, and smugglers is not known.

Clandestine production of poison gas and germs in United States laboratories, of which there are thousands, is out of control.

No preparation has been made yet to make United States population alert and to arrive at concerted operation of the armed services and civil defense, although decisions may have to be taken eventually within 15 minutes.

The above shows that next to the military aid to the western nations, immense efforts are to be made to streamline the United States defensive machinery. However, the Atlantic Pact, combining 270,000,000 people in their will for security and to bring humanity out of the valley of fear, is worth the greatest sacrifice.

Alternatively, it is obediently suggested that the United States accepts the pact excluding the clause that any aggression on any pact nation to be considered as an aggression on the United States. Recommended is a waiting time of 1 year during which the United States shall have the option to agree on this clause.

During this year, the United States to provide the AP nations with armament and any possible assistance for economic recovery and coordination.

The United States doesn't seem to be in a position to bind itself to warfare at present.

As to Germany, it may be submitted that the Germans need strong military command and that they may accept military leadership by United States generals who are of German ancestry. If such strong command is not provided, the most ruthless faction of the Germans, the new Nazis, will come to the lead again and plunge the world into another war.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all very interesting.

Mr. SCHERBAK. In that way it is possible to identify by broadcast.

Now, I make up a statement on the enormous efforts necessary to make the pact work and to give it daily very great economic and cultural advantages to all of the nations of the world. It must become indispensable to all of these men for business reasons.

Now, having made that survey, it looks to me—and Mr. Chairman, I beg to apologize for this suggestion—that before the United States should enter war, if any of these nations should be attacked, or there are troubles between them, that there should be 1 year of trying in which a master plan would be laid out, but during the year any one of the nations could retire from the pact or could be asked to resign, as, when a couple marries, they have a little engagement to get to know each other better.

The pact is one of the greatest things in history, and it would be very terrible if by some neglect of any matter it would fail.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, sir. We appreciate your coming here.

Miss Grace L. Oswalt.

STATEMENT OF MISS GRACE OSWALT, MOROCCO, IND.

Miss OSWALT. Ratification of the North Atlantic Pact, accepting as fact that it is within the framework of the United Nations, and that it does not abrogate the right of Congress to declare war, would be a demoralizing affront to the courage, the integrity and the common sense of the average citizen, who should repudiate all its present implications but could subscribe to the basic ground work if integrated properly and honestly into democratic principles and the purposes of the United Nations. The Senate realizes the importance of this decision to itself and to this Nation.

It is a thin subterfuge to claim that military preparedness would be used only against an aggressor. The United Nations has been unable to write the label of an aggressor. It has also been unable to formulate a method for establishing a world police force, and, although in principle, it takes a stand against the use of armed force, like its predecessor, the League of Nations, the UN has no substitute means of authority. Ratification under proposed conditions, would not only be the end of the Monroe Doctrine, but if entered into for a period of 20 years, the death knell of the United Nations and of all pretense of democratic principles and human rights.

Time was when immigrants came to the United States to avoid compulsory military service. Now, boys too young to take care of legal matters and too young to be represented by vote, can be conscripted. Whatever the origin of these unsatisfactory conditions, the Atlantic Pact, as it stands, is no panacea. However, if United States, as elder brother of the family of nations, were to enunciate a definition as to what constitutes international justice, and the nations signatory to the Atlantic Pact should accept that definition, together with a mutual-aid plan to put it into practice, these nations could form the nucleus for a stable world unity and the pact could be ratified, maintaining military power until such time as voluntary participation could become world-wide, looking toward a day when military force could be dispensed with in favor of a world guard—an authentic police force.

Pressure for ratification, on the theory that these nations have signed in good faith and that it would not be gracious for the Senate to refuse, is not the fault of the Senate nor of the people whom the Senate represents. It is a vital necessity to the whole bankrupt world, that this United States reservoir of plenty remain solvent and proceed to put into effect a method to rid humanity of the vast overhead of military force now maintaining national advantage, wherever possible, in the world under the cloak of justice, rather than by endorsing this 20-year stricture ourselves abdicate to the world-order concept of the Kaiser, who envisioned a world without war, but without true peace and freedom, constantly under military control.

What, then, is international justice? It is equal economic opportunity for nations, as for individuals within a free nation, undue advantage for none. If the signatories to the Atlantic Pact declare themselves dedicated to back this concept, then they, with the United States, could form a justifiable military alliance with that principle their declared objective and duration of this alliance subject to satisfactory accomplishment of this specific aim. While maintaining this temporary military strength, democratic and nonmilitary implementation of this principle could be established with the intention of ultimately turning over to an authentic international guard or police force, responsibility for preventing violation of this world principle so essential to world peace and order.

The basic physical needs of humanity provide the foundation for world unity, peace, and freedom. Desire for mundane security is the motivation back of each and every ideology, and is the root of nationalism and the condoned justification for war. Economic stress is the acknowledged cause of conflict. Man cannot enjoy the privileges set forth as desirable in the United Nations Charter nor hope to become invested with the human rights set forth in the recent declaration, unless and until he becomes the master, and is no longer the slave of his physical necessities.

Implementation of the foregoing concept of world justice would perpetuate democratic principle and draw the teeth of war. It would invest the United Nations with the authority it lacks and permit it to act freely within its scope, with the consent of the members. With a positive international principle agreed upon and unequivocally endorsed and backed by sponsors of world order and not dependent on military power, the question of veto by any nation would not arise. Subscription to this definite concept of international justice would be prerequisite to membership in United Nations and any nation not subscribing, would be outside the pale, unless and until such nation becomes eligible for membership by giving evidence of renouncing military force as a method of maintaining economic security. Disarmament for any and all (except for the proposed international guard) could then safely and logically be systematically accomplished by all voluntary members and if necessary forcibly done and government deposed of any nation dissenting after a reasonable period of grace.

Disarmament, however, being the natural result of true peace, cannot be the basis for it, but the sooner the world frees itself of this vast overhead the sooner world economic recovery will ensue. Excessive practice of, or necessity for, philanthropy on a world-wide scale, is undisputable evidence of critical lack of economic balance, and a state of affairs calling for drastic, forceful, and positive readjustment measures. This Nation has international relations, but no definite international policy. The present state of relations is not fair to any people, least of all, to the citizens of the United States, who have done and are (under protest) doing what is required of them, hoping desperately that leadership is capable of realizing on the tremendous opportunity the people have twice won and now sustain at great cost. If statesmanship is ineffectual and reactionary, in establishing rational world order, especially the statesmanship of a democracy, the only hope for the world's people lies in revolution.

A statement as to what constitutes international justice is the missing link in the chain of peace necessary to bind together both big and little nations trying to arrive at a universal goal. Surely powerful nations may safely bear up economically under equal opportunity, if any semblance of justice now exists for small nations or those under jurisdiction of larger nations ostensibly for protection. Unless international justice is first enunciated, international law, by democratic standards, classifies as tyranny. In such case enforcement, however mild, is oppression and is a denial of human rights. All that is talked of in international relations is enforcement. This is because, law being stressed and justice not defined, the fact that justice must be administered and its positive phase recognized, has been overlooked. Once the formula for world justice has been established law to protect it and opportunity to enjoy the security that it guarantees may be enjoyed. Then an authentic world police force could maintain world organization and through this assure human rights to all peoples.

Peace is a business proposition and requires a practical foundation. The world is said to be building for peace but, so far, the structure has not been anchored to realities, of which there are good as well as bad. The situation with regard to the weakening status of United Nations is now quite similar to that of the League of Nations (and World Court), membership in which was repudiated as being undemocratic, and activity to correct this objection being blocked, at least in part by national politics. Today the bipartisan approach offers better opportunity to make United Nations, not only an exponent of objectives, but an actual and forceful practical organization. This Atlantic Pact, in reference to its abandonment of the Monroe Doctrine, in itself does not impose any particular loss to the cause of peace. However, this serves to bring to mind the walk-out of Japan from the League because of denial of the proposition to form a Monroe doctrine of the east for supervision of China. Ratification of the Atlantic Pact, as presented, would be not only untrue to democratic standards but also entirely lacking in business foresight.

An international board of production and distribution would be necessary to help to administer peace. "Divide and conquer" could mean division of the world's resources to conquer war. In fact, many existing international organizations could be "converted" overnight to the purposes of peace, such as the world bank, through which a common money standard could be established and where forfeit, or bond, could be deposited from resources now being used for armament. In this way an adjustment and catastrophe fund would be available, providing nonpolitical financing for maintaining justice. In the past, some have been "our brother's keeper" in the sense that the freedom of some has been possible because others have been the "bound-men." Instead of the "blood and sweat and tears" of war, it is possible to provide bread, oil and milk, and through this establishing of lasting security for physical needs, liberate the spirit of mankind to enjoy his constructive accomplishments, at this critical time when destructive accomplishments threaten to rule the destiny of humanity.

The world is top-heavy now with overorganization and needs mergers and simplification instead of more burdens for the people to shoulder, such as proposed implementation of the Atlantic Pact. The methods for this simplification must not be beyond the comprehension of the human common denominator, nor so costly as to enslave him. In this simplification process it can become possible to stabilize the symbols of exchange if their antecedent, world economy, is stabilized first. Hindrance to world recovery and prosperity lies almost entirely in international relations, and it is governments, not peoples, that obstruct. On the other hand, an honest and practical organization need not disturb the status quo. Free enterprise could exist in every nation and philanthropy would go begging.

It is not a matter for pride that this Nation fails to realize that not all nations, in fact, few, if any, have had commensurate opportunity with the United States. This does not mean that this Nation should coddle others nor that they would like it. However, with international relations on a firm and simple foundation, national development will take care of itself.

Centuries of living have taught the value of separation of church and state and that a person's religion is his private affair. International business can be conducted without mind control or interference in religion, business integrity is employed and respected for what it is worth, in contrast to the wiles of diplomacy. A lot of overhead in that line can be cut down, too.

Senators, do not sell down the "river," for 20 years, all latitude for world economic readjustment by ratification of this backward-looking pact!

The CHAIRMAN. All right; thank you very much.

Mr. Carl D'Aquino, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

This matter is on the treaty and it is not on any general questions. I understand you have a long statement here about general foreign policy and so on. You will have to get down to earth and talk about the treaty. Have you a prepared statement?

Mr. D'AQUINO. Yes, sir. It will take 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Not over that. That is our limit this morning.

What business are you in and where do you live? What is your name?

STATEMENT OF CARL D'AQUINO, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Mr. D'AQUINO. My name is Carl D'Aquino. My address is 1867 West 12th Street, Brooklyn 23, N. Y.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. D'AQUINO. I am a salesman for the Elno Corp., which manufactures portable electric-sewing machines.

The CHAIRMAN. You are an American citizen, I suppose?

Mr. D'AQUINO. Yes, sir; and a veteran.

May I state: before lending my testimony for or against the North Atlantic Pact, a few facts about my past influence in creating a foreign policy through the late President, Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you claim that you formulated the foreign policies of Mr. Roosevelt?

Mr. D'AQUINO. I claim I inspired the creation of the United Nations back on August 26, 1936.

The CHAIRMAN. You say:

a few facts about my past influence in creating a foreign policy through the late President, Mr. Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Did you influence the President to adopt his course of foreign policy?

Mr. D'AQUINO. I believe I have. I most honestly believe that.

The CHAIRMAN. We are glad to hear from the real source of our foreign policy.

Mr. D'AQUINO. The proof of the matter can be found in a front page article in the New York Times of August 26, 1936. My letter was dated August 20, 1936. It provided an inspiring suggestion encouraging the creation of the United Nations. As proof of that I have a State Department letter dated September 11, 1936.

I would like to see the United States strong always, even if pacts are required to accomplish it. Just what is it that this pact lends to the conduct of a saner life for all concerned? There seems to be some military assistance permitted to the North Atlantic countries and to that I shall address some further remarks.

I was with the Chemical Warfare Branch of the United States Army and the feelings I held on their contemplated activities, should gas be used by Japanese, were not envious. I have kept abreast of national affairs for 16 years and feel any remarks I make should be of some beneficial nature to you gentlemen. I observed the results of activities of chemical officials, who make claims about their products of research. Have these men provided a haven for themselves if they should loose their vermin on the populace and see their servants destroyed, their food, drink and dwellings? The only refuge then would be another planet.

I spent 3 years on active duty with the Army,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  of it overseas. I've witnessed certain reactions of dissatisfaction among the people who were rescued after 1 year of occupation. A Philippine Island provincial governor who was paid by the United States Navy for occupying his lands, also on which a fine airfield was created, was still dissatisfied because of the barrenness of the land. The land was practically saved for him by the bloodshed of many Americans, both male and female. In regard to foreign policy, I would suggest we take a permanent lease on that well-placed airfield for future use in the peaceful conduct of international relationships. One of their delegates has already asked for a pact in the Pacific theater, similar to that of the Atlantic Pact.

And yet I say, let's not have the policy of our Foreign Affairs Committee constantly influenced by other neighboring officials who look forward to such hand-outs of our Government to their own aggrandizement. We've neglected the internal affairs of our Nation too long. Greater concentration of thought should be given our native people, our veterans, our civilians, our women, and children, who inspire us to greater humane affairs. Let's be a little more selfish to Uncle Sam's children, where the appreciation is evidently sincerely strongest.

If we are to continue world leadership in foreign activities, all nations must be heard and recognized in voice. Yet in encouraging the voice of smaller nations, let's look forward to consolidating the many smaller nations bordering each other, to improving relationships amongst themselves, excluding, of course, the weapons of defense, offense, or any other name you may call it. By encouraging the introduction of communication systems, as well as transportation vehicles, on the ground, sea, air, or underground, and developing a fellowship of good neighborliness, and then permitting those nations to self-adjustment toward a more fruitful period of life, then progress of the right sort can be made. Even the encouragement of world government should be made, but without relinquishing the democratic ideals of the United States Government that are ideally accepted by other nations. My remarks as made regarding weapons are based on a study of a report made by the Senate committee investigations of munitions, headed by Senator Nye, a very able Senator.

Whenever investigations are made too little thought is given to the revelations that are made. One of their justifiable concluding remarks was that the trend is there are many bribes made in the executive branches of all governments for unearthly enterprises, such as the conduct of war, conflict, genocide, and yet even another name is appropriate, premeditated murder by other participants, and not of the planners.

I've had the opportunity of observing constantly for the past 16 years the truthfulness of the conduct of the results of Senator Nye's committee. Their conclusions are pretty exact in many ways.

The North Atlantic Pact permits the donating of armaments to foreign nations of Europe. I say it is wrong. It is wrong because the same people gain by wars or even the donation of these instruments that eventually lead to conflicts. While on this subject I would like to ask two questions of you gentlemen.

Has Senator Burton K. Wheeler collected any moneys for his client under the Lend-Lease Act? His client, I'd say, was the man who helped the painter from Germany become a genocidist. Also, to whom were those payments made that President Truman declared in his last lend-lease report so vaguely and so much.

As far as I am concerned, I haven't as yet seen the profits of war removed from war materials.

Let's get and give further encouragement to ideals, those that tend to lend a greater outlook on life, that enrich rather than destroy. More apprenticeships in good trades should be encouraged, just as those spoken about in the United Nations chambers and by UNESCO. It seems we have given greater consideration to our enemy nations than to our own people here in America and our allies in China and the Philippines. I don't mean money when I refer to consideration.

The UN needs a definite injection of new blood to encourage the finer activities recommended by UNESCO. A better enforcement agency should be encouraged in the UN to prevent other conflicts, and patrol the seas, airplanes and grounds of destructive devices intended for genocide. If only a major concentration of effort were made toward developing nondestructive articles, I am sure a greater life could be enjoyed by all peoples everywhere. Rather than supporting a program of artificially created atmosphere, we would be concentrating on realism. That is the only ism I stand for now. The advice of men who seek the preservation of civilization must be heeded, not that of those who seek its destruction.

How can the honorable board—I mean the Foreign Policy Board—legislate properly when the reports of the Russian nation are really and truly not permitted a better analysis by the reporters of our newspapers? How much is really known of Russian activity to permit this Atlantic treaty to go through to its full intent to arm to the teeth the most meddlesome governments civilization has known to exist? If we again sectionalize areas and designate them as an armed force, those nations will again fail to recover economically and properly for humanity's sake.

To accomplish a peaceful world does not require the supply of a section of people with destructive instruments which bring good to no one.

If the same cooperative security were used as used by these nations participating in the North Atlantic Pact, to provide its people and the people of other bordering nations with the finer necessities of life and the peaceful products that are manufactured in peacetime, then a Utopian civilization would not be impossible, rather than have those conniving delegations who get out of hand by accepting bribes to permit the contemplation and introduction of warlike and unneeded articles, to maintain a false and insecure governmental program that eventually leads to the destruction of fertile lands that sustain human life.

Only then can the North Atlantic Pact be an asset to the legislative geniuses that are assembled before me.

Do not misinterpret my remarks. I do not claim that those necessities should be given without any strings attached. There must be some form of remuneration.

The economics of the other nations should not be figured accountable with the economics of a going concern such as the United States Government. A separate set of books should be devised so that the burden of accountability does not fall entirely on the shoulders of the United States and its people.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you for the pact or against it?

Mr. D'AQUINO. I have stated that I am for certain views that do not permit the adding of additional armaments to these nations.

The CHAIRMAN. Then you are against the pact.

Mr. D'AQUINO. Does the pact actually permit the donating of arms to these countries? It doesn't say it in the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. That is up to the Congress. That is for future action if we do it. It is not in the pact. We are just on the pact now. I would like to know if you are for the pact or against it.

Mr. D'AQUINO. I am only for the peaceful—

The CHAIRMAN. That is all. You are not going to answer my question, I see that.

Mr. D'AQUINO. The pact states that there is no donating of any arms at all, yet the papers give another view.

The CHAIRMAN. That will have to come up in the implementation, which is not before us but which will come later.

Mr. D'AQUINO. I will say I am for the pact but not for the implementation.

The CHAIRMAN. You are for the pact but you do not want to give them any arms?

Mr. D'AQUINO. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you for your statement.

Mr. Alcott L. Tyler, business manager, local No. 121, Chemical Workers of America, CIO. They are meeting somewhere now, the CIO. We have had several witnesses along the lines of the CIO, Mr. Tyler, and you will have to be very brief.

STATEMENT OF ALCOTT L. TYLER, LOCAL NO. 121, CHEMICAL WORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO

Mr. TYLER. My opposition to the Atlantic Pact flows from the following:

1. It will tend to divide the world into two antagonistic and irreconcilable blocks;
2. This will intensify an uneconomical, wasteful, armaments race.
3. Internal economic conditions of all countries will worsen because of this armaments program which is a virtual indispensable part of the pact.

4. The fight by workers against unemployment, speed-up, and other economic consequences that will flow from the Atlantic Pact will hardly make for the stability necessary for peaceful relations within and among countries.

5. Big business that profits from armaments will, as they always have, fight against any attempt by workers to stave off speed-up, unemployment, and will even shut off commitments made under the Atlantic Pact, if such commitments interfere with their profits. This will mean that our country will be forced into the position of reneging on the commitments that the Atlantic Pact would mean.

I shall attempt to document my first four points. However, I should like to state now that the false hopes that the pact will generate in Europe and that we will later be forced to repudiate, will be the basis for a world-wide economic slump similar to or worse than that of 1929 which followed the failures of the Dawes and Young plans.

SUPPORTING DATA

1. Nearly all witnesses before your committee—either those for or against the pact—attempt to document my No. 1 point that the pact will force each country to join up in one or another block.

2. Secretary Acheson and others have indicated that an armaments program is an indispensable part of the pact. Over a billion dollars now, and several billions later if we are to keep our word should the pact be ratified. Already the so-called economy advocates in Congress are demanding the reduced appropriation of funds for social security, health, education, etc., in order to be able to support armaments for the pact and for the armed forces of other signatories, without materially increasing our already $40,000,000,000 budget. In addition to being a drain on our economy as a whole, as well as depriving us of necessary social services, an armaments program tends to create unemployment—as witness the technical improvements reported last month by the Standard and Poor's Corp.

This report high lighted the dropping of scrapping of alloy casting production; a substantial increase of worker output of electronic equipment; an increased productivity in the steel industry where units of production per man-hour, using 1939 as 100 reached a peak of 124 in 1948 against 123 in 1947 and 113 in 1946. The coal industry is another in which output per worker has made substantial gains. The conclusion of Bernard T. Frevert, who is writing for this corporation was that—

Layoffs of least efficient workers in recent months have had a sobering effect on those still employed, spurring them to greater effort. Many corporation executives have noted this change in attitude. A west coast manufacturer sums up the situation by saying: "There is virtually no turn-over now, and there is more regular attendance. Everybody is hanging on and putting more elbow grease into his work. If this trend continues, we should be in a good position to meet the keener price competition that lies ahead."

These industrial experts were only voicing the general attitude of big business that under the guise of patriotism spurred workers to tremendous speed-up while they raised prices with a net result of 20 billion in profit, the highest in our history, more than twice the net wartime profit high of 1945. Workers will not long take this growing unemployment coupled with speed-up, as evidenced by the 62,000 Ford production workers strike.

The result of all of this will be that big business drive for greater profits under the slogan of rearmament to save our country from some cooked-up aggressor, will be checked, and I predict that any checking of the grabbing of profits by big business will result in a cooling of their ardor for aid to Atlantic Pact countries. Should our country accept the Atlantic Pact obligations, our ability to fulfill them will be at the mercy of big business' profit take. Such a situation is not one conducive to stability on which peaceful relationships within and outside a country depend. It is the wrong way to plan for international stability.

I urge, therefore, the rejection of the Atlantic Pact and an attempt by our Government to seek security and peace through genuine co-operations of all countries within the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. What business are you in?

Mr. TYLER. I am the business manager of Local 121, United Chemical Workers Union.

The CHAIRMAN. You were in some sort of business before you got this job, were you not?

Mr. TYLER. No. I worked in a plant.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. TYLER. I worked in a plant, that's right.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of a plant?

Mr. TYLER. A chemical plant.

The CHAIRMAN. What are the duties of a business agent? You have the president of your local and the secretary. Where does the business agent fit in?

Mr. TYLER. He negotiates contracts, and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. Contracts for employment?

Mr. TYLER. Contracts for employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Or contracts for other things?

Mr. TYLER. Contracts for employment.

The CHAIRMAN. You are against the pact?

Mr. TYLER. That's right.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. McDaniel, I notice you represent the People's Progressive Party.

Mr. McDANIEL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We have had four or five different witnesses from the Progressive Party.

Mr. McDANIEL. I am representing the student division at the University of Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. I know, but you belong to the Progressive Party. How long will it take you to get through?

Mr. McDANIEL. I have just one page. I will be very brief.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

STATEMENT OF WINSTON McDANIEL, DANE COUNTY CHAPTER, PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF WISCONSIN

Mr. McDANIEL. I am here representing the Dane County Chapter of the Progressive Party of Wisconsin. I am a student at the University of Wisconsin. I am a resident of Jefferson, Wis.

I also think that I can unofficially represent the views of 11 Madison clergymen who issued a joint attack against the Atlantic Pact a short time ago. The basis of their attack was that they said the agreement will not insure peace, and they also attacked the influence of the military upon our civilian establishment.

POSTWAR AID

I would like to very briefly review our postwar foreign policy with respect to aiding other nations. First of all was the killing of UNRRA. The American people were told that the United States had sent enough aid to Europe. The real reason was the fact that 80 percent of the aid was going to eastern Europe, but this fact was not widely circulated. There is no official indication that any unilateral program of aid for Europe was being considered. The first development of the unilateral aid program was enunciated as the Truman doctrine, but this was not a means of feeding starving people but rather of fighting communism, and communism at the most critical points on the globe—Greece, China, and Turkey—found their military establishments benefited.

However, the American people were not happy with this type of aid and its purpose, so our leaders were pressured to devise a new covering or veil for this anti-Communist program. The new concept put forth by Secretary Marshall at Harvard was that, on the surface, the Marshall plan was not directed at any nation or against any ideology. This plan was so subtly presented that the American people concluded that the Russians were actually welcome, despite the sentiments expressed to the contrary in the Congressional Record. The plan resulted in a grouping of the western European countries which we really wanted to build up as bulwarks against communism. So, under the banner of good will, charity, and brotherhood, this anti-Communist project was carried further.

WORLD DIVISION

This splitting of the nations into two worlds or spheres was so successful that the Western Powers became so united that our leaders decided to take another step forward. Thus, today we have the proposed Atlantic Pact. Again we claim that this is not directed against any specific power, but this argument has become a farce by now. It has become quite clear that our entire foreign policy has been geared to anticommunism, not aid to democracy or for the needy peoples of the world. These are merely selling points for the poisonous products, the bargain package of three values for one.

STEPS AFTER THE TREATY

Since each declaration of policy has been a veil for new pills to follow, one must ask what will follow the Atlantic Pact, if approved. We must grab hold of all the trains in order to understand the motives and the direction in which we are moving. I think that one may justifiably predict the following additions to the program:

1. Seven or eight billion-dollar program to arm western Europe. This would be a conservative estimate, and probably include only the first year of such a program.

2. Full cooperation of the economies of these Atlantic Pact members, and complete subordination of civilian authority to the military program and production, and training of large armies.

3. The climax of this plan, short only of the war which it might incite, will be a proposal for a Western Federation of anti-Communist countries completely aside from the United Nations. This would bring to a final death and complete burial any hopes for a strong world government. The Atlantic Pact virtually prepares this grave, and this is the burial ceremony to follow. Thus I claim that essentially that we have done is to walk out on the United Nations. We have claimed that the Russians have done this on occasion, and I think they have been very tactless in doing that. However, I think we are being much more subtle. We are paying lip service to the cause after we have in essence walked out.

QUESTIONS ON THE TREATY

In conclusion I would like to raise the following three questions:

What will we get for our seven or eight billion dollar annual investment? If there is to be an act of aggression upon the European Continent we have three possible bulwarks against this communism: Western Germany, Italy, and France. Are you going to put faith in the Nazis, the Germans, or are you going to rely upon a Nazi Army to stop so-called Communist aggression? Can we expect any support from France and Italy when one-third are Communists? Do we propose to erect a Maginot line along the Ruhr?

The second question: Where is the seven or eight billion dollars going to come from? Dr. Edwin Nourse, economic adviser to the President, has said that it must come out of the present military expenditures, the proposed $42,000,000,000 budget. If our economic condition is so serious, then it must be a question as to whether we arm ourselves completely or drop most of this program to arm the Socialists and Communists and pro-Nazis of western Europe, supposedly to fight the Communists of Russia.

How strong could this ungodly coalition become and how long could it last?

Finally, if it is not our intention either to provoke an attack by Russia or to wage an aggressive war ourselves, how can we possibly accept article 5, which obligates all signatory powers to assist any party or parties which have been the object of an armed attack; regardless of congressional power to declare war, there is nothing which would prevent the President of the United States from fulfilling our obligation by dispatching troops upon the slightest provocation. This would, in effect, nullify the power of Congress to declare war.

In conclusion, I would like to ask and request that further consideration of this be postponed, because I feel that the American people, upon the first news of the Atlantic Pact, concluded that the pact was signed and there was nothing they could do about it. However, recently, as the testimony has been introduced in the newspapers, after a lot of secrecy of about a month, the American people realize it is not completed, and I think the American people would like for time to consider it, so I ask your consideration of the postponement or the delay of recommendation to the full Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. You claim that the President could make war without the action of the Senate?

Mr. McDANIEL. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever studied the Constitution any?

Mr. McDANIEL. If the President dispatches troops to a certain area, and actually fulfills the obligation of this charter, the Congress could do nothing but declare war.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, it could do whatever it pleased, because it reserved specifically "as it may deem necessary" as the Congress may deem necessary. I will not argue with you, however. What are you studying in the University of Wisconsin?

Mr. McDANIEL. Political science.

The CHAIRMAN. How far advanced are you? What year are you in?

Mr. McDANIEL. Third year. I am serving on the student board at the University of Wisconsin as vice president this year.

The CHAIRMAN. Vice president of the student board?

Mr. McDANIEL. But I am not representing them here.

The CHAIRMAN. You are representing nobody but yourself?

Mr. McDANIEL. The Dane County Chapter of the Young Progressives.

The CHAIRMAN. You are here representing a political party then?

Mr. McDANIEL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You took active part in the last campaign?

Mr. McDANIEL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. You subscribe unqualifiedly to the policies of Mr. Henry A. Wallace?

Mr. McDANIEL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Stand aside.

Mr. McDANIEL. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We have had Mr. Wallace already, so your views reaffirm what he said, as I understand you.

Mr. Nicholas Topping? Mr. Topping, whom do you represent?

STATEMENT OF NICHOLAS TOPPING

Mr. TOPPING. I represent quite a wide number of citizens of the State of Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. No organization?

Mr. TOPPING. No organization.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your business?

Mr. TOPPING. I am a businessman in Milwaukee, Wis., and I have been very active in community and veterans' affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. What kind of business are you in?

Mr. TOPPING. I am in the retail business. I sell imported foods, foreign music records, and other specialties.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Can you get through in 5 minutes?

Mr. TOPPING. I think I can.

The CHAIRMAN. We will give you 5 minutes.

Mr. TOPPING. All right, sir.

OPPOSITION TO TREATY

I am opposed to the ratification of the North Atlantic Pact because it is not a step toward peace, but can be a step toward war. I am opposed to the ratification of the pact because it is not a definitive pact, as so many of its supporters loudly claim. I believe that it is an aggressive move which will bypass the United Nations, and divide the world into two irreconcilable and hostile blocs.

It will inevitably lead to a series of measures and countermeasures on the part of both sides, particularly in the form of an armaments race which can only result in a war of complete devastation.

I am appearing before you today upon the request of many sincere and profoundly disturbed citizens of Wisconsin, as the result of a radio address I made, of speeches against the pact, and an advertisement placed in the Milwaukee paper. I have found widespread opposition to the pact, which is masqueraded as a pact for peace.

Those are copies of the advertisement that appeared in the Milwaukee Journal.

The CHAIRMAN. Who paid for them?

Mr. TOPPING. Quite a number of citizens in Milwaukee.

The CHAIRMAN. You collected the money?

Mr. TOPPING. I collected $252.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did you pay in?

Mr. TOPPING. $252.

The CHAIRMAN. We cannot put your ads in the record, because we are not running an advertising agency. Go ahead.

Mr. TOPPING. Working on this advertisement, I soon noted that many who opposed the pact were fearful of expressing their opposition. This is due, as you know, to the atmosphere of hysteria and intimidation prevalent in our country today. I personally experienced this.

For example, this paid advertisement I was instrumental in placing in a local paper was edited by the newspaper with the ultimatum that it could not appear unless certain key words were deleted.

Before the ad made its appearance, another ad tried to intimidate and harass local leaders by distorting and misrepresenting the purpose of the act, and even the individual signers were harassed. In spite of this, many people contributed financially to the expense of the ad, even though they were fearful of expressing themselves as endorsers of the statement.

As a veteran who served two and a half years in the African-Middle East Theater of War, in the capacity of a special agent in the Counter Intelligence Corps, I do not wish to see the major portion of my tax dollars and the tax dollars of other Americans pay for the rearmament of western Europe, a step which can lead only to war.

History, at the same time, has proved that arms races lead inevitably to war. The tens of billions that will be spent will have to be followed by American divisions because western Europe is not in a position to defend itself, and not in a position to support its ancient curse, which is a large standing army.

EFFECT OF THE TREATY

Not only will the implementation of the pact impoverish Europe, but it will disrupt our economy and dissipate our resources, and it can only mean spiraling prices, a continued lack of adequate housing, a continued lack of social security, health, and education measures, and also can only generate an even greater degree of war hysteria and depression. For example, the proposed Mundt-Ferguson-Nixon bill.

For lack of time I would like to go briefly over a certain number of other points I have in my statement, and one is the question of the automatic commitment of our country to war.

Article 9 of the pact gives the military council of the Atlantic Pact nations the authority to decide what action they can take, and in reference to a question you put before to Mr. McDaniel, of Madison, Wis., I do not know that James Reston, of the New York Times, when he was speaking in favor of the pact in the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations on March 23, said categorically, "I do not think any President in the future is likely to wait for Congress to declare war after the Congress has passed, and the world has accepted our signature on article 5 of the Atlantic Pact."

The question of the abrogation of the United Nations Charter, especially articles 51 and 52, are well known to you. I remember that a month ago the Department of State was telling us that the Atlantic Pact was a regional arrangement, but since that time, 1 month ago, there has been no reference to the fact that it is a regional arrangement, because a reading of the United Nations Charter would point out that this regional arrangement would not be separable.

The question of Spain, which is not a democracy, in my opinion, but is tied up indissolubly with Franco Spain, is another question that is causing a lot of concern among American citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. Spain is not in this treaty. What has that to do with this?

Mr. TOPPING. Franco Spain is tied up with Portugal and there has been pressure on many sides, even in the last few weeks, to permit Spain to sign the Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. She did not sign it, and she is not a party to it. Go ahead.

COST OF REARMAMENT

Mr. TOPPING. I would like to point out a conclusion here, again, what the staggering cost of the armament of Europe, together with the amount of money we are paying toward the cold war, is going to cost us.

I think China and Greece have shown that the $7,000,000 spent there, and the sole program of anticommunism, has not been successful. It has proved that you cannot contain an idea or a philosophy that has attracted as communism has. But if you can present a better idea, like an ardent, virile, dynamic democracy, you have a philosophy that can win the minds and hearts of men all over the world.

In my experience during the war, when I was very close to the Greek situation, and saw much of Greek history made, and had the opportunity to interrogate and interview and examine many of the present members of the Greek Government, high and low officials, doing refugee work, interrogation of Greek refugees, with British intelligence in the Middle East, it was easy for me to see, and many others who were close to the Greek scene, exactly what was to happen in Greece since we started to aid them. The Wyman report that was made public about a month ago also points out the conclusions that many of us have felt.

By way of recapitulation, let me just say the pact can only give us a false sense of security. As one prominent Milwaukee women's leader put it to me: The Atlantic Pact is just another shot of morphine to hold back the pain of honestly facing the underlying causes of war, of facing up to the steps that can lead but only to a war of destruction.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you. You were in the United States Army Counter Intelligence Service?

Mr. TOPPING. The CIC—Counter Intelligence Corps, the counter-espionage branch of Military Intelligence.

The CHAIRMAN. Where were you operating?

Mr. TOPPING. After a year of training here in the United States, I was sent to the African-Middle East Theater of Operations.

The CHAIRMAN. Were there any United States armies there then?

Mr. TOPPING. Yes, there were troops in North Africa and the Middle East. And after the British Eighth Army, with the help of the Allies, defeated the Afrika Korps, Africa and the Middle East ceased to be a war zone but remained an important zone of supply and communications.

I can remember the many intelligence files I saw concerning the widespread espionage system of the Germans and the Japanese in Turkey, another country which is far from democratic, and which was far from being friendly to us.

The CHAIRMAN. We did not have an army in Turkey, did we?

Mr. TOPPING. No, we did not, because they were supposedly neutral.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a native-born American citizen?

Mr. TOPPING. Yes, I was.

The CHAIRMAN. You were? Are you not still?

Mr. TOPPING. Yes, sir, I am. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Martin?

(No response.)

Mr. Martin is not here.

Now we have the pleasure of hearing from Mr. Don Wilson of Clarksburg, W. Va., who represents the American Legion. He is accompanied by Gen. John Thomas Taylor, legislative director of the veterans' organization of the American Legion, and also by Mr. Robert R. Post, who is associate director of the national legislative committee.

STATEMENT OF DON WILSON, REPRESENTING THE AMERICAN LEGION; ACCOMPANIED BY BRIG. GEN. JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR, DIRECTOR, NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE; AND ROBERT R. POST, ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR OF THE NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

General TAYLOR. I have Mr. Post and Mr. Wilson here Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The national commander, Mr. Perry Brown, approves the position of these gentlemen. He told me so personally. But it was impossible for him to be present to make the presentation. So we will have Mr. Wilson.

General TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I would be derelict if I did not express to you my admiration for the marvelous way in which these hearings have been conducted this morning in the truly American democratic fashion when the pros and cons on such a vital issue have been presented to you, and with such patience on your part. Individuals speaking for themselves and individuals speaking for organizations.

Our speaker today is here to speak for the American Legion, three and a half million men and women who wore the uniform in the last two great wars; a million women in the auxiliary of the American Legion, the mothers, the wives, the sisters of these soldiers and sailors and marines. And we think, for 400,000 men who did not come back at all, we think we speak for them. We feel that way about it.

The democratic processes depend upon national security, Mr. Chairman, and this North Atlantic Pact is a part of our national security. It has been given careful consideration by the American Legion.

I have with me today a young World War II soldier, 40 months in the service, right out of the uniform, from the grass roots of the Legion, the department commander of the State of West Virginia, a brilliant young lawyer, delegated, designated by National Commander Brown, to speak for the American Legion: Don Wilson, of Clarksburg, W. Va.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. I first of all want to thank this committee for the opportunity it has given to me personally, and to the American Legion to place before it the views of the national organization of the American Legion.

I have prepared a statement, Mr. Chairman, which I would like to introduce into the record in the interests of saving time, if it is agreeable to you. I shall extemporize on that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be satisfactory if you desire it. Go ahead. (The prepared statement of Mr. Don Wilson is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF DONALD R. WILSON, DEPARTMENT COMMANDER OF WEST VIRGINIA, THE AMERICAN LEGION, ON THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Mr. Chairman and members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the American Legion has eagerly accepted this opportunity to appear before this committee for the purpose of expressing its views on the North Atlantic treaty.

In the light of some of the charges which have been made to the effect that the treaty is a prelude to war, it may be interesting and helpful to this committee to have an expression from the largest veterans' organization in the world, with over 3,000,000 members, giving its considered view that, far from being an instrument of war the treaty in fact does much toward the accomplishment of its announced objectives of obtaining peace and security for the world.

There is no organization of individuals more devoutly interested in the cause of peace and security than an organization of veterans who have had the experience that can only come from participation in a global armed conflict. They have seen and felt the destruction that comes with war; they have observed at first hand the dislocations which result; they have seen the suffering not only of their comrades in arms but of all peoples.

As a result of their experiences in the first great world conflict, the organizers, leaders, and members of the American Legion during the years 1918-41 urged time after time that the United States of America keep itself militarily strong and cooperate with the peoples of other peace-loving and democratic nations, to present a united front against the aggressive designs of nations whose leaders were mad with a lust for conquest and power.

It was with a sense of impending doom during those years that the members of the American Legion, veterans of World War I, watched the United States destroy its military effectiveness, encourage aggressors by displaying only weakness, place its confidence in high-sounding but meaningless and nonimplemented declarations of policy, sit idly by while Japan plunged the dagger of conquest into a prostrate China, refuse to be alarmed and effectively cooperate to deal with Mussolini's blatant aggression against Ethiopia, and fail to see the significance of Hitler's relentless measures of conquest against Austria and Czechoslovakia. Perhaps the attitude of mind of the American people during those tragic years was best expressed by our announced policy of neutrality, which amounted to a complete abandonment of our sense of obligation toward peace, freedom, democracy, and the human dignity of man.

Partially as a result of our abandonment of the responsibility in international affairs, another generation of Americans was called upon to secure in bloody conflict the peace that had been so carelessly thrown away. Another generation of Americans was called upon to participate in the destruction of a malignant way of life. Upon the conclusion of hostilities, there were then two generations of American veterans, members of the American Legion, who possessed an overwhelming desire to secure to future generations what had been denied to them, namely, a peaceful and secure world. They had seen and understood the war, even when conducted in a righteous cause, left behind it untold misery. Particularly after the Second World War was it apparent that the peoples in many nations in the world were disheartened, exhausted, and practically devoid even of a will to live.

It is out of that background of experience that the American Legion sees adherence to the North Atlantic treaty not only as a desirable step, but as an imperative step for the United States to take if we are to be consistent and progressive in our endeavors to build an edifice of peace. The participation of the United States in the North Atlantic treaty is not an isolated step; it cannot be considered alone; it must be considered only as one further advance along the road upon which we are now marching.

I have spoken of the peoples of some of the nations of the world losing their will to exist. In our opinion, that will was partially recreated by the hope that was held out to them when the United States joined in the proclamation of the Atlantic Charter. That served to sustain them during the difficult years of war.

At the conclusion of the struggle, with the promulgation of the Charter of the United Nations there was recreated in the hearts of the peoples all over the world a desire not only to live, but to struggle upward toward a goal which for so many years had seemed completely beyond reach and was now within the realm of the possibility of attainment. It was significant that so many nations which had gone through the experience of war could unite and struggle together for enduring peace through the framework of a world organization.

After the first enthusiastic acceptance of the United Nations, it became apparent that there were defects in the structure, defects which would be difficult to remedy. Because of those defects the Soviet Union has been able to expand its power and influence over practically half of Europe and much of Asia. It has been possible for the Soviet Union to contemplate the enslavement of the remaining portions of the world. Her obstructionist and aggressive designs brought about a situation which too closely parallels that which existed in 1939.

To meet Russian encroachments, and to fortify ourselves against enslavement from whatever source it might come, we came to believe that it was not enough for the people of the world merely to have the will to live and an ideal goal to struggle toward, but it was necessary for us to build within them the desire to prosper, to build up their businesses, their trade and their economic security. To that end the United States announced what might be called the most unselfish act in the history of nations. We proclaimed the Marshall plan. We have been enthusiastic in our participation in it. We are proud to know that it is accomplishing its purpose, and we delight in the evidences of the increasing domestic strength of our friends.

After thus acting to do our part in creating the will to prosper, we observed with warm approbation the rebirth of the will on the part of these nations to protect what they and we were building; to resist all further efforts to deprive them of the progress they were making. It was for that reason that we so strongly approved of the Brussels Pact, which announced on behalf of five nations in western Europe that they would protect and preserve themselves and their way of life against all aggression.

Upon this background of history, we come to the North Atlantic Treaty. It is not only an expression of the will to resist, but it is an expression of the desire to work with others in maintaining that which is noble, good, and desirable.

As I previously indicated, therefore, the American Legion does not view the North Atlantic Treaty as an isolated step. It is merely one further imperative step along the road we have been traveling since we were brought to a realization that we have an obligation to shoulder our responsibilities in international affairs.

It indicates our community of interest with other peoples having the same heritage of freedom and democracy that we possess. It indicates our desire to be helpful to them and likewise to expect them to discharge their obligations to us, to all other signatories of the treaty, and to the other peace- and freedom-loving nations of the world. It reaffirms our belief in the ultimate success of the United Nations. Created within the framework of the United Nations, it strengthens that organization by strengthening the members in it. It places us on record as having learned the lessons of two wars, namely that aggression against our friends so endangers our own security that we cannot permit that aggression to go unchallenged. Our participation in the treaty will proclaim to the world that the United States of America is not this time withdrawing from its international responsibilities.

We do not view the North Atlantic Treaty as a mere play on words. The pledges we will have given should be considered as solemn ones, so solemn as a matter of fact that we are willing to work with others in building up strength against aggression, strength in the diplomatic as well as in the military spheres. We do not recoil from the use of strength if strength should become necessary. The treaty leaves it open to us to ascertain what strength we must begin to build now and what strength we should call into play if our cooperation with our friends or their cooperation with us is ever challenged.

It is our sincere hope and belief that the participation of the United States in the North Atlantic Treaty will help us to build a stronger and more peaceful and a more secure world for ourselves and all generations to come. It is for that reason that the American Legion, through its national executive committee, in session on May 4-6, 1949, unanimously and enthusiastically passed the following resolution:

"Whereas the treaty known as the North Atlantic Pact is now before the United States Senate for ratification; and

"Whereas this pact was formulated under articles 51 and 52 of the United Nations Charter for the peace and security of the member nations to this pact: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, We urge early ratification and implementation as provided in the articles of the pact."

I have the honor to transmit this resolution to you in the hope that its terms will be met and in the hope that by taking the step recommended we will have built peace, security, and prosperity, and will have advanced considerably toward our goal of a strong and effective United Nations as the enduring foundation of world peace.

Mr. WILSON. I have been particularly interested this morning and on other mornings in reading in the newspapers some of the charges that have been made in connection with the North Atlantic Treaty, to the effect that actually it is merely a prelude to war. I thought it might be interesting and perhaps helpful to this committee to have the American Legion, representing over three and a half million veterans and their families, appear here and state that it is its firm conviction that this North Atlantic Treaty, far from being an instrument of war, is actually calculated to accomplish its announced objectives of peace and security for the United States and all the world.

It goes without saying that there is no organization in the world more devoutly interested in the cause of peace and security. To appreciate that it is necessary to realize that the American Legion is composed of members who know war first-hand. They have been through the experience of war, they have seen families destroyed, they have seen the destruction, the deprivation of all rights and human dignities.

Naturally, then, the members of the Legion are interested in obtaining peace. We are sometimes interested in hearing individuals say that we want war. No one who has seen war first-hand wants it. The one who has seen war first-hand wants only peace and security and the human dignity of man.

As a result of the experiences of the veterans of the First World War, the American Legion was organized. Its organizers, its members, and its leaders, time after time during the years 1919-41, urged that the United States keep itself militarily strong, and that it cooperate with other peace-loving nations of the world to present a united front against aggression from whatever source it might come.

ISOLATIONISM IN THE UNITED STATES

Unfortunately many of the preachings of the Legion during those years were disregarded, and the Legion, viewed with a sense of impending doom the successive steps of the United States in withdrawing from its international responsibilities. We saw the United States refuse to participate in any form of international organization. We saw the United States place its reliance upon comparatively meaningless statements of broad, international policy that nations of the world made without any apparent intent to live up to them. We saw the United States absolutely disregard the necessities for being militarily secure.

We sat by while the United States looked at aggression as it occurred, and refused to act. The aggression that was accomplished upon China by Japan, the aggression that occurred when Mussolini marched into Ethiopia, the aggression that occurred when Hitler enslaved Austria and Czechoslovakia. As a result of our complete withdrawal from our sense of international responsibility we as a people proclaimed that we would be neutral and perhaps at that time we reached an all-time moral low when we thought we could buy our own peace and security at the expense of the freedom of other peoples of the world.

We all know the tragedy that came from that withdrawal, the tragedy is demonstrated here and throughout the United States, in that we built another generation of veterans who had once again to secure in war what had been carelessly thrown away in peace.

We had to once again liberate, as best we could, the areas of the world that were threatened with enslavement, and we entered upon that, to accomplish that task, and came back resolved that insofar as it was within our power, we work with all our strength toward the accomplishment of peace and security so that succeeding generations would not have to experience those things which the last two generations experienced.

So it is with that background of the Legion's policy during the years 1919-41 that we approached the North Atlantic Treaty. We see in the North Atlantic Treaty not only a necessary and desirable step, but we consider it to be an inevitable step for the United States to take.

I might call to the chairman's attention the fact that, as he well knows, during this Second World War peoples of the world at one time had almost lost, in many areas, even the desire to live; having been enslaved and oppressed they wondered whether it was worth the candle.

I think our Government recognized that when we joined in the proclamation of the Atlantic Charter, we gave to those downtrodden peoples of the world some glimmer of hope. We created in them some desire to continue to live. We created in them the hope that eventually they would once again rise and be free. But that was only the beginning of this Government's policy in recreating a better and a stronger and a more secure world.

THE UNITED NATIONS

After the conclusion of hostilities in World War II we entered upon the proclamation of the Charter of the United Nations. To the Legion's way of thinking, the Charter of the United Nations gave to the peoples of the world an ideal toward which they could work. It gave them further hope that once again we might, with some degree of confidence, contemplate a great world organization that would bring to us all of the security that we had in times past thrown away.

But we did not stop with the United Nations, because it became apparent, after the United Nations had been in operation for a while, that there were defects in that Charter, and it is significant that one nation of the world, the Soviet Union, seized upon every conceivable defect in that Charter and endeavored, and with some degree of success endeavored, to bring about the enslavement of as many areas of the world as it possibly could.

Through its use of the veto power the American Legion believes that the Soviet Union has deliberately blocked every effort that could be made through the United Nations to bring about a peaceful solution of many of the problems confronting the troubled areas of the world today. We of the Legion recommended many changes in the Charter of the United Nations. We have recommended that it be strengthened in many ways.

Thus far, those recommendations, although never considered, and although this Government has been moving in the direction of the recommendations, have not borne the fruit that we would like to see them bear. So we approved, and enthusiastically approved, another step, although somewhat different from the Charter of the United Nations, still within its fabric and framework, namely, the proclamation of the United States in the Marshall plan, which we considered the most unselfish act that had ever been made by any country in the world.

THE MARSHALL PLAN AND THE BRUSSELS TREATY

The American Legion went on record in the convention in New York as favoring the Marshall plan even before it became the policy of this Government. And it did so because it saw in the Marshall plan a further step along the road we wanted to travel, a step in which was not only the will to live created, but after the will to live was created the people of the world were to be given an opportunity to build their businesses, to build their economies, so that it would be secure, and we recognized that we had an obligation to help them in their efforts to do that.

Shortly after the proclamation of the Marshall plan we were most pleased that this Government saw fit to approve the proclamation of the Brussels Treaty, because the Brussels Treaty represented the intention of five nations of western Europe not only to live and to build their economy and their internal security, but it represented that they had the will to resist any encroachments against them from whatsoever source they might come.

We enthusiastically endorsed that Brussels Treaty at our last convention in Miami, and we endorsed the principle upon which it was based. And now the North Atlantic Treaty we think follows so logically from that step, so logically that we are again enthusiastic in our approbation of that treaty.

SECURITY AND HOPE THROUGH THE ATLANTIC PACT

After having created the will to live, the will to build, now it is necessary to create in the hearts and minds of the peoples of these 12 nations, a sense of feeling that they are all working together toward a common goal, within the fabric of the United Nations, which represents their ideal to which they are struggling, and an ideal with which the American Legion is in hearty sympathy.

The North Atlantic Treaty, we believe, is clearly within the provisions of the United Nations Charter. Efforts have been made, as you well know, to say that it was not within the United Nations Charter. But it is clearly contemplated there that the nations of the world may work together to secure themselves against aggression, so that if there is no question there, as we believe there is not, then we view also with approval, the fact that the North Atlantic Treaty represents to the peoples of the world, that the United States, once and for all, has seen clearly its obligation in international relations, and that it has no desire to avoid those obligations; it has a desire to carry through with them, placing its strength, such as it may be, at the disposal of a great world organization. And at the same time requiring that the nations with which it is associated in this treaty, contribute their fair share toward the security of the world that we are all working toward.

The ratification of this treaty cannot help but be a great encouragement not only to the peoples of the nations with whom we are associated in it, but to the peoples of all the world, to see that the United States, great, strong, and powerful as it is, discharging its obligations and has no hesitancy to discharge those obligations to the fullest extent.

I must call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to this fact: The American Legion does not believe that this North Atlantic Treaty is just a play on words. We believe in the North Atlantic Treaty so strongly and so sincerely that we want our organization on record before this committee as favoring the implementation of that treaty. We have never looked forward to the use of strength as a means of obtaining great and noble objectives.

The American Legion, composed of veterans of two world wars, has never been reluctant to proclaim that if the occasion should arise, that strength should be used in the interest of righteousness and justice. And so we look forward to the implementation of this treaty when the United States becomes a signatory to it.

I have given you, Mr. Chairman, a summary of the views of the American Legion with reference to the North Atlantic Treaty, viewing it only as a logical step in the development of the policy we have been pursuing thus far. At the meeting of the National Executive Committee, held in Indianapolis, Ind., recently—as a matter of fact the dates are on that, May 4 through 6—the National Executive Committee enthusiastically—and when I say enthusiastically, I mean that when the time came they rose to their feet and applauded this resolution.

RESOLUTION OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

The CHAIRMAN. Read the resolution, and I want the press to take note of this resolution.

Mr. WILSON. The resolution is as follows:

Whereas the treaty known as the North Atlantic Pact is now before the United States Senate for ratification; and

Whereas this pact was formulated under articles 51 and 52 of the United Nations Charter for peace and security of the member nations to this pact: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, We urge early ratification and implementation as provided in the articles of the pact.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to transmit this resolution to you, and to your committee, and to the United States Senate in the hope that its terms will be met, and in the further hope that by taking the step recommended we will have built peace, security, prosperity, and that we will have advanced considerably toward our goal of a strong and effective United Nations, as the enduring and ultimate foundation of world peace.

I want to thank you again, Mr. Chairman, for the courtesy of this committee in hearing the statement of the American Legion, and to express my own appreciation for the opportunity to be with you.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you for a very illuminating and sound and splendid statement. I want to extend my congratulations to you, sir, for being the commander of the West Virginia American Legion, as I understand it. Is that correct?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have seen war in close contact.

Mr. WILSON. I have, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you know the ambitions of those who want peace and want to provide the agencies and the implementations necessary to secure peace?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not your view that this treaty is well within the framework—I think you said so a while ago—of the United Nations?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; I believe it is clearly within the framework of the United Nations.

THE TREATY AND THE UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that in article 1 of the treaty is set forth—

The parties undertake, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international disputes—and so forth?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that in several places within the present treaty it is unequivocally plainly stated that it is not in conflict with the United Nations Charter, but is in aid thereof, and supplementary thereto?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct, sir. And further than the words used in the draft of the treaty, the sentiment of the peoples of the nations that are signatory to it, is such that they all want this to be within the fabric of the United Nations and to contribute to the building up of the United Nations?

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. I do not want to lead you but I want to direct your attention to particular phases of the matter. Is it not true that this treaty is purely a defensive pact, and has nothing whatever, not a word, not a sentence, looking to aggression or the armed attack by the signatories upon any other nation or country?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I cannot see, in this treaty, any indication of an aggressive design by the signatories to the treaty. There is not a word in here that would indicate an aggressive intent. As a matter of fact, the entire draft of the treaty, throughout, is indicative merely of a defensive arrangement within the Charter of the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to direct your attention to article 5. This article reads:

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered as an attack against them all. Consequently they agree that if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in the exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense, recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties—and that is what I want to direct your particular attention to—such action as it deems necessary—that is each country—

Including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area, any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council—

That is the Security Council of the United Nations.

Such measures shall be determined when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

Do you not construe the language that requires the nations to take "such action as it deems necessary," a complete assurance to the United States that under our sovereignty there is no automatic declaration of war, there is no automatic pulling into the war, but that it is up to the United States to determine what action it deems necessary in view of all the circumstances?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, that is the only logical interpretation of those words that are used in that article 5.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that article 5 acknowledges the overriding authority of the Security Council, specifically?

Mr. WILSON. It acknowledges it, and sets it forth clearly, in language that cannot be misunderstood by anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, whatever is done by the nations shall be reported to the Security Council?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And that such measures shall terminate whenever the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security?

Mr. WILSON. That is clearly expressed in that article, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that this treaty is only directed against an armed attack by some nation other than a member of the North Atlantic Pact?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct.

SECURITY THROUGH THE PACT

The CHAIRMAN. And that it is intended to aid any of the signatories to the pact when an armed attack is made upon that nation by some other nation?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Without the joint action of these small and weak nations, would it not be possible for a strong power to pick them off, one by one, and thus consolidate a tremendous military establishment of some nation, with these nations incorporated therein?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, the policy of an aggressive nation in picking off smaller nations has been well demonstrated to us in the not too distant past, when one by one the nations of the world that were weak and defenseless were picked off by nations that had aggressive designs and intentions.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of Estonia?

Mr. WILSON. Estonia is at the present time part and parcel of the Soviet Union.

The CHAIRMAN. What became of Lithuania?

Mr. WILSON. It is in exactly the same posture, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. And Latvia?

Mr. WILSON. In the same posture.

The CHAIRMAN. With reference to the satellite states, what happened in Czechoslovakia, one of the oldest countries of central Europe, that had been democratic and had ambitions for freedom and liberty and constitutional government for hundreds of years? What happened to it?

Mr. WILSON. In Czechoslovakia the Soviet Union has moved in, bag and baggage, and has made Czechoslovakia a satellite of the Soviet Union.

The CHAIRMAN. And a police state.

Mr. WILSON. A police state completely.

The CHAIRMAN. The same thing is true of Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary, is it not?

Mr. WILSON. That is true. And it is significant, Mr. Chairman, that each of those nations at one time or another has indicated that it did not want to get involved with any other nations in any sort of an arrangement or agreement to protect it against just such aggression as ultimately developed.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that in article 11 it is stated that—

This treaty shall be ratified and its provisions carried out by the parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes?

Does that not refute the claims of certain witnesses and others that the power of Congress to declare war or not to declare war is abrogated by this treaty? Does this not recognize that all action taken under this treaty by the governments of the signatories should be carried out in accordance with the respective constitutional processes, which would include the declaration of war?

Mr. WILSON. This article 11, Mr. Chairman, completely refutes the contentions of those who have said here before this committee that the United States could declare war without any action on the part of Congress, and in an unconstitutional fashion.

It is not contemplated by this treaty that such action be taken unconstitutionally. If that had been contemplated it would be difficult to justify the insertion of the words you just read in article 11.

The CHAIRMAN. And when the other article, which says that the countries may take such action as they deem best, individually, presupposes, does it not, that the nation will discuss and take such action under its constitutional provisions as it may decide necessary to preserve the security of the North Atlantic area?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all, sir. We thank you very much. It is a great statement.

The American Legion, of course, is a great patriotic organization. You have the best interests of the United States at heart. And since your formation you have contributed to the civic and public functions and responsibilities of citizens, is that not true?

Mr. WILSON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We think so, too. It is a great patriotic organization devoted to the welfare of the people of the United States.

I want to thank you very earnestly for coming here and giving us such a clear and explicit statement of the views of the American Legion on this treaty.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to say to the public now that this concludes the hearings on this treaty.

Mr. D'AQUINO. Senator Connally, may I ask a question, please?

The CHAIRMAN. What is it?

Mr. D'AQUINO. About the article—

The CHAIRMAN. You have testified once?

Mr. D'AQUINO. I have. But something has come up which I would like to make a remark about, this section 8.

The CHAIRMAN. Section what?

Mr. D'AQUINO. Eight.

The CHAIRMAN. Make it short now. You have had 1 day in court. You are not supposed to have 2 days.

Mr. D'AQUINO. I shall not read article 8, but I should like to ask a question in this regard: England, which is a part of this pact, now has an international agreement with Russia to permit the exchange of international trade.

The CHAIRMAN. That has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. D'AQUINO. It is not in conflict with this treaty?

The CHAIRMAN. No, it is not. You are excused.

Mr. D'AQUINO. That is what I wanted to know.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to say that during these hearings it has been the intent, and I think the practice, of the Committee on Foreign Relations to give every phase of public opinion represented by witnesses, a hearing in order that they may lay before the committee and the country their views respecting this treaty. We have, I think, been most generous, contrary to the complaints of some people that we are rushing action. We are trying to perform our duty, we are trying to respect public opinion, we are trying to give the citizens who desire to come here a hearing.

We have heard 96 witnesses, which is among the largest—not the largest, but among the largest—number of witnesses heard by any responsible committee of the Senate for a number of years. The press is witness to the fact that we have been here patiently from day to day, trying to give opportunities for those interested to express their views. We thank the witnesses for their presence here, and appreciate their views.

There is one gentleman here, George R. Laird, who did not file his request in time. He comes up here just as the curtain is going down. If he wants to make some comments, he will have to make it mighty brief, and mighty to the point, because we have given everybody opportunity.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE R. LAIRD, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. LAIRD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for giving me just a minute. I am enthusiastically in favor of this North Atlantic Pact. And I was delighted to hear some people get up here and denounce it and criticize it, because that shows the freedom of speech that we have in America, and they do not have it in Russia. If you people, I, or anyone else, got up and talked about anything that is advocated by Stalin, he would disappear from the scene.

The grand thing about this country is that it is a free country, freedom of speech, freedom of religion. Some have quoted Christianity and religion as opposed to the Atlantic Pact. If you want opposition, go to Russia where Stalin is atheist, and all the Russians, or nearly all of them, are denouncing real religion. You do not get real religious freedom there.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the mentioning of this fact, and I want to say again that I want to thank the gentleman representing the American Legion.

I gave a lecture on George Washington in Clarksburg, W. Va., 40 years ago, and I pointed out then, as I point out now, that George Washington said, "The best preparation for peace is thorough preparation from a military standpoint."

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. Give the reporter your name and occupation, and so on.

Mr. LAIRD. My name is George R. Laird, I live at 18 Fourth Street Southeast. I was for many years a teacher in Wisconsin University, in Northwestern, Ill., and for many years a lecturer on the Redpath and the Radcliffe Chautauqua Bureau, having lectured in 40 States in every section of the country, on Washington, and Lincoln, and Franklin, and other historical subjects.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for your presence.

Miss OSWALT. Would it be possible for me to speak?

The CHAIRMAN. You will have to make it short. I did not stop you.

Miss OSWALT. I know it. I do not want to take advantage of it.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you want to say?

Miss OSWALT. I want to say that in proposing this foundation for international relations, if the North Atlantic Pact were, instead of being just announced as a definite treaty, if it were to make the stand, the North Atlantic nations, were to make a stand for this principle of equal economic opportunity, then we would have something on which to base a world police force, an authentic basis. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. These hearings are closed.

(Whereupon, at 12:55 p. m., the hearing was closed.)

VILLANOVA COLLEGE,
DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH,
Villanova, Pa., May 16, 1949.

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER,
*Senator from Florida,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.*

DEAR SIR: I am enclosing a copy of an unpublished letter to the New York Times presenting two specific objections to the Atlantic defense treaty.

I am sending this material to you as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate so that the points I raise in my letter to the Times may be considered in the hearings of that committee and in the preparation of the Senate report by the committee on the Atlantic defense treaty.

Believe me,

Yours very truly,

GILBERT MACBETH,
Associate Professor of English, Villanova College.

LEGAL OBJECTIONS TO THE ATLANTIC DEFENSE TREATY

(The letter that follows was denied publication by the New York Times, a similar letter having been rejected earlier by the New York Herald Tribune. Since the regular channel of publication in the press has proved unavailable to me, I have recourse to the present means of circulation.)

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

However desirable the Atlantic defense treaty may seem from the point of view of immediate necessity, there are two objections to its acceptance by the United States that are grave enough to deprive it of its ultimate value as an instrument of American foreign policy.

One of these objections is that the terms of the treaty violate the provision in our Constitution relating to a declaration of war. Under article 5 of the treaty the United States agrees, in the event of an armed attack upon another party to the pact, that it "will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area." But the Constitution specifies that Congress alone has the power "to declare war."

It has been argued that the expression "as it deems necessary" permits the signatory governments to exercise their individual discretion as to what action may be required of them in the event of an attack upon a member of the pact. Such an interpretation is untenable. The expression "as it deems necessary" restricts in no degree the meaning of the passage in which it occurs; if it were removed, article 5 would have the same force as before. The words "as it deems necessary" merely convey what would be assumed anyway, that each nation, being sovereign, of course decides what its obligations under the pact may be in any given situation.

At an illustration, let us suppose that Luxemburg, a party to the pact, should be attacked by Greece, and should be in clear need of military assistance from the United States. Let us suppose that our Government should find it inexpedient to give this military assistance. Could we plead before the world that we were not obligated to implement article 5 of the pact because in our judgment military aid was not necessary "to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area"? Of course, we could not. We would be compelled by world opinion to give military aid to the attacked nation whether or not we believed that it was expedient for us to do so.

There is no escape from the conclusion that, as the pact now reads, it violates the letter as well as the spirit of our Constitution. The Senate by virtue of its treaty-making power cannot determine how Congress as a whole shall exercise its power to declare war. It is possible that our State Department was misled as to the import, or rather the lack of it, of the words "as it deems necessary," a phrasing that might well have been suggested by representatives of other nations concerned in the drafting of the treaty, conceivably eager to secure a commitment of military support by the United States in the event of war.

This difficulty in the treaty can be easily remedied. It is only necessary to replace the above expression by one like "as it shall determine" in order to satisfy the constitutional requirement that Congress as a whole must declare war. Without some such alteration of article 5 it would be the office of the Supreme Court to rule the ratification of the pact by the Senate null and void.

The other serious objection to the Atlantic Pact is that it violates the terms of the charter of the United Nations, which the Senate ratified as a treaty by a vote of 89 to 2 less than 4 years ago. The Atlantic Pact conflicts with the requirement in the charter that

"The parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, shall, first of all, seek a solution by negotiation, inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice (art. 33)." and

"Should the parties to a dispute of the nature referred to in article 33 fail to settle it by the means indicated in that article, they shall refer it to the Security Council (art. 37)."

The United States has had a serious dispute, constituting a great danger to international peace, with the Soviet Union, one having begun over 2 years ago, and growing more serious with the passage of time. In January of this year Premier Stalin, in accordance with article 33 of the charter, offered to open comprehensive negotiations to settle the major differences between Russia and the United States. The United States Government rejected this offer, ostensibly because the Soviet Union could not be trusted to keep the agreements that might result from such negotiations. President Truman's expression of willingness to see Premier Stalin if he should come to Washington only underlined that rejection.

If we will not negotiate now, one may ask in passing, when will we negotiate? When will we decide that Russia can be trusted? Will we ever negotiate? There is no hope of peace in such an attitude; there is only the prospect of ultimate war.

The signing of the Atlantic Pact, a treaty initiated and promoted by the United States, followed hard upon the offer by Premier Stalin to settle by negotiation the differences between Russia and the United States. The Atlantic Pact is a substitute for recourse to the measures of arbitration and conciliation prescribed by the United Nations Charter for the precise kind of situation that now prevails between the United States and the Soviet Union. The confirmation by the Senate of the pact will be a violation of the UN Charter, a document which includes the solemn asseveration that the United States by accepting the charter has made its own:

"All members, in order to ensure to all of them the rights and benefits resulting from membership, shall fulfill in good faith the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the present charter (art. 2)."

This objection to the Atlantic Pact is one that is inherent, and can be removed only by the rejection of the pact by the United States Senate.

AMERICAN COTTON SHIPPERS ASSOCIATION,
Memphis 1, Tenn., May 10, 1949.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,
*Senate Office Building,

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: At a recent annual meeting of members of this association which is composed of merchants, shippers, and exporters of American raw cotton in all the cotton-growing States of America the following was adopted with regard to the Atlantic Pact:

"Every American citizen is concerned with the maintenance of a peaceful world. The international trade in cotton which is our business and so important to the United States and the world is still suffering from the disruptions of the recent war. World war has hit us twice in a generation and each time there is a reasonable ground to believe it might not have, had the aggressor nations fully understood that we would be an inevitable and immediate participant. The Senate of the United States now has before it the Atlantic Pact in which we and the nations of western Europe agree to make common and immediate defense against any aggressor. This is a momentous step for the United States, but it is a recognition of the changed world situation, and vital to our own defense and democracy. We think we should so advise our Senators and we recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the American Cotton Shippers Association urge the immediate ratification and implementation of the Atlantic Pact as essential to national defense and democracy; and

"Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be wired Chairman Connally of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and sent to each other Member of the Senate, and that Justice Owen J. Roberts be advised of this action."

We respectfully request that you give the above expressed views of our members your careful consideration.

Yours very truly,

R. C. DICKERSON,
Executive Vice President and Secretary.

STATEMENT OF MOSES H. DOUGLAS, SOUTH HILL, LEMPSTER, N. H., ON THE ATLANTIC PACT: ITS CAUSES AND CONSEQUENCES

Major changes in the political motivation of the United States became fixed during the Senate leadership of Nelson Aldrich, (R. R. I.) who entered the Senate in 1878; and who stood for a theory of government which has been defined by his biographer as "the conception of society as an economic hierarchy, which is the heart of Hamilton's vision." See Bowers, Beveridge and the Progressive Era, page 317.

Mr. Aldrich's influence upon our wars with Spain and Germany has been underestimated, but to say that Mr. Aldrich and American policymakers alone effected the changes in our political motivation would be rash; for English pressure and discord-making have been incessant from Cobbett to Churchill, and all have been directed against American principles of government and political morality.

Of Cobbett, publisher of Porcupine's Gazette, 1793, in the capital city, Wyndham said in Parliament that he deserved a statue of gold for his services here in the interest of Great Britain. England's official pressure in 1793, and for 20 years thereafter, was rugged terrorism; and a project of British origin for detaching New England from the Union found its way into American State Papers (Vol. VIII; p. 258; 2d edition). After the War of 1812, subversion took the place of force. Beginning about 1828, our antislavery associations were altered from a wholesome national movement in all the States, to sectional abolition, largely by the labors of George Thompson, an English emissary (see George Lunt's Origin of the Late War, 1866). British periodicals came to New York during the Crimean War period, and Paris Conference, 1844-56. The cooperation of Sir John Russell with the Northern States in 1862, while British sympathy was believed to favor the Confederacy, amounted almost to an allied war (see President Davis' message to the Confederate Congress, December 1863).

Just before the Civil War the New York organ of the American Party was conducted by four British editors, and one American. Other New York papers, according to L. A. Wilmer (Our Press Gang, 1859), were not very differently managed. The leading weekly story-paper, half a million circulation, was English owned. An Englishman owned the New York Herald.

During the period from 1899 to 1903, Charles Welsh, an English publicist, operating from an American educational publisher's, procured alteration in our school-books of passages unfilial toward Great Britain. I can speak without references concerning Mr. Welsh, who was my close friend; but for the sake of verifying, I will add that Mr. Welsh's most prevailing argument can be found in the Educational Review, January 1900. By 1914, nearly everyone in the United States under 30, had possibly felt Mr. Welsh's influence in favor of Great Britain.

At a critical moment in 1914, a newspaper in this country which is now featured as the most quoted paper in the world, made an English journalist its editor. In 1946, Mr. Churchill brought the church's opposition to communism into American politics.

These are subversive and subtle acts. They can be verified. To study them is a liberal education in tyranny and intrigue. The people are unsuspecting, and need to be informed upon all the channels of foreign influence by volunteers as well as by governments. Yet whoever examines volume I, 1938, of the publications of the Institute of Propaganda Analysis, will find no mention of these acts, nor, strange to say, any mention of the American principles of government and political morality which they were meant to disrupt. In place of both, on page 2, he will find a formula of the type Washington described as an "imaginary common interest."

"* * * A passionate attachment of one nation for another," Washington said in paragraph 33 of his Farewell Address, "produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into the one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification."

No common interest in human right exists between a sovereign who ordains justice in foreign intercourse, and one who is motivated by power. Nor is there common interest between the acknowledgment of political liberty, which we declared to be a universal right, and the English policy of order, or world government. They are contradictions.

As the policy of order has not perhaps been sufficiently publicized, I will cite it from Bell's Life of Canning; page 331:

"Canning always protested against the system of holding congresses for the government of the world. Mr. Canning's 'system' of foreign policy, as described in his own language, resolved itself into this principle of action, that 'England should hold the balance, not only between contending nations, but between conflicting principles; that, in order to prevent things from going to extremities, she should keep a distinct middle ground, staying, the plague both ways.'"

In order to bring the United States into this system of mutual slaughter, which mows down friends and foes alike, for England's economic advancement, a common interest is imagined in peace and freedoms which have been promised by war makers possibly from the beginnings of civilization, although these ancient gold-bricks are conspicuously absent from our constitutional objectives.

Peace is always subject to recall by an executive, through shaping public thought into a popular demand for war. Our fathers accordingly, provided that peace should not take precedence of justice; nor should aggression on the part of the United States invade the political liberty of another nation. They implemented these provisions with a risk of impeachment for the man held responsible for war making, their chief executive.

These provisions were not merely isolationist ideals, though our unique ordinance of justice isolates us in a distinguished sense from other nations. They were partly an indignant reaction against the dumping-ground policy of British commerce, shown in the following extract from a letter of the Lords Commissioners of Trade and Plantations to Governor Shirley, of Massachusetts, in 1756:

"As we are by our commission directed to consider of the means to prevent the colonies from furnishing themselves or other colonies with what may be supplied from this kingdom, we cannot give it as our opinion that you should comply with the request of the persons concerned in the scheme (the manufacture of linen) that they may be erected into a corporation."

Instead of moralizing upon this grasping system of servitude, I will cite a London correspondent of the Boston Transcript (Carroll Binder), quoting an English official, August 23, 1937. He shows that the balance of power in which we last took part, was motivated by the same interests which governed the Lords Commissioners in 1756:

"There is absolutely no thought in official quarters here of leaving the luscious prize of China to be devoured or destroyed by either the Japanese or Chinese. The British have enjoyed it a long time and expect to continue enjoying it when this shooting is over.

"Things may look black now for British interests. But Britannia will be heard from when the combatants' strength is spent by prolonged warfare."

In my opening reference to Mr. Aldrich, he was further described as believing that a "divine right to rule had passed from kings to property." Such a departure from the sovereignty of the people explains our changes of political motivation, and our participation in two British balances of power, as well as the project to tie our hands from making just or lasting peace in the impending war. For the Atlantic Pact is a typical British balance of power, and a British balance of power without a war for economic conquest is unusual. I believe it would be unprecedented.

LORD, DAY & LORD,
New York, May 13, 1948.

HON. TOM CONNALLY,
Chairman, Foreign Relations Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I desire to add my voice to those who are urging upon your committee that it recommend to the Senate ratification of the North Atlantic treaty.

Professional obligations have prevented me so far from asking time for personal testimony before the committee, and you have already had a long list of witnesses before you. However, if before your hearings close my appearance should be desired, I am now available. But in any event, feeling strongly on the subject, I desire in this way to record my view that great injury to the cause of peace, of economic stability, and of mutual confidence among nations would be the result should this country not now adhere to the treaty. I write this as one who is not only interested in international affairs but has some knowledge about relations in Europe.

I have the honor to be the first head of our economic mission to France during the war, and saw at first hand that country as it emerged from German occupation and from the horrors and destruction of the fighting. I have both business relations and a number of personal friends in France, Belgium, and Holland, and have made it a point to keep closely in touch with the progress of events in those countries. I was in Europe last summer and observed the development and probable consequences of the Marshall plan, which was then beginning to function, and also discussed the situation with various business interests, Government officials whom I have known, and others.

I am convinced that the Marshall plan has done a great deal to bring about economic rehabilitation in western Europe and to preserve or restore conditions in which democratic institutions can be maintained. On the other hand, I am equally convinced that something more than the Marshall plan is needed. I know a number of instances where, despite the economic improvement which the Marshall plan has accomplished, much needed investments in plant rehabilitation or in new industrial enterprises, for which there is a need, have been withheld because of fear of the future. In France and in Holland the fear of war has been expressed as fear of another occupation. And in the instances to which I have referred I was informed that investments of funds which were available were being withheld because of fear that if plants were modernized or new plants constructed they would simply be taken over by occupying forces. In many personal conferences last summer and in correspondence since then it has been impressed upon me that the Marshall plan could not achieve its maximum usefulness and full European recovery could not be had unless something could be done to inspire confidence and remove or mitigate the fear of another war and another occupation.

While there is, of course, the risk that the intentions of the countries entering into the North Atlantic treaty may be misinterpreted, nevertheless I strongly believe that, balancing all considerations, it affords the most immediate hope which we have of imparting some degree of confidence to the people of western Europe. And I certainly believe that at this stage for this country to refuse to adhere to the treaty would destroy hope and invite a break-down of morale whose consequences would be terrible.

I shall be glad to have this letter made a part of your record.

Yours respectfully,

PARKER MCCOLLESTER.

CITY CLUB OF CHICAGO,
Chicago, 2, Ill., May 18, 1949.

To the Members of the Foreign Relations Committee, of the United States Senate.

GENTLEMEN: I am transmitting herewith a resolution adopted by the national affairs committee of the City Club of Chicago and approved by the board of governors of the club, endorsing the North Atlantic Pact and urging its immediate ratification by the United States Senate.

We trust you will give the pact your personal support.

Sincerely yours,

G. D. YOEKUM,
Chairman, National Affairs Committee.

RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, CITY CLUB OF CHICAGO, ON THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT

Whereas the North Atlantic Pact is claimed to be a defensive movement within the framework of the United Nations, and is for the sole purpose of protecting the independence, political rights, and individual liberty of the citizens of the member nations and their present boundary lines; and

Whereas many of our citizens deem a pact necessary wherein the United States shall accept responsibility in proportion to her power to protect the weaker nations from any aggressor: Be it

Resolved, That this committee approves of the North Atlantic Pact and urges its immediate ratification by the Senate of the United States.

The following recommendations of the department of international justice and good will of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America are also approved by the committee and are an integral part of the committee's action.

Recommended that the Senate declare that ratification of the pact:

1. Is not construed as closing the avenues of diplomatic conversation with the Soviet Union.
2. Is not construed as the equivalent of, or as a substitute for, a universal system of collective security.
3. Is not construed as the equivalent of, or as a substitute for, those curative and creative efforts of government through which it is sought to promote economic recovery, to strengthen the institutions of democracy, and to advance the political and social well-being of subject and dependent peoples.
4. Is not construed as comprising in any way the prior responsibility of the President and the Congress in the shaping of American foreign policy.

THE AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES,
New York, N. Y., May 20, 1949.

Hon. TOM CONNALLY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: It is my pleasure to present to you the attached text of a resolution unanimously adopted by this council at its recent spring convention in Denver, Colo.

We shall be grateful to you if you will kindly instruct that the text of this resolution be placed in the record of the hearings on the Atlantic Pact.

With kind personal regards,

Cordially yours,

WILLIAM HALLIEE BORDEAUX, General Secretary.

RESOLUTION ON RUSSIA ADOPTED BY THE AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, MEETING IN DENVER, COLO., APRIL 27-29, 1949

There is no dodging the fact that atheistic communism is on the march, and that the very existence of western civilization and freemen is threatened. A strong military defense is an absolute essential to deter Russia or to deal with her in case of aggression. Indifference, compromise, and confusion, to which the United States is a party, have made possible her expanding power and the inability to hold a peace conference following World War II.

We call for the ratification of the Atlantic Pact with its present intent and purpose, and the implementation of the same. The threat of war is real and the cry of Pacifists and Socialists in the Federal Council of Churches should be recognized for what it is—an undermining force aiding the Russian cause.

We hold that Christian principles and common sense require that an understanding with Russia be secured before the advantage the A-bomb gives the West is equalled by Russia's own supply of the weapon. To sit idly by and permit Russia to move for the leadership and control of the world is the utmost folly.

At the same time, we would remind those in positions of authority that it is righteousness which exalteth a nation, and that our first line of defense should be a spiritual one in a return to God through Christ, in repentance and confession of our sins.

Hon. TOM CONNALLY,

*Chairman, Senate Committee on Foreign Relations,

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: I hope you will permit me to file with your committee the attached statement in support of the North Atlantic Pact now receiving consideration by your committee.

Will you please make my statement a part of the committee's record.

Very truly yours,

GEO. M. HARRISON, Grand President.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE M. HARRISON, GRAND PRESIDENT, BROTHERHOOD OF RAILWAY CLERKS, SUBMITTED TO THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS URGING APPROVAL OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I should like to express my appreciation to the honorable chairman and members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations for the opportunity to present my views in support of the North Atlantic Treaty. I wish to state categorically it is my view that the North Atlantic Pact should be approved by the Senate of the United States. I believe such action is in the best interest of world peace and is essential to the security of the American people.

The Congress of the United States has twice in our lifetime decided the United States could not remain aloof from war which we had no part in starting. All our efforts—and it has been a sincere effort in both instances—to isolate ourselves from the differences that arise between the nations of the world have failed to leave our Nation free to pursue its own course in peace. These differences that have accumulated between nations which have ultimately exploded into world conflagrations have in both instances involved the interests of the American people so greatly that they have finally cost American lives and resources before they were finally brought to an end. Our experience in these two instances should be proof enough that the interests of the American people cannot be protected if we are to await until wars are started before we assert our influence. The conclusion would seem obvious that we must of necessity inject ourselves into the problems that arise between the nations of the world in our own self-interest. If, as has been our experience twice in our own generation, we cannot avoid being drawn into the wars that arise from the differences between other nations, it follows that our influence should be exerted to resolve these differences in an effort to avoid wars.

The American people are convinced that since we cannot remain aloof from world conflagrations, we must try to prevent their starting. Public opinion in the United States, so far as I have been able to determine it, is overwhelmingly in favor of our Government taking an active part in preserving world peace. This opinion is evidenced by approval of the action of our Government in initiating the formation of the United Nations. Public opinion overwhelmingly endorsed the action of the Senate in approving the United Nations Charter, and public opinion continues to support the United Nations.

Our Nation has contributed great stores of our resources within the past few years and we are continuing to do this for the purpose of assisting in rehabilitating the economic systems, not only of our allies in World War II but also of our enemies during that war. The people of this Nation have approved this action of Congress because they understand that hunger and deprivation breed the despair which causes people to turn to totalitarianism. The American people understand there can be no security and prosperity for ourselves with much of the world in economic chaos.

The citizens of our Nation have approved the action of our Government in exerting every effort to encourage the formation of organizations of the nations in the several regions of the world committed to the use of the conference method for the settlement of disputes. The Bogotá agreement of the nations of the Western Hemisphere; the encouragement by our State Department of the adoption of the Benelux agreement, under which it is planned to integrate the economies of Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg; the assistance given the western European nations under the Marshall plan in the formation of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, which has as its objective the integration of the economies of all the Marshall-plan countries—all of these have the approval of the overwhelming majority of the American people because they are convinced each is essential to the attempt of our Government to build an arch of world well-being and understanding to sustain world peace.

So far, our efforts have been primarily devoted to the rehabilitation of economic systems of the western European nations. This is as it should be, for economic chaos breeds political instability. Without political stability, there cannot be security from internal and external aggression. Political stability seems fairly well assured by reason of the economic assistance so far rendered by the United States. These western European nations are not yet sound pillars in the arch that sustains world peace because the task of economic rehabilitation has not been finished. Congress has itself, through extension of the Economic Cooperation Administration, acknowledged the need for our continued help to the western European nations. These nations will make greater progress the greater is their feeling of security from external aggression. Approval by the United States Senate of the North Atlantic Pact will enhance their feeling of security and the rebuilding of their economies will be speeded because of the greater confidence of the people in their security from attack. The point of all our effort so far in rendering assistance to the western European nations has been to strengthen them to make them a greater force in preserving world peace. The North Atlantic Pact will further this cause.

The assistance rendered by the United States in western Europe, to Greece, to Turkey, and in other troubled spots of the world, and the firm position taken by our representatives in the United Nations, has demonstrated to Russia very pointedly that her tactics are out of harmony with world opinion. This is demonstrated in a very telling manner by the votes cast on the propositions which have come before the United Nations General Assembly. Whereas, in the earlier months of the sessions of the General Assembly, Russia found a few nations voting with her and others abstaining from voting, in recent months the Russian position has been supported by only the six votes she controls, and many of the very nations which previously abstained from voting now demonstrate by their vote that they recognize the Russian obstructionist tactics for what they are.

Our positions in the United Nations Councils could have been reversed today had we abandoned the western European nations to their own misery following the close of the war. Our economic aid to those nations can be said to be responsible in a large measure for preventing the spread of communism in those countries and, consequently, for sustaining our position on the questions that have come before the United Nations. Our positions could yet be reversed in the Councils of the United Nations if we were now to adopt a policy which abandoned the western European nations to shift for themselves. Congress has expressed the views of the American people against such a policy by approving the continuation of economic aid through the extension of the Economic Cooperation Administration.

We have built well the foundations for an arch to sustain world peace. The Atlantic Pact is the keystone of that arch. The arch rests on the free democratic nations of the world with one pillar in the United States and the other pillar resting in western Europe.

The North Atlantic Pact, as with other regional agreements mentioned above, finds approval in article 51 of the United Nations Charter. It is not, therefore, an alternative to the United Nations as an instrument for bolstering world peace; rather it is a device for strengthening the United Nations—one which has the full approval of that Charter.

The North Atlantic Pact is solely defensive in character. Any nation that views it as an interference with its national policy admits that aggression and the subjugation of other nations is a part of its foreign policy. The representatives of our State Department and the foreign offices of the other nations which it has been planned will subscribe to the North Atlantic Pact have been skilled in shaping the keystone of the arch upon which world peace must rest. The Senate of the United States should take the action which is overwhelmingly endorsed by the American people and drop that keystone in place by promptly giving its approval to the North Atlantic Pact.

THE METHODIST CHURCH,
Birmingham, Ala., May 9, 1949.

HON. TOM CONNALLY,
Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing to add my word of approval of the North Atlantic Pact. It is very unfortunate that a few church leaders have issued a statement withholding approval of the pact. These statements are in no way official expressions of the Methodist Church. I am convinced that the vast majority of our Methodist members and ministers are in favor of it. I look upon it as an extension of the principle embodied in the Monroe Doctrine. It will certainly be a very effective deterrent to any aggressor nation. I hope that your committee will give it prompt approval for ratification by the Senate.

My best wishes.

Faithfully yours,

CLARE PURCELL.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF JEWISH WOMEN, INC.,
New York, N. Y., May 9, 1949.

Mr. C. C. O'DAY,
Clerk, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. O'DAY: I am enclosing herewith a copy of the statement by the National Council of Jewish Women in support of the North Atlantic Treaty. I would appreciate its inclusion in the record of the hearings.

Sincerely yours,

MILDRED S. WEIT,
Mrs. Joseph M. Weit,
National President.

STATEMENT IN SUPPORT OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

In the light of its resolution on the United Nations calling for United States adherence "to a democratic foreign policy consistent with the aims of the United Nations Charter," the National Council of Jewish Women has considered the North Atlantic Treaty and adopted the position stated below.

The National Council of Jewish Women supports the basic premise of the North Atlantic Treaty, namely, that the threat of aggression in Europe requires adequate measures for self-defense. The National Council of Jewish Women recognizes that aggression against the countries of western Europe threatens United States security. We recognize also that the United Nations has not yet demonstrated its ability to prevent such aggression and that the United States and the countries of western Europe must act to guarantee their security. The aggressors of the two world wars were spurred on to attack by the fact that the United States was not committed to the defense of western Europe. Potential aggressors now and in the future must know in advance that the United States will not remain neutral if Europe is attacked. The North Atlantic Treaty is a statement of America's intention to guarantee the security of western Europe.

No one denies that the treaty strengthens its members by providing for their collective defense against attack. But the treaty is criticized on the ground that it conflicts with the United Nations. This is not so. The treaty in fact, strengthens the United Nations by strengthening the security of the North Atlantic area which is so critical to the peace of all the nations. The treaty supplements and does not supplant the United Nations.

To date the United Nations has been unable to secure peace. Russia has consistently used the veto to obstruct the settlement of problems plaguing the world. In Berlin, in Korea, in Iran, and in Greece, force has prevailed as the instrument of international settlement. It has also been impossible to establish the international armed force without which the United Nations cannot maintain world order.

The National Council of Jewish Women therefore supports the North Atlantic Treaty as a realistic measure of collective defense against military attack. We must, however, make certain that the treaty is given its proper place in the whole of our foreign policy. Economic aid to Europe, support of the United Nations and assistance to underdeveloped areas, as well as strengthening freedom-loving nations against aggression are the basic aspects of American foreign policy, which were enunciated by President Truman in his inaugural address. All these programs must be supported with equal vigor if the United States is to pursue a constructive and democratic foreign policy.

It is especially important that the military aid which the United States will provide as a concomitant of the treaty is balanced against the economic aid which continues to be essential to the recovery of Europe. This balance requires that economic aid is not made secondary to military aid. The National Council of Jewish Women believes that American aid for European recovery must take precedence over any armament program. We urge that it be carefully and publicly stated that the ECA program has first claim on American funds for Europe.

United States support of the United Nations has always been, and continues to be, strong and devoted. Support of the United Nations must continue an integral part of United States foreign policy. For this reason, the NCJW believes that the treaty should not be limited to a particular regional grouping but should be opened to all nations willing to abide by its provisions. The treaty itself offers no prohibition against this. Article 5 of the treaty which binds the members to act if any one of them is attacked, takes its authority from article 51 of the United Nations Charter, which specifically recognizes the right of individual or collective self-defense, and does not limit this to regional arrangements. If the treaty is opened to all nations, then the signers of the treaty will avoid establishing themselves as a bloc within or outside the United Nations. They will be stating their determination to maintain collective security within the spirit and letter of the Charter.

In his inaugural address, President Truman outlined, as one of the four fundamentals of the United States foreign policy, a program of technical and scientific assistance to the underdeveloped territories of the world to aid in developing their economies and strengthening the economy of the world. This program will add great weight to the democratic nature of American foreign policy and will give tangible evidence of the United States concern with the welfare of dependent peoples. That North Atlantic Treaty must not be allowed to conflict with this policy by blinding the United States to support of the colonial policy of any major power. It must be made clear that article 4 of this treaty, which calls for consultation when "the territorial integrity" of any of the parties is threatened, does not require the United States to aid in supporting the colonial policies of the treaty members. The purpose of the treaty is the protection of the metropolitan territories of the signatories, not of colonial areas.

The severe rift which exists between the United States and Russia requires the North Atlantic Treaty for self-defense, but this must not bring the United States to base its foreign policy solely upon military considerations. Peace will be maintained and economic stability assured through the combined measures of strengthening freedom-loving nations against aggression, strengthening the United Nations, rebuilding the economies of the war-torn nations, and developing the potential economic resources of the backward areas. All of these steps taken together will form a total American democratic foreign policy.

THE CATHOLIC ASSOCIATION FOR INTERNATIONAL PEACE,
Washington, D. C., May 16, 1949.

Hon. THOMAS CONNALLY,
Chairman, Foreign Relations Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: I should like to submit for your information the enclosed statement on the North Atlantic Pact by the world order committee and the juridical institutions subcommittee of the Catholic Association for International Peace.

Sincerely yours,

RITA SCHAEFER, Committee Secretary.

THE UNITED STATES AND THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT

JOINT STATEMENT OF THE WORLD ORDER COMMITTEE AND THE JURIDICAL INSTITUTIONS SUBCOMMITTEE

The North Atlantic regional pact for joint defense of the United States, Canada, and western Europe seems necessary. It is consistent with the UN and may fill gaps in the UN. It should, in fact, have been entered into in some form years ago to fit long-standing realities of the North Atlantic countries. Accompanied by the present swift but difficult steps toward European economic and political unity, themselves magnificent, the pact has already had good effects.

These committees urge its speedy ratification.

The present inadequacies of the UN to maintain international peace and security due to the veto in the Security Council require other means of adequate protection against aggression or armed attack. The North Atlantic Pact is a necessary step forward in this direction.

The North Atlantic Pact is consistent with the UN in that the UN provides for regional pacts and for collective self-defense. Some have contended that a regional pact violates the idea of a world organization. The UN Charter itself takes no such position, and the American states, even before the UN was formed, took steps to form a far closer regional agreement than that of the regional North Atlantic Pact. In fact, there should be no contradiction of a world organization with regional organizations any more than with national governments. All three are needed and have to work together.

Others object that the pact is a threat of aggression against Russia, or at least that Russia will so consider it. Anyone who knows American, Canadian, and west European opinion could scarcely construe the pact as anything but defensive.

Now that the countries of this region are determined to work together in the pursuit of peace, their Atlantic Pact, although not yet in effect, has already had a salutary effect on the Soviet.

A change in the Soviet is necessary to save the UN. Every pressure of peaceful opposition to any Soviet aggression, every practicable move for world and regional peaceful cooperation, inclusive of Russia if she will enter, or apart from her if she refuses, and such joint agreements on regional military defense as the organization of American states or the North Atlantic Pact needed to wake up the Soviet to her dangerous policy, should be used.

The Atlantic Pact can, therefore, be a means of saving the UN.

We entered a pact in the UN for the defense of every country and we entered a pact for the joint defense of the Western Hemisphere in the organization of American states to solidify a similar decision that we made alone a century and a quarter ago to defend the Americas from western European aggression. However, in the North Atlantic old prejudices make some of us hesitate.

Yet for the last 50 years our own well-being, the well-being of Europe, the prevention of two world wars, and prevention of the depression of 1929 largely depended upon Europe, Canada, and the United States working together. In the Marshall plan, in the drive for a united Europe, in the continued use of the UN, and now in the Atlantic Pact, we are catching up somewhat with the facts.

The Atlantic Pact is only one part of a general plan. It is an essential part. The great hope is that through the success of these other methods there will never be need to use military action to defend Europe, Canada, and the United States. Meanwhile, in adopting the Atlantic Pact, let us employ and strengthen the UN and hasten the union of Europe.

POWELL-MARTIN-BARRETT POST, No. 37,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Lake Providence, La., May 13, 1949.

CHAIRMAN, FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE,
Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Powell-Martin-Barrett Post, No. 37, of the American Legion, located at Lake Providence, La., with a membership of 365 active members, has unanimously adopted the enclosed resolution relative to the North Atlantic Treaty or pact of mutual defense now pending before the Senate.

We will appreciate your committee's favorable consideration of this resolution, which we believe has the support of the vast majority of the American people.

Yours very truly,

POWELL-MARTIN-BARRETT POST, No. 37,
By MAX F. STOCKNER, Adjutant.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED (IN SUBSTANCE) BY POWELL-MARTIN-BARRETT POST, No. 37, OF THE AMERICAN LEGION, LOCATED AT LAKE PROVIDENCE, LA., AT ITS SESSION
OF APRIL 20, 1949

Whereas currents or movements are discernible in this Nation tending to defeat or weaken the effect of the so-called North Atlantic Security Treaty or Pact of Mutual Defense now pending before the Senate; and

Whereas these endeavors assume the direct form of opposition to ratification of the said treaty and the indirect forms of opposition to adequate provision of arms and economic assistance to nonaggressive European nations and of opposition to prolonged maintenance of the United States flag and United States forces on European soil at the outposts of the prospective western alliance; and

Whereas the said neosolationist endeavors, if successful, would, in our opinion, not only gravely impair the power position of the United States and hence its security, but would render a third world war more probable, and victory in such war more difficult and costly in lives and resources; Therefore be it

Resolved by Powell-Martin-Barrett Post, No. 37 of the American Legion;

I. That the United States Senate be and it is hereby respectfully memorialized to ratify the said North Atlantic Security Treaty or Pact.

II. That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to support the following objectives in appropriate ways, and consonantly with executive leadership:

A. Adequate rearmament and economic rehabilitation of friendly and non-Communist Europe and, where expedient, Asia, by the United States within the bounds of sound strategy and financial policy.

B. Maintenance of the United States flag and suitable armed forces at key points in Europe in order to warn Teuton and Slav, and to reassure the rest of Europe, of United States determination forcibly to resist, and capacity to halt and eventually repulse, aggression; and thus presumably to safeguard the west from war or from conquest, whether by resurgent Germany or the Soviet Empire or both together in any relationship of alliance, or subjugation of either by the other.

C. The continuation of this regime of military guaranty and necessary aid in civilian supplies and arms matériel for a prolonged or an indefinite period rather than for a short term of years; or until United States security and world peace are stabilized beyond serious risk of overthrow; the political and strategic pattern suggested by the present resolutions being, in our opinion, comparable to an extension of the permanent Monroe Doctrine across the oceans and well up into the Eurasian Continent, so as to prevent, or meet at its inception there, armed or conspiratorial expansion of any political and military power, and acquisition of any strategic positions, that would menace our peace and safety.

D. Adequate United States strength in population, industry, agriculture, resources, and arms to implement the aforesaid objectives.

III. That a copy of these resolutions be submitted to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, Senators Allen J. Ellender and Russell Long, of Louisiana, and Representative Otto E. Passman of the Fifth Louisiana District.

MY DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: In behalf of the American Federation of Labor, International Labor Relations Committee, I have issued a declaration in support of the Atlantic Pact.

I am herewith enclosing a copy of the declaration with the hope that you will give it careful and favorable consideration as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate.

If you have any questions or inquiries at all as to our position, kindly do not hesitate to call upon me for further clarification.

Thank you most heartily for your cooperation.

RATIFY THE ATLANTIC PACT

DECLARATION BY MATTHEW WOLL, CHAIRMAN, INTERNATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS COMMITTEE, A. F. OF L.

The American Federation of Labor strongly urges the Members of the United States Senate to ratify the Atlantic Pact. We urge ratification for the sake of our own country's highest ideals and best interests. We plead for prompt and favorable Senate action in the interest of world democracy, recovery and peace.

The A. F. of L. views with the greatest admiration the determined and fruitful efforts of the European peoples to overcome postwar chaos, rebuild their countries and secure social justice. But in this grave hour, we cannot overlook the most painful feature of the crisis of our times: The war-breeding course pursued by totalitarian Russia and its world-wide fifth column—the Cominform and the WFTU—is the heaviest obstacle to coordinated international effort for overcoming the heritage of the global war. Today, totalitarian communism is the one force deliberately planning, plotting, and pushing the aggravation of the international crisis. This destructive Communist role is no less evident and dangerous in the spiritual and moral realms than in the political, economic, and military fields. Therefore, the overriding need of the hour is the maximum international cooperation of all freedom-loving and peace-seeking peoples.

It is in this spirit that the A. F. of L. has been seeking the transformation of the UN into an effective instrument for world peace. It is in this spirit that we have hailed and worked for the Marshall plan. It is likewise in this spirit that the A. F. of L. now calls upon its 8,000,000 members to rally their representatives in Washington for whole-hearted support of the Atlantic Pact.

America and the rest of mankind are not facing or fighting an obnoxious theory. We are facing an overawing condition and cruel challenge. It is true the Communist dictatorship oppressing the Russian people and the Soviet satellites has not yet launched a frontal military assault against our country or any other western democracy. But it is already waging ruthlessly and relentlessly a cold war against all nations not under the yoke of Communist totalitarianism. We need but point to the sinister role of Russia's Communist fifth column—the Communists. They are hypocritically exploiting the democratic rights to demoralize and disrupt the democracies in peacetime. Their traitorous activities are aimed solely at helping the Kremlin tyrants defeat and destroy the liberty-loving peoples in the event of war.

These dastardly machinations conceived and directed by the present Russian regime are as much crimes against the Russian people and particularly Soviet labor as against the people and labor movements of the rest of the world. Unless these crimes are checked now they are bound to lead to the worst and most unforgiveable of all crimes against humanity—total war. Surely, the democratic world dare not forget this vital and costly lesson learned from the experience with Nazi totalitarian aggression.

The A. F. of L. believes that the only time to prevent war is before it breaks out. The A. F. of L. believes that it is far better to prevent a war than even to win it most decisively. History has taught us that the best way to defeat aggression is to deter it. Only the active and permanent cooperation of free peoples—armed with unshakable determination and unbeatable power to maintain freedom and peace—can be strong enough to deter aggression, to prevent war, to preserve human dignity and liberty, and assure enduring peace.

What is more, there can be no real economic recovery and sound social and economic reconstruction as long as the spectre of war haunts the peoples of the world. No worker can give his best to production as long as he is harassed by the terrifying fear of war and frustrating uncertainty of an unstable world. No greater encouragement and incentive to healthy economic reconstruction and improved working and living conditions could be imparted to the ranks of free labor than imbuing the working peoples of the democratic countries with a firm feeling that they are secure against the encroachments and aggression by totalitarian communism—the twentieth century slave state. Hence, the dollars and cents cost of procuring such military defense and democratic security is infinitesimal in comparison with the vast social, economic, and political benefits resulting therefrom.

If we make the fatal mistake of being defenseless today, we will not get another chance to defend ourselves successfully against expanding totalitarian enslavement tomorrow. Either our own and the other free nations amass and pool enough strength to prevent a war—and surely win it if totalitarian communism should lose its head and launch a military conflict—or we disarm now and let the Bolshevik enslavers take over the world. There is no other alternative. Half a partnership among the free peoples, half rearmament of the democracies, would be suicidal. That would only give us a feeling of false security and make us an easy prey for the ruthless aggressionists.

We call for Senate approval of the Atlantic Pact as an act of living solidarity and full partnership with all the forces of freedom. In the words of Jefferson, America and the rest of the free world have arrived at "a geographical line coinciding with a marked principle." We cannot preserve this principle of human liberty and decency without safeguarding this geographical line. America never was and never can be neutral in the event of any serious assault on freedom. Our love of liberty and social justice is entirely incompatible with standing idly by, with doing nothing, with being neutral when giant military powers seek to extend their tyrannical hold and expand their imperialist ambitions to attain world domination. Furthermore, for the Communists, there is no such concept as neutrality. Those who are not with them, are against them, and are considered by them as their mortal enemies—to be enslaved or slaughtered at the very first opportunity.

Moreover, it was the hope and belief that America would remain neutral or would not be prepared in time to help the nations attacked which have encouraged the aggressors to start the last two World Wars. The Atlantic Pact will dissipate such hopes and beliefs and will deter any imperialist power from plunging mankind into another total war.

Given the present world situation, there is only one nation capable of rallying the forces of freedom and providing them with enough material strength to convince a would-be aggressor in advance that his attack is doomed to failure. That nation is America. Only vigorous American adherence to the Atlantic Pact can convince a would-be aggressor that an attack even against the smallest and weakest people would call forth a crushing counterblow by the strongest power at the head of an invincible coalition for international justice and peace.

The A. F. of L. especially emphasizes that the American people have a spiritual and moral bond which binds them to all liberty-loving peoples. This community of sacred purpose underlies the basic necessities for our joining the Atlantic alliance. This identical mainspring of human values and aims is the best reason for our Senate endorsing the Atlantic Pact. We assure the workers of all countries that organized labor in America is solemnly devoted to these democratic ideals. Here is our firmest guaranty for the Atlantic alliance serving not against any people or groups of peoples, but only for defending the world peace and promoting international harmony on the basis of the Charter of the United Nations.

THE INSTITUTE FOR CANCER RESEARCH,
Philadelphia, Pa., May 11, 1949.

The Honorable TOM CONNALLY,
Chairman, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, United States Senate, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONNALLY: An appointment was made for me to testify before your committee today in its hearings on the proposed North Atlantic Pact, on behalf of the Philadelphia Council of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions. However, my time is fully occupied with my duties as head of the Department of General Physiology of the Institute for Cancer Research, and rather than spend by time and yours in verbal testimony I have felt it best to present my point of view in writing.

The North Atlantic Pact is a very touchy and dangerous move which can be of great importance for either good or evil. It, and its collateral legislation, must be given the closest scrutiny. I am utterly opposed to any move which is exclusive, which is aimed against anyone, or which may serve to weaken or bypass the United Nations. Insofar as the Atlantic Pact is aimed at consolidation of the western powers in their similar economic and social aims, the establishment of general spheres of cooperation, the breaking down of nationalistic and sectional barriers, the setting up of regional agreements within the United Nations, I am for it. Insofar as it is a military alliance against Russia or against anyone else I am utterly opposed to it. I would be strongly against our spending any money whatever to arm western Europe.

Obviously the world is going to have to spend some money on police protection—armaments. But the only armaments money which I would be prepared to approve freely would be for a United Nations police force. It is high time we recognized that competitive armament is disastrously costly and unnecessary.

I therefore urge you—

(1) To approve the Atlantic Pact only if it is so amended that all friendly nations, including Russia, are not only invited but urged to join it.

(2) To reject any expenditures for regional armaments either under this pact or in relation to other agreements and to recommend the allocation of equivalent funds to support a nonregional military police force under the United Nations.

(3) To urge upon President Truman, as head of our country's administrative and diplomatic forces, to use the danger of our present regional tendencies as grounds for still another attempt at those discussions of the problem which divide the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, at the highest diplomatic levels which were so successful in obtaining cooperation during the war.

It seems perfectly obvious to me, from considerable experience in various parts of the world, that neither the United States nor Europe can afford the expenditure of funds and the economic disruption entailed in even a moderate armament on a present-day scale. We have got to find means of providing for our security in another way. The United Nations, as a strong centralized power with real police powers, seems the most evident method for obviating regional armaments. The fact that the North Atlantic Pact, with military connotations, could be even seriously considered, since it obviously would undercut one of the intended purposes of the United Nations, seems to me to emphasize the need for a complete reconsideration of the problems of regional versus central police power.

Let us remember the resemblance between the present stage of the United Nations and the situation of our own confederation before 1789, which was resolved by the establishment of a strong central authority, the United States of America, and also the unhappy resemblance of the present recrudescence of sectionalism which the Atlantic Pact would seem to legalize, to the state of affairs in our own country in the 1840's to 1860's, which led to secession and the Civil War. Let us be sure that the Atlantic Pact is not an act of secession.

Sincerely yours,

PHILIP R. WHITE,

Head, Department General Physiology, Institute for Cancer Research.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA, INC.,

DEPARTMENT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE AND GOOD WILL,

New York 10, N. Y., April 22, 1949.

The Honorable TOM CONNALLY,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: No position for or against ratification of the North Atlantic Pact has been taken by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America since when its executive committee last met the text of the pact had not been made public. It is desirable, however, that such pact actions of the Federal Council as may have a bearing upon the forthcoming debate in the Senate be brought to your attention.

I am writing to you in my capacity as chairman of the department of international justice and good will. We believe the considerations here set forth are warranted in the light of pronouncements previously subscribed to by the Federal Council.

I. The Federal Council of Churches is convinced that war with the Soviet Union is not inevitable. We recognize, and have said, that "Marxist communism in its orthodox philosophy, stands clearly opposed to Christianity." But a war with the Soviet Union is believed by us to be improbable, given proper use by the United States of its powerful influence. Accordingly, we hold steadfastly to the view that the avenues of diplomatic conversation between the Soviet Union and the United States should be kept open and used. Such action as may be taken by the Senate on the pact should not be allowed to close the doors of direct negotiation with the Soviet Union.

II. The churches related to the Federal Council supported Senate ratification of the Charter of the United Nations in the conviction that the security of our Nation was to be derived from a system of collective security embracing all nations. They still hold to this view.

If, as a result of such action as may be taken by the Senate on the pact, the interest of the American people in supporting and strengthening the United Nations were to be diminished, the consequences might well be inimical to the peace of the world.

III. In the event the pact is ratified by the Senate, many people of our churches would desire that it be so implemented as to give impetus to those acts of government by which the conditions of peace with justice can be established. The Federal Council believes that "if our Nation's leadership is to be worthy, it must develop constructive and creative programs that will capture the imagination and enlist the support of the multitudes whose interest in battling political, economic, and racial injustice is greater than their interest in defending such injustice merely because communism attacks it."

The North Atlantic Pact may conceivably act as a deterrent to the more violent acts of Communist aggression by the Soviet state. However, the ideological thrust of communism cannot effectively be countered by defensive measures. What is required is the transcending of communism by enlarging the areas of political and spiritual freedom and economic well-being throughout the world.

Accordingly, we believe the implementation of the pact, if ratified, should be of such a kind as not to imperil the success of those recovery and reconstructive programs to which our Government is or may hereafter be committed. Senate support of authorization of the funds required to assure the continuous success of the European recovery program is very heartening in this respect.

IV. In the event the pact is ratified by the Senate, the people of our churches would desire that this regional arrangement be not used as a pretext for unduly expanding the influence of the military in the formulation of foreign policy.

The Federal Council's executive committee has expressed the view that "If * * * our national power is to serve the ends of peace, our basic national strategy should be made by persons who have faith in the achievability of peace and who are qualified by experience and training to use and to evaluate the great possibilities for peace that reside in moral and economic force in organizations like the United Nations and the World Court and in the resources of diplomacy and conciliation."

We recognize that under pacts of the kind now being discussed our military leaders have their necessary place. Foreign policy, however, far from being accommodated to the views of the military should remain, as heretofore, the prerogative of the President and the Congress.

V. In view of the foregoing, we venture to raise the question as to whether it would be appropriate for the Senate, in the event that body votes to ratify the pact, to accompany the instrument of ratification with a clarifying resolution in which the sense of the Senate would be expressed along such lines as the following:

(a) Ratification of the pact is not construed by the Senate as closing the avenues of diplomatic conversation with the Soviet Union;

(b) Ratification of the pact is not construed by the Senate as equivalent of or as a substitute for a universal system of collective security;

(c) Ratification of the pact is not construed by the Senate as the equivalent of or as a substitute for those curative and creative efforts of government through which it is sought to promote economic recovery, to strengthen the institutions of democracy, and to advance the political and social well-being of subject and dependent peoples;

(d) Ratification of the pact is not construed by the Senate as compromising in any way the prior responsibility of the President and the Congress in the shaping of American foreign policy.

Faithfully yours,

WILLIAM SCARLETT, Chairman.

*Chairman, Senate Foreign Affairs Committee,
 Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:*

Will be unable to appear before your committee Monday as scheduled. I want to express my opposition to the proposed Atlantic military alliance and to the gigantic rearmament program to follow. The American people have had enough of the discredited Winston Churchill dictating our foreign policy to us. We cannot afford the cost of buying a gold brick in the form of bankrupt British and Dutch empires. This foreign policy is costing us our entire New Deal program because we cannot have money and materials for war and still have housing, electrification, education, and a real farm program. We pay for this foreign policy by sacrificing our democratic heritage for a mad spree of hysteria against co-ops, labor, farmers, liberals, and minorities. We ordinary people do the paying while militarists and munitions moguls grow fat abroad. This wasteful program of dollar diplomacy to bolster corrupt reactionary governments against the demands of the common people everywhere for New Deal reforms is morally wrong. It has already failed in Greece and China. Can we not learn from experience that the extension of our present foreign policy into new areas can only result in more colossal failures and in world hatred for America?

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am the international representative for the Hotel and Restaurant Employees and Bartenders International Union. We are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and with the Railway Labor Executives Association. We have more than 425,000 members in the States and Territories in our 800 local unions.

Please be advised that the convention of our international union which concluded their deliberations in Chicago, April 30, 1949, as a result of a resolution introduced, discussed the North Atlantic Treaty and after discussion voted by an overwhelming vote to endorse same and urge that the Senate ratify.

It is an extreme pleasure for me as per instructions to add the name of our great international union to those endorsing and urging the ratification.

Very truly yours,

NATIONAL RELIGION AND LABOR FOUNDATION,
 New Haven, Conn., May 11, 1949.

Hon. TOM CONNALLY,
*Chairman, Foreign Relations Committee,
 United States Senate, Washington, D. C.*

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: I send you herewith a copy of the official publication of the National Religion and Labor Foundation which reports the opposition of our annual conference in Cincinnati, March 28 to 30, to the North Atlantic Pact.

Our conference held that peace "will not come by military alliances which further split our world and further weaken the United Nations and contribute to the polarization of power at the expense of the little countries caught between the United States and Russia." It held that "it [peace] will not come by Atlantic, Mediterranean, or Pacific power pacts, or by intensification of the already ominous armaments race."

Our conference insisted that "the architects of our Government's foreign policy bring it into conformity with our prophetic and democratic faith."

We believe our alternative program for peace outlined on page 2 comes more nearly being based on our religious and democratic heritage and will do more for peace than the North Atlantic Pact. We spend 1,000 times more for wars annually—past, present, and future—than we do on United Nations. We shall probably be spending 100 times more on the military implementation of the North Atlantic Pact than upon United Nations. We do not believe this is proof of sincerity, when we say we work for peace.

We sincerely hope that the Senate will not take action until after the Council of Foreign Ministers has met.

Sincerely yours,

WILLARD UPHAUS,
Executive Secretary.

THE GREATEST TASK OF OUR GENERATION IS TO END DRIFT TO WAR, CINCINNATI RLF CONFERENCE DELEGATES TOLD—COMMISSION ON THE WORLD SCENE DECLARED THAT PEACE WILL NOT COME BY ATLANTIC PACT, OMINOUS ARMAMENT RACE, OR BY ALLIANCES WITH REACTIONARY REGIMES—ALTERNATIVE PROGRAM OFFERED

[Text of report]

We have met here under the auspices of the Religion and Labor Foundation—mindful of our prophetic Judeo-Christian heritage and its impact on American democracy. We have met as citizens of the Nation which gave the world the Declaration of Independence, the American Revolution, the free public-school system, the Emancipation Proclamation, the economic Bill of Rights, labor's Magna Charta—the Wagner Act. We have met in the country where the United Nations was born.

We seek to follow the great Hebrew prophets and Jesus—who demanded justice for the poor, liberation for the oppressed, new wine skins for new wine, new attitudes and motives for new ways of life, "new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." We seek to follow Thomas Jefferson, who declared in the very launching of our Nation "That all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and that among these rights are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." We believe this Declaration and know it applies to all peoples—to the Indonesian and other colonial people struggling for democratic independence today, as much as to our colonial forefathers.

We insist that the architects of our Government's foreign policy bring it into conformity with our prophetic and democratic faith. Let it once again champion the cause of independence for colonial peoples, and justice for the poor and oppressed in America and around the world. Specifically, let us champion the right to independence of dependent peoples, not merely by good words, but by refusing to arm and aid the colonial regimes which use violent aggression to prevent liberation—in defiance of the United Nations. Our plea is that foreign policy decisions be determined by our loyalty to democracy and not by strategic or power advantages. Let us end the color line both at home and in our foreign policy. In colonial and semifederal lands the time is at hand for fundamental reforms, bringing independence to peoples, and giving land and economic opportunity to exploited peasants, following the example set by the agricultural reforms in Japan. The people in the vast areas involved demand these changes. Let an America which fought a revolution against colonialism and feudalism heed these popular and justified demands and ally itself with them. Let America meet the challenge of world revolution by being true to our own revolutionary past.

We meet in the atomic age and in the midst of an ever hotter, ever tougher cold war, in a time when armament is challenging armament, belligerence challenging belligerence. We do not like the fruits of that cold war—on either side of the battle lines. We are aghast at the present trend toward war, definitely influenced by military and financial interests. Unless that trend is checked, it will lead us and the peoples of the world into the greatest holocaust in history. It is folly to talk of anyone's winning a third world war, atomic scientists tell us. Humanity must lose it. All peoples of the world want peace. The drift in our world is toward war. The greatest task of our generation is to end that drift, and secure the peace for which the world yearns and prays. We deny that war is inevitable, affirm that peace is necessary and possible, and that the desire for peace is not the monopoly of any people.

The last war brought death to many of America's finest boys—and devastation and death on a far larger scale to other invaded nations. A war between the United States and the Soviet Union would be insane and suicidal for the Soviet Union—no less insane and suicidal for the United States. The time has come to seek with Isaiah and Micah that day when the nations shall "beat their swords into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks, when every man shall sit under his own vine and fig tree, and when none shall be afraid."

This will not come by military alliances which further split our world and further weaken the United Nations and contribute to the polarization of power at the expense of the little countries caught between the United States and Russia. It will not come by Atlantic, Mediterranean, or Pacific power pacts or by intensification of the already ominous armaments race. It will not come by the suppression of democracy anywhere in the world—or by alliances with reaction as in Portugal, Greece, Spain, China, and Argentina.

We have an alternative program to offer. We covet for our Nation the historic glory of taking the initiative on that program's behalf. We know that there is much suspicion, fear, and mistrust in the Soviet Union of moves initiated by the United States, and equal mistrust in the United States of the moves initiated by the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, the initiative must be taken. Therefore, we call on our Government to:

AN ALTERNATIVE PROGRAM FOR PEACE

1. Advocate now a definite and specific program of world disarmament through the United Nations, especially on the part of the great powers from whom comes the threat of global war. We do so because armament expenditures are now so heavy throughout the world that they deprive the peoples of the world of needed consumer goods, housing, health, aid to education, and other socially beneficial economic programs. Men in armed forces are not men who can participate in economically beneficial production. Since voluntary enlistments are more than meeting the quotas set by the armed forces themselves, and since peacetime conscription is an unjustified departure from American tradition and contributes by design to a militaristic spirit alien to America's democratic heritage, we should immediately repeal the unnecessary and costly draft. With the coming of multilateral disarmament and demilitarization, the economic resources and production now devoted to war preparation must be devoted to serving the crying and as yet unmet peacetime human needs: to a great program of slum clearance and housing, to a program of national medical care and hospitalization opportunity for all, to a program to save and expand our schools, to develop our river valleys, to produce ever more consumer goods and to secure for the people who need them the necessary purchasing power. Thus will we strengthen basic American institutions.

2. Strengthen and build the United Nations, and develop government under law for all the world. Work for a United Nations police force, stronger than the armed forces of either the United States or Russia. Make the United Nations so strong that the sovereignty of all nations will be respected against any act of aggression by any nation. We believe that the United Nations should be transformed into a federal world government, acceptable to the United States and Russia, with powers adequate to insure peace. Such a government would (a) be constituted of representatives elected directly by the people, (b) be able to act directly upon individuals in the maintenance of peace, (c) have authority to pass laws that are binding upon its members, (d) possess sufficient power to enforce its laws, and (e) have powers of taxation adequate to insure its own maintenance.

3. Seize every single opportunity for consultation through the UN with Soviet leaders in the interest of facing and resolving the problem and tensions which so ominously threaten the peace. Promote contact and understanding, not only between government leaders, but between the peoples of our great nations.

4. Return to the American democratic tradition under which foreign policy is under civilian and not military control. (We commend the President for the beginning recently made in this direction.) See that the American people as a whole are considered, consulted, and involved in the making of fundamental foreign policy. For example, assure that they are given adequate time, even yet, for careful deliberation and consideration of the serious implications of the Atlantic Pact (which our State Department has brought to its present stage largely without the participation of the people). We believe there is no emergency justifying adoption of any legislation without congressional knowledge or debate of that legislation's specific contents, as was done by the House in the case of the Espionage Act.

5. Dedicate the unmatched economic resources of the United States to the meeting of human needs everywhere, returning to the spirit and program of UNRRA, in which nations cooperated under and through the United Nations in a great program for all the devastated peoples. Expand and implement the splendid suggestion made by President Truman that there be cooperation by all nations through the United Nations for the development of industrially undeveloped areas. We affirm here the basic worth of human beings wherever they live and under whatever creed. No nation, including our own, should play politics with food or with the lives of little children. We are impressed with the record of UNRRA and seek a return to its universal and humanitarian principles. We are impressed also by the testimony of the Brethren, Friends, and other religious groups who are conducting a splendid program of relief and rehabilitation in various areas of the world, and who are distributing aid on the ethically and religiously valid basis of need, regardless of political belief.

6. Implement the commendable support given by our Government to the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights by applying it at home through that change in Senate rules necessary to make possible the adoption by this Congress of the President's civil-rights program.

7. Build here at home a democracy which is not afraid of itself or of the bill of rights which is at its roots—a democracy which practices before an observant world equality and fraternity as well as liberty for all—the kind of democracy in which both freedom and security will be guaranteed.

8. Open the doors of immigration to all peoples without discrimination. An America which recaptures its revolutionary democratic faith and which applies it in every corner of our land will be a united America, a morally strong America, and an America which need not and will not be afraid.

FARMERS EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA

National office: Denver, Colo.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1949.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,
Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: With this I am enclosing a copy of a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the National Farmers Union, March 19, 1949, with respect to United States foreign policy and in particular with respect to such regional agreements as the North Atlantic Treaty now pending before the Foreign Relations Committee.

It should be observed that the board of directors of the National Farmers Union is composed of all State presidents of our organization and is not a select group. Hence the attitude adopted by the board on March 19, on foreign policy may unquestionably be taken as fully representative of the rank-and-file membership of the organization.

I should appreciate it very much if you would see to it that this letter and the board statements are made a part of the record of the hearings on the North Atlantic Treaty.

Sincerely,

JAMES G. PATTON, President.

DENVER, COLO., March 22.—The National Board of the Farmers Union has adopted a resolution condemning the proposed North Atlantic Security Treaty as "directly contrary to American precedent and history" and "a futile gesture."

The group adopted the resolution at its semiannual meeting in Denver.

Declaring there are "very disturbing elements in our Government's foreign policy," the farm representatives from 35 States said, "The most alarming is the proposal for a North Atlantic Security Treaty, obviously to be followed by extensive arms aids to Europe. We cannot approve such a course."

At the same time the board of directors of the National Farmers Union pointed to four actions which "indicate a possible new trend in the conduct of this Nation's relations with other nations."

These were listed as "The installation of Secretary of State Acheson and the removal of Secretary of National Defense Forrestal, President Truman's staunch refusal to permit the military to stampede him into approving an increased military budget, the partial success in its peaceful aspects of the European recovery program, (and) the elimination of Assistant Secretary Draper from a controlling voice in German economic affairs."

The Farmers Union officials strongly endorsed President Truman's now-famous "point four" of his Inaugural address, and went on to list eight other steps that need to be taken on the international scene to preserve world peace and promote the security and welfare of the people of the world.

(The full text of the resolution adopted by the board of director of the National Farmers Union is as follows (the board is composed of all State and Territorial presidents)) :

STATEMENT ON UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE NATIONAL FARMERS UNION, MARCH 19, 1949

Since VJ-day, our Government's foreign policy has under military domination been a blind unreasoning prosecution of cold war—on the basic premise that a third world war is inevitable. The installation of Secretary of State Acheson and the removal of Secretary of National Defense Forrestal, President Truman's staunch refusal to permit the military to stampede him into approving an increased military budget, the partial success in its peaceful aspects of the European recovery program, the elimination of Assistant Secretary Draper from a controlling voice in German economic affairs—these actions indicate a possible new trend in the conduct of this Nation's relations with other nations.

Beyond all else, the President's proposal in the now famous "point four" of his Inaugural address, has encouraged the people of the United States to hope that at last the United States will turn its enormous energies from military preparations to the waging of a successful peace. The emphasis the President has put upon working through United Nation agencies in the execution of point four has especially impressed us. We hope that this marks a definite and permanent turning point. For a peaceful world, it is imperative that the United States cease its widespread bilateral action and that it work through the UN agencies it helped to establish.

We especially commend President Patton for his earnest efforts to forward this peaceful course, particularly his call for the resignation of Secretary Forrestal and his persistent attempt to encourage the development of the "point four" program along lines of true international cooperation.

There continue to be, however, certain very disturbing elements in our Government's foreign policy. Of these, the most alarming is the proposal for a North Atlantic security treaty, obviously to be followed by extensive arms aid to Europe. We cannot approve such a course. We believe it to be directly contrary to American precedent and history and to be a futile gesture. We cannot conceive of a situation arising under the proposed treaty where the United States would fight unless it would also fight in the absence of a treaty. Therefore, we view the treaty merely as a preliminary to the sending of arms to European nations. Specifically we make the following recommendations:

1. We endorse the President's "point four" program as he presented it in his Inaugural address:

"Fourth, we must embark on a bold new program for making the benefits of our scientific advances and industrial progress available for the improvement and growth of under-developed areas.

"More than half the people of the world are living in conditions approaching misery. Their food is inadequate. They are victims of disease. Their economic life is primitive and stagnant. Their poverty is a handicap and a threat both to them and to more prosperous areas,

"For the first time in history, humanity possesses the knowledge and the skill to relieve the suffering of these people.

"The United States is preeminent among nations in the development of industrial and scientific techniques. The material resources which we can afford to use for the assistance of other peoples are limited. But our imponderable resources in technical knowledge are constantly growing and are inexhaustible.

"I believe that we should make available to peace-loving peoples the benefits of our store of technical knowledge in order to help them realize their aspirations for a better life. And, in cooperation with other nations, we should foster capital investment in areas needing development.

"Our aim should be to help the free people of the world, through their own efforts, to produce more food, more clothing, more materials for housing, and more mechanical power to lighten their burdens.

"We invite other countries to pool their technological resources in this undertaking. Their contributions will be warmly welcomed. This should be a cooperative enterprise in which all nations work together through the United Nations and its specialized agencies wherever practicable. It must be a worldwide effort for the achievement of peace, plenty and freedom.

"With the cooperation of business, private capital, agriculture and labor in this country, this program can greatly increase the industrial activity in other nations and can raise substantially their standards of living.

"Such new economic developments must be devised and controlled to benefit the peoples of the areas in which they are established. Guaranties to the investor must be balanced by guaranties in the interest of the people whose resources and whose labor go into these developments.

"The old imperialism—exploitation for foreign profit—has no place in our plans. What we envisage is a program of development based on the concepts of democratic fair dealing.

"All countries, including our own, will greatly benefit from a constructive program for the better use of the world's human and natural resources. Experience shows that our commerce with other countries expands as they progress industrially and economically.

"Greater production is the key to prosperity and peace. And the key to greater production is a wider and more vigorous application of modern scientific and technical knowledge.

"Only by helping the least fortunate of its members to help themselves can the human family achieve the decent, satisfying life that is the right of all people.

"Democracy alone can supply the vitalizing force to stir the peoples of the world into triumphant action, not only against their human oppressors, but also against their ancient enemies, hunger, misery and despair."

We will continue to be opposed to exploitation of citizens and the economies of other countries by American corporations.

2. We deplore the sponsorship by the United States or by Russia of, or participation in regional or bilateral "defense" agreements, and believe such efforts will weaken the UN.

3. We endorse all efforts to strengthen the UN and its technical agencies, and approve such movements as those looking toward a constitutional world federation with defined and limited powers.

4. We again insist that aid to other countries should be channeled through and administered by specialized agencies of the United Nations including the FAO, the World Bank, World Health Organization and the International Trade Organization.

5. We urge that every effort be made to conclude an International Wheat Agreement and that, if its terms are at all reasonable, it be ratified by the Senate.

6. We ask the early initiation of discussions, under the auspices of FAO, looking toward the negotiation of other international commodity agreements.

7. We favor the early approval by this Nation of the Charter of the International Trade Organization, as well as approval of the pending proposal for extension of International trade agreements authority.

8. We urge international control of the Ruhr on such a basis that all European countries will have equal access to the products of the Ruhr. We further urge that policies be put into effect which will eliminate all cartel and Nazi influence in German economic affairs. United States administration in Germany should be immediately transferred to civilian hands.

9. We urge that the President, through the State Department, assume full responsibility for administering our foreign policy, with emphasis on political diplomacy to the end that military-banker influence in shaping our foreign policy be completely eliminated. We especially urge that the National Security Council be divested of its overriding influence in the administration of our foreign policy.

MADISON, WIS., May 13, 1949.

HON. TOM CONNALLY,
Chairman, Foreign Relations Committee,
The Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As we are unable to avail ourselves of the privilege of being in Washington to testify on May 17, we take this opportunity to appeal to you and your fellow committee members to reject the North Atlantic Pact. There are many reasons why we feel that the United States should not be part of this alliance, but will name just a few for your consideration.

First, even if the pact is a defensive measure, it is an attempt to freeze the social structure of a large portion of the world. The nations that have embraced the Soviet ideology have done so because the old order proved itself impotent. Power alone cannot defeat an idea as the Chinese fiasco so convincingly demonstrates.

Second, the recent accord on the Berlin problem makes it imperative that the United States make no move that might indicate bad faith in the coming Foreign Ministers' Conference. The tension can be further relaxed by mutual compromise at the conference table.

Third, this inclusion of Italy seems to verify the suspicion of Russia that it is a plot to further contain her. This is especially true with the emphasis the pact puts on armaments.

Fourth, and probably the most disastrous aspect the pact presents, is that it writes the obituary of the United Nations. There is no longer any choice for small nations but to align themselves with one or the other rival big powers. The one-world dream of Wendell Willkie and Franklin Roosevelt can never materialize in a world divided into two hostile, frightened blocks.

Fifth, in our discussions with many of our friends, we find they resent the indiscriminate waste of our wealth to prolong the regime of Chiang Kai-shek. They fear the Atlantic Pact is a similar venture that can only end in ignominious failure. Our understanding of the pact justifies their conclusions with the additional factor that world war is much more possible in the European situation.

Respectfully,

ELIZABETH AND MERL SHIPMAN.

SOCIAL SERVICE EMPLOYEES' UNION

LOCAL 19, UNITED OFFICE AND PROFESSIONAL WORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO

NEW YORK 16, N. Y., May 17, 1949.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,
Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: The enclosed statement of this union's position on the North Atlantic Pact is being submitted in accordance with your telegram of May 16.

This union is composed of over 5,000 professional, office, and maintenance employees in private and nonprofit agencies, and represents the thinking of many other white-collar workers in this field, who have become increasingly concerned over our country's adoption of a program of rearmament, rather than one of meeting welfare needs. We will watch closely the results of these hearings and strongly urge that the position taken in our enclosed statement be adopted by the administration in Senate debate.

We further urge that you personally, will use your good offices to ensure a vote against ratification of the North Atlantic Pact.

Sincerely yours,

HELEN S. MANGOLD, President.

STATEMENT OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT

The Social Service Employees' Union, which we represent, is composed of people trained and dedicated to the principle of rendering service to the individual. We are concerned at the growing numbers of our clients who suffer the deprivations of such basic life necessities as adequate working conditions, decent housing and health facilities, ample food, provisions for child care and training, healthy play facilities for young children, care of the aged, and among our own members, a denial of old-age survivors, and unemployment insurance.

We cannot believe that the emphasis in our foreign and domestic policy for rearmaments and the intervention in the sovereign affairs of other states is meeting the needs of the people of this country.

We cannot believe that the North Atlantic Pact will provide either peace of mind or body for the people of this country.

We cannot believe that a Federal budget which in 1949, allowed only 6 percent for welfare needs, and which next year, if this pact is ratified, will in all probability eliminate even this inadequate sum, is concerned with the well-being of the people of this country.

We cannot help but question why the United Nations Charter, which adequately provides for the handling of all international questions is bypassed today by some of the very same nations which were instrumental in establishing the United Nations. Examination of the United Nations Charter shows that article 24, for example, rests the right to determine the evidence of a threat to peace primarily in the Security Council. Article 51 of the Charter provides that if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, no act of individual or collective self-defense may be taken until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain peace and security. Articles 53, section 1, of the Charter provides that no enforcement action under regional agreements or agencies shall be taken without the authority of the Security Council, except when such measures are taken against an enemy state. The term "enemy state" is further defined in this article as applied to any state which during the Second World War had been an enemy of any signatories of the Charter.

We cannot help but question why a former enemy state (Italy), and one which aided and certainly gave comfort to our enemies, although ostensibly neutral (Portugal), have been selected as allies, while a nation which suffered some of the severest attacks of fascism (the Soviet Union) and fought back so heroically that the people of the world pledged themselves to undying gratitude, was not invited to join in this agreement. The excuse that this is a regional agreement, thereby forbidding the admission of the Soviet Union, is proven false in article 10 of the pact which provides for the subsequent admission of other European states.

We cannot help but question why a foreign policy which has cost this Nation billions of dollars, which has proved itself bankrupt, and which has at no time since its inception, in the form of the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall plan, proved its ability to either aid in world reconstruction or to achieve world peace, is still being pursued.

We cannot help but question why the signatories of this pact are returning to the anachronisms of regional agreements and "little ententes" when history since the First World War has taught us that peace can only be secured effectively through world organization.

We cannot help but question the necessity for the existence of such an agreement as the North Atlantic Pact with its veiled threats, when only recently, direct negotiations with the Soviet Union succeeded in doing what no amount of sabre-rattling in the past year has achieved, namely the lifting of the Berlin blockade.

We cannot help but question therefore, whether the gentlemen who are sponsoring the North Atlantic Pact really have as their objective the establishment of world peace.

We are forced to conclude from examination of our foreign policy in the years since the Second World War, first, that nowhere in the world, particularly not in our country or in the Soviet Union, do the people want another war. Second, that signatories of the pact have been carrying out government without representation. Third, that the effects on the people in this country and throughout the world of such an alliance, can only be increased deprivation. Fourth, that our support of defunct, militaristic states such as exist in Greece, and which existed until recently in China, will only succeed in costing us untold billions of dollars but will not succeed in stemming the battle of those people for democratic governments. Fifth, that the stock piling of atomic weapons is creating a stock pile of ill-will for this country throughout the world. Sixth, that the exclusion from any international agreements of a whole group of nations whose philosophies happen to differ from those prevalent in the United States, is in itself an act of aggression on our part. Seventh, that because of all the foregoing, the North Atlantic Pact is not designed for the peaceful solution of world problems, but rather one which can precipitate the world into war at any moment. Eighth, that such a pact will mean many more years of privation and fear for the entire world.

We have it within our power now, today, to prevent still greater damage than has already been done to the successful functioning of the United Nations and the principle of one world living in peace and freedom, which was the heritage of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. We urge you not to ratify the North Atlantic Pact.

STATEMENT BY CHRISTIAN F. RENDEIRO OF SOUTH WINDSOR, CONN.

MR. CHAIRMAN. I am an American citizen of Portuguese birth. I requested permission to testify on the Atlantic Pact, as it affects Portugal, because I feel that neglect to consider and understand the prevalent conditions in that country might be detrimental to the welfare of our democratic Nation. When I first came to the United States I was under the wing of my oldest brother who had assumed responsibility for my bringing up, after the death of my father. It was with him, too, that I returned to Portugal, but the taste of freedom was too sweet for a young man to forget, and so, against the wishes of my family, I immigrated to the United States where I soon began the process of becoming an American citizen. While in that process, and trying to convince my family that I had become a convert to the democratic American way of life, and would renounce my Portuguese citizenship, the United States was attacked and war was declared. I volunteered through the draft board, the only agency that could take me before I had completed the process of citizenship. A month after my induction, the regular issuance of certificates included my final papers. I served in the Army from the first months of 1942 to the first months of 1947, when I was honorably discharged with the rank of major. I shall be honored to serve again whenever necessary. It is only natural, therefore, that I should be most interested and better informed on the issues relating to the affairs of the two countries than the average citizen. I cannot say that I am impartial in my concern for the people of Portugal, since my affection for them is deeply rooted, and it grieves me enormously to know that a great majority of them are today some of the most unhappy people of the world, and that some actions of the United States might have been a contributing force to that condition.

Through my investigations I have been able to find that there is less knowledge of the conditions in Portugal than perhaps any other civilized country of the world; and that the veil of service is not completely accidental, but rather a well planned technique used to further policies that cannot withstand the light of scrutiny.

May I, then, Mr. Chairman, take but a few moments to high light the conditions of Portugal, in order that we might more readily understand and decide the results that mutual membership of Portugal and the United States in the Atlantic Pact might have.

Portugal is a dictatorship, entirely authoritarian, and a corporative state. The dictatorship has been in power since 1926. Marshal Carmona, who is President, functioning in the same manner as King Emanuel to Italy under Mussolini, gave his views to the Secretary of Propaganda, Mr. Antonio Ferro, as follows: "Elections, a falsification of public opinion; voters, a bunch of reeling drunkards." Mr. Ferro, in turn, defined the Estado Novo—New State—as: "General Carmona is the dictatorship, Dr. Salazar the dictator."

The transformation of Portugal into a Fascist state with most of the characteristics of the Italian regime of Mussolini was completed about 1933, 5 years after Salazar was called to office. This transformation was accomplished with the strong backing of the army and the church, and both had many of its members in official positions, especially in small towns, as heads of executive boards that took the place of the elected municipal councils.

It was under this dictatorship that the military coup to overthrow the Republic of Spain was planned. At Estoril, a fashionable resort outside of Lisbon, General Sanjurjo, who was the leader of the coup, made all the plans. Fate was not very kind to him, however; he was killed in a plane accident while taking off from a military base near Lisbon. After that General Franco assumed command. From the start the Portuguese dictatorship gave substantial help to Franco, and even sent troops under the command of Jorge Botelho Moniz; these troops were known as "Viriatos." To the officers who were killed while commanding these troops, awards of compensation were given as if they had died for their fatherland. At the end of the Civil War, the Spanish refugees of the Republican Army who sought asylum in Portugal, after handing over their weapons to the frontier guards, were returned to the Falangists of Franco and killed at sight.

Dictator Salazar has defined the corporative state, in a speech to a convention of the União Nacional—the only party legally authorized in the country—as: "Antidemocratic, antiliberal, antiparlimentary." In the early portion of the dictatorship not only was the one-party system established but also the Legião Portuguesa, modeled after the black shirts of Mussolini * * * in Portugal, however, the shirts turned green. The youth were formed into youth groups under the Mocidade Portuguesa. After the defeat of the Fascist powers the uniform and insignia went out of vogue, and were not shown to the buyers who must be impressed and carry dollars in their purses.

Most of our information on Portugal must be based on the little items that are published now and then, or on the purposeful propaganda that is planted wherever convenient. It is important to remember that there is a strict censorship in Portugal, like in Russia, and the Secretariat of Propaganda is very well aware of the fields which are most likely to influence the greatest amount toward the objective. One of the strongest impressions that the dictatorship has wanted to make is that it is a devout adherent of the principles of the Catholic doctrines. Anyone, however, that would take the trouble to examine carefully both the words and deeds would have no trouble recognizing the hypocritical conduct of these fanatics. Our present Holy Pope and the princes of the church have always proclaimed liberty as a gift of God, that only God may take away. And the magnificent concept that is fundamental with all who give any consideration to justice: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these you have done it unto Me."

It is hard to believe that public officials who allow the functioning of concentration camps for political prisoners, sent there very often without even the sham of a put-up trial; who at the infamous Tarrafal, in the Cape Verde Islands, are allowed to keep people interned until they die with tropical diseases, or for want of attention, for the sole crime that they dared to fight for the liberty of the human soul, which we cherish above all, can find any shelter under the beautiful doctrines of the Catholic Church. Can it be that these officials who take part in executing the orders of the dictatorship firmly believe that they are acting in accord with the preachings of the church? If so, then they are practicing the shameful tactics of the inquisitors of the past, to the shame of all of us.

In 1946, Dr. Ferreira Soares, of Nogueira da Regedoura, while attending his patients, in his office, was killed cold-bloodedly in the presence of his patients "for resisting arrest." He was being arrested for the awful crime of disagreeing with the dictatorship about the manner in which social attention should be given to the sick. The secret-police agent who shot the doctor was acquitted cum laude.

During World War II the dictatorship passed through various phases of admiration. At first it was all for the Fascists, and proclaimed openly its feelings for rapid and complete victory for them. When things began to look darker, it shouted neutrality. The kind of neutrality which permitted enemy ships and submarines to use its coast line thereby facilitating our ships and men to fall prey to their attacks; the kind of neutrality which permitted its army to help the Fascist spies operate in Portuguese East Africa to the extent that we had to send our own intelligence men down there to take measures which would stop the heavy toll we were suffering; the kind of neutrality which forced us to prepare and even name an invasion force to occupy the Azores. The Lifebelt Operation was not fulfilled only because Britain was able to call on its alliance with Portugal. Finally an agreement was virtually imposed on Portugal whereby we obtained military air facilities in the Azores.

The victory of the Allies, even though joyfully received by the Portuguese people, was not a happy moment for the dictatorship. In fact, when Hitler was announced dead, the dictatorship ordered all official buildings to display the Portuguese flag at half mast, in official mourning. But the Allies won, therefore the dictatorship had to give some signs of recognition to the reality of the moment. When in 1945 there were some elections, it authorized "sufficient liberty" which meant that the opposition would be allowed to say or write only that which the dictatorship thought was enough to proclaim that "liberty" in fact was allowed. While there was a feeling that with the victory of the allied cause, and the first indication that the dictatorship was trembling, the opposition felt that a sound, democratic beginning might be made. At this time, however, the United States sent units of its fleet to pay homage to the Portuguese Duce, which proved to him that his conduct of the affairs of the state were quite in harmony with the wishes of at least some elements of the armed forces in the United States. The effect was instantaneous: the "sufficient liberty" was withdrawn, the leaders of the opposition were arrested, or dismissed from public office or the universities. General José Godinho, former commander in chief of the Portuguese forces in Azores during the most critical period of the war, was arrested in April 1947 and charged with conspiracy against the "legal government." Before he and other superior officers were transferred to the very old, damp, cold, fortress of Caxias, from the hospital for mental diseases where he had been kept a prisoner, two doctors certified that, due to his advanced age, and precarious health, his transfer might be fatal. Nevertheless, the government carried out its decision. He soon died. A scandal developed, and it reached the highest levels of indignation among the Catholic hierarchy since the widow of the general was a fervent practicing Catholic. She brought suit against the dictatorship's Minister of War, Lt. Col. Santos Costa, charging him with murder of her husband. In 1948 both she and her attorney were arrested for daring to take such a step. Well, that just about brought on a Government crisis, and the situation became so alarming that it came up for discussion before the National Assembly, an organ of hand-picked supporters of the dictatorship.

Of particular interest were the copies of letters written by the same Minister of War to General Godinho, during his command at Azores, in which unkind remarks were made of the English and the Americans. These letters were circulated clandestinely by the friends of the widow. It was indeed a shameful, serious condition for the Minister of War to be in, at a time when it was necessary to put on a good show for the leading allies of the democratic world. Precisely at this moment a United States military mission was dispatched by air to Lisbon to decorate the same Lt. Col. Santos Costa, the Minister of War, at an elaborate public ceremony that was widely used by the Government to show to all interested the degree of prestige held by the Portuguese dictatorship from the standard bearer of democracy.

General José Godinho was already in the grave, no embarrassing reply would be forthcoming * * *

The first agreement between the dictatorship of Portugal and the United States was obtained in 1944, and provided facilities on the island of Santa Maria. This agreement expired after the end of hostilities. It was followed by an agreement of June 2, 1946, that lasted 2 years and provided a base at Lagens on the island of Terceira. The latest agreement was signed February 2, 1948, and will last until 1953.

The admiration shown by the dictatorship to the United States is a simple, matter-of-fact approach: It needs dollars.

In close cooperation with the dictatorship of Spain, it set its course along a line that would give it the most results: even though it would not receive any financial consideration at first, in the end the harvest would be reaped. Having made handsome profits out of the war selling to both sides—before formal war almost completely to the Fascists—it could not pretend being out of funds. Instead it got special consideration in the purchase of strategic, scarce items of which it had dire need. Today, however, having played the part and acted in the most popular trend, it could take courage and demand financial help through the Marshall plan.

One other impression that the dictatorship tries to leave with the casual citizen, is that the dictator is a financial wizard who has been able to keep his budget balanced. But again, those who take the trouble to examine under the surface find that the rosy apple on the outside is really rotten to the core in the inside. The important thing concerning the welfare of any country has to be judged on the basis of the standard of living, the percentage of literacy, and the general mortality rate. To examine those phases of life under the dictatorship one has to conclude that the budget is balanced only on paper. Half of the population is still illiterate, and even though the dictatorship wants to impress all with the number of new schools that it has built, it never mentions that the children, very often, are kept out of school in order to go begging for alms with their parents. In over 20 years in power the great financial wizard has not been able to find a way to stop the thousands of beggars who go from house to house asking for alms while exposing the most nauseating sores from cancer, malnutrition, syphilis, etc.; these afflictions are more developed in the older people, therefore the children are used to call the attention of the passers-by to the pitiful sights, especially when the begging is done in the market places or the streets. For the sake of the tourists such begging is forbidden in the capital and important cities.

Trade-unions do not exist. Wages are set by guilds, whose leaders are appointed from the ruling class of the industry concerned, by the dictatorship, and lag far behind the very high cost of living with the result that workers earn hardly enough to keep body and soul together. The extravagant and useless spending of money in military and other uses to keep the dictatorship in power has brought the country to a very bad financial status, so much so that there have been serious indications that a number of banks would close unless the Government stepped in to keep them going a little longer. Such economy, whose basic goal is not the general welfare of the people and the country, is financially unsound and certainly not worthy of any capital risk.

The amount asked by the dictatorship from ECA is not yet certain, but it ranges from $640,000,000 for a 4-year period to $10,000,000 for the first year.

In the recent months, every time the dictatorship has had a chance to put on a marionette show of sufficient liberty to impress the western democracies it has done so. The last occasion was in February when it held the so-called election to choose the president. The result was as expected when the still Minister of War, Col. Santos Costa, ordered for the entire week of the elections the most extensive air war games ever to be staged, to culminate in the capital the exact day of the election. Marshal Carmona naturally continues to be President.

The campaign was good for one thing, it allowed the dictatorship to say at every opportunity that it favored the idea of the Atlantic defense pact as a weapon against Soviet Russia. May I say here, Mr. Chairman, that all statements that I have seen and read from the anticommunistic democratic opposition in Portugal clearly indicated that the democratic forces of the people of Portugal are wholehearted in favor of a union of democratic states opposed to the aggressive design of Soviet Russia. The dictatorship, however, used a double-edged weapon. At home it said that it had to be maintained in power since the opposition was controlled by the Communists; while abroad, especially in the United States, its spokesmen shouted high and loud that the Government of Portugal had been one of the first to oppose Soviet Russia, had consistently fought Communists, and today there was no Communist danger in Portugal. * * * magic, now you see it, now you don't. Recently, the dictatorship of Portugal has been able to find the United States at its side whenever it needed to be propped up. With serious economic troubles at home, with a vast opposition not only at home but amongst the immigrants who are in close touch with the situation and contribute a large amount in tourism, revenue from films, and upkeep of families back in Portugal, it needs the economic help of ERP, and the new arms and prestige of the Atlantic Pact, to which we have accepted it as a signatory, paving the way for its admission to the United Nations.

That's the background, Mr. Chairman. The present-day realities are much simpler. The dictatorship of Portugal was and continues to be a government that has not the slightest consideration for the democratic ideals which we proclaim throughout the world. It continues to suppress all freedoms: Religion, speech, assembly, and representation—not to mention from want and from fear.

Morally, the dictatorship of Portugal could not have been accepted in the Atlantic Pact, if the aims of the pact were the basis of admission, since it states: "They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law."

Ideologically, it is a government that could easily contaminate the good harvest that we have collected in the Atlantic Pact. Its opposition to communism is flagrantly dishonest since it practices that which it condemns. By suppressing everything except fascism, it has actually encouraged the increase of communism to the extent that while those ranks were almost void of any membership during the parliamentary republican government, today the clandestine Communist force is considerable, and full of tension and possibilities for increase.

Strategically, we already have the bases by agreement. And if we did not have them the alliance that it holds with Britain would always make those bases available to our most important ally. We need not buy those bases at the high price demanded, in prestige, compromise of ideals, and weapons.

Politically, the dictatorship, which now professes sympathy with the aims of the United States, if faced with a development of nationalistic, corporative, Fascist movements in France, Italy, or Germany, in addition to its ally Franco in Spain, would immediately abandon its camouflage, and again parade its youth and legions in the green shirts, now in moth balls, as was done in the recent past, and paying tribute to the memory of Hitler and Mussolini.

There is indeed, Mr. Chairman, a great need to oppose communism, with even more vigor than they use to spread their gospel of hate. We must strengthen the bond of all democracies everywhere, and by the constant preaching and practicing of dynamic democracy, expose the evils of tyranny wherever it exists. Our greatest weapon in this struggle is never to compromise with principles, our democratic principles.

In asking Portugal to be a signatory to the Atlantic Pact we have made a grave error. Let's admit it, and take the necessary steps to correct it before it embarrasses us, as follows:

Firstly, deny any arms to the dictatorship of Portugal under the North Atlantic Pact. Such arms would be used primarily against the democratic people of Portugal whose respect and friendship we must seek first of all.

Secondly, refuse to grant, as a bad investment, economically, and morally, any ECA funds to a dictatorship which has shown regression in all phases of human endeavor, unlike the democracies that fought at our side and are steadily showing progress and a dynamic urge to develop and give substance to the basic liberties of man. If aid is given let the conditions be so rigid that the people of Portugal will get the full benefit of the grant, and with it, the support of the American people in their struggle for freedom.

We have too often compromised with the tyrannical dictatorship of Portugal. Let's not compromise again.

STATEN ISLAND, NEW YORK CITY, May 9, 1949.

Hon. TOM CONNALLY,

Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: I will greatly appreciate your favor in reporting and recording for the record the following relative to the hearings on the proposed North Atlantic Treaty.

Although I agree with the North Atlantic Treaty in principle, I strongly oppose its ratification in its present form.

If this proposed treaty be amended and streamlined along spiritual and moral lines (with particular reference to art. 5) it would revolutionize the world's search for an effective peace formula to handle the aggressor nation problem.

The substance of my proposed amendment for harnessing the power of religion to prevent war and to bring into captivity the threat of "dictatorship by the few" is as follows:

PROPOSED AMENDMENT

After the treaty has been in force for 5 years, any party shall automatically cease to be a party which fails to submit proof that its political structure has been amended to provide that it is mandatory to give its people the right to vote in a referendum for peace or war except in the case of direct invasion and except for the use of joint military power by the parties of this treaty.

Adoption of the above proposal is the kind of ammunition the Russian people need to liquidate the members of the Politburo.

It is about time that the world scrapped "peace and war making by the few" for "peace making by the multitudes" as exemplified in my proposal.

Physical might can win wars, but only right ideas can win the peace.

Sincerely submitted,

CLIFFORD R. JOHNSON.

CONCERNING COMMUNISM, THE ATLANTIC PACT, AND CHINA, ETC.

Communism claims that it is a system of dialectical materialism; consequently, it is antagonistic at once to God, morality, and to all the nobilities of life. Grounded in the principle of class antagonism, it looks upon class strife as normal. Dedicated exclusively to the dictatorship of the proletariat, it makes use of any procedures that will promote this end—lying, conspiracy, murder, revolution. Its schools train men in all these forms of immorality and violence.

Both in principle and practice communism robs men of all the rights and dignities of life. It dictates the conclusions of science. It forbids men free knowledge, shutting away from them the facts of life. It regiments men both in residence, in work, in travel, and in knowledge. It practices falsehood, deceiving its own people. It brutalizes men. It liquidates men.

The several Communist states cannot be looked upon as responsible governments, for both in principle and in leadership they are dedicated only to the dictatorship of the proletariat; and they pursue this goal with complete disregard both for truth and honor. Within the structure of the United Nations Russia has been guilty of such continuous abuse of the veto power as to make that world organization almost impotent. Her notorious effort to retard economic recovery in Europe, and her ruthless blockade of Berlin are illustrations of the dishonesty of her purpose. The present Communist clamor for world peace is evidently an hypocrisy, as the drive of the Communist armies now developing in China makes evident. What world communism wants is not peace but an impotent democracy. Communism is unrelaxing in its devotion to world-wide revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Because these things are true it must be evident that the only kind of world peace at present possible is an armed world peace. A peace of understanding and of honorable cooperation is not possible with communism, because communism does not recognize the authority either of truth or honor. The leaders of the free world have a right to the gratitude of all Christian and free men for their notable achievement in accomplishing the North Atlantic Pact. This and the increasing stability of Europe, due to the healing influence of the Marshall plan, has greatly enlarged the present world prospect of peace.

We regard with grave anxiety the present do-nothing policy of our Government in China. As American free men we cannot afford to allow communism to overwhelm and dominate that great eastern people. America has been traditionally China's friend; and we feel that this historic friendship should be retained and implemented at the present hour. As Bishop Fred P. Corson has pointed out to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, an American investment of $500,000,000 would probably be enough to turn the tide, and enable the free men in China to defend and maintain their freedom. If we fail to do this and China is overrun by communism, it will mean the same pattern of tyranny and Christian repression with which we are now familiar in eastern Europe. It will also mean, later, a greatly enlarged American investment and in Asia, for we will be under the necessity of organizing the defenses both of Japan and of the Philippines.

As churchmen we are, of course, deeply committed to peace. We firmly believe in the peaceful intentions of our own Government and of the free peoples of western Europe who are united with us in the defense of our Christian liberties.

We point out that communism as an international conspiracy to destroy free government cannot be regarded a political party organized under a national constitution. Communist office seekers must be regarded as leading conspirators pledged to overthrow our institutions. Manifestly it is no violation of our American principles to refuse the facilities of our Government to the work of accomplishing its own overthrow. Daniel Webster said more than 100 years ago that no national instrument ever includes a provision whereby it, itself, can be destroyed.

We order that this expression of our convictions and confidence be sent to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretaries of both Houses of Congress, and to both the House and Senate Committees on Foreign Relations.

STATEMENT OF LADIES GARMENT CENTER, AMERICAN LABOR PARTY, NEW YORK, N. Y.

We wish to go on record opposing the ratification of the North Atlantic Pact as an instrument for war, and not for defense. This pact also will empty our pockets to the tune of billions of dollars over and above what is being spent for armaments in the national budget.

RESOLUTION REGARDING ATLANTIC DEFENSE PACT, ADOPTED BY THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, FEBRUARY 1, 1949

Whereas the constitution of this association provides, among other things, for the advancement of the science of jurisprudence and promotion of the administration of justice; and

Whereas by resolution adopted February 24, 1948, this association recognized that these objectives cannot be advanced effectively in countries lacking economic and financial stability; and

Whereas, this association by such resolution did accordingly endorse in principle aid by the United States for European recovery; and

Whereas such recovery cannot be effectively advanced if fear of aggression exists in such countries and if the security of this country and other peace-loving, democratic countries is not firmly established: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this association endorses in principle:

(a) The establishment, by constitutional process, of regional and collective arrangements based on continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, in accordance with Senate Resolution 239, Eightieth Congress (the Vandenberg resolution) and within the framework of the United Nations;

(b) Provision by the United States of military armament, supplies and advice to those areas and countries whose security is of primary importance to our own and whose efforts to maintain freedom and independence cannot be accomplished unless fear of aggression against them is removed.

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of the resolution adopted by the house of delegates of the American Bar Association.

STATEMENT OF MRS. BJORN BJORNSEN, NEW YORK CITY

To the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, re the North Atlantic Pact:

As a wife, and mother of two grown sons, I am conscious of my duties and privileges of citizenship in a matter of such importance as the North Atlantic Pact.

The newspapers and radio have established one thing clearly. We will spend $1,130,000 immediately for European armaments. That means we intend to go into the armaments business in a big way. We also, if the pact is passed and implemented, will have to establish Army personnel to handle the arms we export to the European countries which have already indicated their own inadequacy in this respect. What will our boys with guns do in Europe while waiting for an aggressive act? What will the alleged aggressor (the Soviet Union) be doing while our boys with arms stand around waiting for an aggressive act? It seems to me that when you make this type of preparation—and history attests this as a fact—you embark on a blood bath. It resolves nothing.

Is our policy to fight communism so determined that we hope to exterminate it by a war? I am not sure that we have raised our children to this single purpose.

It has been stated that the purpose of the North Atlantic Pact is to increase our security and chances for world peace. But the net effect on our youth—and I speak from personal experience—is to heighten their expectancy of participation in a war in the near future.

I also note that a peace parley is imminent. I remember peace parleys with the Soviet Union during the war period which produced many fruitful results despite ideological differences. We approached them then with a determination to reach agreement. Do we hope to reach agreement when we hang a sword via the North Atlantic Pact over the conference table?

If the Soviet Union is actually threatening Europe, the small initial allotment for arms, ammunition, and personnel will certainly not be adequate to fortify all the signers of the pact. How much more are we prepared to sacrifice for a military settlement of differences?

We wives and mothers have learned to be realistic. We know what it costs to raise a family. The forthcoming white paper of our State Department indicates that the President will have emergency powers to send additional amounts as may be necessary. If any part of our promises to the cosigners are to be carried out, these emergency powers will not long be waiting to be exercised. Where will it lead?

It seems to me our diplomats and statesmen who found a way to agree with the Soviet Union in wartime have enough sagacity and equipment to do so now. If American business is fearful of communism, it can find more practical measures of combating it. Why not try doing business with Russia?

From where I sit, the North Atlantic Pact can mean nothing but war. I am against war for any reasons promulgated on the present world scene. I am therefore against the pact, and every family in our country who sees it this way is against the pact.

STATEMENT BY THE INTERNATIONAL UNION OF MINE, MILL, AND SMELTER WORKERS ON THE PROPOSED NORTH ATLANTIC PACT, PRESENTED TO THE SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

For many years trade-union leaders in the United States, in contrast with their brothers in other countries of the world, confined their activities to the on-the-job problems of the membership. Wages, hours, and working conditions—these were the proper concern of the trade-unionists—other phases of the political and economic lives of the members were passed over. And the politicians were happy about this narrow division of interest and responsibility.

But we learned, slowly and the hard way, that it was easy to lose in the political area what had been so bitterly and expensively won on the picket line and in collective bargaining. We are still learning this lesson. The recent action of the House of Representatives in refusing to repeal the vicious Taft-Hartley Act taught many more American workers the need for the most active participation in the political life of our country.

Needless to say, labor legislation, social security, housing, even taxation, have gradually been accepted as legitimate concerns of trade-unions. Only in foreign policy has the old hands-off attitude persisted.

And here we meet again and again the attitude that the relations between our own country and the other countries of the world are complex and intricate, not the fit concern of the ordinary citizen uneducated in these matters.

The International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers absolutely rejects this kind of a dismissal of our interest and our imperative responsibility to participate in the formulation of the foreign policy of our country.

The fact is that for too long the striped-pants boys have had a field day leading us down the rosy lanes of their own choosing. And the result has been that we suddenly find our country on the wrong side, and we use wrong advisedly, of an issue; taking a stand, and supporting reactionary or corrupt regimes in a manner that is a complete contradiction of everything our country has ever stood for either at home or abroad.

It's about time a few people in Washington began to understand that the noble aims and aspirations of our foreign policy that are so eloquently expressed by them in speeches will never be realized through corrupt military dictation in South America, or tottering semi-Fascist regimes in Europe, or disintegrated feudal states in the Far East. These aims cannot be realized while antagonizing and alienating the workers and the common people all over the world, because, as much as some high-placed persons try to forget it, most of the people of the world still sweat, and work with their hands to earn a livelihood. And these common working people must be our friends, not our enemies.

The members of our union are such working people. They are people who desperately want peace, who suffer most the privations and horrors of war. And they are people who see in this Atlantic Pact now before this committee the preparations for another war.

Frankly, to us the Atlantic Pact represents the drift to war. We see in the pact the refusal on the part of the leaders of our country to try to work out the differences we have with the Soviet Union, and we admit this is a tough job to do, for the easy alternative of setting up a series of relations with other countries which inevitably and logically can end in the most destructive war in the history of mankind.

We wish to discuss some aspects of the pact and the climate within which it is being presented to the American people. It is these facts which have convinced us that the pact can mean nothing but evil and disaster for the American people. Our examination of the facts leads us to conclude that the Atlantic Pact increases the risk of war, endangers our security, and lowers our standard of living.

It is our conviction, simply put, that the Atlantic Pact subverts the United Nations. And in doing this, the pact is undermining and weakening, if not destroying, mankind's best hope for peace.

There is no denying the fact that people everywhere in the world look to the UN today as the only organization of mankind that can maintain the peace and steadily decrease the risk of war.

Dr. Herbert V. Evatt, of Australia, and president of the General Assembly of the UN said all this quite explicitly and clearly last month when he pointed out in a speech:

"The peoples of the world have faith in the United Nations. It is their chief instrument in the struggles to create a world based upon justice. Nothing else is a substitute for it; nothing else can be a substitute for it."

Our own national organization in its convention as well as the National CIO has repeatedly passed resolutions endorsing the United Nations and urging the further strengthening of this organization.

Although we do not hold ourselves to be experts on the Charter of the UN, nevertheless we do feel that any group of American citizens who sees so much of the future of the world in the United Nations, as we do, have the right and the responsibility to evaluate the Atlantic Pact in terms of what we know to be the terms of the UN Charter.

We have listed below six separate and distinct contradictions between the function and role in international affairs of the UN and the Atlantic Pact. In every instance the pact would abrogate to its members a unilateral role explicitly granted to the UN and its agencies through the Charter.

1. The UN Security Council is the only body authorized in international law to determine the existence of aggression or other threat to peace.

The Atlantic Pact permits unilateral determination by its members that an act of aggression has occurred or is threatened. At the San Francisco Conference in 1945, the United States specifically opposed any definition of aggression in the UN Charter.

2. The UN Security Council has exclusive authority under the Charter to enforce peace.

The pact directs its signatories to take "such individual and collective action, including the use of armed force, as each party considers necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic Pact area."

3. The UN Charter recognizes the inherent right of self-defense against armed attack until the Security Council can take action.

The pact uses this clause as a pretext to justify its authorization of unilateral military action.

4. The UN Charter permits use of regional arrangements to enforce peace, "provided that such arrangements * * * are consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations."

The pact covers parts of two hemispheres and three continents, hence is not regional. Its basic purpose, establishing a military bloc of states outside the UN, is wholly inconsistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

5. The UN Charter provides that "the Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies."

The pact provides that measures taken by its signatories shall be reported to the UN Security Council only after the event.

6. The Charter provides that "no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements * * * without the authorization of the Security Council."

THE ESSENCE OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT IS THE ASSERTED RIGHT OF ITS SIGNATORIES TO UNDERTAKE MILITARY AND OTHER MEASURES WITHOUT THE PRIOR AUTHORIZATION OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL

As disturbing as these specific points are is the more general retreat from the One World philosophy of the UN to the already discredited policy of big-power alliance. This committee is examining a pact which has as its aim the substitution of an alliance directed against the Soviet Union for a solution of international differences through a body whose sole purpose is to try to prevent war and reach solutions.

The San Francisco Conference clearly rejected the system of great-power alliances which has dominated international politics for centuries—and for centuries has resulted in nothing but war and destruction and suffering. The UN was born out of a search for a new and better world—and born out of the bitter awareness that the common people throughout the world had of the toll that World War II had taken.

The pact, on the other hand, appears to us as a calculated and carefully conceived plan to build a military alliance outside the UN. It is as clearly the result of thinking and planning which has given up any intention of permitting the UN to prove its worth.

In retrospect, the Atlantic Pact appears today as the latest step in the unfolding foreign policy of our country outside the UN.

The Greek-Turkish aid program, as Secretary of State Acheson has indicated, was the first step in the path that today has reached the pact now before you. And similarly the Marshall plan designed to instill "fighting spirit" in the western European countries and prevent their remaining neutral in the cold war was the second major step in this plan.

Because the pact establishes an alliance outside of UN, and because it is directed against one country or a group of countries, and because it is inextricably tied to a military-aid program and military planning, it inevitably increases the risk of war.

ATLANTIC PACT AND ARMAMENTS

No one denies that the approval of this pact will be followed by a demand that Congress appropriate funds for financing the rearmament of the countries that are party of the agreement. This is a military alliance pure and simple.

The billion dollars in military lend-lease proposed by the State Department is integral to the pact itself. With the approval of the pact we would be embarking our country on the most fantastic peacetime arms expenditure in world history. And toward what end? Can it be said honestly that all of this expenditure and planning has a peaceful objective? That's a hard one to swallow, either by an American worker or a worker in any other country of the world.

Incidentally, much has been made of the relatively small expenditure, so-called, $1,130,000,000, proposed by the State Department. We are being told that we're buying a cheap bargain.

Yet a recent analysis of this proposal reveals that it includes $452,000,000 for United States military equipment now on hand, and valued at 10 cents on the dollar. Thus, the actual value of the first installment instead of being slightly less than half a billion is actually closer to four and a half billion dollars at original cost. And at current replacement cost the value of these military items is probably closer to $8,000,000,000. (See United States News, May 6, 1949, pp. 5 and 11.)

It is deception of this kind, so potently aimed at not revealing to the American people the full extent of the military commitments already made that causes us to be doubly suspicious of all we can learn of this pact and its purposes.

To us one of the most disturbing, and revealing, features of the Atlantic Pact and its purposes is what it means in terms of Germany. It is already clear that German manpower and the Ruhr industrial power are being counted on to ease the strain on the United States economy, as some put it.

It is strikingly clear that the pact has no reference to the provisions in the UN Charter for regional arrangements, without the prior authorization of the Security Council, directed against any further German aggression. The Atlantic Pact makes no specific reference to Germany. And it is clear from what has been said here, and by leading political figures elsewhere that defense against German aggression is the last thing in the mind of the authors of the pact.

Moreover, the regional arrangement in which the pact relies in western Europe, the so-called Western Union, is explicitly based on the policy of rebuilding western Germany, utilizing the old pro-Nazi and militarist elements there.

This policy will inevitably come home to haunt every one of us.

We have presented to you but a few general aspects of the pact that strike us as being particularly frightening in their implications for world peace. Perhaps our approach is too simple, but we cannot help feeling that world peace is not found and maintained in military alliances and heavy armament programs. But we repeat this is what the ordinary American citizen thinks, and we have seen nothing to change our thinking or our conclusions on the Atlantic Pact.

FOREIGN POLICY AND JOBS

Behind the pact and the armament program that is its blood brother lurks the conviction that the cold-war foreign policy which produced the pact is good for American industry and the American economy generally.

Senator Ed Johnson put this succinctly when, in a recent talk before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States he contended that without the cold war the present economic situation in the United States really would be alarming. Senator Johnson concluded: "If Russia suddenly decided to be a good neighbor there would be hell to pay."

This is, to say the least, an undesirable foundation on which to build a program for jobs and security of the American working people. And we cannot stop with this statement. What we really have before us for consideration are alternatives, which path truly leads to security and jobs:

On the one hand there is the way of military alliances, pointed toward war, and totally destructive of the security of our workers if carried through to its logical conclusion. And if the "danger" of peace develops, certainly a program geared to military preparations can provide neither jobs nor the Fair Deal program to which the administration committed itself.

On the other hand there is the alternative to the Truman doctrine-Marshall plan which our union has supported, a United Nations program of economic aid and development and a determined effort by our country to seek the settlement of differences through the United Nations.

We would like to discuss these alternatives as they apply to the industries in which our members are employed.

EFFECTS OF ECA COLD-WAR PROGRAM ON JOBS AND PRODUCTION IN INDUSTRIES IN WHICH MEMBERS OF THE INTERNATIONAL UNION OF MINE, MILL, AND SMELTER WORKERS ARE EMPLOYED

The heavy armament program, stock piling and Marshall-plan aid to European countries are undoubtedly using large quantities of nonferrous metals and thereby, to some extent, cushioning cyclical contraction in demand.

The effects of the cold war on nonferrous metals markets must be weighed, however, against available alternatives which, in the long run, would undoubtedly create much greater demand for metals and minerals produced by mine-mill members.

A general relief and rehabilitation program administered by the United Nations would promote industrialization of all Europe, thereby building up more stable and larger markets for nonferrous metals.

A United Nations program would similarly open up vast new potential markets in eastern European countries, many of which are now attempting to develop their own basic industries.

Money now used on armaments could be put to better purposes on such vitally needed programs as increased housing and coordinated river valley development programs, both of which would require much greater amounts of basic nonferrous metals.

The known details on the effects of cold-war spending on mine-mill industries are presented below:

Through March 31, 1949, the Economic Cooperation Administration authorized purchases of $304.5 millions of nonferrous metals with Marshall-plan funds. Of this total, $204.2 millions had been actually shipped up to that time.

The greater bulk of Marshall-plan authorizations for purchases of nonferrous metals were to come from Canada and Latin America.

The high lights on ECA authorizations and shipments of nonferrous metals are as follows:

[In millions]

	Through Mar. 31, 1949
	Authorized	Shipped
All nonferrous metals.....	$304.5	$204.2
From United States.....	71.8	58.4
Copper.....	39.4	34.0
Zinc.....	18.0	12.4
Brass and bronze.....	5.0	4.0
Lead.....	2.0	2.0
From Canada.....	133.6	108.7
Copper.....	85.5	73.7
Zinc.....	21.4	17.0
Lead.....	28.8	16.0
Aluminum.....	68.1	58.3
From Latin America.....	70.1	48.4
Copper.....	30.1	23.7
Lead.....	17.7	8.1

From tenth report of the Public Advisory Board of the ECA.

The total amount of shipments of nonferrous metals from the United States ($38.8 million dollars) are less than half of amount spent on shipments of tobacco ($85.6 million dollars).

As declining purchases hit nonferrous markets more ECA purchases are being made in the United States at expense of Canadian producers (Northern Miner, May 5, 1949).

These figures alone do not, of course, reveal what would take place under the alternative program of encouraging trade with all countries operating through a United Nations program. But it is clear that additional metal markets are being blocked off by the United States policy of denying shipments to eastern European countries. Our union is directly concerned with the expansion of markets for both United States and Canadian products.

The United States News of January 21, 1949, reports:

"* * * United States exports to Russia and eastern Europe already are diminishing rapidly. Russia's share of United States exports, for example, are down from a monthly average of $12,400,000 in 1947 to $2,350,000 as a monthly average in 1948. Last year, Russia sold the United States about three times as much as the United States sold to Russia. United States exports to the Soviet sphere in 1948, as the chart shows, were far below the figures for 1947, lower still than in 1946 when the UNRRA was sending American aid to eastern Europe.

"Question for United States businessmen is how much longer it will be worth the risk and the effort to handle American exports to the Soviet sphere, how much longer Russia and her satellites will sell more to the United States than they get in exchange."

Similarly, Marshall plan objectives retard development of a staple European economy and promotion of a free flow of trade among European countries.

A recent United States News World Report article "Dollars Stay Scarce Despite ERP" in the May 13, 1949, issue reports opinion of Swiss bankers on ERP operations:

"* * * The Swiss assert that ERP countries tend to concentrate on imports that will make life easier, giving second billing to the things that will help to build up national economies. For example, they report that gasoline being brought in under ERP is being used largely for private automobiles rather than for major industrial uses. Emphasis, they argue, should be on imports of industrial equipment, not raw materials, semifinished or finished goods."

On promotion of inter-European trade, this article also says:

"* * * The trouble, as Swiss bankers size it up, is that there is more competition than cooperation among European countries. These countries scramble for United States dollars—the only currency that can be used in buying American goods. Little evidence is seen by these men that the ERP countries, as a means of opening broader markets, are getting together to lower barriers that prevent a free flow of money and of goods. The view of the ERP beneficiaries, as interpreted in Switzerland, seems to be that United States will go on putting up dollars to keep industry afloat, so why do all the changing that probably should be done?"

The effect of trade barriers on sale of nonferrous metals was commented upon by the trade journal Engineering and Mining Journal in their February 1949 issue:

"TRADE REVIVAL SLOW

"Progress in reviving trade between countries in Europe that in the past have been important consumers of copper was painfully slow. As 1948 ended, it was apparent that currency depreciation threatened to further limit the movement of products containing copper from one European country to another. In fact, some of the increase in stocks of refined copper that occurred in the last quarter of the year could be traced to the chaotic economic situation that deepened with the unrest over establishing stable mediums of exchange."

The ECA program, through its Strategic Materials Division, facilitates control of foreign sources of mineral supply by American monopolies thereby enabling these monopoly groups to play off colonial labor against American labor to their own advantage.

In the long run, this can be one of the simple results of the cold-war program most injurious to our membership.

That this is a realistic appraisal of the perspective we face is indicated by the functions of the Strategic Materials Division of ECA. These functions are:

1. To expedite transfer of materials from ECA countries and possessions to United States stock piles.
2. To use ECA funds to expand production of needed materials.
3. To assure United States capital fair treatment in buying of materials or development of new sources of production. This is accomplished through requiring ECA recipients to negotiate schedules of minimum materials available to the United States, and also through pledges by these countries that American enterprise will receive equal footing with their own nationals in the development of new sources.

ECA countries are also required to pledge to expand their mineral production and commit portion thereof to United States. But, as the Engineering and Mining Journal for September 1948 bluntly puts it:

"Exactly how do you go about assuring that a given nation will direct output of its mining industry so as to fulfill that obligation and yet not impose undesirable controls on private enterprise."

The official 14.3 billion dollars plus 1.5 billion dollars more for Atlantic Pact countries to be spent on armaments purchases in the next fiscal year will, of course, mean use of fairly substantial quantities of nonferrous metals. The exact amounts to be so employed is not known to us.

Significantly, however, it should be noted that these large outlays for armaments have been unable to prevent serious recession developing in those industries which would normally be expected to benefit from such expenditures. For example, the brass industry which would normally be expected to be producing various types of armament materials is now at the lowest level of production since before the last war.

EFFECTS OF A POSITIVE PEACE PROGRAM ON JOBS AND PRODUCTION IN MINE MILL INDUSTRIES

An alternative to our present cold-war program would necessarily involve the following features:

A UN program for relief and rehabilitation of distressed countries.

A program for better living at home involving a large-scale housing program, development of regional valley authorities, increased rural electrification, as well as numerous social security, health, and welfare benefits. Such a program would obviously mean more to the workers in mine-mill industry in terms of jobs and employment (not to mention other obvious far-reaching benefits) than the present cold-war program.

While exact estimates, in terms of actual figures are difficult, it is fairly obvious that:

A UN program that covered all the countries of the world would promote increased use of metals through greater industrialization. Such a program would obviously open up larger markets for metals through inclusion of eastern European countries.

A 2,000,000-homes-per-year housing program would mean, roughly, 785,000 tons of copper alone, or the equivalent of what would go into 523,333 bombers (these estimates are based on an average of 785 pounds of copper for a model 6-room house, including all appliances, as estimated by the president of Anaconda Copper before the TNEC, and on estimate of 3,000 pounds per bomber).

Similar equivalents to housing use of copper can be worked out on the basis of the following rough estimates:

One B-17 Flying Fortress uses 2,968 pounds of copper.

One B-24 Liberator uses 3,025 pounds of copper.

One 45,000-ton battleship uses 3,058,000 pounds of copper.

One aircraft carrier uses 2,861,000 pounds of copper.

An expanded rural electrification program would vastly increase consumption of copper, lead, and possibly aluminum (to the extent that aluminum was used instead of copper for wiring).

Similarly, a comprehensive regional development program through creation of river valley authorities would require huge quantities of nonferrous metals, particularly copper, for transmission lines, power stations, etc.

Again exact estimates on this are difficult, but rough calculations can be made on the basis of these approximations:

One mile of high voltage transmission lines uses 31,378 pounds of copper.

One mile of urban distribution electrification system uses 5,944 pounds.

One mile of typical rural distribution system uses 1,063 pounds.

STATEMENT OF JOHN GILMAN, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., May 23, 1949.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,

*Chairman, Foreign Relations Committee,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.*

DEAR SIR: Here is the statement which I would have given to your committee had it been early enough to testify in person:

I am opposed to the North Atlantic Pact as a veteran since the pact is without doubt an aggressive pact * * * a pact which directly threatens the Soviet Union with force of arms should the President interpret any event which takes place among the signatory nations or its colonies, an act of aggression.

I fought for almost 9 months against Nazi Germany as a machine-gunner and was awarded the D. S. C. and Silver Star. I didn't fight, I'm sure, to make money for the international cartelists. I didn't fight so that we could prepare ourselves to fight Russia. I fought because I felt that it was in the best interests of our country.

However, this pact is a war pact and is not in the best interests of our country. An uprising in French Morocco can be interpreted as an act of aggression on Russia's part * * * internal aggression * * * as the pact infers. This pact is similar to the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis in that it is out to smash bolshevism. Actually, the Axis was interested in smashing not bolshevism but any and all phases of democratic procedure as we know it. And so it seems that the creators of this pact are hell-bent on doing the same thing.

I am opposed to the pact because it is violating the entire foundations and spirit of the UN. The pact is not a regional pact but an international pact covering several regions * * * the Mediterranean region * * * the Scandinavian region * * * the western European region * * * and the American region. The UN at San Francisco specifically defined regionalism and this pact is exactly what the UN didn't want done.

And lastly, I oppose this North Atlantic Military Alliance because I am opposed to automatic declarations of war. Congress would have little to say if the signatory nations decided that an act of aggression took place. It would be committing our Nation to war under the terms of the pact.

Why don't you creators of blood-money profits and destructible conflicts spend your hard-earned salaries so that the National Association of Manufacturers can accumulate enough profits without sending us boys into war? Why don't you suffer as I and thousands like myself by staying up 24 hours per day working together with Russia instead of working for war?

I swear by God Almighty that if that pact goes through and if war comes about, I shall pray day and night that every Member of Congress who votes for it shall be its first victims. I'm disabled and can hardly stand on my feet from the results of the last holocaust. If there should be another war, may God see to it that every Member of Congress who is whooping it up for another war by talking demagogically about "peace," may He see to it that they suffer and die as I and the boys who I saw die on the battlefield.

It's easy to sign papers committing us little people to die for someone else's profits. But it's not so easy to convince us that we are dying for America. I love my country more than any one of those war creators will ever love this country. I was willing to die for it and proved that I was willing to die for it. How many of you can say the same thing?

Distinguished Service Crosses * * * Silver Stars * * * Purple Hearts * * * I've got them. But they will mean only medals awarded by big business for bravery in earning blood profits if you recommend this pact to Congress.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN GILMAN,
Staff Sergeant, Thirty-ninth Infantry Regiment,
Ninth Infantry Division, Serial No. 33791156.

PROGRESSIVE PARTY,
New York 19, N. Y., May 10, 1949.

HON. TOM CONNALLY,
Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: Mr. Wallace who is now on the west coast has asked me to return the enclosed transcript of his testimony before your committee with several corrections noted thereon.

At the time of his appearance, in response to a question from Senator McMahon, Mr. Wallace stated that he would present the committee with documentation for the purposes of the record, in support of his statement that between the date of the Russian offer to lift the Berlin blockade on March 21 and the date when that offer was disclosed by Tass on April 25 "the State Department was filling the press and radio with stories about Russian aggressiveness, intensifying the atmosphere of fear and hostility which it evidently thinks necessary to assure the ratification and implementation of the Atlantic Pact."

Mr. Wallace has asked me to transmit to you the following very partial chronicle of acts and declarations of an official character in support of that statement:

March 24

President Truman officially welcomes Winston Churchill upon his arrival in this country at a formal dinner in Blair House (N. Y. Post, March 24).

March 31

Winston Churchill addresses the Mid-Century Convocation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and says, among other things:

"The failure to strange Bolshevism at its birth and to bring Russia, then prostrate, by one means or another, into the general democratic system lies heavy upon us today. * * * It is certain that Europe would have been communized and London under bombardment some time ago but for the deterrent of the atomic bomb in the hands of the United States" (N. Y. Herald Tribune, April 1).

March 31

Senator Connally, in a press interview, speaks of "an open Russian plan and design 'to impose upon the civilized world their plan of government and economy'" (N. Y. Times, April 1).

March 31

Assistant Secretary of State Dean Rusk, in an address before the United States Commission for the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, deplored the "discouraging, disagreeable, frustrating role" played by Russia and referred to the "terror and international intimidation" of eastern Europe (N. Y. Times, April 1).

April 4

In an address made at the ceremonies accompanying the signing of the Atlantic Pact, President Truman referred to the pact as "a shield against aggression" (N. Y. Times, April 5).

April 5

Speaking at an Army Day ceremony before the Jewish War Veterans in New York City, General Bradley discussed the Atlantic Pact at the invitation of the State Department saying:

"Strategically, the North Atlantic Pact would enable free nations of the Old World and the New to funnel the great strength of our New World to the ramparts of the Old, and thus challenge an enemy where he would transgress." He further referred to Russian protests against the pact as "the expressions of angry resentment from jackals denied their plunder" (N. Y. Times, April 6).

April 6

Speaking before the new Members of the House and Senate, President Truman declared:

"Now I believe that we are in a position where we will never have to make that decision (to drop atom bombs) again, but if it has to be made for the welfare of the United States, and the democracies of the world are at stake, I wouldn't hesitate to make it again" (N. Y. Times, April 7).

April 9

General Walter Bedell Smith, former United States Ambassador to Moscow, speaking before the Military Order of World Wars, stated that Russia—

"is pointed behind its iron curtain with a formidable military entity, preying on the fears of the free peoples of Europe * * * It is typical of Communist cynicism that while they administer liberal doses of fear, at the same time they press their so-called peace offensive" (New York Times, April 10).

April 9

The House Appropriations Committee released the testimony of "top air officials" that the air force "now plans to keep flying supplies into the blockaded city (Berlin) indefinitely" and that "they did not expect war during the year starting July 1—although, they added, it was a possibility at any time (New York Times, April 10).

April 12

A report from London that announces facilities "necessary to the United States Air Force for atomic bombardment have been prepared in this country by agreement between the United States and British Governments."

The correspondent added that:

"The mutual responsibility of the two governments in such defense has recently been highlighted by Winston Churchill's statement that western Europe owes its liberty solely to possession by the United States of the atomic bomb and to President Truman's declaration that he would use the bomb again if it became necessary" (New York Times, April 13).

April 12

In his message to the Senate requesting ratification of the North Atlantic Pact President Truman referred to "the rights of small nations, broken one by one and the people of those nations deprived of freedom by terror and oppression" (New York Times, April 13).

April 13

Representative Clarence Cannon, Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said on the floor of the House:

"Moscow and every other center in Russia, we must hit within one week after the war starts, and it can be done only by land-based planes such as we now have * * *

"With the signing of the North Atlantic Pact we would have ample land bases.

"We will absolutely demoralize the enemy. We will destroy all his lines of communications. We will blast at the centers of operation, and then let our allies send the army in, other boys, not our boys, to hold the ground we win" (New York Times, April 14).

April 25

A report from London announced that:

"The first American superfortress group with the know-how for atomic bombing will arrive in England next Saturday and put the United States in position to drop an atomic bomb anywhere in Europe on short notice.

"Air Force officers revealed that the famous 509th 'Atom Bomb' Group of 30 planes will fly to this front-line Atlantic pact base for training with its specially equipped, specially trained crews.

"Included in the 509th's personnel will be at least two veterans of the history-making missions that obliterated Hiroshima and Nagasaki" (New York Times, April 26).

April 25

Tass statement announces the Russian offer made on March 21 to lift the Berlin blockade (New York Times, April 26).

At Mr. Wallace's request, I am asking that the committee include the foregoing chronicle in the record of the hearings as an addenda to Mr. Wallace's statement.

Very truly yours,

JOHN J. ABT, General Counsel.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
COMMISSION ON ADMINISTRATION AND FINANCE,
State House, Boston 33, April 22, 1949.

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In connection with the forthcoming hearings on the North Atlantic Pact, several points have arisen in my mind in connection with the partition of Ireland which I think may have some bearing on the consideration of the pact by the United States.

As I read article IV, the thought occurs to me that under the present wording the United States is bound to uphold the unjust partition and occupation of Ireland by Britain where it seems to bind all signatories to the preservation of the present territorial limits.

If my understanding is correct, is it not within the realm of possibility that American troops might be sent in to aid in putting down revolt in the six-county area against the unjust government of Great Britain?

My thought on that is based on the reports which we have received from time to time of the resentment of the younger generation, particularly toward the injustice of partition and the threat offered from time to time that there may be determined revolution in the six-county area.

With this premise I naturally do not subscribe, but the fear is always within our minds that the younger group may not heed the wisdom of the older generation and take matters into their own hands.

A further question in my mind is whether the United States should sanction any further elimination by Great Britain of the elementary demand of the right to self-determination on the part of all Ireland by signing of the pact.

It occurs to me that there are two angles of approach on this; first, direct and vigorous opposition to the present wording of article IV, and second, by the action of the Congress on a resolution which would provide for mediation by the United States and Britain on the question of partition.

This second approach may be feasible in view of the deep desire on the part of the United States that the North Atlantic Pact shall not be one of oppression and discrimination but one of aid and advancement of peace.

We have recently heard an objection offered by one of those opposing any action, particularly in the State Department, that the six-county area has been depended upon in two world wars and that the southern counties have been neutral.

I think that this is very easily overcome and that if partition is removed Ireland would become copartners with the other signatories and bases in all the counties would be immediately available if need arose.

In addition, I believe we agree that any conflict between the North Atlantic Pact signers and other countries in Europe will be based on the issue of communism and I daresay that no one will contradict the fact that Ireland is the strongest field of anticommunistic sentiment in the entire European area.

I hope to be in Washington some day next week and I shall try to see you personally if I may.

With every good wish to you, personally, I am

Sincerely and respectfully yours,

THOMAS H. BUCKLEY,
Commissioner of Administration.

APRIL 26, 1949.

HON. DEAN ACHESON,

The Secretary of State, Department of State.

Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Enclosed is a letter which I have received from Mr. Thomas H. Buckley, commissioner of administration of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, who is also a vice president of the American League for an Undivided Ireland, which asks a number of very important questions regarding the effect of article 4 of the North Atlantic Pact on Ireland. I wish you would respond as fully as possible to all the questions raised in Mr. Buckley's letter. I also hope that you will not be limited by his letter, but will cover all phases of this question, in particular the following:

(1) Does the wording of article 4 require the United States to uphold and preserve the present partition of Ireland?

(2) If so, could American troops be employed under the terms of the pact in quelling disturbances resulting from a possible revolt of the six-county area against Great Britain?

(3) What would be the effect of United States ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty upon the right of self-determination on the part of all Ireland?

I consider it to be a matter of fundamental and urgent importance that the whole question of the impact of article 4 and of the entire pact upon the situation in Ireland be explained, analyzed, and answered in as completely an unequivocal and detailed fashion as possible. I merely cite the above three questions to indicate some of the more significant points to which I believe your reply should address itself.

Your prompt attention to this matter will be most gratefully appreciated.

Very sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr.,
United States Senator.

MAY 4, 1949.

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr.,

United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: Thank you for your letter of April 26 bringing to my attention Mr. Thomas H. Buckley's letter concerning the North Atlantic Treaty with respect to Ireland. The answers to Mr. Buckley's questions are clear and simple.

Article 4 of the treaty does not require the United States to uphold and preserve the partition of Ireland. That article merely requires the parties to consult under certain circumstances. It contains no further obligation.

It is inconceivable that American troops could be employed, under the terms of the treaty, in quelling possible disturbances in northern Ireland. As I stated Monday in response to a question asked during the hearings of the Foreign Relations Committee, there is no thought whatever of stationing American troops in Europe in peacetime other than existing forces of occupation.

United States ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty would have no effect whatsoever upon the right of self-determination in Northern Ireland or anywhere else.

In short, the treaty, as I have explained both to Mr. MacBride and Mr. Nunan, has no relation whatever to the problem of partition.

I have noted with gratification Mr. Buckley's statements, which are similar to those previously made to us by the Irish Government, concerning the devotion of the Irish people to Christian and democratic principles which the Treaty is designed to preserve.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON.

NEW YORK 7, N. Y., April 25, 1949.

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.,

United States Senate.

DEAR MR. SENATOR: As an aid to you in fully appreciating Ireland's attitude on participation in the Atlantic Pact, we enclose—

- (a) A summary of Ireland's attitude on the Atlantic Pact;
- (b) A summary of the considered viewpoint of representative American citizens of Irish blood with respect thereto;
- (c) Reprint of a special article by John O'Donnell, the well-known journalist.

These are submitted for your consideration and study.

The Irish Government has expressed a desire to participate in the Atlantic Pact, provided England withdraws from Ireland and hands over all power of government to a Central Government elected by the Irish people. The Irish Government is particularly inviting American consideration of the obstacle which is preventing Ireland from joining the Atlantic Pact.

It appears to us that certain questions in relation to the issue raised should be carefully considered and answered at this time:

1. Does the Atlantic Pact, in its present form, bind the United States to uphold the unjust partition of Ireland and the occupation of part of Ireland by England?

The answer is "Yes"—Article 4 would bind the participating countries to maintain present territorial integrities for 20 years.

2. Is it our American purpose that the United States should lend its sanctions to a denial by England of the elementary democratic right of national self-determination to the Irish nation?

The obvious answer is "No."

3. Is it our desire to achieve cooperation among the Atlantic nations?

If such is really the desire, why does the United States of America hesitate to exert its very real influence in order to bring about a settlement of this issue which endangers the success of the entire Atlantic Pact? It is the admitted geographical fact that Ireland's strategic position on the western flank of Europe makes her a vital link in the Atlantic chain.

England's continued occupation of the northeasterly corner of Ireland, against the recorded wish of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people, is therefore jeopardizing the enormous investment of the American taxpayers in this mighty venture directed to the preservation of world peace.

These are vital questions which should be considered by every American.

Ireland is (a) vetoed by Russia from participation in the United Nations and (b) partitioned by England against the will of the Irish people.

Is the United States of America prepared also to take sides against Ireland by guaranteeing the partition of Ireland, and thereby excluding Ireland from taking her full and rightful place among the nations of the earth?

We do not believe so.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH SCOTT,
National President,
American League for an Undivided Ireland.

A SUMMARY OF IRELAND'S ATTITUDE ON THE ATLANTIC PACT

(A) THE ATTITUDE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND

Ireland's Minister for External Affairs, Mr. Sean MacBride, stated his Government's position in relation to the Atlantic Pact in the Irish Parliament on February 23, 1949, as follows:

"Exchanges of views have taken place between the Government of the United States and the Government of Ireland on the question of Ireland's participation in the proposed Atlantic Pact. I took advantage of these exchanges of views to make clear the attitude of this Government on the matter, and I have kept other Governments concerned in the pact informed of our views.

"As I explained in the course of these exchanges, Ireland, as an essentially democratic and freedom-loving country, is anxious to play her full part in protecting and preserving Christian civilization and the democratic way of life. With the general aim of the proposed Atlantic Pact in this regard, therefore, we are in agreement. In the matter of military measures, however, we are faced with an insuperable difficulty, from the strategic and political points of view, by reason of the fact that six of our northeastern counties are occupied by British forces against the will of the overwhelming majority of the Irish people. Partition is naturally and bitterly resented by the people of this country as a violation of Ireland's territorial integrity and as a denial in her case of the elementary democratic right of national self-determination. As long as partition lasts, any military alliance or commitment involving joint military action with the State responsible for partition must be quite out of the question so far as Ireland is concerned. Any such commitment, if undertaken, would involve the prospect of civil conflict in this country in the event of a crisis.

"Any such alliance or commitment is equally out of the question from the strategic point of view. The defence of a small island such as Ireland can be undertaken effectively only by a single authority having at its back the firm support of a decisive majority of the population of the whole country. Furthermore, it would obviously be necessary, from the strategic point of view, that the productive capacity of the country as a whole should be integrated under a democratically elected central authority; and this is impossible so long as partition lasts because the six northeastern counties are the principal industrial area of the country. These practical difficulties are aggravated by the state of feeling naturally created by the undemocratic practices used to maintain and insure the continuance of the partition of our country. Our attitude is that neither this Government, nor, we believe, any other Irish Government, could expect to find the necessary support for a policy involving joint military commitments with the power that continues to lend its sanction, tacit or active, to evils of the very kind which it is the object of the proposed pact to oppose and prevent.

"In explaining our attitude, I made it quite clear that this Government is not actuated by feelings of hostility toward Britain; on the contrary, we are anxious to develop and strengthen our relations with Britain, and there are so many factors and interests making for good neighborly relations between the two countries that it is inconceivable that, once partition were removed and once the geographical, ideological, and other forces making for friendship between the two countries were given full play, Ireland should ever constitute a source of danger or embarrassment to Britain in time of war. Any detached or impartial survey of the strategic and political considerations involved must lead to the conclusion that a friendly and united Ireland on Britain's western approaches is in the interest, not merely of Britain or of Ireland, but of all the countries concerned with the security of the Atlantic area. Every consideration of constructive statesmanship points to the necessity of ending, as soon as possible and once and for all, the centuries-old conflict between our two countries. I have strongly urged that it is better to face this question now as a matter of urgency rather than to allow a situation to develop wherein a satisfactory solution might be much more difficult to bring about. I also indicated that, inasmuch as the solution of the partition problem would not merely end an undemocratic and dangerous situation, but would also make a vital contribution toward strengthening the internal harmony and cohesion of the North Atlantic community, the matter was one which should receive the active consideration of all governments interested in the cooperation of nations concerned.

"That, briefly, is the attitude of the Government on the question of Ireland's participation in the proposed Atlantic Pact, and, as I said, I have taken steps to make our position clear to the governments of all states immediately concerned."

Asked by Sir John Esmonde whether acceptance of the Atlantic Pact would imply "acceptance of the unnatural and enforced division of our country," Mr. MacBride replied:

"Article 2 of our constitution provides that: 'The national territory consists of the whole island of Ireland, its islands and its territorial seas.'

"Article 4 of the draft Atlantic Treaty, which is the consultative article, refers to 'the territorial integrity, political independence or security' of the parties to the treaty. The provisions of this article might well, under existing circumstances in regard to the six northeastern counties, imply an acceptance that 'the territorial integrity' and 'political independence' referred to in the article, are the concern of Great Britain, unless it is clearly recognized that the national territory of this state consists of the whole island of Ireland, as provided by article 2 of our constitution."

Asked by Deputy Lebane whether the exchange of views on the proposed North Atlantic Treaty which took place between the Government of the United States and the Irish Government was written or verbal, and, if this exchange was in writing, whether he will consider the publication of the notes exchanged, Mr. MacBride replied:

"The exchange of views referred to took place by way of aide-memoire. The Irish Government's aide-memoire was delivered to the United States on the 8th February last. No intimation has so far been received to indicate that the United States Government, and the governments of the other convening powers, have yet had an opportunity of considering the Irish Government's aide-memoire.

"As already stated, the Irish Government's view is that a constructive approach to the concept of Atlantic cooperation would suggest the necessity of examining, in the first instance, problems tending to prevent or weaken the cooperation in the Atlantic area. The Irish Government has indicated that it would welcome such an approach to what we consider to be the unnatural and unjust division of our country.

"In these circumstances, I do not envisage the publication, at the moment, of the documents in question."

[From the Irish Press (Dublin) of Tuesday, March 22, 1949]

(R) STATEMENT IN RELATION TO THIS MATTER BY MR. DE VALERA, THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Asked at a press conference, which he gave in Sheffield yesterday, what would be his attitude to the Atlantic Pact if he was returned to power, Mr. de Valera replied that the first thing they must ask themselves was: What was the Atlantic Pact for?

"Its object," he continued, "was to enable various countries to maintain their independence which they already had and which they wished to protect.

"We in Ireland have not yet got our national independence and before we could protect it, we must secure it."

Asked if partition were out of the way and Ireland was independent, what would be his attitude to the Atlantic Pact, Mr. de Valera said that if we were united and Ireland had her independence, he personally would advocate joining the pact, but, until unity was secured, he did not think that there was any chance of the people of Ireland wanting to join the Atlantic Pact.

CAPITOL STUFF

(By John O'Donnell)

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 12.—Just to pursue that ancient "this is where I came in" line, we wish to direct the attention of readers with Irish blood to the present visit in Washington of Sean MacBride, Eire's Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The extremely hush-hush talks of Ireland's MacBride and United States Secretary of State Dean Acheson mean just one more unreeling of that ancient theme: That the last tie which binds this piece of ground in the Atlantic to the monarchy of Britain must be slashed. These are the facts:

Ireland's Secretary of State MacBride has told United States Secretary of State Acheson that his government holds office because the voters elected its members on the platform pledge that the artificial partition of Ireland would be abolished. That Ireland will not enter into any Atlantic military alliance which prohibits the majority of any nation from changing frontiers to meet the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants.

And at the same time, the Washington diplomatic representatives of His Britannic Majesty have insisted to our State Department that the United States must not meddle in this delicate problem. And when the heads of our armed forces have mildly reminded the Londoners that we would like to have the use of the air fields of Eire as a part of our chore in saving all of western Europe from the Kremlin, they have been met with the brusque British come uppance:

"Well, we won World War I while the Irish were staging a revolution. We won World War II without Irish bases which we wanted. And if World War III comes along, we'll win that without the Irish—provided you come across as Franklin Roosevelt did 10 years ago and from then on."

All of this brings up the present battle over the Atlantic treaty and the proposition of whether to give, under some new lend-lease set-up, billions of American military equipment, planes, guns, and brains. This is just an echo of what happened upon Capitol Hill after World War I when Woodrow Wilson's League of Nations got what it deserved—an ignominious exit via the international garbage can.

TRICK CLAUSE IN FUZZY-BRAINED LEAGUE

In 1919, when the great battle over the League was being staged, the voters of Irish descent played an important part. The same holds true today.

The trick clause in the fuzzy-brained League of Nations was article 10, slickly written into the pact by Britain for the sole purpose of knocking off all efforts of the Irish to win their independence.

Well, we've got the same set-up in the present Atlantic Pact. If the Irish were stupid enough to sign it they would pledge that for the next 20 years (according to article 13) they must respect the "territorial integrity and political independence" of the cosigners (read article 4).

In other words, the present Government of Ireland, elected on a platform sworn to end the present partition of their nation, would perforce agree to brush aside its most important issue for at least 20 years. Back in 1919 and 1920, during the days of the troubles which flamed into the honest Anglo-Irish war, a tough, hard-fighting, and accurate-shooting Irish settled that problem when the identical proposal was slipped into the League of Nations by Woodrow Wilson on the needling of Lloyd George.

Into the present conversations moves notorious article 10 of the League of Nations, which the Senate of 1919 courageously tossed back in Woodrow Wilson's teeth. Had the Wilson League of Nations gone through, these United States would have been called upon to send troops to Ireland to preserve the "status quo" of that time. In other words, we would have been pledged to use Americans to shoot down Irishmen who wanted freedom from London rule.

SAME SENATE, SAME DIPLOMACY, SAME ATTITUDE

Thanks in great measure to two great Senators from Massachusetts—Henry Cabot Lodge and David Ignatius Walsh—article 10 of the League and the League itself was properly killed.

And now, 30 years after, the same thing pops up again. Same Senate, same slick British diplomacy, same angry "to hell with it" attitude of the Irish.

What the British slipped into article 10 of the old League of Nations they've put into article 4 of the North Atlantic Treaty. Why they haven't the simple honesty to call it by its right name—"a military alliance against communism"—we don't know.

This article 4 proclaims that "the parties" (this means U. S. fighting men carrying the battle load) will take suitable action whenever "in the opinion of any of them (that's Great Britain), the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened." Well, if the voting majority of North Ireland votes to toss the British crown the hell out of there and join up with Eire to create one simple state, that article, by any reading of words, means that the territorial integrity of the King of Great Britain and North Ireland is most seriously threatened.

And so we're going to send United States troops over there to protect the absentee landlords of London? This is going to be good. But we heard most of it back in 1919 and 1920. The Irish won then and we think they're going to win again.

RESOLUTIONS UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED BY CONFERENCE OF KEYMEN OF THE AMERICAN LEAGUE FOR AN UNDIVIDED IRELAND, AT CHICAGO, FEBRUARY 12 AND 13, 1949

Whereas there has just been issued by the Irish Government at Dublin an official declaration entitled "Ireland's Attitude on Participation in the Atlantic Pact"; and

Whereas this document has been placed in the hands of our appropriate officers by Hon. John Conway, Irish consul at Chicago; and

Whereas this document has been read to and considered by this Conference of Keymen of the American League for an Undivided Ireland, assembled at Chicago the 12th and 13th days of February 1949: Now, therefore, be it

Recorded, That the said statement of Ireland's attitude on participation in the Atlantic Pact meets with our sympathetic understanding and approval;

That we endorse to our fellow Americans each statement of fact therein contained as accurate; and

That we record our fixed determination to intensify and augment our American effort looking to American aid to abolish the border in Ireland.

APRIL 29, 1949.

The Honorable DEAN ACHESON,
Secretary of State, Department of State,

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Enclosed are the following:

A letter from Mr. John Scott, national president of the American League for an Undivided Ireland; an enclosure which Mr. Scott sends me entitled "A Summary of Ireland's Attitude on the Atlantic Pact"; an article which Mr. Scott sends me by John O'Donnell in the New York Daily News of April 13, 1949, entitled "Capitol Stuff."

I send all this material to you for your comment, inasmuch as they deal with the Atlantic Pact and come from an important organization to which many American citizens belong.

1. You will note that Mr. Scott makes the following assertion:

"1. Does the Atlantic Pact, in its present form, bind the United States to uphold the unjust partition of Ireland, and the occupation of part of Ireland by England?"

"The answer is 'Yes'—Article 4 would bind the participating countries to maintain present territorial integrities for 20 years."

2. You will note that Mr. Scott further says:

"Is the United States of America prepared also to take sides against Ireland by guaranteeing the partition of Ireland, and thereby excluding Ireland from taking the full and rightful place among the nations of the earth?"

3. You will notice that in the enclosures entitled "A Summary of Ireland's Attitude on the Atlantic Pact" the following quotation is made:

"Asked by Sir John Esmonde whether acceptance of the Atlantic Pact would imply 'acceptance of the unnatural and enforced division of our country,' Mr. MacBride replied:

"Article 2 of our constitution provides that: 'The national territory consists of the whole island of Ireland, its islands and its territorial seas.'"

"Article 4 of the draft Atlantic Treaty, which is the consultative article, refers to 'the territorial integrity, political independence or security' of the parties to the treaty. The provisions of this article might well, under existing circumstances in regard to the six northeastern counties, imply an acceptance that 'the territorial integrity' and 'political independence' referred to in the article, are the concern of Great Britain, unless it is clearly recognized that the national territory of this state consists of the whole island of Ireland, as provided by article 2 of our constitution.'"

4. You will notice that in the article entitled "Capitol Stuff" which Mr. Scott encloses, the statement is made that "the heads of our armed forces have mildly reminded the Londoners that we would like to have the use of airfields of Eire as a part of our chore in saving all of western Europe from the Kremlin." Is there authority for this statement?

5. You will also note that the article "Capitol Stuff" refers to article 10 of the League of Nations and says "We've got the same set-up in the present Atlantic Pact. If the Irish were * * * to sign it they would pledge that for the next 20 years (according to article 13) they must respect the 'territorial integrity and political independence' of the cosigners (read article 4)."

6. You will note the further statement in the same article, "And now, 30 years after, the same thing pops up again * * * What the British slipped into article 10 of the old League of Nations they've put into article 4 of the North Atlantic Treaty. Why they haven't the simple honesty to call it by its right name—a military alliance against communism—we don't know."

"This article 4 proclaims that 'the parties' (this means United States fighting men carrying the battle load) will take suitable action whenever 'in the opinion of any of them (that's Great Britain), the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened.' Well, if the voting majority of North Ireland votes to toss the British crown the hell out of there and join up with Eire to create one single state, that article, by any reading of words, means that the territorial integrity of the King of Great Britain and North Ireland is most seriously threatened."

"And so we're going to send United States troops over there to protect the absentee landlords of London? This is going to be good. But we heard most of it back in 1919 and 1920. The Irish won then and we think they're going to win again."

I trust that you will at your convenience give clear and unequivocal answers to the questions which I have enumerated and to all other pertinent issues raised in Mr. Scott's communication and enclosures.

Very sincerely yours,

HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr.,
United States Senator.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 13, 1949.

The Honorable HENRY CABOT LODGE, Jr.,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR LODGE: Thank you for your letter of April 29 sending me certain material from Joseph Scott, national president, American League for an Undivided Ireland, concerning the North Atlantic Treaty with respect to Ireland. Your letter particularly calls attention to certain questions raised by Mr. Scott and others, and I am glad to make the following comment:

The North Atlantic Pact certainly does not require the United States to uphold and preserve the partition of Ireland. Article 4 merely obligates the parties to consult under certain circumstances. It contains no further obligations. Article 5 obligates each party in the event of an armed attack upon any of them, to take such action as they deem necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area, but I am confident that the Irish Government has no thought of making an armed attack on anyone.

The United States Government certainly has no thought of taking sides against Ireland or of guaranteeing the partition of Ireland. It has always taken the position that the partition question was not one in which it could intervene, but that, on the contrary, the question was one for settlement by the Irish and UK Governments.

I have noted the reply given by Mr. MacBride to Sir John Esmonde's question, which is similar to statements made personally to me by Mr. MacBride. I could not, of course, enter into a discussion with him of Irish constitutional matters.

I know of no authority for the statements in the newspaper column enclosed with your letter that American military officials have expressed interest, in London, in the use of airfields in Ireland.

The comparisons made in the same column between the pact and the covenant of the League of Nations are not in accordance with the facts. As you know, article 10 of the League covenant committed the members to "respect and preserve the political independence and territorial integrity" of all other members. Article 4 of the pact, as I have stated above, merely obligates the parties to "consult" whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the parties is threatened.

United States ratification of the Atlantic Treaty will have no effect whatsoever upon the partition question or upon the right of self-determination in Northern Ireland or anywhere else. It is inconceivable that American troops could be employed, under the terms of the treaty, in quelling local disturbances in Northern Ireland.

I recently had the pleasure of discussing the North Atlantic Treaty, among other matters, with Mr. MacBride, and was gratified at his understanding of the treaty and sympathy for its objectives.

Sincerely yours,

DEAN ACHESON.

Enclosure: Letter of April 25, 1949, from Mr. Joseph Scott.

THE AMERICAN LEGION REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE SECTION OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMISSION TO NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, MAY 3, 1949

The executive committee of the Foreign Relations Commission consisting of Leon Happell, chairman; John Barnhardt, of North Carolina; John Wicker, of Virginia; and William Verity, of Ohio; members, met in Washington on May 2 and 3, 1949. At this time their discussions and deliberations were benefited by interviews with Senator Tom Connally of Texas, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; Under Secretary of State James Webb; Lloyd A. Lehrbas, Director of Information, State Department; Lloyd V. Berkner; and Maj. Gen. Lemnitzer, a military-liaison committee of the Office of the Secretary of Defense; and Dr. Bielecki, chairman of the National Democratic Party of Poland, in exile.

This executive committee had the further advantage of the experiences of two trips to Washington by John Barnhardt. Mr. Barnhardt attended several meetings at the State Department, the most important of which was the national conference on American foreign policy, on special assignment by the National Commander.

The executive committee then proceeded to Indianapolis on May 3 where they were joined by other members of the Foreign Relations Commission—Charles Gonser, of Washington, and Oscar Rohlf, of Wyoming, and the NEC liaison committee composed of Chairman H. Kirk Grantham, of Mississippi; Roscoe B. Galther, of Mexico; and Ray Murphy of Iowa.

Since the last report on foreign affairs, which was the convention committee report of October 1948, there has been a change in the status of the cold war. The world is still threatened by a totalitarian state obsessed with imperialistic ambitions; however, in the past 6 months we have seen the United States and the countries of western Europe tip the scales in favor of the west by taking the offensive from the Russians.

Because of the crucial situation in the field of foreign relations at this moment it appears appropriate to this Commission that a statement of policy in the matters of foreign relations should be made to the executive committee. It is our feeling that this policy, if approved, should be publicized widely through the press, radio, and Legion channels and publications so that all Legionnaires, Government officials, and the public everywhere will be aware of the foreign policy of the American Legion.

The future of this great organization, in fact the future of our very lives, depends upon a sound, constructive United States foreign policy. For the past several years the American Legion has been most helpful in formulating and implementing the foreign policy of our Nation. Because this fact is known to few Legionnaires, it is our opinion that the reputation and stature of the American Legion will be increased if this fact is more widely known, and if the foreign policy platform of the American Legion can be more widely disseminated.

Since the close of World War II Legion foreign policy has been aimed primarily at three activities in the field of foreign affairs, namely, implementing the European Recovery Program and its ramifications; enlightening the world as to the democratic methods and ideals of the United States; and strengthening the United Nations Charter in the interest of world peace. We believe that these fields of activity are still the most important and we further believe it to be the advantage of the Legion to restate and to bring up to date our policies in these matters.

There can be no real peace or security in the world until the United Nations can be strengthened sufficiently to stop aggression. The American Legion has not merely cried out for a stronger United Nations; we were the first national organization to offer specific methods of how the Charter of the United Nations could be strengthened so that it would become an effective world authority. We believe that these three amendments merit renewed emphasis and we again urge their early adoption by the Congress:

(1) Removal of the veto in matters of aggression or preparation for aggression; also the strengthening of the International Court of Justice by giving it the power to interpret aggression and preparation for aggression with appropriate jurisdiction over individuals, corporations, and nations in these matters.

(2) In connection with this, the limitation of world arms production through the establishment of arms quotas guaranteed through a system of positive international inspection, and the adoption of United States proposals for international control of atomic energy.

(3) Establishment of an effective world police force to consist of an independent active force, presumably to be recruited from the small nations, under the direct control of the Security Council; and a reserve force made up of national contingents of the five major powers.

Because of the misuse of the veto in the United Nations, the peace-loving countries of the North Atlantic area have been forced to take action to guarantee their mutual self-defense. This action became necessary because of the imminent threat of aggression by Soviet Russia to the nations of this area. Stymied by the veto in the United Nations and threatened with aggression by Soviet Russia the North Atlantic countries have joined together in a regional defense pact in accordance with the provisions of articles 51 and 52 of the United Nations Charter.

We wholeheartedly approve this pact and all of its ramifications. We are convinced that this pact is necessary to prevent further aggression by the Soviets. We hope that it will have the effect of showing to the Russian leaders that the peace-loving nations of the world will no longer tolerate their bullying, and that it would be to their advantage to join the family of nations through proper and full participation in the United Nations.

In the meantime we hope that the pact countries will do all they can to bring about the strengthening provisions of the Charter itself, as recommended by the Legion, so that eventually it will be the United Nations and not the North Atlantic countries that will police world aggressors.

We urge other democratic nations of the North Atlantic area to take advantage of article 10 of the pact when they are able to join the present 12 countries now dedicated to their mutual self-defense and the preservation of the ideals of democracy, liberty, and justice.

We also hope that countries in other areas of the world will take advantage of articles 51 and 52 of the Charter and will form regional arrangements under the United Nations Charter to guarantee their mutual defense and to preserve individual liberties.

We believe that the North Atlantic Pact will hold and maintain the gains from the Marshall plan or economic recovery program. The principles of the plan for economic rehabilitation of Europe were first advanced by the American Legion at its New York convention in August of 1947. The American Legion plan was adopted by the convention at New York 3 months prior to the official formulation and release of the Marshall plan in Washington in November 1947. Since that time, the American Legion's faith in the Marshall plan has been fully justified.

Now that we are realizing these economic gains in western Europe we cannot afford to abandon or neglect future necessary help, nor should we neglect to properly protect the areas that have received our help. There is in Europe at this moment a feeling of insecurity caused by the constant threat of aggression. It is because of this lack of security that the North Atlantic Pact was developed. The pact is the obvious outgrowth of the Marshall plan and the Benelux Countries Pact, and it is a necessary step to protect the economic and ideological gains of the past 2 years. The North Atlantic Pact also strengthens and implements our policy of fighting everywhere the insidious forces of communism.

We repeat that the spread of communism is the threat to peace. We can avert war and stop this plan of world domination if we aggressively follow a policy of firmness in the right, coupled with preparedness for any eventuality. We are happy to join the many and varied forces and groups throughout the world who are fighting this evil growth. We offer encouragement and help to all peoples who are fighting with every available resource either Communist aggression or infiltration.

We must not be satisfied with just containment of this Soviet Communist aggression. The United States must now take the initiative, as we are doing in the North Atlantic Pact. We must talk not of our weaknesses but of our determination—of our moral, economic, and military strength.

We applaud the good work of the overseas information branches of our Government who are attempting to spread throughout Europe and into and behind the iron curtain the ideals and methods of the United States of America. Even so, we urge our Government to do more.

The cold war is a war to capture the minds of men. The propagandists in Moscow have been most effective. We cannot afford to be satisfied with anything less than something better than can be supplied by Moscow. We urge the early enlarging and strengthening of the Voice of America and other such programs. We urge the State Department and Congress to use every other practicable means to get the truth into Europe and Asia.

At the Miami Convention the Foreign Relations Committee indicated the focal point of the cold war to be Berlin. We believe that the Berlin blockade is a deliberately inhuman and unjust blockade by the dictators of Russia, and that it could still easily kindle the flames of war. Because of the courage and daring of the Allied air lift the Berlin blockade is now a detriment rather than an advantage to the Russians. It is a defeat for the Russian dictators. If the blockade should be shortly lifted, we believe it is an acknowledgment of defeat rather than an indication of a willingness to cooperate with the nations of the North Atlantic area. We believe that we should always leave the door of friendship and cooperation open to the Russian people, but because of past and bitter experience in our dealings with the Kremlin we believe that action rather than words should be an indication of their willingness to cooperate.

We deplore the inhuman persecutions and physical violence against religious leaders of the countries now under the domination of the Soviet dictators. We offer these persecutions to world opinion as evidence of the true feelings of the Soviet dictators. It is a clear example of the interpretation of freedom by the rulers in the Kremlin.

We realize that all the programs mentioned above depend upon the United States itself remaining strong and free. We insist that our armed forces be maintained at adequate levels and that our economy remain free, so that we, as a people, can carry out our full responsibility for maintaining peace, resisting aggression, and preserving the rights of free men.

As always, we place our trust in God.

We commend Commander Perry Brown for his prompt and vigorous protest to the issuance of visas to 22 delegates from behind the iron curtain to attend the so-called Cultural and Scientific Conference for World Peace in New York City, March 25-27, 1949.

We are indebted to Leonce Legendre, assistant national adjutant, Washington office, for his untiring efforts and the valuable assistance rendered to this commission. Mr. Legendre was the American Legion's representative at the formal signing in Washington, D. C., of the North Atlantic Pact.

Respectfully submitted,

LEON HAPPELL, Chairman.

STATEMENT OF HAMILTON A. LONG

CHICAGO 14, ILL., May 16, 1949.

Re North Atlantic Pact.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,

Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CONNALLY: It is requested that this statement be accepted and incorporated in the record of the current hearings with respect to the pact; in lieu of my personally appearing before your committee to state my facts and reasons for being opposed to the pact. My decision not to ask permission to appear in person is prompted, in part, by the public announcement that a large number of witnesses remain to be heard, that the hearings are to be terminated in a few days, and that each witness opposed to the pact is to be allowed only a few minutes in which to present the reasons—which would be inadequate opportunity to present the within material. I earnestly hope that my request is granted.

I speak as a citizen of undivided allegiance to America and as an individual, representing no group or organization; as a long time, unchanging, uncompromising, outspoken enemy of everything for which communism, Communists, and the godless despots of the Kremlin stand; as a veteran of the armed forces of America in both World Wars (a major in the Air Forces in Europe in the last one); as a formerly active member of the New York bar, long interested deeply in foreign policy. Since 1945, I have been devoting my full time to studying, lecturing, writing, about governmental affairs; principally foreign policy, in line with the ideas presented in the accompanying statement of what I call the Ten American Principles of a Sound Foreign Policy in This Russo-American Era. (See exhibit A.)

These principles indicate what I believe to be a sound, truly American, alternative to the general foreign policy of which the pact is a part; a policy which, in genesis, is basically British and in character is not genuinely American but British-American. The chief architect thereof is Winston Churchill—proudly boastful of the fact, as indicated by the recitals hereinafter. These observations, of undeniable fact, connote no hostility on my part to Churchill or the British or Britain; much as I oppose their policies as a guide for America. Instead, these observations merely evidence my alertness to the pitfalls before America in international dealings and my unyielding allegiance to traditional American principles with respect thereto, my loyalty to American tradition and to what I believe to be to America's best interests in the light thereof and of the harsh facts of international life today.

Indeed, I have nothing but admiration for Churchill, the peerless apostle of Imperial Impeccability, wholly devoted to his country's imperial interests. He and his fellow British leaders are due full honor for unflinchingly exhibiting undivided loyalty to British interests, which we of this generation must match respecting America if we are to be judged by American posterity to have been faithful to their heritage for which we of today are merely temporary trustees.

It should not need to be stated but, due to a seemingly widespread misconception, it does need to be asserted that any loyal citizen's opinion as to what is best for his country is entitled to full credit and a respectful hearing at all times; however right or wrong he may seem to be factually and logically, however objectionable it may seem to this or that foreign government or nation. He is entitled to full protection against imputation of disloyalty or unfaithfulness to country or neglect of its interests, even though he be a minority of one. He is entitled to be free from any degree or manner, however subtle, of such character assassination, and, consequently, denial of genuine freedom of thought and its expression. The prospective impact of the loyal citizen's proposed policy, on this or that foreign nation, and the prospective reaction thereto of this or that element, regime, or nation abroad, are not legitimate tests in judging its merit with respect to America's best interests or his right to a full and fair hearing and respectful treatment—especially by public servants, in line with the spirit and philosophy of the Declaration of Independence. This is doubly true when basic values are at stake, as in the case of this present issue of adoption or rejection of the North Atlantic pact.

CRIMINALLY GAMBLING WITH OUR INHERITANCE

The truly precious thing at stake here, as precious as it is uniquely American, is our Nation's lifelong tradition against involvement in the war-breeding power politics and system of military alliances of the Old World. All pretensions to the contrary notwithstanding, the pact is a military alliance with Britain and her continental allies, chiefly. As Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg pointed out, in his splendid and still timely book (1926), The Trail of a Tradition, the second Declaration of American Independence occurred when the administration of President Washington decided, in 1793, to set for America a course of noninvolvement in the Old World's power politics and military alliances and wars, of aloofness from these Old World evils. In this connection, Senator Vandenberg said therein, at page 247: "We cannot forget—except as we criminally gamble with our inheritance—either the first or the second Declaration of American Independence."

It bears repeating that this is not our inheritance, except temporarily as trustees thereof, of the just inheritance of all succeeding generations of Americans. It is not ours to do with as we will, for our advantage.

Yet the pact will scuttle this second Declaration of American Independence irremediably. It will involve America in the Old World System of military alliances only nominally for 20 years, actually, for all practical purposes, indefinitely—inducing if not impelling our permanent involvement in these war-breeding Old World arrangements. It will, moreover, undermine the basic values of the first Declaration of Independence, in 1776—of our philosophy and system of man-over-state. This will be the result of our carrying out the obligations, express and implied, legal and moral, of this alliance pact; of its economic implications no less than its military aspects. This will foster in America conditions which cannot but breed ever-increasing state over man; Government controls, especially over our economic life; killing taxes; gradual but certain undermining of individual liberty against state-over-man, sure victim in time of Old World militarism to be thus imported through its most festering feature—alliances.

This is criminally gambling with our inheritance with a vengeance; especially since it will undermine our national security, as later noted.

THE CONTINUING VALIDITY OF THIS TRADITION

This lifelong tradition of our Nation is still valid and full of life. Witness the endless protests against it by the propact groups who urge that it must not be permitted to block the pact's ratification by the Senate; and at the same time claim that the pact's approval will kill the tradition. Those who declare that it is already dead are just indulging in wishful thinking, or arguing thus to gain their end, at the expense of the tradition. The tradition is yet to be killed.

It certainly was not invalidated in 1916, when both Presidential candidates based their pleas for votes on the binding character of this tradition, both asserting that they would not take America into the war. Likewise in 1940, with President Roosevelt out-doing Willkie in this regard, asserting "again and again" that the fathers and mothers of America need never fear about their sons going to fight on foreign battlefields if he should be reelected. His then close associates have since admitted that they deliberately made this claim, though knowing that it was false, because they knew it was necessary to do so in order to win the election. The people evidently still held to their tradition.

Similarly in between the two wars. Witness the Vandenberg book just cited, arguing in favor of the tradition's continuing validity and great value to America. His argument's still hold good in every respect, it might be noted in passing. In the thirties, President Roosevelt stated on several occasions that he stood on the basis of the tradition—opposed to America's involvement in the power politics and wars of the Old World, which he correctly defined as the true American isolationism. "Insulation" was the Vandenberg term, in that 1926 book, instead of "isolation." Claims that it embraces the economic field, and so forth, are false.

It is thus obvious that America's involvement in hostilities soon after the 1916 election did not kill this American tradition. In one of his talks with Stalin, President Roosevelt declared that, but for Pearl Harbor, the American people never would have sanctioned America's entry into the fighting. Right up to Pearl Harbor, in fact, they did hold to their antipathy to entering the war—at least about 80 percent of the people, according to reliable surveys. Their sanctioning of lend-lease in early 1941 and other "aid to the allies" measures was by way of helping to prevent America's entry into the war; as antiwar measures, which was the basis on which they were accepted by Congress also. False claims to be sure, and since admittedly so; but nevertheless this was the basis on which the people and Congress approved; showing that the tradition under discussion was not only then valid but controlling, politically.

Certainly the bombs of Pearl Harbor did not kill the tradition. So this leaves only the question as to whether America's entry into the United Nations invalidated our tradition against involvement in the balance of power politics, the internal politics, the military alliances, and the wars, of the Old World.

JOINING THE UN DID NOT IMPAIR THE TRADITION

It needs no argument to establish that the American people and the Congress, on the whole, intended in 1945 to help create an instrument—the UN—which would bar war-breeding balance of power politics; and most assuredly did not sanction it as a means for America's participating therein. The UN Charter expressly forbids any nation, America or otherwise, from interfering in the internal affairs of any other member nation. Nor did any one suggest in 1945 that America was authorized, under the UN Charter, to make a military alliance with the Old World nations of the West—to the exclusion of Russia and therefore, in her eyes, against her. In passing, it should be observed here that, for practical purposes of war or peace, it is the view of the excluded nations which determines the offensive or defensive character of a military alliance such as this pact, not the pretensions, or even bona fide intentions, of the nations which form the alliance. Those excluded react thereto as they deem best.

To contend that, at the San Francisco Conference, such a United States-west Europe alliance—to the exclusion of Russia—was contemplated, and that Russia nevertheless signed the UN Charter, is to deal in nonsense. To claim that such a Russia-excluded alliance was indicated by the debates at that conference or in Congress when the UN Charter was under discussion in 1945 is to falsify the record of those proceedings; so far as my examination and inquiry has disclosed, supplemented by my independent recollection. In fact, the controlling concept—aside from any secret intentions—was cooperation of the two new controlling powers, Russia and America; with the UN being utilized to this end to the extent that this might be possible under its express Charter limitations such as the veto. This was the basis on which the UN Charter was ratified by the Senate with popular approval, despite the fact that, as we shall see later, there was a secret British-United States agreement to police the post-war world to the exclusion of Russia, dating back to 1941 at the Roosevelt-Churchill Atlantic Charter conference. This British balance-of-power scheme, with Roosevelt and Truman cleverly inveigled into it, by Churchill chiefly, was more than matched of course by the Kremlin despots' well-known and long-known intentions to use every such instrumentality (like the UN) as a mere tool to advance their world-conquest aims. Surely neither British nor Russo-Communist power politicking is a sound guide for America.

In an attempt to justify the pact as being within the bounds of the UN Charter, its supporters resort to the most strained construction—in truth misconstruction—of its provisions, such as the merely permissive provision of article 51; which did nothing but recognize the continuing existence of member nations' right to act in self-defense. The provision created no obligation, legal or moral. Apart from its expressly created obligations, the UN Charter left unimpaired America's freedom to act in keeping with her tradition and governing principles in international relations. America's joining the UN, therefore, did not impair the force or validity of our Nation's lifelong tradition here under discussion.

The pact hangs suspended in mid-air therefore, so to speak—lacking any support whatever—so far as concerns America's heretofore controlling tradition against involvement in such military alliances with the Old World; and in the accompanying war-breeding balance-of-power politics of Old World nations—Britain's chief of all, as the record shows.

THE BRITISH (CHURCHILL) ORIGIN OF THIS "TRIPLE-THREAT" PACT

A just estimate of the true character of this pact, having in mind its implications and potentialities for evil results for America, cannot be made without considering its three basic aspects—military, political and economic—and the fact that the mind which germinated the key concepts, respecting each aspect, was that of the wily Churchill—most skillful in manipulating the minds and emotions of men—in America. It is noteworthy that in 1944 he told the Polish General Anders that:

"Perhaps after this war we (Britain) shall no longer be as strong (as before) but in any case we shall be more skillful than others."

How true; Churchill himself above all others—especially when it comes to manipulating the minds and moods of various American leaders, political and otherwise, and of a substantial segment of American public opinion. This skillful Briton is the chief architect of the three basic ideas underlying the pact:

(1) An alliance between America, on the one hand, and Britain and her continental allies (in the main) on the other hand, making available to Britain America's vast military power for use in the centuries-old British "game" of manipulating other nations in support of her aims against her chief continental rival of the moment, in the contest for power dominance in Europe and southern Asia; against Germany of late, now against Russia (but note Britain's power politicking against Russia in the thirties; in the war);

(2) Political collaboration by America with Britain (and her dominions or Commonwealth associate nations) looking toward "common citizenship"—in other words, drawing America's vast strength into the common pool (politically) on which Britain can draw in furthering her imperial aims; with a British bloc in Europe in tow; to create the next world-wide British system (per Smuts, 1943);

(3) Making America's vast economic strength in effect a tool of the bankrupt British Empire as distinguished from the separate, solvent dominions), of bankrupt Britain; to the twin ends of furthering her military security and the creation of her proposed new empire, based on utilization chiefly of Africa's resources.

All done so skillfully, of course, that American leaders (political and otherwise) are permitted to enjoy the role of seeming leadership; indeed, carefully indoctrinated with the false notion that they are the originators of the key ideas and plans—in reality conceived and skillfully "planted" by the adroit Britons, power politicians par excellence. As Churchill put it on his and their behalf: " * * * we shall be more skillful than others."

CHURCHILL ORIGINATES THE MILITARY ALLIANCE PLAN IN 1941

Churchill brought to the meeting in August 1941 several schemes for President Roosevelt's consideration; all interrelated, dovetailing with his plan to get the President's cooperation in bringing America into the war and furthering the postwar Churchill plans for British-United States teamwork.

Besides his plan for a joint United States-British ultimatum to Japan, he obtained the President's approval of his scheme to have British-American forces police the postwar world; to the exclusion of Russia, of course. This was highly secret until revealed by the testimony of then Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles, who was at the conference, testifying in the Pearl Harbor congressional investigation in late 1945.

The plan included a scheme, in effect, to use any future league of nations as a screen behind which to carry on this British-American world-policing activity, as will be noted in detail hereinafter. This too was highly secret until the Welles testimony in 1945.

Churchill also brought to this meeting his drafted ideas for a so-called Atlantic Charter; to be publicized as the main work of the meeting and to serve as a prowar emotional appeal for Americans and as a war-slogan type of propaganda for the Allies. Hopkins recorded that the British group, with whom he proceeded to this conference, considered this Atlantic Charter as being not much more than a publicity hand-out. While Roosevelt's attitude toward it—never even written into shape as a formal document—is indicated by these remarks of Senator Vandenberg in January 1945, protesting against the President's flippant treatment of the subject in a recent announcement:

"I am sure the President does not anticipate the shocking results of his recent almost jocular, and even cynical, dismissal of the Atlantic Charter as a mere collection of fragmentary notes. It jarred America to its very hearthstones. It seemed to make a mere pretense of what has been an inspiringly accepted fact. It seemed almost to sanction alien contempt. * * * The President's statement was utterly devastating in its impact."

The Atlantic Charter served effectively as a cloak for the real business transacted at this August 1941 meeting as above indicated. It should be noted that the plan, then approved, for a postwar British-American working military alliance was in line with the plans agreed upon by British-United States authorities even earlier in the year 1941, involving the adoption by United States officials of objectives of the Roosevelt administration, including prevention of the disruption of the British Empire and eventual establishment in Europe and Asia of balance of power. The President and Churchill had long been in close and frequent communication long before this August 1941 meeting.

Thus we find Churchill laying the basis in 1941 for the military alliance of America with Britain and her continental allies, now in the form of the military part of the North Atlantic Pact. Bring it into being under the sanction, allegedly, of the United Nations Charter also stems from that 1941 meeting, as is clearly apparent. It is not too much to say that America's postwar foreign policy was thus channeled—its pattern set—in August 1941: our British-American policy, that is. The chronological review of postwar developments hereinafter will make this startlingly clear to those who have not followed closely events in this connection.

CHURCHILL ORIGINATES THE BASIC POLITICAL ASPECT OF THE PACT

The underlying political consideration of prime consequence, from the standpoint of Churchill's long-range program for British-American collaboration, was expressed by him in Parliament in mid-1940; saying that the trend toward closer collaboration was irresistible and:

"If this trend should lead to the same kind of consummation as we hoped for in the case of France—namely, eventual common citizenship—all the devils of this war will have been almost worth while."

At Harvard, in 1943, he again expressed the hope that common citizenship would be the eventual outcome of ever-closer British-American relations; and periodically since then, especially since VJ-day, he had reiterated this hope. He seems to voice in this regard the sentiments of his farsighted fellow British planners, and even of some Americans who, for various reasons, desire to see the result of 1776 reversed, in effect, in this respect—some deluded by the absurd notion that America's fate is so interwoven with Britain's that we must stand or fall together.

CHURCHILL ORIGINATES THE BASIC ECONOMIC ASPECT OF THE PACT

America's upholding the British Empire economically is the underlying prime economic aim of the pact—not express but nevertheless true; supplemented by the aim of British-American collaboration with other nations cooperatively minded with respect to British-American aims in general—military, political, economic with regard especially to the power contest in the Old World with Russia.

According to Churchill, he was instrumental in inducing President Roosevelt to evolve the original lend-lease program. In the middle of the war he also succeeded so well in influencing Roosevelt's thinking with respect to postwar lend-lease aid to the British Empire that by 1944 he secured Roosevelt's promise of the first installment of about $5,500,000,000—the beginning of what Morgenthau called phase II of lend-lease that would follow VE-day. Note that in January 1948 the first official disclosure of how much Britain would get under the Marshall plan occurred, the sum being estimated at $5,348,000,000—just what Churchill had arranged in 1944, at his Quebec Conference with President Roosevelt. Morgenthau, who was present there, had previously discussed the subject with Churchill in London, when Churchill told him that Britain would be bankrupt on the day the war ended and that only continued lend-lease could help her recover. At Quebec, according to Morgenthau, Churchill's chief nonmilitary objective was to obtain the desired postwar lend-lease aid—then arranged with such satisfaction to Churchill that he had tears in his eyes when he thanked the President. "Eventually we agreed on a program for the first year of phase II of about $5,500,000,000" as Morgenthau puts it. By no coincidence, it was at this meeting that Morgenthau obtained Churchill's consent to the Morgenthau plan regarding Germany. Morgenthau reported that Churchill's consent was influenced by the consideration so important to British trade; namely because Britain would thereby acquire many of Germany's iron and steel markets and thus eliminate a dangerous competitor.

(Per Hull's memoirs.)

Roosevelt wrote Hull a memorandum in this connection explaining the aim of saving the British Empire economically, saying, * * * The real nub of the situation is to keep Britain from going into complete bankruptcy at the end of the war. * * * I just cannot go along with the idea of seeing the British Empire collapse financially. * * *

In 1948 President Truman admitted that the March 1947 Truman Doctrine program was just preliminary to the June Marshall-plan program, which a reliable report states stemmed specifically from top-secret conversations between Secretary Marshall and Foreign Minister Bevin in January 1947. In 1948 congressional and administration work on carrying out the plan for Marshall-plan aid was so intertwined with preparations for military lend-lease and other aspects of the North Atlantic Pact and the underlying Senate (Vandenberg) resolution in May 1948 that the relationship is unmistakable, part and parcel of the same long-range planning, primarily by Churchill. To him is due the lion's share of the credit therefor.

It is noteworthy at this point that in August 1945, soon after taking office, Foreign Minister Bevin prepared a plan for the development of Britain's new empire—largely in Africa, also in the Middle East in part. The plan was outlined in a memorandum explaining that Britain would work with native peoples primarily, not through their pashas (leaders), a copy of this "peoples, not pashas" document having been requested reportedly by General Marshall at the Moscow meeting in the spring of 1947. Here we find the origin, presumably, of President Truman's "point 4" program of January 1949 to have America's resources used to develop backward areas in Africa principally, also in the Mid-East; also now part of the aim of the Marshall plan acknowledgedly, though at first vehemently denied. The origin in part only, though, if reports be true that the pact's main features were discussed in 1944 at Bretton Woods Conference meetings. Other areas within the scope of British influence, diminishing but for the moment anyway existent, will presumably be included gradually in this program for American economic development; southeast Asia and so on.

BROWDER MATCHED THE "POINT 4" PROGRAM IN 1944

Most interesting of all, however, and also noteworthy here, is the fact that, in that same year in which Churchill gained the promise of the first year of postwar lend-lease aid, the Communist chief in America, Earl Browder, wrote a book (then published) which not only urged the Truman "point 4" program but, according to Henry Hazlitt (Newsweek, April 11, 1949), did so in quite identical terms and even language. The book "Teheran: Our Path in War And Peace," is quoted by Hazlitt thus: partly:

"* * * America can underwrite a gigantic program of the industrialization of Africa, to be launched immediately * * * (after the war) * * * It must initiate a general and steady rise in the standard of life of the African peoples * * * Closely related socially, economically, and politically with Africa are the Near Eastern countries * * * Here also a broad regional program of economic development is called for * * * (also in South America) * * * The Government can do it, if 'free enterprise' fails to meet the challenge and bogs down on the job. Our Government can create a series of giant industrial development corporations, each in partnership with some other government or group of governments, and set them to work upon large-scale plans of railroad and highway building, agricultural and industrial development, and all-round modernization in all the devastated areas of the world. America has the skilled technicians capable of producing the plans for such projects, sufficient to get them under way, within a 6-month period of time after the decision is made * * * On a world scale the combined projects could be self-liquidating in the period of a generation. They would become the best investments the American capitalist class had ever made in its whole history * * *"

Browder was then official head of the Communist, (Kremlin-headed) "party" (really conspiracy) in America; and so was, of course, seeking as always to further not America's but the Kremlin's aims and welfare. How odd that the Kremlin-Browder plan for America's postwar spending in endless billions should have set the pattern for both the 1945 Berlin "Peoples, not pashas" plan and for the 1949 Truman "Point 4" program under the "North Atlantic Pact." America seems to be caught in the cross-ruff between London and Moscow. The British Empire has much to gain through America's depleting her already overstrained resources and industry to help create another British empire in Africa and the Mid-East; but Russia has far more to gain through our being trapped into carrying out this Browder plan. It is in line with the Kremlin's tactic of "conquest through bankruptcy"—here to be applied by inducing America to bankrupt herself in support of this program; which might be called the London-Moscow Axis plan for America's economic debilitation. The program becomes more significant still, when one considers that Russia's armed forces can take over the Mid-East and Europe today at will; and then easily dominate North and East Africa—all Eurasia in fact, as we shall now see. So any developments there with American resources would amount to their preparation not for America's nor even for Britain's benefit—but for the Kremlin's only; being subject to her seizure at will. This grim fact puts a new light on Browder's program for America; and, inescapably, on the British plan which is the twin underpinning of the Truman "Point 4" program.

This is even more significant when one pauses to consider that Russia can, and certainly will, maintain the power dominance which she now possesses in Eurasia and vicinity; for reasons now to be discussed.

RUSSIA HAS POWER DOMINANCE OVER EURASIA AND VICINITY

(a) Russia can overrun Europe at will

The fact that Russia can overrun Europe at will is not the result of events since VJ-day. Russia's power automatically filled the vacuum left by the demise of Germany's power—on VE-day; when Russia became militarily supreme, in fact, throughout Eurasia and vicinity. This was obvious even in 1945, when I used this era-starting fact as the basic factor of the foreign policy program for America which I then proposed in a book-manuscript—in line, generally, with the principles presented in exhibit "A" hereinafter. The fact has just become more obvious since 1945.

This Russian supremacy in Europe, in terms of power dominance—latent though it be until Russia chooses to exercise it—was foreseen clearly during the war by American and British leaders. By 1943, for example, America's highest military authorities—and presumably their British military collaborators—conceded officially that this would be the postwar power picture. At the 1943 Quebec Conference, says R. E. Sherwood—writing on the basis of Harry Hopkins secret papers—

"* * * Hopkins had with him at the Quebec Conference a document headed 'Russia's position, which was quoted from 'a very high-level United States military strategic estimate' (the source was otherwise unidentified). It contained the following: 'Russia's postwar position in Europe will be a dominant one. With Germany crushed, there is no power in Europe to oppose her tremendous military forces. It is true that Great Britain is building up a position in the Mediterranean vis-a-vis Russia that she may find useful in balancing power in Europe. However, even here she may not be able to oppose Russia unless she is otherwise supported. The conclusions from the foregoing are obvious. Since Mediterranean vis-à-vis Russia that she may find useful in balancing power in Russia is the decisive factor in the war she must be given every assistance, and every effort must be made to obtain her friendship. Likewise, since without question she will dominate Europe on the defeat of the Axis, it is even more essential to develop and maintain the most friendly relations with Russia' * * *"

The United States military high command still hold to this 1943 decision—that Russia would have complete power dominance over Europe after the war. Numerous reports from responsible sources are available to support this conclusion. One noteworthy report is a composite study, by the New York Times Washington Bureau's most experienced men, of military opinion in Washington in September 1948; reflected in their report as follows: "* * * all studies by the Joint Chiefs of Staff here concede that the small forces of the western powers west of the Elbe River could not do more than hold any Soviet advance for more than a few days or weeks at the most. There is agreement, in short, that the Russians have the power to stop the airlift whenever they wish, and that they also have the military forces to sweep to the North Sea and the Atlantic within a very short space of time * * *"

In the past few weeks, this still controlling opinion of United States military leaders was evidenced by the statement on the floor of the House, by Representative Cannon, that: "All military experts agree that Russia would occupy the entire European Continent within 90 days after the opening of hostilities." Various reliable reports of top military opinion put the time limit much shorter than 90 days, in fact, reflected in December 1947 by the public admission by the chairman and other members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee that it would take a few days or weeks at most—Chairman Eaton putting it at 24 hours.

British leaders also knew this would be the result after crushing Germany. British military leaders were present in Washington as part of the British-American Combined Joint Chiefs of Staff—top policy-making, military-control body all during the war; and, of course, knew about and doubtless joined in the decision referred to in the 1943 Hopkins memorandum above quoted. Indeed, as soon as the event of Pearl Harbor brought America into the war—guaranteeing Britain against final defeat by Germany, Churchill started his unremitting efforts to prevent Germany from being crushed by direct attack by American armies. He tried endlessly and vigorously to divert the American armies into the Mediterranean and Balkan areas to head off Russia—to keep her out of Europe. He continued these maneuverings right up to the time, almost, of the invasions of France—from the West and South. He wanted to preserve Germany's might substantially, to help hold Russia in check; in line with the British aim in the thirties of helping to rebuild Germany's military might to "balance" Russia's growing military strength and her threat to British Eurasian interests. The full details of this Churchill wartime course are fully recorded in the writings of Stimson, Hopkins, and others. The British leaders, political and military, knew full well during the war that Russia's power dominance over Europe would be complete and unchallengeable. There is nothing surprising in today's power picture.

It should be noted, in passing, that it is fallacious to contend—as some do—that Churchill's wartime course above-mentioned was sound for us and that America's leaders should not have done as they did: insist that America's armies attack America's official enemy, Germany, and not join in the Churchill double-cross-of-Russia plan. (America's military leaders were adamant on this score, though for a time Churchill succeeded in swaying Roosevelt in line with his aim.) This typical piece of British balance-of-power maneuvering—against the future strongest continental power even while allied with her in war—well illustrates the spurious nature of Old World "war aims" and objectives and the evil nature of Old World power politics, especially the British balance-of-power phase of it. The fact that America now wishes, and soundly too, that her efforts in the war (which were decisive in crushing Germany completely) had not happened, since it had the awful effect—as of VE-day—of establishing power dominance of the godless despots of the Kremlin over all Eurasia and vicinity, beyond question or effective challenge, is no reason for saying that America should have joined in that Churchill wartime scheme. Rather does the fact argue against the soundness of America's entering into the Old World's endless power politicking, by entering into the war against Germany, in the first place; which gains support from the now-known facts about the German military leaders' preparations prior to Munich to oust Hitler and his Nazis from control of Germany and about their repeated attempts to do so—even trying to have him assassinated during the war. The Churchill wartime balance-of-power maneuverings against Russia illustrate the wisdom and value of America's tradition before mentioned—against involvement in the power politics and wars of the Old World, in part because America cannot hope to better things by participating therein. Witness today's results!

In 1946 the British Imperial Military Conference decided, per reliable reports, that no power exists which can bar Russia from overrunning Europe at will. The French military chiefs agree; they having even asked the Spanish Government in 1947 for permission for the French army to escape across Spain to North Africa in case of Russian attack. Franco states that he refused, saying that men, armies, should stay and defend their country. Numerous reliable reports state that the French military leaders concede that Russia's forces could reach the Channel coast in a few days. A reliable report states that in 1948 General deGaulle even said that a defending force of some 50 divisions (about 500,000 men) "would create an army of prisoners again." "A gigantic Dunkerque," said British leaders in 1948. Recently the Italian Senate was told by Premier deGasperi that Italy is powerless to defend herself; that in case of war Italy would probably be cut in two and would have an internal war on her hands (with over 2,000,000 Communists in Italy). Italy is not only limited by the war treaty to few arms but is notoriously lacking in both capacity and will to fight. Italy is a military liability to any wartime ally of hers, as the Germans knew—they having made Mussolini promise not to enter the war.

Germany is disarmed and the Russians have the power and the determination to see to it that she is not rearmed; except to the extent, of course, that Russia controls the rearmed forces for all practical purposes. Any Germans who fight in a Russo-American war will fight with Russia; since she can overrun Germany quickly and wipe any unwilling Germans out of existence in short order. The French, too, will see to it that Germany is not rearmed; the prime condition on which France signed the "North Atlantic Pact"—as Schuman assured the French people on his return from the signing ceremony. The French fear a rearmed Germany above all else. Not even West Germans can be rearmed—as an American ally.

Spain is utterly impotent today and does not have any basis—economic or otherwise—for the creation of a substantial military force. Nor could Spain, even if possessed of a huge army, serve as a base for American forces in a Russo-American war because Russia's air power, quickly based in France, and even operating from her present bases (including in Albania), would control the air over Spain and therefore dominate ground operations too. Air supremacy, over a given area, virtually controls ground operations there. United States military chiefs think Spain could last 30 days, reportedly.

The remainder of Europe is divided into various small, widely separated, nations; all so insignificant militarily, compared to Russia's steadily growing might—especially her air power—as to be unworthy of discussion in connection with Russia's capacity to overrun Europe. Besides, the two nations which could put up some real fight are confirmed neutrals, Sweden and Switzerland; some real fight, that is, in brief local defense efforts.

Overwhelming, incontrovertible evidence is available that there is no basis for assuming that Russia cannot overrun Europe at will; and that all military leaders know it full well.

With Germany, even when restored economically, counted out militarily, and Sweden and Switzerland too, for purposes of armed resistance to Russia in terms of vast preparations therefor, there is no basis in all the rest of Europe economically for the creation and support of a vast war machine capable of offering more than token resistance to Russia's invading forces. Such a force would have to constitute a single organization—ready for quick action at all times, ready to put up massive resistance continually with the aid of air supremacy over west Europe; in these and other respects being able to match Russia's vast power. Russia's instant seizure of the oil fields of the Mid-East would alone strangle west Europe's economy and prevent any mechanized forces it might have from operating more than briefly with fuel stocks on hand at the outbreak of war.

Even if France and the Low Countries could hold out for a while—not the case, of course—this would be of no basic significance because the United States does not possess the manpower sufficient to provide ground forces in the millions which would be necessary even to fight against the Russian forces in west Europe; even if America could establish them in Europe after hostilities commence, which would be impossible. Note that America had only 1,500,000 foot soldiers in World War II because of the need of a huge navy and air forces; which would be needed to invade Eurasia again. Britain's small forces moreover, could not and would not fight; for a controlling reason which will be discussed shortly; namely, the British Isles are indefensible against Russia's air weapons—powerless against Russia, therefore, in war.

This has to do in part with Russia's capacity to exercise air supremacy over west Europe at will today; and continually. Her mighty air force, second to none in technical respects according to reliable reports or rather estimates—since accurate information regarding it is lacking, due to her tight blockade on information—has the benefit of all German research in the past, the aid of many top German experts since the war, and the use of many of Germany's factories devoted to aircraft development and manufacture. Aided by her spy system in America, it must be assumed that she has the benefit of the most advanced scientific developments and, in part through east Germany, the most advanced techniques. Russia's air force today is overwhelmingly superior to all others in terms of its primary mission—controlling the air over Russia and being able, next, to exercise air supremacy over west Europe.

West Europe has no air force today and Britain's is small. Russia will certainly see to it that she maintains her vast supremacy in this regard; which will be easy in any event and doubly so for the reason that bankrupt Britain and Europe cannot afford, do not have the resources, to build, and keep on renewing with constantly improving models, a vast air force. Nor can America fill that need, besides her own.

This air supremacy would be exercised on the day war would commence, at the Kremlin's signal; giving Russia the benefit of complete "surprise." Throughout west Europe, and in Britain, fifth columns could easily sabotage all military airfield runways just before dawn—rendering them useless for a few hours at least. So no defending planes, or few at best, could take to the air to oppose the quickly following Russian bombers, at dawn, which would help to make those runways useless for the time being. Suicide airborne forces would aid in this work. In west Europe, fifth-column fighting forces (France has some 1,000,000 Communists and Italy 2,000,000, respectively, for instance), aided by Russian airborne troops, would seize key military airfields for their own use; quickly repairing any damage—while the initial air battle would be going on between any west-defending aircraft which might get into the air, only to meet overwhelming Russian superiority there. Any British air force would, at best, be concentrating on trying to make Britain secure; helpless, at best, to aid west Europe, and unwilling to risk it under such circumstances, as in 1940.

With air opposition in west Europe eliminated at the outset, and with her air-fuel supplies provided by east Europe sources, it would be easy for Russia to maintain air-control over Europe continually. And Britain could not, therefore would not, seek to contest that control there because the British Isles are indefensible.

(b) The British Isles are indefensible, against Russia

In 1946, if not earlier, the British Joint Chiefs of Staff advised the Government that the British Isles are indefensible against the Russians' V-2 alone, of the 1945 German type with a nonatomic warhead. It has since been greatly improved, reportedly, by Russia; she having captured the manufacturing facilities therefor and the personnel for making them; and has had the aid of top German experts in this field. Russia has been steadily manufacturing them since the war; no doubt having a large supply already. There is no known defense to this weapon; and the development of any defense seems to be a long-range and problematical matter, at best. Quickly establishing launching sites in west Europe (even if she cannot fire them into Britain from east Europe), Russia would shower them on densely populated Britain. This would support greatly the continuing attempt of the massive Russian forces to gain air supremacy over Britain; even if not gained quickly in the manner mentioned above.

The people of the British Isles cannot, and therefore will not, fight against Russia under these circumstances. This is the practical meaning of that 1946 decision of the British military leaders that the British Isles are indefensible against the V-2 alone. It is worse than futile to assume otherwise; indeed, dangerous in the extreme. Any such false assumption can serve as nothing but a trap—for America.

(c) The Mideast can be seized by Russia at will

A reliable report from Turkey in 1948 stated that no one there expected the fighting to last more than a few days if Russian forces should attack; aided, of course, by immediately establishing control over the air there. The military airfields in the Mideast, if any, then possessed by Britain and America, would be quickly put out of use by fifth column action supplemented by Russian air attack. There can be no effective, substantial opposition in war to Russia in the mid-east; and it is admitted by our military authorities, officially; according to a Senate investigating committee report.

(d) Russia-over-Europe means Russia-over-north Africa

From air bases in southern Europe, at the outset in Albania and Bulgaria, Russia could easily knock out any British-American air bases in the Mediterranean and north Africa; with the potent aid in the latter place particularly of fifth columnists. With airfield runways sabotaged on the day war would start, this would be easy to accomplish.

(e) Japan is indefensible, like Britain

For the same reasons that the British Isles are powerless against Russia's air weapons—notably the V-2, Japan is indefensible. More so, in fact, because of the density of Japan's population; the fact that Russia's air bases and V-2 launching sites are now within easy reach of Japan—on the mainland and on Sakhalin Island to the north; and because of the substantial and rapidly growing Communist fifth column in Japan. Russian Communist (Chinese) forces over-running middle China in recent months has merely emphasized this post-VJ-day situation.

Japan is bound by her constitution not to rearm; and it is silly to assume that Russia would sit idly by and permit her to rearm or to be rearmed by America. Some military planners for a time advocated that America rearm Japan and plan to use her as an "ally" against Russia; but this "summer madness" has now passed. America's military authorities, and political chiefs, now recognize the obvious—that Japan is indefensible; a condition existing on VJ-day and never changed. It is just more obvious now to more people.

America's military leaders now expect Japan to remain neutral, at best, in any Russo-American war. As General MacArthur put it, Japan is expected to be "the Switzerland" of the Far East; according to a report in recent months.

(f) No air bases for America there; no fighting allies either

The foregoing means that, in war, America would not have the use of any air bases in Britain, Japan, north Africa or Eurasia, Russia's powersphere. Worse still, America would have no fighting allies in those regions.

EUROPE DOES NOT HAVE THE WILL TO FIGHT RUSSIA

The peoples of Europe do not have the will to fight Russia; in part because they know that they do not now have, and can never have, the capacity to do so effectively. Sweden and Switzerland cling fast to their traditional neutrality. French, Italian and Spanish pro-Communist or Communist sections of the population are so great in those countries that any attempt to fight Russia would bring on bitter and disastrous civil wars. It has already been noted that the Italian Premier said so recently with respect to Italy; while French officials make no bones about it regarding their country also—there being some two million Italian Communists and one million more or less in France. Even if they had the capacity to fight effectively, which is lacking, the non-Communist Socialists of west Europe have little stomach for war; and less for war against other Socialists (like the Communists) and with capitalist America, judging by reliable reports at hand. The fact that the defeated forces in Spain's civil war are silent under the iron control of Franco does not by any means prove that they could not ably sabotage any war effort by Franco's regime against Russian forces.

The remainder of the peoples of Europe, so separated and small and conscious of their helplessness against Russia—despite brave talk in order to get on America's list of favored nations, recipients of American largesse in the many millions—that they too lack the substance of the will to make war on America's side against Russia.

All Europe knows that America cannot save them against Russian invading forces; and that, at best, America could try to liberate them after years of Russian occupation. As the French Premier has said in protest against this prospect, any liberating America might prove able to do would have the effect of "liberating" a corpse. The evidence available is conclusive—that the peoples of Europe are lacking this will to fight.

The lack of the will to fight under these circumstances is most understandable, and it cannot be cured by any amount of arms—doomed to be inadequate, against Russia's vast war power, no matter how great.

AMERICA'S ATOMIC BOMB IS NO ANSWER

America's atomic bomb cannot save Europe from Russia's air blitz and over-running ground forces, when the Kremlin gives the signal. It could only have the effect of pressuring Russia to withdraw from Europe to prevent disastrous use against targets in Russia; that is, if America could deliver the bomb effectively, in fact decisively, against Russia targets—which is impossible in wartime, for the following reasons, in part.

Russia would be the one to start the war, so would do so only when she would be completely prepared to counter America's air attacks effectively. These air attacks would have to be trans-Arctic, since America would not have the use of any bases in Britain or Eurasia or north Africa or Japan, as previously explained. Due to the vast distances involved, from North American bases to Russian targets, the United States bombers would arrive over Russia without protecting escort fighters, and in fairly small numbers—being limited by the limited supply of atomic bombs. They would arrive in daylight, which would continue, because in summer there is no real night in north Russia—only a few hours of twilight, and Russia would no doubt take advantage of this season. This would facilitate air defense operations immensely. Russian high-flying big-bomber-type planes, carrying special radar-patrol equipment and keeping the entire northern borders of Russia well patrolled—supplemented by some ground installations also—would easily detect the invading United States bombers; and the radar-scout planes would then trail the invaders so as to be able to direct defending aircraft against them. The invaders could not escape or hide; and the effect of the aurora borealis in the extreme north would not impair this spotting-trailing operation of the Russian planes, as they would operate in the region not seriously affected thereby—to the south of the region where this phenomenon impairs the operation of radar.

As the invading planes would move south over Russia's vast distances in search of their targets, they would encounter relays of massed defending planes fully capable of equally high-flying (perhaps of bomber size) and equally fast or faster, being free of the weight and other handicaps incident to bomb-carrying. They would be armed moreover, with rocket-firing weapons, shooting rockets with "homing" devices (which make them search out and follow the target-plane unerringly) and proximity fuzes (causing the rocket to explode when in the near vicinity of the target-plane), thus making almost certain a fatal attack on the invading bombers—having in mind the shower of rockets each defending plane would fire and the large number of such planes to be encountered in relays, the more the farther Russian territory is penetrated. Once in the general area of any prime target, moreover, if successful in getting there, massed air defenses would be encountered plus vastly improved ground defenses (antiaircraft) using similar missiles with immense effectiveness compared to World War II conditions. It is believed that these and other factors compel the conclusion that invading bombers cannot effectively, much less decisively, "deliver" bombs in wartime from North America against the effective defenses which Russia must be assumed to have; or against the equally effective defenses which America certainly must have, at all costs.

American bombers invading Russia would, in addition, encounter another problem which is well nigh fatal to precision bombing of a specified target, this is, the lack of air maps which alone permit such bombing with accuracy. No such maps exist with respect to Russia, except in Russia's possession, and she will certainly see to it that they are never obtained in the only way in which this is possible—by air-mapping Russia. Targets' precise location is impracticable by enough miles to make effective bombing improbable, even atomic bombing.

Under these conditions, and under other handicaps which will not be mentioned, United States bombers are believed to be incapable of "delivering" the bombs against Russian targets in wartime effectively, decisively. This is why bombers are obsolete for purposes of intercontinental air war; either way—assuming effective use of all available defenses.

America's atomic bomb is, therefore, not an effective—much less controlling—deterrent against Russia's resorting to force, when it best suits her, to counter any pressure America may seek to apply against her by way of rearming Europe and Britain. Certainly Russia's possession of the atomic bomb, in the not distant future, would rob America of any seeming advantage in this regard; and, in the meantime, America could not possibly arm Europe and Britain massively even by entering upon a huge armaments manufacturing program, which is not feasible or prospective.

It is disastrous self-delusion for America not to face these facts. It is fatal self-delusion for America to make the mistake of underrating the potential enemy (Russia) by inexcusably assuming that she, aided by all German technical experts, is lacking in this or that major respect.

SOME IMPLICATIONS OF THE PRESENT, CONTINUING, FACT OF RUSSIA-OVER-EURASIA AND VICINITY

The hideous fact of Russia's power-dominance over Eurasia and vicinity, her powersphere, has equally hideous implications in relation to the pact. A few of them will be mentioned, briefly.

1. All armaments furnished by America to Europe, and all armaments which Europe may manufacture with American aid (raw materials and money), will be Russia's for the taking whenever she chooses. In effect, they are doomed to be in the same class as if put in a warehouse there, with the key in Russia's possession. They will inescapably increase Russia's war-potential at the expense of America's already limited, over strained war-potential. The increasing armaments will be an increasing "bait" and excuse for Russia.

2. Any manufacturing facilities in Europe will, in war, be available for Russia's use; continually so, because America would certainly not use the atomic bomb on Europe to "aid" Europe—not even on Europe's manufacturing establishments which, in all but a few cases, are in her heavily populated areas. This applies chief of all to the most important manufacturing facilities there—those of Germany, including the Ruhr steel industry. Even if America's military leaders should desire to bomb Europe's industrial centers, this would be extremely difficult in view of the fact that it would have to be done from bases in North America and vicinity—for reasons previously stated; and in opposition to complete air supremacy over Europe held by Russia from the outset of war.

3. All protests to the contrary by some Senators, such as Senator Vandenberg, to the contrary notwithstanding, the entire history of the pact's development—and all the evidence regarding the basis on which it was accepted by the governments of Europe, prove that through the pact America has led the peoples of Europe to believe that America not only has the will to make them secure militarily against Russia but the power too. This is a fraud so gross as to pass all condemnation, because America, alone or with any others who might be fighting allies in a Russo-American war (chiefly New World<sup>1</sup> nations), lacks the power to protect them now and every day that goes by gives Russia's power greater comparative value in this respect—through the consolidation of her control in Eurasia, the development of advanced weapons like the atomic bomb, et cetera. Her already huge air force and mechanized forces, key factors, are leaping ahead daily.

4. By inducing—even outright "pressuring" in some cases—the governments of signatory nations to sign the pact, in part through the use of United States largesse in the many millions (billions in the aggregate) to gain their adherence to the British-American plan formulated in August 1941 (previously mentioned) for British-American policing of the world—to the exclusion of Russia, we have in effect forced a taking of sides by governments, and in effect in substantial degree within each country among the peoples themselves, which is the most dangerous possible development from their standpoint. This taking of sides, if completed by the pact's becoming operative, will produce a situation fraught with the most ghastly consequences for the peoples of Europe—in due course: consequences against which America is powerless to save them harmless. By ratifying, and putting into operation, this pact, America will thus be exercising power without any sense of moral responsibility; creating a situation which invites, if not impels, harsh Russian retaliation against which America is powerless to defend them—even in civil wars and those evil conditions which over a period bring civil strife to the "hot" phase.

5. The futility of the European rearmament program's attempt to create military security for Europe, under the pact, is doubly appalling when one considers the deadly weight of this phase of bankrupting militarism upon the economies of Europe and upon the impoverished lives of her peoples. Even if America should foot the entire cost of equipping and keeping equipped a vast army in Europe, which is inconceivable over the years in endless billions, the upkeep alone would be sufficient of a drain to keep the nations there bankrupt. For America to trap them into indulging in the illusion of "prosperity through rearmament"—through enabling them to manufacture great quantities of arms themselves—would be cruel deception of the peoples, however much it might please the existing regimes there.

6. Any armaments furnished or made possible for existing regimes in Europe, to enable them to maintain themselves in power and block the coming to power of regimes favorably inclined toward the Kremlin, by methods short of violence (perhaps a la Czechoslovakia), would be as ill-advised as they would be incapable of being effective to this end in the long run. This cannot but fan the fires of internal division and bitterness which breed civil war and would help in time to create the very condition which it would be designed to prevent. The frankly declared purpose of the first year's rearmament program, to make existing regimes secure internally, is believed to be the most evil and sinister aspect of the pact; judged by America's traditional policy of noninterference in the domestic affairs of other nations, a basic New World concept, which has been made a part of the United Nations Charter. The fact that the incurably bankrupt regimes of Europe are now living on, being maintained in power in effect by, the American dole of billions, only enhances the inherent evil. Russia's evil course is no example for America.

7. As regards Britain, any armaments furnished her and any armaments-production capacity made possible for her by America cannot benefit America's war potential—strength in war—because of the helplessness of Britain against Russia's air weapons alone, previously discussed. Any part of America's resources poured into Britain for this purpose will be at the expense of our war-potential and without any compensating offset though increased national security, therefore to Russia's gain. Just as ERP billions are keeping in power the Socialist regime in Britain, and keeping out of power their opponents who are advocates of America's non-Socialist philosophy (the Churchill party)—through helping the Socialists to hide the bankruptcy inherent in socialism—so will the pact's program of continuing this aid, in the guise of aiding prosperity through rearmament production, in effect make ERP a long-term program with no end in sight.

THE PACT WILL, IN PRACTICE, GUT OUR NATIONAL SECURITY

8. By stripping America of sorely needed resources, already dangerously stripped by World War II's profligacy especially, for the benefit of Russia's war-potential as above explained, the pact's operation will gut our national security. This will be without adding an ounce of effective military deterrent, so far as offering any block to Russia's overrunning Europe at will and exercising her potential power dominance over the British Isles by air weapons and perhaps otherwise (the dangers of biological and bacteriological warfare exceeding those of atomic warfare, perhaps). Thus to fatten the goose for the Kremlin's killing and delectation, making Europe's conquest—by a gigantic Dunkerque—all the more to her liking and benefit, amounts to a planned Pearl Harbor of monstrous proportions. So to do is to "criminally gamble with our inheritance" indeed, to borrow the Vandenberg words.

THE KREMLIN IS SECRETLY OVERJOYED WITH THE PACT

A few of the reasons why the Kremlin is delighted with the prospect of the pact's operations, listed below, indicate part of the basis why it should not be tied as a millstone to America's neck. These reasons are:

1. It will give the Kremlin the perfect excuse within Russia for a greater and never-ending effort, by the enslaved Russian people, in support of the Kremlin's program. Without the pact, the Kremlin despots might be hard put to it in future years to keep the Russian people in harness psychologically and spiritually, working at fever pitch to build up her economic and war potential; although there is no sound basis for assuming, it seems, that the Kremlin's iron grip can or will be broken in the foreseeable future.

2. It gives Russia's despots the perfect propaganda weapon for use among the peoples of the satellite nations: "Russia and her friendly neighbors surrounded by an armed camp bent on conquest." In this respect, it should be repeated: our intentions, however good, do not control, any military alliance's aggressive character being determined by the excluded nations so far as they are concerned.

3. It feeds the suspicions of a vast portion of the non-Communist people in the various countries of the Old World—those especially who hold to the dreams of socialism of which, many believe, Russia is the motherland and great hope despite "temporary" methods of tyranny—that America, capitalist America, is through the pact merely shopping for allies for another war which will merely victimize Europe, no matter who wins. The many reports from the most reliable sources to this effect make it foolhardy in the extreme for America to assume that the pact will be well received and continually approved over the years by the non-Communists within the nations of Europe—preponderantly Socialists. Ex-Premier Blum of France, dean of French Socialists, for example, has expressed publicly almost equally bitter condemnation of capitalist America and Communist Russia. It is believed that the operations of the pact over the years will aggravate this.

4. The pact will directly benefit Russia's war potential at the expense of America's, increasing her power sphere's military and economic strength.

5. The pact's operation will commit America officially, inescapably, and far beyond the 20-year stated limitation thereof, to the astounding military principle that America's security frontier is in Europe; not even on the Rhine but on the Elbe and even farther east; and, by the same token, on the Euphrates, too, and even the Ganges, as southern Asia is brought into the scope of the pact's logical twin arrangement reportedly now scheduled. This forces America's military chiefs by treaty commitment (on a par with the Constitution itself), beyond the veto of any succeeding Congresses, for 20 years at least, to plan their military operations and military budgets on the premise that each and every signatory nation is—for defense purposes—an integral part of America's defense territory, apropos of Russia. This automatically, inescapably, follows from the pact's basic intent and wording: that an attack on any member nation is to be deemed an attack on every one, including America. The pact thus forces our military leaders, beyond the veto of their judgment, to plan military disaster for America at a time determined by any member nation—worse, at the Kremlin's signal.

6. The pact not only can add nothing to America's national security militarily but guts it in these respects and various others of major consequence.

7. America's economic soundness can be wrecked by the pact's operations and will be if we fulfill its commitments to the other signatories, thus playing into the Kremlin's hands through aiding conquest through bankruptcy of the United States of America.

8. The pact's economic program, for continuing American billions unlimited to be spent in building up Europe's economy and Britain's next world-wide system (per Smuts, 1943)—especially the Mideast and East Africa—is to the Kremlin's order; precisely as Communist Browder specified in that 1944 book previously mentioned. Not only will this help to bankrupt the United States of America, but it will directly enrich Russia's power sphere, including East Africa, which can easily be dominated militarily from the Mideast whenever Russia desires to overrun that latter region, which she can do at will.

9. The pact's political program, aiming at ever-closer political union between the United States of America and Britain and her Commonwealth nations and European allies, to the ultimate end of common citizenship (per Churchill), also pleases the Kremlin. This cannot but tend to further the program of the Socialists (including the Communists) in America to have America progress through the welfare state into benevolent socialism, in keeping with the program (though presumably not the intent) of the Roosevelt-Truman regimes. Since the communism of the Kremlin is the extreme degree of the state-over-man system of socialism, embodying violence and tyranny in place of the inescapably temporary benevolence of intermediate socialism, the Kremlin is pleased indeed with having America set on this road, abandoning her traditions and basic principles, all words to the contrary notwithstanding. The pact's marriage politically, in effect in the long run, of young and virile America to the decrepit old woman of the Old World (Britain and Europe), is enough to make the Kremlin guffaw. They could not have planned it better. History will marvel at the insanity of America's suicide.

THE ARMAMENT PROGRAM'S COST

Not to tell the American people the full truth about the inescapable cost involved in the rearmament of our pact "allies" is to trap them inexcusably, amorally; and, presumably, many Members of Congress who are likewise uninformed of the actual cost which cannot be avoided, once the pact is ratified by the Senate.

A few factors involved will be mentioned. With all weapons, especially the key and most expensive ones, constantly and rapidly changing through new developments—a process which will be endless—there will never come a time when we or our "allies" can be said to be effectively rearméd; in relation to Russia. A warplane, for example, and a tank—two of the key weapons—are outmoded in some key respect as soon as they begin to come off the assembly lines; because at that time new developments are already well advanced in the designing and test-product stages. Therefore, for this reason, the outpouring of billions per year will be endless, even after vast armaments have been built up in Britain and Europe.

Since Russia's superiority in every department of warfare is today completely unquestioned, apropos of Europe—in quantity and quality, and since Russia can overrun Europe at will today (previously discussed), any attempt to rearm Europe against Russia (so as to provide some security against her) will not be a real armaments race. That term implies some degree of equality, which is lacking in this case in every respect, not only as to arms but the basic economic strength and war-minded manpower potential capable of sustaining a long-term struggle in arms competition. Even Britain's jet planes cannot soundly be assumed to be in advance of the Russians', who have the benefit of Germany's extremely advanced scientific and experimental work at the end of the war and since then, through capturing her experimental facilities and experts in the main. Note that "High Air Force officials disclosed today that America's vaunted supersonic rocket plane, the Bell X-1, is 'nothing but a beefed-up copy' of a captured German wartime fighter which was brought to this country aboard an Army C-54 cargo plane in 1945 * * *" (per New York Herald Tribune dispatch, June 13, 1948).

The very impossibility of Europe's catching up with Russia in any respect having to do with military security in any real degree, respecting Russian invasion, is the measure of the unlimited nature of the commitment when America undertakes to rearm Europe so as to provide some real measure of such security. Likewise respecting Britain—undefensible since VJ-day and continually against Russia's air weapons alone, notably the V-2, as previously mentioned.

America's left-over World War II equipment and planes are useless for this purpose because outmoded. Even America's heaviest tank is nothing but a medium tank in Russia's categories of armored vehicles or weapons: and, according to reliable reports, our heaviest tank is not superior to the comparable weight tank of the Russians—perhaps inferior. Russia's tank-manufacturing has been going ahead at a great rate since the war but not ours. To rearm Europe with any effective tanks—capable of standing up in competition with Russia's especially her heavies—America must design and manufacture vastly improved models in vast quantity for use in Europe. This would be futile, of course, because Europe cannot provide armies adequate to stand up before Russia's vast hordes of great fighters; in part because of the lack of will to fight of European peoples, in part because of Russia's present and continuing air supremacy over Europe, potentially; and for other reasons.

To rearm Europe with any real degree of potency, America would have to revert to a wartime manufacturing program and continue it endlessly; because of constantly changing models, et cetera. This, too, would be futile because Russia is constantly geared to go into wartime production instantly, so could easily stay ahead of us in any such competition, with the aid of the tremendous new resources added to her manufacturing capacity, in east Germany and Poland and especially Czechoslovakia (the Skoda works); not to mention the rest of east Europe and potent Manchuria.

Some idea of the cost of providing Europe with a large force, one large enough to offer an appearance of possible temporary opposition to Russian invading forces is gained when one considers the actual cost, per unit, multiplied by the units needed for such a "show." Reliable estimates put the cost of fully equipping a "divisional slice" (in Europe, 10,000 men in the fighting division with all reserves, supporting organizations of supply, etc., great stock piles of ammunition and supplies, etc.) at a quarter of a million dollars; costs being greatly advanced over wartime costs. Even with a fighting force of 2,000,000 in Europe so armed—utterly inadequate against the great millions Russia could march across Europe, with the aid of air supremacy—this would mean 200 divisions and a cost initially of some $50,000,000,000 plus the cost of endlessly replacing the equipment with new parts (replacements) and even with new and improved models of weapons etc. Not to mention the vast expense of annual upkeep!

In addition, the cost of an air force for Europe, in size only a modest part of Russia's steadily increasing air force, would skyrocket these figures sky high in billions, due to the huge cost of ever-changing planes, of the supporting ground organizations needed to operate an air force, and so on.

Even apart from the almost bankrupting needs of America's own military establishment, directly related to making North America itself relatively secure militarily apropos of possible attack from the north, these figures indicate why the pact holds the threat for America of forced bankruptcy, once we undertake the obligations of the pact. These obligations it must be remembered, are what Europe has been led to expect, promised secretly but officially over the past year and a half or more (by the secret United States military mission to France in January 1948, and otherwise) per reports.

Indeed, such reports are available in quantity; reports of the most reliable nature. Not only do our "allies" expect such substantial support militarily, with the latest equipment in every category—they demand it.

Not long ago, Foreign Minister Schuman of France described the pact as providing the contractual basis for a United States supply of arms to Europe; and they mean for security against invasion, not just a bait for Russia to invade them with the possibility of later liberation—of a corpse, as Premier Queuille has put it.

All pretensions to the contrary, that the pact does not contemplate such a huge armaments program as Europe expects, constitute a fraud on either them or on the American people. To lull the people to overlook these disastrous implications of the pact, with talk about only the first year's cost, is the height of deceit. In this connection, faced with the truth—the full facts—the American people would ask with Senator Connally (per his remarks on January 10, 1948):

"We can't go on supporting these people for the rest of their lives. Why is it our responsibility to raise their level of production above prewar? It is not our obligation to restore all their foreign investments."

That was regarding ERP billions; on top of which will come the pact costs—with every assurance today that Europe will not have closed the dollar gap by 1952, by billions. One is reminded of Senator Vandenberg's declaration against postwar lend-lease, in the Senate in the spring of 1945; stating that America has her own problems and that she cannot be permanent almoner to the world—not and stay solvent. Not unless we wish to continue to play into the Kremlin's hands—as the pact will force us to do, endlessly.

UNITED STATES TROOPS FOR EUROPE—"THE THIRD AEF"

"With the third AEF" was the headline over Newsweek's May 16, 1949, account of the American Air Force units in Britain now; the plan calling for permanent stationing there of such units. Plans for the use of United States troops now in Europe as part of the west Europe defense plans have been 'tacitly approved' by the United States; and the British and French have secretly agreed that an American general will be commander in chief in case of fighting; per reliable recent reports. Some months ago, ex-Chairman Eaton of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, stated that 'we might save ourselves some money' if United States troops should be sent to Greece to help clean up the situation. 'Why don't we send our soldiers into Greece and clean up the guerrillas?' he asked. And also said: " * * * Sooner or later, we're going to have to do something there. As it is, we're just building up the economy so the guerrillas will have something to take over. * * * " He added that he was raising the question for debate. (New York Times, February 14, 1949.) Only last month Army Secretary Royall's secret report to the House Appropriations Committee last March was revealed in part, showing that not only do west Europe nations' leaders 'unanimously' demand that the United States troops now in Europe stay there but that they be increased, per his talks with them while in Europe. Those leaders made 'an insistent request for additional troops,' he said, and he recommended keeping United States troops in Germany even after Germans are given control of their government. Paul Reynaud, former French premier and now member of parliament, declared in New York recently that America would create a favorable psychology in Europe by increasing its armed forces 'west of the Iron curtain' (using that term of Goebbels, not originated by Churchill, reportedly). In December last, General Collins, Vice Chief of Staff of the Army, admitted official consideration of United States forces in Europe being used as part of Marshall Montgomery's west Europe forces. The influential London Times said in 1948 that United States forces were needed 'in France, Holland, and on the Rhine * * *.' These samples indicate the prospect.

THE PACT TO BE FOLLOWED BY OTHER PACTS

The evidence is adequate and convincing that the basic plan, not yet officially admitted in America, calls for similar pacts to cover other regions; in line with that 1941 agreement of Churchill and Roosevelt for British-American forces to police the postwar world; a global undertaking. Pretensions to the contrary by some are merely designed to fool the American people; except in the case of those ignorant or naive souls whose opinions are not worthy of respect.

For instance, last March Foreign Minister Schuman of France stated that the impending pact would not cover the Mediterranean but that a subsidiary pact would have to be made for this purpose. (N. Y. Times March 2, 1949). Foreign Secretary Bevin's planning was made clear, in guarded comments, by Foreign Minister Tsaldaris of Greece, after the two had conversed in London last February; the latter having long advocated a Mediterranean alliance—now contemplated as being a next step after the completion of the "North Atlantic Pact" whose "great power" signatories, he feels, are alone capable of giving the Mediterranean pact reality through power.<sup>1</sup> This is merely part, of course, of the long-standing British (Bevin) program to have America assume Britain's burdens in the Mediterranean; concerning which the record is replete with persuasive evidence—as brought into the open in connection with the "Truman doctrine" maneuvers secretly in 1946 and openly, officially, in March 1947. The similar plans regarding Asiatic areas are also substantially prepared; awaiting only the step-by-step timing process by which America is being drawn deeper and deeper into the British-Old World manipulations. For instance, a most reliable report by

Joseph Alsop, from London, in the New York Herald Tribune of February 16, 1949 stated in part:

"* * * (Bevin) * * * was on the eve of forming India and southeast Asia into another regional grouping like Western Union, when the Dutch attack on Indonesia spoiled his plans * * * (after saying that the British lack the resources to fight communism in that region) * * * This is why men on lower levels here are beginning to talk of the organization of 'fire brigades,' led by America and Britain, for both the Middle and Far East. It is thought that the famous 'Point Four' in President Truman's inaugural address provides the basis for American action, and joint Anglo-American efforts are proposed * * *." So even if delayed for some time, with regard to this or that region, there can be no doubt that the British and others—including of course some of our own officials—are secretly planning additional pacts to supplement the impending one. Pretensions to the contrary are false.

This enhances the danger for America inherent in the "North Atlantic Pact"—an entering wedge to more of the same; ultimately spreading America's limited strength, economic and military, so thin as to be wholly lacking in potency. Even the impending pact will do this to such great degree as to be extremely dangerous; while more "global" overreaching will complete the undermining of America's capacity to be effective in international relations apropos of Russia's well-integrated, concentrated Eurasian operations. Not to mention overstraining America's capacity to be effective, even with regard to her basic defense needs in the New World; thus undermining her national security.

THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE PACT

It has previously been noted that an America-backed British-Europe alliance, to the exclusion of Russia, was not contemplated when the United Nations Charter was being drafted and ratified by the United States and other nations—that is, except perhaps secretly by a few; so that the pact has no sound support in the UN Charter or spirit.

The striking fact about this pact is that it will in effect make the letters "UN" stand not for United Nations but for "Union Now"—the prewar scheme to have America back Britain and her European allies; and join with them in the kind of collaboration and amalgamation now contemplated under the "North Atlantic Pact." That is, in substantial respects; though the Clarence Streit plan for "Union Now" went even further then—and still does—toward political merger than is seemingly envisaged by the pact; at least for the time being.

This pact, falsely claimed to be sanctioned by the basic intentions originally of the UN members and of the American people and Congress in 1945, is in fulfillment of the 1941 Churchill-Roosevelt plan to have any new league of nations (like the UN) function as a cloak to cover for the British-American world-policing (after the war) agreed upon at their Atlantic Charter meeting previously mentioned.

According to the sworn testimony of Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles, who attended the meeting, President Roosevelt told him about this agreement with Churchill for world policing by British-American forces after the war; and, when Welles, concerned about this power-politics program, asked about the role of a future league of nations, the President replied that nothing could be more futile than another assembly like the League of Nations. According to Welles notes made at the time, which served in part as the basis of his testimony, he urged that there be an assembly in which the smaller nations could make their voice heard and participate in formulating the policy, regarding world policing, which the great powers would execute. Agreeing, the President nevertheless said that after the war, in the transition period, no league council or assembly could exercise the powers in question—such as those possessed by the old League of Nations; regarding world policing and so on. Welles also suggested the inclusion, in these police responsibilities, of other nations like the other American Republics, Norway, the Netherlands, and Belgium (those being named by Welles in his notes). Then, according to Welles notes:

"The President replied that he felt that a solution for this difficulty could probably be found through the ostensible joining of those powers to Great Britain and the United States but that it would have to be recognized that this must be only ostensible, since none of the nations mentioned would have the practical means of taking any effective or at least considerable part in the task involved." [Italics added.]

This word "ostensible" means appearing to be what it is not; falsely appearing; appearing to be true but not true. In other words, fake.

The record of the UN since it started operating in January 1946 shows that this plan of 1941—to have small-nation members of the UN serve as a "front" for British-American policing of the postwar world, to the exclusion of Russia, without the smaller nations having any control over the policing policy or operations, has been largely fulfilled. The pact proposes to make official, controlling, this secret 1941 deal. With negligible exceptions, Britain and America have carried out their plans within the UN, in keeping with that 1941 deal; any disagreement of the smaller nations with respect thereto being unavailing. The sudden springing of the "Truman doctrine"—by long prearrangement between Washington and London—in 1947 without any pretense of recognition of the existence, much less the function, of the UN, was a clear indication of the disregard for the UN which is basic to that 1941 deal and all subsequent steps in fulfillment thereof—including the impending pact. The later attempt, in March 1947, to cover the nakedness of that "Truman doctrine" power-politics play with the cloak of the UN Charter—by pious resolutions—only made the mockery more complete.

In November 1945, only a few weeks after VJ-day and long before the first UN Assembly meeting in January 1946, Bevin adopted officially and publicly, in a Parliament speech, that Churchill-Roosevelt deal of August 1941. This was soon after the close of the disastrous meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in London, when British and Communist Russian imperialisms came to grips for the first time in the postwar period, the fight being bitter. In this Parliament speech Bevin said that Britain would have close ties with her European neighbors, matching Russia's close ties with her own neighbors; and, in a remarkably frank statement, said:

"* * * Britain's policy is to keep on policing the world as she has always tried to do—until a league of nations is developed which can be trusted with the atomic bomb. * * *

In this same speech Bevin said: "Sometimes in these negotiations—I make the confession—power politics seems to me to be naked and unashamed. * * *

A few days later, and long before any conflict over the veto power had developed in the UN—even months before the first UN Assembly meeting—this Old World power-politics atmosphere was so apparent and widely discussed as being the death potentially of the UN, that the magazine Newsweek was able to report thus (November 12, 1945), re Washington opinion:

"* * * officials now admit the possibility that the postwar world will divide itself into two major blocs, one Anglo-American and one Russian * * * if Russia solidifies an eastern European bloc by rigging the Polish and Balkan elections and dominating the resulting governments, the United States probably will support the British plan for organization of a western European bloc. Then, if the Russian bloc operates within the UNO system, so will the Anglo-American bloc; otherwise on the outside." [Italics added.]

Some claim that the UN was still-born; infected with the deadly poison of power politics at the start. Certainly both Britain and Russia intended to use it as a pawn or tool in their centuries-old game of imperialistic rivalry and power competition. If not still-born, it was barely gasping for life in the fall of 1945; months before its first Assembly meeting permitted it to have even the appearance of life. And surely the Truman Doctrine episode above-mentioned cut its jugular vein. The North Atlantic Pact will not kill the UN—as a genuine organization functioning, in spirit and letter, as contemplated by the American people in 1945; because the UN, as so conceived, has long since been dead. The pact just takes the shroud and seeks to cloak with it the false pretensions of this typical Old World military alliance into which America is now asked to enter; falsely pretending to be in keeping with the 1945 spirit of the UN's basic aim in 1945 of Russo-American cooperation primarily. The evil, power-politics schemes of Russia and Britain cannot excuse America.

THE PLAN FOR A BRITISH-LED EUROPE BLOC TO BALANCE THE POWER OF UNITED STATES AND RUSSIA

In entering into the pact, if she does, America will be on notice that Britain and her European allies are not committing themselves fully to stand with America in all matters; not by any means. Highest British officials have repeatedly stated formally and publicly that their aim and hope is to lead Europe in forming an ultimately powerful bloc which will then serve to balance the power of the United States against the power of Russia and vice versa.

Prime Minister Smuts in 1943, then No. 2 man in the British War Cabinet, called for precisely this arrangement in a speech before a secret meeting of British officialdom; which he repeated in March 1946. Again, as recently as May 1948, Smuts repeated the same plan for Britain:

"* * * If Western Union, with British membership, is thus consummated, a third or middle power group will arise, at least equal to either of the other two (United States, Russia), the security set-up of the world will rest on a triangle of power. That is how I see the future basis of security and world peace."

Note that in that 1943 speech Smuts expressly called for a British-led Western Union movement.

Bevin publicly joined in this "Third Force" balance-of-power plea, in September 1948; saying in Parliament that Britain hopes for a revived western Europe which, with the British Commonwealth, "* * * a force of peace, equality, and equilibrium * * *" (between United States and Russia) will result; creating "* * * a better equilibrium and a better balance in the world between the three powers." At the same time, Eden, deputy leader of the Conservative (Churchill) Party, spoke likewise; saying:

"I am certain that the essential thing in the world today is that the major force should not largely reside in either one or two powers with gigantic resources—the United States or the Soviet Union. It is a fundamentally dangerous position for the world * * *."

And he called for Britain's leadership of Commonwealth and Western Union to balance power between Russia and America. In the following month, October 1948, he emphasized the intermediate aim—pending the creation of the capacity of this "Third Force" to serve as the balance of power—of lining up the British-led group with the United States against Russia, in keeping with the pact's program. A few days later, Bevin, in Parliament, reiterated his "Third Force" aim, of creating a solid combination of Britain, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, and France, and probably other countries, with the Middle East, Pakistan, India, South Africa, and southeast Asia, to serve "as a great equilibrium in the world which may result—and I believe will result—in generations and generations of peaceful development"; permitting this group to serve as the balancing factor between east and west, Russia and the United States.

On September 6, 1948, the Newsweek London Bureau chief reported that "Some American circles in London * * * feel that 'Third Force' Socialists in Britain want to build a European bloc of resistance to the United States as well as to Russia." [Italics added.]

General de Gaulle, of France, has repeatedly urged that Europe balance power between Russia and the United States; but a French-led bloc of course. Among other occasion, he so stated in July 1947 and July 1948. Any such bloc will be British led; as history shows, especially of late.

British leaders thus make no bones about seeking, in time, to be powerful enough, with their European allies primarily, to deal at arms length with both America and Russia; playing one against the other. This is fair warning to America of the trap of Old World alliances, power politics.

THE PACT GIVES OUR "ALLIES" A BLANK CHECK

A chief danger of any alliance such as this pact will constitute, if ratified, lies in its blank-check character; a check signed by America, drawn on all our resources—economic and human, the tools of war—with each of our "allies" having the unfettered power to fill in the date and amount at will. The payee is Mars. The policies and actions of any one of our "allies," over which we have no control, can induce or impel an attack by Russia, for example; thus starting what America would be obligated by the terms of the pact to try to finish—through war with Russia. Her complete power dominance and impregnability in her power sphere, all Eurasia and vicinity, make this situation dangerous in the extreme.

Even short of war, the pact will marry America to the Old World with all its evil power-politics practices; especially British balance-of-power policies and practices in the Old World which, throughout our life as a nation, we have scorned and rejected as a fit standard for America. This can have the most evil consequences for America, even short of war.

British policies, and balance-of-power manipulations, are a strictly British concern so far as America is concerned; except when it comes to America's being drawn into the British web of power politicking. Then it becomes the direct and immediate concern of every citizen—to make sure that America's course is wise and sound and true to American interests, to American ideals and traditions and basic principles and posterity's just heritage for which we are merely temporary trustees.

A sharp warning lies in the fact that the pact itself is the direct outgrowth of skillful maneuvering by British leaders, chiefly Churchill, to draw America into that web. Note, for instance, the 1941 Churchill-Roosevelt deal for British-American world policing, before mentioned; the March 1946 public proclamation of this as a British-American policy—by Churchill at Fulton, Mo., with the President's approval, frankly against Russia; the implementation thereof by the March 1947 declaration of the Truman Doctrine as a prelude to the previously planned Marshall plan publicly announced in June 1948—as a first step to be succeeded by the March 1948 Truman declaration of support for the alliance of Britain and her west Europe allies (Brussels Pact); all as intermediate steps, taken in most intimate collaboration with British leaders, preceding the now impending North Atlantic Pact alliance—of America with this same group of Britain and her European allies primarily. The preceding discussion, and the chronological listing of events in the appendix hereto (exhibit B) clarify this picture. Not to heed it will be to “criminally gamble with our inheritance”—to borrow the phrasing of Senator Vandenberg's 1928 book: The Trail of a tradition.

PERSPECTIVE IS THE NEED

Hindsight is a great aid to foresight. Perspective is essential to wise decision. That Vandenberg book will bear reading in relation to this pact, to each Senator's consideration of the issue. It holds good today.

It should be noted, briefly, that this pact is not the outgrowth of postwar conditions but of prewar and wartime planning by the British and some American leaders—as the chronology (exhibit B) makes clear. Russia's post-VJ-day course is being utilized as the excuse therefor; but that course is not the reason for the pact. In my 1945 book manuscript, for instance, in the guiding principles for a proposed traditional American foreign policy which I suggested in the light of the power facts of this Russo-American era which started on VE-day, I stated that if America tries to oppose Russia's imperialistic aims in the old world and to support the competing British aims, “this will in time logically lead to the American people's coming to believe that this is not only their right but their duty and to believe that they have a mission to fight Russia in Europe in order to enforce this policy—perhaps under Hitler's former slogan: ‘Save Europe from Bolshevism’ * * *” and that America should guard against being involved in any such course, especially stumbling unwittingly along this course. I also warned therein against America's being involved in any alliance such as this pact:

“* * * America's power must not, for the sake of her own welfare and of world peace, be in effect placed directly or indirectly at the disposal of Britain for use by her in playing her age-old game of war-breeding balance-of-power politics in Eurasia; that to permit this would logically, inescapably, lead to America's being placed in the position of challenging Russia—first with words and policies, later with bayonets; that America's cooperation with Britain to this end—either through an open alliance, or by means of a cabal within the United Nations or any other association or league of nations, or otherwise * * *” would in time have evil results.

Written in the summer of 1945, this volume of mine warned at length and vigorously against the dangers stemming from Communists—in America and elsewhere—and against the world-rule aims of the godless despots of the Kremlin. The program for America therein proposed was in keeping with the principles stated in the following exhibit A, in general.

It is noteworthy that in July 1945 former Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles warned, in his syndicated column, that powerful influences were at work in Britain to restore Germany's strength for use against Russia; repeating the mistake Britain made in the thirties in restoring Germany's strength (helping her to rearm, etc.) to balance France's power and the reviving Russian might—having started even in the twenties, in seeking to offset in such ways the great French Army's power dominance in Europe. In his 1942 book, America's Strategy in World Politics, N. J. Spykman, of Yale University, not only predicted such use by Britain of the defeated Germany, after the war, but said America's approval would probably be gained by the British, Spykman approving of this course.

Nothing could be clearer than the fact that Russia's post-VJ-day course is just the excuse, not the cause, of the developments culminating in the new impending North Atlantic Pact.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE VERSUS THE CHURCHILL-ROOSEVELT-TRUMAN DOCTRINE

This pact can legitimately, with complete accuracy, be said to be the expression, in part, of the program initiated by Churchill—reaching back to 1941—and “sold” to Roosevelt and Truman, of which the so-called Truman doctrine was just partial evidence. Hence the term, “the Churchill-Roosevelt-Truman doctrine.”

Further and invaluable perspective regarding the pact can be gained by noting briefly how the Roosevelt-Truman course contrasts with that of the Monroe administration in 1823. We are today falling into the very British trap which America avoided skillfully in that year, if the pact is ratified.

British Foreign Secretary Canning suggested that America join with Britain in blocking the Holy Alliance's aim of aiding Spain in reconquering her former South American colonies, the newly independent republics whose independence Britain had not recognized. The American Minister in London, Rush, passed the suggestion on to Washington for consideration but meanwhile pressed Canning to determine whether he was primarily interested in the freedom of those republics or was merely using it as bait to draw America into support of Britain in her maneuverings against the Holy Alliance and Spain. He quickly decided that the latter was the case and so advised President Monroe, recommending that America have absolutely nothing to do with the scheme, just part of Britain's old balance-of-power maneuvering.

Meanwhile Monroe had consulted various advisers, including former President Jefferson. Note that somewhat earlier, on June 11, 1823, before this matter was initiated by Canning, Jefferson had written Monroe about the power politics and oppressions of liberty in Europe, in this letter condemning British balance-of-power politics and treachery in international dealings in the most scathing terms. His recitals fully explain why Britain has well earned, throughout the centuries, the name Perfidious Albion. In keeping with his never-changing hostility to America's participating in any way at any time in the power politics maneuverings in the Old World, he warned that President Monroe should avoid mixing therein:

“ * * * I have ever deemed it fundamental for the United States never to take active part in the quarrels of Europe. Their mutual jealousies, their balance of power, their complicated alliances, their forms and principles of government, are all foreign to us. They are nations of eternal war * * *.”

In line therewith, holding fast to the eternal value for America of what Senator Vandenberg called the second Declaration of American Independence, as previously noted, Jefferson wrote Monroe on October 24, 1823, about the Canning proposal; stating at the outset that: “Our first and fundamental maxim should be, never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs * * *.”

There, in a nutshell, is the spirit of then soon-to-be-announced Monroe Doctrine's two basic and inseparable principles. Not having been advised, at the time of his October 24 letter (due to delay in mails from England in those days) that Canning's real aim was to have America violate those principles stated by Jefferson, the latter told Monroe that he was willing to see America cooperate with Britain in furtherance of America's aims in the New World only; but never to mix in Britain's power politics in the Old World. Since Canning never had any idea of playing America's New World game and had dropped the subject cold when he saw that Rush was not to be fooled, the Canning scheme died aborning and the Monroe Doctrine was announced as a strictly American doctrine having solely to do with the independence of the New World—expressly rejecting any idea of America's mixing in the power politics, alliances, and wars of the Old World. Monroe and every one of his advisers were in agreement at all times in hostility to the latter idea; Jefferson most of all. The record, even the foregoing small sample thereof, exposes the falsity of statements to the contrary.

The North Atlantic Pact will scuttle the second Declaration of American Independence, the twin principle of the Monroe Doctrine (against America's interference in Old World power politics, through alliances, etc.), and will fly in the face of the advice and consistent policies of the Founders—Jefferson chief of all. This furnishes food for thought indeed; doubly so when one considers that the incurably bankrupt British Eurasian Empire and Europe offer no sound basis on which to build any substantial degree of power to oppose Russia there, she having the power to prevent it.

As said before, Britain's policies are Britain's business; except when her leaders try to draw America into her power politics schemes in the Old World, as in the case of this pact. We must reject it.

Sincerely yours,

(Signed) HAMILTON A. LONG.

A TRADITIONIST'S 10 AMERICAN PRINCIPLES OF A SOUND FOREIGN POLICY IN THIS RUSSO-AMERICAN ERA

(By Hamilton A. Long)

1. America can be effective in foreign affairs only by being so sound and strong—spiritually, socially, economically, governmentally, militarily—as to be always adequately prepared for the relative, reasonable, security of her power sphere (where her power can remain dominant despite any Old World challenge), embracing the New World (Iceland to Alaska, and south), and the mid-Pacific and Australia.

2. America must face the hideous fact that the war gave despotic Russia power-dominance over all Eurasia and vicinity—her power sphere (where her power can remain dominant despite any New World challenge); that Russia can seize Europe, the Mid-East and China's east coast quickly; that her Continent-based air weapons (the V-2 especially) make indefensible and neutralize Britain, Japan, north Africa, and other adjacent areas; and that America must restrict her policy to fit her power's limits fixed by these power-facts, to avoid overextension and certain disaster.

3. America can and should live with all nations, especially Russia in this Russo-American Era, as amicably as possible and work with them as fully as possible; and should take the lead in using constructively all international agencies like the United Nations and not help to pervert them into tools of never changing Old World balance of power politics—as Britain and Russia, for example, always do.

4. America should understand, and be on guard against, the dangers of war-breeding Old World power politics, especially Britain's ceaseless balance of power scheming to use other nation's power as her tool in opposing her strongest rival on the Continent, and the dangers of bankrupting, Old World, militarism and military alliances; never permitting America's course to fit into this disastrous, evil pattern.

5. America can and should live by her New World, American, principles despite—no, because of—the loathesome, cancerous disease, communism, which has attained great potency in the Old World after feeding on its inner decay for a century; and, to have a sound foreign policy and be safeguarded internally, we must understand the Communists' aim of world-rule, the creeping paralysis nature of communism, the fact that it is basically socialism with despotism added (so it cannot be defeated by fostering Socialist regimes, whose state-over-man system paves the way for the despotic degree of state-over-man under tyrant-Socialists, such as Communists), and we must understand that the state-over-man program in America now, of ever-increasing Government controls and welfare-state measures and killing taxes, is part of the initial program of all Socialists, including Communists.

6. America must not start a "preventive" war; nor act in Russia's power sphere in a manner which America would never tolerate at Russia's hands in our power sphere for security reasons, nor do anything in Russia's power sphere which is conducive to armed action by her there in self-defense, as she sees her security need there—her view controlling her actions there, like America's in her own power sphere—because a contrary course will victimize the helpless peoples of Russia's power sphere, whom we cannot defend against her, and blight civilization if war results.

7. America must not increase Russia's Eurasian war-potential, certainly not at the expense of our own—of our dangerously depleted, limited, natural resources constituting mainly a vital part of the just heritage of all future generations of Americans, for whom our generation is merely temporary trustee, nor permit the Kremlin's tactic of conquest through bankruptcy to succeed, in America.

8. America can have a sound, American, foreign policy only by living faithfully by our uniquely American traditions and principles underlying the New World dream, a practical program, of a New World civilization made secure and ever better despite the Old World's inner decay and decline which America is powerless to cure.

9. America has a moral obligation thus to remain America in the richest and fullest sense of that inspiring word; husbanding her limited strength—spiritual and material—to insure fulfillment of her primary mission as the main pillar of New World civilization and the beacon light and citadel of individual liberty, which can be transmitted to other peoples by example only, not by sword or dollar.

10. America's obligation and need to live by American principles are such that any who favor their abandonment in any respect have the burden of proof, of persuasion; and they should respect American standards in the process of making their case before the people, entitled to the full truth at all times, especially from their public servants, and to be treated as the sovereign authority under genuine self-government and not victimized by false propaganda by them or anyone else.

CHRONOLOGICAL RECITAL OF SOME HIGH LIGHTS RE THE BACKGROUND OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT

August.—Churchill and Roosevelt agreed, at the Atlantic Charter meeting, that British-United States forces would police the postwar world (excluding Russia deliberately, so far as Churchill at least is concerned, beyond questions).

Roosevelt then told Sumner Welles, at the meeting as Under Secretary of State, that nothing could be more futile than another Assembly like the League of Nations in the postwar period; and, if there should be one, other nations (like Norway and Belgium and the other American Republics) would be invited to participate only "ostensibly"—Welles' word, recording what Roosevelt said, because Britain and America would have the power and do this world-policing job. (See discussion pp. 23-24.)

These secret agreements in the main explain the postwar British-United States policy. Still earlier in 1941 the Roosevelt administration "objectives" had been secretly stated as including prevention of the disruption of the British Empire and " * * * eventual establishment in Europe and Asia of balance of power * * *." This would seem to indicate that Roosevelt, as well as Churchill, had in mind at this time British-American military collaboration to offset the prospective power dominance in Eurasia of Russia—with Japan and Germany eliminated by defeat in the war.

Churchill's attitude toward the prospective United Nations Organization at this time—that it could not be relied upon to be effective—continued without change; as indicated in his statement in 1949 that: "I had always felt during the war that the structure of world security could be founded only on regional organizations." [Italics added.]

This ties in with the statement regarding the United States attitude continually, by then ex-Under Secretary of State (now Secretary) Acheson—in October 1948, in an address. He said that unity among the great western powers was essential to world peace, and that the United States worked toward that goal through and immediately after World War II—1941 set the pattern.

1948

Churchill, at Harvard, called for continuation after the war of the British-American Combined Joint Chiefs of Staff sitting in Washington. (He won.)

Secretary Knox reportedly had discussed with Churchill earlier at Quebec his plan for British-United States control of the seven seas after the war pending permanent peace arrangements, and Knox got approval of the plan in London later, with Russia to be allowed to participate to some extent.

Governor Dewey, of New York, called for a postwar British-United States alliance.

Prime Minister Smuts, of South Africa, as No. 2 man in British War Cabinet, speaking before secret meeting of officialdom in London, said Britain would be bankrupt after the war; Germany, France, and Italy would be powerless; Russia would be mistress of Eurasian Continent, and called for a British-led western Europe bloc (in effect, Western Union) as the basis of "the next world-wide British system"—to balance the power of the United States and Russia. The reported reaction of the Netherlands Government-in-exile, in London, was that an Atlantic bloc to control Germany and offset Russia should be composed of America as the arsenal, Britain the base, western Europe the beachhead.

Hopkins at Quebec had memorandum quoting United States high military authorities' estimate that after the war Russia would be in complete control of Europe, powerwise—potentially (see p. 9).

1944

Churchill and Eden in Paris lining up France for western Europe bloc; in response to which DeGaulle and Bidault, French chiefs, invited to Moscow. Similar British bids made to Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway.

Churchill obtained promise from Roosevelt of  $5\frac{1}{2}$  billion dollars of first year of postwar lend-lease for Britain (see p. 7).

Earl Browder (Communist chief in United States) book published, advocating plan closely paralleling President Truman's "Point 4" program (see p. 8).

1945

July.—Potsdam Conference—Russia's expansionist aims and tactics made clear. Attlee regime succeeds Churchill's. Sumner Welles warned Britain getting ready to rebuild Germany for use against Russia (see p. 27).

August.—Bevin prepared his "peoples, not pushes" memorandum—plan for new British Empire technique and development in Mid-East and Africa (see pp. 7-8).

September.—First Foreign Ministers Conference, London; bitter fight between Bevin and Molotov, with Byrnes backing Bevin (in line with his plan before the meeting, per his book); in effect backing British Empire's Eurasian aims against Russia's. The Balkans were the chief issue, the real contest being for power dominance there, though talk all about "elections."

Attlee secretly arranged with President Truman for later (November) conference in Washington with Canada re "atomic bomb"; widely taken to be an attempt to "scare" Russia (not present) into being good.

Churchill-Truman arrangements made about this time for the visit of Churchill to the United States in 1946; to make the March 1946 address at Fulton, Mo.

Truman began to formulate, about this time, his ideas which took the form of the "Truman doctrine" in March 1947; according to a most reliable report, in the spring of 1947.

These arrangements and plans were secret, of course.

Field Marshal Wilson, in Washington as British chief of Combined Joint Chiefs of Staff, called on Congress, in effect, to halt demobilization and bringing troops home lest the Balkans be left to Russia; thus revealing the real nature of the struggle at the Foreign Ministers meeting.

October.—United States planes and ships moved Chiang Kai-shek's armies to the north, in an attempt to give them control over North China and Manchuria—against Reds. Military lend-lease had previously been extended into 1946 for Chiang.

November 7.—In Parliament, Bevin and Churchill made quite similar speeches, indicating determination to line up western Europe with Britain, to lean on United States support—especially the atom bomb, and in general to prepare to fight the power-struggle with Russia vigorously. Churchill cried for atomic bombs for Britain (from the United States). Bevin admitted power-politics was "naked and unashamed" in the recent Foreign Ministers Conference; and in effect wrote off the United Nations entirely (months before its first Assembly meeting), saying " * * * Britain's policy is to keep on policing the world as she has always tried to do—until a league of nations is developed which can be trusted with the atomic bomb * * *."

November 15.—Washington "atomic bomb" conference; United States, Britain, Canada.

November 24.—In Parliament, Bevin said in effect he proposed to work for a western Europe alignment with Britain. (Offset to Russia's eastern Europe bloc.) Note Newsweek report (see p. 24) about this time that United States officials about ready to back British plan for western Europe bloc to match Russia's (in or out United Nations)

Churchill addressed Belgian Parliament in support of western Europe bloc; asserting that British-United States relations getting steadily closer.

DeGaulle working in this period to have French leadership of this bloc; and referred to France as "beachhead" for Britain and United States—"the bridge head of the West in Europe"; referring to looming power-contest with Russia in Europe. That is a military term, landing place for invaders. Much backing and filling and confusion in Washington re China policy.

December.—DeGaulle continued his espousal of role for France of balancing power between Russia and United States.

General Marshall sent to China to foster coalition regime.

January.—Churchill, in Florida, "vacationing"; publicly expressed the hope that United States troops "are not all going home because we (the British) are not numerous enough to handle postwar Europe alone" (against Russia, of course). This was the month in which first United Nations Assembly meeting convened. In this general period, even earlier, perhaps, British financing of Greece scheduled to end at end of British fiscal year 1947 (on March 31).

February.—Secretary Byrnes and Barney Baruch visited Churchill in Florida; doubtless to discuss the forthcoming Fulton, Mo., address by Churchill. Reliable report states that Churchill also had a hand in preparing the Byrnes speech, made soon after returning from Florida, widely referred to as the "get tough with Russia" speech; in which he said, in effect, that Britain and the United States and their friends in the United Nations would work together within the United Nations, "veto or no veto," so to speak. Vandenberg also indicated at this time that it was time for a "firmer" attitude toward Russia, though he declared that the success of the United Nations depended on Russo-American co-operation. Churchill reportedly (a later report) visited the White House to discuss with the President his coming Fulton speech. In this period Stalin made an aggressive speech; clarifying the power struggle.

March.—Churchill speech at Fulton, Mo.; in substance calling for continuing United States-British military collaboration; in effect a working military alliance featuring cooperation around the globe. Russia was clearly the target. President Truman denied he knew in advance what Churchill was going to say but reliable reports show he was informed in advance.

Bad press and public reaction to the alliance proposal; but a British correspondent in Washington cabled London that the White House and State Department had advised him the people would be "educated" to acceptance of this program (in reality fulfilling the August 1941 deal for British-United States policing of the postwar world). This "education" took the form of the fictitious "sudden" crisis of March 1947 and the equally fictitious war scare of March 1948, in part.

June.—Reports of United States plans for eastern Mediterranean base, British withdrawing defenses from Mediterranean to East Africa.

September.—Public official discussion in London of plans to withdraw troops from Greece.

Fall of 1946.—This was the period in which the British and United States officials worked out their plans regarding the Greek-Turkey aid program sprung "suddenly" as a "crisis" in February-March 1947. Long continued consultations with Greek officials in Greece; and with Tsaldaris, Greek premier, in Washington in December 1946. As previously noted, these plans, culminating in the "Truman doctrine" in 1947, had roots reaching back reportedly to about September 1945.

In this period, also, plans were being discussed between London and Washington regarding, or looking toward, the Marshall plan program and United States backing of the British plans for development of a new empire in the Middle East and Africa—per the Bevin August 1945 "peoples, not pashas" memorandum; in line with the Truman point-four proposal of January 1949.

January.—Marshall returned to Washington, replacing Byrnes. Had top-secret communications with Bevin regarding Bevin pleas for more billions for Britain. Marshall said not possible unless aid for Britain made part of aid to Europe; because American people would not stand for it (per H. J. Taylor, Cosmopolitan, March 1948). Bevin pleas continued, for about 5½ billions.

Churchill article in Collier's (January 4 issue) urged creation of United States of Europe backed by United States power—the atomic bomb. Declared that Russia could overrun Europe at will; but the bomb was "the new balancing factor." Expressly defied Communists and Russia in urging the plan.

Franco-British military alliance announced; and United States approval thereof.

Pursuant to his earlier speeches advocating a united Europe, Churchill formed a committee to promote it. On same day, announcement made that Dulles—with approval of Vandenberg and Dewey—favored United States backing of economic federation of western Europe based on international control of Germany's industrial resources; expressly in competition with Russia.

New Republican Congress met with great plans for budget cutting; especially the military budget.

February.—Economy plans knocked into a cocked hat by sudden springing of the "crisis" regarding Greece and Turkey; privately at first, with key Members of Congress. Full plans made for the melodramatic public moves; including a joint session of Congress to be addressed by the President, etc.

March.—The Truman doctrine program suddenly sprung on the public before a joint session, addressed by the President. Promptly Tsaldaris of Greece cabled the President thanking him for carrying out his promises of the preceding December, when he was in Washington. The crisis was spurious; repeated announcements having been made over 6 months and more of the planned gradual withdrawal of British troops from Greece and the British plans to stop financing Greece on March 31 having been long fixed and published as previously mentioned (in London if not elsewhere); per press reports.

A year later, in March 1948, President Truman admitted that this "Truman Doctrine" announcement was just a preliminary to the later announcement of the "Marshall plan" (really the Bevin-Marshall plan) in the following June.

Press reports about this time of impending new financial aid for Britain.

The "Truman Doctrine" announcement at first did not take the United Nations into consideration at all; a later resolution pertaining to it. In the midst of this excitement, at the beginning of the month (or February 28) Secretary of the Navy Forrestal made clear the extent of British-United States fulfillment of the Churchill, Fulton, Mo., plea; saying in an address that: "Our fleet, in conjunction with the British, is now doing what the British did alone for 100 years." Especially in the Mediterranean and Middle East area, he might have added. Yet note the following item.

Although in this month of the announcement of the "Truman Doctrine," when the Senate asked questions of the State Department regarding the true picture behind it, the State Department, through Under Secretary Acheson, asserted that the Greek-Turkey aid program was "not connected with any oil concessions which American companies may have in the Near or Middle East." But in the following November it was asserted in a speech that the United States "is striving to keep the oil fields of the Middle East out of the hands of an 'unfriendly great power.'" (This means underwriting long-standing British policy in that area; yet Acheson in March denied that the United States was underwriting British policy there.) This speech was by the State Department's chief of Middle-East Affairs.

April.—In Moscow, Secretary Marshall reportedly asked Bevin for a copy of his August 1945 "peoples, not pashas" memorandum. A clear break with the Kremlin was made at this meeting; paving the way for British-United States organization of west Germany, putting through the already planned "Marshall plan," preparing for the developments leading to the military alliances program and so on.

May.—Acheson's Cleveland, Miss., speech outlined in general what was coming in the "Marshall plan" the following month; discussions about it being conducted with London officials secretly.

June.—Announcement of the Marshall plan, pretending that there had been no prearrangements with London: but this proved to be false, the London Press "spilling the beans," causing Bevin to protest publicly. This was carrying out the January 1947 Bevin-Marshall plans.

July.—Press reports from Britain indicated that the British public took it for granted that the Marshall plan was just an excuse for more aid for Britain, to broaden the coverage to make it more pleasing to the American public: just about what Marshall had told Bevin was necessary in those January communications.

Summer-fall.—Great pressure applied by United States officials to force into line Marshall-plan nations, to make the program acceptable to Congress; but the British share (the 5¼ billions asked for by Bevin in January, being the amount promised Churchill by Roosevelt in 1944) remained fixed.

November-December.—At Foreign Ministers' Conference, complete break with Russia made; and way paved by Marshall and Bevin for the forthcoming Bevin call for a European military alliance (to be the Brussels Pact). Temporary or interim "aid" voted at this time, with much Communist scare. Just as the London Times had predicted; though the Marshall plan was said at first not to be anti-Communist or anti-Russia. Chairman Eaton of House Foreign Affairs Committee made the first public admission by an official that Russia could overrun Europe at will, he saying in 24 hours. Also, progress being made in building up Germany and Japan, preliminarily, as bulwarks in the contest with Russia, in line with the Acheson speech of May 1947 at Cleveland, Miss., forerunner of the Marshall-plan announcement.

1948

January.—Bevin called for Brussels Pact alliance, with United States immediate blessing. In hearings on Marshall-plan aid, much heard of a United States military alliance with Britain and her continental allies and also about military lend-lease to rearm Britain and Europe against Russia. Much scare-mongering, as prelude to the fictitious war scare of March-April; part of the melodramatic atmosphere of the Truman address to the joint session of Congress (on the day the Brussels Pact was signed) promising United States backing to the Brussels Pact allies.

Before the House Armed Services Committee, in April, I denounced the war scare as a fake, which was admitted to be true later in the year.

April.—The long-prepared program for military aid to Britain and her allies was almost announced by the President; but he finally put it off, as being premature, the public not having been sufficiently "educated" to accept it readily. It was officially admitted in various quarters, however, that the lend-lease program was being readied. It was just a question of timing.

May.—Finally decided to confine the immediate step to that embodied in the Vandenberg resolution (S. Res. 239), which was reported out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee without any hearings. This resolution was addressed to article 51 of the United Nations Charter primarily, in line with what Senator Vandenberg had written H. F. Armstrong in October 1948, was under active consideration.

June.—The Vandenberg resolution, brought out only a few weeks before adjournment for the political conventions, in the midst of all the political jockeying for the presidential nominations, received scanty attention in the debating process, only a few hours being allowed for this purpose on the crowded Senate calendar. During the debate that took place, few Senators were present much of the time, according to the record, it being difficult to get quorums to respond. On the whole, under these conditions, with many key Senators not present at all for various reasons, the resolution received woefully inadequate debate.

July to November.—Nothing in particular was heard about the proposed North Atlantic Pact during the campaign. It was given the silent treatment. With no issue presented, the popular vote was no test of approval or disapproval, not one voter in a hundred even knowing anything about the existence of the Vandenberg resolution it is believed, and not one in a thousand knowing about the substance of it.

Meanwhile, however, United States officials, military and otherwise, were conferring with those of British and western European nations, preparatory to the planned 1949 development of the project. Great pressure was applied, according to reliable reports, on various of the nations to bring them into line with British-United States plans, notably on the Scandinavian countries—most of all on Sweden. Typical power-politics techniques were employed in preparing to bring America, by this means, into this alliance with the Old World.
