NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to call, at 10:30 a. m. in the Senate caucus room, 318 Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), George, Thomas of Utah, Tydings, Pepper, Green, McMahon, Fulbright, Vandenberg, Wiley, Smith of New Jersey, Hickenlooper, and Lodge.

Also present: Senators Tobey, Ferguson, Donnell, Knowland, Jenner, McGrath, and Watkins.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

This is a meeting of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, for the purpose of holding hearings on the North Atlantic Treaty. We are glad to have visitors, but we must enjoin upon them the duty of preserving quiet and not interrupting the committee on its deliberations.

The committee is glad to have Senators sit in these hearings. We want the widest possible information respecting the treaty to go to the people of the United States, and we will thank the press for carrying those reports to the people of the country. We would like to have the facts and the truth.

For the convenience and information of the committee and the Senate a copy of the North Atlantic Treaty will be printed in the record at this point.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The Parties to this Treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and their desire to live in peace with all peoples and all governments.

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

They seek to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area.

They are resolved to unite their efforts for collective defense and for the preservation of peace and security.

They therefore agree to this North Atlantic Treaty:

ARTICLE I

The Parties undertake, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

ARTICLE 2

The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

ARTICLE 3

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this Treaty, the Parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

ARTICLE 4

The Parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the Parties is threatened.

ARTICLE 5

The Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the Party or Parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other Parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

ARTICLE 6

For the purpose of Article 5 an armed attack on one or more of the Parties is deemed to include an armed attack on the territory of any of the Parties in Europe or North America, on the Algerian departments of France, on the occupation forces of any Party in Europe, on the islands under the jurisdiction of any Party in the North Atlantic area north of the Tropic of Cancer or on the vessels or aircraft in this area of any of the Parties.

ARTICLE 7

This Treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting, in any way the rights and obligations under the Charter of the Parties which are members of the United Nations, or the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

ARTICLE 8

Each Party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the Parties or any third state is in conflict with the provisions of this Treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement in conflict with this Treaty.

ARTICLE 9

The Parties hereby establish a council, on which each of them shall be represented, to consider matters concerning the implementation of this Treaty. The council shall be so organized as to be able to meet promptly at any time. The council shall set up such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary; in particular it shall establish immediately a defense committee which shall recommend measures for the implementation of Articles 3 and 5.

ARTICLE 10

The Parties may, by unanimous agreement, invite any other European state in a position to further the principles of this Treaty and to contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area to accede to this Treaty. Any state so invited may become a party to the Treaty by depositing its instrument of accession with the Government of the United States of America. The Government of the United States of America will inform each of the Parties of the deposit of each such instrument of accession.

ARTICLE 11

This Treaty shall be ratified and its provisions carried out by the Parties in accordance with their respective constitutional processes. The instruments of ratification shall be deposited as soon as possible with the Government of the United States of America, which will notify all the other signatories of each deposit. The Treaty shall enter into force between the states which have ratified it as soon as the ratifications of the majority of the signatories, including the ratifications of Belgium, Canada, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, have been deposited and shall come into effect with respect to other states on the date of the deposit of their ratifications.

ARTICLE 12

After the Treaty has been in force for ten years, or at any time thereafter, the Parties shall, if any of them so requests, consult together for the purpose of reviewing the Treaty, having regard for the factors then affecting peace and security in the North Atlantic area, including the development of universal as well as regional arrangements under the Charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

ARTICLE 13

After the Treaty has been in force for twenty years, any Party may cease to be a party one year after its notice of denunciation has been given to the Government of the United States of America, which will inform the Governments of the other Parties of the deposit of each notice of denunciation.

ARTICLE 14

This Treaty, of which the English and French texts are equally authentic, shall be deposited in the archives of the Government of the United States of America. Duly certified copies thereof will be transmitted by that Government to the Governments of the other signatories.

In witness whereof, the undersigned plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is honored today by having present Secretary of State Acheson, who will be the first witness to be heard. Mr. Secretary, proceed in your own way. The questions of the committee and others will be deferred until you have finished reading your statement, if that is agreeable to you.

Secretary ACHESON. That is entirely agreeable, Mr. Chairman.

STATEMENT OF HON. DEAN ACHESON, SECRETARY OF STATE

Secretary ACHESON. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I welcome this opportunity to discuss with you the North Atlantic Treaty signed on April 4. That treaty is no new document to you. It has been developed, to an extent without parallel in my knowledge, as a cooperative enterprise between the executive and legislative branches of the Government and particularly between the Department of State and this committee. Without the vision and assistance of your chairman, of your former chairman, and the members of this committee, this treaty could never have been concluded. The text embodies many constructive suggestions from members of the committee.

The President has spoken on the treaty in recent weeks, and the Department of State has made available a considerable amount of source material regarding it. Since you already have in your possession some of what I shall say today, I shall make my statement as short as possible and will then be at your disposal for questions.

I should like very briefly to review with you the reason for this treaty, and its purposes.

It has been well said that "Everyone wants peace, but not everyone is prepared to work for it." No people in this world want peace more than the American people. They have always wanted it, they have sought it in various ways, but they have not always been ready to work for it. If we wish peace, we must be prepared to wage peace, with all our thought, energy, and courage. That is the purpose of this treaty.

TRADITIONAL AMERICAN POLICY

When the United States was a small and weak country, isolated by many weeks from other continents, our forefathers wisely based our foreign policy upon the realities of those times, and we managed to stay apart, to a large extent from developments in other lands.

However, our responsibility for assisting in the maintenance of peace beyond our borders has been long recognized and assumed. For more than a century and a quarter this Government has contributed to the peace of the Americas by making clear that it would regard an attack on any American state as an attack on itself. We gave our unilateral declaration to this effect. As the years passed and our neighbors to the South grew in stature, they accepted a similar responsibility.

But beyond this responsibility, we did not see clearly the impact of an unstable world on our security. In 1920 many nations of the world joined in an attempt to maintain international peace and security through the League of Nations. Although the President of the United States had played a leading part in drafting the League Covenant, the United States was not prepared to enter the League, and we withdrew from the participation with other nations in their first effort to wage peace on a world-wide basis. As a consequence, we had no effective means to prevent the Second World War.

IMPACT OF WORLD WAR II ON AMERICAN POLICY

But by 1945, after the tragedy of involvement in a Second World War, we realized fully that times had changed, drastically and irrevocably. It is the responsibility of this generation to base the conduct of foreign affairs upon the realities of today. Today no place on earth is more than a few hours distant from any other place. Today neither distance nor ocean nor air affords security. Security today and henceforward can only be assured, in the President's words, by stopping war before it can start.

THE CREATION OF THE UNITED NATIONS

In 1945 a new and greater effort for the maintenance of international peace and security was undertaken in the establishment of the United Nations. In the preamble of the Charter the peoples of the United Nations expressed their determination—to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind * * *

And for these ends—

the Charter goes on—

To practice tolerance and live together in peace with one another as good neighbors; and

To unite our strength to maintain international peace and security; and
 To ensure, by the acceptance of principles and the institution of methods, that armed force shall not be used save in the common interest * * *.

These are the words of the Charter.

The first purpose of the United Nations, as stated in article 1 of the Charter is—to maintain international peace and security, and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace.

AMERICAN ACCEPTANCE OF UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

The American people overwhelmingly accepted this commitment and the other commitments laid down in the Charter. They showed not merely their desire for peace but their determination to work for peace through full participation in—effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace and for the suppression of acts of aggression.

The hopes of the American people for peace with freedom and justice are based on the United Nations.

COMMITMENTS IN UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

The Charter not only spells out, as did the Kellogg Pact, the essential principle of settling disputes by peaceful means instead of war; it goes much further. The Charter commits all members of the United Nations to certain principles in the conduct of their foreign affairs which would, if carried out, do a number of things. First, they would secure peace and do away with the use of force as an instrument of national policy. Second, they would establish the right of nations to independence and self-determination. Third, they would establish that economic, social, and other problems can and should be worked out by international agreement and for the benefit of the peoples of all countries. Fourth, they would recognize and further human rights and fundamental freedoms. Here is more than a vague expression. These are the foundations of a world system, based on law, which would do far more than merely prevent war.

Still, the Charter goes further. It establishes machinery and procedures for furthering these purposes. The fundamental fact of the Charter is that these mechanisms and procedures are the institutions and procedures of free peoples, based on solving difficulties and making progress through investigation of facts, free discussion, and decisions by adjustment among representatives of the member nations, all of whom accept and are attempting to achieve the purposes of the world organization.

NONACCEPTANCE BY A MINORITY OF CHARTER PRINCIPLES

carry them out. If this is so, adjustments are made within the area of common purposes; and, no matter how sharp disagreements may be, there are common principles to which appeal may be made and which basically govern the conscience and behavior of the members. Whenever a powerful minority repudiates the basic principles and uses the procedures to accomplish directly contrary purposes or to frustrate the organization, then it obviously will not work as intended.

Here lies the basic difficulty which the United Nations has faced—a difficulty which would produce serious problems in any international organization, however perfectly devised. This difficulty is that a powerful group, even though a minority, has not genuinely accepted the purposes and principles of the organization and has used its institutions and procedures to frustrate them. This is not a defect of machinery. It is a defect in the basic attitude of some of the members which no change of machinery or procedure can cure.

ABILITY OF UNITED NATIONS TO FUNCTION

One of the principal problems which has grown out of this situation which I have described is that a sense of insecurity and a fear of aggression have grown up in an important section of the world which is struggling to recover economically, politically, and socially from the drains of the last war. The recovery of this area is of vital concern to the whole world.

To attain a sense of security and to be free from the constant fear of armed attack is certainly one of the prime objectives of the United Nations. How, then, is this objective to be obtained when a few of the members of the United Nations frustrate the attempt to attain it through the machinery provided in the Charter? It is certainly not to be obtained by doing nothing about it. It is certainly not hostile to the United Nations or contrary to the Charter to attempt to attain this objective by means wholly consistent with the Charter.

The United Nations is not a thing in itself. It is not an end in itself. It is a means to an end. The end is progressive development of a peaceful and stable world order where law rather than force and anarchy will govern the conduct of nations in their foreign relations. It was never in the minds of the framers of the Charter that the organization set up under it should be so distorted as to become an international instrument which paralyzed the pacific nations of the world, the possible victims of aggression, while leaving a would-be aggressor with completely free hands to deal with them one by one. In order that there should be no misunderstanding on this point, article 51 was inserted in the Charter.

VIOLATIONS BY RUSSIA OF CHARTER PRINCIPLES

If I may use an understatement, the sense of insecurity prevalent in western Europe is not a figment of the imagination. It has come about through the conduct of the Soviet Union. Western European countries have seen the basic purposes and principles of the Charter cynically violated by the conduct of the Soviet Union with the countries of eastern Europe. Their right to self-determination has been extinguished by force or threats of force. The human freedoms as the rest of the world understands them have been extinguished throughout that whole area. Economic problems have not been solved by international cooperation but have been dealt with by dictation. These same methods have been attempted in other areas—penetration by propaganda and the Communist Party, attempts to block cooperative international efforts in the economic field, wars of nerves, and in some cases thinly veiled use of force itself.

By the end of 1947 it had become abundantly clear that this Soviet pressure and penetration was being exerted progressively further to the west. In January 1948, the British Foreign Secretary, Mr. Ernest Bevin, said that if any one power attempted to dominate Europe by whatever means, direct or indirect, it would inevitably lead to another world war unless this policy could be checked by peaceful means. He declared that if peace and security were to be preserved it could be done only—by mobilization of such a moral and material force as will create confidence and energy in the West and inspire respect elsewhere.

THE BRUSSELS TREATY

With encouragement from the United States the Brussels Treaty was signed on March 17, 1948. The Brussels Treaty system took the form, not of a network of bilateral alliances as had been originally considered, but of a collective defense arrangement within the framework of the United Nations Charter similar in many respects to the Rio Treaty. On the day the Brussels Treaty was signed, the President, in addressing both Houses of Congress, called the treaty a notable step toward peace and expressed confidence that the determination of the free peoples of Europe to protect themselves would be matched by equal determination on our part to help them do so and that the United States would extend to the free countries the support which the situation might require.

SENATE RESOLUTION 239

At that time the Congress had before it a number of proposals for strengthening the United Nations and making it a more effective instrument for the maintenance of international peace and security. My predecessor, General Marshall, and the former Under Secretary of State, Mr. Robert Lovett, entered into consultation with the committee on how the great influence of the United States might best be brought to bear in association with other free nations in strengthening the United Nations and furthering the cause of world peace.

On May 19, 1948, this committee unanimously reported Senate Resolution No. 239. That resolution declared:

Whereas peace with justice and the defense of human rights and fundamental freedoms require international cooperation through more effective use of the United Nations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate reaffirm the policy of the United States to achieve international peace and security through the United Nations so that armed force shall not be used except in the common interest, and that the President be advised of the sense of the Senate that this Government, by constitutional process, should particularly pursue the following objectives within the United Nations Charter:

(1) Voluntary agreement to remove the veto from all questions involving pacific settlements of international disputes and situations, and from the admission of new members.

(2) Progressive development of regional and other collective arrangements for individual and collective self-defense in accordance with the purposes, principles, and provisions of the Charter.

(3) Association of the United States, by constitutional process, with such regional and other collective arrangements as are based on continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, and as affect its national security.

(4) Contributing to the maintenance of peace by making clear its determination to exercise the right of individual or collective self-defense under article 51 should any armed attack occur affecting its national security.

(5) Maximum efforts to obtain agreements to provide the United Nations with armed forces as provided by the Charter, and to obtain agreement among member nations upon universal regulation and reduction of armaments under adequate and dependable guaranty against violation.

(6) If necessary, after adequate effort toward strengthening the United Nations, review of the Charter at an appropriate time by a general conference called under article 109 or by the General Assembly.

It will be noted that of the six objectives recommended, Nos. 1, 5, and 6 were designed to strengthen the United Nations on a universal basis. This requires the agreement of all the major powers. Our efforts to achieve these objectives are being steadily pursued but it has not yet been possible, and I am not able to say when it will be possible, to achieve them.

The second, third, and fourth objectives are designed to promote peace and stability by ancillary methods within the principles of the Charter. In its report on that resolution the committee declared that these relatively unexplored resources of the Charter should be further explored and developed as rapidly as possible.

LEGISLATIVE-EXECUTIVE COOPERATION TOWARD IMPLEMENTING SENATE RESOLUTION 239

For more than a year the members of the committee and officers of the Department of State have been in consultation as to the nature of the problems involved, how they might best be met, and how the influence of the United States might best be brought to bear in the cause of peace. Throughout the negotiation of this treaty the United States negotiators have been guided by the wishes of the Senate as expressed in Resolution 239. It is highly gratifying that the views of the Senate, as expressed in the unanimous report of this committee on the resolution and the passage by the Senate of that resolution by a vote of 64 to 4, and in subsequent consultation on the text of the treaty, have been absolutely free of partisan spirit and have been moved solely by the interests of the United States, of the United Nations, and of world peace.

EXPLORATORY TALKS WITH WESTERN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

Following the resolution of the Senate, Mr. Lovett undertook to explore the matter with the Ambassadors of Canada, the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxemburg. The objective of this Government and of the other governments participating in these discussions was to establish an arrangement which would:

First. Increase the determination of the parties to resist aggression and their confidence that they could successfully do so;

Second. Promote full economic recovery through removing the drag of a sense of insecurity;

Third. Stimulate the efforts of the parties to help themselves and each other and, through coordination, to achieve maximum effectiveness for defense; and Fourth. Contribute to the maintenance of peace and reduce the possibility of war by making clear the determination of the parties jointly to resist armed attack from any quarter.

EXPLANATION OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

I have explained the text of the treaty article by article in my report to the President, which is before you, and I will not repeat that explanation at this point. I wish merely to stress certain essential points of the treaty.

ARTICLE I

The treaty is carefully and conscientiously designed to conform in every particular with the Charter of the United Nations and to contribute to the accomplishments of its purposes. This is made clear in article I which reiterates and reaffirms the basic principle of the Charter, namely, that the participating countries will settle all their international disputes, not only among themselves but with any nation, by peaceful means in accordance with the provisions of the Charter. This declaration sets the whole tone and spirit of the treaty and provides unmistakable proof that any allegations that the treaty conceals aggressive intentions are obvious perversions of the truth. Democracies, by their very nature must conduct their affairs openly. They could not, even if they wished, conspire against anyone, individually or collectively. Such allegations are belied both by the terms of the treaty and by the very nature of the free institutions upon which the signatory governments are founded.

ARTICLE II. ETHICAL PRINCIPLES

Article II demonstrates the conviction of the parties that real peace is a positive and dynamic thing, that it is much more than the mere absence of war. In this article the signatory governments assert that they will strengthen their free institutions and see to it that the fundamental purposes upon which these institutions are founded are better understood everywhere. They also agree to seek to eliminate conflicts in their economic life and to promote economic cooperation among themselves. Here is the ethical essence of the treaty—the common resolve to preserve, strengthen, and make better understood the very basis of tolerance, restraint, freedom, and well-being, the really vital things with which we are concerned.

ARTICLE III. MUTUAL AID AND SELF-HELP

Article III, of which I will speak further later this morning, embodies in the treaty the concept contained in the Senate resolution of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid. This means that no party can rely on others for its defense unless it does its utmost to defend itself and contribute toward the defense of the others.

The basic purpose of the treaty is, as recommended in the Senate resolution, to contribute to the maintenance of peace by making clear the determination of the parties to exercise the right of self-defense under article 51, should armed attack upon any party occur. This provision is contained in article V. If the treaty accomplishes its purpose such an armed attack will not occur. In order to accomplish that purpose, however, the parties must state clearly what they would be prepared to do if an armed attack should occur.

ARTICLE V. OBLIGATIONS IN THE EVENT OF AN ARMED ATTACK

Article V recognizes the basic fact that an armed attack upon any party would so threaten the national security of the other parties as to be in effect an armed attack upon all. It further provides that in the event of such an attack each of them will take, individually and in concert with the other parties, whatever action it deems necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area, including the use of armed force.

This naturally does not mean that the United States would automatically be at war if one of the other signatory nations were the victim of an armed attack. Under our Constitution, the Congress alone has the power to declare war. The obligation of this Government under article V would be to take promptly the action it deemed necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area. That decision would, of course, be taken in accordance with our constitutional procedures. The factors which would have to be considered would be the gravity of the attack and the nature of the action which this Government considered necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area. That would be the end to be achieved. Under the treaty we would be bound to make an honest judgment as to what action was necessary to attain that end and consequently to take such action. That action might or might not include the use of armed force. If we should be confronted again with an all-out armed attack such as has twice occurred in this century and caused world wars, I do not believe that any action other than the use of armed force could be effective. The decision, however, would naturally rest where the Constitution has placed it.

THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM (M. A. P.)

I believe it appropriate to outline briefly the role of the proposed military assistance program in our over-all foreign policy and its relationship to the Atlantic Pact. As you know, the President will shortly recommend to the Congress the enactment of legislation authorizing the transfer of military equipment and assistance to other nations. As you also know, the proposed program will request authorization and appropriation of $1,130,000,000 for Atlantic Pact countries and approximately $320,000,000 for other countries, including Greece and Turkey, making a total of $1,450,000,000 for the fiscal year 1950.

The furnishing of military assistance to the Atlantic Pact countries is designed to assist us in attaining the fundamental goal of our foreign policy: The preservation of international peace and the preservation of the security of the United States. Our aid to Greece and Turkey, the European recovery program—the greatest of all measures to date in our foreign policy—Senate Resolution 239, the Atlantic Pact which we are now considering, and the proposed military assistance program, are all designed to this end.

PURPOSE OF THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

You may ask why it is not enough to have the Atlantic Pact alone since it accepts the principle that an attack on one is an attack on all. Why does the Executive believe that it will be necessary to have a military assistance program in addition to the commitments contained in the pact?

The answer is found in the insecurity and the fears of western Europe and of many of the other freedom-loving nations of the world. Basic to the purposes of the military assistance program is the necessity of promoting economic recovery and political stability by providing a basis for confidence, a sense of security and a reasonable assurance of peace among European peoples. The military assistance program will improve the defenses and military capabilities of these nations, and thus increase their will to resist aggression and their ability to maintain internal security.

It is understandable that the free nations of western Europe cannot look forward with equanimity to invasion and occupation in the event of war, even if we guarantee subsequently to liberate them. Nor is it in our own interest to permit them to be occupied with the consequent necessity of the costly liberation of these areas. Our active foreign policy has given rise in Europe to a great momentum of recovery and a great increase in the will to resist. The hope for peace lies in maintaining this momentum. The free countries of western Europe must be encouraged to continue their efforts toward recovery. Their will to resist and their ability mutually to defend themselves must be strengthened. They must be encouraged and assisted to build up their defense forces, through self-help and mutual aid, to a point where aggression cannot take place through internal disorders growing from the seeds sown by a potential aggressor, or under the guise of border incidents. In short, they must regain, individually and collectively, their ability to maintain their independence and national security. This in itself is an additional deterrent to any would-be aggressor. Thus, even without the existence of the North Atlantic Treaty, the need for assistance for defense of these countries would be the same. With the pact, the assistance, once given, will be infinitely more effective.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE AND MUTUAL AID AND SELF-HELP

It is important, however, to view the objectives of the proposed military assistance program in light of the objectives of article 3, the self-help and mutual-aid article, of the North Atlantic Treaty, for the objectives of each are complementary. The objectives of both are to maintain and develop individual and collective capacity to resist by self-help and mutual aid. That is what article 3 is going to do; that is what the proposed military assistance program is going to do. Article 3 does not bind the United States to the proposed military assistance program, nor indeed to any program. It does bind the United States to the principle of self-help and mutual aid. Within this principle each party to the pact must exercise its own honest judgment as to what it can and should do, to develop and maintain its own capacity to resist and to help others. The judgment of the executive branch of this Government is that the United States can and should provide military assistance to assist the other countries in the pact to maintain their collective security. The pact does not bind the Congress to reach that same conclusion, for it does not dictate the conclusion of honest judgment. It does preclude repudiation of the principle or of the obligation of making that honest judgment. Thus, if you ratify the pact, it cannot be said that there is no obligation to help. There is an obligation to help, but the extent, the manner, and the timing is up to the honest judgment of the parties.

I therefore earnestly trust that the Congress will see fit to enable this Government to carry out that aspect of its foreign policy represented by the proposed military assistance program. At the same time, I urge that both the treaty and the proposed military assistance program should be considered separately and on their own merits.

For my own part I believe that both the North Atlantic Treaty and the military assistance program will contribute to world-wide security.

THE TREATY AND THE UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

The treaty is wholly consistent with the Charter and designed to strengthen the system of international law of which the Charter is the basis. It will give security and confidence to the signatory nations, whose common institutions and moral and ethical beliefs draw them naturally together, and whose well-being is vital to world recovery.

The added security of these nations does not threaten or weaken any other nation or portion of the world. The principles which draw these nations into natural affinity and which they seek to defend—freedom of the individual, tolerance and restraint, and the rule of law—are the principles which unite free peoples throughout the world.

The determination to provide defense for these principles by the 12 nations joining in this treaty—added to the other steps taken by these and other nations to wage peace—must be an encouragement to all free peoples who wish peace based on these principles.

PREVENTIVE EFFECT OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The treaty is the practical expression of the determination that an aggressor cannot divide these nations and pick them off one by one. History has taught us that the absence of such determination and of its clear statement in advance is gravely dangerous. The knowledge that armed attack will be met by collective defense, prompt and effective, will surely have a steadying effect on anyone from whom that transgression might come.

The political and moral strength which this treaty adds to the accumulating economic strength of a vital portion of the world will strengthen our ability to build a world in which freedom is maintained and expanded and in which the problems remaining and growing out of the war can be solved in an atmosphere free of the fear of aggression.

In conclusion I should like to repeat to you words which the President used at the signing of the treaty:

It is a simple document, but if it had existed in 1914 and in 1939, supported by the nations which are represented here today, I believe it would have prevented the acts of aggression which led to two world wars.

For us war is not inevitable. We do not believe that there are blind tides of history which sweep men one way or the other. In our own times we have seen brave men overcome obstacles that seemed insurmountable and forces that seemed overwhelming. Men with courage and vision can still determine their own destiny. They can choose slavery or freedom—war or peace.

I have no doubt which they will choose. The treaty we are signing here today is evidence of the path they will follow.

If there is anything certain today, if there is anything inevitable in the future, it is the will of the people of the world for freedom and peace.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, you are agreeable to questions at this time, are you not?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, Mr. Chairman. That concludes my statement and I am at your service for questions.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, I understand from your testimony and from our own knowledge of the matter that this is a defensive treaty, a defensive treaty aimed at the preservation of peace rather than at aggressive or offensive action on the part of the signatories to the treaty. Is that not true?

Secretary ACHESON. That is entirely correct, Mr. Chairman. It is wholly defensive. There are no aggressive designs of any sort openly stated, covertly concealed, or in any way connected with this treaty.

COMPARISON WITH OLD MILITARY ALLIANCES

The CHAIRMAN. It has been charged, and will be charged in some quarters, that this is a military alliance. I wish you would discuss and outline the military alliances in Europe and elsewhere in the last century or so and compare them with this particular treaty upon which we are embarking. The balances of power and things of that kind in the old world were commonly denominated military alliances. Would you mind doing that?

Secretary ACHESON. To the best of my ability.

The system of military alliances to which you refer was usually embodied in treaties which provided that if one of the signatory parties—they were usually bilateral treaties—became involved in war—

The CHAIRMAN. It was not limited to attack on them, but extended also to an enterprise to make war on somebody else, is that true?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that is true; yes, sir. The idea of arrangements to prevent aggression is somewhat modern. In the old treaties it was if you became involved in war, then the other signatory party would come to your help.

Some of the treaties provided that the other signatory party should actually engage in war with military forces; still others provided that they should be benevolent, not neutral but nonbelligerent, and help in any way.

One of the oldest treaties of alliance in existence in the world today is the British-Portuguese treaty.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The conception of this treaty, and the conception of the Rio treaty and the conception of the Brussels Treaty, is a newer one, and one which grows out of principles and procedures of the United Nations Charter. It is an arrangement entered into within the scope of article 51 of the United Nations Charter.

Now I want to make clear that article 51 does not create the right of individual or collective self-defense. That is inherent in all nations. The United Nations Charter merely recognizes that right and says that nothing in the Charter shall impair it or interfere with it in any way.

These arrangements that I have referred to, the Rio Treaty, the Brussels Treaty and this treaty, are arrangements entered into as an exercise of the inherent right of individual and collective self-defense. They are arrangements entered into by natural communities of nations, in one case by the community of nations in the Western Hemisphere, in another case by that community of nations which represents the Brussels powers, in the third case by the Atlantic community.

It has been pointed out many times that there is nothing contrived or created by the treaty. It is a naturally existing thing. There is a community of spirit, a community of history, and a community of interest in these Atlantic countries, and what they agree to here is that if an armed attack occurs on one of them, it is an attack upon the whole community, and the whole community would join in resisting it.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no provision in the treaty, as I understand it, of an aggressive or offensive character whatever.

Secretary ACHESON. There is none, Mr. Chairman.

RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE INHERENT IN ANY STATE

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that without this treaty we would have the right to take the action that the treaty contemplates, if we so desire as a nation?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that in World War I and World War II, without any treaty, we did, because of the armed attack on other nations which we thought threatened the security of the United States, enter the war to resist the aggression by armed powers upon the peaceful nations of the earth, without any treaty?

Secretary ACHESON. We did, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it is well to emphasize the fact that you brought out, that this treaty really does not create any new authority or any new powers; it simply is a recognition, under Article 51, of rights which we already possess to cooperate in behalf of peace.

Secretary ACHESON. That is very true. The rights which are exercised through action taken under this treaty are inherent rights, described as such in the United Nations Charter. They inhere in the very existence of nationhood.

The CHAIRMAN. To the nation they are the same as the inherent rights that individuals possess, applied to the nation as a whole.

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

RELATIONSHIP OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, there is a good deal of discussion and confusion, I would say, about the relationship of the treaty itself to the future proposals to furnish arms. I notice you say in your testimony that you think that each one of these instruments should be separately considered and treated on its own merits. Is that correct?

Secretary ACHESON. That, I think, is substantially what I said, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I haven't got the point in the testimony right before me.

Secretary ACHESON. It is on page 9, Mr. Chairman, of the mimeographed statement. The sentence that you refer to is right in the middle of the page, where it says:

I therefore earnestly trust that the Congress will see fit to enable this Government to carry out that aspect of its foreign policy represented by the proposed military assistance program. At the same time I urge that both the treaty and the proposed military assistance program should be considered separately and on their own merits.

OBLIGATION OF VOTING FOR MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM AFTER RATIFICATION OF TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. There is some argument and debate as to whether or not a vote for the treaty carries with it any obligation or duty to vote for the arms program at a later date. Is there anything in the treaty itself that binds the United States even to adopt the military program? I mean explicitly. The general phrase "mutual self-help" is that upon which I suppose they base their argument.

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir. That question is one which it would be pleasant if one could answer "Yes" or "No." I think it requires a very clear understanding.

There is something in the treaty which requires each Member of the Senate, if you ratify this treaty, when he comes to vote on the military assistance program, to exercise his judgment less freely than he would have exercised it if it had not been for this treaty. No Member of the Senate, after the treaty is ratified, in exercising his judgment, can properly say to himself, "I do not believe in the principle of mutual assistance. I think that principle is silly and I will put it out of my mind." That should not be done, because by ratifying this treaty you accept that principle, and that principle exists.

However, when the Senator approaches the vote on the military-assistance program, if his judgment is different from that which I have described as the judgment of the executive branch, if he thinks either that the United States is not able for financial, economic, or other reasons to help other countries, or if he thinks that it is not necessary to meet the situation as he sees it, there is nothing in this treaty which determines how he shall vote. The thing that exists in the treaty is that he must accept the principle of mutual assistance. He cannot repudiate that, and he must use his own best judgment within the confines of that principle to determine whether or not we can and we should, so far as the world situation is concerned, approve the military-assistance program as a means of mutual assistance.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true, though, that the Senator would be free, within his own conception of his duty, even though the treaty does carry the clause of mutual assistance, to determine whether the exact measure which was proposed was within that general scope of mutual assistance that was necessary?

Secretary ACHESON. Of course, Senator Connally. There is no question about that.

The CHAIRMAN. I wanted to make that clear, if I might, because some Senators seem to be bothered with that question. It seems to me that when we treat these two instruments separately that each Senator is under the duty of searching his own conscience and his own mind as to whether or not the provisions of any particular measure come within the obligations which we will assume when we ratify the treaty. There might be a wide divergence of view in some Senator's mind as to whether it was necessary to adopt any particular measure to meet the general clause of mutual assistance. There might be mutual assistance in other ways besides armed force. So that is your answer on that.

THE TREATY IS NOT AIMED AT ANY STATE

Now, Mr. Secretary, you brought out rather clearly—it won't hurt to reiterate it a little—that this treaty is not aimed at any nation particularly. It is aimed only at any nation or any country that contemplates or undertakes armed aggression against the members of the signatory powers. Is that true?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct, Senator Connally. It is not aimed at any country; it is aimed solely at armed aggression.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, unless a nation other than the signatories contemplates, meditates or makes plans looking toward, aggression or armed attack on another nation, it has no cause to fear this treaty.

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct, Senator Connally, and it seems to me that any nation which claims that this treaty is directed against it should be reminded of the Biblical admonition that "The guilty flee when no man pursueth."

The CHAIRMAN. That is a very apt illustration.

What I had in mind was, when a State or Nation passes a criminal act, for instance, against burglary, nobody but those who are burglars or getting ready to be burglars need have any fear of the Burglary Act. Is that not true?

Secretary ACHESON. Very true.

The CHAIRMAN. And so it is with one who might meditate and get ready and arm himself to commit a murder. If he is not going to indulge in that kind of enterprise, the law on murder would not have any effect on him, would it?

Secretary ACHESON. The only effect it would have would be for his protection, perhaps, by deterring someone else. He wouldn't worry about the imposition of the penalties on himself, but he might feel that the statute added to his protection.

NO SURRENDER OF SOVEREIGNTY

The CHAIRMAN. Some people contend that this is a treaty limiting our freedom of action and sovereignty and so on. Is it not true that the very organization of the United Nations is a treaty to which we are parties, and its obligations are binding upon us? Is that not true?

Secretary ACHESON. That is so. It is a treaty ratified by the Senate of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. And entering into a treaty like the United Nations is not a surrender of sovereignty but it is really an exercise of sovereignty.

Secretary ACHESON. That is very true, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. One other point, and then I will turn you over to some of the other committee members.

AUTOMATIC DECLARATION OF WAR

Is there or is there not anything in the treaty that pledges us to an automatic declaration of war in any event?

Secretary ACHESON. There is nothing in the treaty which has that effect, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Those are matters still residing in the discretion and judgment of the Government and the Senate?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Even after the occurrence of events, we would still have that freedom, would we not?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true.

MINORITY DOMINATION IN AN INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

The CHAIRMAN. I was interested in your statement that in the United Nations or any other international organization there was the possibility that a group within that organization would have designs that could be very destructive and detrimental to the organization. There is evidence, to my mind, not necessarily to yours, that such possibilities are already in existence at the present time—that there are little groups who vote together and act together with an objective, I think, of hampering and disrupting the international organization. There is nothing of that kind in this treaty?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir. What I was referring to was the difficulties which faced the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Secretary ACHESON. And I was pointing out that I thought it was not, as one commonly hears it said, a defect in the provisions of the United Nations Charter. It is not because we do not have a better Charter; it is not because we do not have world government that this difficulty arises. It would arise in any organization, no matter how perfectly devised. The difficulty comes in the attitude and the actions of this powerful minority group, and it happens that the same thing happens in a trade-union or a church or a club or a political body, that when some of the members of it undertake to use the principles and procedures to frustrate the functioning, then the organization just won't work.

THE SOVIET ALLIANCE SYSTEM

The CHAIRMAN. I noticed in the press—I have no direct diplomatic information on the subject—that at least one great country is denouncing this treaty and complaining about it because it does not approve of it. This country is not a signatory and it was not concerned with the treaty.

Is it not true that since the war that same power has formed alliances and arrangements with a number of the Balkan countries without asking anybody's advice or anybody's agreement, and most certainly without consulting the United States of America?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true, Senator Connally. And I think all of those treaties have been printed in the document which the Senate has had prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. Containing very strong obligations on the part of those nations.

UNITED NATIONS' ABILITY TO MAINTAIN SECURITY

The United Nations, as you have pointed out, has not been effective in some respects, because of frustrations and delays and obstructions of this group, so that by reason of that we feel the necessity of entering into and signing or ratifying the present treaty. Is that true?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in this treaty that is in anywise hostile to the purposes or plans of the United Nations? They are supplementary, are they not?

Secretary ACHESON. That is entirely right, Senator. The purposes of this treaty are to accomplish the very purposes of the United Nations. This is an ancillary method, within the provisions of the Charter, for accomplishing the purposes of the Charter.

LEGISLATIVE-EXECUTIVE COOPERATION PRIOR TO SIGNATURE OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. The treaty is really a concrete implementation of the resolution that the Senate passed, in which the State Department collaborated throughout the preparation and the consideration of the objectives set forth in this resolution, is that true?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir. That resolution has been the constant guide of the negotiators of this treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one other point that I would like to bring out, and that is this: Is it not true that during the preparation of the present treaty consultations were held frequently between the State Department and members of the Committee on Foreign Relations as to the exact text, the use of words here and there, and things of that kind? Is that not true?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no secrecy on the part of the State Department, no attempt to keep from the Committee on Foreign Relations or from the Senate, for that matter, the provisions of this treaty as they were being formulated?

Secretary ACHESON. Not the slightest.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to commend that course in the future. I think we will get along much better under that procedure than by the Senate being handed a treaty or a convention with the words "Here it is; take it or leave it." If the members of the committee that are interested in these matters might be consulted—and I am not complaining—prior to the final act of adopting or ratifying or agreeing to a treaty or convention.

Secretary ACHESON. I think it is a very wise course which you suggest.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

As I view the treaty, and I will ask you whether or not you agree with me, one of its chief merits is that there would be a deterrent effect on any nation that contemplated an armed attack or an aggression because of the knowledge by that nation that such an attack would arouse the opposition of the whole group and the resistance of the whole group.

Secretary ACHESON. That is the first dominant and overwhelming purpose of this treaty. As the Senate Resolution pointed out, as the President stated in his inaugural and other addresses, the only really effective way to deal with the threat of war is to prevent wars from happening. Anything that you do after the war has happened is an aid to national survival, but the disaster has occurred, therefore everything that can be done to prevent a war from happening is to the greatest possible benefit not only of the United States but of all the rest of the world, including the nation that might be foolish enough to think of aggression, because in these days both the aggressor and the nations against whom the aggression takes place suffer terribly in the course of a modern war.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not also true that it would have a deterrent effect on the practice that is growing up of one nation reaching out and grabbing little nations one at a time, and incorporating each into its system, when it knows in advance that to do that would arouse the hostility and resistance of all the nations that are parties to this treaty?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir. That is a very great part of the effectiveness of this treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. A great and powerful nation without that situation in mind could just reach out and grab some little wobbly and weak nation and incorporate it, and then go on to the next one and the next one and the next one, until it had picked the roost clean.

Secretary ACHESON. That is true, sir.

ACTION IN CASE OF AN ARMED ATTACK

The CHAIRMAN. One other point. Article 5 of the treaty provides that an armed attack against any one of the nations shall be considered an armed attack upon all of them. It further provides that in the event of such an armed attack, each of them will take individually and in concert with the other parties whatever action it deems necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area, including the use of armed force. With regard to the language "including the use of armed force," is it not true that that does not require the use of armed force, but armed force is merely one of the means, among other means, which it may adopt to perform its duty of helping maintain the integrity of the Atlantic area?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true, Senator, and of course, whatever means would be employed would be appropriate to the gravity of the attack.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly. But, after all, it is up to each country to determine for itself, is it not, what action it deems necessary to restore the security of the Atlantic Pact area?

Secretary ACHESON. There is no question about that, Senator. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. I wanted to get that clear, if I could, because there was some disagreement over it.

REFERENCE TO UNITED NATIONS

Secretary ACHESON. Of course, one of the first things which would occur would be reference to the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you develop that a little?

Secretary ACHESON. I beg your pardon?

The CHAIRMAN. I say, go ahead and develop that, if you care to.

Secretary ACHESON. Nearly all of the signatories of this treaty are members of the United Nations, and if a situation was developing which looked as though an armed attack might be threatened, one of the first things that you will do will be to invoke the Security Council, invoke all the provisions of the Charter for the pacific settlement of disputes. But when the armed attack occurs, and no effective action having been taken by the United Nations, then this treaty provides for action to resist the armed attack.

RELATIONSHIP OF TREATY TO MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

The CHAIRMAN. From page 9 of your statement I would like to quote just a moment:

Article 3 does not bind the United States to the proposed military assistance program nor indeed to any program. It does bind the United States to the principle of self-help and mutual aid.

Now, again:

Within this principle each party to the pact must exercise its own honest judgment as to what it can and should do to develop and maintain its own capacity to resist and to help others. The judgment of the executive branch of this Government is that the United States can and should provide military assistance to assist the other countries in the pact to maintain their collective security. The pact does not bind the Congress to reach that same conclusion, for it does not dictate the conclusion of honest judgment.

That is very true, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN (reading):

It does preclude repudiation of the principle or of the obligation of making that honest judgment. Thus, if you ratify the pact, it cannot be said that there is no obligation to help. There is an obligation to help, but the extent, the manner, and the timing is up to the honest judgment of the parties.

RELATIONSHIP OF TREATY TO UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. You referred to this being in aid of or supplementary to the United Nations. Is there anything in this treaty which is in conflict with any of our obligations under the United Nations?

Secretary ACHESON. There is not only nothing which is in conflict, but there is express provision in the treaty that the provisions of the Charter of the United Nations prevail. Article 7 provides:

This treaty does not affect and shall not be interpreted as affecting in any way the rights and obligations under the Charter of the United Nations of the parties which are members of the United Nations, or the primary responsibilities of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

PURPOSE OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

The CHAIRMAN. I have gotten the idea somewhere from these discussions that even the proposed arms agreement coming along a little later does not necessarily envisage the increase in the armed forces of the signatories to the pact, but rather the furnishing of supplies and equipment to bring up to date their armed forces.

Secretary ACHESON. That is the basis on which the proposal will be made to the Congress, Senator. You are quite correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad you bring that out, because some Senators seem to be confused about the arms program. They are worried that it means that we are going to vastly increase the armed forces of European nations and give them large amounts of supplies and so forth that would involve us still more deeply in some scheme of military alliance.

Senator Vandenberg?

LIMITATIONS OF THE TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Secretary, first of all I want to be sure that the record discloses what I conceive to be the very close limitations within which the treaty moves into action. I am not clear about your answer to one question that the chairman asked you. He asked you what happens when an armed aggressor contemplates or undertakes an attack, and I understood you to say that the treaty came into effect under those circumstances. It is not my understanding that it would come into effect on the basis of a contemplation. The armed attack has to occur. Am I wrong on that?

Secretary ACHESON. You are right, Senator. If I gave the other impression, it was inadvertence on my part.

Senator VANDENBERG. And that is not the only limitation. The area of action is completely described within article 51, is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. And under article 51 even the cooperative effort which is made under the North Atlantic Treaty ceases the first moment that the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security, is that not true?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true, both under article 51 and under the express provisions of this treaty.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think it would be well, Mr. Chairman, to print article 51 in the record at this point, because it is the key to the whole situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, article 51 will be printed in the record at this point.

Nothing in the present charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by members in the exercise of this right of self-defense shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present charter to take it at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security.

Senator VANDENBERG. So we confront, then, this series of limitations. In the first place, no nation is the target of this treaty unless it nominates itself as an armed aggressor by its own armed aggression. Is that right?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir; that is correct.

Senator VANDENBERG. Secondly, it is effective only so long as the Security Council fails to take measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

Secretary ACHESON. That is made repeatedly clear in the treaty itself, Senator.

Senator VANDENBERG. Therefore, if the general membership of the United Nations is faithful to its obligation to the Treaty of the United Nations, this treaty never becomes operative in action at all.

Secretary ACHESON. That is entirely true.

OBLIGATION TO VOTE FOR ARMS PROGRAM

Senator VANDENBERG. Now, this is a rather ticklish question which I dislike to bring up again, because I know it is a difficult one to answer. Nevertheless it involves the viewpoints of a number of my colleagues. On the nature and extent of the obligation that a Senator assumes, if any, when he votes for the pact, you have narrowed that obligation as nearly as possible to the vanishing point as you could, but you have left this sentence:

It does preclude repudiation of the principle or of the obligation of making honest judgment regarding mutual aid.

Let me ask you this question, and I am not intending thereby to indicate my own point of view but I would like to know what your answer is. Suppose a Senator who votes for this pact says, in his own honest judgment, that he prefers to let the general obligation involved in the pledge of "one for all and all for one" to stand as his commitment to do everything required of him when the crisis arrives. Is he entitled to say that?

Secretary ACHESON. Well, of course he can say it, Senator.

Senator VANDENBERG. Has he violated your rule if he says that?

Secretary ACHESON. In my judgment I think he would have violated my rule, if we add something further to your question, and that is, that in his judgment the United States not only can help other countries but the strengthening of the other countries is called for in view of the world situation.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think that is pretty clear. I am not sure I subscribe to it, but certainly there should be no doubt on the subject. I must say that I think a Senator could logically say that he accepts this obligation when it arises under article 51 without accepting an obligation to prepare in advance to implement article 51. However, you have made your answer, and that stands.

SCOPE OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Now, I have a question on the subsequent military pact, which under your last answer does become pretty definitely integrated into the initial decision that we have to make regarding the pact itself. I wonder if you can be any more specific than you have been in respect to this contemplated mutual aid program. I agree that the two things have got to be settled separately and yet a divorce in the first instance is pretty near impossible when a Senator is undertaking to arrive at a judgment.

You have suggested that you will ask for the authorization and appropriation of $1,130,000,000 for Atlantic Pact countries. I assume that is for the first year.

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir; that is for the fiscal year 1950.

Senator VANDENBERG. Can you say what may be contemplated beyond 1950?

Secretary ACHESON. No; I cannot say that, Senator, because I think it is almost impossible to say that at the present time. The program for the year 1950 has been worked out in advance of the setting up of the machinery provided for in this treaty. If the treaty is ratified, you will then have a council, a defense committee with various subcommittees, probably, with military people on them. When that gets into full operation, and there is a completion of the exchanges of views between the countries, they will know more clearly what the future plans are so far as the military establishment of each one of the countries is concerned.

The program for the year 1950 has been worked out in consultation with all of these countries, and as Senator Connally intimated a moment ago, it is based upon the maintenance of the military establishments of the European countries as they exist in their proposed 1950 budgets. It is not proposed to increase the establishments beyond what is already provided in their budgets.

This assistance has to do with the provision of more effective and better rounded equipment for those forces. The European nations will do the great bulk of this equipping themselves. They will enter into—in fact they already have devised the basis of—agreements by which they will help one another get equipment.

So far as the pact countries are concerned, United States assistance will be somewhere between one-sixth and one-seventh of the total effort which will go into military efforts in Europe. We will provide, as is stated in the statement, approximately $1,130,000,000 for the pact countries.

NATURE OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator WILEY. Money or equipment?

Secretary ACHESON. That is the authorized funds, and the funds which we hope will be appropriated. Some of that, Senator, will be furnished in the form of already existing military equipment, equipment which is in existence. Some of it will have to be manufactured for that purpose. About $150,000,000 of it will be in the form of raw materials which the European nations will have to import in order to help their own manufacturing of military equipment. That gives you the general picture.

Now, the equipment which we will be furnishing will be very largely in the nature of what you might call capital goods. It will be equipment which is not used up in 1 year in peacetime. It will last much longer than that, so that it will not be necessary to replace that equipment every year. There are certain more or less limiting factors here. If the size of the forces is limited by the primary necessity for recovery, as is the case in Europe, then any annual increment in existence is limited, so that there are limiting factors, both the fact that the equipment is in the nature of capital goods and is not readily expendable except in time of war, and the fact that the size of the forces is very closely related to the needs of recovery.

PROSPECTS OF DECREASING MILITARY EXPENDITURES ✓

Senator VANDENBERG. Of course, in contemplating future budgets on this score, the greater the success of the program in increasing pacific and reliable security, the less will be the need, and the need may entirely disappear.

Secretary ACHESON. That is entirely correct, Senator. Of course, the outstanding purpose of both the treaty and of the military assistance program is the prevention of war. These two are complementary. If they prevent war from starting, and if that creates a stable situation in which you can look forward to the fact that war is not going to start, then the whole outlook is changed and greatly eased.

NO AUTOMATIC DECLARATION OF WAR

Senator VANDENBERG. I was requested to ask you one question earlier, which I will ask now so that the record may be clear. Is there anything in the treaty which will lead automatically to a declaration of war on our part?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. The answer, of course, is unequivocally "No."

Secretary ACHESON. Unequivocally "No."

ACTION IN THE EVENT OF COMMUNIST SEIZURE OF POWER IN PACT COUNTRIES

Senator VANDENBERG. What happens, Mr. Secretary, if one of the pact countries should be taken over politically by their Communist Parties?

Secretary ACHESON. Is that question based on the assumption that this is not by external aggression?

Senator VANDENBERG. Oh, yes.

Secretary ACHESON. Purely internal action?

Senator VANDENBERG. Right.

Secretary ACHESON. Then the country will obviously have a Communist government, and I should suppose that the country would want to repudiate this association in that case. It is pure speculation on my part, but that has been the general attitude of countries which go that route. And it would undoubtedly take unilateral action to declare that any obligations from it to anyone else were at an end.

Senator VANDENBERG. How about the reverse? Suppose this new government clearly fails to qualify under the credentials that are required for membership in this fraternity? Would it not almost perforce have to leave the fraternity because there is no possibility of congenial action?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that is very likely to be the case.

PROCEDURE FOR ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

Senator VANDENBERG. I want to ask specifically about article 10, Mr. Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the treaty?

Senator VANDENBERG. Of the treaty. This is the article which permits by unanimous agreement other European states in a position to further the principles of this treaty, and contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area, to accede to this treaty. How would the judgment of the United States be expressed upon a question of that character?

Secretary ACHESON. I take it that your question involves the point as to whether this would be done by the Executive alone, or whether there would be the advice and consent of the Senate to it.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is my point.

Secretary ACHESON. Senator, I am authorized by the President of the United States to say that in his judgment the accession of new members to this treaty creates in regard to each new member coming in in effect a new treaty between the United States and that nation, and that therefore the President would consider it necessary to ask for the advice and consent of the Senate before himself agreeing to the admission of a new member.

Senator VANDENBERG. I do not know how you could make a more totally persuasive or righteous answer.

I will pass for the time being.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not want to elaborate on that, but is it not true that with the nations that are now parties to the treaty, any addition of another member would be, in effect, a new treaty?

Secretary ACHESON. That is the President's judgment, sir, which I have just expressed.

The CHAIRMAN. And therefore, being a new treaty, it would have to be ratified by the Senate.

OBLIGATION OF SENATORS TOWARD MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

I do not want to argue with you, Mr. Secretary, but I think you went, according to my view, a little far in your statement about the obligation of a Senator, if he votes for the treaty, to vote on the arms provision.

I do not think there is any compulsion or obligation on a Senator when he votes on any question except his own conscientious conviction and his sense of his obligation under the Constitution. When this treaty is ratified, it is the obligation of the United States, as a Government to aid the other signatories, but that does not mean that every Member of the Senate shall take the views of the executive department as to what this aid shall be.

I do not want to labor the point, but I wanted the record to show that I do not quite go with you that far. I think, after all, it is a matter of judgment and conscientious conviction of each particular Senator casting his vote.

Secretary ACHESON. Of course, Senator Connally, that is right. It is not my function or place to be stating what should move Senators in their votes. I was trying to respond to questions in a responsive way, and to give what I thought was the intellectual relation between this treaty and some other proposal. Obviously I think I have made it very clear that there is no obligation on anybody to vote for the forthcoming proposal on the arms program because he votes for this treaty. He may believe this program is too small or too badly devised or too large, or have all sorts of reasons. All I was trying to point out is that the treaty brings upon the United States the obligation to help, and those who are officers of the United States will want to conduct themselves in such a way as to carry out the obligation of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. As I pointed out a little while ago, I quite agree that the Government still has the obligation to render such aid, but after all, the judgment of the Senator as to whether such vote would comply with that obligation or not is up to him.

Secretary ACHESON. That is entirely up to him.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me announce to the Senators that you need not worry about a quorum call. I had an agreement entered in the Senate yesterday that the Committee on Foreign Relations would be excused from attendance on the session indefinitely, and at the end of each quorum roll call there would be a statement to that effect, so that if you are not recorded you have a complete alibi in the fact that the Senate has excused you.

Senator Thomas?

Senator THOMAS of Utah. May I ask, Mr. Chairman, if our names will be counted toward making a quorum over there?

The CHAIRMAN. I do not suppose they will, because we are not personally present, but it explains our absence so if they can not get a quorum without us they are in a bad way.

THE TREATY AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Mr. Secretary, my question is wholly in the realm of the development of international law. I think myself—I have got to say this at the start so that you will see what I am talking about—that this is the first time in the history of international law, and if the pact becomes effective it will be positive international law about as strong as anything we have, will it not?

Senator THOMAS of Utah. This is the first time in the history of international law that community responsibility in regard to an aggressor, and in regard to war, is made quite as definite as it is made in this treaty. Is that not true?

Secretary ACHESON. Well, I should think that the Rio Treaty is just about as definite as this, and the Brussels Treaty is also.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Nearly as definite. It is reciprocal and, of course, in the evolution you have theories that are closely connected with this. For instance, article X of the League Covenant attempted to guarantee the sovereign integrity of the various members, and that implied some obligation on the rest of them, but the statement that an attack on one is an attack on all, does that not put all in the position of war if one is attacked?

RIO AND NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY PROVISIONS RELATING TO ATTACKS

Secretary ACHESON. As we pointed out in other discussions before the committee, that particular phrase that you refer to is in the Rio Treaty.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Yes.

Secretary ACHESON. Article 3 of the Rio Treaty provides—

The high contracting parties agree that an armed attack by any State against an American State shall be considered an attack against all the American States.

And consequently—

Each one of said contracting parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. If that right is binding under our Rio Treaty, and I myself believe it is, this is merely an extension of the idea, is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. That is so, Senator. Would you like me to go on with your question?

Senator THOMAS of Utah. I would like to have it developed.

Secretary ACHESON. The provision of article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty states, first of all, that an attack upon one is an attack upon all. That is to make clear that there is collective interest and collective self-defense involved. The article then goes on to spell out what happens when that occurs, and there it says that each one of the contracting parties will forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, take such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

PROCEDURE IN EVENT OF AN ATTACK

Therefore, when the attack occurs, which is an attack upon all of them by definition, each party considers what the objective under the treaty is. That objective is to restore, if it has been violated, and to maintain after it has been restored, the security of the North Atlantic area, and it pledges itself to take any sort of action, including armed force, if that is necessary in its judgment—to take whatever action its judgment says is necessary to bring about that result.

That might be a declaration of war and the use of all the resources of the country. It might be something much less, depending on what happens as a result of the attack. If the attack is something which has not been deliberately planned but has flared up in some way, it might be dealt with by means not involving the use of armed force. It might be dealt with by reason, and that sort of thing.

If, however, it were a deliberate plan, a highly mobilized attack upon the whole area, then I assume that the only thing that could possibly have any effect in restoring and maintaining the security would be every possible physical effort on the part of the country. So you are not automatically at war. You take whatever action you think is necessary in the circumstances.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. And all of the various means, from consultation up, might be taken?

Secretary ACHESON. They might all be taken.

SUBSTITUTE FOR WAR

Senator THOMAS of Utah. But from the standpoint of creating a substitute for war, haven't you at least done this by these two pacts, and especially by the last one; made war between any of the members that are parties to the pact almost an impossibility?

Secretary ACHESON. I think so. As Senator Vandenberg, I think, said earlier, if all of the members of the United Nations—certainly all of the members of this pact—live up to their duties under this pact and under the United Nations, war is totally impossible, because you declare that you will settle every dispute by peaceful means. You declare again under the United Nations Charter that you will not use force, in accordance with the principles of the Charter, and therefore war is impossible unless some nation violates its undertakings under the Charter or under this pact.

EVENTS IN CASE OF A VIOLATION OF CHARTER OBLIGATION

Senator THOMAS of Utah. If a nation does violate its obligation, what happens to that nation?

Secretary ACHESON. Well, if it violates it in the connection we are discussing here, it violates it by making war on somebody else, and it has precipitated the situation which all of these treaties, the United Nations and everything else, are designed to prevent; therefore it has to be met by collective resistance.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Collective resistance; or the preponderant force of the united group in the community could be used against such a nation, could it not?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. And would it not be used in a moral way and every other way if the pact works as you think it is going to work?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true, Senator Thomas; yes, sir.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. That is all I have, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask one question right on that.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ARMED ATTACK

This clause about an armed attack on any one nation being regarded as an armed attack on all leaves each nation free, however, not to consider any armed resistance if it should see fit; is that not true?

Secretary ACHESON. That is what I was spelling out for Senator Thomas.

The CHAIRMAN. The measures they take, if any, would be wholly within the judgment of each particular country.

Senator SMITH?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I have a few questions I would like to ask the Secretary, based partly on my own thinking and partly on questions that have been asked of me.

TRADITIONAL UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY AND THE TREATY

The first one has to do with the implications of this treaty in connection with our traditional foreign policy. Would you or would you not consider this an extension, for example, of our original foreign policy of noninterference in the affairs of the world and the Monroe Doctrine, and so forth? In other words, is it really an extension of exactly the same principle on exactly the same basis that we laid down when we made the unilateral declaration of the Monroe Doctrine that now we have extended in the Rio Pact into a collective responsibility of the same principle for this hemisphere? Now in this treaty we have extended our vision because of world conditions, World War II and threats to peace, to include these Atlantic Pact countries? The same principle is involved that we had in mind when we did set the Monroe Doctrine?

Secretary ACHESON. I think you are entirely right, Senator Smith. This is the recognition and enunciation of something which has happened twice before in our history. It lays down principles on which we have acted in this hemisphere since the statement of President Monroe which developed into a similar treaty within the hemisphere, and as this committee itself said in resolution 239 and in its report, if we had stated, and everyone had understood, before World War I and before World War II, that what did happen would happen, then those wars might not and probably would not have occurred.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad to have you state that, because I agree entirely with the position that you have stated. It seems to me it is a perfectly logical development of our whole foreign relationship since the beginning of our history, and of course the change of world conditions. Conditions have changed, but we are still sticking to the things we believe in fundamentally, and we are prepared if necessary to join with others in defending them.

REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS AND THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Senator Vandenberg pointed out, I think very properly, that article 51 is the key article here so far as the right of individual or collective self-defense is concerned. But I have been asked this question: Whether, assuming that is true so far as article 51 is concerned, and passing over for the moment article 52, a question mark cannot be raised when we read article 53 of the United Nations Charter. That reads:

The Security Council shall, where appropriate, utilize such regional arrangements or agencies for enforcement action under its authority. But no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council—and then it excepts, of course, Germany as the enemy in the last World War.

My assumption is that the way we get around that, and I want to ask you if I am correct, we know perfectly well from the present composition of the Security Council we probably would run up against a stone wall, and therefore we have to fall back on the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs, because we feel the futility of the application of article 53 if we want to have this anchor to windward in case that comes, in the event of an armed aggression.

Secretary ACHESON. Senator, I do not think that article 53 has any application whatever to this problem. There is no question of "getting around" anything in the Charter. We have no desire to get around anything whatever. Article 53 deals with a regional arrangement which has been set up, for whatever purpose it may be, and article 53 says that that regional arrangement shall not, itself, undertake positive coercive enforcement action against any country unless the Security Council asks it to do so and authorizes it to do so. Article 53 has nothing whatever to do with the right of self-defense, individual or collective. Therefore article 53 is not involved in our discussions in any way whatever. Under the North Atlantic Treaty nobody proposes to take enforcement action, aggressive action, preliminary action, any sort of action at all, except defensive, after an attack has occurred. Article 53 isn't talking about that at all.

Now I think it is important, and one hesitates to discuss this before Senators Connally and Vandenberg, who were at San Francisco and know far more about this than I do, to recall that in the drafting of the Charter article 51, which as originally proposed and discussed was under the heading of "Regional arrangements" and with these other articles, was purposely separated from them, so that the inherent right of individual and collective self-defense should not be associated with any other idea whatever; it is a complete, absolute right which is not associated with regional arrangements or actions of the Security Council, unless the Security Council steps in and stops their development. Therefore we are not concerned with article 53 at all.

Have I made that clear?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I think you are right, but the question has been so pressed on me and others have raised the question as to what this language means here that I wanted very much to get your statement, and I think the separation of those in different chapters is significant, as you have suggested, of the two articles, 51 and 53.

Senator VANDENBERG. Before you leave that, Senator, I would like to testify that I cordially agree with the Secretary's analysis. Article 53 deals with affirmative action by the Security Council; article 51 deals with a situation where the Security Council does not act, and the need for article 51 grew out of the fact that article 53 did not meet the conditions to which article 51 addresses itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that article 53 simply authorized the Security Council to use this regional arrangement to carry out instructions set forth in article 53?

Secretary ACHESON. That is right, sir.

ARTICLE 54 OF THE CHARTER AND THE TREATY

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. The next question, which I also admit I personally do not have any difficulty with but I would like to have the Secretary answer for the record, is with regard to article 54, and I will read it:

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

There again, if I may express my own interpretation, you apply the same interpretation that you just applied to article 53, that these two articles have nothing to do with the individual or collective self-defense provision provided for in article 51.

Secretary ACHESON. I think that is right.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And therefore, under article 51, if we are seeking to protect ourselves under the self-defense principle, we will not be compelled to keep the Security Council necessarily informed of all the activities we are taking in that connection.

Secretary ACHESON. We would, under the provisions of this treaty and under article 51, immediately inform the Security Council of any armed attack and of the measures which we were taking to resist it. That is an obligation both of the Charter and of this treaty.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. That would be at the moment the armed attack occurs?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And the fact that we are just looking ahead to protect ourselves against any possible danger does not necessarily mean that we give that full information to the Security Council?

Secretary ACHESON. We would file this treaty under article 102 of the Charter. It would be filed with the United Nations in accordance with that obligation.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I thank you very much for that, because I have been asked that question many times, and I wanted to get your statement for the record on it.

INFORMATIONAL ACTIVITIES AND THE TREATY

I would like to refer to page 7 of your testimony, where you refer to article II, because a question comes into my mind in connection with what you say about article II. You say,

In this article the signatory governments assert that they will strengthen their free institutions and see to it that the fundamental purposes upon which these institutions are founded are better understood everywhere.

I have been one of those very much interested in our whole program of the Voice of America and the interpretation to the world of our purposes in world affairs. This seems to me to imply, in article II, that it is contemplated that from here on out possibly these Atlantic Treaty countries may jointly present to the world their purposes and intentions in entering into this treaty, and their general plans for strengthening their free institutions, and let the world know the fundamental purposes upon which these institutions are founded and see that they are better understood.

Am I possibly anticipating future action, or is it understood that we should create a "Voice of United Treaty Countries" to explain that position?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir. It is not contemplated that there will be joint action. Article II does not impose any obligations upon the contracting parties. Article II states the fundamental things which are being defended. We are defending those things which are most precious to us. Those are free institutions, and we want everyone to understand what those are. Article II states the basic principles of free government and the determination of each one of the parties to have those understood by everybody. Once you understand what those free institutions are, you know there is nothing aggressive in the Treaty, that there cannot be; but there are no plans and there is no obligation here for joint action under article II.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. But we are probably hoping, or I would be hoping at least, that the parties to this treaty would all attempt, so far as they can, to reiterate the point that you have just made. That is what we are trying to do in our presentation to the world of where we stand. I am saying this because I feel that a great deal will be accomplished by the proper carrying on of a publicity program and an expression of where we stand, so as not to permit these charges of imperialistic designs and aggression to take hold. I think we have a responsibility to make that clear as a part of the whole present world picture.

Secretary ACHESON. The Department of State, as you know, reiterates its belief in the importance of the Voice of America and other information activities which we take outside of our borders to make ourselves understood, and we will continue to urge on the Congress that we be enabled to do that as effectively as possible.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And while you might wish that other countries will do the same thing as a group, there is no contemplation of joint action?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

Senator VANDENBERG. May I interrupt you just a moment.

I think it is rather important to stress that point, Mr. Secretary. This is not a rival organization to the United Nations in any aspect of its contemplated activities, and to go into a collateral informational program at the same time that the United Nations is operating one or the State Department is operating one would be sheer duplication, and nothing of the sort is contemplated.

Secretary ACHESON. That is entirely correct.

PRIORITY OF ECA OVER MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Now, Mr. Secretary, am I correct in my feeling that we look upon the ECA program, the program for the rehabilitation of these countries of western Europe, as a No. 1 undertaking of our own, and under no conditions are we going to sacrifice that program for any other program? We are going to see that through. In other words, it has priority in our thinking as a means for bringing about world peace and as a means for resisting those forces that seem to tend to destruction and chaos and so forth, as against the forces of unity that we are trying to set up.

Secretary ACHESON. That is fundamental, Senator Smith.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Then we would not, in the case of this program and especially the military implementation end of it, contemplate cutting down on the ECA program at all, but we would consider that that was an A-1 proposition to be considered as the first objective in our own foreign policy?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir. That has complete priority.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Thank you very much. That is all I have in mind at the moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Pepper?

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Secretary, in article 106, chapter XVII of the United Nations Charter—

The CHAIRMAN. It is the purpose of the Chair, if it is agreed to by the committee, that we will recess at about 1 o'clock, and come back at 2:30. I am not saying that to influence the Senator. I just want everybody to know what we have in mind.

CHAPTER XVII OF THE CHARTER AND THE TREATY

Senator PEPPER. I started to say that article 106, chapter XVII of the United Nations Charter, under the heading "Transitional security arrangements," does apparently make provision for association among the four signatory powers of the Moscow Declaration of 1943 and France with respect to maintaining international peace and security on behalf of ourselves and the United Nations. I think the answer is clear, but I wanted to make it clear in the record, to the effect that those four signatory powers and France were authorized in that article, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 5 of the Moscow Declaration, to consult with one another, and, as occasion requires, with other members of the United Nations, with a view to such joint action on behalf of the organization as may be necessary for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

In your opinion, that did not preclude other associations and consultations among member powers when in accord with article 51 of the Charter?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct, Senator Pepper.

RELATIONSHIP OF TREATY TO CHARTER

Senator PEPPER. Now then, the question has been raised with respect to the relationship of the association formed under the treaty with the United Nations organization, and naturally the question would arise as to the relationship of the United Nations Charter to the North Atlantic treaty. It is provided, is it not, in article 103 of the United Nations Charter, that—

In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail.

Secretary ACHESON. That is the provision of the Charter, and that is reiterated in the treaty.

Senator PEPPER. So that not only is it not intended that there should be anything in the North Atlantic treaty in conflict with what is in the United Nations Charter; if anything were in the North Atlantic Treaty in conflict with the Charter, then that would not be valid with respect to the Charter.

Secretary ACHESON. That is, as I say, stated in the Charter and in the treaty.

Senator VANDENBERG. Before the Senator leaves that point, may I ask a question on the same point?

Senator PEPPER. Yes, indeed.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN AND FRANCO-RUSSIAN TREATIES AND THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. There are many questions raised regarding the French and British treaties with Russia in that connection. What is the situation in that respect? I am sure you are familiar with those treaties.

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

In the North Atlantic treaty there is article VIII, which states that each party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the parties, or any third state, is in conflict with the provisions of this treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement—

Senator PEPPER. Will the Secretary allow me to interrupt? I have just been notified that there are some amendments coming up on the floor in which I am interested, and if the Senator will allow me, since the Secretary is coming back, I will desist for the time being.

Secretary ACHESON. By entering into this treaty, the French Government with respect to its engagements, and the British Government with respect to its engagements, certify that there is nothing in those treaties which is in conflict with this treaty.

Senator VANDENBERG. In other words, the answer to these inquiries about the conflict between the existing French and British treaties with the Soviet Union is that there is nothing in conflict between those treaties and this pact, is that correct?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir. The answer is that the British and the French Governments have stated that, and that is conclusive so far as we are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. Would not their signing this treaty have the effect of really modifying or abrogating any treaty in conflict with this treaty, even though they might have difficulties with the contracting power in adjusting themselves to that decision? It is a subsequent treaty, and if there is any conflict this treaty would supersede the other.

Secretary ACHESON. I am not prepared to say that that would follow, Senator. I think that it is left by the parties declaring that there is nothing in those treaties that conflicts.

Senator VANDENBERG. But in this instance there is no question whatever that both parties, both Britain and France, have declared that there is nothing in conflict.

Secretary ACHESON. There is no question as to that, Senator Vandenberg.

The CHAIRMAN. They are bound by that statement.

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper, if it is agreeable, when Senator Pepper comes back we will let him resume.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I believe I can finish in a very few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not rushing you. Take all the time you want.

FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS ASSUMED BY THE TREATY

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Secretary, I am interested in two phases of this treaty other than those which you have already covered, and to which you have given a number of answers in which I was interested. One of them is the financial obligation that we are assuming to sustain the ability of other nations to resist over a 20-year period, which is the life of this treaty; and the other one is a question that has been asked of me a number of times as to the interpretation by some other nations of our action in assisting or in mutual assistance in arming these nations.

IS THE TREATY PROVOCATIVE?

I do not necessarily hold this view, but I think the question is going to have to be answered, and I think I can sum it up in this way. Some other nation or powerful group of nations not party to this treaty may well say that by our very action in passing a mutual assistance pact, and then implementing it immediately and over a period of years, with increasing armaments which surround that nation or group of nations with a ring of steel, it can be interpreted by that nation as an aggressive act on our part, or a preparation for aggression. May I hasten to say that I do not necessarily hold that view myself. I do not mean that. But those questions have been asked.

Now, what may the answer be to that?

Secretary ACHESON. Let's take up the charges one by one. There is no action here which is assisting the rearmament of nations which surround that nation which you are presumably talking about. The one nation which has attacked this treaty has been the Soviet Union. There is no ring of steel surrounding the Soviet Union. Only one of the signatories of this pact even borders on the Soviet Union, and that is one of the smallest members, and I am sure that no matter how hysterical anyone's fears might be, they could not suppose that Norway was contemplating any aggressive action.

The second answer would be that, following World War II, the United States and those nations associated with it in the West had one of the greatest aggregations of military power ever gotten together. We undertook to demobilize all of that. So, far from being any aggressive action on our part, we went almost to the extreme other end of possible action. We demobilized our great ground forces, we demobilized our great Air Force, a large part of our Navy is put up, our military forces now are very small.

The nations of western Europe also have very small military forces. The action which is contemplated and outlined in what I have told you about the President's proposed recommendation on a military assistance plan could not by any stretch of imagination be regarded as aggressive. There is nothing to aggress with under that program.

What would be done is to take the existing small forces and make their equipment more modern and better rounded, so that to the best of their ability they can defend themselves if they are attacked. The idea that, with everything that is going to be done, they could possibly take aggressive action, is really unthinkable.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think it is important to call attention to the fact that we have demobilized and our forces really are not being brought back up to what one might call a war strength. But that position is going to be taken by some people, without any doubt. It already has been stated by some people, that our assistance in armament to these countries in western Europe is in and of itself a basis for suspicion by those who either do not understand the circumstances or blind themselves to the circumstances.

PURPOSE OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Now may I ask you, because I feel that the matter of the implementation of this pact is part and parcel of the whole consideration, is it contemplated by the parties to this pact that the western European nations will eventually be placed in a position so they can themselves successfully resist armed aggression from whatever source it may come, or will we limit it to the nature of a holding force, or a police set-up? In other words, I am concerned with the extent to which we may be expected to participate in building armaments, largely as a load upon our own people or from that standpoint, and of course perhaps equally as important in the success of mutual cooperation under this pact.

Maybe I can make it a little clearer. I can envision certain assistance, physical assistance, by way of arms and supplies sent to bolster the forces of western Europe which would be not enough to give them the strength they would have to have to resist aggression. I can also envision certain volumes of supplies which might be deemed by a lot of people to be enough, but would be beyond our capacity to supply. One might be waste of materials, if we sent too little or if we aided too little or if the mutual cooperation was too little. It might be a waste of effort. Another might be a burden that we just could not stand.

I wonder if there is any defined area of assistance now, and in the program over the next 20 years, because this is a 20-year program; that is, that we can picture at the moment.

SIZE OF MILITARY BUDGETS

The CHAIRMAN. Would you mind if I intervened just a moment?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that while under the budget and this proposed bill we give them $1,130,000,000 for the next current year, their own budgets providing for arms and so on are something like six or seven times as much as that $1,130,000,000?

Secretary ACHESON. Somewhere in that neighborhood, Senator.

LIMITATIONS OF THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

I think, in answering Senator Hickenlooper's question, we might start with the question that was asked of me by Senator Smith, because that begins to give the contours to this problem.

The first primary necessity is the economic recovery of western Europe. That means that there are very definite limitations on the size of the military forces which western Europe can maintain, because if you withdrew greatly increased numbers of men from production and put them into military service, you would impair recovery and you would impair the very ability of these nations to resist and to remain as free nations. Therefore recovery comes first.

That means that under the military assistance program we have started with the forces as they exist in the 1950 budgets of these countries, and we are trying to give better armaments to those countries.

As Senator Connally pointed out, the great bulk of this effort is being undertaken by the European countries themselves.

WILL ERP FINANCE THE REARMAMENT OF EUROPE?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Yes, and may I suggest, at that very point, the possible inseparable relationship between ECA and the proposed assistance. As I understand it, we propose to give $1,000,000,000 a year, or to contribute mutual assistance this near year, at least, in the amount of $1,000,000,000, which, as you say, is one-sixth or one-seventh of what these pact countries are putting in. I cannot avoid recalling that the European recovery program is about five and a half billion dollars. So, is it possible that the argument might be made that exactly what we are putting into European recovery is the total amount that these pact countries are putting into military development in one way or another? I suggest that because that question is going to come up.

● Secretary ACHESON. I think the answer to that is, whereas the amounts may in general be somewhat in the same area, you are talking about different countries and you are talking about something wholly different.

What the ECA plan and program does is to assist the western European countries, 16 altogether as against 12 here, with their problems of foreign exchange; that is, with getting the things outside of their area which they have to pay for in foreign money. Their military budgets are budgets which are made up of maintaining and equipping establishments of their own. They are paid for with their own funds within their own countries.

So far as the connection between ECA and this military assistance program is concerned, there is one important connection which has various aspects, and that is that the recovery program comes first. Nothing which is proposed under the military assistance program will interfere with the recovery program.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. The military assistance program can't survive unless the recovery program survives.

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct, Senator.

Therefore, when, in planning the military assistance program, it became clear that in order to manufacture certain equipment the European countries would have to import certain raw materials, the question arose, How were they going to do that? Was that going to come out of the ECA program? The answer is "No." $150,000,000 for that purpose is included in the military assistance program, so that the ECA program goes on undisturbed.

Also, plans for production have been drawn so that they do not withdraw people who are manufacturing goods for domestic consumption or for export. Such increased manufacture as they are undertaking here is done with the slack of certain manufacturing facilities which will not interfere with production for civilian use at home or for export.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. But, as I understand it, the budgets for these pact countries are already drawn, and they contemplate, let us say, 5 or 6 billion dollars for their own contribution, so that those budgets must come out of their economic calculations in these countries.

Secretary ACHESON. They are the continuation of budgets which they have had for many years.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Without doubt, but I frankly have difficulty, while I may some place back in my own mind think I understand the situation, in explaining some of these things to people that ask me questions.

Secretary ACHESON. It is undoubtedly a difficult thing to explain, Senator, but we will continue to try. I think the point we are making here is that, of course, the maintenance of a military establishment does take something out of the economy of a country. There is no question about that. It does. But nobody would propose that a country should be without any kind of military establishment because it has economic problems. If you propose that, you obviously would get nowhere. The country would be without protection; economic recovery could not go forward because of the terrible state of uncertainty within it, and you would defeat yourself.

The real problem, I thought, that you were proposing, was, are we indirectly paying for all of the military budgets of all of these countries. I think that answer is "No," we are not.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. You have stated the question, yes.

Secretary ACHESON. I think we are not.

The CHAIRMAN. With regard to ECA and these arms, these expenditures by these countries will be made in their own funds and not out of dollars.

Secretary ACHESON. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be expenditures of their local currencies, and will not be a load on the dollar provisions of the ECA.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I have always been unable to reconcile the reasoning for that argument which has been used many times, I know. It does not seem to me to make much difference what pocket you carry your money in or how you change it. There is a certain amount of financial stability behind an economy or that goes into an economy, and if we relieve the pressure with dollars, it releases that portion of the local economy to be devoted to something else. I do not claim to be a financial expert, and I may be wrong in that, but I have never had the other theory satisfactorily explained to me.

FUTURE COMMITMENTS UNDER THE TREATY

I want to make clear to you, Mr. Secretary, that I believe this program is a very essential program, but getting back to the question of the implementation of this pact, you propose $1,130,000,000 for this next fiscal year. Now, as I said before, I think, to either you or some members of the committee, when we go into this we commit ourselves to mutual cooperation with these countries for 20 years. That is a substantial period of time. And I feel that it is highly essential, in the interest of our whole calculation, that we get some reasonably substantial view of the over-all obligation that we will be expected to assume over this period. There should be some perspective that we can have, and I feel that it is not a good thing to go at this piecemeal.

I know the argument that successive Congresses can look at the picture and they can exercise their own judgment, but too often when we get committed on a matter of this kind we resign the right to exercise our own judgment because of the so-called moral commitments and legal commitments which we assume in the first contract. So

I am concerned with whether it will be $1,000,000,000 in 1952, $2,000,000,000 in 1953, and those matters.

I do not know that you are prepared to answer those questions this morning, and perhaps they should be presented in some different way than the answer to my questions might suggest, but it is a matter that greatly troubles me, because I think I am obligated to take a look at this thing over the next 20 years if we are going to sign a contract that lasts that long.

Secretary ACHESON. Senator, I started on an attempt to throw some light on this question when somehow or other we got entangled with the foreign-exchange problem.

LIMITATIONS ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

What I think I want to throw out is some things I said earlier, and I think you were not in the room at the time, that there are certain clearly self-liquidating factors to the military assistance program. The first one comes out of the fact that recovery is a prior necessity, therefore the size of the European forces must be such that they do not interfere with recovery. And it looks as though it will continue to be quite small for some time. Therefore, the size of the forces will not, as many people erroneously assume, mushroom into vast numbers of troops. That is one limiting factor.

The second limiting factor is that as recovery takes place, the European countries can take over more and more of this increment which we are helping them with, so that they will increasingly be in a position where they can carry their own expenditures. That is another limiting factor.

The third limiting factor is that the help which we are giving them, as I pointed out a moment ago, is in terms of durable equipment. It is not shoes and uniforms and ammunition which disappears; it is equipment which is durable in peacetime and will last for many years. Therefore you do not have to replace that equipment annually, and the only necessity for adding to it comes when you have any increment in the forces. That increment, as we pointed out a moment ago, cannot take place until recovery is more nearly achieved, and when it does take place the Europeans are in better shape to provide all the equipment themselves. So it is not, in my judgment, a program where I look forward to years of the same or of increasing help. I look for a comparatively short time of help and then it is no longer necessary.

RECOVERY OF MATERIALS FURNISHED UNDER MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM IN THE EVENT OF A COMMUNIST COUP

Senator HICKENLOOPER. With reference to a question that was asked you a while ago by some member of the committee—and incidentally I did hear you generally refer to that subject awhile ago because I was here when we started the meeting—some member of the committee asked you a moment ago what the situation would be in the event of an internal coup or taking over by forces that were not sympathetic or cooperative to the general pact consideration.

Have you given consideration to the possibility that capital goods which we might mutually cooperate to provide to such a country that later got out of this pact, or repudiated, or disassociated itself with the pact, could be returned to us under safeguard for the return of capital assistance that we have put up?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, Senator, that has had a lot of consideration. I think it would be less than candid on my part to leave you with the impression that if there were a coup, and if one of these countries had such a change in government, that we would have any large chance of getting back any large amount of what we had transferred.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I thoroughly agree with that.

Secretary ACHESON. In my judgment the possibility of such a coup is remote. It is made more remote by the program, because as you give a sense of will to resist and the possibilities that that will be successful, you get further and further away from the sort of disintegration which leads to an increase in Communist strength.

TYPE OF MATERIAL TO BE FURNISHED UNDER MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator HICKENLOOPER. That would lead to another group of questions, or an area of questions, that have been asked me by members of the Senate and which may be more properly answerable by the military people than by the State Department. I do not know. But those questions would go to the type and kind and purposes of capital equipment. In other words, we could put permanent long-range capital equipment of great value into certain countries which might be later subject to seizure by internal revolution, or something of that sort, which would not necessarily call up the obligations under the pact; that is, the mutual obligations for resistance to aggression. But that may be a military matter rather than a diplomatic matter.

Secretary ACHESON. I think that either in these hearings or in the hearings on the military-assistance program the military authorities will completely satisfy you on that. That is one of the criteria that they have been considering in the screening work which has been done.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. For instance, we hear the statement that it is a military-assistance question of whether or not we are going to send and permanently stable B-36's in Europe.

Secretary ACHESON. I think they can remove any worries from your mind on that.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I may not be necessarily personally worried, but I think in many of these questions the areas should be explored, and there should be some answers to them.

Secretary ACHESON. I highly agree.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. On some of them I certainly cannot give the answers unless I have the benefit of better knowledge than mine.

Secretary ACHESON. I think you can be and should be fully informed on it.

FUTURE COMMITMENTS UNDER MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Do you think that we will have the opportunity, or that there will be available any more reliable or understandable detailed pictures of what we may reasonably expect over the next few years by way of our share of the mutual contribution and by way of some concrete evidence of the contribution of other nations to this pact, before these hearings are over? In other words, at this moment I am not at all content with the very nebulous program of the next few years. I don't know what we are going to do. And I certainly hope that before we come to final action we can have a little more concrete understanding of what we are expected to do in the foreseeable future, and what other nations are expected to contribute to this well-knit unity of purpose for resistance to aggression. In other words, perhaps some of those things might be discussed in executive session or some other place, but certainly I do not have the answers yet, and I do hope to get myself much more satisfied on those obligations.

Secretary ACHESON. I think that can be done, Senator.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think at this time, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing else.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. We will recess until 2:30.

(Whereupon, at 1 p. m., the committee adjourned, to reconvene at 2:30 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(The committee reconvened at 2:30 p. m. at the expiration of the recess.)

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Senator Wiley, we will be glad to have you proceed.

Senator WILEY. Mr. Chairman, I have only a few questions I want to direct to the Secretary. I feel that the questioning up to the present time has elicited a lot of the information that the public should have, and most of us had before. I just want to ask a few simple questions.

INABILITY OF UNITED NATIONS TO ACT

This North Atlantic Pact, Mr. Secretary, is the result, is it not, of, first, because under the United Nations, which is a good mechanism in itself, there has been the inability to get the results due in large measure to the fact that Russia constantly exercised its veto?

Senator WILEY. In other words, there has been that lack of international cooperation which we hoped and prayed would come into being after the United Nations was born in San Francisco.

If the United Nations had functioned, if the nations had played ball together, there would not have been that fear that brought about what we think is another mechanism that will have beneficial results; is that right?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir. If everybody in good faith had lived up to their obligations under the Charter, then there would have been no fear of aggression, because the clear obligation is that you shall not use force or the threat of force in settling any international question.

Senator WILEY. But it is because of that very condition the European nations and the rest of the world, sensing a threat to the independence of the nations, that we are now trying this new mechanism, the North Atlantic Pact?

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

Senator WILEY. Again you face the question that if there is this unity, and if this great Nation becomes a part of this unified action, it is the hope that it will operate to repress or stop any aggression. That is the theory of it; is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, Senator Wiley.

Senator WILEY. Whether or not military assistance will become necessary will depend upon whether or not there are any beneficial results following the mere execution and the ratifying of the pact. In other words, if the pact itself would open the eyes of the would-be aggressors there would not be any need to carry out any military assistance; is that true?

Secretary ACHESON. If you mean that the mere ratification of the pact would do away with any fear of aggression, that would be true; but that is not the case, Senator.

Senator WILEY. The fact is, as you so dynamically outlined, that we got into two previous wars because, first, the Kaiser was informed and thought that we would not get into the First World War, and it is generally said that if he and his armed crew had thought that America would get in, he would have hesitated a long time.

And in this Second World War it has been said that if Hitler and the Japs had thought that we could do what we did do in the short time that we did do it, they would have hesitated.

In other words, Hitler did not think that it was possible. Now we are saying in this pact, "Do not tread on me," or "Do not tread on my co-pact-makers." That is the substance of it.

Would that not have the same effect that we think it might have had in the previous cases, had we at that time informed the world that if certain things happen, like aggression or an attack, we would stop the aggressor?

Secretary ACHESON. We hope and believe, Senator, that the unity of all the signatories of the pact on the theory that an attack against one is an attack against all, will have a profound effect in discouraging any attack whatever.

NEED FOR IMPLEMENTING THE PACT

Senator WILEY. I get then, from the general concept of the so-called military assistance program that has been evolved, and which you pictured for us today, that there is still the fear that, unless there is some unified action on the part of nations involved as co-pact-makers in the matter of getting better prepared, the situation will not be bettered much by merely signing the pact.

Secretary ACHESON. I say that these two things are complementary; they are both directed to bringing about the same purpose. If we ratify the pact, what we in effect say to the 12 nations signing it is that we will join together, if one of them is attacked, in resisting this attack and restoring peace.

In the present situation some of the signatories of the pact have very inadequate armament, very inadequate equipment for the troops that they have. These nations are anxious to join with us. They say the signing of this pact means that we are all together. They say as we look at the actual situation, if there were a really serious, all-out attack, we know that in the long run, probably, the great strength of the United States would end in the defeat of the aggressor.

But in the meantime, they say, "we would be overrun. Most of us," they say, "would be dead; our countries would be destroyed; our civilization would be pretty well destroyed." The final outcome would be that the United States would be liberating a corpse.

"Now," they say, "we want a chance to fight with you; we want a chance to protect ourselves; we want to join in this effort. If you will help us in bringing the equipment of our admittedly small forces to a more competent level, then the will of those forces to fight will be great; the will of the countries to resist will be great; and any would-be aggressor will know that he will be faced with immediate resistance, not only ultimate defeat, but immediate resistance, so that he cannot accomplish his results by some kind of a coup or some kind of a push which is all over before he starts."

He has got to move into this with full-scale mobilization and a full-scale, aggressive, warlike purpose. They say we want to be able to help in meeting that and help in protecting ourselves. If we do not respond to that desire we do not get the full impact of the pact, which is that all of these countries will join in resistance with determination and with effectiveness.

Senator WILEY. Then we reach the conclusion, which I think is apparent to every reasonable person, that the condition as it exists in the world today, after 2 or 3 years since the so-called war ceased, we find ourselves in the position where we, with our co-pact-makers, feel that two things are necessary: First, an announcement to the world that we will stand in unity against any aggressor; and, second, that we will back up that announcement by getting ready as far as we can foresee to meet any aggressor.

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir. That is right, Senator Wiley.

ANGLO-RUSSIAN AND FRANCO-RUSSIAN TREATY AND THE PACT

Senator WILEY. And perhaps you can throw some light on the subject if you will turn to article 8 of the pact, which reads:

Each party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the parties or any third state is in conflict with the provisions of this Treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement in conflict with this Treaty.

As I say, it has developed that both France and England entered into certain treaties with Russia. I think they preceded the Second World War; and some, I think, were entered into during the war.

You are in a position to explain those treaties. In case there is a breach of the peace or an aggression on the part of Russia against any of the co-pact-makers, those so-called agreements or treaties between Russia and France or England would not have any application, would they? I think that is important for the public to know, because there has been considerable talk on that subject.

Secretary ACHESON. Senator, I think we touched on that this morning. I pointed out that the article which you have just read from the treaty is a declaration by the signatory that it has no treaty which is inconsistent with this treaty. That is an unequivocal statement by the British Government and by the French Government that no treaty to which they are a party is inconsistent with the North Atlantic Treaty.

In fact we have printed in this very book, from which I think you were perhaps reading, Senate Document No. 48, among all the source material you have the British-Russian treaty printed there so that all can read it and all can see that this declaration which Britain made is correct.

But it is not for me, as an official of the American government, to undertake to state on behalf of the British Government what their obligations are. They have done that themselves. We see the treaty and we can know that their statement is true. But I am not an official who is called upon to interpret British treaties.

Senator WILEY. I have the benefit of the record, and your assurance that it is at least your conclusion that the statement of the two governments is in accord with the facts and the truth?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, Senator; it is inconceivable that these two governments would make a statement that is not in accord with the facts. As I say, we can all read these treaties, and there is the language before us.

Senator WILEY. That is all I have.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Chairman, may I supplement what I said this morning with the other matters?

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Secretary ACHESON. May I just add one thing to the answer to Senator Wiley? I should add that, in addition to this assurance in the treaty itself, the Soviet Government addressed a note to the British Government at the time it addressed one to us at the end of March, in which it raised this very question, and the British Government, in its answer to the Soviet Government—which is published and has been printed in all our newspapers—points out exactly again what I have said: That this treaty in nowise is inconsistent with the Charter.

Senator WILEY. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

DEVELOPMENT OF MUTUAL AID BEFORE AN ATTACK OCCURS

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Secretary, article 3 of the pact, in referring to the self-help or mutual aid, uses this language:

that the parties, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

I interpret that provision as clearly adopting a policy that you mentioned this morning, of the preaggression development of the mutual strength of these countries rather than the attempt to develop their strength in the event of aggression.

Is that a proper interpretation of what you stated this morning?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, Senator Hickenlooper. And that is right. In other words, you do not wait until the attack takes place to start getting ready to meet the aggression.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And that is an obligation raised in this pact on the part of the participating countries to increase their strength prior to any aggressive acts on the part of another nation.

STRENGTH OF THE WILL TO RESIST

I have noticed a number of times in your statement reference to the term "the will to resist," which, of course, I think is an essential thing in any self-defense agreement or any self-defense activity. But I seriously wonder, in view of the rapid fall of France at the outset of World War II, Dunkirk, all of the rest of the historical failures at the outset of that war on the western front, if there is any sound or reliable basis upon which to believe that the will to resist now in these countries, after the devastation of war, is any greater than it was, let us say, in 1939 when at least the resistance itself collapsed with great speed.

To qualify that a little further, I would say that it might well be argued that the will to resist might even be greatly weakened because of the devastation of war and all the things subsequent to the war that we think are necessary for the rehabilitation of those countries.

I am wondering if we can anticipate that the will to resist will be any greater now than it was in 1939.

Secretary ACHESON. In our judgment, Senator, there is a strong and growing will to resist in western Europe. If you wish to compare a condition of will now with a condition of will at some other time, I think that we will get into a slightly confusing area. Let us talk about the will to resist now.

The fact that countries meet disasters I do not think is an indication of a lack of will to resist. We certainly met our disasters early in the war, and some of those were pretty complete, as the disaster in the Philippines. That indicated no lack of will to resist. In fact, there was a tremendous will to resist in the United States, and that brought us through to victory.

You mentioned Dunkirk. Dunkirk is no example of a lack of will to resist. It is one of the really glorious episodes of history; and nothing has been more outstanding than the will of the British people.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I do not mean to detract from the heroism of Dunkirk.

Secretary ACHESON. If you point to the fact that France was disorganized, and its armies becoming disorganized, that is quite true. I think we could point out something else, which is true, and that is that those experiences have left a very strong effect upon the countries. In my judgment, the effect is to make even more vigorous the will to resist.

One has to talk with Norwegians, for instance, only a short time to discover that they are not prepared to repeat the experiences of 1940. They are not prepared to rely on neutrality; they are not prepared to believe that they alone can escape if some major aggression is planned, and they have a complete will to resist.

I believe that that exists in western Europe, and I believe it is increased as we give these people a feeling that what forces they have are going to be so equipped that they have a real fighting chance. And then I think you get the fighting spirit.

THE WILL TO RESIST AND THE ABILITY TO RESIST

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I recall that prior to 1939 there was a substantial degree of armament in western Europe. Many years had gone by since the close of World War I. Yet, with a substantial amount of armament and with France especially being reputed to have, at least at the start of the war, a highly trained and a very effective land army, we saw the resistance collapse almost overnight, even with equipment and with a reputedly fine military organization.

Again let me assure you so that you may not misunderstand me: I am not intending to argue against the merits and philosophy of this program, but I feel that it is only fair that we test the facts rather than embark on wishful thinking so far as results in the time of need are concerned.

I am not certain yet whether the will to resist can be separated from the ability to resist. The will to resist may exist in certain quarters. But a year and a half ago I was in one of the countries, one of the small countries of Europe, and it was repeatedly stated to me thus: "We have learned to live with invasion and capture, and we believe that when the third one comes we will know much better how to survive on our own under the invasion than we did in the last two, when we were unschooled in the methods to be used." This rather shook my faith in the will to resist in that particular small country.

I just do not know. I hope that the will is strengthened, and I hope that the ability to implement that will can be strengthened; but I do not think we have any particular assurance based on past events.

NO PLANS TO SEND AMERICAN TROOPS TO EUROPE

I believe you said earlier in your testimony today that it was contemplated that a great portion of the armament, or the developed armament, of western Europe, in the nations of this pact, would be carried under their own weight. I presume that that refers also to the manpower in their armies. I am interested in getting the answers as to whether or not we are expected to supply substantial numbers—by that, I do not mean a thousand or two, or 500, or anything of that kind, but very substantial numbers—of troops and troop organizations, of American troops, to implement the land power of western Europe prior to aggression.

Is that contemplated under article 3, where we agree to maintain and develop the collective capacity to resist? In other words, are we going to be expected to send substantial numbers of troops over there as a more or less permanent contribution to the development of these countries' capacity to resist?

Secretary ACHESON. The answer to that question, Senator, is a clear and absolute "No."

Senator HICKENLOOPER. That is sufficient. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Senator SMITH. In connection with article 3, I would like to ask one question.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you yield, Senator?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead, Senator Smith.

CONTEMPLATED ACTION UNDER ARTICLE III

Senator SMITH. Mr. Secretary, as Senator Hickenlooper has read the text of article 3, I will not read it again. But where you speak of individual and collective capacity and joint action, you contemplate, I assume——

Secretary ACHESON. Would you direct my attention again to what you are reading, Senator?

Senator SMITH. Article 3 of the treaty. I will read the whole article so as to make it clear in the record.

Secretary ACHESON. I have it before me. I just did not know what you were speaking of.

Senator SMITH. It says:

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

Am I to understand from that that we are contemplating some sort of lend-lease program in this military-assistance program that goes along with this, and, if so, is it just a unilateral lend-lease from the United States, or do we expect joint lend-lease by the whole group, you might say, a multilateral lend-lease program? If some other nation is able to do the lending or leasing of a particular article as well or better than we do, that would be contemplated?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, Senator, I think, as I tried to sketch out this morning, under the proposed military-assistance program, we will ask the Congress to make available funds out of which certain transfers can be made from the United States to these pact countries, of weapons.

It is also contemplated, and well worked out already, that the European countries themselves will not only do their utmost in their specific plans to supply themselves, but they will supply one another; and the exact amounts of that are also worked out, and they are very substantial.

Senator SMITH. It would be proper to say it is a sort of multilateral lend-lease program?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not want to talk about lend-lease. That is not something that adds to the clarity of the thought.

Senator SMITH. I agree with you, we do not know whether it will be lend-lease or what it will be. But under that general idea——

Secretary ACHESON. We propose transfers from our own side to the Europeans, and the Europeans will make transfers between one another.

Senator SMITH. Thank you very much. That is all I have, Mr. Chairman.

ASSURANCE THAT SENATE WILL BE CONSULTED ON ADMISSION OF NEW MEMBERS

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Secretary, if the chairman will permit, I would like to ask one supplemental question before the next Senator takes over, regarding your answer to my question this morning on article 10. You recall that you quoted the President as saying that, if he were confronted with the problem of deciding whether or not to accede to the addition of other members to the pact, he would consider that this involved the equivalent of writing a new treaty; and, so far as he is concerned, he would seek the advice and consent of the Senate.

Senator VANDENBERG. That protects us up to 1952—I do not mean to put a limitation at that point—

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly beyond 1948.

Senator VANDENBERG. But, after all, this treaty runs for 20 years. What protects us if, as, and when this President concludes to retire, voluntarily or otherwise?

Secretary ACHESON. I think there is precedent, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Would this not be a precedent? Would not the statement of the President—in the event it transpired within that period—and the custom and the practice, would that not make a precedent that the others would respect?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir; this mere statement would be a precedent. But I was going to say that there is a precedent for the fact that a statement made by a sitting President in regard to Presidential interpretation of the treaty, and what should be done under it, is accepted by his successors as a statement coming from the Presidential office.

Senator VANDENBERG. You yourself evidently considered it to be a somewhat important point, I judge, from the degree of attention which you gave to arming yourself with a thoroughly adequate answer.

If the Senate should conclude that this is of very fundamental importance, and interpret a reservation which dealt solely with our understanding of what the language means—and obviously it deals solely with our own domestic procedure—it could in no sense be hostile to the treaty itself or to any acceptance of it by us; could it?

Secretary ACHESON. I should not think so, Senator, that being purely an internal, American arrangement; the Senate might consider it unnecessary to attach this to an international document. But that is up to the Senate.

Senator VANDENBERG. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Along the line of the interrogation, the Presidential action in saying that this is a matter for Congress and the Executive would certainly have some influence at least, I hope, on a successor?

Secretary ACHESON. I should think it would make it clear that the basis of the thing is what the President said; that it is in effect a new treaty with a new stay.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly. It either has to be a new treaty or a modification of an existing treaty, and the consent of the Congress is required in any event. I think the President was exactly right in that attitude, because if he could make a treaty without referring it to the Senate at all he would abrogate, almost, the advice-and-consent clause of the Constitution.

Secretary ACHESON. I think the statement that was made on behalf of the President really puts the question to rest. I do not think that any future President, in the light of that statement, would undertake to vote for the admission of a new member, and any new member would be very ill-advised to let the matter rest at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wiley, did you finish?

Senator WILEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green is next.

Senator GREEN. Mr. Chairman, the questions I had in mind to ask have all been answered in the interval by the preliminary statement of the Secretary—upon which I would like to congratulate him for its clarity and comprehensiveness—or by the answers to the questions of other members of the committee.

Since those questions have been asked by some of them several times over, I do not feel I will do the same. I have no questions to ask at present.

The CHAIRMAN. Congratulations to the Senator from Rhode Island. Senator Lodge is next.

Senator LODGE. Mr. Secretary, I think you have answered a number of rather difficult questions, and I have a few more difficult ones to put to you, not so much on my own account but on account of the important functions that this committee has to perform; to make a record in which an answer is found to every question which can reasonably be asked. In that spirit I shall interrogate you.

IMPORTANCE OF MUTUAL AID AND SELF-HELP

Referring to the requirement in the treaty that there be continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, is it not true that, if there were not continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, our obligation to assist would, by virtue of that fact, be suspended?

Secretary ACHESON. You mean if the other countries do not do everything that they can for themselves?

Senator LODGE. Yes.

Secretary ACHESON. Yes. We should not be assisting countries that are not doing the best they can themselves; that is quite correct.

Senator LODGE. By the same token, if they are doing the best they can by themselves, then there certainly is an obligation on us, is there not, to do something?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes. We have accepted the principle that if they do all they can, and in our judgment they need help, then we give them the help.

Senator LODGE. And that it is a good proposition from our standpoint.

Secretary ACHESON. A very good proposition, yes, sir.

COMPARISON WITH THE SITUATION IN 1939

Senator LODGE. In connection with the point that has been made regarding the comparison between 1939 and 1949, is it not true that there are a number of very significant differences in Europe as between 1949 and 1939, to wit, that there is now an agreed-to plan between the western union powers which is much more definite and much more closely adhered to than any plan which existed in 1939? Is that not the fact?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, Senator Lodge.

Senator LODGE. Is it not the fact that, whether or not we do ratify this treaty, there is a very reasonable expectation in Europe, based on two previous experiences, that in case of trouble the United States would interest itself, and that that belief is held with far less doubt and uncertainty than ever existed in 1939?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir; that is true.

Senator LODGE. And that those factors, therefore, make it very much more likely that the will to resist would certainly be as great, if not greater.

Secretary ACHESON. There is another factor, Senator Lodge, which I know has not escaped you, but I think it is important perhaps to have on the record, as a difference between the period before 1939 and the present time.

I think all the European countries have had experience with the conception that it is possible to appease a potential aggressor. The view was widely held at one time that if one just acted softly, and gave in, that the aggressor's interest would die down and there would be no aggression. I think that view is no longer held anywhere in Europe.

Senator LODGE. In other words they have learned from experience.

Secretary ACHESON. They have learned from experience. They have also learned, as I said a moment ago in answer to a question by Senator Hickenlooper, that you cannot escape by hiding and looking the other way. If there is a full-scale aggression no one is left out of it.

Senator LODGE. Is it not true that the French, whose army, as has just been said, was so disorganized in 1939, formed an army with our help which, in 1944 and 1945, acquitted itself extremely well?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir; that is true.

Senator LODGE. So that we do not need to conjecture as to the capacity of France to regenerate itself from a military standpoint. We already have some performance we can point to, is that right?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir; no one is a greater authority on that subject than you are yourself.

DANGER OF AMERICAN EQUIPMENT FALLING INTO AGGRESSOR'S HANDS

Senator LODGE. I do not know about that. The statement is made, here and there, that to extend military assistance and equipment is a short-sighted thing to do because in case there is another crisis that equipment will fall into enemy hands. Therefore we would be much wiser to keep it over here. What would you say would be the answer to that contention?

Secretary ACHESON. I should say there were several answers to that, Senator Lodge. In the first place, in the last war we sent a great deal of equipment to many of our associates in the war. It is true that some of that equipment was captured and fell into the hands of the enemy. But by far the great bulk was used most effectively in winning the victory.

In the second place, I think the dividends which come to the United States from making this equipment available are very great indeed. We get many times the return in security from this equipment, more than the cost of the equipment to us. We get better rounded forces on the continent, we get a greater will to resist, we get all this equipment manned by people who are determined to use it. We get very great returns in security for the whole area in return for our assistance.

Senator LODGE. In other words, most of the equipment which we sent to the Russians and the British and the French in 1944 and 1945 did not fall into the hands of the enemy but was used to inflict punishment on the enemy?

Secretary ACHESON. That is right.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. May I interrupt?

Senator LODGE. Yes.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I do not think the situation is comparable at all. It certainly is not comparable to the question I asked a moment ago, and someone else asked, as to an internal coup in the country permitting the capture of this equipment. Manifestly when the enemy is shooting at one he is going to do everything he can to protect the equipment. It was not a military act of seizure that I was concerned about at all.

Senator LODGE. I do not understand you, Senator. I thought you were talking about the danger of enemy action.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Not at all.

Secretary ACHESON. Even at that, Senator Hickenlooper, there is a certain amount of comparison. I suppose people could have justifiably wondered, in 1940 and 1941, whether equipment which was being sent to the British at the time of their darkest days, might not fall into the hands of the enemy. It did not, it was well worth while taking whatever risk there was, as the British might have been overwhelmed, by giving them the essential aid which took them through those very dark days. I think in that degree there is a certain amount of comparison.

EFFECT OF COMMUNIST SEIZURE OF POWER IN A TREATY COUNTRY

Senator LODGE. In pursuance of Senator Hickenlooper's suggestion that there might be Communists that would take over one of these foreign governments, did you not say to Senator Vandenberg, under the terms of this treaty, such Communist control of the government would no longer receive any benefits from this country?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that is correct, yes.

Senator LODGE. I do not believe you made it quite clear in your response to Senator Vandenberg that that would be true not only because the Nation itself would not care to be under this pact, but also because we would take the initiative in seeing to it that they did not get the benefits under this pact?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that is correct, Senator Lodge.

Senator LODGE. And that the language of the pact—this is a question that has been raised on the floor of the Senate already—makes it clear that it is to be attributed to the nations that believe in the liberty of the individual, and in democratic ideals, and if they stopped practicing those ideals then they would not come under the pact any more. Is that true?

Secretary ACHESON. A new situation is created by that, yes.

POSSIBILITY OF FINANCING THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM OUT OF MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS

Senator LODGE. Another question that is frequently asked is: Will whatever military assistance we extend under the terms of this general concept—I mean the treaty and the Military Assistance Act—be at the expense of our own Military Establishment? That is a question that has been brought up quite a lot. I would like to get your comment on that.

Secretary ACHESON. Of course, Senator, that is a question which is out of my field. I would have no authority to speak on behalf of the President. My judgment and expectation is that it would not be had at the expense of our own military preparations.

IMPACT OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM OF UNITED STATES BUDGET

Senator LODGE. Would it be outside your field to comment on the fear that is frequently expressed that there must be a limit somewhere to these expenses that we are making for foreign assistance, and that this may be just that straw that breaks the camel's back?

Secretary ACHESON. I should think it is not that straw. I agree that we cannot go on indefinitely adding expenses on account of foreign operations. But I believe what we are doing here is taking the essential step which makes all the vast amounts we have invested really productive and will really bring about the results we are seeking.

Senator LODGE. You do not consider that this step will impose a burden on the American economy so serious that it would require fundamental changes in our economic relationships?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir; I do not.

Senator LODGE. Or that it would precipitate a crisis in Government finances, or budgetary matters?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir; I do not.

Senator LODGE. After all, the nations of Europe have as great an interest, have they not, in the health of the American economy as we have ourselves?

Secretary ACHESON. Nearly as great. We all have a vital interest in it.

Senator LODGE. I do not know how many realize it. I hope that is being preached to them. Of course if any of these questions—

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, would you mind an interruption?

Senator LODGE. Not a bit, Senator.

EXPENDITURES NOW WILL SAVE GREATER ONES LATER

The CHAIRMAN. Along the line of the question of Senator Lodge about present expenditures, is it not true that proper expenditures now would save future expenditures of a much larger amount?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that is quite true, Senator Connally. If all of these expenditures have their result of really removing, we hope at some fairly near future date, this overhanging threat of aggression, as Senator Vandenberg pointed out this morning, it will have a tremendous effect.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator.

IMPROVEMENT IN EUROPEAN MORALE

Senator LODGE. Has there been any perceptible improvement in morale in western Europe since the North Atlantic Treaty was signed? Do you get any news from abroad to that effect?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes. We have a great deal of information on that, and I think that Ambassador Harriman, who has come back from Europe for the purpose of testifying before this committee, can give you chapter and verse on that, Senator.

GOOD WILL BEHIND THE IRON CURTAIN

Senator LODGE. I understand that there is still considerable good will for the democracies behind the iron curtain. What would the effect of this pact be on people in Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and eastern Europe in general? Do you know what reception it has had there?

Secretary ACHESON. We have had very little information about that, Senator. I should hazard a guess that it is encouraging to those forces within the countries who are hoping some day to regain the type of freedom which they have lost.

PROSPECTS OF OTHER PACTS

Senator LODGE. There are people who write to me, and I am sure to other Senators—and maybe to you—who say that this is going to be followed by a Mediterranean pact, and then by a Pacific pact, and so forth. Is there a likelihood that there will be further regional arrangements, and that the United States will participate in them?

Secretary ACHESON. There are no further arrangements under contemplation at the present time, Senator.

RELATIONSHIP TO OEEC

Senator LODGE. Is it planned to have the OEEC fill any function, insofar as the administration of this military aid is concerned, the organization for European recovery, or will there be some machinery set up based on that?

Secretary ACHESON. My impression is that their chief function will be that they will continue as they have in the past, to bring about a recovery of their various countries. The actual manufacturing of particular types of weapons in whatever country, will probably not be handled by OEEC but by arrangements under the Brussels Treaty or this treaty.

Senator LODGE. There probably would be, would there not, some international group—in fact the treaty calls for the setting up of an international group—to administer the military aid, does it not?

ECONOMIC PROGRESS IN EUROPE AND THE TREATY

Secretary ACHESON. Yes; that is true, Senator.

Senator LODGE. Has enough progress been made in western Europe in the last year to justify any statement of hope as to the degree to which the countries of western Europe will cooperate together in a military way?

Secretary ACHESON. I think there has been very considerable progress, and I think that this treaty will increase the rate of progress and bring much closer cooperation in many fields.

POSSIBILITY OF COUNTER-MEASURES BY U. S. S. R.

Senator LODGE. Now the question has been raised by a number of very prominent men of the press, over the radio, and television, as to counter-measures which the Soviet Union will take as a result of the ratification of the Atlantic Pact. Is there something that you can say to that on the record?

Secretary ACHESON. I should not want to speculate about that matter. We already know, of course, that the Soviet Union has greatly intensified its propaganda against this treaty; we know that they have addressed notes to us and many of the other signatories protesting about it. I should imagine that that type of action will continue.

Senator LODGE. But it certainly is true, is it not, that the force which is building in western Europe, even in its maximum level of strength, would not possess any offensive capabilities at all?

Secretary ACHESON. That is entirely right.

Senator LODGE. So a nation which is making realistic judgments as distinguished from propaganda, or as distinguished from looking for pretexts, certainly would not change its policy because of the development of an armed force that has no offensive capabilities, would it?

Secretary ACHESON. One would think not.

AGREEMENT ON GERMANY AND THE TREATY

Senator LODGE. If an agreement could be reached between Russia and the western powers with respect to Berlin and the German problems generally, would it still be necessary to go ahead with the North Atlantic Treaty?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes; in my judgment it would.

Senator LODGE. In other words that is just a part of the problem?

Secretary ACHESON. That is a part of the much larger problem of Europe, and I should like to add there what I know you appreciate very fully, Senator Lodge, that the tendency of some people in the United States to believe that our policy should go up and down, depending on whether the Russians raise or lower the international temperature, is really to take the initiative in the formulation of our policy away from the American Government and put it in the hands of somebody else.

I think that is a most unwise way of proceeding, and that we should go ahead calmly and not be influenced by these various peace offensives or wars of nerves or wars of propaganda, or whatever is directed against us.

Senator LODGE. We hear people say that the United States ought to declare, if you step over this line, we will do so and so. As I understand your point, it is that the minute you say that you give the other man the control of what we do.

Secretary ACHESON. That is right.

COLONIAL POLICIES AND THE TREATY

Senator LODGE. Does the United States, by the acceptance of this pact, in any way indicate approval or support of the colonial policies of other pact members?

Secretary ACHESON. Not in the slightest.

Senator LODGE. There is just no doubt about that at all, is there?

AGREEMENT ON STRATEGIC ASPECTS OF MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Have you discovered any basic differences between the opinions of our own military leaders and those of European countries with respect to the fundamental nature of this military-assistance program, and the over-all strategy that governs it?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir; I think it has been worked out in complete harmony.

Senator LODGE. They really are in agreement on it?

Secretary ACHESON. They really are.

AMOUNT OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE SINCE WORLD WAR II

Senator LODGE. Can you state, or would you rather not for reasons of security, the amount of money which has been expended on military assistance to these nations since the war?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not have that information available at this moment. I think it can be obtained and given to you, Senator.

Senator LODGE. That is a question that is asked quite often.

Secretary ACHESON. I think that can be readily made available to you.

(The committee has been informed that the Department of State is preparing this information for submission in connection with the proposed military assistance legislation.)

CUT IN MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS TO OFFSET MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator LODGE. The argument is made that since the pact will increase our security, and it will cost a billion dollars, therefore we ought to cut a billion dollars from domestic military purposes in order to offset the gain in security we get from the pact. Will you comment on that contention?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that that is not a sound argument. In the first place, as I think you very well know, we use the word security in two different ways. We gain greatly in security by both the military assistance program and the pact in the general prevention of war.

That is perhaps the most important aspect. We also gain, in the unhappy event that that war is not prevented, in security, by having more effective associates in resisting aggression than we otherwise would. That does not mean that by merely transferring some money from our military budget and the budgets of other countries that we get the same amount of protection only in a different place.

In the first place, the element of time comes into it. It will take a year or a year and a half or 2 years for the full effect of the military-assistance program to go into operation. We should not weaken our own preparation.

Secondly, we wish to make our own participation as effective and vigorous as possible. We wish to make the European assistance as effective and vigorous as possible. Both programs are much smaller than they would be if there were a threat of war, an immediate threat of war.

We would have greatly to expand that program, both abroad and here. Therefore we are doing, I believe, about as little as we safely can in time of peace to prepare ourselves for this emergency, and we should not weaken what we are doing, because we are helping to add to the effectiveness of allies in time of crisis.

Senator LODGE. We ourselves, are we not, are starting from scratch in a sense, and have just begun to build up?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes. We have a great deal to make up.

Senator LODGE. If we were to reduce our own strength because of this billion dollar's worth of equipment in Europe, would we not be giving up actual armed forces in being, in exchange for paper plans over there, which could not possibly be realized for several years?

Secretary ACHESON. To some extent that is true, although it could be said that some of our expenditures are also for production which has not yet taken place.

REVIVAL OF ARMS INDUSTRY

Senator LODGE. Is it contemplated that arms industries will be revived in Europe, and, if so, should limitations be placed upon such expansion in the light of our own interests? What is the view on that? Is it a view that we encourage them to expand their armament industry or do we encourage them to expand it up to a certain point or what?

Secretary ACHESON. As I said this morning, absolute priority goes to recovery. Therefore, production of arms has to be held to almost a minimum point so that you will not withdraw any people or any factories from civilian production for consumption and for export. Therefore, what they are doing is operating the factories, whether they are Government-owned or otherwise, which are making armaments, at a point which will be somewhat increased under this program but within the slack which exists under the recovery program.

You will not be deflecting people or machines which are now working on civilian orders to military orders, but you will be making the production of those factories which are working on military orders closer to 100 percent. You will take up all the slack that there is. Therefore, there is a very severe limitation.

Senator LODGE. So the economic policy acts as a limiting factor?

REVIVAL OF RUHR ARMS INDUSTRY

Senator LODGE. Is it planned to bring back the Ruhr as a source of arms production?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir; it is not. We are very clear that the disarmament and demilitarization of Germany must be complete and absolute.

DIVISION OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator LODGE. What can you tell us about how the arms aid is going to be divided up as between the different countries of Europe? First of all, will we make that allocation ourselves, or will that be made in response to some joint recommendation? That is the first question.

Secretary ACHESON. It is made as the result of receiving a plan which has been worked out in Europe. That plan shows certain deficiencies in the total fulfillment of the plan. The plan involves manufacture sometimes in one country for use in another country, sometimes by manufacture in the country for use within its own areas.

All of that leads to certain deficiencies in equipment, that is, material which they cannot under this program make themselves. Those requests have been very carefully screened in the National Military Establishment. It was gone over after consultations with our military authorities and those in Europe, as to how these could be used, where they would be most effectively used, et cetera.

The total result is reached after that screening. I think it would be unwise, certainly at this time, to try to say how much of what we propose to do goes to a particular European country.

Senator LODGE. Will it be possible for the United States to make sure that, for instance, arms allocated to the Netherlands will not be used in Indonesia?

Secretary ACHESON. Absolutely. There is no question about that.

Senator LODGE. We will retain that control?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir. Absolutely no doubt about that.

Senator LODGE. Thank you, Mr. Secretary, very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Fulbright?

Senator FULBRIGHT. In view of the congratulations of the last Democrat, I hesitate to ask the Secretary any questions on the proposal at this time. There are just a few that I would like to ask, Mr. Secretary.

EFFECT OF A COMMUNIST SEIZURE OF POWER IN A TREATY COUNTRY

I was not clear this morning as to what you think might happen if, as a result of an election, Communist government took control of one of the members. Is there any mechanism by which a member of which we do not approve can be excluded? I was not clear. I know it was discussed, but I am a little in doubt as to what your feelings are.

Secretary ACHESON. There have been no provisions in the treaty looking to that end, Senator. I think if the event occurred to which you refer, that in the first place the country which became Communist would not be able to carry out its obligations under the treaty, would not want to, we could not have this sort of cooperation that the treaty envisages, and in one way or another, ways would be found to solve that problem.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Of course that has happened in the United Nations. That is approximately what has happened. We might have to resort to some similar action in this case.

Secretary ACHESON. Yes.

DEFINITION OF AN "ARMED ATTACK"

Senator FULBRIGHT. Under article 5 a question was prepared by the staff:

Would an internal revolution, perhaps aided and abetted by an outside state, in which armed force was being used in an attempt to drive the recognized government from power be deemed an "armed attack" within the meaning of article 5?

That is a little different from the last question, in that I assume an ordinary election which the Communists won. This is in the nature of a coup. Would that come within the definition of an armed attack?

Secretary ACHESON. It is quite hard for me to hear you Senator, and I am not sure that I got the question. Did you say if there were a revolution supported by outside armed force, would we regard that as an armed attack?

Senator FULBRIGHT. That is right. It is one of those border-line cases.

Secretary ACHESON. I think it would be an armed attack.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It would be?

Secretary ACHESON. It would seem to me that it would, yes.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Would you say that each country, or this country, would decide for itself whether or not that is an armed attack within the meaning of article 5, or would that be a function of the Council?

Secretary ACHESON. No. Each country would have to decide for itself.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Is the Council given any executive powers to make such a decision?

Secretary ACHESON. No, it is not.

VOTING IN THE COUNCIL

Senator FULBRIGHT. There is one other question in regard to the Council. Is it intended that those decisions be unanimous or by majority? That is a question that has plagued us.

Secretary ACHESON. There are no voting procedures laid down. The Council is a place where questions are discussed and recommendations are made to the member governments. Those recommendations might be unanimous, they might be split recommendations, and you might get one group of Council members recommending something, and another group recommending something slightly different.

There are no voting procedures, there is no desire to prevent any member of the Council from making any recommendation.

Senator FULBRIGHT. As a practical matter, that being so, if the members choose, they can require unanimity, which they would like to do, in case they ever want to set up some voting procedure among themselves, by agreement within the Council.

Secretary ACHESON. I suppose they could.

Senator FULBRIGHT. There being nothing to the contrary, nobody objecting; in other words, it is a practical resort for unanimity.

Secretary ACHESON. Their principal function is recommendatory and there is no purpose in trying to get a voting procedure, because what you want to do is to get the views of the Council. That is the purpose. If you set up a procedure whereby you may not get any views you have defeated your own purpose.

Senator FULBRIGHT. The point I have is if they themselves choose to set up some machinery there is nothing to prevent it. There is no prohibition.

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir; there is nothing to prevent them.

AREA COVERED BY TREATY

Senator FULBRIGHT. There has been a good deal of speculation as to article 6 as to the extent of the area covered. I think it might be a good thing to clarify a little bit further, because I do not think that you treated that article in detail. I did not hear it this morning. There are four questions there.

Is it intended that the treaty should cover only those areas specifically referred to in article 6, or does the use of the word "include" imply that it might also cover certain other areas?

Secretary ACHESON. It covers the area specified in article 6.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Only?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator FULBRIGHT. With the exception of Algeria and the North Atlantic area, does article 5 of the treaty cover any of the outlying territory of member states?

Secretary ACHESON. It does not cover any areas outside the area described.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Even though the area belongs to a member?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct. It does not cover that.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Why is Algeria singled out in the text of article 6?

Secretary ACHESON. Because Algeria, under the French Constitution, is a part of metropolitan France. Only those parts of Algeria which are parts of metropolitan France, under French law, are included.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Where does the Panama Canal fall in that connection?

Secretary ACHESON. The Panama Canal falls outside of the area. In the pamphlet which you have, Senator, published by the Senate, the Senate committee print, there is a map which is drawn.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I saw the map. What I was asking is for the record, because it is easier to use for debate than is the map in any case.

Secretary ACHESON. That is right, Senator. It falls outside the area.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Does the North Atlantic area include any part of the Mediterranean Sea?

RELATIONSHIP OF BRUSSELS PACT TO TREATY

Senator FULBRIGHT. How will the Brussels Pact defense organization be drawn into the broader framework of the Atlantic Pact in our concept of military assistance? Is there any idea of merging those two?

Secretary ACHESON. I should think that the relations between the organization set up under the Brussels Pact and that set up under the North Atlantic Treaty, would be very close indeed. It would seem to me unwise to merge them. All of that, of course, is in the future.

There is a working party already set up to work out the arrangements under this article which provides for the council, the military committee, et cetera, and they will work and come forth with recommendations if, as, and when the treaty is ratified.

Senator FULBRIGHT. All of the members of the Brussels Pact countries are, of course, members of this organization?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes; they are.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you wish to comment on the military matters, that is, can you give the committee for the record your idea as to how this military aid will be organized? Will a single military force be organized in Europe, or will there be 12 different ones?

Secretary ACHESON. I would not be competent to testify on that subject.

MEMBERSHIP IN NORTH ATLANTIC PACT COMMUNITY

Senator FULBRIGHT. What was the reason why Portugal was included and Spain was excluded?

Secretary ACHESON. The countries which were included, aside from those who originally met to negotiate the treaty, were included by the unanimous decision of the negotiators. Portugal was unanimously included. There was no agreement that Spain should be included, therefore Spain was not included.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Is it probable that Spain will be invited to participate at a later date?

Secretary ACHESON. I could not possibly speculate about that, Senator. As you see, it has to be by unanimous agreement.

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF GERMANY

Senator FULBRIGHT. Would the inclusion of western Germany in the pact improve the strategic position of the North Atlantic powers?

Secretary ACHESON. Would it do what?

Senator FULBRIGHT. Would it improve the strategic position of the North Atlantic powers?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not think I am an expert on military strategy, but I should think that we must say quite clearly at the present time that a discussion of including western Germany in the pact is not possible. The pact deals with armament questions, with self-help, mutual aid, and things of that sort, and at the present stage of affairs in Germany we could not contemplate a military program in Germany.

At the present time, of course, under the treaty, an attack on the occupation forces in Germany would be an armed attack under the treaty, so in effect Germany is protected as long as the occupation forces are there.

Senator FULBRIGHT. We will just assume the western government is set up, and if it becomes a self-governing area there is no reason why it could not be made a member. There is no prohibition there either. That is just left for the future for determination.

Secretary ACHESON. There are reasons that I have pointed out, in policy, which would create difficulties. You would have a conflict in policy between disarmament agreements which were entered into between the occupying powers and the self-help and mutual-aid preparations to resist aggression which are called for in the treaty. Therefore I think the question does not arise.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I realize that, but all the members who are concerned from that point of view, except one, is a member of this pact. It could, by agreement, be brought in also later on, if the members chose?

Secretary ACHESON. You could do anything by unanimous agreement; yes.

Senator FULBRIGHT. In other words, if you are asked "Are they excluded?" and they cannot be, that is not necessarily so, at all, by this pact. They could be brought in later on but they are not now included.

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC INTEGRATION OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think that this pact will influence in any way the political and economic integration of the western European countries?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir; I think it will have a very helpful influence upon it.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That is all.

Senator LODGE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask one more question.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

IMPOSSIBILITY OF COMMUNIST COMPLYING WITH PRINCIPLES OF THE TREATY

Senator LODGE. I would like to direct your attention, Mr. Secretary, to the preamble and article 2, and I shall read two excerpts from those two portions of the treaty.

In the preamble "they"—that is the parties—are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

The other excerpt is article 2:

The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being.

My question is, in the light of those two phrases: "Is it not true that a Communist government would not come within the purview of those two phrases that I have quoted?"

Secretary ACHESON. I think you are quite right.

Senator LODGE. Are those not two very pertinent provisions?

Secretary ACHESON. They are very pertinent, and they bear upon the question that you have in mind.

Senator LODGE. And they would justify us, would they not, in saying to a nation that was taken over by the Communists, "You no longer come within the purview of the pact."

Secretary ACHESON. In my judgment they would.

Senator LODGE. Thank you.

INVITATION TO SENATORS DONNELL AND WATKINS

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has invited Senators Donnell and Watkins to appear at this session. These Senators indicated a desire to sit with the committee and to interrogate witnesses. The committee agreed to that, under the accepted practices and courtesies of the Senate, so that at this point we will give Senator Donnell, the senior of the two Senators, the right to interrogate Secretary Acheson.

Senator DONNELL. I want to thank the chairman for his courtesy, and to make inquiry at this time, if I may, before proceeding.

As the chairman knows, neither Senator Watkins nor I were present this morning at the hearing, and consequently did not have the benefit of the testimony of the Secretary of State this morning. In view of that, I inquire whether or not it is the pleasure of the committee, in order to prevent any possible duplication, that we should defer our examination of the Secretary until his return, if he is to return, or whether the committee would prefer that we proceed this afternoon.

I am sure, speaking for myself, that I would be glad to go ahead, although I realize that there is a possibility of unnecessary duplication in view of the fact that I do not know what his testimony was this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. I will say to the Senator that it is not the fault of the committee that the Senators were not here. As soon as I was advised as to what the attitude of the committee was this morning I notified the chief of the staff here to notify both Senator Donnell and Senator Watkins that we were going to meet at 10:30 and we would be pleased to have them.

I had assumed also that the public announcement I had made on the floor of the Senate several days ago to that effect, in which we invited all Senators to be present, if they desired, had come to the notice of Senators Donnell and Watkins prior to the meeting of the committee this morning.

I am not complaining that you were not here: I am simply trying to show that it is through no action of the committee that you were not here.

Senator DONNELL. May I say to the chairman that I am sure there is no desire to enter into a controversy on the matter, but the fact is that on the 23d day of March there was delivered to the chairman, by myself, a letter, jointly from Senator Watkins and myself, requesting not merely the privilege of attendance, and not merely the privilege of interrogation to such extent as someone else might deem proper, but all the privileges of members of the committee, except the right to vote, in connection with these hearings.

Our request was based primarily on the fact that we felt that the committee had already, as to 12 out of the 13 members, expressed themselves as being in harmony with certainly the theory of the treaty, and subsequently, I may add, that the other member, Senator Lodge, had expressed himself to a similar effect by a newspaper article.

I may say that we received no response whatsoever to our letter, and this morning the communication to which the chairman refers was merely a statement—I have a copy substantially of it in my pocket—to the effect that we were invited to come to this meeting, with no statement as to whether we were entitled to interrogate, no statement as to whether our letter was being acceded to, no other statement at all, except that we were invited to come, as other Senators.

I think that was stated by Dr. Wilcox. The exact language is available if the chairman needs it.

As to the invitation on the floor of the Senate, I think the chairman will find on an examination of the record that there was no invitation, as far as I find at any rate, in the announcement by the chairman yesterday. It was no invitation. It was simply a request for an excuse by the committee for attendance, and previous announcement was to the effect that the hearing would start today.

I say, however, there is no desire on my part to enter into controversy. Our request, however, has never been complied with, or acknowledged, until 10 minutes before the hearing this afternoon, at which time I received a letter from the chairman, who told me some 40 or 45 minutes before, I should say, substantially, that he was going to send me such a letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator knew, and the Senator from Utah also knew, that we were going to meet today for these hearings. That was told on the floor of the Senate. We thought that the interest of the two Senators would be such that they would appear.

The Senator from Texas, who is the chairman of this committee, could not reply to the Senator's long and involved letter without knowing what the views of the committee members were. As soon as I found out what the attitude of the committee was I called you this morning. Until that time no definite conclusion had been reached.

Now, the Senator's letter, and his statement here now, refers to all of the privileges, all of the privileges except voting. The precedent, so far as I know, in the Senate, has been that frequently non-committee members of the Senate attending a hearing are invited to ask questions, and to sit. But other than that I do not know what these privileges are that the Senator refers to.

Certainly he cannot have the privilege of voting, and he did not ask for that. But the primary responsibility on this committee is for the members of this committee to investigate these facts.

Now, the Senator referred to the fact that he understands that the members of the committee are for the pact. I do not know. I have taken no vote. But certainly everybody knows that the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Utah are not for the treaty, and that they are here not to—if I may say it—elucidate such information as we had this morning, but they are here to impede and obstruct and delay and hinder and filibuster, if I might say, against the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat difficult, in view of the statement by the chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. I do not say that in any hostile spirit.

Senator DONNELL. I know that. I observe it is very friendly and nonhostile. May I say that when such terms as impede, obstruct, delay, hinder, and filibuster are used against a fellow Senator, I cannot help resenting any such language; and I do resent it.

There is no such attitude on the part of either Senator Watkins or myself. We have just as much right to our opinion as any member of this committee has, and we are not here in a desire to impede, obstruct, delay, hinder, or filibuster.

I may say we have devoted considerable time to this matter, and we should like to examine the witnesses and do so intelligently. I am quite willing to proceed with examination of Secretary Acheson this afternoon, if it is the pleasure of the committee. On the other hand, as I started out by making the inquiry, in view of the fact we did not hear the testimony this morning, I asked whether or not you desire us to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not intend to offend the Senator by those terms. The future conduct of the Senators in their questioning will reveal whether or not I am correct in my original view.

I withdraw the language, however, and apologize. I want to be courteous, I want to be fair. But this Senate, and this committee, have some considerations in this matter as well as the two Senators from Missouri.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Watkins, I am sorry to say, is not from Missouri. We would like to have three Senators.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume the Senate would like to have everybody on this committee, for that matter.

Senator DONNELL. Is it all right for us to proceed with this matter?

The CHAIRMAN. It is perfectly agreeable to me. I do not know what the engagements of the Secretary are.

Secretary ACHESON. I am at your disposal.

The CHAIRMAN. Tomorrow we have booked former Senator Austin, who will be here. I suppose we can work that out. For the time being we will go on with the interrogation. If it is necessary to suspend it, we will postpone the remainder of it.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, since my name has been mentioned, and since certain statements have been made concerning my views, my commitments—

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly you can make a brief statment. I would appreciate the courtesy of making a brief statement.

Senator WATKINS. In the first place I have made no commitment for or against this treaty. I have asked some questions which I think ought to be answered. Maybe some of them have been answered.

The CHAIRMAN. Would the Senator mind saying now whether he is for it or against it?

Senator WATKINS. I cannot say. I have not completed my investigation of it.

The CHAIRMAN. You have not finished? That is fine.

Senator WATKINS. If the chairman would please, I was trained as a lawyer and as a judge. When I do not understand a matter I try to get all the information on both sides. I think my conduct has been absolutely fair in the matter.

The statements in the Record, in the Congressional Record, contain exactly what I have said, and I defy you or anyone else to go into those statements and find that I have been reflecting upon any Member of this body, or have taken a definite position one way or the other.

The record is there, and I rely entirely upon it. I would like to say something about this—

The CHAIRMAN. I want to be courteous to the Senator, and respectful to him, and he has a right to his views.

Senator WATKINS. I have received your letter. I think I received mine at 2:20 this afternoon, although my letter was addressed to you about a month ago.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true. I explained to you why I did it. I am not the whole committee. This committee is the only authority that has any power to control the proceedings here on who shall appear or not appear and what they shall ask or not ask. I did not assume to decide that question for myself.

The Senator knows we have been under tremendous pressure here. We have just had the ECA for a month or more.

Senator WATKINS. I realize all that. I thought probably the decision had been made. This afternoon when I was on the Senate floor and picked up my home-town paper in the Senate reading room I found that apparently on last Saturday the Associated Press reporter had interviewed the distinguished chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, in which it was announced that Senators Donnell and Watkins would be permitted to appear here and ask questions.

That is in substance what it was. I got it today. It is dated April 23. It was apparently known in Salt Lake City on last Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. All that shows is that the Salt Lake paper is better advised as to what is going on in Washington than the Senator from Utah.

Senator WATKINS. That is true. I thought perhaps I would have to go home to get the information. I can get it right here, close by. But apparently I have to read my home-town papers in order to get the answers.

The CHAIRMAN. I commend that practice.

Senator WATKINS. I have an invitation that has been extended to me now. I call the attention of the committee to the statement in this letter:

This is to advise you—and this is the last paragraph—that the committee meets again at 2:30 p. m. in the caucus room, in the Senate Office Building, to hear Secretary of State Acheson, and the committee invites you and Senator Donnell to appear. Each of you will be permitted to ask Secretary Acheson appropriate questions respecting his testimony and the Atlantic treaty.

That is very good, and all right as far as it goes. The request was not only to ask Secretary Acheson questions, but the other witnesses who were to appear here. I am wondering now, maybe this was not intentional, but it seems to limit us to the examination only of Secretary Acheson. If that is the fact, that I am limited, and by this appearance you have complied with our request, I would most respectfully decline to participate unless I am permitted to ask the other witnesses questions.

Senator LODGE. I hope these two Senators have the chance to interrogate other witnesses, too.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. That letter referred to this afternoon's meeting. I said we would meet this afternoon at 2:30 and that you could come and interrogate Secretary Acheson.

Senator WATKINS. I am asking the question now to clear it up. If that is all that you want, very fine, and I appreciate the courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all I meant for the moment. I do not know what the committee will do hereafter. It depends on how the hearings progress. When anybody appears, if they want to ask questions they can indicate so and the committee will decide whether they will hear them.

Senator WATKINS. I also want to say, not having received any reply, and not having been advised, I did not make any special preparation. I had other obligations. I knew that I could read in the record what was said. There was no necessity for me to come here to listen. I was not prepared to come here to interrogate, so I did not prepare, and I have not heard what Secretary Acheson said. I have not heard the questions that have already been asked.

The CHAIRMAN. You could have heard if you had come this morning.

Senator WATKINS. I understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. You were notified before the committee met this morning that they were going to meet at 10:30, and you did not come.

Senator WATKINS. I did not come, of course. I had other obligations.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly.

Senator WATKINS. And I had not been given permission to ask questions. I would like to say, with this, that I would like to ask some questions after examining the record. I would like to read the transcript tomorrow, when it is ready, and I take it for granted that in a matter of this importance, with the Secretary here in the city, it will be possible to get him back, and we will not be unduly trespassing on his time if we ask him to return for further questions.

I will not ask him anything this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator DONNELL, do you have any questions?

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. I would like to say that my opinion of the wisdom of the distinguished Senator from Missouri and the distinguished Senator from Utah is such that I fully expect after their exploration of the subject that they will become ardent devotees of the North Atlantic Pact.

Senator WATKINS. That is possible.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the examination, I desire just to reiterate this one statement: I trust the Secretary and the committee will pardon me if I should repeat some of the matters that have come up this morning. I have no knowledge of what has come up, and necessarily it is entirely possible that some of the questions I shall ask will be repetitious to that extent. I may say also that it is entirely possible that approaching this matter from the standpoint of questioning the validity of the treaty—the advisability, I should say, of the treaty—that I may ask some questions that the chairman of this committee, or possibly some others, may not agree with, and may not think will elicit information of value. Yet I assure the chairman that I will endeavor only to ask questions that I think are of importance in the proceedings.

EXPLORATORY CONVERSATIONS ON ATLANTIC TREATY

Mr. Secretary, I direct your attention to that part of your letter of April 7, 1949, to the President, which appears in Executive L, Senate, Eighty-first Congress, first session, in which letter you state that in July 1948 the President authorized Mr. Lovett to begin exploratory conversations with the Ambassadors of Canada and the parties to the Brussels Treaty. I pause until you have observed that portion of your letter. It is at page 5 of the Executive L print, up near the top.

I assume, Mr. Secretary, that these exploratory conversations that Mr. Lovett entered into, pursuant to the authority of the President, were the first of the acts participated in by the United States and other countries which ultimately culminated in the North Atlantic Treaty. Am I correct in that assumption?

Secretary ACHESON. These I believe were the first discussion with those countries about a possible treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Those countries were Canada, Belgium, France, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom. Is that correct?

Secretary ACHESON. I believe you stated the Brussels countries correctly; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You say in this letter, Mr. Secretary, that the President, and I quote, "on the basis of these expressions of the wishes of the legislative branch," authorized Mr. Lovett to begin these exploratory conversations to which I referred. Will you state, please, Mr. Secretary, what are those expressions of the wishes of the legislative branch to which you refer in that observation?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that is set forth in the letter, Senator Donnell.

SENATE RESOLUTION 239 AND H. R. 6802

Senator DONNELL. And it is the preceding page, and consists of two items, does it not, Mr. Secretary; namely, Senate Resolution 239, which was adopted by the Senate on June 11, 1948, and the preamble of H. R. 6802, which was unanimously reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives on June 9. Am I correct in that?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. The action in the House of Representatives did not culminate in any actual action by the House itself. I am correct in that; am I not?

Secretary ACHESON. The letter points out that that was the vote of the committee but it was not taken up before the end of the session, so that the wishes of the legislative branch were confined, so far as any final action by either body of the Congress, to Senate Resolution 239, which was adopted by the Senate on June 11, 1948; am I correct in that?

Senator DONNELL. Yes. Mr. Secretary, could you tell us, if you know, the reason that it was originally suggested that such a resolution as Senate Resolution 239 was advisable?

Secretary ACHESON. I am afraid I don't understand that question.

REASONS FOR PASSAGE OF SENATE RESOLUTION 239

Senator DONNELL. Here is the question I am asking you: Senate Resolution 239 was passed by the Senate on June 11, 1948. I want to ask you, if you know, what was the reason why there was an effort made to secure the passage of that resolution?

Secretary ACHESON. I was not in public office at that time. I just know what the record indicates, and what is contained in my letter.

Senator DONNELL. The record indicates the reason why it was necessary or advisable to have a resolution such as 239, which is known as the Vandenberg resolution.

Secretary ACHESON. I think if you will turn to my letter, Senator, we point out—on the day the Brussels Treaty was signed—

Senator DONNELL. March 17, 1948.

Secretary ACHESON. Yes.

the President addressed the Congress in joint session, and the conclusion of that treaty as a noticeable step toward peace. You—that is the President—expressed confidence that the American people would extend the free countries the support which the situation might require and that their determination to defend themselves would be matched by an equal determination on our part to help them to do so. Shortly thereafter, my predecessor, General Marshall, and Mr. Robert Lovett undertook a series of consultations with the leaders and members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on the problems facing the free world and how they might best be met by bringing American influence to bear in the cause of peace, in association with other free nations, and within the framework of the United Nations Charter.

I think that states why the consultations took place and the purposes of them.

USE OF THE SECURITY COUNCIL VETO AND THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Did the fact that Russia had made frequent use of the veto in the United Nations have anything to do with the institution of the consultations between your Department and the Foreign Relations Committee leading to the adoption of Senate Resolution 239?

Secretary ACHESON. I pointed out this morning, Senator, at some length that the hopes that the world had had that the members of the United Nations would adhere, continue to adhere to the principles of the United Nations, and that they would use the procedures of the United Nations to carry out those principles, had been disappointed; and that a large group of the Soviet Union, and some of its satellite states had, in effect, not adhered to the principles of the United Nations Charter, and had used the procedures of the United Nations to frustrate the achievement of the purposes and principles. As a result of that, and as a result of other Soviet action in eastern Europe, a deep-seated sense of insecurity arose in Europe, and it was to meet that sense of insecurity which was having an unfortunate effect upon recovery that the Brussels Treaty was undertaken, that the consultations were undertaken between the State Department and the members of the Foreign Relations Committee; and, as you read the report of the Foreign Relations Committee, you will see that they were influenced by that in drafting the resolution, and the Senate was influenced by that in adopting it, by a vote of 64 to 4.

BRUSSELS PACT

Senator DONNELL. And the President's observation with respect to the Brussels Treaty occurs, does it not, in his address to the Congress on March 17, 1948, three sentences of which read as follows:

This development—

that is, I think, referring to the Brussels agreement—deserves our full support. I am confident that the United States will, by appropriate means, extend to the free nations the support which the situation requires. I am sure that the determination of the free nations of the free countries of Europe to protect themselves will be matched by an equal determination on our part to help them to do so.

Secretary ACHESON. That is what I referred to in my letter.

PREPARATION OF SENATE RESOLUTION 239

Senator DONNELL. That is what I thought doubtless you had referred to. Now coming on down to the days immediately preceding the presentation on May 19, 1948, of the Vandenberg resolution to the Senate, do you know, even though you were not in the department at that time, who it was that worked with the Foreign Relations Committee from the State Department on the preparation of Senate Resolution 239?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not.

Senator DONNELL. It was a fact, however, as the records disclose, is it not, Mr. Secretary, that representatives of the State Department did cooperate in the preparation of Senate Resolution 239, which was presented to the Senate by Senator Vandenberg?

Secretary ACHESON. I have no idea whether they participated in the preparation of the resolution or not.

Senator DONNELL. Was Mr. Lovett in the Department at that time?

Secretary ACHESON. He was the Under Secretary of State.

Senator DONNELL. Did you read the Congressional Record of June 11, 1948, and note particularly the various expressions of opinion by Senator Vandenberg as to what S. Res. 239 did and what it did not do?

Secretary ACHESON. I am sure that I have read at one time or another the debates and the report, everything in connection with the resolution. I do not recall now.

PREPARATORY CONVERSATIONS ON ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Going forward: After the passage of the resolution, Senate Resolution 239, on June 11, 1948, you have mentioned, as I have indicated, in your letter of April 7, 1949, to the President, that in July—the next month—after the action of the Senate, on the basis of the expressions of the wishes of this branch, the President authorized Mr. Lovett to begin exploratory conversations with the Ambassadors of Canada and the parties to the Brussels Treaty.

May I ask you, Mr. Secretary, if a little bit later in your letter of April 7, 1949, you say:

These conversations resulted in September in agreement by the representatives participating in them that an arrangement established by treaty, for the collective defense of the North Atlantic area, was desirable and necessary.

Am I correct in that?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. In November 1948, which was 2 months after the September agreement to which you refer, is it a fact that the western European alliance was itself working on a draft of a proposed treaty?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not know. I have no information.

Senator DONNELL. You have no knowledge to that effect? Do you recall seeing in the press, as of that approximate date, Mr. Secretary, a statement from the Washington Post, an Associated Press London dispatch, November 20, 1948, that:

The western European alliance is plugging away on a rough draft of the North Atlantic defense pact—as shown in the Washington Post of November 21, 1948.

Did you see that statement?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You do not know whether that is a fact or not?

Secretary ACHESON. I assume that these parties were working on a draft of the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Had the State Department of our own country started work at that time also on a draft of the treaty?

Secretary ACHESON. I assume so. An outline of what was to be discussed was prepared; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. An outline, prior to December 1948, is that correct?

NEGOTIATIONS ON THE ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Then you say in your letter to the President:

Following approval by the governments concerned—of the recommendations of their representatives—

negotiation of the treaty was begun in December and finished on March 15, 1949.

Is that correct?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. So that the actual negotiation, after these preliminary conversations, after the agreement had been reached on the general nature of the treaty, after the approval by the governments of the prior recommendations, the negotiation of the treaty began in December 1948 and was finished on March 15, 1949?

FIRST DRAFT OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Are you able to say whether or not at the beginning of what you term "negotiation of the treaty" that there was any instrument in existence which had previously been drawn by the State Department of our country, or whether the only instrument was something that had been drawn in Europe by representatives of the western European alliance?

Secretary ACHESON. I am informed by my colleagues, who were in the Department at that time—although I was not—that the first draft of any sort emerged from the conversations and was a product of group discussion.

Senator DONNELL. I am not quite certain whether you mean at the beginning of the negotiations—I am using the term negotiations as used in your letter of April 7, 1949, to the President—whether there had been anything drawn by the United States or whether anything that had been drawn was drawn by foreign countries.

Secretary ACHESON. The answer is neither. My colleagues inform me that the first draft was the product of group discussion between the United States and these other countries. This came out in a group discussion.

Senator DONNELL. And that was in the month of December 1948?

PRESIDENT'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS

Senator DONNELL. The President's inaugural address delivered on January 20 contained these three sentences, did it not, Mr. Secretary:

If we can make it sufficiently clear in advance that any armed attack affecting our national security would be met with overwhelming force, the armed attack might never occur. I hope soon to send to the Senate a treaty respecting the North Atlantic security plan. In addition, we will provide military advice and equipment to free nations which will cooperate with us in the maintenance of peace and security.

Do you recall that language in the President's address of January 20?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes; I do.

Senator DONNELL. You took your oath of office on the day after the inauguration of the President, did you not?

Secretary ACHESON. January 21.

CHANGES IN THE DRAFT TREATY

Senator DONNELL. January 21, 1949. Do you recall whether or not the treaty was, at the time you took your office, in substantially the same form as it was when it was signed on April 4, or was it in quite different form?

Secretary ACHESON. There were very important changes.

CONFERENCE WITH NORWEGIAN FOREIGN MINISTER

Senator DONNELL. I will ask you to state whether or not on or about February 11, 1949, you had a conference with Mr. Lange, the Foreign Minister of Norway.

Secretary ACHESON. I suppose that is the day. Yes; I presume that you have the date correct, Senator. The Foreign Minister of Norway, as you know, came over here for the purpose of discussing the treaty with us.

Senator DONNELL. I ask you to state, Mr. Secretary, whether or not there was given out a statement with your knowledge to the Associated Press, almost immediately following the conference between you and Mr. Lange, in which these two paragraphs—which are very short—appeared:

The United States, subject to Senate approval of the treaty, will make the strongest possible commitment to give prompt and effective aid if any one of the countries in the alliance is attacked; but only Congress can declare war.

Military action, therefore, cannot be committed in advance, but in joining the alliance the American Government would subscribe to the principle that an attack on one member nation was an attack on all, and this would be interpreted as a moral commitment to fight.

Was there a statement given out to that general effect with your knowledge?

Secretary ACHESON. Not at all.

Senator DONNELL. There was not?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Did you know of any such statement having appeared in the press?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir.

SENATE DEBATE OF FEBRUARY 14, 1949

Senator DONNELL. Did you read the Congressional Record of February 14, 1949?

Secretary ACHESON. I am sure I did not.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall that that was the date on which that observation was called to the attention of the Senate, and that Senators Vandenberg and Connally made various statements which were immediately commented upon by the press of European nations, country after country, within the next 24 or 48 hours? Do you recall that?

Secretary ACHESON. I remember the incident to which you refer.

Senator DONNELL. Would you state, Mr. Secretary, whether or not on the afternoon of February 14, following the debate in the Senate of that day, you had a call from Messrs. Connally and Vandenberg at your office? Do you recall that?

Secretary ACHESON. I have had several calls.

Senator DONNELL. They came to see you that afternoon, did they not?

Secretary ACHESON. I will ask them. I do not know whether they came on that afternoon or some other afternoon.

Senator DONNELL. You knew of the foreign comments that were made, did you not, immediately after the debate of February 14?

Secretary ACHESON. I knew of many of them, Senator. There were quite a few comments.

Senator DONNELL. Did you know that this question was asked, and answer returned by Mr. Vandenberg, in the debate of February 14:

But the Senator would not favor, would he, a North Atlantic Pact containing within it a moral commitment on the part of the United States to fight?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not without its own independent decision to that end.

Did you know, Mr. Secretary, that in the same debate the following ensued in which Mr. Connally made various statements:

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not, of course, approve of any language which may be adopted which could be construed as automatically involving the United States in war.

Mr. DONNELL. Or as a moral commitment to fight?

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course. In the case of governments I do not know the difference between moral commitments and legal commitments. I certainly would not desire the adoption of any language which would morally commit us to fight. I think our morality is worth something in the world, and we would not want to play with a moral commitment, even though we might not be legally bound.

But there are many people, and we have found them in Government and elsewhere, who would favor automatically going to war, which would mean letting European nations declare war and letting us fight.

Mr. DONNELL. Which would, of course, be entirely contrary to the Constitution of the United States, would it not?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly. Congress alone has the power to declare war. Of course, individual Senators declare war sometimes.

Mr. DONNELL. But those are only local wars.

Mr. CONNALLY. Seriously, I would not vote for any language of that kind. I have so told the Secretary of State, and I think he knows that I feel as does the Senator from Michigan, that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations would not approve or adopt any form of language in an international agreement which would commit us to go to war when some other country in Europe might be attacked.

We are not responsible for the disagreements which may arise in the countries of Europe. Any European nation might attack another nation, not merely the one country about which we hear so much talk.

I would not attempt to assess all the different ramifications involved but when and if the situation shall arise, the Government of the United States can legally, morally, and constitutionally determine what our course shall be under the given circumstances; that is reserved to the United States.

If we think the controversy or situation is of such a nature that we should go to war, we can do so. If we think it is not of such a nature, we shall not go to war.

That is my horseback attitude in regard to the question at the moment.

Do you recall having had that language, or substantially the information that the two Senators had so expressed themselves, called to your attention?

Secretary ACHESON. I recall the incident, and I recall reading about it. I do not recall the quotation to the extent that you read it.

Senator DONNELL. Did you read the New York Times statement of February 15, an article by Mr. James Reston? I pause to ask, Do you know Mr. James Reston of the New York Times?

Senator DONNELL. Has Mr. Reston frequently conferred with the State Department, and did he prior to the general knowledge of the contents of this pact coming to public attention?

Secretary ACHESON. Mr. Reston has always attended the press conferences of the Secretary of State. I do not know that he has any other conferences.

REPERCUSSIONS OF SENATE DEBATE

Senator DONNELL. Did you observe this statement on February 15, by Mr. Reston:

After the debate, Senators Connally and Vandenberg went to the State Department to see Secretary of State Acheson.

The Secretary of State intends to have other talks with Senators Connally and Vandenberg later this week, after which he will present his case to the full Foreign Relations Committee.

Meanwhile, the State Department will be watching for reaction to the day's debate, not only at home but abroad.

Do you remember seeing that article?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall an editorial in the New York Times of the next day on the Atlantic Pact Debate, in the course of which this language appears:

This was especially evident from the statements of Republican Senator Donnell, who, in the manner of Senator Lodge's round robin of 1919, attempted to serve notice that the United States will accept neither legal nor moral obligations to defend the peace by opposing aggression, if necessary by force of arms, and that the Senate will repudiate any treaty even implying such commitments.

In this stand during the debate on the floor of the Senate he found the support of Senator Connally, the new Democratic chairman of the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee. Even Senator Vandenberg saw himself compelled to advocate such a watering-down of the Atlantic Pact as to make it little more than a formal recognition of the community of interest in the event of an armed attack upon the Atlantic community, leaving every member free to do as he pleases.

In contrast to this position is the stand of President Truman, who proposes the Atlantic Pact in order to provide unmistakable proof of the joint determination of the free countries to resist armed attack from any quarter as the best method of avoiding such attack and thereby safeguarding our own security, et cetera.

Do you recall having seen that editorial in the New York Times?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir; I do not.

Senator DONNELL. Did you read the press accounts, or many of them, Mr. Secretary, in the foreign countries, or from the foreign countries, with respect to this debate of February 14, in which these two gentlemen, the two Senators, had made these various observations?

Secretary ACHESON. Very few.

Senator DONNELL. You were aware, were you not, Mr. Secretary, that there was very grave apprehension in Europe, by reason of the statements made by the two distinguished Senators. You knew that, did you not?

Secretary ACHESON. I knew that the incident attracted a great deal of attention throughout Europe.

FURTHER COMMENTS ON THE SENATE DEBATE

Senator DONNELL. Did you notice this language by Mr. David Lawrence appearing on February 16:

The negotiations over the North Atlantic Pact, for example, have aroused a significant comment in the Manchester Guardian, one of the leading liberal newspapers of Great Britain. It says, in an editorial entitled "The Wrong Way": "The United States can hardly be proud of some recent passages in its diplomacy. Negotiations on the North Atlantic Pact have obviously been bungled. The apparent retreat behind the shelter of the Senate's authority should have been avoidable and much misunderstanding and heart-searching in Europe could have been prevented. The United States should not have forced the pace if it were not able to deliver the goods. Now a more sober and less spectacular approach to problems of mutual aid must be attempted." * * * Other British newspapers put headlines on the comments of Senators Vandenberg and Connally and said America is "welshing" on its obligations to Europe in connection with the military alliance.

You saw that, did you not, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary ACHESON. No; I did not.

Senator DONNELL. You read these newspapers, of course, Mr. Secretary, I know, to the full extent that your time permits. That is correct, is it not? Current press observations on matters involving the State Department?

Secretary ACHESON. I am quite lazy about that, Senator. There is prepared for me a résumé of most of the press.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask, without inquiring further in any detail, whether or not you saw this Associated Press dispatch, or learned of it:

London, February 15—which was the day after the debate—

America's rejection of any "automatic war" clause in the Atlantic Pact hit the public of western Europe like a dash of ice water today. "Senate Bans War Pledge" and "No Automatic War Tie, Say Senators," morning paper headlines announced.

Did you hear or see anything like that?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. It is a fact, is it not, Mr. Secretary, that you did learn there was great apprehension in Europe that after all this treaty that you had been working on from December 1948 up until February 14 probably would not give anything to Europe that it expected. That is correct, is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. No; I should not think so. I knew there was a great deal of interest in the debate which took place in the Senate, and some confusion about it.

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard Mr. Reston as a gentleman of wide information on matters pertaining to diplomatic affairs?

Secretary ACHESON. I have the highest regard for him.

Senator DONNELL. Do you concur with his language in the New York Times of February 20:

Since last Monday's debate in the Senate considerable energy has been expended on finding words that will scare the Russians, reassure the western Europeans and satisfy the Senate.

Do you recall seeing that, and do you agree with it?

Secretary ACHESON. No; I do not recall seeing it.

Senator DONNELL. Do you agree with that, that that is what was going on in the State Department, shortly after the debate of February 14?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not think it was intended to be a description of my mental process.

EUROPEAN REACTION TO SENATE DEBATE

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, you do realize, do you not, that following these announcements by the two gentlemen in the debate, that there was a strong position in Europe, a strong feeling in Europe, I should say, that after all the pact was not going to give any assurance. Therefore the State Department, on the one hand, was confronted by the problem of satisfying Europe, that the United States will go to war in the event of armed attack on any signatory, and on the other hand, of reassuring people in this country who feared that there was an obligation to go to war.

Was not that the dilemma that was presented to your Department?

Secretary ACHESON. No; I should not say that was a dilemma.

Senator DONNELL. You would not say that?

Secretary ACHESON. No.

EFFECT OF A COMMUNIST COUP IN A TREATY COUNTRY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, I would like to pass for a moment to article 5 and ask something of your opinion as to the meaning of article 5 as it now stands. Before doing so, might I refer to a comment which you made here this afternoon in regard to the question as to whether, if a nation becomes a Communist nation, it can be expelled or ousted from the pact.

Is there any other language in the entire treaty to which you can point, or which has ever occurred to you as tending to indicate that such a nation could be put out, other than that that Senator Lodge called to your attention this afternoon while you were on the stand?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that the language which is applicable is that contained in the preamble, probably in article 1, article 2, and kept running through the treaty, Senator DONNELL. You will find all through here provisions which would seem quite incompatible with participation by a nation which was Communist and which was following the Communist line.

Senator DONNELL. Would you point to the next one of those provisions, which runs through, to which you refer?

Secretary ACHESON. For instance, the undertaking to settle all their disputes by peaceful means in accordance with the charter, which is in article 1.

Senator DONNELL. That is in article 1?

Secretary ACHESON. In article 2 it is referred to. In article 3 it talks about "more effectively to achieve the objectives of the treaties by means of continuous self-help and mutual aid."

I have not seen very much mutual aid between Communist and non-Communist countries. Consultation, whenever in the opinion of one of them the territorial integrity, political independence, or security is involved.

Article 5 would be a difficult one for a Communist country.

Senator DONNELL. Any other provisions that you can think of as bearing on that question?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not know whether these Communist countries could say that none of the international engagements which they now have in force would conflict with this treaty.

I think that about covers them.

PROVISIONS FOR WITHDRAWAL FROM TREATY

Senator DONNELL. There is nothing, I take it, Mr. Secretary, which in express terms provides any method by which any country can be ousted from the participation in the pact. I am correct in that, am I not?

Secretary ACHESON. I pointed that out earlier this afternoon.

Senator DONNELL. And there is no provision in the pact by which a country may voluntarily withdraw, is there?

Secretary ACHESON. There is no express provision.

Senator DONNELL. There is no implied provision either, is there?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Neither expressed nor implied, by which a country may withdraw. And certainly, unless these items that you have referred to, and Senator Lodge has referred to, have application, there is nothing which either expressly or impliedly says that if a country goes Communist that it can be ousted or can withdraw. I am correct in that, am I not?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, you, of course, are an eminent member of the bar; you were the private secretary or law clerk of Mr. Justice Brandeis; that is correct, is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. I was his law clerk.

Senator DONNELL. And practiced law?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. If you were writing a contract for a client, and wanted to make it clear that one of them could get out of the contract, or either of them could, or could be put out, you would say that in so many words, would you not?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. It is not said in so many words in this pact, is it?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true.

MEANING OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you, going down to article 5 of this treaty, with which, of course, you are thoroughly familiar, whether you agree with this observation of the New York Times editorial—

I may say it is the first editorial—of March 22, 1949, which is not very long. This excerpt says:

The North Atlantic Pact contains promises not even dreamed of by Woodrow Wilson. President Wilson, indeed, in his war speech of April 2, 1917, looked forward to "a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free." But Mr. Wilson in time of peace would not have dared ask the Senate to commit itself, as Mr. Truman and his advisers are now doing, to go to war if any 1 of 11 or more nations is attacked. We should not quibble on this point. The defense pact means that or it means nothing.

Do you agree with that statement in the New York Times?

Secretary ACHESON. No, sir. I think if you would ask me questions, not as to whether I agree with what other people said, but my own view—

Senator DONNELL. I want to know if your view of that statement is correct, namely, that the defense pact means that the United States will go to war if any 1 or more of the 11 nations is attacked, or it means nothing. Do you agree with that?

Secretary ACHESON. That is not what I testified here today.

Senator DONNELL. And you testified here earlier this morning on that point?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes. I covered it quite fully in my statement.

Senator DONNELL. Let me quote this dispatch which appeared in the Washington Post March 23:

United Press, Copenhagen, Denmark. Foreign Minister Gustav Rasmussen—he is the gentleman who signed the treaty on behalf of Denmark, is he not?

Senator DONNELL. I resume, from the Washington Post, to the United Press:

Foreign Minister Gustav Rasmussen told Parliament today that under the proposed North Atlantic treaty, the United States would go to war if any one of the signatory nations is attacked. "To the Danish Government," he said, "there is no doubt that the United States will consider herself pledged to assist an attacked nation with all her force."

"If armed force is necessary to reestablish security, it is evident that the member countries possessing such force are obliged to use it. That means that if an armed attack occurred on one of the member countries, it could have only one answer—the United States would go to war."

Do you agree with that statement of Mr. Rasmussen?

INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 5

Secretary ACHESON. I said this morning, Senator, that under article 5, if there is an armed attack, then all the signatories of this treaty state that they will regard an armed attack on one as an attack on all, and forthwith they will, jointly and severally, take the action which each one of them deems necessary to restore peace and security in the North Atlantic area.

Now if there is an all-out armed attack, where the only action which this country believes can possibly restore peace and security in the North Atlantic area is the use of armed force, then this Nation is obligated to do that, but it has the decision in its own hands.

The objective which it is pledged to follow is to take whatever action it deems necessary to restore peace and security. Now if we in our honest judgment believe that action less than the use of armed force will restore peace and security, then we may do that. If in our honest judgment we believe that force is the only thing which can restore peace, then our obligation is to do that.

Senator DONNELL. If I may give you an illustration, Mr. Secretary: If Norway were to be attacked, 6 months after this treaty were ratified, by a force of 500,000 Russians, this pact would constitute, in your opinion, would it not, an absolute engagement on the part of this country to go to war?

Secretary ACHESON. My judgment would be that the only way to restore peace and security would be by the use of armed force. You might differ with me on that.

Senator DONNELL. I say, to restate my question: Your judgment is that in the hypothetical case to which I have called your attention, this treaty constitutes an absolute obligation on the part of the United States Government to go to war, does it not?

Secretary ACHESON. It imposes an obligation that if those in charge of the constitutional procedures of the United States believe, as I would believe in such a circumstance, that force would be the only answer to that, then that is the obligation. If those in charge of our constitutional procedures do not believe that, then they use their best judgment.

OBLIGATIONS UNDER ARTICLE 5

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, this article 5 contains an agreement that—

An armed attack against any one or more of the signatories of Europe or North America—

I take it that means the extended continent of Europe and North America as defined in article 6—any armed attack shall be considered an attack against them all.

There is an absolute obligation, is there not, a little further in article 5, that—each of the signatories will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

That is the obligation, is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. That is the obligation of article 5, yes.

Senator DONNELL. I take it, Mr. Secretary, that you do not at all construe that language, "such action as it deems necessary," to give any country the right to use a dishonest determination, or an unreasonable interpretation of that language?

Secretary ACHESON. No honorable country would do that.

Senator DONNELL. What you mean there, as I understand you very frankly stated in the white paper and also in your radio speech on this subject, you said:

Article 5 of the pact comprises a solemn obligation that each party will exercise honest and genuine judgment in determining what is necessary for the determination of peace when another party has been attacked.

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. So that article 5, under the suppositious case that I presented to you, with 500,000 troops marching into Norway, we will say, from Russia, woud unquestionably, in your opinion, impose an obligation on the part of this country forthwith to assist Norway by taking the action of going to war. That is correct, is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. That is the obligation which in my judgement would follow from the facts that you have stated. It is up to those who control the constitutional procedure to reach their own judgment. If they agreed with me, then they would feel that they were bound to do that. If they did not agree with me, they would not feel so bound.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. There is no condition in this treaty which says anything more than this, is there, Mr. Secretary: this treaty shall be ratified and its provisions carried out by the parties in accordance with their constitutional processes? There is nothing in the treaty which says that this obligation, individually to take such action, to assist the parties by taking such action as it deems necessary, is conditioned on the judgment of Congress. There is nothing in this treaty to that effect, is there?

Secretary ACHESON. The words which you just read, so far as the declaration of war is concerned, obviously mean that Congress is the body in charge of that constitutional procedure.

Senator DONNELL. Obviously, of course, we would agree, would we not, Mr. Secretary, that Congress is the only body that can declare war? That is correct, is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. If the United States were to be attacked at the port of New York by 500,000 troops or by atom bombs or whatever it might be, you would have no doubt of the right of the President, before the Congress took any action at all, to defend this country against that attack?

Secretary ACHESON. I would have no doubt.

Senator DONNELL. In this article 5, each of the parties agree that an armed attack against any one or more of them shall be considered an attack against them all. That is correct; is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. That is true.

Senator DONNELL. So that if the President would have the right to defend this country against an attack on New York, without action by Congress, this would obligate him, would it not, and our country, immediately to take action even though Congress did not go through with the formal declaration of war?

Secretary ACHESON. Article 5, Senator, does not enlarge, nor does it decrease, nor does it change in any way, the relative constitutional position of the President and the Congress.

Senator DONNELL. In other words, the President would have the entire right to send troops to safeguard this country against an attack on New York without any action by Congress; that is correct, is it not?

Secretary ACHESON. He would have whatever right the Constitution gives him.

Senator DONNELL. He does have that right, does he not, in your opinion as a lawyer?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not want to go into a discussion as to the relative position of the Commander in Chief.

Senator DONNELL. If you do not want to go into that subject we will not trespass on your desire.

COMMENTS ON THE ATLANTIC TREATY

Turning again to what other persons as to this document have construed to mean, do you agree with Mr. Bevin's observation as reported in the New York Times of March 20, 1949, as follows:

In London British Foreign Secretary Bevin told the House of Commons: "This is the first time that the United States has ever felt able to contemplate entering into commitments in peacetime for joint defense of Europe, and it is a most famous historical undertaking."

Do you agree with that statement?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir; I think that is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Do you agree with this statement in the New York Times of March 20:

In Paris Foreign Minister Schuman said: "Today we obtain what we sought between two wars. * * * The United States * * * offers us both immediate military aid in the organization of our defense and a guarantee of assistance in case of conflict."

Do you agree with that statement?

Secretary ACHESON. Within the terms of article 5. We have been all over article 5.

Senator DONNELL. We have gone over that?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes; I do not want to use the loose word "guarantee." I have explained exactly what is involved in article 5.

Senator DONNELL. I take it this morning with your testimony you went into that question, did you not?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes; I have just been into it also with you.

Senator DONNELL. And you did it this morning, too?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Did you do it any further this morning than you did this afternoon? Did you bring out any other points?

Secretary ACHESON. I do not recall. I had quite a long statement on that, and I think I was asked some questions on it.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, I would like to read this observation, if I may, from Senator Vandenberg in his speech to the mayors, delivered in March of this year, reading as follows: "The Neutrality Act of 1939 told Hitler that the United States would keep out of any such conflict, would keep our vessels out of belligerent ports, would refuse credits to warring nations. The North Atlantic Pact, wholly to the contrary, will tell any aggressor in 1949 that from the very moment that he launches his conquest in this area he will face whatever united opposition, including that of the United States, is necessary to beat him to his knees. I assert that this is the greatest war deterrent ever devised. No itching conqueror would care to face such odds."

Do you care to state whether you agree with the statement so made by Senator Vandenberg?

Secretary ACHESON. I think that is correct. And that is carried out in the Senate Resolution 239.

The whole purpose, as you know, Senator Donnell, as expressed in Senate Resolution 239, was to make clear in advance what the attitude of the United States would be.

Senator DONNELL. And you regard the treaty, as I gather, from your letter to the President, as having been carried out pursuant to the wishes as shown in Senate Resolution 239?

Secretary ACHESON. That has been our constant guide.

PROCEDURE UNDER ARTICLE 5

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, I would like to ask you this question: Both in your radio speech—in your committee paper and again in your letter to the President, of April 7, you indicate this view: That this provision, "as it deems necessary" is one which means, in substance, the exercise of honest and genuine judgment. That is correct, is it not?

Senator DONNELL. Not some arbitrary or fictitious judgment.

Secretary ACHESON. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. I ask you to state, please, who is it, in the case of an attack being made against one or more of the signatories, the President or the Congress, that in your judgment has the right to exercise that honest judgment to which you refer in these various documents?

Secretary ACHESON. Both the Congress and the President have their constitutional responsibilities, and each one in carrying out its responsibility would exercise that judgment.

Senator DONNELL. Would you care to indicate in the suppositious case which I have given you, of the 500,000 troops being marched in by Russia into Norway, whether or not the President would have the constitutional right to put this country into a state of war without the actual formal declaration of war by Congress?

Secretary ACHESON. I would prefer not to go into cases of that sort. I should think if you take one which is fairly clear—I am not the Attorney General and I do not express legal views on this matter—but if you will take the case of an attack upon our own forces, suppose they were attacked, then obviously it is the responsibility of the Commander in Chief at once to take steps for the safety of the forces. And obviously that would be his initial responsibility, and the Congress would then come in later to see whether further steps were necessary to protect the forces.

Senator DONNELL. And of course, as article 5 indicates, and you have indicated yourself, the parties agree that an armed attack against any one or more of them, shall be considered an attack against them all; is that correct?

MUTUAL AID AND SELF-HELP UNDER THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, referring to article 3 of the treaty, under which it is provided—that in order more effectively to achieve the objectives of the treaty the parties, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack—effective to do what? What does the word "effective" mean?

Secretary ACHESON. That expression, as you know, Senator Donnell, has a history. It first appears in Senate Resolution 239. It is in paragraph 3. And there the view of the Senate was that it should advise the President to follow several courses.

Paragraph 3 was:

Association of the United States, by constitutional process, with such regional and other collective arrangements as are based on continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, and as affect its national security.

That language was adopted in the treaty from the Senate resolution.

Senator DONNELL. Might I interrupt to ask you please, if you know whether or not that language was placed in Senate Resolution 239 by representatives of the State Department?

Secretary ACHESON. I have no knowledge of that.

Senator DONNELL. Pardon me for the interruption. Go ahead, please.

Secretary ACHESON. In its report the Senate committee says:

United States association with arrangements for collective defense must supplement rather than replace the efforts of the other participants on their own behalf. Such arrangements must be based upon continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid. This means, in practice, that the participants must be prepared fully to carry out their obligations under the charter, resolutely to defend their liberties against attack from any source, and efficiently to develop their maximum defense potential by coordination of their military forces and resources.

Effective, I suppose, means competent, not ineffectual efforts, but effective efforts.

Senator DONNELL. Does it contain within it the idea of sufficiency? That is to say, by means of continuous and sufficient self-help as to accomplish the maintenance and development of individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack?

Secretary ACHESON. No. It cannot mean that, because probably the provision of "sufficient forces" at the present time is impossible for everybody. Otherwise if you were trying to get sufficient forces you would have to maintain military establishments which would be quite impossible both for Europe and for us.

THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you whether or not, on April 5, 1949, there was made a reply by the Government of the United States to a certain memorandum from the Brussels Treaty powers, which memorandum inquires whether the United States will provide military assistance in the form of military equipment and financial aid to the Brussels Treaty powers?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes; there was.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you, Mr. Secretary, whether the following few sentences, two, I think it is, constitute paragraph 2 of that reply:

The executive branch of the United States Government is prepared to recommend to the United States Congress that the United States provide military assistance to countries signatory to the Brussels treaty, in order to assist them to meet the material requirements of their defense program. Such assistance will be extended in recognition of the principle of self-help and mutual aid contained in the Atlantic Pact under which pact members will extend to each other such reciprocal assistance as each country can reasonably be expected to contribute, consistent with its geographical resources and in the form in which each can most effectively furnish such assistance.

Is that correct?

Secretary ACHESON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. That was in your answer?

Secretary ACHESON. That was contained in our reply.

Senator DONNELL, may I insert something at this point?

Senator DONNELL. Certainly.

COMMITMENT TO SEND MILITARY AID UNDER THE TREATY

Secretary ACHESON. There was a suggestion, in one of the long quotations that you read to me before, that there may have been some commitment or other on the part of the executive branch of the government to these other governments in regard to military assistance. Now, there is absolutely no commitment of any sort except the commitment which you have read, and that is that the executive branch would recommend to the Congress a military assistance program of the kind you have described. That is being done.

There was no commitment by me or anybody on behalf of the executive branch that anything would be done beyond recommending to the Congress, recommending this program.

Senator DONNELL. I do not want to repeat this if you prefer not to answer. I am not certain whether you indicated a desire not to answer this. You have only to indicate your desire one way or the other and I will be guided accordingly.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

In the suppositious case of the 500,000 troops from Russia converging 6 weeks after this treaty shall have been ratified, on to Norway, are you willing to say whether or not, in your opinion, the President would have the constitutional power to send a large number of American troops instantly to repel that advance, without any action by Congress whatsoever?

If you prefer not to answer that question, that is all right.

Secretary ACHESON. I am quite clear that I prefer not to answer it, and I want to make it perfectly clear why I do not. It is not for the purpose of engaging in any fencing match with you. We are here dealing with one of the questions of the highest prerogatives in Government, the constitutional powers of the President and the constitutional powers of the Congress of the United States.

It is not my function, not being the chief legal officer of the Government, to make any statement whatever which might either prejudice powers of the President or undertake to prejudice powers of the Congress.

AREA COVERED BY THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Very well. I shall not pursue that inquiry further. This matter I should like to ask about as a matter of information. It may have no bearing whatsoever on the merits of it. I would like to know why it is that this document is called the "North Atlantic Treaty." What is the reason for that?

Secretary ACHESON. It has to do with the defense of the North Atlantic area. Obviously that does not mean that you are defending water. This is not a treaty that has to do with water and not with land. It has to do with that area of the world which is concerned in the North Atlantic, and that means those countries which border on it or border on countries which border on it.

And it has to do with that area of western Europe which, with the United States and Canada, constitutes the whole North Atlantic defense area.

TREATY NOT A REGIONAL ARRANGEMENT

Senator DONNELL. Was the thought in the minds of those who prepared the pact—originally, I should say, in their work upon it—that the justification under the United Nations Charter for such a pact would at least in part lie in that portion of the United Nations Charter which refers to regional arrangements?

Secretary ACHESON. No. It lies in article 51.

Senator ACHESON. And not 52?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. So the appellation of "North Atlantic Treaty" did not in any sense indicate a desire on the part of those who framed the pact to bring the pact under the aegis, so to speak, of the regional arrangement contemplated by the United Nations Charter?

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct. We were concerned with an area. This was not a universal commitment, widespread commitment all around the world. It had to do with a particular area, and an area of great importance to the United States.

Senator DONNELL. And as previously indicated, the governments which entered into these negotiations which culminated in the treaty, originally included only those either fronting on the North Atlantic—on the Atlantic Ocean, or close at hand, as, for illustration, Belgium, Luxemburg, et al., and did not include a country as far removed from the Atlantic as Italy. Am I correct in that?

Secretary ACHESON. The point is not whether it is removed from the Atlantic. That is what I was trying to get at a moment ago. You are not defending some water here. You are talking about a defense area. And Italy is very closely connected with the defense of that western European area, which in turn is what we call the North Atlantic area.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, did the committee desire to continue at this time in view of the vote call that has come in?

The CHAIRMAN. We do not pay any attention to votes, but I will consult the committee. What is your desire, to recess or go on?

Senator DONNELL. I will be very brief. It will take me only a few more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Let us go on.

Senator DONNELL. Had you finished your answer to that?

COMPATIBILITY OF ATLANTIC TREATY WITH ANGLO-RUSSIAN AND FRANCO-RUSSIAN TREATIES

Senator DONNELL. You referred to the provision in the treaty which is a warning, I think, or at least a statement, by the parties that—

Each party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any of the parties and a third state is in conflict with this treaty and undertakes not to enter into any international engagements which conflict with the treaty.

You commented on that earlier this afternoon.

Senator DONNELL. I want to ask you whether or not you yourself have examined the treaties placed before the Senate some weeks ago by either Senator Watkins or Senator O'Mahoney, or both of them, between France on the one hand and Russia on the other, and between Great Britain on the one hand and Russian on the other, which contain certain obligations of the contracting parties, whether you examined them yourself with a view to determining whether France and Great Britain, in a representation that there is no international engagement now in force and in conflict with this treaty, correctly construe the obligations under this treaty.

Secretary ACHESON. I have examined them very closely. I want to make one thing absolutely clear to you, and that is that the declaration in this treaty, by each of the signatories, that they have no treaty which is in conflict with the North Atlantic Treaty, is their responsibility, and they stand upon that, and we stand upon that.

I do not want to take the position for a moment that the Secretary of State of the United States, on behalf of other countries, undertakes to go into their treaties or express any views about them. We are not called upon by the treaty to do that. The nations make that declaration themselves. We have the plain language of the treaties before us. And that is where the matter rests.

Now, any person reading it I think can come to his own conclusion, and I think it is perfectly clear what that conclusion is. But I am not going to, as an officer of the United States, say in respect of any of these countries what their treaties mean or whether their declarations are anything other than what they should be, a statement of complete and absolute truth.

TERMINATION OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Is there any provision in the treaty by which the treaty may be terminated in less than 20 years?

Secretary ACHESON. It may be terminated by unanimous consent at any time. But there is a provision for review at the end of 10 years.

Senator DONNELL. That provision for review does not, however, contain any provision for the termination of the treaty at the end of 10 years.

Secretary ACHESON. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Senator DONNELL. Certainly. Anything, as you said earlier this afternoon, can be done by unanimous consent.

Secretary ACHESON. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. I am not asking whether there is anything in the treaty which provides in any way for the termination of the treaty earlier than at the expiration of 20 years.

Secretary ACHESON. Not except as I have said.

Senator DONNELL. That is not an exemption. There is no provision for it, is there, for a termination earlier than 20 years?

Secretary ACHESON. There are no words in the treaty which provide for its termination earlier than 20 years, as I stated to you. There is a provision that it should be reviewed at the end of 10 years, and it of course follows, as you yourself have said, that if that review leads to the unanimous conclusion that it should be terminated, modified or changed, that may be done.

Senator DONNELL. That may be done in 6 months from now equally.

Secretary ACHESON. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. That does not depend on a provision in the treaty?

Secretary ACHESON. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Did not the United States take the view in its negotiations that the treaty should run for 10 years and not 20?

Secretary ACHESON. I am not aware of that. I do not think that is true at all.

Senator DONNELL. That was reported in the press. Perhaps it may be incorrect.

Secretary ACHESON. That is unfounded.

Senator DONNELL. It was reported in the press that the European nations desired a 50-year period and this country desired 10, and ultimately 20 years was agreed upon.

Secretary ACHESON. The latter statement is true. The European nations did desire 50 years. The earlier statement is not correct, that we took the position of 10 years.

Senator DONNELL. I thank you very much, Mr. Secretary, and Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection from the committee we will recess at this time until 10:30 tomorrow morning. Senator Austin will be the witness tomorrow. We will be glad to hear him.

(Thereupon, at 5:05 p. m., the committee recessed, to reconvene at 10:30 a. m. Thursday, April 28, 1949.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment, on April 27, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), George, Thomas of Utah, Tydings, Pepper, McMahon, Vandenberg, Wiley, Smith of New Jersey, Hickenlooper, and Lodge.

Also present: Senators Tobey, Donnell, Flanders, Watkins, Gillette.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

This is a meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate. We are holding hearings on the North Atlantic Pact. We are honored this morning to have former Senator Warren Austin, now Chief Representative of the United States at the United Nations, and a member of the Security Council, representing the United States. Is that correct the way I have stated it?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes; it is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Austin, we are very pleased to have you here, and we are prepared to hear any statement you desire to make with reference to the North Atlantic Pact and related matters.

STATEMENT OF HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN, CHIEF OF THE UNITED STATES MISSION TO THE UNITED NATIONS

Ambassador AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will you let me say something personal before I start talking about the North Atlantic treaty?

This is a very emotional experience for me, to be invited by this very great committee, on which I was serving when I resigned from the Senate about 3 years ago. I have not been back here since, and now to be asked to come and talk with you about so important and grave a matter as the North Atlantic treaty is a great honor and a great pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. It is mutual. We esteem it an honor to have you here and a pleasure to have you here. We remember quite vividly your valuable services on this committee and your outstanding services in the Senate of the United States. We are glad to have your advice and counsel in view of your broad activities in connection with the United Nations and foreign relations generally.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Thank you, sir.

Now may I read a prepared statement?

The CHAIRMAN. You may; and at the end of the prepared statement you will have to submit to questions, as you know.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I am a little bit intrigued by the novel situation of being on this end of the questions. However, I will try to respond to them with the utmost frankness and without any reservations whatever.

EFFECT OF THE TREATY ON THE UNITED NATIONS

From the point of view of the United States Mission to the United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty, by its express terms and by its probable effect would, if properly executed, promote United Nations effort to maintain peace generally, increase its ability to remove causes of war, bring the world nearer to its goal of substituting pacific settlements for the ancient practice of fighting out controversies among nations, and aid in the promotion of social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom. This is one of its objects.

It would be a shield under the protection of which such purposes and policies of the United Nations could be more rapidly achieved in the North Atlantic area than if the fear of aggression should continue to deplete the energies and confidence of peoples. This is the other object.

These objectives are complementary.

HOPES FOR UNITED NATIONS SUCCESS

Here in this committee, which only 4 years ago considered carefully the United Nations Charter, I hardly need recall the hopes we held then that there would continue to be a large measure of cooperation among the great powers. We did not expect the drastic deterioration in relations between east and west which has occurred. We certainly did not conceive that the Soviet Union would so brazenly violate the solemn Charter pledge to refrain from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of other states. None of us imagined the adoption of a deliberate and calculated policy of obstruction that has prevented the conclusion of peace treaties and impaired the work of the United Nations.

RUSSIA AND THE UNITED NATIONS

It was hard to believe what we were seeing. While most of the world was seeking to build a system of collective security in the United Nations, the Soviet Union sought security through the discredited policy of territorial aggrandizement. This feudalistic concept of security threw its black mantle over country after country in eastern Europe. Only decisive action by the United Nations, supported effectively by the United States, prevented Iran, Greece, and Korea from being drawn into the shadows.

COUNTERMEASURES BY DEMOCRATIC COUNTRIES

As a result of the growing opposition of the non-Communist world, the balance is swinging toward the forces favoring peaceful progress. This committee can be gratified at the part it has played in influencing that trend. Impetus was given it, I believe, when we decided to help Greece and Turkey. It attained historic proportions when we joined in the European recovery program. It is now being advanced by our adherence to the North Atlantic Treaty. Our devoted support of the United Nations has immeasurably strengthened that trend.

INCREASING UNITY OF NON-SOVIET WORLD

The increasing unity of the non-Soviet world is being demonstrated in the United Nations. Two years ago there was a widespread tendency to regard major differences simply as a conflict of interest between the United States and the Soviet Union. As a result, the voting was mixed and marked by a large number of abstentions. The actions and attitudes of the Soviet Union, inside and outside the United Nations, have altered that situation. Today, most major issues are recognized as a conflict between the Soviet Union and the rest of the world. Abstentions are fewer; the majorities are larger, and the minority is usually the six voices and votes controlled by the Soviet Union. These majorities run between 40 and 50; 43 to 6, with four abstentions, is an example which we frequently have. We are now witnessing in the United Nations the unity that is progressively making aggression and obstruction less attractive and less feasible; that is, the unity of those countries outside of the Soviet group. They are growing more and more to act like one world. I don't mean to say that they always vote in a bloc. There is a variation which is represented by perhaps the factor of five or six votes among these countries that are outside the iron curtain.

It is difficult for the meaning of facts like these to penetrate the isolation which the ruling class of the Soviet Union has created for itself behind the walls of the Kremlin. But slowly it penetrates even there. The Soviet rulers have seen that we cannot be driven out of Berlin, and they are learning that the European recovery program cannot be defeated; that free nations will no longer permit themselves to be submerged one by one; that the Charter of the United Nations means what it says, and that the overwhelming majority of the nations are determined to uphold and defend it. While this process continues, we hopefully keep open the door to cooperation. Time after time we reiterate the invitation to this group to join with us. You realize that in some of our organs they will not even sit at the table with us.

ECONOMIC RECOVERY AND THE TREATY

Now, I would like to speak of economic recovery and the treaty. I have divided this paper up into chapters, because it is more convenient for me to think this matter out that way from the point of view of the United States Mission to the United Nations. And that is the characteristic of this testimony. I am trying to present the view of our mission to the United Nations.

The claim has been made that economic recovery should be our primary objective in the North Atlantic area and that the treaty may endanger that objective. The premise is correct, but the conclusion is not. Economic recovery is the surest defense against the spread of totalitarian tyranny, but that recovery requires security and confidence.

The treaty would not have come into existence if there had not been a real need for it. The last two World Wars raged across the lands of the European signatories of this treaty. We share with them the desire to remove the miscalculations which could invite a similar tragedy.

This community—that is to say the North Atlantic community—with its bridgeheads on both sides of the Atlantic, is engaged in a great cooperative effort to attain economic recovery and the blessings of political stability and social progress. The United States is assisting on a very large scale because we know that a healthy Europe is a strong force for peace, a vital element in a strong United Nations and a friendly partner with the United States in its efforts to establish greater security for all.

SECURITY AND RECOVERY

The nations of the North Atlantic area have learned that they must stand together and make plain in advance that they will do so. I believe that they knew it as far back as February 1946, just after the Organization had been set up in London, for I find in one of the speeches of the Honorable James Byrnes, who was then Secretary of State, remarks which plainly showed that. I would read parts of it if you ask me to, but otherwise I will not take your time. In that speech, Secretary Byrnes forecast this situation, and he makes perfectly plain that, if we are going to have greater security for all, we must ourselves be strong and we must be ready to contribute our part with the neighbors in the North Atlantic area to prevent or to suppress these attacks from outside upon this area.

The preservation of the freedom and independence of any one of them is of vital concern to all of them. An armed attack upon one is considered an armed attack on all. The treaty is intended to remove the feeling of insecurity which hinders economic recovery in Europe by establishing a needed preponderance of moral and material power for peace. I say "preponderance"; I would like to emphasize it.

SOVIET ATTACK ON THE ATLANTIC TREATY

Now I would like to talk with you just a moment about the Soviet attack on the North Atlantic Treaty in the General Assembly. It does throw light upon what the treaty means to them.

As we expected, the Soviet Union has attacked the North Atlantic Treaty in the General Assembly. The nature of that attack exposed the awareness of the Soviet group to the intimate relationship between the treaty and the United Nations.

THE SECURITY COUNCIL VETO AND THE TREATY

Every member of the Soviet group spoke against the treaty in attempting to defeat a resolution aimed at correcting abuse of the special privilege of the so-called veto in the Security Council. The Soviet Union, which has used the veto 30 times—some of those times in cases to which the founders of the United Nations did not intend the veto to apply, for they said so in establishing the Charter—realized that the treaty might endanger objectives which it can use the veto to protect. Consequently, it introduced discussion of the North Atlantic Treaty as germane to the then pending question, which was the problem of voting in the Security Council. No member state other than the Soviet bloc criticized the treaty, but every one of these six argued that the treaty violated the Charter.

The Soviet delegate claimed it violated the Charter because it organized a bloc outside the United Nations. He said this bloc was being organized "because the approval of such actions is impossible in the Security Council, where the concurrence of all the great powers is required to adopt decisions on all important questions involved in the maintenance of peace." Thus he revealed the bearing that this treaty had in his estimation on the privilege he has exercised 30 times; that of the veto.

If, indeed, the North Atlantic grouping should render possible the security of members which is now impossible because of the veto, then the treaty ought to be put into effect promptly.

INCLUSION OF PORTUGAL AND ITALY

Mr. Gromyko claimed further that the treaty violates the Charter because it contains among its signatories two states not members of the United Nations—Italy and Portugal. References to article 51, he said, were—and I am quoting his words—"groundless" because "only an armed attack against a member of the Organization gives the right to take action in self-defense."

Our answer is this: By international law, every state has the inherent right of self-defense. The Charter does not exclude nonmember states from the inherent right referred to in article 51.

The application of article 51 to existing arrangements such as the Arab League and the Act of Chapultepec was precisely noted. At the May 23, 1945, meeting of committee III/4 the delegate of Egypt observed that "the principle involved in the new text should certainly extend to the League of Arab States." The text of the league agreement, signed at Cairo March 22, 1945, was before the committee, having been made an official committee III/4 document as of May 4, 1945. Two of the signatories of the pact of the Arab League, Transjordan and Yemen, were not represented at the San Francisco Conference. To be sure, years afterward Yemen was admitted to the United Nations, but Transjordan, though having applied, has not yet been admitted to the United Nations.

I refer this committee to a document already in its files. This document is so important that I shall refer to it again later. It is entitled "Participation in the North Atlantic Treaty of States Not Members of the United Nations." This document is so important that it seems to me to be worthy of being printed as a Senate document. It has been a very useful document in making a careful study of the origin of article 51.

And now I say that on the basis of reason, on the basis of current interpretation by the founders, and on the basis of experience, it is clear that Mr. Gromyko's claim that the North Atlantic Treaty violates the Charter because of the memberships of Italy and Portugal is without any foundation whatever. In a word, the Charter recognizes the inherent right, growing out of international law, not out of the Charter, of Italy and Portugal to join with member states for collective self-defense. This document to which I refer elaborates this reasoning. I shall not take your time to read all of that.

And now I come to another chapter: Article 51 and Regional Arrangements.

REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS AND THE TREATY

Mr. Gromyko has made another charge.

The North Atlantic Pact—

he said—

cannot under any circumstances be called a regional arrangement because it comprises states located in two different continents—America and Europe. Thus these states are united not according to the regional principle.

What we say about it in the United States mission to the United Nations is this:

This claim that the treaty is in conflict with the Charter because it does not create an arrangement according to the regional principle is without probity. First, it does create an arrangement according to the regional principle. History shows that the Atlantic Ocean is a bridge linking America and Europe. Second, even if the treaty did not do so, it creates a group for collective defense under article 51 of the Charter.

It is not necessary to define the organization of the North Atlantic community as exclusively a regional arrangement, or as exclusively a group for collective self-defense, since activities under both article 51 and chapter VIII are comprehended in the treaty. It is our opinion that the provisions of the Charter relating to each such activity—that is, when applied and if applied, if undertaken—will apply to that activity. But you do not have to departmentalize the treaty. It is significant that no definition of regional arrangements, or regional organization, was contained in the Charter, or the Senate Resolution 239, or the North Atlantic Treaty. Each of these contemplates both regional action and collective self-defense.

HISTORY OF ARTICLE 51 OF UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

Light is thrown on the relationship between the North Atlantic Treaty and the Charter of the United Nations by reviewing the origin and then current interpretation of article 51. At the San Francisco meeting, representatives of states of the Western Hemisphere, who had participated in establishing the Act of Chapultepec, actively opposed being subordinated completely to the United Nations. They had developed a system of hemispheric self-defense based on the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense. The question arose as to how the legitimate operation of such a regional system was to be fitted into a general global system.

It was obvious that autonomy of the Western Hemisphere system would be in conflict with the primacy of the universal system which the Charter sought to establish and which all American States recognized. It was necessary to reconcile the operation of both systems. This was done by inserting article 51, which was not in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, providing that nothing in the present Charter—what sweeping terms: nothing in the present Charter!—shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

This very comprehensive language overrides any other part of the Charter that might stand in the way of this special right of self-defense until the Security Council has acted effectively. In any case whatever, it is my opinion that article 51 is not concerned with "enforcement action"; it is concerned with self-defense.

COLLECTIVE SELF-DEFENSE AND REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

Chapter VIII, which prohibits taking enforcement action without the authorization of the Security Council, does not apply to collective action for self-defense under article 51. The objection that the North Atlantic Treaty does not create a regional arrangement contemplated by articles 52 and 53 does not hit the treaty. It does not apply to the treaty. This arises from the fact that the authority recognized in article 51 is not limited to regional arrangements. This point was clearly established in the hearings conducted by this committee when it was considering ratification of the Charter. I am sure all who were sitting then will remember. There is an important exposition of the meaning of article 51 on page 304 of the published testimony. This exposition resulted from an exchange between Mr. Pasvolsky of the State Department and Senator Vandenberg. Senator Vandenberg's views with respect to article 51 are of utmost significance because he was a member of the subcommittee dealing with this question and the principal negotiator in the formulation of the text of article 51.

FORESHADOWING OF ATLANTIC PACT DURING THE DRAFTING OF ARTICLE 51 OF THE CHARTER

In that exchange it is established that the phrase "collective self-defense" contained in article 51 not only relates to regional but also to any group action that may be taken for purposes of collective self-defense. This view is corroborated in other statements made before this committee at that time. I would cite to you particularly the statement made by Mr. Stettinius, which you will find at page 210, and that by Mr. Dulles, at page 650. To the same effect are statements by representatives of France, Australia, Egypt, and the United Kingdom in 1945. See the document in this committee's files to which I have already referred, entitled "Participation in the North Atlantic Treaty of States Not Members of the United Nations."

There is one brief passage here from Paul Boncour which I want to read. I hope you will pardon me for doing this. I know you can read just as well as I can, but it fits the occasion very well, as I see it. After he had paid Senator Vandenberg a great compliment he went on to give the characterization of what article 51 would do for the future, showing that article 51 contemplated entrance into such a treaty as the North Atlantic Treaty. I would not speak of this if I had not met and encountered the claim that the Charter of the United Nations did not contemplate this treaty. I say it did.

Senator PEPPER. When and where was that speech made, Mr. Ambassador?

Ambassador AUSTIN. In Committee III on June 13, 1945.

Senator PEPPER. That was at San Francisco?

Ambassador AUSTIN. During the writing of article 51. They had just completed it and he burst into song. I am not reading the whole of it. He said:

I would more particularly like to express my gratitude to Senator Vandenberg and the delegation of the United States who have helped so much in the drafting of the text now submitted and in securing its acceptance. The text makes a clear distinction between the prevention and repression of aggression.

After skipping a lot of it I come to this. He had, in between, described the devastation that France had suffered in the war. He said:

This is why we have sought and will continue to seek—that has reference to the future—through pacts of mutual assistance and regional arrangements, fully in conformity, of course, with the governing principles of the Charter, the means of taking action on the very day, the very hour, or minute, when brutal aggression is committed, aggression that can be made all the more deadly by the speed of technical devices.

Nobody can meet that. That, in my opinion, is the end of the claim that this pact, this treaty, was not contemplated by the Charter or by article 51.

There are other references in there by other distinguished statesmen from around the world to the same effect.

Senator VANDENBERG. And may I interrupt you, Senator? They are uniformly all in the same tenor, without a single dissenting voice.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Thank you, sir. I believe that is correct.

REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS AND THE TREATY

The principal emphasis in the treaty is upon its character as a group of nations who are binding themselves together to take collective action in self-defense. Article 51 contains ample authority for the right of any group of nations, regional or otherwise, members of the United Nations or otherwise, to bind themselves to take collective action for self-defense against an armed attack. In certain of its aspects, the treaty is also a regional arrangement. Don't think that I am arguing that this treaty undertakes to set out in full the kind of regional arrangement that is described in chapter VIII. I am not. The point I am making is that if in the operation of this treaty the signatories go into the exercise of duties that fall within that chapter, then that chapter applies. But in the main what I am saying is that this is not that kind of an organization. This is an organization for collective self-defense against an armed attack. That is another limitation. And I say, in certain of its aspects the treaty is also a regional arrangement, and insofar as it partakes of those characteristics, chapter VIII of the Charter provides full authority for its provisions. Thus, those aspects of the treaty which are not authorized by chapter VIII are covered by article 51, and vice versa.

Now I come to another topic, Regional Versus Universal Arrangements. We have been asked the question, "Why don't you shoot for something larger?"

REGIONAL VERSUS UNIVERSAL ARRANGEMENTS

The question may be asked: Is the conclusion of collective security pacts on a regional basis the best solution? Would it not be better to devise a universal pact to which all states might adhere? In the abstract such a universal pact might appear desirable. However, any binding collective defense pact to be effective depends on the individual and collective and effective self-help and mutual aid as envisaged under article 3 of the treaty. On its part the United States at the moment is making prodigious efforts through the European recovery program to enable the participating countries of Europe to stand on their own feet economically and so be both psychologically and economically able to resist internal and external pressures. Under the treaty it is contemplated that this self-help and mutual aid will be continued and augmented, in particular through the development of a coordinated defense program as envisaged in articles 3 and 9 of the treaty. The United States contribution to this over-all program requires a substantial outlay by the American people, a contribution which, it is hoped, will lead to a more stable world.

I do not mean by this to dismiss out of hand the idea of a generalized article 51 treaty. We should welcome all contributions of intelligent men of good will who are constantly searching for ways and means by which the great purposes of the United Nations may be advanced. But I doubt—and here is the milk in the coconut—that many member nations would be prepared to undertake substantial commitments going far beyond those contained in the Charter of the United Nations with respect to all other nations who were prepared to reciprocate.

Furthermore, assuming that a formula could be found which most of the United Nations could accept, would we not run a very serious risk of splitting the United Nations, and driving out of it nations who might consider the new arrangement directed against themselves? I feel myself that the course we have chosen is the more practical of the two alternatives. We should continue to examine, of course, sympathetically, all suggestions for strengthening the United Nations and the cause of peace.

Now I come to the New Power for Peace.

NEW POWER FOR PEACE

I have been asked whether the North Atlantic Treaty is not the resumption of the practice of setting up a power equilibrium; whether it would take the place of the United Nations; or whether it would reduce the opportunities of the United Nations for development through service. My answer is "No."

The ancient theory of balance of power lost its potential utility through the voluntary association of states, on the basis of sovereign equality and universality. The old veteran, balance of power, was given a blue discharge when the United Nations was formed. The undertaking of the peoples of the United Nations to combine their efforts through the international organization to maintain international peace and security, and to that end, to take effective collective measures, introduced formally the element of preponderance of power for peace. And out went old man balance of power.

Effective collective measures are intended to be dealt with through the Security Council, through regional arrangements, and through groups for collective self-defense. Members of the United Nations have joined to put an end to war. They have bound themselves not to use force except in the defense of law as embodied in the purposes and principles of the Charter. Treaties, combining within the framework of the Charter nations that sincerely adhere to and practice the great principles of the United Nations, increase that unaggressive and decisive preponderance of power introduced by the Charter. Among such treaties, we recognize the Brussels Pact, the Inter-American Agreement, and the Atlantic Treaty as activities giving power, both moral and material, to those principles. The Charter is a check and a guide for the organizations resulting from such treaties. The treaties are a stimulant to the influence and activities of the United Nations.

In this swiftly shrinking world, peace will be secured and maintained only if we pursue the goal of collective security that is set up in the Charter. I support the North Atlantic Treaty because I believe it is a practical, although geographically limited, method of supporting that universal objective.

Like all treaties, the words of the North Atlantic Treaty will take on meaning in the light of the policies and actions that the signatories follow in implementing it. That is why I opened my statement by emphasizing that the Treaty must be properly executed. I believe it will be so executed. The President and the Secretary of State have expressed the determination that the Treaty shall support and not be a substitute for the United Nations. My old friends, I want to say to you that I have already defended the Treaty against the attacks of the Soviet group, some of which I have mentioned here. I am determined, as are the President and the Secretary of State, that the North Atlantic Treaty shall not take the place of or weaken the United Nations, but that it will increase the opportunities of the United Nations to develop through service.

If the North Atlantic Treaty is operated according to the letter and spirit both of the Charter and of the Treaty, it can lift the cause of peace above any level yet attained.

The CHAIRMAN. You are open to questions?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes.

INHERENT RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Austin, the matter of article 51 and the inherent right of nations to self-defense arises, does it not, independently of the Charter or any other arrangements that we might have? If it is inherent it is a natural right that each nation would have to resist aggression or attack.

Ambassador AUSTIN. The chairman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The purpose, or one of the purposes, of this Treaty is to not only recognize that principle in each individual state, but to recognize the power of the individual states to join a collective arrangement for the same purpose of defense inherently in each one, but joined together in an arrangement set forth in this Treaty.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is right, Senator.

GEOGRAPHIC SCOPE OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. With regard to the regional character, and the Soviet complaint that this was not confined to a particular region, is it not true that those forming the arrangement would probably have the right to define what the region is, and does not this treaty define particularly the region to which it is applicable?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes. The region is described here.

The CHAIRMAN. It is described accurately and definitely; is it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes; I consider it so. But I do not think that that is exclusive. I do not want my answer to be regarded that way. I think there is a possibility of that region being amplified upon unanimous agreement of the signatories, and that in making that agreement each signatory will, of course, have the right, and probably the duty, to give its consent or dissent according to its constitutional processes, so that if the question arose here in the United States whether a certain country should be added to those that are now signatories, I believe that that question would have to come to Congress.

There are two ways of looking at it. One would be whether this amounted to a protocol or additional provision of the treaty, or whether this amounted to authorizing legislation that would enable the Chief Executive to give the consent of the United States to that addition. In that case, of course, the extent of the area would be changed.

The CHAIRMAN. In that event would it not be open to very serious question that we could not change it without congressional approval, senatorial approval, because of the fact that it would in essence be a new arrangement?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is what prompted me to say what I did about it, yes. It is a serious question.

BASIS FOR A REGION

The CHAIRMAN. In the case of Portugal and Italy, you say the Soviets made some complaint about them. As a matter of fact, those nations are intimately associated by sea routes and their geographical position with the general plan of the treaty to make this area defensive; is that correct?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is true, but I think there are other factors in the consideration of what constitutes a region.

The CHAIRMAN. I am glad to hear it. You might point them out, if you will.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I think the customary life of the countries, their contact with each other in business, culture, and interchange of travel, those things which identify an area by the customs of the people, enter into this question of what is a region, and in such cases as ours here the ocean is no longer a barrier. And we find ourselves very close together on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean and on both sides of the Mediterranean.

PURPOSES OF THE CHARTER AND REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

The CHAIRMAN. It is clear, is it not, in the charter and particularly in the articles dealing with regional arrangements that they must be within the general purposes of the United Nations and that there is no conflict between permitting a regional arrangement of this character and the United Nations.

Ambassador AUSTIN. My answer is, "Yes." I think also, if you will permit me to add—I don't know whether I am heading right by offering additional statements—

The CHAIRMAN. That is what you are here for, not to hear me ask questions but for you to answer them.

Ambassador AUSTIN. You are very gracious. I have never been on this end of the questions before. I want to be perfectly respectful to the committee and not get outside of my position as a witness.

What I had in mind, prompted by your question, was that not only is that true by virtue of the terms of the Charter, but it is true by virtue of the terms of the treaty—the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. I wanted to make that clear in answer to the charge that the regional arrangements that we are entering into would be in conflict with the United Nations Charter. As I understand, Mr. Gromyko urged that in his comment before the General Assembly.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is true. Every one of those six countries in that group made that claim.

The CHAIRMAN. They have a unity of purpose and a unity of speech, have they not, pretty much? Never mind answering that.

OVERRIDING AUTHORITY OF UN

Article 51 of the Charter says—

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

That recognizes the overriding authority of the United Nations; does it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. It certainly does.

INCLUSION IN THE TREATY OF NON-UNITED NATIONS MEMBERS

The CHAIRMAN. Article 51 is restricted to an armed attack against a member of the United Nations. Has there been any comment or objection that this treaty spreads that and permits the participation by other nations not members of the United Nations?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is right. It was raised as an objection. It was asserted that the treaty was in conflict with the Charter because of that characteristic, that the treaty has in it two states that are not within those words.

The CHAIRMAN. You answered that, of course, successfully?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I answered that in my formal statement, and I pointed out that the answer to this is perfect, because you had exactly that situation in fact before you—and I mean you—and you and Senator Vandenberg were there on that work. You had exactly that situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg was a member of the subcommittee. I was on another committee. We had frequent meetings of the delegation.

Ambassador AUSTIN. You had two states that were not present at San Francisco, were not participating in the organization of the United Nations. It wasn't then known whether they would ever be members, yet they were recognized as coming within the scope of article 51.

The CHAIRMAN. You were a representative at Chapultepec; were you not, Senator Austin?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

DEVELOPMENT OF ARTICLE 51 OF THE CHARTER

The CHAIRMAN. In the meeting at the expiration of Chapultepec there was placed in the Dumbarton Oaks draft of the proposed United Nations a reference here, "Section (a), Purpose and Relationship," entitled "Arrangements for International Economic and Social Cooperation." But as I understand it, and I will not read it all, while Dumbarton Oaks recognized regional arrangements and so forth, it did not go into detail specifically regarding armed aggression and the inherent right of self-defense. Is that true?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. So it was developed and amplified at San Francisco in the treaty which established the United Nations and made applicable to situations like the present.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And the activity of Senator Vandenberg, who was on the subcommittee, had a great deal to do with it.

Ambassador AUSTIN. May I call your attention to page 13 of that document to which I called your attention twice before?

Senator GEORGE. Is that a United Nations publication?

Ambassador AUSTIN. No; it is not. It is a paper that is furnished by the Department of State, Participation in the North Atlantic Treaty of States Not Members of the United Nations, and a copy of it, I understand, is on file with you. I have had the good fortune to have had access to this, and at page 13 it states, regarding these defensive situations that were actually in existence and under contemplation when article 51 was devised—

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it be put in the record at this place. The statement surely has a place for the consideration of the Senate, and if it can be put in the record we will have it in the Senate document.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That will save me reading it.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I think that is an appropriate request. By way of explanation, the memorandum to which our able visitor refers was prepared for me at my request by the Department in the first instance. I doubt whether it has been given general circulation. I certainly think it should be, and I suggest, with the Senator from Utah, that it be inserted in the record at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it will be inserted in the record.

PARTICIPATION IN THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY OF STATES NOT MEMBERS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

INTRODUCTION

In considering the question whether members of the United Nations may, consistent with the United Nations Charter, enter into mutual defense pacts with nonmember states, it is obviously necessary to consider the relevant rules of international law, to examine the provisions of the Charter relating to individual and collective self-defense, and to read these provisions against the background of the whole Charter establishing a United Nations security system. Article 51, which preserves to member states the inherent right of individual and collective self-defense, is of primary importance, in view of its language and of its negotiating history at San Francisco.

The argument developed in the course of the present paper runs as follows: Article 51 of the Charter, in providing: "Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations," is not a grant of authority to member states enabling them to take measures of defense if attacked. The article states simply that, after the Charter has come into force, just as before, member states retain the right which all states have traditionally enjoyed under international law to defend themselves in the event of armed attack. Article 51 thus does not purport to limit the right of self-defense to member states only, and creates no obstacle to collective defense efforts by member states jointly with nonmembers in the event of armed attack.

It will perhaps be appropriate to begin with a consideration of the rules of international law.

I. THE RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE IN INTERNATIONAL LAW

Article 51 refers, by its language, only to states which are members of the United Nations. However, it is clear that the right of individual and collective self-defense preserved to member states by article 51 was not created by the Charter. The right existed in international law before the Charter, available to all states. Article 51 made clear that it continued, under the Charter, to be available to member states, subject to certain limitations. Naturally this right of self-defense remains available to nonmembers.

An eminent authority on international law and the United Nations has said concerning the right of self-defense:

"International law recognizes the right of a state to resort to force in self-defense. Where the use of force has this justification, the incidental or consequent infringement of the rights of another state is excused, although the other state may be legally privileged to resist. A forcible act of self-defense may amount to or may result in war, but it may frequently be a single incident of short duration, especially when the two states involved are of unequal strength. Self-defense has also been a commonly invoked political justification on moral grounds for resort to war.

"When, in 1928, states renounced war as an instrument of national policy and agreed that they would not seek to settle their disputes by other than peaceful means, the right of self-defense was expressly reserved. Thus the United States note of June 23, 1928, declared that the proposed treaty did not in any way restrict or impair the right of self-defense. 'That right is inherent in every sovereign state and is implicit in every treaty. Every nation is free at all times and regardless of treaty provisions to defend its territory from attack or invasion and it alone is competent to decide whether circumstances require recourse to war in self-defense.' Such a statement suggests that the right of self-defense by its very nature must escape legal regulation. In one sense this is true. Secretary of State Daniel Webster, in the course of discussions with the British Government concerning the celebrated affair of the Caroline, stated in 1842 that action in self-defense was justified only when the necessity for action is 'instant, overwhelming, and leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation.' This definition is obviously drawn from consideration of the right of self-defense in domestic law; the cases are rare, indeed, in which it would exactly fit an international situation. It is an accurate definition for international law, however, in the sense that the exceptional right of self-defense can be exercised only if the end cannot be otherwise obtained. In 1926, when League of Nations experts were studying the problems which would result from the application of sanctions under article 16 of the covenant, a Belgian jurist noted that 'Legitimate defense implies the adoption of measures proportionate to the seriousness of the attack and justified by the imminence of the danger.' When an individual is set upon by an armed thug who threatens his life, instantaneous action is clearly requisite, and it can be said that there is 'no moment for deliberation.' When a state anticipates a threatened injury from another state or from a lawless band, there is usually opportunity for deliberation in a chancery or war office, and an officer on the spot does not act until he has received instructions from a higher command. Telegraphic or radio communication between the officer and his superiors can be taken as a counterpart of the impulses in the nervous system of the individual whose brain instructs his arm to strike." (Jessup, A Modern Law of Nations (1948), 163-64.)

II. LEGISLATIVE HISTORY OF ARTICLE 51 OF THE CHARTER

A. Chronology

The Dumbarton Oaks Proposals contained no provision comparable to article 51 of the United Nations Charter. It was a matter of common knowledge, however, at the San Francisco Conference that representatives of the Big Five Powers (China, France, the U. S. S. R., the United Kingdom, and the United States) were engaged in intensive private negotiations during the early stages of the Conference to find a formula on the subject of regional arrangements and self-defense. The first public intimation as to the nature of this formula came in an official press statement by Mr. Stettinius, Secretary of State, on May 15, 1945. (The text of this statement is set forth below in II.) In that statement, a new section was suggested, the language of which was almost identical with article 51.

Subsequently, on May 21, 1945, Senator Vandenberg, United States delegate on committee III/4 (regional arrangements), submitted this proposed text to subcommittee III/4/A, on behalf of the Big Five Powers. It was suggested that this text become a new paragraph 12 to chapter VIII, section B (determination of threats to the peace or acts of aggression and action with respect thereto), of the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals. Subcommittee III/4/A unanimously approved the proposed text but favored its becoming a new section D to chapter VIII. The subcommittee concluded, however, that the location of the text should be decided by the coordination committee of the Conference.

On May 23, 1945, the full committee III/4 unanimously approved the text of the proposed new section and also decided to refer to the coordination committee the question of the location of the text.

This decision of committee III/4 was subsequently approved by Commission III (Security Council) at its second meeting on June 13, 1945. At its thirty-fifth meeting on June 20, 1945, the coordination committee made several minor drafting changes in the text and decided, upon the advice of the Advisory Committee of Jurists, that the text should be located, as article 51, at the end of chapter VII (action with respect to threats to the peace, breaches of the peace, and acts of aggression) of the final text of the Charter. This article, as so revised and located, was approved by the ninth plenary session of the Conference on June 25, 1945.

B. Interpretive statements

During the course of the formulation of this article at the Conference, various delegations made significant interpretive statements which are included in the public records. These are set forth below in the chronological order in which made.

1. United States statements.—As indicated above, the first public release of the text of which finally became article 51 was that made by Secretary of State Stettinius on May 15, 1945. This statement is set forth in full, as follows:

"[For the press, May 15, 1945, No. 25]

"Statement by Hon. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Secretary of State:

"As a result of discussions with a number of interested delegations, proposals will be made to clarify in the Charter the relationship of regional agencies and collective arrangements to the world organization. These proposals will—

"1. Recognize the paramount authority of the world organization in all enforcement action.

"2. Recognize that the inherent right of self-defense, either individual or collective, remains unimpaired in case the Security Council does not maintain international peace and security and an armed attack against a member state occurs. Any measures of self-defense shall immediately be reported to the Security Council and shall in no way affect the authority and responsibility of the Council under the Charter to take at any time such action as it may deem necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security.

"3. Make more clear that regional agencies will be looked to as an important way of settling local disputes by peaceful means.

"The first point is already dealt with by the provision of the Dumbarton Oaks Proposals (ch. VIII, sec. c, par. 2), which provides that no enforcement action will be taken by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council. It is not proposed to change this language.

"The second point will be dealt with by an addition to chapter VIII of a new section substantially as follows:

"Nothing in this chapter impairs the inherent right of self-defense, either individual or collective, in the event that the Security Council does not maintain international peace and security and an armed attack against a member state occurs. Measures taken in the exercise of this right shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under this Charter to take at any time such action as it may deem necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security."

"The third point would be dealt with by inclusion of a specific reference to regional agencies or arrangements in chapter VIII, section A, paragraph 3, describing the methods whereby parties to a dispute should, first of all, seek a peaceful solution by means of their own choice.

"The United States delegation believes that proposals as above outlined if adopted by the Conference would, with the other relevant provisions of the projected Charter, make possible a useful and effective integration of regional systems of cooperation with the world system of international security.

"This applies with particular significance to the long established Inter-American system.

"At Mexico City last March preliminary discussions took place regarding this problem, and the Act of Chapultepec envisaged the conclusion of an inter-American treaty which would be integrated into and be consistent with the world organization. After the conclusion of the Conference at San Francisco, it is the intention of the United States Government to invite the other American Republics to undertake in the near future the negotiation of a treaty which, as provided for in the Act of Chapultepec itself, would be consistent with the Charter of the world organization and would support and strengthen that organization, while at the same time advancing the development of the historic system of inter-American cooperation. This would be another important step in carrying forward the good neighbor policy."

In addition, Senator Vandenberg made the following statement relative to article 51 at the second meeting of commission III on June 13, 1945:

"Third, we have here recognized the inherent right of self-defense, whether individual or collective, which permits any sovereign state among us or any qualified regional group of states to ward off attack pending adequate action by the parent body. And we specifically recognize the continuous validity of mutual protection pacts to prevent a resurgence of Axis aggression, pending the time when all the states concerned may be satisfied to rest this exclusive responsibility with the new organization."

The statements of Senator Vandenberg with respect to article 51 are of utmost significance, as it was a matter of public knowledge that he was the principal negotiator in the formulation of this text. Public tribute was paid Senator Vandenberg for his "wisdom, infinite patience, and unexcelled skill" in this matter by Dr. Wellington Koo (China), rapporteur of committee III/4, as well as by Dr. Lleras Camargo (Colombia), chairman of that committee.

Subsequently at the hearings held by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations of the Charter, Senator Vandenberg brought out the fact that article 51 was designed to safeguard the interests of the inter-American system. Senator Connally also stated the view in this connection, that the Monroe Doctrine survived in its entirety and that the purpose of the Charter was to strengthen the doctrine rather than to weaken it.

2. Latin-American statements.—At the May 23, 1945, meeting of committee III/4, which approved the text which later became article 51, Dr. Lleras Camargo, speaking as delegate of Colombia, made the following statement:

"The Latin-American countries understood, as Senator Vandenberg has said, that the origin of the term 'collective self-defense' is identified with the necessity of preserving regional systems like the inter-American one. The Charter, in general terms, is a constitution, and it legitimatizes the right of collective self-defense to be carried out in accord with the regional pacts so long as they are not opposed to the purposes and principles of the organization as expressed in the Charter. If a group of countries with regional ties declare their solidarity for their mutual defense, as in the case of American states, they will undertake such defense jointly if and when one of them is attacked. And the right of defense is not limited to the country which is the direct victim of aggression but extends to those countries which have established solidarity, through regional arrangements, with the country directly attacked. This is the typical case of the American system. The Act of Chapultepec provides for the collective defense of the hemisphere and establishes that if an American nation is attacked all the rest consider themselves attacked. Consequently, such action as they may take to repel aggression, authorized by the article which was discussed in sub-committee yesterday, is authorized for all of them. Such action would be in accord with the Charter, by the approval of the article, and a regional arrangement may take action, provided it does not have improper purposes as, for example, joint aggression against another state. From this, it may be deduced that the approval of this article implies that the Act of Chapultepec is not in contravention of the Charter."

The committee records show that the delegates of Mexico, Costa Rica, Paraguay, Venezuela, Chile, Ecuador, Bolivia, Panama, Uruguay, Peru, Guatemala, El Salvador, Brazil, Honduras, and Cuba associated themselves with this statement.

3. French statements—At this same meeting of committee III/4, the delegate of France "expressed his desire to give utterance to the voice of Europe amidst the general concert of the Latin-American Nations. In his opinion, the formula approved by the committee extended in general to cases of mutual assistance against aggression."

The French view of article 51 was elaborated by M. Paul-Boncour at the meeting of commission III on June 13, 1945, as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, my dear colleagues, in the name of the French delegation, I want to pay tribute to the work that has been done and to express our public and grateful adherence to the text now submitted for your consideration. I would like to thank the president of the committee, Senor Llaras Camargo, and my old Geneva companion, Dr. Wellington Koo, for their help. I would also like to express my gratitude to all the nations of America who wanted this amendment in order to safeguard their fecund Pan American Union, which for years has prevented or avoided war in your continent.

"I would more particularly like to express my gratitude to Senator Vandenberg and the delegation of the United States who have helped so much in the drafting of the text now submitted and in securing its acceptance. This text makes clear distinction between the prevention and repression of aggression.

"As far as prevention of aggression is concerned, it vests in the Security Council the task of making the necessary provision and taking whatever measures are necessary. It renders obligatory the authorization of the Council for the measures which the states concerned would take, with an exception in the case of the application of treaties for the prevention of fresh aggressions by our present enemies. And this exception will endure until the signatories think that the Security Council is in a position to take over the task.

"But as far as repression of aggression is concerned—and that is a form of legitimate individual or collective defense—the text indicates the right of the signatories of regional understandings or treaties of mutual assistance to act immediately without awaiting the execution of the measures taken by the Security Council. They will naturally have to report to the Security Council what they have done.

"Gentlemen, let me say what a great relief this amendment has brought to the French delegation, and with them to all the French people. And for this reason, I expressed a moment ago my gratitude to all those who have helped in this work.

"After all, you see, I belong to a country which has been three times invaded in less than a century. The last war has left it, like so many other invaded countries of Europe, devastated, shaken, destroyed. Their distress rises as an appeal to the nations untouched by war to persevere in the common task.

"My country has complete confidence in the system of collective security, in the Security Council, in the Charter which we are making. The report which you unanimously accepted yesterday—I would like to thank you again for that—testifies to the faith I have personally in this system of collective security and in its efficacy. But whatever precautions may be taken in the various committees, in order to assure swift and effective action by the Security Council, it is impossible to prevent delays resulting from its meetings, its discussion, from the transport from countries often distant of material and men assigned to those who are attacked. And this, coupled with the lightning rapidity which aggression in modern war is capable of, may defeat—still more in any future war if that unhappily should occur—may subject a country to the risk of death.

"Let us not forget that in 1914, had it not been for the prompt arrival of the valiant British Army, our left wing would have been turned at Charleroi and the war finished on August 24. We do not forget how German ranks poured through as soon as the lines of Belgium and the Meuse were forced, nor the bewildered crowds fleeing from an invaded capital, nor all the atrocious disorder which remains an unforgettable memory for those who have witnessed it.

"This is why we have sought and will continue to seek through pacts of mutual assistance and regional agreements, fully in conformity, of course, with the governing principles of the Charter—the means of taking action on the very day, the very hour or minute when brutal aggression is committed—aggression which can be made all the more deadly by the speed of technical devices.

"Admittedly, we know that in the end the strength of the United Nations will prevail. This must inspire us with a deep confidence that the piling up of material and men will unfailingly beat down the lone aggressor which has dared to provoke the war. But, in the meantime, we don't want to leave any more parts of our territory in the hands of an aggressor whose brutal attack has succeeded in paralyzing momentarily our means of defense. We want to seek in those regional agreements which the amendment leaves open to us, provided they conform to the principles of the Charter, in treaties of mutual assistance which must likewise be in conformity—the means of acting forthwith without having to await the execution of the measures taken by the Security Council to protect us from the experience which has made us shed our blood three times in less than a century.

"This is why I thank the fourth committee for having assured us these means, and I hope that the third Commission will give its approval to these conclusions."

4. Egyptian statement.—At the May 23, 1945, meeting of committee III/4, the delegate of Egypt observed that "the principle involved in the new text should certainly extend to the League of Arab States." (The text of the pact of the League of Arab States, signed in Cairo, March 22, 1945, was before committee III/4 at that time, having been made an official committee III/4 document issued as of May 4, 1945.)

5. Australian statement.—At this same meeting of committee III/4, the Australian delegate stated the view that the term "individual or collective security" was "sufficiently wide to cover that part of the Australian amendment referring to the right of the parties, in certain circumstances, to adopt necessary measures to maintain international peace and security in accordance with any arrangements consistent with the Charter."

The Australian amendment on this subject read as follows:

"At the end of section (C) [ch. VIII, Dumbarton Oaks Proposals], a new section to be added, as follows:

"Section (D): Other arrangements for maintaining international peace and security. If the Security Council does not itself take measures, and does not authorize action to be taken under a regional arrangement or agency, for maintaining or restoring international peace, nothing in this Charter shall be deemed to abrogate the right of the parties to any arrangement which is consistent with this Charter to adopt such measures as they deem just and necessary for maintaining or restoring international peace and security in accordance with that arrangement."

6. British commentary.—The records of the San Francisco Conference do not reveal the British view of article 51. The following significant statement appears, however, in the official British commentary on the Charter of the United Nations, presented by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the British Parliament:

"38. A most important addition is the recognition of the explicit right of self-defense, both individual and collective, but in such a manner that the final authority and responsibility of the Security Council to maintain international peace and security is not impaired (art. 51). It was considered at the Dumbarton Oaks Conference that the right of self-defense was inherent in the proposals and did not need explicit mention in the Charter. But self-defense may be undertaken by more than one state at a time, and the existence of regional organizations made this right of special importance to some states, while special treaties of defense made its explicit recognition important to others. Accordingly the right is given to individual states or to combinations of states to act until the Security Council itself has taken the necessary measures. It will be for the Security Council to decide whether these measures have been taken and whether they are adequate for the purpose. In the event of the Security Council failing to take any action, or if such action as it does take is clearly inadequate, the right of self-defense could be invoked by any member or group of members as justifying any action they thought fit to take."

7. Views of the Advisory Committee of Jurists and of the Coordinating Committee of the San Francisco Conference.—In addition to these statements of individual governments represented at the San Francisco Conference, note should be taken of the views of the Advisory Committee of Jurists and of the Coordinating Committee.

As indicated above in section I, the Coordinating Committee at its thirty-fifth meeting on June 20, 1945, decided to put the text of present article 51 at the end of chapter VII of the Charter, which relates to the functions of the Security Council. Committee III/4 had suggested that this article might be located as a separate section after the chapter on regional arrangements but left final decision to the Coordinating Committee.

The Coordinating Committee was advised, however, by the Advisory Committee of Jurists that "the article should not be placed after chapter VIII, as a separate section as Committee III/4 had proposed, because it might have the effect there of limiting the right of self-defense only to regional arrangements, thus depriving a state which was not a party to such arrangements of that right. Such a conclusion was clearly not to be permitted."

The Coordinating Committee concurred in this conclusion of the Advisory Committee of Jurists and expressly rejected the contention of one member of the Coordinating Committee that this article belonged in the chapter on regional arrangements because it was only "a particular exception to the action of the [Security] Council in connection with the system of regional arrangements." It was the consensus of this Committee that the article belonged to the chapter on the Security Council, as a general exception to the statement of the powers of the Security Council.

III. DEFENSIVE ARRANGEMENTS EXISTING AT THE TIME OF THE SAN FRANCISCO CONFERENCE

The following defensive arrangements or pacts were in existence at the time of the San Francisco Conference, and were clearly intended to be safe-guarded by article 51:

- (1) The Inter-American system of collective security, as embodied in the Act of Chapultepec of 1945;
- (2) The Pact of the League of Arab States of March 22, 1945;
- (3) The Treaty of Alliance between the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom of May 26, 1942;
- (4) The Treaty of Alliance and Mutual Assistance between the Soviet Union and France of December 10, 1944.

Of particular interest in connection with the question of participation of states not members of the United Nations in mutual assistance pacts is the Pan-Arab Pact. The states parties to the other defense arrangements specified above all were represented at the San Francisco Conference and hence eligible to become members of the United Nations immediately. In the case of the Arab League, however, two of the signatories of the pact of March 22, 1945, Transjordan and Yemen, were not represented at the San Francisco Conference. Yemen was subsequently admitted to the United Nations in 1947, but the application of Transjordan has not yet been approved by the Security Council.

This would indicate that the delegates at the San Francisco Conference did not regard the term "collective self-defense" in article 51 to apply exclusively to states members of the United Nations.

IV. CHARTER PROVISIONS RELATING TO NONMEMBER STATES

An examination of the various provisions of the Charter relating to nonmember states shows that it was not intended to isolate the organization or the member states from states not members of the United Nations.

A significant provision is contained in article 2, paragraph 6, which reads: "The organization shall ensure that states not members of the United Nations act in accordance with these principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of peace and security."

The report of the chairman of the United States delegation to the San Francisco Conference states that this principle was contained in the Dumbarton Oaks proposals and was unanimously adopted by the San Francisco Conference. The delegates had in mind the fact that two exmembers of the League of Nations,

Germany and Japan, had been the aggressors responsible for World War II. It was therefore felt that unless the organization undertook this responsibility with respect to states not members of the organization, the whole scheme of the Charter would be seriously jeopardized.

It is important, moreover, to read article 2 (6) in connection with article 39 of the Charter, which provides:

"The Security Council shall determine the existence of any threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or act of aggression and shall make recommendations, or decide what measures shall be taken in accordance with articles 41 and 42, to maintain or restore international peace and security."

It should be noted that the Security Council has already been called upon to take action in several situations involving nonmember states. In 1946, for example, Albania and Bulgaria were charged with aiding the Greek guerrillas against the Greek Government. In 1947 the British Government charged Albania with causing illegal damage to British warships in the Corfu Straits. In addition, the Security Council has had to intervene actively in the Palestine situation, after the termination of the British mandate on May 15, 1948, and the proclamation of the State of Israel.

While the legislative history of article 2, paragraph 6, shows that the delegates at San Francisco were primarily concerned with the need to prevent future aggression by nonmember states, it seems evident that the organization would be equally concerned in event of aggression against a nonmember state. This is the clear import of paragraph 1 of article 1, which states as a purpose of the United Nations to " * * * maintain international peace and security, and to that end to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace * * *." Attention is also called to article 2 paragraph 4, of the Charter, which requires members of the United Nations to refrain from the threat or use of force in their international relations against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state. It therefore seems evident that the United Nations is concerned with aggression against any state, whether a member or nonmember state, and regardless of whether the aggressor was a nonmember state or a member state.

It is nevertheless clear that article 2 (6) does not impair the traditional right of self-defense of nonmember states under international law. Any such state has the right to defend itself against an armed attack.

Other provisions of the Charter also recognize the need to permit nonmember states to participate to some extent in the United Nations system for maintaining peace and security. Thus article 32 specifically provides that any state which is not a member of the United Nations, if it is a party to a dispute under consideration by the Security Council, shall be invited to participate, without vote, in the discussion relating to this dispute. In both the Greek and the Corfu Channel cases noted above, the nonmember states involved were invited to participate without vote in the proceeding of the Security Council.

In addition, article 35 (2) provides:

"2. A state which is not a member of the United Nations may bring to the attention of the Security Council or of the General Assembly any dispute to which it is a party if it accepts in advance, for the purposes of the dispute, the obligations to pacific settlement provided in the present Charter."

Moreover, article 93 (2) provides:

"A state which is not a member of the United Nations may become a party to the Statute of the International Court of Justice on conditions to be determined in each case by the General Assembly upon the recommendation of the Security Council."

(Pursuant to this provision and to a resolution adopted by the General Assembly in 1946, Switzerland became a party to the Court's Statute.) In this connection, article 35 (2) of the Court's Statute provides that the Court may, under conditions to be laid down by the Security Council, also be open to states not parties to the statute.

Finally, of interest in connection with the status of nonmember states under the Charter is article 103, which reads:

"In the event of a conflict between the obligations of members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail."

The legislative history of this article shows that the delegates at San Francisco were particularly concerned about treaty obligations which member states had incurred, or might incur in the future, vis-a-vis nonmember states. The committee report indicates, as an example, the possible conflict of obligations in the case of application of economic sanctions. The report concludes on this point:

"The committee has considered that in the event of an actual conflict between such obligations and the obligations of members under the Charter, particularly in matters affecting peace and security, the latter may have to prevail. The committee is fully aware that as a matter of international law it is not ordinarily possible to provide in any convention for rules binding upon third parties. On the other hand, it is of the highest importance for the organization that the performance of the members' obligations under the Charter in specific cases should not be hindered by obligations which they may have assumed to non-member states. The committee has had these considerations in view when drafting the text. The suggested text is accordingly not limited to preexisting obligations between members."

It seems clear from the language of article 108 and from its legislative history that the Charter did not intend to prohibit members of the United Nations from entering into treaties with nonmembers. The sole requirement is that obligations incurred under such treaties be consistent with obligations of members under the charter.

The obligations assumed by the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty of April 4, 1949, are consistent with the obligations of the United Nations Charter. Article 1 of this treaty parallels paragraphs 3 and 4 of article 2 of the Charter in expressing general principles of international law. Article 7 of the treaty specifically provides that nothing in the treaty is inconsistent with the obligations under the Charter of the parties which are members of the United Nations.

V. CONCLUSIONS

The following conclusions may be drawn:

(1) The United Nations general responsibility for maintenance of international peace and security includes the responsibility to check aggression against any state, whether a member or nonmember.

(2) The United Nations Charter does not prohibit any state, member or non-member, from taking necessary measures of self-defense in the event of an armed attack, subject to the right of the Security Council to review this action.

(3) The United Nations Charter does not prohibit member states from entering into mutual-defense treaties with nonmember states, but requires only that such treaty obligations be consistent with the obligations of the Charter.

(4) Such treaties, consistent with the obligations undertaken in the Charter of the United Nations, can lend positive support to the substantive law of the Charter as expressed in the purposes and principles of the United Nations, particularly under circumstances where Soviet abuse of the veto has obstructed the full development and effective functioning of United Nations organs in the security field.

JUSTIFICATION OF ITALY'S AND PORTUGAL'S MEMBERSHIP IN THE ATLANTIC PACT

The CHAIRMAN. Now, Senator, I want to refer to one matter that you have touched upon, and that is the cases of Portugal and Italy not being members of the United Nations. Regardless of whether they are members of the United Nations or not, does not the doctrine of the inherent right of self-defense apply to them independently of the treaty?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And is that not a sufficient warrant for them to be included in this particular treaty?

Ambassador AUSTIN. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. You need not be so terse unless you want to. We will be glad to have your comments and your views, because you have had large experience in international affairs, both on this committee and in the United Nations. We welcome any suggestions or amplification of your testimony, Senator Austin. I know you were never a prolix debater in the Senate. You were a very able debater and an eloquent debater, but you were not so prolix. That seems to be a development of the last two or three Congresses.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Could I make a request?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, indeed.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I think it is so valuable as a matter of history and as a means of answering some of the claims that are made now that I would like to have printed in the record Secretary Byrnes' address of February 28, 1946. To show why, I will just read you a paragraph or two of this. Do you mind?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no; go ahead.

SECRETARY BYRNES' SPEECH OF FEBRUARY 28, 1946

Ambassador AUSTIN (reading):

We have joined with our allies in the United Nations to put an end to war. We have covenanted not to use force except in the defense of law as embodied in the purposes and principles of the Charter. We intend to live up to that covenant. But as a great power and as a permanent member of the Security Council, we have a responsibility to use our influence to see that other powers live up to that covenant, and that responsibility we also intend to meet. Unless the great powers are prepared to act in the defense of law, the United Nations cannot prevent war. We must make it clear in advance—

that we intend to act to prevent aggression, making it clear at the same time that we will not use force for any other purpose. The great powers are given special responsibilities because they have the strength to maintain peace if they have the will to maintain peace. Their strength in relation to one another is such that no one of them can safely break the peace if the others stand united in the defense of the Charter.

The present power relationships of the great states preclude the domination of the world by any one of them. Those power relationships cannot be substantially altered by the unilateral action of any one great state without profoundly disturbing the whole structure of the United Nations.

Therefore, if we are going to do our part to maintain peace in the world, we must maintain our power to do so, and we must make it clear that we will stand united with other great states in defense of the Charter. If we are to be a great power we must act as a great power, not only in order to insure our own security but in order to preserve the peace of the world.

There is much more in that.

The CHAIRMAN. Where was that address made?

Ambassador AUSTIN. This address was made at the Overseas Press Club in New York City on February 28, 1946.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be put in the record as the Senator requests.

(The address of the Honorable James F. Byrnes, so identified, will be inserted in the record at this point.)

ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE JAMES F. BYRNES, SECRETARY OF STATE<sup>1</sup>

We are beginning to realize that the war is over. It is good to have sons, husbands, and fathers home again. It is good to open a newspaper without fear of finding in the casualty lists the name of one near and dear to us.

But this is not wholly a time of celebration and rejoicing. As families in their homes on the farms and in the cities settle back from the dinner table to hear the boys tell of Normandy and Iwo Jima, there is an unspoken question in every mind. The question is what we can do to make certain that there will never be another war.

During the war our goal was clear. Our goal was victory. The problems of industrial and military mobilization, it is true, were problems of the first magnitude. Production bottlenecks often seemed unbreakable, transportation difficulties and manpower shortages insurmountable. On the fighting front the combined land, sea, and air operations were heartbreaking in complexity.

These were hard tasks. Yet we were able to apply a yardstick to each proposal by asking a simple question: "Will it help to win the war?" The common goal of victory served to unite us and to give purpose and direction to our efforts.

Now that we have come into calmer waters, our relief and gratitude are mixed with uncertainty. Our goal now is permanent peace, and surely we seek it even more anxiously than we sought victory.

The difficulty is that the path to permanent peace is not so easy to see and to follow as was the path to victory.

When an issue is presented, we ask, "Will it help to win the peace?" When the answer is slow to come or does not come at all, we grow uneasy and apprehensive.

While we may be in doubt about many things, there are certain basic propositions on which we are clear.

One is that a just and lasting peace is not the inevitable result of victory. Rather, victory has given us the opportunity to build such a peace. And our lives depend upon whether we make the most of this opportunity.

Another thing of which we are certain is that we Americans alone cannot determine whether the world will live in peace or perish in war. Peace depends quite as much upon others as it does upon us. No nation is the complete master of its fate. We are all bound together for better or for worse.

Because we know this, we have pinned our hopes to the banner of the United Nations. And we are not content simply to take our place in that Organization. We realize that, although the dreams of the world are lodged in it, the United Nations will fail unless its members give it life by their confidence and by their determination to make it work in concrete cases and in everyday affairs.

And so I wish to talk to you about the first meetings of the United Nations. What has been said in these meetings has been said as plainly and bluntly as anything I have heard said by responsible statesmen in any private conference.

These first meetings were intended only to establish the various organs of the United Nations. But so pressing were some of the problems presented to the Security Council that they had to be dealt with before there was a chance for the Council to adopt even provisional rules of procedure.

All was not calm and peaceful at the meetings in London. There was effort to use the United Nations to advance selfish national aims. But the clash of national interests and purposes which were reflected in the debates in London was very much like the clash of local and special interests which are reflected in our national and State legislatures.

We may deprecate some of these clashes of interest. But when they exist, it is better that they should be publicly revealed. If these conflicts of interest did not appear in the forums of the United Nations, these forums would be detached from reality and in the long run turn out to be purposeless and futile.

A most significant precedent was established when the Security Council finished its discussions of the complaint of the Syrian and Lebanese Governments requesting the withdrawal of French and British troops from their territories.

The Council did not take formal action because of a difference among the permanent members as to the form of the resolution. But no one questioned the general proposition that no state has the right to maintain its troops on the territory of another independent state without its consent, nor the application of this proposition to the pending case.

The particular form of resolution to this general effect which was presented by the United States representative, Mr. Stettinius, was supported by most of the members of the Council. It failed of acceptance, however, because the Soviet Union vetoed it on the ground that it was not definite enough.

But the British and French Governments immediately announced that, notwithstanding the technical veto of the Soviet Union, they would act in accordance with the American resolution as it clearly represented the views of the Council.

This indicates that the mere legal veto by one of the permanent members of the Council does not in fact relieve any state, large or small, of its moral obligation to act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter.

The United Nations got off to a good start. However, that does not mean it is an assured success. It simply means that the Charter will work if the peoples of the United Nations are determined to make it work. At times our Congress may make serious errors of omission and commission. Such errors are not the fault of the Congress as an institution. They are the fault of its members or of their constituents who fail to measure up to their responsibilities.

So it is with the United Nations. It will succeed only as we, the peoples of the United Nations measure up to our responsibilities.

I should be lacking in candor if I said to you that world conditions today are sound or reassuring. All around us there is suspicion and distrust, which in turn breeds suspicion and distrust.

Some suspicions are unfounded and unreasonable. Of some others that cannot be said. That requires frank discussion between great powers of the things that give rise to suspicion. At the Moscow conference there was such frank discussion. It was helpful. But the basis of some suspicion persists and prompts me to make some comments as to our position.

We have joined with our allies in the United Nations to put an end to war. We have covenanted not to use force except in the defense of law as embodied in the purposes and principles of the Charter. We intend to live up to that covenant.

But as a great power and as a permanent member of the Security Council we have a responsibility to use our influence to see that other powers live up to their covenant. And that responsibility we also intend to meet.

Unless the great powers are prepared to act in the defense of law, the United Nations cannot prevent war. We must make it clear in advance that we do intend to act to prevent aggression, making it clear at the same time that we will not use force for any other purpose.

The great powers are given special responsibilities because they have the strength to maintain peace, if they have the will to maintain peace. Their strength in relation to one another is such that no one of them can safely break the peace if the others stand united in defense of the Charter.

The present power relationships of the great states preclude the domination of the world by any one of them. Those power relationships cannot be substantially altered by the unilateral action of any one great state without profoundly disturbing the whole structure of the United Nations.

Therefore, if we are going to do our part to maintain peace in the world we must maintain our power to do so; and we must make it clear that we will stand united with other great states in defense of the Charter.

If we are to be a great power we must act as a great power, not only in order to ensure our own security but in order to preserve the peace of the world.

Much as we desire general disarmament and much as we are prepared to participate in a general reduction of armaments, we cannot be faithful to our obligations to ourselves and to the world if we alone disarm.

While it is not in accord with our traditions to maintain a large professional standing army, we must be able and ready to provide armed contingents that may be required on short notice. We must also have a trained citizenry able and ready to supplement those armed contingents without unnecessarily prolonged training.

That is why in the interest of peace, we cannot allow our Military Establishment to be reduced below the point required to maintain a position commensurate with our responsibilities; and that is why we must have some form of universal military training.

Our power thus maintained cannot and will not be used for aggressive purposes. Our tradition as a peace-loving, law-abiding, democratic people should be an assurance that our force will not be used except in the defense of law. Our armed forces, except as they may be called into action by the Security Council, cannot be employed in war without the consent of the Congress. We need not fear their misuse unless we distrust the representatives of the people.

I am convinced that there is no reason for war between any of the great powers. Their present power relationships and interests are such that none need or should feel insecure in relation to the others, as long as each faithfully observes the purposes and principles of the Charter.

It is not enough for nations to declare they do not want to make war. Hitler said that. In a sense he meant it. He wanted the world to accept the domination of a totalitarian government under his direction. He wanted that without war if possible. He was determined to get it with war if necessary.

To banish war, nations must refrain from doing the things that lead to war.

It has never been the policy of the United States in its internal affairs or in its foreign relations to regard the status quo as sacrosanct. The essence of our democracy is our belief in life and growth and in the right of the people to shape and mold their own destiny.

It is not in our tradition to defend the dead hand of reaction or the tyranny of privilege. We did not fight against the Nazis and Fascists who turned back the clock of civilization in order that we might stop the clock of progress.

Our diplomacy must not be negative and inert. It must be capable of adjustment and development in response to constantly changing circumstances. It must be marked by creative ideas, constructive proposals, practical and forward-looking suggestions.

Though the status quo is not sacred and unchangeable, we cannot overlook a unilateral gnawing away at the status quo. The Charter forbids aggression, and we cannot allow aggression to be accomplished by coercion or pressure or by subterfuges such as political infiltration.

When adjustments between states, large or small, are called for, we will frankly and fairly consider those adjustments on their merits and in the light of the common interests of all states, large and small, to maintain peace and security in a world based on the unity of all great powers and the dominance of none.

There are undoubtedly vitally important adjustments which will require our consideration. Some of these situations are delicate to deal with. I am convinced, however, that satisfactory solutions can be found if there is a stop to this maneuvering for strategic advantage all over the world and to the use of one adjustment as an entering wedge for further and undisclosed penetrations of power.

We must face the fact that to preserve the United Nations we cannot be indifferent—veto or no veto—to serious controversies between any of the great powers, because such controversies could affect the whole power relationship between all of the great powers.

The United States wishes to maintain friendly relations with all nations and exclusive arrangements with no nation. Naturally there are some problems which concern some nations much more than other nations. That is true in regard to many problems related to inter-American affairs. That is true in regard to the control of Germany and Japan.

In our relations with the other great powers there are many problems which concern two or three of us much more than the others of us. I see no objection to conferences between the big three or the big four or the big five.

Even conferences between ourselves and the Soviet Union alone, conferences between ourselves and Britain alone, or conferences between ourselves and France or China alone, can all help to further general accord among the great powers and peace with the smaller powers.

But in such conferences, so far as the United States is concerned, we will gang up against no state. We will do nothing to break the world into exclusive blocs or spheres of influence. In this atomic age we will not seek to divide a world which is one and indivisible.

We have openly, gladly, and wholeheartedly welcomed our Soviet ally as a great power, second to none in the family of the United Nations. We have approved many adjustments in her favor, and in the process, resolved many serious doubts in her favor.

Only an inexcusable tragedy of errors could cause serious conflict between us in the future. Despite the differences in our way of life, our people admire and respect our allies and wish to continue to be friends and partners in a world of expanding freedom and rising standards of living.

But in the interest of world peace and in the interest of our common and traditional friendship we must make plain that the United States intends to defend the Charter.

Great powers as well as small powers have agreed under the United Nations Charter not to use force or the threat of force except in defense of law and the purposes and principles of the Charter.

We will not and we cannot stand aloof if force or the threat of force is used contrary to the purposes and principles of the Charter.

We have no right to hold our troops in the territories of other sovereign states without their approval and consent freely given.

We must not unduly prolong the making of peace and continue to impose our troops upon small and impoverished states.

No power has a right to help itself to alleged enemy properties in liberated or ex-satellite countries before a reparation settlement has been agreed upon by the Allies. We have not and will not agree to any one power deciding for itself what it will take from these countries.

We must not conduct a war of nerves to achieve strategic ends.

We do not want to stumble and stagger into situations where no power intends war but no power will be able to avert war.

We must not regard the drawing of attention to situations which might endanger the peace, as an affront to the nation or nations responsible for those situations.

It is quite possible that any nation may in good faith embark on a course of conduct without fully appreciating the effects of its conduct. We must all be willing to review our actions to preserve our common interests in the peace, which are so much more important to all of us than the differences which might divide us.

We must get back to conditions of peace. We must liquidate the terrible legacy which the war has left us. We must return our armies to their homelands. We must eliminate the breeding grounds of suspicion and fear. We must not deceive ourselves or mislead our allies. To avoid trouble we must not allow situations to develop into incidents from which there is no retreat.

We must live by the Charter. That is the only road to peace.

To live by the Charter requires good will and understanding on the part of all of us. We who had patience and gave confidence to one another in the most trying days of the war must have patience and give confidence to one another now.

No nation has a monopoly of virtue or of wisdom, and no nation has a right to act as if it had. Friendly nations should act as friendly nations.

Loose talk of the inevitability of war casts doubts on our own loyalty to the Charter and jeopardizes our most cherished freedoms, both at home and abroad.

There are ideological differences in the world. There always have been. But in this world there is room for many people with varying views and many governments with varying systems. None of us can foresee the far-distant future and the ultimate shape of things to come. But we are bound together as part of a common civilization.

As we view the wreckage of the war, we must realize that the urgent tasks of reconstruction, the challenging tasks of creating higher standards of living for our people, should absorb all our constructive energies.

Great states and small states must work together to build a friendlier and happier world. If we fail to work together there can be no peace, no comfort, and little hope for any of us.

COOPERATION AMONG THE GREAT POWERS

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that at San Francisco, where we adopted the United Nations Charter, it was upon the assumption, perhaps without sufficient support as events have shown, that the great powers would cooperate and go along in a general plan to support the principles of the United Nations Charter?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes; of course.

The CHAIRMAN. They all professed at San Francisco the desire to do that, did they not, or their representatives did?

Ambassador AUSTIN. They did.

The CHAIRMAN. And the conception that there would be any little group led by any one power opposed really to the purposes of the Charter through delay and frustration and veto and things of that kind was never seriously questioned, is that right?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That I believe to be true.

The CHAIRMAN. The idea that you touched on, that there is complaint, that they think that instead of confining it to article 51 it would be better to devise a universal pact to which all states might adhere, that is what the United Nations is intended to do, is it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes; yes, indeed.

The CHAIRMAN. And it is only because of the failure of the United Nations in some respects that it is necessary to do these things, is that true?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes. May I make an observation?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, indeed. I told you a while ago to observe whenever you feel like it.

Ambassador AUSTIN. It is not necessary to have unanimity of all the members of the United Nations all the time on every question to maintain peace.

The CHAIRMAN. I agree with you.

Ambassador AUSTIN. All we have to have is that reasonable cooperative spirit that enables us to go forward as we do in ordinary transactions among human beings. And when we have a case up for pacific settlement, a dispute between two countries, we need to handle it in the interest of peace and not in the interest of some national idea. If we could only have that cooperative spirit which we do have in the great majority of the members, if it could extend to the five permanent members, we could make more progress than we are making now, and I don't want you to believe that we are not making good progress now. We are moving in the right direction, and have been throughout the history of the United Nations. We are moving toward pacific settlement of disputes and against the use of war for the determination of controversies among nations. We have made progress in every case where there has been a scare and a threat of possible international disturbance.

That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The United Nations has, by reason of affording a forum for all of the members of that organization, been able to crystallize public opinion on many of these questions that have had a great deal to do with supporting the United Nations.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is true.

NO SUBSTITUTE FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. You state here that the President and Secretary of State have expressed their determination that the treaty should support and not be a substitute for the United Nations. That is true also of the mission and of all connected with the United Nations representing the Government of the United States, is it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. It is true.

The CHAIRMAN. It is certainly true of the Senate of the United States, insofar as I am informed and advised, and I believe that the Government and responsible Government officials have the same impression, that we are not trying to chisel off or destroy or impair the United Nations, but that this treaty shall in a way be supplementary thereto, and in conformance with the cardinal principles of the United Nations.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, may I observe that your witness is representing the Senate of the United States in the United States mission. You rarely stop to think of that, that the appointive power is not in the President alone. It is in the President and in the Senate. And what is more, he is under a participation act adopted by Congress. There is a very close responsibility of the representative of the United States in the United Nations to the Congress and to the Senate. I would like to have you remember that.

The CHAIRMAN. I thank you, Senator. The committee and the Congress are very proud that there is such an eminent former Member of the Senate as yourself who represents us in the United Nations, and we know what you are keenly alive to the obligations both to the President and to the Senate and to the country that you possess.

Senator Vandenberg, take the witness.

Senator VANDENBERG. Senator Austin, I want to congratulate you upon your very able analysis of article 51. I so completely agree with every word you have said that there is no necessity for me to pursue the subject in cross-examination. I simply want to raise one question with you for your comment.

THE TREATY NOT A MILITARY ALLIANCE

The critical habit is growing in the country of labeling the North Atlantic Treaty as a "military alliance," with all the connotations which historically condemn either the morals or the utility of military alliances. I ask you whether this North Atlantic Pact is not in essence the precise opposite of the term "military alliance" in its traditional sense.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, absolutely. I agree completely with that characterization.

LIMITATIONS ON THE TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. Is it not true that the North Atlantic Pact operates in its ultimate action only under two conditions: (1) That an armed aggressor has identified himself as an international criminal; (2) the pact operates only so long as the Security Council has failed to take the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security? Therefore, so long as the United Nations is able, under its procedures, to function, the North Atlantic Pact does not function in action, and it only functions within the completely limited area of action which I have described.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Exactly.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. May I intervene right there? Of course, until the Security Council acts the North Atlantic Charter is not confined to having to wait. It may come into operation immediately upon armed attack. When the Security Council takes the matter up and acts, then the North Atlantic Pact would not be operative insofar as any aggressive action was concerned. Is that true or not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an emergency provision, recognizing the inherent right of self-defense of these nations, subject to the overriding authority of the Security Council, and until the Security Council acts the authority of the treaty powers is not impaired. Is that correct?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

CONTINUITY OF ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator GEORGE. Senator Austin, I wish to compliment you on your very cogent and able statement of this matter. Like all such statements, your implications, of course, go beyond your mere language, but on the point that you have just been queried about by Senator Vandenberg and Senator Connally, the treaty, the pact, remains and continues, it is in existence, it is the particular measure that is taken to repel an armed attack which ceases when the United Nations takes over; is that not right?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes, sir.

Senator GEORGE. So the obligation, of course, of the member states in the pact who are also members of the United Nations is to make a report of their acts and doings, but nothing ceases, nothing ends, except the particular measures that have been taken to put down the aggressor—all the measures taken for that purpose—

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes.

Senator GEORGE. By the very language of article 5 of this treaty.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is right.

Senator GEORGE. I read it:

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

I want to make that clear.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Thank you very much. I haven't heard it stated exactly like that before, and with your customary clarity and wonderful incisive speech you have made that point very clear.

INHERENT RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE

Senator GEORGE. I gather, Senator Austin, and indeed I think the conclusion is inescapable, that you justify this treaty not alone because of article 51 or any other provision in the United Nations Charter, but out of the precedent inherent right under international law of any state jointly in association with another state to take appropriate action to defend itself.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes, sir. I have a little bit of a distinction there. In my mind article 51 does not grant a power. It merely prohibits anything contained in the Charter cutting across an existing power. This existing power is not dependent on the Charter, it is dependent upon international law and the customs of people, and that is the inherent right of self-defense.

Senator GEORGE. Which precedes the Charter and which the Charter expressly recognizes.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes.

ASSOCIATION OF MEMBER AND NONMEMBER OF UN IN REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

Senator GEORGE. I think that ought to be kept clearly in mind, because then the argument that any state which is associated in the North Atlantic Pact which is not a member of the United Nations cannot be so associated ceases to have any force and effect whatever, does it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. It ceases to have any effect.

Senator GEORGE. Because a member of the United Nations may associate himself with a nonmember so long as it is acting within the purview of the United Nations Charter and for the purposes of accomplishing the main objectives of that Charter.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is certainly so, and it cannot be said that it is conflict with the Charter.

Senator GEORGE. It cannot be so said. In other words, a regional arrangement is not to be interpreted in a narrow or geographical sense at all. You have already recited here, in your main statement, what you thought should be and might properly be considered. You did not expressly say so, but I take it that from what you did say it necessarily follows that if there be a common purpose and a kindred objective existing between a member of the United Nations and even a nonmember in this vital area of self-defense, maintenance of peace and security, they may properly become members of the same group.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I think you have formulated a rule beautifully. That is the doctrine. I think.

Senator GEORGE. I agree with you. And I again want to thank you for your valuable contribution to our studies here.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Thank you, Senator.

Senator GEORGE. Perhaps others may ask you, and I would not myself go into it, about any specific provision in the North Atlantic Treaty. I simply want to content myself with thanking you for your great contribution to our work here on this committee.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Thank you, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Austin, on the point that Senator George placed so well before you and before the committee about these nations that are not members of the United Nations, ought any members of the United Nations to object to a nation not technically a member of the United Nations joining with other members of the United Nations in carrying out the purposes and objectives of the United Nations?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I believe not, and in this case it seems especially unjust that one of these countries, namely Italy, which is not a member of the United Nations, is in that status because her application for membership has been vetoed by the Soviet Union, notwithstanding that they had announced that she was qualified to become a member of the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. I thank you very much, Senator Austin. I want to compliment you upon your very comprehensive and very clear exposition of the matters relating to the North Atlantic Treaty.

Senator Smith of New Jersey will have the floor.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, before I begin my questions to our distinguished former colleague, I would merely like to say for the record, if I may, that as one member of the Foreign Relations Committee I am happy to see this morning with us Senator Donnell and Senator Watkins and other members of our body who are not members of the Foreign Relations Committee, because this is a matter of such profound importance that it is my conviction, and I express the hope, that all our colleagues may come to these hearings in order to get the kind of excellent presentation we have had this morning.

I also express the hope that any of our colleagues who may see fit to ask questions may be given the full privilege to do so in order that we can bring out every possible issue that is involved in this tremendously important matter.

I want to say, Senator Austin, that from a personal standpoint it is a great pleasure for me to see you here with us. As you know, our friendship has been such that it is a great pleasure for me to see you here.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN COLLECTIVE SELF-DEFENSE AND REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

I want to thank you for one emphasis which you have made here this morning which has cleared up in my own mind some difficulties I had but more particularly has cleared up difficulties that many of my correspondents had. They do not realize the distinction, as you have so ably brought out, between chapter VIII of the United Nations Charter, which is entitled "Regional Arrangements," and article 51 of chapter VII, which is really a totally different subject. I think you have brought that out so clearly that we do not need to develop it any further.

Ambassador AUSTIN. If you do not mind my making this observation, there is one curious event that makes that very clear, and that was the removal of that article from its original position under chapter VIII. They did not want to have any question about it, so they lifted it right out of chapter VIII and put it up there really alone on the end of chapter VII, relating to enforcement. It is a very interesting event.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I think that is very important, and we find it now in chapter VII, at the end, as you have suggested, of a chapter the title of which is "Action With Respect to Threats to the Peace, Breaches of the Peace, and Acts of Aggression." That is what 51 deals with.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is it.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And it does not deal primarily with the regional arrangements.

COMMUNITY OF INTERESTS MORE IMPORTANT THAN REGIONAL LOCATION

That leads me to ask this question, which is presented by your own statement this morning, where you discuss universal arrangements and point out than any binding collective defense pact, to be effective, depends on the individual and collective capacity of the parties to resist armed attack. This involves continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid as envisaged under article 3 of the treaty, implying that that language which I have just read is the only limitation to any possible other nation, with the consent of the members of this treaty, joining in this Atlantic Pact. In other words, it is not the question of whether they actually happen to be in the Atlantic area, but if they have similar objectives and are related to the objectives of the nations in the Atlantic area, they might properly be considered eligible, although the exact regional definition might not reach them.

Is that a fair conclusion, with the possibility that this might grow into a larger group of nations than we have contemplated in the immediate Treaty?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I think that is a likely position for a signatory state to take. Of course the question of projecting what is going to be done and what probably will happen is a little difficult where you are dealing with states. I have discovered that in the experience of the past 3 years.

ADDITIONAL MEMBERS FOR TREATY

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And, of course, the treaty provides that other States are admitted only on the invitation of all the signatories, so you would have a problem there. There are other states whose names have been mentioned. The question has been brought to my attention, "Are you going to make this eligible for so and so and so and so?" You probably know some of those to whom I have referred.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I would have to mention names, but I do not think we need to go into that discussion.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. No.

REGIONAL ASPECTS OF ATLANTIC TREATY

You said one thing on page 5 of your statement which was not entirely clear to me, on the assumption that we clearly divide chapter VIII of the United Nations Charter from article 51. You say:

In certain of its aspects, the treaty is also a regional arrangement; and insofar as it partakes of those characteristics, chapter VIII of the Charter provides full authority for its provisions.

That is the end of the quotation from your statement.

That seems to suggest that you visualize certain regional characteristics where the parties as a regional group might be called upon to act under chapter VIII. I am not quite clear what you mean by that.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Well, I think I would be very intemperate if I undertook to forecast the specific acts that can be done under this treaty that would require application of the checks that are contained in chapter VIII. But it must be obvious to anyone reading this treaty that they could get into that field under article 4:

The Parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the Parties is threatened.

You see, that deals with threats. Article 51 does not deal with threats. Therefore, I can imagine cases where even there they would be obliged to conform to what the Charter of the United Nations requires to be done in such an event, don't you see? It all depends on what happens. As I have said repeatedly in my position here, what this treaty is depends on how the signatories carry it out. And we will deal with practical things and not theories. We will not have to pass on lots of these problems that I see expressed in various forms. We may never meet them.

So from the point of view of wise consideration of a treaty like this, I do not think that it would be right for me to speculate about what acts are likely to occur under this treaty that would be in the realm of those things which are suitable for regional determination.

There is one thing very clear, and it is a recommendation for the treaty, and that is the firm adherence to the fundamental principles of the Charter of the United Nations; so great adherence as to repeat some of them, like the reference in article 2:

The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

That is almost taken right out of the Charter. And the fact that 12 great nations get together in a treaty like this and reaffirm those fundamental principles helps to carry out one of the objects that we have, and that is to gain universal peace, universal cooperation.

Excuse me; I got away from your question.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. You see no implication in the fact that we are preparing to enter into this North Atlantic Treaty that it is an evidence of our lack of confidence in the United Nations?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Far from it; oh, no. It is simply another way to strengthen and carry on the United Nations.

OBLIGATION OF NON-UN MEMBERS OF ATLANTIC PACT TO ACCEPT CERTAIN PRINCIPLES OF UN CHARTER

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Senator, I would like to bring to your attention certain questions that have come to me in my correspondence, certain questions that have come to our staff. We have compiled certain of these issues, and there are a few of them here that it seems to me have a special bearing on your intimate knowledge of the way the United Nations Charter was set up and the way it is functioning and the relation of that to certain articles in this treaty.

I want to, in the first place, in taking up article 1, ask you some questions, and I am going to read article 1 first so we have in the record what we are talking about:

The Parties undertake, as set forth in the Charter of the United Nations, to settle any international disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

In reading that I emphasize the word "parties," meaning the parties to this North Atlantic Treaty.

Does that language mean that such nonmembers of the United Nations—the two countries we have brought into this, Italy and Portugal—will now be bound by the provisions of the United Nations Charter relating to the peaceful settlement of disputes?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. You think by their entering into this they are just as much bound as though they entered the United Nations themselves?

Ambassador AUSTIN. What they have done by this treaty is not to make an operative clause here. I do not regard this as an operative clause. I regard this as a declaration. In other words, Italy and Portugal, who are not members of the United Nations, say by this treaty that this is sound principle. That is what they are saying. And they are saying that, so far as they are concerned, they will undertake to do as the Charter of the United Nations requires in respect of any disputes.

USE OF UNITED NATIONS MACHINERY BY ATLANTIC PACT MEMBERS TO SETTLE DISPUTES

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. That leads to the next question: Does this article mean that the pact members are to settle their disputes through the machinery of the United Nations or other existing agencies? Otherwise, why does the treaty omit detailed provisions outlining the methods to be followed? Would that be true of Italy and Portugal as well as of the members of the United Nations?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Your question opens the door to a whole lot. There are many features of the Charter of the United Nations that this really refers to by indirection, like those obligations on the parties to any dispute to try to settle it themselves by various means, don't you know. Article 33 is a characteristic one. But that is not the only one. And now then, in order to facilitate the work of such litigants, you might say, such opponents in a dispute, we have worked out in practice certain methods and procedures. In one case, for example, the President of the Security Council had been vainly trying to get his Security Council into agreement on a settlement between certain countries; and then he finally launched out on an informal basis to act as a mediator or peacemaker. All right. Then what happened? From that experience the interim committee went into its study and procedures to the point of making a finding and recommendation that we establish, by rule, this practice of having the parties, after they have made their claim and created the issue, join with the President of the Security Council or a peacemaker that he appoints, for the purpose of carrying out such a provision as this which you have in article 1 of the treaty and such a provision as this which you find in article 33. Permit me to read this. It is not long:

The parties to any dispute, the continuance of which is likely to endanger the maintenance of international peace and security, shall, first of all, seek a solution by negotiation, inquiry, mediation, conciliation, arbitration, judicial settlement, resort to regional agencies or arrangements, or other peaceful means of their own choice.

Do you see?

Now I think I had better stop, because I could go on with a long story relating to this.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I realize that, but what I am trying to bring out is from your answer to my former question, that such a provision as that would apply to Italy and Portugal, who are in the Atlantic Pact, if they have a problem that is presented.

Ambassador AUSTIN. It is my belief that it does.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. That is a very interesting development of this whole thing, and very important, and I am very much pleased with your answer, because it seems to me that was the conclusion that we have to draw.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I intended to make that clear in my little statement. I doubt that I did, now.

CONTEMPLATED EXPANSION OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS

Senator SMITH. I thank you very much. It has been a question I have been asked a number of times, and I think it is a very important reply you are making.

I will skip article 2 and go to article 3. Article 3 reads:

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

The questions that are presented under this article, which I want to present to you as an authority on the way the UN operates, are these: Would the signatory parties be bound by this article not only to maintain the present strength of their military establishment for the duration of the treaty, which incidentally is 20 years, but also to develop and expand those establishments? Does this mean, for example, that in 1950, 1951, and 1952, our Military Establishment would have to be progressively enlarged and improved? I am not quite clear where we go on the military implementation here.

Ambassador AUSTIN. You are asking me a question that I have not considered, and perhaps I am making a hasty answer.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. If you would rather not answer it, do not hesitate to say so.

Ambassador AUSTIN. No; I am going to give you my opinion. I think you have to make reasonable interpretations of such a statement as you have there. As I see it that is expressed in general terms, not specific—maintain and develop their individual and collective capacities. You would get into a terrible tangle, I think, if you undertook to say how much gain you shall make the first year, how much development you shall make the second year, and all that. You leap from one extreme interpretation to another, and get yourself into a cul-de-sac.

Now, what I interpret that to mean, looking at it reasonably and construing it liberally, is that in order to implement mutual aid and self-help, each one of the signatories to this treaty will perform its part. I do not think there was any intent to measure it with such degree of care as to say it shall be maintained at the level that exists now, or that it be developed above that level.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Let us put the matter this way.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I believe it means that it must be by self-help and mutual aid kept qualified to make the contribution that article 5 requires.

OBLIGATIONS UNDER ARTICLE 3 AND POSSIBLE DISARMAMENT BY UNITED NATIONS

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Let me put it the other way, then: Would not the obligation involved in article 3 possibly prohibit us for at least 10 years, when we renew our consideration of this treaty, from accepting plans that might be formulated by the United Nations, either for the establishment of a ceiling on armaments, or disarmament, or whatever it may be; either a ceiling or a reduction or whatever it might be? Is there any interference there?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That answer is perfectly clear. Article 7 says:

This treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting, in any way the rights and obligations under the Charter of the parties which are members of the United Nations, or the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Doesn't that answer your question?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I think it does, but I wanted to get it on the record and from a person of your distinction and authority, that you do not feel that our entering into this thing, and our discussing in article 3 here the developing of our individual right to resist armed attack, in any way prevents our joining in a program for limitation of armaments, or what we all hope for in the time to come, when we can disarm entirely and let the police force of the world be in the hands of the United Nations.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I recommend, if you do not mind my saying it, that you study that article 3 with reference to the fact that this treaty is going to set up a group to do something that heretofore has been done only by the individual members themselves. And when they talk about developing the individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack, they refer principally to that.

Senator VANDENBERG. Will the Senator yield?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. Is not the final answer, Mr. Ambassador, that the interpretation of this article is entirely contingent upon events; that as events improve the peace prospective under the United Nations, this obligation recedes?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. And it recedes just as much as it can progress, depending upon events.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes. The word "effective" is the word that makes that perfectly clear.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I am very glad you have gotten that into the record, because lots of people are fearing that we are setting up something here (a) that will contemplate our continuing to increase the armed forces of this group year by year; and (b), that we will be in some way stopped from joining in a plan for disarmament when that plan comes properly through the United Nations. You made it clear, as my own judgment is, that neither one of those conclusions should be drawn.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I think that is an interpretation that strains the language of the pact and the purpose of it far beyond what you call reasonable and fair interpretation.

SUPREMACY OF CHARTER OVER TREATY

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Let me turn to article 7, if I may. I will read the article again:

This treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting, in any way the rights and obligations under the Charter of the parties which are members of the United Nations, or the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The question is this: In the event of a conflict in jurisdiction between the treaty and this Charter, which would prevail? Suppose a pact member is attacked by a nonpact member and the Security Council assumes jurisdiction. To what extent would action under the treaty still be possible?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Perhaps you have two questions there. I would like to separate them, if you don't mind.

The supremacy of the Charter is strictly maintained in the treaty itself. If there is a conflict of law, the law of the Charter prevails.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad you have made that statement, because I have been attacked by some of my correspondents in New Jersey on the ground that in supporting this treaty I am undermining the Charter and putting something superior to the Charter in effect so far as the United States is concerned. You have negated that definitely. The Charter is the supreme law as between these two should there be a conflict.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that not clear in article 7?

* * * the primary responsibility of the Security Council—

That recognizes its overriding authority.

Ambassador AUSTIN. There is another article here, Senator Smith.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT THAT SECURITY COUNCIL ASSUMES JURISDICTION OVER A DISPUTE

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Then the other question I put, the question of a pact member being attacked by a nonpact member, and the Security Council assuming jurisdiction.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I do not quite understand your question. Probably I had better understand it before I try to respond.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Let us suppose a pact member is attacked by a nonpact member and the Security Council assumes jurisdiction. To what extent will action under the treaty still be possible?

Ambassador AUSTIN. To no extent, if the Security Council takes the measures necessary to maintain security and peace. There is the big "if." Now, it is said that the Security Council will decide the matter; that the Security Council, being supreme over the subject, having the primary responsibility, will decide that question of whether they have taken the measures necessary.

Does that answer your question?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I think that takes care of that particular question.

But until they do, the treaty is still in effect so far as self-defense.

Ambassador AUSTIN. The treaty is still in effect, but the activity, as Senator George said—he brought that out very clearly—will cease. The word "measure" is involved.

The CHAIRMAN. When and if they take action. Until they do, the treaty remains effective, the measure remains effective.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is right.

Before you pass from that take this into account, that Article 8 says:

Each party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any other of the parties or any third state is in conflict with the provisions of this treaty, and undertakes not to enter into any international engagement in conflict with the treaty.

That has to be read, I think, in connection with the other provisions of the treaty, on your last question.

POSSIBLE CONFLICTS BETWEEN AMENDMENTS TO UNITED NATIONS CHARTER AND THE TREATY

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad you brought in article 8, because I was going to ask you a question in connection with that, whether under the second clause of that article the United States obligates itself not to become a party for 10 or 20 years to any proposed amendment for strengthening the United Nations if that amendment would in any way limit the right of self-defense under the North Atlantic Treaty.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I have no difficulty in answering that, because throughout this treaty that is before us the obligation of the United States under the Charter of the United Nations is maintained unbroken, and its right under the Charter of the United Nations is sustained. There is nothing in this that abridges the power of the United Nations.

Does that answer it?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Not quite, because this question I gave you contemplated the possibility of amendments, we will say. Suppose we get together to amend the United Nations. Does this article 8 in any way prevent our entering into amendments to the United Nations which might conceivably be looked upon as in conflict with the North Atlantic Treaty?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, no; I think not.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. That is a question that has been presented.

Ambassador AUSTIN. How could you get in conflict with this treaty, anyway?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Only if it in any way limited the right of collective self-defense. I imagine we would not agree with that anyway, so there would not be any question.

Ambassador AUSTIN. The Charter says that nothing inconsistent with this shall prevail. The Charter does not create that right; that right exists under international law, as you know. You are perfectly familiar with that.

I think I have answered it.

COMPETITION BETWEEN SECURITY COUNCIL AND THE COUNCIL UNDER THE TREATY

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. We provide in article 9 for a Council. Now, as I understand that Council, it consists of representatives of each of the treaty countries who meet together and confer. They have no authority to bind their respective governments, but they do consider with regard to matters to implement the treaty.

The question that has been presented to me is this: Will the Council compete in any way with the Security Council? Are we going to have any danger of any conflicts with these various councils operating under these other treaties—the Security Council, the Council under the Brussels pact, and so on?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I do not see any danger. With the supremacy of the Security Council declared in the treaty itself, I do not see how anyone can raise a question that the Council under this treaty is supreme over the Security Council. That I just cannot see.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I think you are right about that, because in reading this it seems to me the Council is not given any authority except to get together and consider matters. The individual members are not given any final voice for the countries they represent.

Ambassador AUSTIN. You will notice that this article 9 envisages the purpose of the treaty, collective self-defense, and specifically includes in its reference articles 3 and 5. How that could ever get in conflict with the Charter of the United Nations I cannot see, because the activity under this treaty would cease, that is, the measures taken for self-defense would cease, if and when the Security Council took the necessary measures to maintain security and peace.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And the Council probably never would begin to function until the Security Council had endeavored to take care of any threat to the peace. It would only function in case of an aggression, which is provided definitely at the point of aggression.

I agree with you entirely, but as I say to you, it has been presented to us, and I am glad to have your reply to the question.

I have one or two more, and then I am through.

This question I think you have already answered, but because it has been asked I am going to repeat it. Many people still pin their hopes for world peace on the United Nations. Why is it not possible to leave the question of security in the North Atlantic area up to the United Nations generally, instead of emphasizing the regional approach as contemplated in the pact? I think you have answered that in your statement, and I think Secretary Acheson did yesterday, too, so I won't press that question. It is clear to me.

THE ARMSTRONG PROPOSAL

There is one more here that I do want to ask you, and that is with regard to the so-called Armstrong proposal. I do not know whether you are familiar with that or not. I will read it to you in the question: It has been proposed that members of the United Nations who are determined to avoid the excessive use of the veto should form a coalition for peace within the United Nations and open to all members. Would such a pact open to all states serve the cause of world peace and security better than a pact of this nature, this North Atlantic Treaty?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I have covered that pretty fully in my opening statement. I would have covered it precisely if I had said "including that proposition" by name. My idea is that we should not close our minds. We are in a new field. We are engaged with a new power for peace. We have had only 4 years' experience with it. I think we have done well. But we haven't done as well as we are going to do. And I welcome proposals of all kinds for strengthening this power, except those that are proposals to destroy it under the pretext of strengthening it.

THE UNITED NATIONS AND PROPOSALS FOR WORLD FEDERATION

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Then you would agree with me that some of the talk that is going around, that the United Nations is a failure, that we had better start from scratch, that we had better set up a world federation, we had better do this, we had better do that, is unfortunate discussion—let's put it that way—and you thoroughly believe the United Nations has made substantial progress with all the difficulties it has had and is on the road to accomplishing the objectives we seek?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Much of the dissatisfaction with the United Nations and the desire to substitute something else for it results from inadequate understanding. We try very hard to distribute information on the progress the United Nations is making, but it is a difficult thing to do. Success usually is achieved quietly, while failures attract widespread publicity. It is the people who don't appreciate what we have who are more readily swept off their feet by promises of something else.

The birth and organization of the greatest combination of nations that history has ever seen, in the interest of the greatest cause—the abolition of the scourge of war—should command the attention of every citizen.

The indifference of people is difficult to cure, but of one thing I am certain: There are an enormous number of young people all over the United States, in fact all over the world, who are taking an interest in the United Nations, who are finding out all about it, and who are qualifying themselves to take up the torch and carry it on. Their interest, their enthusiasm, and their determination to make it work, offset the unjustified skepticism with which some of our generation view the work of the United Nations. These young people will become more qualified than my generation was, and is, to make a success, a wonderful success of the United Nations.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Thank you, Senator Austin. I appreciate your fine testimony today, and especially your answers to these questions which will enable me, from an authoritative source, to give some answers. I can say that I agree with all of your replies. They have been my own conclusion, but I do not feel qualified as the expert you are, and I wanted to get into our record your answers to those points which have been raised, and especially the very last thing you have said, because I have had pressed on me by delegations from my State that I should support a movement in the light of the atomic bomb to scrap all armament in the world except such police force as we give to some central authority, and everybody will be happy continuously thereafter.

I gather from your replies that you feel just the way I do. Nobody yet has devised a plan by which any such scheme could be put into effect. We have got to work with the materials we have. We are making progress because of the great work done in San Francisco by our distinguished colleagues here and others, and we do see the way ahead through this Atlantic Treaty as a supplementary step to bringing about the things we are praying for.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Thank you very much.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Austin, I just want to say, in connection with what you observed about the United Nations, that while the United Nations has not achieved all the things that we either expected or hoped for, I think it has made substantial progress and has achieved many worth while and useful things, and I think that the hope of the world is through the development and strengthening of the United Nations, rather than to junk it and run off after some other scheme that probably won't work half so well.

One of my chief observations about the use of the United Nations is that under it no member can pursue schemes and plans of conquest or an armed attack or subjugation without the whole world knowing it, because the Security Council and the United Nations can immediately air the whole thing before the whole world, and I feel that already what the United Nations has done in one or two instances has prevented that very thing from happening since the Charter was adopted.

I want to pay my respects to the United Nations. I regret the obstructions and the delays and the handicaps under which it has suffered, but that is no new experience. All of these things have to undergo that period of trial and error, and I want to congratulate you and the others associated with the United Nations on the things that have been accomplished rather than to criticize you for the things you have not accomplished.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, let me say that you have every reason to be gratified for the development that has been accomplished in the United Nations through your own distinguished service—

The CHAIRMAN. I thank you.

Ambassador AUSTIN. From the beginning to this moment.

The CHAIRMAN. I thank you, Senator.

Ambassador AUSTIN. And I expect to see it increase.

The CHAIRMAN. We congratulate you, and we thank you for your appearance.

The committee has here today Senator Watkins, of Utah, who has been invited by the committee to come before the committee. He desires to interrogate some of the witnesses, so, with your consent, we will turn over the questioning to Senator Watkins.

Senator WATKINS. I thank the Chairman, but Senator Donnell is my senior.

The CHAIRMAN. The reason I called on you was because Senator Donnell was here yesterday. It is agreeable to me that either one of you go on.

Senator DONNELL. We would like for both of us to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. We cannot hear but one of you at a time.

Senator DONNELL. We are not asking that. As the chairman well knows, both of us desire to have the privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. Whichever one of you wants to go on, go ahead.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Austin, I, too, want to compliment you on a very able presentation of at least a part of the case for the treaty. I cannot say I agree with it all. Many of the matters that you mentioned I am not sure about. I will admit my mind is somewhat in a state of confusion from what I see happening and what you have said. I probably am one of those who doesn't know exactly what the United Nations has done. I have been trying to read the newspapers faithfully—

Ambassador AUSTIN. Do you expect to get it all in the newspapers?

Senator WATKINS. I have had an experience recently that indicates that you don't get it all in the newspapers.

What I want to call to your attention are some of the statements that you have made and that have not been covered by the other examination. I do not want to go into the whole thing. Some of these questions may seem to be not so important, but I am calling them up because no one else probably has said very much about them.

PROGRESS IN THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE NEED FOR THE TREATY

One of the first ones is, I was very much impressed with what you said, that we are now witnessing in the United Nations the unity that is progressively making aggression and obstruction less attractive and less feasible. As I remember, you probably interpolated some other statement there about the number that would vote now and, outside of the few that voted with the Soviet Union, the voting was almost unanimous on the part of these other nations.

Now, this is the thing that bothers me. If the United Nations is making progress, and the group within it, except for the Soviet Union and its satellites, are working together more than they have ever done, and seem now to be working as a unit, why is it necessary now to formalize this unity when, as a matter of fact, they are already acting together without any formal agreement?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Well, you have drawn a conclusion that was not justified by what I said, and you have omitted a very important fact.

Senator WATKINS. I will be glad to get whatever it is. I do not want to misrepresent it.

THE SECURITY COUNCIL VETO AND THE NEED FOR THE TREATY

Ambassador AUSTIN. We have what is called the unanimity rule, under article 27 of the Charter, by which the five permanent members have to be included in the majority of seven in the Security Council, which has the primary responsibility for the maintenance of security and peace. And the point is that the Soviet Union, one of those five permanent members, has used the veto, as we call it, or has made it impossible for us to have unanimity, thirty different times.

Senator WATKINS. I am aware of that, and that was not what I was calling attention to.

Ambassador AUSTIN. There is the question of why it is necessary to have the North Atlantic Treaty. Don't you see it?

Senator WATKINS. What I am calling to your attention is the fact that you say these other nations, these western democracies, outside of Russia and her satellites, have been working together and are voting together in the Assembly, I take it. I know that in the Council only five nations are represented, and I understand that. But these other groups have been working together and voting together, and the point is, why can't they continue to work together without making some sort of a formal agreement to continue to work together, if the entire movement, as I get it from what you have said, has been toward a united working by these groups or these nations? Why couldn't that go on without formalizing it, putting it in the form of an alliance or a treaty? That is the thing that bothers me.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Why do you ask that question? Of course they can go on and continue to do it.

Senator WATKINS. Why is it necessary to put it in the form of a treaty if they can act?

Ambassador AUSTIN. You are mixing all these things up.

Senator WATKINS. I told you I was mixed up and wanted you to straighten me out.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SECURITY COUNCIL AND GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Ambassador AUSTIN. The majority votes I mentioned do not represent Security Council votes, but General Assembly votes. The General Assembly does not have charge of the subject of security and peace. Look at the Charter and you will see that the Security Council deals with that subject, primarily, and it is because the peace of the North Atlantic area is under the threat of aggression, the use of force, for territorial aggrandizement and overwhelming of the sovereignty of countries in the North Atlantic area; it is because the assault upon any one of them is an assault upon all of us, that we combine together here and say, "Now you remember, you make an attack, an armed attack, on one of us, and it will be deemed an armed attack on all of us."

Now, haven't you in mind the possibility that that will strengthen the United Nations? That will be a shield over the development economically and socially of the North Atlantic area.

Senator WATKINS. What I can't understand, Mr. Austin, is this: We have been acting now for a number of years, since the close of hostilities, together, and we have undertaken a program to put them on their feet economically without having any binding pact of any kind other than the United Nations, so I am wondering, if the union of thought and feeling and action is growing among this group that we are talking about now—I am not talking about the Security Council—and if that is all growing and getting stronger each day, why do we need to formalize it with a pact in order to get us to act together? We have been doing pretty well to the present time, haven't we? I don't mean in the Security Council; I mean among the nations that are going to be participants in this pact, the North Atlantic Pact.

SECURITY AND RECOVERY

Ambassador AUSTIN. You seem to assume that these 12 countries are what I was talking about when I talked about the gain in unanimity of 43 countries, sometimes 45, sometimes 49. That wasn't what I was talking about. Now stick to one subject at a time. Take this proposition of economic recovery of Europe. The point about it is that there is a fear gripping the souls of those people of Europe that has a tendency to paralyze their effort. How much initiative are you going to get out of a poor devil who sincerely believes that he is exposed to having an invading army come in and destroy the product of his labors and of his initiative? If you don't understand that the recovery of Europe is actually dependent on protection from that fear, then you don't understand this whole problem. Certainly you don't realize the importance of this Atlantic Treaty.

That is what this treaty is for. It is to give notice to those poor fellows who are under that fear that they have friends who are strong enough to protect them against that kind of an attack, and it is for the purpose of giving notice to those who threaten them; who have already, by either the threat or the use of force, taken over countries right next door to them. It is for that purpose that this treaty is put together. It is not for the other purpose in particular, although it does help it. That is what we say about this treaty, that it is a shield under the protection of which the economic recovery not only of Europe, but of all the world, can be sought.

NECESSITY FOR NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator WATKINS. As I get it, going back to what you said when you said we ought to stick to one subject, and that is what I want to stick to, why can't we go on as we are, with these nations acting as they are under the economic recovery program and the other things that the United States has done to indicate its support of these nations who have been living in fear? If we are growing more united all the time, why can't we do it without actually entering into some agreement and committing ourselves for some 20 years? That is the question that is bothering me. I don't think I am dodging it at all.

Ambassador AUSTIN. What you are doing is making an argument. You are not asking me a question. I could answer the question "Why?" very easily, but the real question—

Senator WATKINS. Give me the reasons why we can't go on. That is what I would like to know.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, well, I will repeat it for you as many times as you like.

The reason that we need a treaty of self-defense is that we need to stabilize the situation. We need to give those people courage. We need to increase their energy and their spirit in order to make use of this financial aid that we are giving, and other aid, too. That is why.

Senator WATKINS. I may say that I voted for the European recovery program, for the Greek-Turkish loan twice, and for the European recovery program twice, to do exactly what you say now ought to be done with the pact. I thought, and I think we were told, that those steps would do the very thing that you now say the pact is necessary to do. I thought that was going to give them the spirit and the hope and the faith to go on and take care of themselves. I think I can find plenty of speeches in the Congressional Record from my colleagues and many others in public life who took that point of view, and I have been wondering why these measures that we have been doing—you state we are becoming more united, and I think that is a fact. I think it is a fact that these western nations are becoming more united. Why do we need now to take this other step?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Have I answered your question twice?

Senator WATKINS. Maybe you have. If that is your best answer, all right; I will let it go at that.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is my best answer.

EFFECT OF LIMITATIONS ON ITALY UNDER THE TREATY OF PEACE

Senator WATKINS. Now I would like to come over to this question of Italy. As I understood you to say, and I agree with you, every nation has the inherent right of self-defense. And the justification, probably, or one of the justifications, for this pact would be in getting together in order to make stronger this right of self-defense, this inherent right of collective self-defense.

Now, with respect to Italy, how can Italy, under the treaty that Italy entered into with the United States and Russia and the other nations at the end of the war, increase its armament or increase its powers of self-defense and still keep the terms of that treaty?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I don't know. Do you?

Senator WATKINS. I am asking for information.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, no; that isn't it. If I understand questions, and I have sat in your seat, sir, 16 years, this is not solicitation of information from a witness. This is clearly using a witness to make an argument. Now, I would like to have, Mr. Chairman, questions that I can answer instead of being confronted here with arguments.

The CHAIRMAN. I will say to you, Senator, that you are acquainted with Senatorial procedures in committees and things of that kind. If you do not care to answer any question, you may say so.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, no; I will try my best. I have already.

The CHAIRMAN. You may decline whenever you like. It seems to me that the Senator from Utah in his questions has completely ignored those 30 vetoes in the Security Council which go to the very vitals of the organization of the United Nations. He suggests, "Why don't we just go on as we are going?" Of course, if we are just going on as we are going, we do not need to do anything. But I do not want to go on as we are going. I do not want to go on with one nation and its half a dozen satellites absolutely dominating action by its vetoes 30 times in the Security Council.

Senator WATKINS. May I call the attention of the witness to the fact that the treaty with Italy apparently limits the armament of Italy. I personally voted against the ratification of that treaty because I thought it infringed on the inherent right of self-defense of the Italian people, and I made a talk against the ratification on that ground, and I said that some day we would be sorry for it.

Now I am wondering, in keeping with the commitment, if we ratify this North Atlantic Pact and Italy becomes a party. It gives me some concern as to how we can justify ourselves in now adding to the armament that Italy was permitted to have under the treaty, and it is very limited. That is a legal question, and I know the distinguished member of our delegation to the United Nations is a lawyer, and a distinguished international lawyer, and I thought maybe he could give me some light on that question. I am not just doing it to argue with Senator Austin. I would really like to know how we can justify increasing the armament or putting up armament for Italy if we admit that we have such a treaty and in that treaty there are limitations to hold it down to certain obsolete equipment and a very small army and no navy and no air force, except some old bombers and a few observation planes and something of that sort.

Ambassador AUSTIN. You have not asked me whether we do justify it, nor have you asked me whether we have got to justify it. You have made an assumption, sir, that I have not testified to.

Are you a lawyer?

Senator WATKINS. I do not care to get into any argument with you, Mr. Austin.

The CHAIRMAN. I will volunteer the information that the Senator from Utah is a lawyer and he has been on the bench from his State.

Senator WATKINS. And I have asked many a lawyer the same question to explain his opinion and his judgment, and now you come here as an opinion witness, as I have understood, and I would like you to give me the benefit of your opinion.

Ambassador AUSTIN. If you will ask me a question, sir, you will get a response. It may not be an answer that you like.

Senator WATKINS. I quite often do not get the answers I want, but nevertheless I ask them.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Let me have one that is a question and not a speech.

Senator WATKINS. I submit I have asked a question; and, if you don't want to give me your opinion as to how we can justify that action, I will let it go at that.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Who says we have to justify it?

Senator WATKINS. Maybe we haven't. Maybe we can go ahead and violate treaties. Do you think it would be a violation of the treaty to increase the armament of Italy?

Ambassador AUSTIN. What treaty are you talking about?

Senator WATKINS. I thought I had made it clear: The treaty of peace between Italy and the other members of the United Nations, made at the conclusion of World War II, and it was ratified, as I remember, 2 years ago this spring.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Now, sir, I do not know what the provision in that treaty is with respect to the limitation of armament. But, if there is a limitation of armament in that treaty, it does not constitute a barrier to carrying out the provision in this treaty here with relation to self-help and mutual aid. Is that an answer?

Senator WATKINS. That is your answer?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I thought you would not like it.

Senator WATKINS. It does not give me very much information, I will admit, but if that is your answer we will let it go at that.

(The Department of State supplied further information on this point for the record as follows:)

It is understood by all parties to the treaty that the participation of Italy in the North Atlantic Pact had no effect on the military provisions, or any other provisions, of the Italian Peace Treaty. Any contribution which Italy makes to the collective capacity for defense of the North Atlantic area must be within the limits fixed by the military provisions of the Italian Peace Treaty.

Senator WATKINS. I have no further questions.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to finish, if I can, before lunch. Would you mind having Senator Donnell ask me his questions before lunch? The reason is that I have to be in New York this afternoon, if possible.

The CHAIRMAN. We will accommodate you, Senator.

Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. I want to say that I am very happy to see my friend, the distinguished Ambassador and former Senator, whom I have known for some years and regard most highly, here with us today.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Thank you very much. You go just as far as you like, too.

Senator DONNELL. I will try to go only within the limits. I think Senator Watkins, to my judgment, has observed the limits, too. I shall endeavor to present my questions to you as briefly and succinctly as I can.

THE TREATY IN RELATION TO REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

Mr. Ambassador, on page 3 of your testimony, near the bottom, occurs a quotation which I ask you now, is this an exact quotation from Mr. Gromyko?

The North Atlantic Pact cannot under any circumstances be called a regional arrangement because it comprises states located in two different continents—America and Europe. Thus these states are united not according to the regional principle.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I believe it is. I intended it to be.

Senator DONNELL. I assumed it was intended to be a correct statement of what Mr. Gromyko said.

Then I want to ask the meaning of this next sentence, your own sentence:

This claim that the treaty is in conflict with the Charter, because it does not create an arrangement according to the regional principle, is without probity.

Would you be kind enough to tell us, am I correct in understanding, if I may put it in that form, that that is an incorrect statement, and not founded on truth?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, no.

Senator DONNELL. What is it that you mean?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I use "probity" in the common, ordinary acceptance of that word to lawyers, as something that proves something.

Senator DONNELL. I beg your pardon. All right, sir.

Do you, Mr. Ambassador, understand, or assert, that the North Atlantic Treaty is, to use the language of Mr. Gromyko, a regional arrangement?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Not in the full sense of the Charter of the United Nations. You see, you can regard it as regional in some of its functions. It is evidently not designed under chapter VIII, but designed as it is, under article 51, it is described in the record this way. This is the hearings on July 9 to 13, 1945, in this same committee. Mr. Pasvolksky said:

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conjunction with the provisions of this chapter, I would like to say a word about article 51 of the preceding chapter. That is the self-defense article which states that nothing in this Charter shall impair the inherent right of self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations until the Security Council has taken all measures necessary.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think you left out three very important words: "individual or collective" self-defense.

Mr. PASVOLSKY. I am just coming to that.

Senator VANDENBERG. All right.

Mr. PASVOLSKY. I wanted to say that the right of self-defense is defined as individual or collective.

Senator VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. PASVOLSKY. That word "collective" relates in part to the regional arrangements I have just described, but it relates also to any group action that may be taken for purposes of self-defense.

That same thought, you will find, I am confident, at the pages that I have stated in my written statement there, expressed by Mr. Stettinius and by John Foster Dulles.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ambassador, I wanted to ask you this question: You next say in your statement, and perhaps I should read this sentence:

This claim that the treaty is in conflict with the Charter because it does not create an arrangement according to the regional principle is without probity: First—and I am quoting from you now—

It does create an arrangement according to the regional principle. History shows that the Atlantic Ocean is a bridge linking America and Europe. Second, even if the treaty did not do so, it creates a group for collective defense under article 51 of the Charter.

Then, on the next page, is this further sentence to which I direct your attention. You say:

It is not necessary to define the organization of the North Atlantic community as exclusively a regional arrangement, or as exclusively a group for collective self-defense, since activities under both article 51 and chapter VIII are comprehended in the treaty.

I take it that that is your opinion?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is my opinion.

Senator DONNELL. And chapter VIII is the one which contains article 52?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. And chapter VIII is entitled "Regional Arrangements" and contains, as I have indicated, article 52, and also articles 53 and 54. That is correct; is it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is right.

KEEPING THE SECURITY COUNCIL INFORMED OF ACTIVITIES UNDER THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Ambassador, article 54, I observe—and this is the question I want to ask you—reads:

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Does it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. I understand your statement—and am I correct in this?—to say that activities under chapter VIII, that is to say article 52 and these other two articles, 53 and 54, are comprehended in the North Atlantic Treaty.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is my opinion.

Senator DONNELL. The Security Council includes within its membership, as among its permanent members, Russia; does it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, yes.

Senator DONNELL. So that in the provisions of article 54, am I correct in understanding that the Security Council as an entirety, including every member, both Russia and the others, shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security?

Ambassador AUSTIN. First you have to have a premise for it; that is, an activity. Understand, I make this distinction clear in my statement, I think. I do not regard this treaty as making a regional arrangement, fully panoplied regional arrangement. I have said so time and time again, and I do not think it does, but it comprehends some activities that may get in there, and when you try those activities then you come under the restrictions in chapter VIII. Thus, the parties will consult together whenever in the opinion of any of them the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the parties is threatened. I don't know that it will ever happen, but if it should happen and this group of 12 countries here, under the North Atlantic Treaty, undertook to do any business in that field, don't you see, they would have to tell about it.

But the implied question—I don't think I have the full question—that they would have to report everything I would have to answer “no”; they wouldn't have to.

GEOGRAPHIC BASIS OF NORTH ATLANTIC AREA

Senator DONNELL. Simply in view of your statement in what you have given us today that the treaty “does not create an arrangement according to the regional principle”—

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is on geography; that meets the geographical question.

Senator DONNELL. I understood you to say, however, earlier this morning, that geography is not the only thing to be considered in determining whether a region exists; that cultural and other such things may be taken into consideration in determining that.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Let's stick to the question. Here is the situation. In the text you will see that I am answering Mr. Gromyko. Mr. Gromyko says it cannot under any circumstances be called a regional arrangement because it comprises states located in two different continents—America and Europe. And he says, “Thus” (because of that) “these states are united not according to the regional principle.”

My answer is limited to that. I am saying that the Atlantic unites them, and history shows that the Atlantic is a bridge linking America and Europe and the including of them is therefore within that regional principle. It relates to that, that answer does.

REGIONALISM AND COLLECTIVE SECURITY

Senator DONNELL. Now, Senator, it is true, however, is it not, according to your statement which you have given the committee this morning, and I quote, that “Activities under both article 51 and chapter VIII are comprehended in this treaty”? That is correct; is it not?

Ambassador AUSTIN. They may be.

Senator DONNELL. You say they are.

Ambassador AUSTIN. My position is that the treaty is broad enough so that certain activities would come in there. Now, when they come in—I know what you are driving at. I am very familiar with what you are driving at. Let's get right down to it.

Senator DONNELL. That is just what I would like to do, and have you give me your view.

Ambassador AUSTIN. The question is, What information are you bound to give up under article 54?

Senator DONNELL. If I may just state the question I have in mind succinctly, I would like to have your answer. My statement is based on the fact that you have said first, and I quote exactly, that the treaty does create an arrangement according to the regional principle, and second that you state that activities under both article 51 and chapter VIII are comprehended in the Treaty.

Now I ask you, Mr. Ambassador, what type of activities which will be carried out under the Atlantic Treaty, and comprehended in the treaty, will have to be reported by the participants in the treaty to the Security Council, of which Russia is a permanent member? That is my question.

Ambassador AUSTIN. In the first place, take the prior object of the treaty, self-defense. It is self-defense; is it not? It is security. We aim for security and protection against armed aggression. Isn't that the No. 1 thing?

Senator DONNELL. I would assume so.

REPORTING TO THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Ambassador AUSTIN. All right. If that is it, then what do we report? We are not in that objective of the treaty which functions under chapter VIII at all; are we? We are in article 51, and under that article, even, we have to do some reporting. And we say that under article 51 we have to report to the Security Council after this attack has commenced what we are doing about it, and I am for a very liberal interpretation about reporting, don't you see? And my theory about this is that there isn't anything in this treaty that calls for an unreasonable interpretation. There isn't anything in the North Atlantic Treaty that calls for a change-over from the practice that has been found necessary on this subject of self-defense and security. And this does not mean and the Charter does not mean that we have got to violate security by turning over to the enemy secret information. Such an interpretation would be absolutely absurd. We are governed by this theory of self-help and mutual aid.

Now, then, can this reasonably be interpreted that we turn over to the Security Council at any time, under any pretext, information that would convert and reverse this into self-injury and mutual damage? No. That would be a very unreasonable interpretation. Even the most liberal interpretation of what you ought to do as a regional group here for self-defense will not admit of that, because that would destroy the whole theory of self-defense. I would give it a very liberal interpretation, because I am under the firm conviction that this treaty, if carried out according to its spirit and letter and according to the Charter of the United Nations, will have to be operated through the United Nations. The moment that it steps out into this field, the nonsecurity field, which it might occupy as I have said here, then its functions would fall under chapter VIII, and it has to do business through the United Nations. But what it has to turn over for the information is qualified by what is reasonable.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Senator, I appreciate your answer, and I understand it to mean, and perhaps I am making it too simple, that you say that it would obviously not devolve upon the participants to the treaty to turn over to our enemy matters which are essential to our own defense under the treaty.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. I wanted to ask you affirmatively, however, inasmuch as you say in your statement that activities under chapter VIII, which includes article 52, are comprehended in the treaty, what type of activities you think, under article 54 of the United Nations Charter, are required to be communicated to the Security Council, of which one of the permanent members is Russia?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I think no man can predict what will happen under this treaty, and I can't. I see clearly from my point of view as a representative of the United States in the United Nations, and therefore representing one of the important signatories to this treaty here, that there could arise a situation under which article 4 would come into operation and the parties would have to consult.

Senator DONNELL. Might it not arise also under article 2, in which there is a requirement of the endeavor to eliminate conflict in international economic policies?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I doubt it. I doubt it. I think that comes under another part of the Charter of the United Nations. I don't think it falls into chapter VIII. You see, I believe that this part of it, Senator Donnell, is strengthening of the United Nations Charter, consciously strengthening that part of the Charter that deals with the removal of causes of war, poverty, ill health, economic warfare, ignorance, bad housing, crowded conditions, and all those things. I believe article 2 is an affirmation by this group that it is for those things affirmatively, and that the only way in the world for them to be effective in carrying out that affirmation is to do it through the United Nations.

BASIS FOR NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY IN THE UN CHARTER

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ambassador, may I ask you, do you think the North Atlantic Treaty is based in part on article 52 of the Charter, and also on article 51?

Ambassador AUSTIN. No; oh, no. I am afraid I have not been clear.

Senator DONNELL. Would you tell us just what your view is with regard to that?

Ambassador AUSTIN. I will give you my opinion, based on my personal knowledge of the origin of 51, of its current interpretation—meaning there at San Francisco—its use, its application covering four different things, namely the inter-American system of collective security, as embodied in the Act of Chapultepec, 1945; the pact of the League of Arab States of March 22, 1945; the treaty of alliance between the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom of May 26, 1942; and the treaty of alliance and mutual assistance between the Soviet Union and France of December 10, 1944. From all these things it is clear to my mind that the foundation of this treaty, the very essence of this movement among the 12 states here, having bridgeheads on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean, is article 51, and no other article.

Senator DONNELL. Do you mind, Mr. Ambassador, if I ask you at that point, then, what is it that you mean by saying that the treaty does create an arrangement according to the regional principle, and I am quoting exactly from your statement this morning?

Ambassador AUSTIN. That means that it answers the charge that because some of these members in this group are on one side of the Atlantic and some on the other, and in different continents, therefore it is in violation of the Charter. I say that that is a fallacy of logic, and a fallacy of fact.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ambassador, I am mindful of the time.

Ambassador AUSTIN. You go just as far as you like.

Senator DONNELL. I do not want to interfere with your arrangements or those of the committee.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I would go without my lunch to talk with you any time.

By the way, I want you to know that I have followed your argument and been very interested in it, and I know what a wonderful logician you are.

Senator DONNELL. That is very kind of you, Mr. Ambassador. I greatly appreciate the compliment, coming from you, whom I know so well.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I tell you what: I think you ought to change your position, that's all.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Ambassador, I don't want to fall into any error of making an argument, and I shall not do so if I can prevent it.

Senator Pepper, of this Foreign Relations Committee, made a statement in the course of the debate that I would like to present to you and ask you what your opinion is of his statement.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Please don't do that.

Senator DONNELL. Would you mind if I do that?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, don't do that. I don't like to express an opinion about a Senator's statement.

Senator DONNELL. May I state the point that is involved?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes; that is all right.

INTENT BEHIND ARTICLE 51 AT SAN FRANCISCO

Senator DONNELL. The point, as I understand it, that Senator Pepper made, and I will make it now to present to you as a point, apart from himself, was that it was never intended that article 51 should justify states in getting together and forming a military alliance, entering into a general agreement about concerted action in the common interest or against the common enemy, and to standardize the military equipment and provide for joint supply of their armed forces; that in the second place article 51, and I am speaking now of the United Nations Charter, was intended to give authority for something like a spontaneous and instantaneous resistance to an armed attack on the part of an individual state or collective states, et cetera, and the language to which I call your attention in respect to this question in the Charter is that—

To boil that question down a little bit, if I may, the point I am presenting to you is, Do you think there is any merit in the view that article 51 of the United Nations Charter was not intended to cover a general future arrangement or agreement, no matter what you may call it, between parties, but was designed to cover the situation solely "if an armed attack occurs"; a temporary situation as distinguished from a more or less permanent arrangement? Do I make my point clear?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Oh, yes; that is a very fine question.

Senator DONNELL. I cannot claim credit for it.

Ambassador AUSTIN. At first I thought your question was aimed at the future element in it, but it is not. Your question, as I understand it, is aimed at the element of the permanency of the organization.

Senator DONNELL. That is correct. I think we understand one another. It is aimed at the question as to whether article 51, in referring to a situation "if an armed attack occurs," since "nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs," means that there is a limitation to a situation where an armed attack occurs, and then you can all get together to defend, or, on the contrary, does article 51 authorize you to make a future arrangement in contemplation of all future possible attacks?

Ambassador AUSTIN. Now I know I understood you. Your question seems to me to be this: Does that article do this, or is there something else that does it, and my answer is that that article just says "Nothing in this Charter shall interfere with it." Don't you see?

Senator DONNELL. Yes.

INHERENT RIGHT OF SELF-DEFENSE

Ambassador AUSTIN. As I said before, article 51 doesn't grant any powers. Article 51 brushes aside anything in conflict herewith. That is what it does. It is a tremendous big thing. But the real foundation of this agreement and other like it is the inherent right of self-defense. Do you see?

Now, that exists without this treaty. It exists without this Charter. Every State has that right of self-defense, and it is sees fit to join up with a friend that is willing to join and it make them both stronger and their interests are mutual, then it can go ahead and do that, and that is what these men did. And since some of them were members of the United Nations, they had to put into it article 51. Don't you see?

Then there was an interpretation made of article 51 in another way, don't you see? The Latins, of course, who were very greatly interested in it, came along and said, "Not only does it do that; not only does it permit this organization by states on the basis of their international rights," but one of the most brilliant of these men, Lleras Camargo, said this, if you will permit me to read it.

Senator DONNELL. I would like to have you do it if the committee is agreeable.

INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 51

Ambassador AUSTIN. This statement was made on May 23, 1945, in that committee meeting, committee III/4, which approved the text of article 51. This purports to be a quote from Lleras Camargo, of Colombia:

The Latin-American countries understood, as Senator Vandenberg had said, that the origin of the term "collective self-defense" is identified with the necessity of preserving regional systems like the Inter-American one. The Charter, in general terms, is a constitution, and it legitimizes the right of collective self-defense to be carried out in accord with the regional pacts so long as they are not opposed to the purposes and principles of the organization as expressed in the Charter. If a group of countries with regional ties declare their solidarity for their mutual defense, as in the case of American states, they will undertake such defense jointly if and when one of them is attacked. And the right of defense is not limited to the country which is the direct victim of aggression but extends to those countries which have established solidarity, through regional arrangements, with the country directly attacked. This is the typical case of the American system.

The Act of Chapultepec provides for the collective defense of the hemisphere and establishes that if an American nation is attacked all the rest consider themselves attacked. Consequently such action as they may take to repel aggression, authorized by the article which was discussed in subcommittee yesterday, is authorized for all of them. Such action would be in accord with the Charter, by the approval of the article and a regional arrangement may take action, provided it does not have improper purposes, as, for example, joint aggression against another state.

From this, it may be deduced that the approval of this Article implies that the Act of Chapultepec is not in contravention of the Charter.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you, Mr. Ambassador.

There is just one final point, very briefly, that, with the permission of the committee, I should like to ask the Ambassador, if he will be so kind as to likewise be patient with me if I ask him.

It relates to this: Senator Vandenberg, with his eloquence and clarity of thought, presented to you this morning the point that this treaty is not only not a military alliance but that it is the opposite of it.

Ambassador AUSTIN. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. I am not entirely able to follow the reasoning that the Senator had in that respect.

Senator VANDENBERG. You mean there wasn't that much clarity?

Senator DONNELL. It was because of my own density, I have no doubt, sir. But in the course of his presentation I understood him to use the words, in substance, or the expression, in substance, that these measures that had been taken by the participants in this treaty in the event of an armed attack will continue only so long as the Security Council has failed to take action, and I think I recall the word "emergency" having crept in also into the course of the statement.

INABILITY OF SECURITY COUNCIL TO ACT

Now, the point to which I ask you to direct your attention, and on which I ask your opinion, is this: Assuming that there should be an attack made upon Norway by Russia, and that the parties to this pact take prompt action forthwith, as it says in article 5, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area, notwithstanding, Mr. Ambassador, the provision in article 5 that those measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security, how long do you think it would be before the Security Council, which contains among its permanent members Russia, would take the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security?

Perhaps I faultily stated the question.

Ambassador AUSTIN. No; you have a good question. I understand it. It is all right. It is a compact question.

Well, you are asking an opinion, and I am going to give you one.

Senator DONNELL. I would like to have it.

Ambassador AUSTIN. I don't know as it is worth a cent, but I think it will be forever and ever, see? I think that they will veto, of course. That is a perfectly natural thing.

Senator DONNELL. That is a very frank and clear statement, and I thoroughly agree with you, and I don't think that this situation of a temporary emergency that would be dissipated by some action of the Security Council next week will be taken. I want to thank you, Mr. Ambassador.

Senator VANDENBERG. May I just intervene, inasmuch as my quotation is involved? I agree with the answer too, and I think one of the supreme virtues of this arrangement is that you can act in self-defense inside the Charter and outside the veto. That is what I like about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the veto does not apply to an inherent right that exists by reason of international law and custom over and above the provisions of the Charter and above the provisions of the pending treaty. Is that true?

COMPARISON OF TREATY TO MILITARY ALLIANCE

Senator DONNELL. Might I have leave, in view of the interpolation by my good friend Senator Vandenberg, to state on the point of whether or not this is the opposite of a military alliance—that I am not clear on the point that an instrument which contains within it a contract to use effective self-help and mutual aid in maintaining and developing individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack, which contains within it also an agreement that an armed attack against one of them shall be considered an attack against them all, and which contains the further agreement that each of them agrees that forthwith, upon such an attack being made, each party, individually and in concert with the others, will take such action as it deems necessary, and so forth, as set forth in article 5—I just can't see where Senator Vandenberg makes the point that that is not a military alliance. I just wanted to make that statement on that, so I might not in any sense be thought to have been convinced by the very eloquent and clear and expressive statement made by Senator Vandenberg.

Senator VANDENBERG. I would just like to add this postscript, that I suspect this question will be debated at some length on the floor of the Senate, when I personally will be quite happy and prepared to meet it.

I simply add this postscript at the moment, that in my opinion the traditional interpretation of the phrase "military alliance" carries within it an offensive rather than an essentially defensive overriding objective, and that it is a partnership for power rather than a partnership for peace—in the traditional sense, I am saying. I do not think that any of those characteristics is involved here, and that is the great distinction that I draw.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. To answer the Senator from Missouri, the reading also of Mr. Acheson's statement yesterday, I believe it was, when that particular question was directed to him, to distinguish between this sort of an arrangement and the traditional military alliance as practiced in former years, is recommended.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I shall certainly read that with care, and I am very happy to have the suggestion.

BALANCE OF POWER AND PREPONDERANCE OF POWER

May I just conclude by mentioning to Mr. Ambassador the fact that I have noted with interest particularly the fact that he points out in page 6 of his statement, "The ancient theory of balance of power lost its potential utility," and then points out that the undertaking of the peoples of the United Nations, et cetera, to combine their efforts introduced formally the element of preponderance of power for peace. That is in there.

But the point I am making is that the distinguished Ambassador, for whose judgment and character I have the greatest of admiration, points out that now the traditional idea of balance of power has been superseded by the preponderance of power idea; in other words this treaty, as I understand it, is to create not merely a balance of power, but a preponderance of power.

Ambassador AUSTIN. That is right. I meant exactly that.

Now, some people have talked with me about this, and you can imagine I have not taken that position without very great care.

Senator DONNELL. I know you haven't. I am very sure of it.

Ambassador AUSTIN. And I have talked with very learned men and got their views. I have had lots of help on that.

Some people interpret balance of power as the same thing as preponderance of power, but it is not. The traditional meaning of balance of power was equilibrium. The balance was kept level by means of two or more states, don't you see, usually more. But the strange thing is that in all the history of balance of power they never did have a balance. There always was a preponderance in some state, and in my years, the years I remember, it has been the United Kingdom, because of their control of the seas.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, may I thank not only the distinguished Ambassador for his very great patience and courtesy, but also the committee for permitting me to infringe upon their patience.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope the Senator is satisfied with the action of the committee.

Senator DONNELL. I appreciate the action of the committee very much indeed, and I shall desire to avail myself, if I may, of future incursions of like character.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you, Senator Austin, for your very fine statement. We appreciate your presence.

The committee will be in recess until 2:30 o'clock, when we will reconvene to hear Secretary of Defense Johnson.

(Whereupon, at 1:25 p. m., the committee recessed until 2:30 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

The committee reconvened at 2:30 p. m., upon the expiration of the recess.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

The committee has the pleasure of having before it today Secretary of Defense Johnson who will testify on the North Atlantic treaty and related matters.

STATEMENT OF HON. LOUIS JOHNSON, SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Secretary JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I am appearing here today at the invitation of your committee to add the views of the National Military Establishment to what Secretary Acheson has told you about the North Atlantic Treaty.

As you know, I have been in office only about 1 month and there have been many serious problems to face. I have had an opportunity, however, to study this momentous document. I say it is momentous with feeling, because it is a long stride in the peacetime path of American history. It is a bold and important step for us all, for in it we join our great power with that of our neighbors in a common effort for safety and self-preservation—for peace before victory, and without war.

INITIATIVE AND RESPONSIBILITY OF STATE DEPARTMENT

The Secretary of State has outlined to you the progress the Government is making in what he calls "waging the peace." He has demonstrated that the North Atlantic Treaty and the military assistance program are components of our progressive foreign policy. The initiative and responsibility for both have clearly and properly been with the Secretary of State. This great structure of freedom has been built through months of careful and precise work by Secretary Acheson and his foreign colleagues. He and his staff took over this heavy burden where General Marshall and Mr. Lovett left off and were aided by the cooperation of this committee. I think that all who have worked on this treaty are deserving of the highest gratitude of this country.

ECONOMIC STABILITY AND PREPAREDNESS

There has been very close cooperation on these matters between the Department of State and the Military Establishment, for all of us are seeking the greatest security for our country. In striving for this objective, however, we must carefully balance the military requirements of coping with the dangers we now face with the maintenance of a sound and prosperous American economy. At the same time we must give first priority to restoration of economic stability in Europe while assisting her to regain greater military security. All of these calculations involve risks, but our willingness to face them may well measure our ability to prevent war. We must face them squarely and courageously.

It is absolutely clear to me, as it was between 1937 and 1940 when I was last in the Military Establishment, that we must be prepared to counter foreseeable threats. This requires preparedness not only in terms of guns, ships, and airplanes, but in terms of readily convertible resources of manpower and industry. It is equally obvious that we need friends and partners. Through this treaty we band together with many of our friends and by the military assistance program we put the means in their hands to defend themselves, thereby increasing our own security.

Ambassador Austin has explained to you the importance of this treaty to the United Nations, how it is consistent with the UN Charter and serves as a strong brace in support of the peaceful objectives of the Charter. It is and has long been my belief that we must continue earnestly and faithfully our efforts to make the United Nations succeed. What he has said confirms my belief that the ability of the western nations to work for peace through the United Nations will be strengthened.

THE TREATY—NOT A MILITARY ALLIANCE

I expect that sometime during the congressional consideration of these matters that someone will say that I have been inconsistent in my attitude toward treaties of this character. They will probably refer to a speech I made a year ago to the Daughters of the American Revolution. At that time I stated, and I quote:

Military alliances are not in the tradition of the United States.

As Secretary Acheson has carefully pointed out, this treaty is an association of nations that have come together under the Charter of the United Nations to exercise their inherent right of self-defense through a collective security arrangement authorized by the Charter of the United Nations.

This treaty, like the Rio Treaty, is thus a vital measure for self-defense. Neither of them, in my opinion, is a foreign military alliance in the customary sense, and therefore my remarks in the speech I referred to do not thus apply. These treaties are logical extensions of the time-honored Monroe Doctrine, and entirely consistent with our policy of seeking international security through the United Nations.

When I made that speech, I was referring to the Brussels Pact, the signatories of which had held their first meeting only 3 days before. At that time I considered it to be a purely western European military alliance. But, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I was then a private citizen, and properly did not have access to information regarding implementation of that pact which has since been made available to the entire world.

The North Atlantic Treaty is of much wider scope and involves a broad area in which the very preservation of the United States is at stake. It is a partnership with our friends for the common defense.

In that speech I also said, and I quote:

We cannot give to any foreign nation or group of nations the power to say when the United States should go to war.

I can assure you that I continue to believe this. It seems clear to me from a reading of article 5 that in this treaty we do not give to any foreign nation or group of nations the power to say when the United States should go to war. We obligate ourselves to take whatever action we deem necessary "to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area."

Now, as Secretary of Defense, I want to tell you how important this treaty is from the point of view of the Military Establishment. I understand that you have invited General Bradley to testify before your committee next week. He will give you more detailed information about the meaning of the treaty to our armed forces.

STRENGTHENING OF UNITED STATES SECURITY THROUGH TREATY

From the military viewpoint, the basic objectives of the collective defense system contemplated by the treaty are to deter war and to attain maximum military effectiveness in war, if war cannot be prevented. The North Atlantic Treaty will form a basis for improving United States security by improving the military potential of all the member nations. This potential will be improved in terms of collective action as well as individual armed strength.

I am sure that its value as a war deterrent and, in the last resort, in war itself must be obvious to you all. Nevertheless, it is our firm belief in the Military Establishment that the ratification of the treaty cannot, in itself and without further action, safely be relied upon to accomplish the objectives of the treaty. Unless its terms are vigorously implemented, its force for peace will be vitiated and, if there should be war, we should have to pay an inordinate price for our failure to implement it.

NEED FOR MILITARY ASSISTANCE

We must keep constantly in mind the three fundamentals of preparedness—manpower, materials, and suitable positions from which to employ them in the event of attack. The treaty goes far toward making available for the common defense the manpower and strategic positions. The main lack in this great partnership will be materials—the materials required for defense. Some of the required materials may become available over the next few years as byproducts of economic recovery and we must assure uninterrupted effort toward attainment of the goals set by the Marshall plan.

If we are to strengthen the line of defense in Europe and elsewhere, we must go further and supply our friends with some of their deficiencies in arms and equipment and help them to help themselves. We have invested a great deal in rebuilding the western community and now we should join these friendly neighbors in building a bulwark against aggression.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE

There has been some talk lately of the possibility that by joining the treaty we can reduce the investment in our Military Establishment. It is confidently hoped that over the next few years we will enhance our security by joining this partnership for peace. However, I am sure it is clear to you that until the world situation clarifies we cannot afford to relax the strengthening of our military forces. We may, over the long term after the strength of our partnership is built up, be able to reduce our annual expenditures for the armed forces. However, until the danger that confronts us subsides and an efficiently operating, coordinated defense system is established under this treaty, we of America cannot afford to reduce our investment in preparedness.

In passing, I want to tell you that Mr. Forrestal planned to appear before your committee to lend his strong support to favorable action on this treaty. You will recall from his annual report that he considered greater solidarity with our neighbors in the Atlantic area and military aid to western Europe as matters of highest priority to the Military Establishment. With that thought I concur.

And there, for a moment, Mr. Chairman, may I digress to say that it is with the greatest pleasure I say to you that at Mr. Forrestal's invitation I visited him for about 35 minutes in his room at the hospital the first of this week, and I found him like his own self, in good health. The doctors expect him to leave in 2 or 3 weeks. He will take some rest; he will be a completely restored and able man. I am glad to tell you that.

BENEFITS TO THE UNITED STATES FROM THE TREATY

To resume: On the assumption that the pact becomes, as intended, a force to discourage war and a basis for improving the military potential of its member nations in the event of war, I believe that we shall get, in return for joining the pact, a greatly improved prospect for the maintenance of the security of the United States and the world. We will get it, in my opinion, through an improved sense of security and stability abroad under which the moral, economic and military strength of our friends can be rebuilt.

We will feel a greater assurance that friendly governments will not fall to fifth columns. We will see a growing nucleus of defensive military force on which to base our own strategy in the event of war. Furthermore, it is to be expected that our actual strategic position will be improved, in that we shall be much better able to make effective use of our armed strength, if the necessity arises, as a result of the mutual aid we will get from our partners under article 3 of the treaty.

The Military Establishment certainly does not want war. We are striving for peace and security with honor. The North Atlantic Treaty, in our opinion, is an instrument for such peace and security. We believe, in the National Military Establishment, that ratification of the treaty is essential to the future security of the United States as well as to the peace and freedom of very important areas of the world.

THE MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, I will ask you a few questions, and then turn you over to the questions of the committee.

It is contemplated, is it not, at a later date, after the ratification of the treaty, that such plans as may be in the making for military aid to Europe, will be laid before the Congress in the form of a bill or some other appropriate action?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir; and much intensive work by our most competent men is being done, so that when the hour arrives, under the State Department's leadership we shall submit the data to this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I understood from your main statement that General Bradley, as our Chief of Staff and our chief military officer, would give us a good many more details than you have been able to give us; is that correct?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir. On those details, sir, you are entitled to the highest and best authority, the most qualified men we have. I therefore, as has been my custom, put it up to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and General Bradley will be here at such time as you indicate.

TREATY AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM DO NOT LESSEN NEED FOR MAINTAINING UNITED STATES MILITARY STRENGTH

The CHAIRMAN. I want to stress one point that you made, and that is that the ratification of this treaty and the adoption of a military plan for western Europe does not in any wise lessen the necessity for us to maintain our own military strength here in the United States.

Secretary JOHNSON. Until such time as, in the western union, or in the area of this pact, there is there constituted such military strength as can be substantially relied upon, there can be no lessening of our own burden of keeping up sufficient military strength in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. I was speaking of the present. Those are desirable ends that you mention, but for the present, in our present situation, Congress is going to be faced with the problem of the size of our military budget and all those things.

The point that I want to bring out is that regardless of this treaty we still will have the obligation to the people of the United States to provide for their proper defense.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Through the Army, the Air Force, and all the other auxiliary branches. Is that not true?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir. I agree with you.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume from your statement that it is our ultimate hope that by doing what this treaty provides, and following it with military assistance to western Europe, we may decrease that necessity in the course of years, as it goes along.

Secretary JOHNSON. I agree.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chiefs of Staff, I assume, are working on this military program now, are they? Or have they finished it?

Secretary JOHNSON. They have not finished it. Among other pressing things they are working on this, and the joint staff, working under the Joint Chiefs, is giving elaborate attention to this.

COMPARISON OF TREATY TO OLD MILITARY ALLIANCES

The CHAIRMAN. With regard to your speech where you quoted on the subject of military alliance, is there not a wide divergence from this treaty and what was traditionally known as military alliances?

Secretary JOHNSON. In the first draft that I intended to give you, the reference to my speech was left out—the speech is very vivid in my mind—so that it might not later be misconstrued. It seemed to me advisable not to explain it away but just to say what was in the speech and what it meant, and that it is not inconsistent with what I am saying here today.

The CHAIRMAN. My conception of the military alliances in the traditional history of the United States and other countries is an alliance not limited to self-defense. It is an alliance not along that line at all, but those alliances of which we speak were joint alliances, both for defensive and aggressive action.

If one of the parties should in any event go to war, then the others were forced to go to war; is that not true?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir. That is what I was then talking about, as distinguished from what we have here today, which I now support.

The CHAIRMAN. To my mind and memory, the World War I was a classic illustration of that. They had the Triple Entente, and on the other side they had another group, the Central Powers, and when the Central Powers declared war, or went into war, they demanded that Italy should join them because Italy was a party to their military alliance. But Italy did not join them. She did not agree to go along. That is a classic example of where they, when they declared war, expected Italy to join them, not because Italy was in danger, not because she was attacked, but because they were in a state of war and Italy was a member of the alliance—it was thought she should automatically come into the war.

Secretary JOHNSON. Thank you, sir, for the additional explanation, which shows that what I said then is not in conflict with what I said today.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all. As a matter of fact, this treaty is not a general military alliance in any sense. It is limited to defense against armed attack.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the very opposite of the military alliance.

Senator TYDINGS. Defensive entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. Defensive entirely. It is an alliance of peace, if you want to call it an alliance.

Secretary JOHNSON. I like your language.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an alliance against armed attack, it is an alliance against war, and does not partake of the essentials of the primary obligations of a military alliance as we know military alliances at all; is that true?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

BENEFITS TO THE UNITED STATES FROM THE TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I think I will defer to the other members of the committee who are more competent to discuss this particular phase of the matter. I want only to call the Secretary's attention to a sentence on page 5 of his statement, in which he says, with my complete concurrence:

I believe that we shall get, in return for joining the pact, a greatly improved prospect for the maintenance of the security of the United States and the world.

If I correctly judge the temper of the Secretary's able statement he would not object to the addition of one more phrase to that sentence, so it will read as follows:

I believe that we shall get, in return for joining the pact, a greatly improved prospect for the maintenance of the security of the United States and the world, without the necessity of actually using this armed force.

Secretary JOHNSON. I agree to that, sir. That is implied. You put it expressly, and I thank you for it.

Senator VANDENBERG. I pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Tydings, chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate.

Senator TYDINGS. I would like to say at this time that my army, navy and air force, consisting of the Republican and Democratic members of the Armed Services Committee, feel that they are being bypassed when the security of the United States, with which they are particularly charged, is being considered by the Foreign Relations Committee exclusively. I would like the record to show that, because they have served notice on me in no uncertain terms that I am lying down on the job.

Senator McMAHON. A protest will be filed.

COLLECTIVE APPROACH TO SELF-DEFENSE

Senator TYDINGS. We would like to first have you look at page 1, Secretary Johnson. You say if "we join our great power with that of our neighbors in a common effort for safety and self-preservation"—that is what this North Atlantic Security Pact will actually do, will it not?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. So that we are no longer going to proceed on the concept that we are planning for our defense without regard to other nations. Heretofore I take it that we have planned for our defense without regard to any alliance or agreement in writing, or any formal statement or program that connected our defense with that of any other nation.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. So this will be somewhat of a departure.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. We will no longer rely entirely upon ourselves in certain categories, but we have given our word and other nations have given their words to us, that it will be a joint effort to keep the peace of the world, and for the mutual defense, including our own, of the parties that are signatory to the pact.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is correct, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. This has been called, over and over again, an agreement for defense, is that not correct?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, on page 2, you used this language:

In striving for this objective, however, we must carefully balance the military requirements of coping with the dangers we now face with the maintenance of a sound and prosperous American economy.

I take it, too, from what your statement expressly sets forth, we have to likewise balance our own military requirements and our military actions with the military requirements and military actions of the other nations that are parties to the North Atlantic Security Pact.

Secretary JOHNSON. If approved by Congress, that will be done.
Senator TYDINGS. But that would be the concept in the approach?
Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

INDUSTRIAL POTENTIALS AND PREPAREDNESS

Senator TYDINGS. Later on, on the same page, you say:

This requires preparedness not only in terms of guns, ships, and airplanes, but in terms of readily convertible resources of manpower and industry.

Would you give me a little more of an explanation of what you conveyed by that thought?

Secretary JOHNSON. I mean to convey that if this is authorized, that it is not alone the number of guns, ships, and airplanes, but particularly as to industry. The maintenance of what they want to do in their country will vary in the different countries according to the industrial resources and ability of that particular country, and that factors such as that will be taken into consideration in working out our assistance when authorized by Congress.

STRENGTHENING UNITED STATES NATIONAL SECURITY

Through this treaty we band together with many of our friends and by the military assistance program we put the means in their hands to defend themselves, thereby increasing our own security.

So that the purpose of this program is basically to increase our own security first, and to do that we find it necessary to increase the security of those who are associated with us.

Secretary JOHNSON. Beautifully expressed.

Senator TYDINGS. Do you agree?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. But the core of it is our own national security?

Secretary JOHNSON. All the way through.

Senator TYDINGS. And our thoughts and our motivation, as from the hub of a wheel, all radiate from that point in encompassing the whole North Atlantic Security Pact picture.

Secretary JOHNSON. If we did not believe that in the National Military Establishment we would not be supporting this to the limit of our ability today.

Senator TYDINGS. The point that I want to get at, and you have answered it specifically, but I would like it repeated for the sake of emphasis: The core of this whole program is the security of the United States of America, from where we sit.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator TYDINGS. Of course, you have said here that when General Bradley comes before us representing the professional side of the Military Establishment—that is, the Army, Navy, and the Air Force—he will give us more details about this program.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. I assume that when General Bradley comes, either in executive session or in open session, that he will give us the benefit of what other countries propose to do in concert, and what we propose to do in concert in the event of certain happenings, for our own security and for the security of all the other nations involved.

Secretary JOHNSON. Subject to not having before him the exact language of what you may or may not do in your authorization, he will give you, to the best of his ability, the beliefs of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. But, Senator, if you want him to go as far as you have now said, may I suggest you think about it most carefully. It should not be on the record, and it should be in executive session.

Senator McMAHON. What difference does that make?

Secretary JOHNSON. Insofar as it would be a disclosure to other people of what is proposed to be the set-up in the several countries, we would not have served ourselves well to have let it be cabled abroad.

Senator TYDINGS. I am going to assume—and I am not going to even ask you the question, but so that I can proceed from now on—if this pact is adopted, and if the arms implementation part of it is carried out, that the arms implementation part of it will only be carried out as a part of what might be called an over-all master plan primarily and exclusively devoted to the defense of the North Atlantic area and the keeping of the peace of the world.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is correct, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. So not going into the details of that, quite obviously if there is a plan it has only one purpose, and that is defense, and not aggression.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. And if it is for that purpose it ought not to be put on the record to advise those who are evil-minded of what we intend to do to protect democracy and ourselves from future aggression.

IMPROVING UNITED STATES SECURITY AND MILITARY POTENTIAL

You say on the same page:

The North Atlantic Treaty will form a basis for improving United States security by improving the military potential of all member nations.

That is a repetition of the thought I expressed a while ago, to wit, that the core of this is the defense of the United States of America, and by improving the military potential of those friendly nations that are associated with us in this endeavor we increase the security of ourselves.

Secretary JOHNSON. I agree with you, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. The potential will be improved, you say, "in terms of collective action as well as individual armed strength." That answers the question I hypothetically put a while ago.

Secretary JOHNSON. I think it does, sir.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF THE TREATY

Senator TYDINGS (reading) :

I am sure that its value—

you say—

as a war deterrent, and in the last resort in war itself, must be obvious to all.

It is quite plain from that statement that you are using this machinery first in a tremendous effort to prevent war by making the peaceful, nonaggressive, democratic, liberty-loving countries so strong that no nation or group of nations will feel they can successfully attack that sort of a compact group.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. But that if war comes, and you have to prove that you are stronger than the others, the very fact that you are combined together will in time prove that you were right in assuming these nations would be foolish if they would attack us.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

BENEFITS FROM COLLECTIVE ACTION

Senator TYDINGS. I think this sentence, too, bears to that end. You say :

Unless its terms are vigorously implemented, its force for peace will be vitiated and, if there should be war, we should have to pay an inordinate price for our failure to implement it.

We all comprehend that. Would you care to enlarge on it?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, sir. But I stand upon that as a fundamental, one of the fundamental bases underlying this whole program.

Senator TYDINGS. In other words, we will be weaker being selfish and thinking only of ourselves, without regard to the other friendly nations that are like minded, than we will be if we muster all our strength in one common pool and exert it for the defense of all.

Secretary JOHNSON. Quite right, Senator Tydings. We cannot leave the world alone any more. The world is not going to leave us alone. And in the known problems we face, knowing that some part of the world might not leave us alone, we ought to have friends where we may, and to the extent within our own economy that we can, they ought to be substantial friends.

We hope, through this program, that those who are our friends may be substantial friends.

Senator TYDINGS. What I am reemphasizing all the time is the defensive character of your testimony here before this committee.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF THE TREATY

You say on page 4 :

We must keep constantly in mind the three fundamentals of preparedness: manpower, materials, and suitable positions from which to employ them in the event of attack.

Obviously it must be your opinion that if we have this alliance we will have more manpower than we would have without it to resist aggression.

Secretary JOHNSON. Senator, my approach to this whole statement is that a strong America is the one hope of a peaceful world. I realize in the business to which I now am assigned that a strong America is an expensive thing. I want to strengthen others who think as we do, and who are not aggressors, so that those others may join with us, and that while we help them a little bit now, without reducing the sufficiency of our own Military Establishment, we want to enable them to build up, in their own national interests, their own military establishment and that this will enable me to come back to the Congress 3 or 4 years from now and say:

We can now reduce the Military Establishment of the United States with safety, because their effective strength has been added to ours.

That is what I mean by these references to economy.

Senator TYDINGS. When you name manpower, materials, and suitable positions, what you really say is to put together such a preponderance of industrial plant, economic potential, financial stability, inventive genius, military equipment, military experience and imagination, and know-how, to such an extent that if there is any reason left it is almost certain to keep the peace.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir. The whole purport of this is defensive—defensive toward retarding those who would cause trouble—and to make peace in the world. To that end the language in this statement, after it was prepared, was turned over to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, sir. A few words were changed so there would be no confusion later in the military approach to this picture, and the statement as given to you—except the insert that I made about my own speech, was approved by the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

EFFECT ON OUR SECURITY

Senator TYDINGS. To those of us who are going to vote on this committee, in our Government, in accepting it or rejecting it, or in the military in approving it or opposing it, there is the choice of whether we will be more secure without it, standing on our own feet, and acting alone, or whether we will be more secure with all that we have plus all the other might of one kind or another which other countries like-minded with us could contribute to the common purpose.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is a fair statement.

Senator TYDINGS. So that we must make a choice either to stand alone or to stand with more than ourselves for the same objective.

Secretary JOHNSON. Hoping to build them more to the point that we can reduce our own.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF THE TREATY

Senator TYDINGS. And always with the clear understanding that there is not one line of aggression in this whole transaction that anyone can honestly point to.

Secretary JOHNSON. No; and in no statement that comes out from my knowledge from the Military Establishment will there be anything that looks like aggression. It is all going to be defensive, and peace through strength.

Senator TYDINGS. In the first place, there is no one strong enough to aggress the possible aggressors, possibly alone, except ourselves. Goodness knows we cannot do it without a declaration of war. We are pretty safe from any implication of aggression in the very nature of things.

On that same page you say, too:

We must go further and supply our friends with some of their deficiencies in arms and equipment and help them to help themselves.

That further bears out the concept that the stronger we make our friends, the stronger we make ourselves.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is quite right, sir.

ENHANCEMENT OF OUR SECURITY

Senator TYDINGS. On that same page you again say—and you are speaking for the Military Establishment—

We will enhance our security by joining this partnership of peace.

By "our security" you mean in effect, I take it, that we will have the best prospect of peace by joining this compact?

Secretary JOHNSON. In my opinion, and since this is a statement that I had submitted to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the opinion of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, sir, than whom I have no better source.

Senator TYDINGS. In other words, the military motivation for support of this pact is predicated entirely on the fact that it is the best opportunity to prevent hostilities.

Secretary JOHNSON. The best offered us; yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. It is the last best hope of mankind that we can evolve at this time for the preservation of peace in this country and peace in Europe, and perhaps in the world.

Secretary JOHNSON. I agree with that general statement. But if something should happen to this, I am still going to be fighting for something else.

Senator TYDINGS. That is right. But this is the best thing that we have been able to devise to keep the peace.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is correct.

NO RELAXATION IN STRENGTHENING OUR OWN MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT

Senator TYDINGS. You furthermore say:

We cannot afford to relax the strengthening of our military forces.

With that I agree. We are dealing primarily in that statement with the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and our own country. Now let us be candid about it, to the extent that we take our good weapons, whether they be bombing planes or artillery or tanks or battleships, or whatever they may be, and transfer them to other countries, we do weaken our own military potential if we were standing alone.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is true, Senator Tydings.

Senator TYDINGS. I am not talking about the compensation for the moment. I am just asking if we do not weaken ourselves in the event we were standing alone.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir. But what—

Senator TYDINGS. Go ahead.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is almost a question like, "Have you stopped beating your wife?"

Senator TYDINGS. No; it is not.

Secretary JOHNSON. The things that we shall furnish them are largely those that are in reserves or surplus. But before answering your question, I must say that in the doing of this I shall be governed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and we are not going to do anything that weakens the immediate sufficiency of our own defense.

Senator TYDINGS. Let us take a concrete case.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM AND THE STRENGTH OF UNITED STATES DEFENSE ESTABLISHMENT

If you take a hundred B-29's, or B-17's, or whatever you want to take, good, healthy bombers that might be in storage, and distribute them to some countries of Europe, have you not weakened your own military potential to the extent of 100 bombers that you might need if you got into a war?

Secretary JOHNSON. Your military potential? Yes, sir. But we are not going to give them equipment, unless we have left what the Joint Chiefs of Staff continue to say is sufficient unto the needs of the hour.

Senator TYDINGS. I agree with that, but just the same, if you had that 100, plus what the Joint Chiefs of Staff say is the irreducible minimum, you would be that much better off, would you not?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. That is my point. So you do, to that extent, weaken your own ability to resist.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. Now, the compensation is—

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes; that is what we want to come to. You state it.

Senator TYDINGS. I want to take it through its evolutions. The compensation is that whatever you have lost here, by taking things which, in many cases you probably would not need or use anyhow and giving them to people where they are immediately available in the event of hostilities, you have increased your security more than if you had kept them in your own arsenal.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is true, Senator Tydings, when you reach the point—and they are developing their own strengths over there—that it is of substance and can contribute to the common defense.

Senator TYDINGS. That is right. I am assuming that their economic recovery, as well as their military recovery, continues.

Secretary JOHNSON. On that assumption you are right.

Senator TYDINGS. My point is that whatever you lose of potentials in this country by the transfer of military equipment to the other countries, you should be more than compensated for by the effect of that material where it can be employed to the greatest advantage.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir; that is the theory.

Senator TYDINGS. In other words, to take an imaginary case, if we were to transfer a thousand tanks to Europe, and if there were an aggression on one of the countries of the Atlantic pact, and these thousand tanks were on the spot where they could be immediately used, it would have more effect than if we had those thousand tanks down at Fort Knox, Ky.; is that right?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. While that is a crude illustration, you can multiply it and see how, with other categories, it would make a tremendous difference and give us plenty of time.

You also say, on page 4:

MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS AND THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

However, until the danger that confronts us subsides and an efficiently operating, ocoordinated defense system is seabshed under this treaty, we of America cannot afford to reduce our investment in preparedness.

What do you mean by "our investment"?

Secretary JOHNSON. I mean what you of the Hill—as we call it in the Pentagon—give us annually to keep up the Military Establishment.

Senator TYDINGS. Even, to be perfectly honest about it, even after we have this pact in being, and after the other countries have made a substantial recovery, and we have allocated tasks, somewhat, let us say, to carry out the general purposes of keeping ourselves strong, we still want to have an adequate investment in this country for defense, do we not, just in case something should not turn out quite as we hoped and believed that it was going to turn out.

Secretary JOHNSON. I would believe that the over-all minimum requirements for our own safety would be reduced by the strength that we would have through these friends who were themselves fortified.

Senator TYDINGS. That is right. But your statement likewise implies the converse, that we cannot go below a certain point with safety.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. Notwithstanding the help we are sending abroad.

Secretary JOHNSON. America must always be able to be strong enough that no aggressor is going to dare attack us.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF THE TREATY AND UNITED STATES SECURITY

Senator TYDINGS. Speaking of Secretary Forrestal's testimony and your own, and speaking of the annual reports of the National Military Establishment, you say:

You will recall from his—
that is, Mr. Forrestal's—

annual report that he considered greater solidarity with our neighbors in the Atlantic area and military aid to western Europe as matters of the highest priority to the Military Establishment.

That again emphasizes that this pact is again, at base, nothing more or less in its motivation, from where we sit, than a defensive mechanism that we have employed for our own and the world's security.

Secretary JOHNSON. I think it does, sir, and that was Mr. Forrestal's approach, if you take the written word.

Senator TYDINGS. That is right. There are other repetitions of this main idea. I am not reading them all; I do not want to read them all; I do not believe it is necessary.

Finally you say, on page 5:

We will see a growing nucleus of defensive military force on which to base our own strategy in the event of war.

That again emphasizes it.

Again you say:

Furthermore, it is to be expected that our actual strategic position will be improved, in that we shall be much better able to make effective use of our armed strength, if the necessity arises as a result of the "mutual aid" we will get from our partners under article 3 of the treaty.

Again, the whole core of this thing is the security and the defense of the United States, with the decision made that we have more security, more prospect of world peace, in this pact than we have without it.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. And that is the opinion of the highest military level in our Military Establishment.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir; and General Bradley will be here prepared to support that position.

COST OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator TYDINGS. In the transfer—coming down to the weapons themselves—in the transfer of the supplies and weapons from our own arsenal, so to speak—those we now have, in storehouses—to the countries in Europe, do you know whether or not it is planned, in keeping the books, to charge them off at their cost value or at a percentage of their cost value?

Secretary JOHNSON. They will come from several categories. Some of it will be new procurement. That will be cost.

Senator TYDINGS. I am not talking about—

Secretary JOHNSON. Some of it will be from reserves. Some will be from the third category, surplus.

ORIGINAL COST AND REHABILITATION COST OF SURPLUS ITEMS

Senator TYDINGS. Those that you have in reserve or in surplus, what percentage of the original cost will be entered in making up this figure of $1,100,000,000-odd?

Secretary JOHNSON. I think we can answer that generally.

Senator TYDINGS. If you can answer me specifically, I would appreciate that.

Secretary JOHNSON. For the items that are in the category of surplus we should, out of your appropriations in the National Military Establishment, be reimbursed the cost of rehabilitating that surplus material only.

Senator TYDINGS. That will be about 15 percent, will it not?

Secretary JOHNSON. It will vary.

Senator TYDINGS. I saw a figure this morning that I think said it would cost about 15 percent to rehabilitate.

Secretary JOHNSON. You may have gotten that from one of our generals as an over-all approach as to what it might average out. We will be able to give you a little more specific data. About 10 or 15 percent.

Then, on the items that are reserve items, those are the ones that we have to replace. Those will give you an exact definition. I think it will be at replacement cost, sir.

BREAK-DOWN OF COST FIGURES

Senator TYDINGS. Here is what I would like to know: Let us take bombing planes that we might have in storage. They have been used, but they are in good condition; they are usable; they may need some minor repairs. When we take those bombing planes and send them abroad as a part of the arms implementation plan of the North Atlantic Security Pact, how much of it are we going to charge to these countries? Are we going to say that they are worth 10 percent of what they cost or 50 percent? How do we arrive at this figure of $1,100,000,000?

Secretary JOHNSON. I think we are going to have to give you, eventually, a break-down to arrive at that, Senator. I am afraid if you try to take an isolated instance that it will require a detailed description—

Senator TYDINGS. I would like to say this, because obviously this is not a fair question: There is nobody who can testify and give offhand answers to that.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator TYDINGS. And I do not think it is fair for me to press you on that. But I would say this: I would like to have—and I know the committee would like to have, as soon as you can give it to us, either tentatively or in final form—the number of weapons by categories that are to be transferred in toto; the original cost of those weapons; the date they were purchased; whether they have been used in whole or in part or not; and what the charge will be to the countries to which they are to go—I mean the bookkeeping charge—what percentage of the cost, at the time of delivery, will be charged against country X.

Secretary JOHNSON. We will work that out for you, Senator.

Senator TYDINGS. So that I will have the original cost of the article and the final assumed present cost of the article at the time of transfer.

Secretary JOHNSON. Its classification by us and its condition.

(The committee has been informed that the Department of State is preparing this information for submission in connection with the proposed military assistance legislation.)

Senator TYDINGS. I would likewise like to know whether these articles are surplus and whether they are from our reserve, and what it is proposed to do, by way of replenishing the reserve. For example, you may take a certain weapon—without naming it—and get a certain amount of credit for it. But I would assume you would not replace the money credit that you got for that arm by the same article. You might want to get an improved article.

I am not going into too much detail on that.

Secretary JOHNSON. We aren't going to give them any junk equipment, sir. We are going to give them the best. But do not press the other question.

Senator TYDINGS. I would like to say that I do not think you should be bound—and I hope you will give me an answer that you will not be bound—to use the money to purchase the identical equipment as that you have sent abroad wherever you have tapped your reserves.

Secretary JOHNSON. No, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. You might be able to buy a later model, if you can get a later model.

Secretary JOHNSON. You have given me a thought. We do not want to come back to you to get another appropriation and add it on to the armed forces appropriation.

Senator TYDINGS. We will give you authority so as not to catch you outside the door.

Secretary JOHNSON. I like your method of bookkeeping, sir, and we will give you that.

Senator TYDINGS. I think we have got to have that. In other words, it has been said here that this program for the security of the North Atlantic countries is going to cost about $1,100,000,000 in round numbers.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator TYDINGS. And it is likewise said that so much of it would be in cash, so to speak, to buy new equipment with, and so much of it will be used for old equipment, the equivalent value for old equipment. What I want to know is what part of it is going to be used to buy entirely new equipment that has to be made, and how much you are going to charge for the old equipment as a bookkeeping transaction that you are going to turn over to them.

Secretary JOHNSON. We will bring you that.

Senator TYDINGS. And what part of that is surplus, and what part of it is reserve.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir; we will bring you that. It is quite an order.

Senator TYDINGS. I think we ought to have it.

Secretary JOHNSON. I do, too, and we will get it for you.

[The committee has been informed that the Department of State is preparing this information for submission in connection with the proposed military-assistance legislation.]

Senator TYDINGS. I have some other questions, Mr. Chairman, but I would rather ask them in executive session. I do not think I can go any further.

INCREASING THE SECURITY OF THE UNITED STATES

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Mr. Secretary, I would like to ask you a very brief question, and then turn you over to Senator Smith. Senator Tydings referred to the main purpose of this treaty being the preservation of the United States and its safety and security, and so forth and so on.

Is it not true, though, that any attack, any war on a free government, any unprovoked attack, either on its territory or on its people, is, in a sense, a weakening of the security of the United States itself?

If any aggressor, if any military aggressor is allowed to pick off one at a time, smaller and weaker nations, does not that increase the danger to our security and the danger to the security of every other nation which expects and desires to maintain its integrity and its independence?

Secretary JOHNSON. You are quite right, Mr. Chairman, and history has many instances. The oldest and most classic, I guess, is when, despite the pleading in the market place to take care of themselves, Athens sat by while Philip of Macedonia picked them off one by one until nobody was left in the city itself, and then it perished.

AGGRESSION ANYWHERE AS A THREAT TO UNITED STATES SECURITY

The CHAIRMAN. Were we not provoked in World War I by that very thing, that the aggressors in World War I threatened the security of the United States ultimately, and did we not enter that struggle to preserve our freedom from aggression and from invasion of our territory?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that in World War II, while we were attacked unjustifiably by Japan, that our measures for aid prior to our declaration of war were motivated by the fact that here was an aggressor attacking Poland, attacking Norway, overrunning Czechoslovakia, and doing all of those things that we considered an attack on democracy and freedom everywhere? Speeches in Congress, prior to the outbreak of our part of the war, illustrate the danger that we felt in case of victory by the aggressors in Europe, that they would ultimately invade or attack the nations of western Europe.

Secretary JOHNSON. The action of the Congress and of the executive department both support the statement that you now make.

The CHAIRMAN. So that one of the important things about this treaty is that we do not propose to let aggressors feel that they have any security in a similar course of conduct in the future, and that if they make an unprovoked armed attack upon a weaker nation, that they may expect the resistance, the armed resistance, if necessary, of all of the nations that are signatories to this pact.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Secretary, there are one or two questions that have been brought to my attention frequently in discussions of this matter. The first one in a sense has already been brought out in the questions Senator Tydings has asked you.

EFFECT OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM ON MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS

That question simply stated is this: It is probably conceded by entering into this North Atlantic Treaty that our security position is improved.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Taking the over-all picture?

Secretary JOHNSON. We think it will be.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And it will probably have an over-all strategic program to take care of the eventuality of an attack?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. That being true, people very naturally ask the question, If our estimates of cost for our military establishment were made prior to this treaty being entered into, why should it not be possible now, within the over-all coverage of those figures, to take care of this need of implementing the European set-up because of that additional security that we have got?

I think you answered it in a way already, but I want to get that clear again.

Secretary JOHNSON. My first job as Secretary of Defense is to see that these United States are ready at 4 o'clock in the morning if somebody wants to be an aggressor as far as we are concerned.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Whether or not we have aid abroad?

NO DIMINUTION OF UNITED STATES PREPAREDNESS NOW

Secretary JOHNSON. Your appropriating money, or doing things under this treaty, is a matter that we hope in time will build strength abroad that will be helpful to us, so that when the Joint Chiefs are gaging our readiness at 4 o'clock in the morning they can take that into calculation.

I say to you that for the next 2 or 3 years after you do this there still can be no diminution in our own military strength here because, until that is organized and built up abroad, to which you now contribute, we still must make the gage our own interest here. Is that answering what you have in mind?

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. That gives us your position on the matter very clearly. Whether it satisfies those who feel there might be some area in which we might be able to take care of this may be another question. I realize we have that in the field of controversy, perhaps.

CONTRIBUTION OF COSIGNATORIES

Are we satisfied—if you do not want to answer this now we will save it for the executive session—that the other members of this pact are going to be able to help themselves in this joint effort or is it going to be looked upon as something in which we are practically doing the whole thing?

Are they going to be able to make a real substantial contribution?

Secretary JOHNSON. Some of them; yes. And our allocation of arms and other assistance that goes under this program, if authorized by you, will be that which fits into their shortages and contributes to their building up those things that will make them strong in the way we see it.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And we are contemplating now building up their present program for their military set-up, or their divisions, or what not, without going into the longer range of implementing those in years to come and making them even stronger and stronger?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. You are not at the present moment looking ahead to any increase say in 1950, 1951, or 1952, although we do admit that what we are doing today probably would not be adequate, if there should be an attack, to defend those countries. One of the opinions that people have about this is that this is a billion-dollar cost this year, but in the years to come it may go up to 5 billion dollars, 10 billion dollars, or what have you.

Secretary JOHNSON. With cooperation on their part, that amount should not grow. They should begin to come down, and even our appropriations at home should come down—our appropriation at home for our own military establishment—as their organized strength goes up.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. But their organized strength conceivably might need more help from us.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I assume that is a possibility. We ought to face that.

Secretary JOHNSON. I do face that, and therefore say that 2 or 3 years, or 4 years from now.

ALLOCATION OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Another question that has been asked me is the question of how the over-all plan for dividing this military aid is set up. Is that going to be a joint staff that determines that, that country X needs this—I am not asking you for divisions now—that country Y needs that, and so forth?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And it will be allocated accordingly under a joint set-up?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir; that is right.

REVIVAL OF ARMS INDUSTRY

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Another question asked me is this one: Is it contemplated that arms industries will be revived in Europe, and have we any fear—if that should be a result of this program—to the extent it might be a danger to the future peace of the world?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, sir.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. There will be some manufacturing of arms, of course?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir. But their own economy will be the limitation thereon.

PRIORITY OF ECONOMIC RECOVERY

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And that economy of theirs is one that we are deeply interested in because we do give priority, do you agree with this, to the ECA program?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. The economic recovery is the basic thing we are relying on for the rehabilitation of those countries for the preservation of peace.

Secretary JOHNSON. And this will further the ECA program in that it will give confidence to the people who must build the new factories, new stores, establish the new businesses, we hope.

FINANCING THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM OUT OF THE MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I will say, in the questions I have asked you, the first one is the one that troubles more people that come to me, because they get this argument. The figure of $15,000,000,000-plus, is an enormous figure. The details of that cannot be known to the ordinary person, the so-called layman. People feel within that over-all global figure, possibly some savings here, there, or the other place, might conceivably take care of this much smaller program that we are contemplating for the European aid.

Do you think that can be done? That there cannot be squeezings and reallocations and dealing with that in a way to give this implementation to the European countries without calling on our taxpayers to put up some more money?

Secretary JOHNSON. I think not, sir.
Senator SMITH of New Jersey. That is all.

LIMITATION ON ARMING OUR ALLIES

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Secretary, on the top of page 3, beginning at the bottom sentence of page 2, you say:

Through this treaty we band together with many of our friends and by the military assistance program we put the means in their hands to defend themselves, thereby increasing our own security.

I do not suppose that you intend us to conclude that by saying that that we anticipate putting all of the means into the hands of—

Secretary JOHNSON. No, Senator McMahon; not at all. Where there are shortages we can contribute to build their over-all power. We are going to try to do that intelligently on the Chiefs of Staff level.

Senator McMAHON. And any deduction that they furnish the men and we are going to furnish the war material would not be in accordance with the facts?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, sir.

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Secretary, this pact follows pretty well the form of the Rio Pact, as I understand it.

Secretary JOHNSON. I believe that is right.

NEED FOR IMPLEMENTING TREATY BUT NOT RIO PACT

Senator McMAHON. With that in mind I wish to refer to the language on page 3, in which you say, speaking about this pact:

I am sure that its value as a war deterrent and, in the last resort, in war itself, must be obvious to you all. Nevertheless, it is our firm belief in the Military Establishment that the ratification of the treaty cannot, in itself and without further action, safely be relied upon to accomplish the objectives of the treaty.

Now, in the Rio Pact we do just that. There has been no military implementation of that pact. That was the more or less natural development of the Monroe Doctrine. We have said in the pact, that if anybody attacked any signatory member that we would go to their defense.

How do you differentiate between the two defensive pacts?

Secretary JOHNSON. They are very different situations. There are, of their own kind, economies in operation in the governments in the Rio Pact. We are dealing here with people without equipment, without houses, without plants, without food. We are trying to build back some sort of economy for them, and they are faced, on their border, with an organized possible aggression.

No such menace confronts so closely the people in the Rio Pact.

Senator McMAHON. So you differentiate on the basis of the geography of the situation in good part.

Secretary JOHNSON. Location and economic condition.

Senator McMAHON. The closeness of the possible aggressor?

Secretary JOHNSON. The location and condition of the country.

Senator McMAHON. Perhaps this question might be better put to you or to your representatives, those representing the security establishment, when we consider specifically the implementation of the treaty. Yet it might be well to have it in the record at this point.

SUFFICIENCY OF THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Do you consider that the aid that we contemplate giving, as represented by an expenditure of $1,100,000,000, is going to be much more than a psychological lift for the people of western Europe?

Secretary JOHNSON. I think it might be justified in a great many people's minds as a psychological lift. To me it is not. It is beginning to make those people keep the frontier against possible aggression over there, instead of it being here on the Atlantic seaboard.

Senator McMAHON. While I am definitely committed to the pact, and shall support it with whatever resource at my command, I am in no way committed to the implementation of it through military aid. I will say, however, that the only argument that today has made very much sense to me is the morale factor. That $1,100,000,000 of aid is the kind of aid that scarcely impresses me a bit. However, that is something that we will go into more definitely when we do discuss the details of that proposition.

Thank you very much.

Senator TYDINGS. (presiding). The next Senator: Senator Hickenlooper?

ADEQUACY OF MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Secretary, you have answered a great many questions that are of interest to me, and those that you have not answered I think you have agreed to furnish the information later on in a break-down of the material. I am interested in getting your view from the military point of view, as to whether or not you believe the $15,000,000,000 plus recommended for appropriation to the National Military Establishment for our own defenses is adequate?

Secretary JOHNSON. You have opened up an entirely new field, and I am probably going to get in duteh with the Armed Services Committee. I hope Senator Tydings will not leave—

Senator TYDINGS. No; I will not.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Secretary, let me assure you that I do not want to press you on any matters that you believe are secret for the interests of the defense of the United States. That is not what I am getting at.

Secretary JOHNSON. Not at all. My first endeavor is, first, peace. My second is to get the Military Establishment streamlined and efficient, to cut out the duplication, to bring down the costs and get it more nearly within the economy, so it is less a burden to the American people.

We have been giving a lot of attention to that, day and night. I do not want to be committed to the $15,000,000,000 figure.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. May I ask you another question, then?

Secretary JOHNSON. I find that there are authorizations for expenditures for guided missiles, for planes and submarines, that are not going to cost very much between now and July 1. A few million or a few thousand, maybe. But the project which is authorized, and upon which we are embarking in the next year and the year following and the year after, runs into tremendous sums. Therefore I cannot answer your question that I am satisfied with the $15,000,000,000.

Despite the savings we can make—and they will be great—there are these other things to which we are already committed and contracts entered into and authorizations, to run into great items of money. That is why we are fighting so hard on the things that are non-essential and do not meet with the approval of the Joint Chiefs of Staff as being within that formula.

EFFECT OF NONVERIFICATION ON DEFENSE EXPENDITURES

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Let me put it another way. If the implementation of the Atlantic Pact should be turned down in toto, and no appropriation for implementing the military forces abroad were provided for, would you then ask for another $1,300,000,000 or $1,400,000,000 on top of the $15,000,000,000 that we have now authorized for the internal defense of this country?

Secretary JOHNSON. I would, sir, if after a thorough study, consideration with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, that conclusion were arrived at.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. It is my impression that the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Budget Bureau, quite thoroughly canvassed the minimum necessities for national defense in arriving at the figures of fifteen billion some million dollars.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir. But you were talking about my reducing it in the future, and I did not want an answer here saying, yes, we might reduce it in the future some amount when there are these commitments that I had to get in the record so there will be no confusion later.

MINIMUM AMOUNT NECESSARY FOR UNITED STATES SECURITY

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I do not like to prolong this questioning. Of course, the thing that I am concerned with is were we wrong when we said that $15,000,000,000 was the minimum that we could get along with, with safety and security, for the United States, under the circumstances? Were we wrong then or are we wrong now when we say we may need another billion, three hundred million dollars for foreign contributions to increase our safety and security?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, sir; I see your thinking.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I am wondering can we reduce our $15,000,000,000 internally.

Secretary JOHNSON. No; you cannot reduce the $15,000,000,000, in my opinion, until you have strengthened that abroad, until it is organized and capable of contributing substantially to this picture.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. But before the Atlantic Pact came up for implementation we considered that $15,000,000,000, that is roughly that, was what we should spend to secure our own military forces against potential—

NECESSITY FOR MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO OTHER PARTS OF THE WORLD

Senator HICKENLOOPER. By the same token, is it necessary for us to go into Japan or Australia and appropriate another billion dollars or two to secure our peace from that part of the world?

In other words, we are now securing it in Europe. Is it going to be necessary for us to secure it in Asia and other places in the world? I am merely trying to get a limitation.

Secretary JOHNSON. Senator, I hope you will ask that of the State Department. I just do not want to be asked about this Chinese picture and Japan, and so forth. That is not my field. I am not prepared to testify on that.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I am talking about the security element.

Secretary JOHNSON. Nobody suggested to me that we ask for money in these other fields. If there is any discussion of any like arrangements in other parts of the world we have not heard of them. I have not heard of them in the Military Establishment at all.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I am trying to get a little better understanding of the philosophy of these defense expenditures, on the theory that there ought to be a considered minimum which is reasonable for our national security needs, in keeping with the present economic situation which faces us, and just where that limitation is.

POSSIBLE FUTURE REDUCTION OF UNITED STATES MILITARY EXPENDITURES

Secretary JOHNSON. Senator, here you start at this fund—if that should later be authorized—for the improvement of forces over there that we hope will build up in those several countries a military establishment with the countries tied to us in this pact or treaty, who would be of such substance and value that then we could reduce our own military appropriation.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. That is at some time in the future?

Secretary JOHNSON. At some time in the future. In the meantime, through this year and next year, we hope, through their cooperation with you, that they will be building toward that end, but until you do reach that point of sufficiency of their establishments, collectively, to be of aid to us, there can be no reduction in our own National Military Establishment.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Is this a reasonable conclusion of this program, as you might view it from the military standpoint: that we arrived at a figure of $15,000,000,000 plus, as the necessary figure if we had to stand alone against the world, or if we were responsible solely for our own defense, but that here we have a chance to buy a bargain at the expenditure of a little more money, that is a bargain in security, a bargain in the security of further frontiers than we did have, or something of that kind?

Secretary JOHNSON. Senator, until they have built their own establishment so it is substantially of aid, we do not reduce our establishment. But at the same time, if you do not spend this $1,100,000,000 over and above ECA, to bring peace to the world, and your failure to do it will not bring peace to the world, then you have made a mistake. But that is a matter of your judgment.

The two things are separate. Our own Military Establishment must be on the basis—and I believe will be on the basis—of the sufficiency of defense for the safety of America.

Now you are doing something here, if you do it, that besides the strength of America, like the ECA, contributes to deterring an aggressor from starting something because you are building up next to him those who can deter him, and thus make for peace.

MINIMUM REQUIREMENTS FOR UNITED STATES DEFENSE

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I would like to be firm in my conclusion, if I feel I must at any time defend any action in this thing, that what we may be doing is spending an extra amount of time and money and sacrifice in strengthening the frontiers out farther away from our own country, rather than to have to sit back and merely defend ourselves against aggression which may come over here.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, but looking at that, Senator, you will not overlook that this trend to build toward a sufficiency abroad, every bit they do brings to America a greater degree of security.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Would you say that the implementation of this treaty, whatever we do by way of implementation is necessarily on top of and in addition to what we have heretofore concluded to be our minimum responsibility toward the Military Establishment?

Secretary JOHNSON. You and I are talking the same language now, sir. I do. It cannot come out of the Military Establishment without crippling it to the point that you imperil the safety of America.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. So that you do believe there is an irreducible minimum that we must maintain here in any event.

Secretary JOHNSON. There is an irreducible point of safety. We have not, in this authorization you have given us, perfectionist defense. It has cut down to the point where we are satisfied it is a sufficiency of defense, but not the ideal defense.

You cannot cut it any more and you cannot take the money out without risking the security of this Nation of ours.

ADDED SECURITY TO THE UNITED STATES THROUGH THE TREATY

Senator HICKENLOOPER. But you believe, as I understand it, that the implementation of this pact will add greatly to our area of security, that is, not only our own as a Nation, but to the security of the world?

Secretary JOHNSON. I believe it will tend to add to our military security. I think it certainly will add, as Senator McMahon put it, to the psychology of the situation favorable to us, and that it establishes a trend which over 3 or 4 years will bring a real addition to our strength, and at a lesser cost to us on those items than if we took the same money and put it in our own Military Establishment.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Secretary, you stated a moment ago that the pact and the implementation are really two different actions.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes.

RELATIONSHIP OF TREATY TO THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think I agree with that although I feel that they are interlocked, so that there is no complete severance of the two. But the fact is, the Pact itself is an expression of unity of purpose of nations that have generally common ideas.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir; and therefore an aid to peace in itself, and a deterrent to aggressors.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And that in expressing that unity we get closer together and our common purpose is well understood, and an aggressor would hesitate to attack us.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. That is knowing that if he attacked one he would attack all.

Now, the implementation of this pact, on the other hand, is a physical demonstration of our determination to stand together. Is that a fair statement? That is, when we implement the pact.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes; I agree with that. But I go a little further: that it gives an uplift to those people to be a nation, responsible, strong again.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I hope that that connotation was in my assumption.

Secretary JOHNSON. If so, then I agree with you.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. In implementing the pact we give not only concrete evidence but every other evidence that we mean what we say.

Secretary JOHNSON. Senator Hickenlooper, we are speaking the same language again.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

Senator HICKENLOOPER. By the implementation of the pact, in addition to the psychological uplift that it will give various countries who contribute—and ourselves, too, I hope—we propose to furnish, at least in the first fiscal year, about $1,100,000,000 to the signing countries in one way or another.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. And that $1,100,000,000 is military equipment, is it not?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Of one kind or another. Strategically under the head of military equipment.

Secretary JOHNSON. It has one item in it that I am not familiar with, which is an emergency fund of cash to reach over and supplement within the field you are talking of.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. But the implementation is designed to develop and strengthen the military establishments of these countries with a view to their ability to resist aggression if it occurs.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Now, I am fully aware that—I should not say I am aware; I can only say that I earnestly hope that implementation will add to the confidence of those countries and their unity and their will to resist, as was said here yesterday.

But what would you say is the ultimate use of this military equipment if an aggressor is not deterred, if he is not frightened off, and if he goes ahead with his aggression? I mean, is it not military action? Do we not say, then, we will fight if an aggressor commits aggression against one of the pact countries? Do we not say we will fight, and we are furnishing the implementation material for the purpose, not alone for psychology but for the purpose of fighting an aggressor in case he commits an act of aggression?

That is the purpose of strengthening these countries by implementing the pact, is it not?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Then, Mr. Secretary—and I do not want you to understand that I am trying to take issue with you on the philosophy of this pact. I am pretty much for it.

Secretary JOHNSON. I do not.

COMPARISON WITH MILITARY ALLIANCES OF PAST

Senator HICKENLOOPER. The question of the amount of implementation may be up to some dispute, perhaps; but then I may say respectfully and perfectly cordially that I am in thorough disagreement with your statement that this is not a military alliance, because it would seem to me by whatever name you call it, its end result is fighting.

We have determined the time when we will use our complete strength, military and otherwise, as a last resort measure to throw off aggression. The only reason I bring that up is not to dispute the matter, but I do not want to be under any delusions in my own mind, and certainly I do not want to misrepresent it to those who are bound to ask me questions about it.

It seems to me that it could be said, at least to that extent, that, of course, it is a military alliance, a military alliance as a last resort with peace as its objective; an alliance in which we expect to exhaust every reasonable and possible means to maintain peace. But the end point of the implementation is to get ourselves and our allies in a sufficient position so we can and will fight under those eventual last-ditch conditions.

It would seem to me, therefore, that it is, of course, among other things, definitely a military pact?

Secretary JOHNSON. Military pact?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Yes, sir. Military alliance, I should say. Excuse me.

Secretary JOHNSON. No, you talked yourself out of it.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I would like to see you talk yourself out of that one.

Secretary JOHNSON. You talked yourself over into my corner on it. You and I are not differing, unless we did differ about cutting down the amount we put in our own National Military Establishment, I gather from what you say.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I am not differing. I am merely exploring.

PARTNERSHIP FOR SECURITY—NOT AN ALLIANCE

Secretary JOHNSON. All right. Then I want to add another word or two about that speech of mine. Since I made that a year ago, there have been some other significant developments in the world. There have been the growth of the Cominform; satellite treaties; the Berlin crisis; and still more recently, the Communist successes in China. Those are a few of them. There are a lot more.

Looking at the world situation today instead of the time I made that speech, we are more justified now in taking this step in joining in what, instead of calling an alliance, I am going to call now a broad partnership for security. And in a partnership, there is something that does not exist in your phrase you want to use of "alliance," because alliance is the power to drag us in; and I negated that very carefully three or four times in my statement.

But in the same DAR speech I clarified my attitude toward further aggression in Europe by another quote I want to give you. I quote:

The United States should say that it, like other nations, has joined in the pledge against aggression. It has kept that pledge and expects others to do likewise. In the event that an aggressor attacks the western European group of free democracy, the United States will carry out her pledge and will, in conformity with its obligations to the United Nations, give this group all the assistance in its power.

I say, sir, that that language qualified the use of the words "military alliance." That is from my speech, Senator Vandenberg. This treaty we are proposing here now reaffirms the pledge that this Congress and this country have taken several times against aggression.

I believe it proclaims from the mountaintops our belief in international law as a basis for security and peace. I think this treaty, as you have it here, Mr. Chairman, is entirely consistent with the Charter of the United Nations. It is not a military alliance, the thing I was doubting in this speech, sir, to which I myself made reference.

I think by doing the thing here, we join the other peace-loving nations of the world to build toward peace-keeping in the world.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Secretary, I want to assure you, so that there will be no misunderstanding, that I never would have quarreled with you at all about what you said in that speech.

Secretary JOHNSON. I do not want you to interpret it differently from what I have been interpreting it.

PRESENT SITUATION DIFFERENT FROM THAT EXISTING AT TIME OF PAST ALLIANCES

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I agree it has not been the policy of the United States in the past to get into military alliances abroad. There is no question about that. We are facing a different situation, and I think it has been well pointed out that we are probably facing a great reversal in the American foreign policy.

So I have no criticism of you for making that speech. As far as I am concerned, it is all right with me. I think you stated the facts.

But I do not believe that I can completely say that this is not a military alliance that we are getting into with nations when we agree to join with them, not when they get into war, but we agree to join with them in the preparation and the building of their strength against the time when they may have to use it in war and we will join with them at that time.

Secretary JOHNSON. You and I are thinking alike. We are getting down to where we are disagreeing on Tweedledee and Tweedledum, and I am going to agree with you on the result and not argue with you further about the word.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Maybe we can just leave it with that and each go his own way and sing his own song. I do not know. But we hear a great deal about this being solely and completely a peace measure, and I think it is utterly completely devoted to the earnest hope for peace and every effort for peace, but I do not think in all fairness that we ought to stick our heads in the sand and refuse to recognize that it is a military alliance with these countries if, as, and when that becomes the last-ditch method of resisting active aggression which the peace overtures and the peace unity and all of our objectives fail to attain.

Secretary JOHNSON. You and I agree. We are both for any intelligent thing that tends within our economy, to bring peace to us and the world.

NATURE OF A MILITARY ALLIANCE

Senator HICKENLOOPER. As far as I am personally concerned, I think we would be shortsighted indeed if we merely adopted the pious declaration of united intention and neglected to see to the strength to make it stick. Perhaps I am prejudiced, but by the same token I do not like to hear the denial—and I do not necessarily say that you did make a denial—but I do not like to hear the denial by many, many people that this is in no way a military alliance; because it has ultimate military objectives, and we agree to band together as allies, both before the necessity for military action, and also if all peace unity should fail and an aggressor still decides he will have to aggress, then the ultimate time when we fight is the military use of this strength we are building up.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. My point is this: As I understand military alliances, historically speaking, they provided for automatically going to war in the event of certain contingencies. Now, of course, we will not automatically go to war. That is a difference perhaps, but that might be your position. I am just speaking historically, now.

Alliances in the past have meant that if these countries got together, they agreed automatically, and we certainly are not agreeing automatically, to go to war under this situation.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think there have been alliances. An alliance means people will stand shoulder to shoulder and gang up against the other fellow. Now, then, you go a step further. After you get your alliance and the terms under which the alliance is brought into effect is a different thing.

I think that prior to World War II, Britain had an understanding—I shall not quibble over the term—Britain had an understanding with Poland that if Poland were attacked, she would come to Poland's rescue.

I consider that to be an alliance. I do not believe that Poland could start an aggression against some other country, and with that understanding automatically drag Britain in. I think there are all manners of terms and conditions under which allies can call upon their allies for aid. It depends on the contract they sign.

I feel that we are allying ourselves with these pact countries and that we are allying ourselves for a definite purpose, which primarily is peace, and which we hope to achieve. But we are allying ourselves also for armed unity with them to resist aggression.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Would you make the same answer if there was no military implementation, just the treaty itself, without passing the Military Assistance Act?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think that without any doubt the pact itself is an alliance.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. It seems to me that the military alliance is limited in case of our entering into this pact in the future and only comes up in case we enter into it.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think it is an alliance to this extent. I think the Secretary of State pointed that out yesterday, that when we vote for the pact, I think that we are voting to assume the obligations of doing whatever we can in conjunction with our allies to resist aggression; and that, undoubtedly, in the ultimate would mean military force, military might, if the aggressor had the military force to make a sufficient attack in connection with the aggression.

I do not go on the theory that an alliance necessarily means that an ally can go out and do an affirmative and an offensive thing to somebody else and automatically, in all cases, come in and call his ally to get him out of the hole.

Secretary JOHNSON. Would you join me at dinner sometime? I would like to discuss that word "alliance" with you, and the history of it.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Secretary, I would join you any time.

NATURE OF OLD-FASHIONED ALLIANCES

Senator VANDENBERG. I simply want to join myself with the observation of Senator Smith, and suggest to my able friend that this denouncement of the term "military alliance"—and I certainly joined in that denouncement and so continue to do—has been in precisely the sense that the Secretary himself used the term.

In each instance we both have referred to the old historic tradition, connotation, of the term "military alliance," which historically has usually involved highly offensive features which are not remotely involved in the present situation, which is, I agree with the Senator, an alliance, if you wish to use that word, of a type which is easily distinguished from the historic tradition that I am talking about.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think there is no dispute whatsoever about that. There have been many alliances in the past and probably the customary alliance in the past has been, one might also say, an alliance of aggression, that would permit aggression by one of the Allies.

Of course, there is nothing like that in this pact. I do not approach it from that standpoint. But, by the same token, I want the same right to quibble about the word "alliance" as—I should not say quibble—but to dispute the specific definition of the term "alliance," and reserve my own interpretation of what alliance is.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Secretary just one question which occurs to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that agreeable to you, Senator?

Senator LODGE. I would like to get at him some time.

CHOICE BETWEEN CUTTING MILITARY APPROPRIATIONS OR CUTTING MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Just one question I want to ask the Secretary. If you, Mr. Secretary, as head of the Military Establishment, had to choose for fiscal 1950 between these alternatives, $15,000,- 000,000 for us and nothing for Europe, in the event the Appropriations Committee said we could not go any further; or $14,000,000,000 for us and $1,000,000,000 for this European implementation, which from the standpoint of purely national security would be the choice we would have to make?

Secretary JOHNSON. We would take the $15,000,000,000 for our own defense.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. And leave the European implementation out?

Secretary JOHNSON. We cannot cut, in our opinion—we have canvassed it thoroughly—this $15,000,000,000 for our own defense.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Lodge.

Senator LODGE. Mr. Chairman—

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Thank you, Senator Lodge, I apologize for interrupting.

COMPARISON OF TREATY TO MILITARY ALLIANCES

Senator LODGE. Not at all; not at all. If, by the word "military alliance" we mean an aggressive combination of nations who are going out on the rampage to attack and oppress people, this is not a military alliance, is it?

Secretary JOHNSON. We agree.

Senator LODGE. If by "military alliance" you mean a group of nations who were gathered together in a spirit of cynicism and opportunism, without regard to any common idealistic values, this is not a military alliance; is it?

Secretary JOHNSON. I agree.

Senator LODGE. When you read these two provisions in the North Atlantic Treaty, and I quote:

They (the parties) are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law.

And the following:

The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions * * *.

Do you not come to the conclusion that this North Atlantic Treaty is not purely a cynical device, that it is animated by a certain community of ideals?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do.

Senator LODGE. Is it not also true that there is no time limit set in this North Atlantic Treaty by which a certain state of military readiness must be obtained?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is true.

Senator LODGE. Is it not also true that there is nothing in this North Atlantic Treaty which either expressly or impliedly commits the United States to any particular strategic plan or to fight in any particular place or in any particular way?

BUDGET MESSAGE FIGURES FOR MILITARY AID

Secretary JOHNSON. That is true.

Senator LODGE. You stand, I presume, do you not, on the budget message of the President insofar as the figures on national defense are concerned?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do, sir.

Senator LODGE. Is there anything in that budget message which relates to military aid to foreign countries?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, sir. Wait a minute; there is one item. Your question does not contemplate it, but we want to keep this record straight. There is this one item.

Senator LODGE. What is it? The $400,000,000?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is it.

Senator LODGE. So this amount of $1,100,000,000 is over what there is in the President's budget. Is that not right?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir. We are talking about the Turkish-Greek item.

Senator LODGE. The what?

Secretary JOHNSON. Greek-Turkish.

Senator LODGE. Is it not consistent to be in support of the budget message and at the same time welcome a new opportunity that comes along, wherein, by making some outlay now, we develop a great source of military strength for the future?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir.

Senator LODGE. Certainly there is no inconsistency there, is there?

Secretary JOHNSON. None at all.

Senator LODGE. Now, you, in addition to being Secretary of Defense—

Secretary JOHNSON. You recall in that budget message there was a reference, or the President referred, in discussing these items, in language I will not attempt to quote, to the need of further aid along this line that we now come to here.

Senator LODGE. So the idea was foreshadowed.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator LODGE. In addition to being Secretary of Defense, you are also an American citizen and taxpayer, and in that respect are concerned with the total American economy, the way we all are?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir.

IMPACT ON THE DOMESTIC ECONOMY

Senator LODGE. Do you consider that this added expense imposes a burden on the American economy; that it is the straw that breaks the camel's back and plunges us into a condition in which we have to go to rationing, allocation, and a change in our economic set-up?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do not.

Senator LODGE. I presume you believe that that point can be reached some time?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do. And that is why I want to try to use this in helping these people abroad to build up, so that we might cut down within the National Military Establishment.

Senator LODGE. Certainly it is true, is it not, that at the root of our military strength lies the American productive economy?

Secretary JOHNSON. You are right.

Senator LODGE. And that lies not only at the root of our own Military Establishment, but it has a very intimate relationship with the military establishments of friendly nations?

Secretary JOHNSON. You are quite right, Senator Lodge.

Senator LODGE. They will be almost as badly affected as we will if we had killed the goose that laid the golden eggs.

Secretary JOHNSON. Quite right again.

Senator LODGE. There are a number of questions which I think should be answered in order to make this record complete. I think one of the jobs this committee has to do is to develop a record in which the student of this problem will find an answer to any question he may ask. It may not be an answer he agrees with, but there ought to be some sort of an answer.

I have been asked these questions by Senators and friends of mine in the press and others, and I will try not to ask any questions which involve any matter of security. But if I by inadvertence do so, please do not hesitate to say no.

ALLOCATION OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

I am right, am I not, that it is not possible at the present time, at least, to make any statement as to the partition of these sums between foreign countries? Is that not correct?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is correct. We are not physically ready to do it, and I would just like to discuss with you frankly at some stage when we are ready the advisability of making it a public matter.

Senator LODGE. Would that not involve clearance with the foreign countries, in addition to consultation with our own interests?

Secretary JOHNSON. It would, indeed.

Senator LODGE. That is a matter of international comity.

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir. They have given us in confidence what they want and what they have. We have got to pay the game fairly and honestly with them.

FUTURE COMMITMENTS OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator LODGE. Senator Tydings has asked for a great many figures, which I think are essential to furnish at the proper time; but there are a few questions which I would like to ask in addition. Senators have asked me repeatedly what commitment this imposes insofar as future expenditures are concerned.

Secretary JOHNSON. None.

Senator LODGE. That is a good, clear answer. So we have a request of $1,400,000,000 whatever it is, for this immediate year.

Senator VANDENBERG. $1,100,000,000 for this immediate year.

Secretary JOHNSON. Even if we knew what it would be, we would not ask you for a commitment that we could give for future years that might interfere with the efficiency of the operation of this, if you authorize the $1,100,000.

Senator LODGE. Say that again?

Secretary JOHNSON. If you fixed out a program for 3 or 4 years you were going to do in this, you take away from the National Military Establishment and the executive department the power to try to use this $1,100,000,000 so it makes them assist within their own economies in building up that which we try to aid.

Senator LODGE. So this is not at all comparable to the 4-year program of ECA or to any of these concepts which do tie us down to some degree over a period of years? This is not in that category at all?

Secretary JOHNSON. As long as they have to cooperate to the limit of their ability on an intelligent use of that which is allocated to them, and we have to justify that to you when we come back asking for more funds, they are going to cooperate a lot better than if you had said so many dollars this year, so many dollars next year, to these countries.

We cannot control it, cannot influence it, and what we seek is strength.

Senator LODGE. That is right, and maximum self-help on the part of these other countries.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is the phrase I was reaching for and could not find.

Senator LODGE. Continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid; that is the phrasing in the treaty, and you lay a lot of importance on that?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do, sir.

DURABILITY OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE MATERIAL

Senator LODGE. Is it not true, though—I think you can probably answer this question—that, broadly speaking, most of the articles which we would send over under the terms of this pact would be in a sense capital goods, goods that would not be readily expendable such as if we said a gun or a tank or a rifle? Those are items that last for quite a long while. Would not many of the articles be within that category?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator LODGE. So it is not comparable to lend-lease or to a wartime situation where whatever you send is being used up almost as fast as you send it?

Secretary JOHNSON. It is not that type, sir.

CONTEMPLATED EXPORT OF FACTORIES AND MACHINE TOOLS

Senator LODGE. The question has been asked me whether it is planned to export factories or machine tools, the wherewith to make these weapons. Is that included in this figure?

Secretary JOHNSON. The General says not entire factories, that is true, not complete facilities for factories, and so forth. But, Senator, there might be an instance where within a plant that they have and a facility they have, we might send some machine tools and jigs and dies.

Senator LODGE. Of an ordnance character?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, to fill out what they have; but not an approach where we set up a whole plant or a factory. No, that is out.

RATIO OF AMERICAN ASSISTANCE TO EUROPEAN SELF-HELP

Senator LODGE. In general, would this not be true, that five to six times as much is being spent by the nations of Europe to build themselves up militarily as we would be spending?

Secretary JOHNSON. We hope the ratio—I know what it is—

Senator LODGE. Mr. Acheson—

Secretary JOHNSON. He said it; it is about 1 in 7.

Senator LODGE. He said that.

Secretary JOHNSON. I just did not want to put that in here. That is State Department business.

Senator LODGE. So that with our desire to help some particular European factory, that would much more likely come under ECA as part of an economic consideration?

Secretary JOHNSON. That ties in. That is what I meant when the first question was asked me, maybe by Senator Vandenberg; the dollars that we put in there, if we make them tie them into their economy and build-up, since they are going to get these 6 additional dollars, go a lot further than the dollar here if you added it to our military appropriation bill.

UNITED STATES MILITARY MATERIEL AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator LODGE. The statement has been made here by one Senator that if we turn over a piece of equipment to a foreign country that we have definitely incurred a loss. That has been rankling in me ever since it was made. I would like to put a hypothetical case to you.

Secretary JOHNSON. If anybody said that to me today, I did not hear it.

Senator LODGE. Yes; it was said here today.

Secretary JOHNSON. He got the right answer to that one.

Senator LODGE. Let me take the case of the tank with which we began World War II, the tank that had the 75-millimeter gun mounted on the side so that it could only traverse a little way—I think it was the General Grant tank, if my memory is not wrong.

Let us assume that that is a piece of equipment which could be quite effectively used in certain types of employment in certain countries, but that if we were to keep those tanks here and undertake to man them and train people in their use, have them learn an obsolete firing system and an obsolete motor maintenance and obsolete tactics on a weapon that had very few offensive capabilities, we would actually be doing ourselves a bad turn.

So you would have a piece of equipment which not only is beneficial or could be beneficial, to the foreign countries, but the retention of which might be a positive disadvantage to us. Is that not conceivable?

Secretary JOHNSON. You are quite right. I am sorry I did not make that point.

Senator LODGE. It seems to me you are better off giving it to somebody who can use it.

Secretary JOHNSON. I agree with you.

Senator LODGE. So it is not a case of subtracting something from what you have got. You are getting rid of something that really is not doing you any good. It is doing you harm.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. If I may interrupt, I understood the Secretary to say what we expected to furnish over there was late equipment and not obsolete equipment.

Senator LODGE. But the point is, Senator, the thing that is obsolete for us is not necessarily obsolete for another country, because the employment which the other country wants to make of it is entirely different. That to me is perfectly clear. There are an awful lot of things that you can use if you are engaged in suppressing fifth-column activity, or if you are engaged in a purely defensive role, that you can get very little good out of it if you are trying to go in on an offensive mission.

There is, of course, no doubt, is there, of our ability to control the use to which equipment is put?

Secretary JOHNSON. None at all.

Senator LODGE. And if we wanted to see to it, for instance, that our equipment was not utilized to promote something like this Indonesian venture, we would have the power to see to it?

Secretary JOHNSON. We of the Military Establishment will have the power to do it this year, and we will have to report to you so you have the power and control of approval of how we have done it.

EFFECT OF ITALIAN PEACE TREATY LIMITATIONS ON THE TREATY

Senator LODGE. Now, the question has been asked as to whether the limitation that is in the Italian peace treaty on the size of the Italian defense establishment is any argument against this North Atlantic Pact, in view of the fact that Italy is adhering to the pact.

I wonder if you care to comment on that?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right. I think you have got to leave that to General Bradley, in looking at the strategic picture, speaking for the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and maybe the State Department may want to express an opinion. You are getting into pretty deep military waters there.

Senator LODGE. It is perfectly agreeable to me. Yesterday Senator Hickenlooper asked a very interesting question which has been in the minds of a great many people, and which he phrased very clearly. It was something like this:

WILL TO RESIST IN 1939 AND 1949

If the will to win of the nations of western Europe was as poor as it was in 1939, when they had much larger armies than they have in 1949, what makes you think that their will to win is going to be better in 1949?

I would like to ask if you have any comment you would care to make on that question?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, I cannot answer that. I think that it is a question of measured risk. It is a considered risk, and that very element has been discussed in the National Military Establishment. It is not one that you can give any fixed answer about.

I do know that what you have heretofore done in the Congress, in certain parts of the world has been almost completely successful in what you have sought. I can think of a country that maybe it is not right to name it here, in which, with the assistance you have given it, there is today no communism, and there is the will to resist and they will resist.

I believe that would not have been possible except for the American aid you have given them. I believe it inadvisable to name the country.

LESSONS DRAWN FROM 1939

Senator LODGE. Let me ask you this, Mr. Secretary. Is it not true that in western Europe the nations that have been through the fires of 1939 have had an experience which has probably taught them something that will be of use to them in the future?

Secretary JOHNSON. If I were in the State Department, probably I would not say this; but as an individual, not as Secretary of Defense, I think that some of the peoples who now want to be our friends have seen those who went into the orbit of another country cut up, independence lost, and a slave state created. This means that the probability is that these Western countries who have now come with us are really going to stick it out and profit by what they have seen.

I do believe that the fires from 1939 on have taught them something, and that their morale and their military establishments will not reflect the heedless days of 1939. This is an individual statement. I do not speak for the Administration thereon.

Senator LODGE. Is it not true that the French army, for instance, which was very much disorganized in 1939 eventually rebuilt itself with our assistance into an army which rendered a good account of itself in 1944 and 1945?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is absolutely true.

Senator LODGE. And is it not true also that the Italian partisan formations which fought in cooperation with us in Italy in 1944 and 1945 were of great utility to us?

Secretary JOHNSON. There is no doubt, Senator, what you do here, here, even if there should be aggression somewhere else, is going to leave us with friends indeed if those friends are not going to be overrun.

Senator LODGE. Are you not favorably impressed with the headway that has been made in Europe in the development of an European command and agreed to strategic plan?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator LODGE. You do not, however, do you, expect much quick progress in the way of standardization of weapons in the next year?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, sir.

Senator LODGE. But you do hope to make some headway along that line?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

Senator LODGE. That concludes my questioning, Mr. Chairman. I would like to make one suggestion, and that is that the State Department prepare a memorandum for inclusion in the record on these so-called evil military alliances that we have been discussing here today, so that it will be clear for all to see what the difference is between this pact and these military alliances of the past.

I do not say that they ought to give the direct texts of all these military alliances, but a brief sketch that would show the difference between an automatic go-to-war offensive, cynical, opportunists, old-fashioned power politics, European military alliance, and the type of partnership for peace that we contemplate here.

(The document will be found in the appendix.)

Senator LODGE. Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

Secretary JOHNSON. Thank you for your help, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We have Senator Donnell with us, and the Senator is permitted to ask questions of the Secretary.

I will say to Senator Donnell these other Senators are just going to run over and vote and come back. So we need not interrupt him at all.

COMMON DEFENSE

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, this afternoon in large part the discussion has been in regard to matters relating to equipment. Now, I want to discuss, or have you answer, if you will, some questions along another line. I am particularly interested in the first sentence on page 4 of your statement which reads as follows:

We must keep constantly in mind the three fundamentals of preparedness: manpower, materials, and suitable positions from which to employ them in the event of attack.

Then you proceed to the next sentence:

The treaty goes far toward making available for the common defense the manpower and strategic positions.

Now, it is particularly, Mr. Secretary, along the line of manpower that I want to ask you some questions. In the first place, I would like to ask you if you heard or saw the Army Day speech of General Bradley on April 6 of this year?

Secretary JOHNSON. Only what was printed in the newspapers.

Senator DONNELL. There are three sentences here I would call to your attention, if I may, before questioning you. He said this:

At present, the balance of military power is centered in the United States.

Secretary JOHNSON. I did not get your first sentence.

Senator DONNELL. I was quoting, Mr. Secretary, from the address of General Bradley as I have it of April 6. That is, the quotation has been given to me as follows:

At present, the balance of military power is centered in the United States, 3,000 miles from the heart of Europe. It must be perfectly apparent to the people of the United States that we cannot count on friends in western Europe if our strategy in the event of war dictates that we shall first abandon them to the enemy, with a promise of later liberation.

Yet, that is the only strategy that can prevail if the military balance of power in Europe is to be carried on the wings of our bombers and deposited in reserves this side of the ocean.

Do you know what he was referring to by the term "reserves this side of the ocean"?

Secretary JOHNSON. As I read that sentence, which I now have before me, it means the industrial set-up and equipment and the fighting manpower of America.

Senator DONNELL. It includes both the industrial set-up and the fighting manpower of America?

Secretary JOHNSON. In my opinion that is what he meant. He will be here, and you can ask him about that if you want.

Senator DONNELL. If the chairman will permit me, I intend to do that. May I ask you, Mr. Secretary, whether in your opinion—

Secretary JOHNSON. I do not know where you are headed in your questions, and I do not mean to interfere with you; but you must not overlook the next paragraph:

Unless plans for common defense of the existing free world provide for the security of western Europe, these people cannot be expected to stake their lives in the common cause. As long as the helplessness of western Europe would invite military aggression, its increasing prosperity shall grow more tempting to the armies from the East.

Not until we share our strength on a common defensive front can we hope to replace this temptation with a real deterrent to war.

PROVISION OF MASS MANPOWER FOR EUROPE

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, may I ask you whether or not the plan has been considered of so providing manpower for Europe as to place adequate divisions along the Rhine for the purpose of slowing down and absorbing the shock in the event of a Russian attack? Has that plan been considered, if you are able to tell?

Secretary JOHNSON. That question I cannot answer.

Senator DONNELL. You mean you would prefer not to answer?

Secretary JOHNSON. That question I am saying I will not answer.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. I am not pressing it at all, but I ask whether or not it had been considered, and I understand you to decline to answer that?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. Mr. Secretary, would you tell us, or do you feel that you are at liberty to do so in view of considerations of national security, whether you think the signatories to the pact, other than the United States of America, could hold Europe against Russia if only the manpower of the signatories is used and without any manpower of our country?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do not think the best interests of our own security are served by answering that question, Senator.

RUSSIAN MANPOWER

Senator DONNELL. Very well. May I ask you in regard to the manpower of Russia, in World War II, am I correct in understanding that Stalin equipped and fought some 11,000,000 soldiers during World War II?

Secretary JOHNSON. Senator, I have just asked about this figure.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

Secretary JOHNSON. I would like later to correct this if I am wrong. I think the figure is in excess of 11,000,000; but your question is not quite a fair question.

Senator DONNELL. I mean to make it fair.

Secretary JOHNSON. It is not fair.

Senator DONNELL. In what respect?

Secretary JOHNSON. He did that, whatever the figure is, with the help and industrial might of these United States and not as your question implies.

Senator DONNELL. I had no implication one way or the other on that, Mr. Secretary, and did not intend it.

Secretary JOHNSON. I did not want anybody else hearing or reading that to draw any such implications.

Senator DONNELL. I certainly welcome any corrections from the standpoint of fairness or otherwise.

Secretary JOHNSON. We will get along all right.

Senator DONNELL. In other words, it is a fact, is it not, Mr. Secretary, that Stalin used 502 divisions against Germany on the eastern front?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do not know how many divisions he used; but General Bradley can, without flicking an eyelid, give you the exact figures on that.

AMERICAN MILITARY MANPOWER

Senator DONNELL. Do you know, Mr. Secretary, whether the total number of divisions which the United States of America exported in World War II was 89, which it sent out from the United States? I am not talking solely about Europe.

Secretary JOHNSON. Eighty-nine is our total number of divisions, if my offhand recollection is correct, Mr. Chairman. The question was exported. I do not know quite what exported means. We did not send out of the country 89.

Senator DONNELL. I have just stated by the term "exported" I meant sent from the United States of America.

Secretary JOHNSON. Then your question is wrong. If you have no objection, General Bradley will give you that information.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. Am I correct in this, Mr. Secretary, that of the divisions of United States soldiers in World War II, only 63 were used in Europe? Is that correct, if you know?

Secretary JOHNSON. You had better wait and ask those questions of General Bradley, because where I do not know, I should not answer. I think I know the answer to that one, but it may be wrong. Why do you not, in fairness to me, ask the most competent military authority who is coming to answer such questions?

Senator DONNELL. Well, Mr. Secretary, I am perfectly willing to ask him; but I thought if you knew, you would have no objection to telling us. If you do not know, of course I cannot press it.

NECESSITY OF AMERICAN TROOPS ABROAD

Senator DONNELL. Are you willing to tell us whether or not it is advisable, considering the matter of national defense and national security—I shall not press this question if you do not desire to answer it—but are you willing to tell us whether or not, in order to hold Europe for a few weeks, say 4 weeks, as against Russian attack, considering the number of troops Russia could put into the field, it would be absolutely necessary that United States troops be sent to Europe in order to accomplish that result?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do not think it serves the best interests of any of those governments or ourselves to answer that.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. Therefore, then you are not willing to state because you deem it inadvisable from a standpoint of national security, whether you believe it would be necessary for troops to be conscripted in the United States under the terms of the Atlantic Pact? I do not mean under the terms of it, but in pursuance of the purposes of the Atlantic Pact?

Secretary JOHNSON. You give it another twist. On the first question, I think neither General Bradley nor myself will answer. Now you are bringing in the question of conscription. That has not been involved in your question before, and it is not in any answer I have made or will make.

CONSCRIPTION AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator DONNELL. I am asking you now whether you are willing to state if conscription would be necessary in order to hold Europe as against Russian attack for a period of 4 weeks.

Secretary JOHNSON. I think not.

Senator DONNELL. You do not think conscription would be necessary, or you mean you are not answering?

Secretary JOHNSON. I think we are going to give you a competent authority to answer that, and I think fairness would require that your question be asked of him.

COMBAT EFFECTIVENESS OF OUR ALLIES

Senator DONNELL. Very well, I shall not push that further. May I ask you this question, Mr. Secretary, if you are informed upon this? This has to do with the combat effectiveness of our allies in World War II, just how much actual strength there is among the signatories of this pact as it existed in World War II.

Now, Belgium is one of the signers of this pact, is it not?

Secretary JOHNSON. I can tell you now, I do not know the answer to that. If you want that, you had better tell us, and we will dig it up from the files. I do not think General Bradley can answer that offhand.

Senator DONNELL. You do not think he could answer what? Whether Belgium was a signer of the pact?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, the number of divisions of each of these—

Senator DONNELL. That is not what I was going to ask. I have not got to that yet. Belgium is one of the signers of this pact. That is true, is it not?

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know whether Belgium fought in the last two World Wars at all, whether she placed any troops into the field?

Secretary JOHNSON. I happened to be over in that part of the world in the First World War. Very definitely I do know that they did, and I know from what newspapers, history, and records show that they did in the second.

TROOPS SUPPLIED BY BELGIUM IN WORLD WAR II

Senator DONNELL. Do you know approximately how many troops in each of those two wars that Belgium placed in the field?

Secretary JOHNSON. I have a general estimate, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Are you willing to tell us, sir?

Secretary JOHNSON. No, sir; because if you want that, just tell us and we will get it for you.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. I shall not pursue this down the line. But I should like to ask you if you will furnish us, or have General Bradley prepared to furnish when he comes here, the information as to the number of troops that each one of the signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty provided in World War II.

Secretary JOHNSON. No. 2?

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir. I do not think it is necessary to ask about No. 1. I think World War II would be sufficient.

END USE CONTROLS

Mr. Secretary, I wanted to direct your attention to another question, that is, the possibility of the use of equipment which this country might furnish under the North Atlantic Treaty, the possibility of the use of that equipment by those who are the other signers of the treaty for purposes which we might not favor.

There are two of the signatories, are there not, who are at present at war with their own colonies, namely, France and the Netherlands?

Secretary JOHNSON. Just what do you want to know about France and Netherlands along that line?

Senator DONNELL. Are they at war with their own colonies, any of their colonies, at this time?

Secretary JOHNSON. I do not know.

Senator DONNELL. You know of the Netherlands being at war in Indonesia, do you not?

Secretary JOHNSON. I know that they were.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

Secretary JOHNSON. I saw in the paper that France was having some troubles, I believe, with Morocco or someone. But you are asking me about something knowledge of which I do not possess as an expert, and where I do not know, I am not going to answer.

Senator DONNELL. I would not want you to; I certainly would not. I wanted to ask your opinion, however, of this question, regardless of whether or not you are familiar with the actual facts as to these particular countries.

If equipment should be sent by our country under the terms of the North Atlantic Treaty to a country which is itself engaged in war against its own colony or colonies, would not one of two situations be possible? First, that such country might use some or all of that material in the fighting against its colony; or, if by reason of precaution in our agreement with it as to the furnishing of that equipment, it could use the equipment which it received for the purpose of releasing other equipment to be used in the war against its own colonies?

Secretary JOHNSON. As to the other equipment, there would not be too much we could do about it. As to that which we furnished, we can control it within the area of this treaty.

Senator DONNELL. And just how would you control that? What type of policing would you have in order to be sure that each country would use that equipment solely for purposes that the United States thinks proper?

Secretary JOHNSON. Their very dependency upon us for future aid in that field would enable us to control it within that area. If you have to worry on that score, we can give proper assurances, Mr. Chairman, that that will not happen. American equipment that goes in will be used within the terms and purports of the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. When it is given to them or furnished to them, would not it be understood in the agreements that it is to be used under this treaty?

Secretary JOHNSON. We can control that. He wants to know how we can control it. How we control it will be determined later. That it will be controlled we tell you now.

The CHAIRMAN. But when we supply them with this material, will it not be understood that it is to be used under this treaty?

Secretary JOHNSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And not for general warfare, general expedition.

Secretary JOHNSON. That is right, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, a message from the minority leader—I suppose he is trying to get all of us members of the minority party there. I will waive any further examination of the Secretary.

Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

Secretary JOHNSON. If there is other stuff like that that you want which we can under security furnish, give us a list of that. It is not fair to General Bradley to ask him how many troops Belgium fought in the area in 1925. You ought to give him a little tip-off.

The CHAIRMAN. We are obliged to you, Mr. Secretary.

The committee stands adjourned until 10:30 tomorrow morning in this room.

(Thereupon, at 4:55 p. m., the committee recessed until Friday morning, at 10:30 a. m., April 29, 1949.)

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment on April 28, 1949, at 10:30 a. m. in room 318 Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), George, Thomas of Utah, Tydings, Green, Vandenberg, Wiley, Smith of New Jersey, and Hick-enlooper.

Also present: Senators Donnell and Watkins.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order.

This is the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, holding hearings on what is popularly known as the North Atlantic Pact. We have the pleasure and honor today of having before us Mr. Harriman, who is the Chief of the European Branch of the ECA. His office is in Paris and he is well equipped to testify regarding European matters, both with regard to ECA and the pending treaty.

We are very glad indeed to have you, Mr. Ambassador, and we will be glad to have a formal statement if you have one prepared, and after you have had the pleasure of reading that you will be subjected to questioning by members of the committee if they so desired. Is that agreeable to you?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well; you may proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. W. AVERELL HARRIMAN, UNITED STATES SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVE IN EUROPE, ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am grateful for this opportunity to express to you what I feel to be the meaning of the North Atlantic Treaty to our European partners, namely the governments and people of the participating countries, and how it relates to the European recovery program. Testimony has already been given on other aspects of the treaty, including its relation to the United Nations. I speak from my own experience during the past year as United States Special Representative in Europe for the Economic Cooperation Administration and from those of our missions in the different countries. I also speak from my earlier experience during the past 8 years much of which I have spent in different parts of Europe.

EUROPEAN RECOVERY UNDER ERP

Early in February, I testified before this committee at the hearings on the Economic Cooperation Act and gave certain information and figures on the strides that have been made toward economic recovery in western Europe. I explained, however, that progress could not be measured alone in terms of food, industry and trade. I stated (and I quote from my testimony) :

No one who has had occasion, as I have had, to see Europe in the summer of 1947 and to see it again today, can fail to be struck by the deeper progress in the things of the human spirit. Hope, and the will to resist tyranny, were ebbing in Europe in 1947. They are flowing again today. It is this—the will to live as freemen and to go forward toward a future which, while it cannot be precisely foreseen, can yet be believed in—that is, to my mind, the most heartening and significant development in Europe since the Marshall proposal and the measures to give it effect. It is this which has made possible the increased efforts of the ordinary men and women visible throughout Europe today. It is this which has made it possible for the governments of the participating countries to face up to the rigorous measures which are needed. And it is this which has arrested the spread of reactionary Communist aggression. Without this revival, the Communists might well have succeeded in their design to get control of Italy, which was frustrated in the elections of April 1948; nor could the Communists have been kept out of the Government of France.

FEAR IN EUROPE

Progress until recently has thus been based on hope, but there still have been disrupting influences. In February, in my testimony, I stated:

It is my conviction that the USSR regards the fear of war as an instrument to be used in the course of its scheme of moral and psychological disruption. The fear of war tends to kill hope for the future, and with it initiative, enterprise and investment, all essential to the recovery of Europe.

GROWING CONFIDENCE IN EUROPE

In the intervening months, I have traveled in many of the participating countries during the period when the North Atlantic Treaty has been under consideration. I can testify that a new factor has developed, a growth of confidence, based on the belief that through the North Atlantic Pact security from external aggression can be attained. Fear is a contagious and frustrating emotion. But confidence, too, is contagious, and is a constructive and creative human emotion. Confidence is essential for the eventual success of the recovery program and the maintenance of determination to resist internal and external aggression.

EUROPEAN DISCUSSION OF ATLANTIC PACT

We are dealing with some 200,000,000 people facing varying problems, but all with a tradition of liberty and freedom. Discussions in these different countries leading up to the decision to sign the Atlantic Pact were sober and searching. This decision was based on the acceptance of the principle that neither appeasement nor neutrality could be relied upon, that it was only through unity of purpose and action of freemen that there could be hope for future peace and security. This was a momentous decision. The decision was based on the two principal articles of the pact, namely, article 5 and article 3, first—that an armed attack against one * * * shall be considered an attack against * * * all—and secondly—

* * * means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid * * * to resist armed attack.

In the European mind, these two concepts have been, I feel, inseparable. The first is that unity of purpose among the free nations would be a powerful deterrent to any aggressor, and the second that through self-help and mutual aid, effective military establishments can be developed as an assurance of defense.

IMPORTANCE OF UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN ATLANTIC PACT

The participation of the United States in the pact is of course the factor which is basic to the development of confidence. The Brussels Pact, entered into a year ago between Britain, France, and the Benelux countries, was a search for common security measures. Yet the Europeans know that without the United States, no association among the free peoples of western Europe would be effective. The strength of the United States gives strength and meaning to the pact. The proposal for military aid from the United States gives vitality and meaning to the concept of effective self-help and mutual aid to resist armed attack. The Europeans have confidence in us, have confidence that in any war we would eventually be victorious. But they recognize only too well that as things stand today, they would be overrun, and when their countries were again liberated, the life of their people would be irreparably destroyed. Thus article 5 of the pact cannot stand by itself in the development of the confidence essential in making this association effective in serving the needs of the people of Europe and of the people of the United States. For the pact to have real meaning, I am convinced there must be a willingness to implement promptly article 3. European nations are prepared, I believe, to contribute their share in self-help and mutual aid. They cannot, however, develop an effective military establishment alone. They need military equipment and raw materials from us to supplement what they can do for themselves. Assistance from us is vital to the growth of mutual confidence. It will be concrete evidence that we have real concern for their problems of self-defense.

BENEFITS TO UNITED STATES FROM TREATY

From our standpoint, I feel that our security can be immeasurably increased as time goes on and as the military forces of the western European countries are strengthened. I think we should look at the productive capacity of the signatories of the Atlantic Pact. For example, between us we have four times the coal and four times the steel production of the Soviet Union and its satellites, and a labor force substantially greater. The productivity of our mutual labor force is vastly greater than that of the backward countries of the East, on a man-by-man basis. The western European participants alone have greater industrial productive capacity than the countries behind the iron curtain. It does not seem unreasonable to me to have confidence that in time an effective defensive force can be developed which would provide a real sense of security. It is well always to bear in mind that no one has any thought of an armament program for aggression. The only thought in anyone's mind is the thought of defense. A defensive force is relatively small and cannot be a threat of aggression.

In looking at the world today, I feel we need strong and vigorous partners, of like mind and intent. The North Atlantic Treaty gives us this association with like-minded people. They are vigorous people but they need help in rebuilding their strength. Of prime importance is the European recovery program. All agree that nothing should be permitted to interfere with that. But alongside of it, I earnestly believe we should help our associates, and it is very much in our own interest to help our associates, in their own efforts to build up means to defend themselves.

If the United States consistently pursues the policies which have been adopted in supporting the European recovery program, if we will now enter the Atlantic Pact and honestly implement article 3, we can look forward to the time when we ourselves can feel confident in our search for peace and security.

The North Atlantic Pact is one of the great concepts of history. If we join it with enthusiasm and implement it with American determination, we will contribute to the confidence and will of freemen the world over.

GROWING CONFIDENCE IN EUROPE

In western Europe today, there is a growing wave of confidence, confidence instilled by the concept of the North Atlantic Treaty, that freemen will stand together in common defense of their liberty and freedom. Should we turn aside at this moment, I doubt whether we can ever again recapture that spirit.

To succeed in what I earnestly believe is our winning struggle in Europe for freedom and peace, America must be resolute and steadfast.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Ambassador, you have in your capacity as representative of the ECA in Europe, had opportunity, of course, to contact a great many countries and to visit in those countries; is that true?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have said there is a marked improvement industrially and commercially and so on among these countries; is that true?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir.

IMPROVEMENT IN EUROPEAN MORALE

The CHAIRMAN. Now, my question is, To what extent has that improvement lifted their morale? Have the operations of the ECA given strength to the revival of the spirit?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. As I said briefly in my testimony, I feel that the spirit of Europe is completely different from what it was in the summer of 1947, when the Marshall proposal was put forward. The recovery program has changed the whole feeling of the people of Europe, hope has been inspired, with the results that have been obtained, of course, they see concrete evidence in the ability to get enough food to live and in other ways that progress is being made, and with progress, of course, comes greater hope for the future. That is true in all of the countries. Of course, the conditions of the different countries are different. I am making a general statement. And there have been concrete results from that in the determination to resist internal and external aggression.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, it has stiffened their spirit of resistance, you would say?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It has given them hope and very much stiffened their will to resist internal and external aggression.

MUTUAL AID AND SELF-HELP

The CHAIRMAN. You have observed, Mr. Ambassador, a clause in the treaty putting the obligation upon all of the signatories of mutual self-help and assistance, and so forth, and so on, and also the obligation of these various countries to improve their condition and help themselves along the lines of the treaty. You have observed that, have you not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Mr. Chairman, the only countries where there has been any evidence of it so far of course, has been the Brussels Pact countries, where they have had these matters under consideration for the past year. The consideration of the treaty is so new that there has been no specific plan, but from my discussions I can assure you that each one of them has its own determination to do what it can, and is discussing what it can do to contribute to its partners in the North Atlantic Treaty.

IMPORTANCE OF SELF-HELP

The CHAIRMAN. You have somewhat anticipated my other question, but it is all right. In your contacts with these various governments and their representatives, do you or do you not find the determination to carry out the injunctions of the treaty to exert themselves to the utmost to accomplish these things, and not rely solely upon the United States?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. They agree with us that the European recovery program must have a higher priority, but all of them are trying to find ways and means by which they can expand production of equipment and supplies which are needed for military establishments, not only by themselves but of their partners in the North Atlantic Treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the treaty provide for American assistance and aid? It seems to me that the European nations must be impressed with the fact that we are not expected, at least, to carry all of the load on this program, and that they should exert themselves to the utmost. What we shall do will be more or less supplementary to their own efforts. Is that understood?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Mr. Chairman, all of the discussions I have had with any European nations have related to aid from America in the matter of equipment which they are not now able to produce themselves. And they are discussing what they can do to expand their production in this field. In other words, they take article 3 seriously from the standpoint of their obligations under it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I was getting at. I wanted to know if they have been seriously impressed with the obligations that this treaty puts on them to exert themselves to the utmost to meet the requirements of the program.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Mr. Chairman, their desire to be in a stronger position is such that I have found no evidence that they were not keen to do what they can for themselves. They recognize that whatever comes from us will be a plus that can not be the basis of their rearmament program.

COOPERATION AMONG BRUSSELS PACT NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. The Brussels Pact countries have, have they not, made substantial progress since the formation of their agreements?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The Military Establishment can tell you more than I can about it, sir, but they have established committees of mutual defense and are working on a program of mutual assistance. That is the only area of Europe where that sort of thing on a mutual assistance basis has been started. The spirit of that organization is such as to indicate the general spirit of Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. Have they or have they not set up a staff arrangement looking toward the unification or rather the association of their military establishments?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir; military staffs, supply staffs, and other joint committees on different aspects of the military and supply program.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it your belief or within your knowledge that these staff arrangements can be very easily fitted into this program under the treaty without duplication?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to answer you that, except to say that what has been done so far naturally is a contribution to what comes next. What the relation of the Brussels Pact present arrangements would be to the arrangements contemplated under the North Atlantic treaty I cannot say.

CONTRIBUTION OF BRUSSELS PACT COUNTRIES IN ATLANTIC TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, some of these countries are equipped to make substantial contributions to the armaments phase of this treaty, and others are not. In the case of Belgium, it is quite a manufacturing point for arms and equipment of a military character, is it not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And naturally it would be expected, probably, to aid in supplying these materials to other nations without having to export them from the United States, is that true?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. Belgium, of course, is relatively an important nation for her size.

The CHAIRMAN. And it has made probably greater progress toward recovery than any of the other nations associated with us in the treaty, has she not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, she has. Life is more normal in Belgium than in many of the other countries.

The CHAIRMAN. My point was that the attitude of these European nations is one not of reliance entirely upon the United States, but that they understand that there must be a very active and vigorous cooperation. They are to assume obligations to do their utmost before the United States shall be expected to take over the program. Is that more or less true?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. It is almost the reverse. They are so keen to get themselves in a stronger position that it does not occur to them that they can rely upon the United States. They know they have got to do the main job themselves, and they want to do it, but they do need assistance from us, particularly in types of military equipment which they cannot produce themselves at the present time.

THE WILL TO RESIST

The CHAIRMAN. A good deal has been said here in these hearings about their spirit of resistance and what would cause them to feel a stronger spirit of resistance. Would you or would you not say that their experience in the last war, the desolation and the ravagement that took place, and the cruelties to themselves, would have a tendency to stiffen their resistance now to a repetition of such outrages in the future?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Each country, of course, differs, but as a general statement the will to resist has grown very markedly among all the participating countries. It is resolute in many of them, and it is growing in others.

As I have said in my testimony, each one is under varying types of pressures and influences, but as a general statement the will to resist is resolute and sound, and growing in larger groups of the populations. Certainly it is in the majority of the populations in all of the countries.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. This treaty, according to our concept, is entirely a defensive treaty?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It has no purposes of aggression or offensive action against any country or group of countries in the world, is that not true?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. There is no thought among the participating countries in Europe of any aggression. Their one desire is to create a situation where they can live in peace and sleep at night without the thought of war coming to them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that feeling more or less general among these nations that we are associating ourselves with?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Among all of the nations with which we are associating ourselves, the overwhelming majority of the people of all nations associated with us.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no thought connected with the treaty of an imperialistic attitude toward the rest of the world?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. That does not exist in Europe today.

ANTI-UNITED STATES PROPAGANDA

The CHAIRMAN. But there is a great deal of propaganda and agitation and falsehoods generated by some countries in Europe against the United States, claiming that we are a great imperialist and we are trying to build up an imperialistic attitude, and that through this treaty we are trying to strengthen that attitude.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. The Communist press, which is small in most countries and fairly large in one or two, when I go to the different capitals, say, or some of them say, "The American Colonial Commissioner has come to give orders to the Government."

The CHAIRMAN. You are sort of a proconsul?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Something like that. We are the imperialist in terms of the Communist attack.

The CHAIRMAN. Do our associates in this treaty realize that that is propaganda and that it is not true, do you think, or do they not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. In most countries it is laughed off. There are one or two countries where there is a large Communist infiltration where those who only read the Communist press I suppose have some impression made on them, but the majority of all the people of even those countries pretty clearly understands what the American motivations are. I will put it that they clearly understand the motivations of the United States, and that is why they want an association with us. They would not associate themselves with us if they believed we had imperialistic intentions. After all, this pact must be ratified by the different legislative branches of the different governments, and they represent the majority of the people.

PRIORITY OF ERP

The CHAIRMAN. Your understanding is that in all of this plan, the treaty and so on, the ECA is to have priority—that the rebuilding of the European system under the provisions of the ECA Act shall have every consideration and priority?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. In my conversations over there it was welcomed that we took such a strong position. When this subject came up of mutual aid, they wanted to be sure that we understood how vital it was for them to reestablish a sound economy.

The CHAIRMAN. A sound economy, if we can reestablish it, of course, will be a basis not only for actual temporary recovery, but for continuous strength in these countries which would aid the purpose of the treaty. Is that not true?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Expanding strength.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; expanding strength.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Expanding strength and greater ability to maintain forces that will be adequately equipped.

COORDINATION OF ECA WITH MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not believe that the operations under the ECA and the action that may be taken under the treaty can be so coordinated and related to each other as not to bring about conflicts of purpose or conflicts of action, so that we can accomplish the objectives of both plans?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. If the treaty is ratified and the military assistant program adopted, it is the intention to have ECA in Europe work closely with the different countries to make sure that their expanded military production in no way interferes with the objectives of the ECA.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Senator Vandenberg?

EMPHASIS ON MUTUAL AID AND SELF-HELP

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I only want to ask the distinguished Ambassador one thing. In his testimony he seems to put paramount emphasis on article 3 of the treaty over the paramount importance of self-help and mutual aid. It seems to me that this is in line with the growing tendency to measure the importance of the North Atlantic Pact by the military aid factor.

Without in any way to discount the argument that can be made regarding the importance of our physical contribution, surely the fundamental importance of this great enterprise is not measured by whether or not we contribute a comparatively trivial $1,130,000,000 of assistance, or whether it is $1,000,000,000 or whether it is $800,000,000. Surely there is a fundamental impulse in this enterprise which far transcends any contribution of that sort, is there not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. If I gave any impression in my testimony of overemphasis on article 3 as against article 5, I appreciate the opportunity to correct it.

I feel, during these discussions, that there is a new feeling developing in Europe, that there will be through the North Atlantic Treaty a new great association among like-minded peoples in the general region that will lead to more intimate relationships in all sorts of ways, and that concept of an association of like-minded people is lifting people's imaginations.

When I emphasized article 3 I correctly stated what I believe is the opinion when they made the decision to put aside reliance on appeasement and neutrality, and those are tempting ideas; they have been tempting in the past. There have been people in this country and people in Europe that have tried to think that that is the way, to put their heads in the sand. They have made the decision that there is a conflict between freedom and dictatorship, and that all free-men must stand together on the side for freedom; and that is the decision which these people have made under different conditions in different countries.

RELATIONSHIP OF ARTICLE V TO ARTICLE III

I tried to indicate, Senator, that, having made that decision, to rely upon this association and to join with it, the natural thing when there is the threat of aggression so close by, is to turn and see what they could do in the way of developing means by which they could protect their people against a possibility of aggressive attack, and it was only because I wanted to try to report to you what I believe to be the feeling in all of these countries, that article 5 is the one they decided upon first, and then article 3 comes along in what they consider the natural sequence. The self-help is one they are ready to get behind. The hope and growing confidence in mutual aid—I should say hope from the article, but confidence when they see it implemented, is of such vital importance, and, as I said in my testimony, the flow of some equipment will be concrete evidence that we have an interest in their problem, namely, self-defense; and unless we give that in evidence, that we are interested in their self-defense, it will take away from this spirit which has been generated by the debate over joining the Atlantic Pact.

Senator VANDENBERG. I am not quarreling with that analysis; and I want to again make it quite plain so there will be no misunderstanding that I am in no sense hostile to the obligation which we confront to seriously consider article 3 and its implications in connection with our action. I simply find myself repelling the idea that the reason the North Atlantic Pact was signed by our associates in this great adventure was article 3.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. That is obviously not a fact. But I tried to indicate that article 5 and article 3 were considered together, but the debate and the soul searching were over article 5, and article 3 came along as an implementation of this determination of free men to stand together.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think we must act under article 3, and I don't want to labor the point, but I should hate to have the importance of the North Atlantic Pact yardsticked by a relatively insignificant sum in respect to the total armament problem of Europe like a billion dollars, and it seems to me that we are tending dangerously toward that sort of concept.

NO PROMISES OF MILITARY AID TO SIGNATORIES

Do you know of any promises that were made to any signatory states in contemplation of the implementation of article 3?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I know of no promises.

Senator VANDENBERG. On the contrary, is it not a fact that there were no promises of any nature under this article?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. There were no promises with which I am familiar, and I do not believe that there are any promises to implement article 3.

Senator VANDENBERG. I would like to state for the record in that connection that I personally interviewed two foreign ministers on this particular point, and they both frankly asserted their hopes in respect to article 3, but categorically denied that they had been given any promises of any nature whatever.

I think that is all I have.

EFFECT OF NATIONALISM ON UNITY

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George, may I interrupt just a minute? I wanted to ask one question, Mr. Ambassador, on the nationalism question.

Of course every country has, or most of them at least have, a feeling of nationalism, just as we have to a certain extent. Do you or do you not believe that that spirit of nationalism in these various countries will hinder or detract from the united action of the countries in carrying out the objectives of this treaty and in acting in a united fashion against aggression against any one of the nations involved?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is a new sense of unity which has developed in Europe as a result of the recovery program. One is for life. The North Atlantic Pact is for security, the deepest of all emotions in men, and that is giving a greater sense of unity of purpose in Europe in the last few weeks since it has been publicly debated and considered.

There is, in my judgment, a determination to work together for the purposes of the pact. It is natural—it is true in our country—that when one part or one country thinks it is entitled to a little more than another there will be discussions about the program, but there is about them a growing sense of unity of objective and purpose, and I am not concerned that that will interfere with the values that we seek in the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. You think, then, that they are realizing that under this treaty there is the necessity of cooperative action if the objectives of the treaty are to be attained in resisting an armed attack upon any one of them? Do you think they realize that and are prepared to meet it?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. I think they interpret the pact as we do.

Senator VANDENBERG. May I just ask one further question?

Mr. Ambassador, I interrogated you about article 3 in a fashion which might have been construed as critical. Now I want to ask you a question which certainly could not be construed in that fashion.

GROWING CONFIDENCE IN EUROPE

As I take it from your testimony, it is your considered conclusion, after first-hand continuous contact with western Europe in the last year or two, that there is now a momentum of confidence?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. And that in the presence of such momentum, which in the language of the street is winning the "cold war," this is the time, of all times, when we should evidence our maximum spirit of cooperation and support?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. The growth of mutual confidence will be tremendously forwarded by concrete evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; Senator George?

INTRA-EUROPEAN TRADE

Senator GEORGE. Mr. Ambassador, to what extent are the European countries trading among themselves? I do not mean to go into detailed figures.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. When I went over to Paris a year ago and studied figures, European trade was on the decline because of the difficulties of exchange problems, unbalance of production, and so forth, and the credits that had been given by certain countries to others had come up to the maximum of their means. It has substantially expanded in this past year, and will expand during the next 12 months.

ABOLISHMENT OF RESTRICTIVE TRADE BARRIERS

Senator GEORGE. Specifically, what barriers have been removed by any one of the states that is in this pact as against any others?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. There have been further discussions in the economic union which has been agreed to between the Benelux countries; there has been a customs union agreed to in principle and it is being implemented between Italy and France. There are discussions of similar nature in the Scandinavian countries. Unfortunately it is a fact that there is a good deal of bilateralism which is essential at the present time to get trade moving, but there is every intention, and we are stimulating it as much as we can, to develop into a general acceleration of European trade. The territories are not a block today; it is the restrictions that have been forced to be placed by the different countries on the importation of goods that used to move in inter-European trade which are considered in a luxury or semiluxury class, and as trade expands those will break down.

Senator GEORGE. Actually, has there been removal of any important restriction between these countries?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. In the areas that I have mentioned; yes. Generally, unfortunately, conditions of the balance of production have not been such that there could be a widespread freeing of trade except by bilateral agreements.

Senator GEORGE. Are you prepared to give to this committee any illustration or instance or example of the actual removal of barriers between these countries, or are you merely expressing a hope?

WILL TO RESIST DIRECTED AT ONE POSSIBLE AGGRESSOR

Senator GEORGE. When you speak of a growing spirit of unity in these European states, do you not mean that there is a growth in the spirit to resist a single outside aggressor, primarily?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Of course, in the European mind that is the immediate concern. But this pact is interpreted to include all aggressors. Germany has been an aggressor in the past, and I have found less concern about our policies with regard to Germany since the Atlantic Pact has been under consideration and signed by us all.

Senator GEORGE. But the question I am putting is this, that when we have done with all the fine phrases about European unity, is it not in fact a unity against a single visualized aggressor, primarily?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Well, there have been two things that have brought the spirit of unity together. One was economic necessity, the economic disintegration of Europe as a result of the war, and the recognition daily and weekly that it was only by the continuation of the cooperative methods which have been started and are expanding that they can hope to develop a reasonable life for the people of western Europe. There isn't anyone that I know that feels that there is any hope for a decent life in Europe for the future without growing economic cooperation. From the standpoint of security there is only one threat that is in the minds of the people of Europe today, but there is a lingering fear about what will happen in Germany.

CHANGING ATTITUDE TOWARD GERMANY

Senator GEORGE. I am going to ask you about that. Is there any change in attitude toward Germany on the part of the other members in this Atlantic Pact with respect to strength and power?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Well, the only change that has specifically occurred was the acceptance of western Germany as a part of the recovery program and as a part of the OEEC, which is the cooperative body of the participating nations. They recognize that Germany is an important economic element in Europe, and that to attain recovery of Europe and prosperity in Europe, western Germany must become a contributing unit, both in production for the European countries and consumption of products that other European countries have in the past and can in the future trade with them. There is no discussion of any other nature in Europe at the present time. There is a hope that a democratic western Germany can be developed which will avoid a threat from Germany for the future. There is a hope that that can be done, but there is no assurance as yet. There is no feeling of assurance about it as yet.

EUROPEAN ATTITUDE TOWARD STRENGTHENING GERMANY

Senator GEORGE. I think there could be no disagreement about the development of Germany so far as economic recovery, but now I am going back to this question of the growth of unity in Europe, a real growth of will to resist. Is there any feeling in Europe that so long as Germany is impotent and weak there can be any real security in western Europe?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. There have been no discussions about western Germany from the military standpoint. There have, as I say, on the economic side, been questions with regard to Germany. There have been no discussions of the kind you speak of, sir.

Senator GEORGE. Well, what is the feeling? If you can tell us, and other witnesses can, about the spirit of unity that is existing in Europe, the disposition to resist that is growing in Europe, can you tell us what the attitude of the other states is toward some strengthening of Germany in this picture?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Until such time as there is concrete evidence that there is a real democratic Germany developing, there is today, and will continue to be, fear that Germany might join up with the east in some form to make her dangerous, and therefore there is still a desire to protect against a military threat from Germany. What that will be in the future I would not want to predict, sir.

Senator GEORGE. I was asking you what the feeling was in the European states.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have tried to give it as I find it today. Until such time as there is real evidence that there is a real democracy in Germany, there will continue in my opinion to be fear that Germany might, unless carefully watched, become a threat, particularly from the standpoint of joining up with the east.

Senator GEORGE. Is not the whole problem of security in western Europe bound up with the future of the movement in Germany, some strengthening of Germany, at least?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I want to say that there are hopes about Germany. There are hopes that Germany will become a real member of the western community of nations. I am only speaking about the fact that until there is concrete evidence that that has become a reality, there will be no acceptance of it.

Senator GEORGE. There is no desire anywhere, so far as I know, to rebuild Germany's great military power, but when you tell me about unity in Europe I am obliged to ask what the attitude of the other European states is toward a strengthened Germany in this picture. Is she to be kept torn as she is now, and impotent? Is western Europe to have any substantial hope of security?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Well, Senator, one has to appreciate what these neighbors have gone through twice, and particularly this last time. There is an acceptance of the fact that economically Germany must be healthy.

Senator GEORGE. How are you going to get Germany economically healthy unless she also has some sense of security? If you are leaving her out of this picture, where does she look for any security which will rebuild her economic strength?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I am attempting to report as accurately as I can what I find the feeling in Europe to be, as a reporter, and the progress, certainly, is very definite. Western Germany sits very definitely as a member of the economic councils of Europe today, and that is a substantial advance. As I say, what the future will hold I cannot predict. I can only say what has happened, which is an advance, but I cannot predict the future.

THE TREATY AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator GEORGE. Now, Mr. Ambassador, I gathered from your statement that if our contribution to mutual aid and the building up of a purely defensive system was withheld, that pact would have no particular significance. Is that right?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Well, sir, I think that is going too far.

Senator GEORGE. I wanted to find out. I gathered from your statement that you were putting a tremendous emphasis upon the military assistance.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I believe this to be a fact, that if we do not interpret article 3, self-help and mutual aid, as they do, which means prompt acceptance, all doing what we can, it will cause a wonder as to what our motivations are, and a beginning of wonder as to confidence in our real desire to have a mutuality of interest. And therefore there will be a serious set-back, and I do not want to minimize the set-back there will be, if there is not some concrete evidence that we interpret article 3, self-help and mutual aid, in the sense Europe does.

Senator GEORGE. Suppose the member states should be of the opinion that our contribution was too little. Then what?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do not think that, Senator, is involved in the discussions at the moment. The important thing to the people—

I am talking about the public—will be in seeing something concrete moving, that the American people have a desire to help them defend their soil.

NEED FOR MILITARY ASSISTANCE

As I said in my testimony, it is the pact itself which I believe is a great deterrent, but they have set aside reliance on neutrality. They are in whatever difficulty comes along, and therefore I think it is not unreasonable to understand that they want to get in position where they don't rely only on the deterrent, but are in position to defend themselves. And the movement of some military equipment from us is an indication that we have a real interest in helping them reach the day when they can defend themselves.

It is very important, Senator, from a psychological standpoint. I do not want to minimize it.

Senator GEORGE. I grant the importance of it, but it comes down practically to this, that so far as European recovery is concerned—because there cannot be any final recovery unless there is a sense of security—it all depends upon the continuation of aid and assistance from us, or primarily depends upon aid and assistance from us.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The European countries have not the ability to carry out a recovery program without the assistance that has come from the United States.

Senator GEORGE. I believe I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wiley?

FEAR IN EUROPE

Senator WILEY. Mr. Ambassador, as I analyze the situation, there are three great fears in Europe that are apparent to observers over there; first, the fear of Russia; second, the fear of a resurrected Germany with its warlike intent; and, third, the fear of economic disintegration. Does that agree with your thought?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I think the only fear that is uppermost in people's minds today is the fear of Russia and her intentions. Germany is only a possibility of future developments. It is not a fear today. And so far as economic collapse is concerned, the recovery program has developed a sense of confidence that they can economically reestablish their lives, so that fear no longer exists as it existed 18 months ago.

NEED FOR FURTHER ASSISTANCE

Senator WILEY. But they are not willing to go on from here without our assistance, are they? They have not gotten that far yet, have they?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No. There is a belief among the people of the different countries that we intend to carry through for the 4-year period, on, of course, a diminishing basis.

ECA CONTACTS WITH EUROPEAN PEOPLES

Senator WILEY. What I got from your testimony was an interpretation of the psychological situation that was facing those people. I am interested in knowing how close you have personal contact with the common people, or whether this was just your conclusion from contact with the so-called leading minds of Europe.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I have in Paris men from labor from the United States, on my staff, who are in touch with the labor unions, and in each mission there is a labor division with men from organized labor in the United States who are in touch with the local unions and with the local labor opinion. All of the members of my staff, and particularly in the country missions, have, of course, wide contacts. We have agriculturalists, we have business people, and they circulate around in a cross section of opinion. I do not mean to say that I would consider that in any sense a poll, but we do get opinions from all sources and they are reported to me both in messages and in written word, and also in my contacts with them.

Senator VANDENBERG. You do not have Dr. Gallup on your staff, do you?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No, sir; we do not have Dr. Gallup on our staff.

CONDITIONS EAST OF THE IRON CURTAIN

Senator WILEY. Now that you have given us the source and basis for your conclusions with relation to the situation west of the iron curtain, have you any opinion to give us as to what the feeling of the German people themselves is? Have you any information to give us as to whether or not there is any information that east of the iron curtain conditions are probably pretty messy?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Well, it is not my direct responsibility, but naturally because of my previous experience I try to follow as best I can whatever information I can get. It is my own judgment, and all information is so limited that it can't be the type of opinion which I have expressed of the attitudes and conditions in western Europe, but the reports I get lead me to believe that with the economic progress that has been made in western Europe, and the policies of the Soviet Union to exploit their neighbors rather than to help them, they are having considerable difficulties. I think the instance about Yugoslavia is an example.

Senator WILEY. Are you talking simply about the satellite nations? Can you tell us anything of within Russia?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I cannot speak for Russia. I think one should get those who have followed more closely than I the recent developments in Russia. It seems obvious that our policies in Europe and the developments in western Europe are such that it has affected policies of the Soviet Union in a direction which is to our interest.

TREND TOWARD POLITICAL UNIFICATION OF EUROPE

Senator WILEY. I understood from your testimony that since you last testified here you have felt that there has been what you might call an optimistic trend in the European people.

Senator WILEY. That conditions are better economically and politically. Now I want to revert to that one question of Senator George. In your opinion, is there any hope that this cauldron that we have, known as Europe, or that the people there, are thinking in terms of any kind of political unity?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. There are definite signs. We have seen the establishment of the Council of Europe. We have seen people joining in meetings and discussions of what is called the European unity movement. After all, this is the first time in history where a movement of this kind has ever started on a peaceful basis. There have been attempts to get unity through conquest, but this is the first time in history where there are earnest attempts being made to get unity in Europe through peaceful means. There are difficulties in the way of it, but certain progress has been made.

Senator WILEY. Do you think our aid has contributed to it or lessened the pressures that might have made that movement greater?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I think if it had not been for our aid it would have fallen apart. Some countries would have been a little better off than others. They would have gradually disintegrated, the weaker going first and the stronger trying to survive. I am talking about the Continent, of course.

Under the leadership of the European recovery program, the development of unity has been stimulated. In other words, United States policies have themselves stimulated this development of the desire for unity.

Senator WILEY. Do you want to comment on the position or situation of such nations as Sweden, which would not come into this pact?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Sweden, of course, has had a traditional and a successful neutrality policy over a number of generations. She and Switzerland are in the same position in that respect. And they have made up their minds that they want to stick to that neutrality. That is about all I can say.

LESSENING INFLUENCE OF COMMUNISTS IN EUROPE

Senator WILEY. Do you want to comment as to what is the situation in Italy and France with relation to whether the influence of the Communists is lessening or getting greater?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. In both countries it is substantially lessening. The two countries, of course, are different, but it is true of both of them that the political strikes which have been called for political purposes by the Communist-dominated unions have not been successful in either country. Because of the disagreement about the use of strikes for political purposes there is developing in both countries non-Communist trade unions which are joining together to develop federations of non-Communist unions.

Senator WILEY. Is the new agrarian policy that we read about in Italy, the dividing up of large tracts of land, becoming a fact, do you think?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I believe so. It is a policy which the Government has adopted and I believe it will be carried out.

Senator WILEY. How do you like the new title that the Communists have given you?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Which one of them?

Senator WILEY. The one of which you spoke. I would have said "the Cecil Rhodes."

Ambassador HARRIMAN. They call me so many things that I don't know which one you speak of.

Senator WILEY. You mentioned it.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The overwhelming majority of people in all the countries laugh at it.

Senator WILEY. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

NECESSITY FOR THE ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator GREEN. Mr. Ambassador, in the testimony so far there has been discussion both of the Atlantic Pact, which is our immediate subject of discussion, and military aid, which may follow and which, it has been stated, is supplementary to the pact. There are some critics, and I am glad to say they are few in number, that believe you can have the Atlantic Pact and be successful with it without the subsequent military aid. That has been discussed and I think has been answered well and adequately.

However, I do not think there has been sufficiently discussed another form of criticism which states that we might give the military aid without the Atlantic Pact, that the Atlantic Pact assumes certain mutual obligations which are unnecessary for us to assume, and we can give them military aid without it.

I would like to ask your opinion of what you think would be the effect on these other nations if we gave military aid without ratifying the Atlantic Pact.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I am quite ready to say, Senator, that in my opinion, if we should pursue that policy, there would be a recession of confidence which would be of such a nature that there will be a regrowth of the idea that appeasement and neutrality were the only hope for these countries, and there would be a set-back in public confidence and discussions which would be extremely damaging to the recovery program and completely destroy this sense of confidence.

Senator GREEN. In other words, the Atlantic Pact would give them a sense of confidence that could not be supplied in any other way?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It is really a great feeling, as I have found it, that there is something new in the world in this association among like-minded people. I think Senator Vandenberg used the expression the other day, "one for all and all for one." There is a spiritual emotion about that which is hard to emphasize.

Senator GREEN. That motto of the Three Musketeers is hardly applicable, because this is for defense rather than offense.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Perhaps that is not the right word, but it indicates the feeling that freemen are standing shoulder to shoulder.

Senator GREEN. I had assumed that in answer to my question you would say there would be a tremendous loss to give them that practical aid without the assurances which were included in the Atlantic Pact also.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes.

Senator GREEN. There are very few such critics, but I think we ought to have some answer in the record such as you have given us now.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Smith?

DEFEATIST ATTITUDE IN EUROPE IN 1947

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I have just one or two questions. I would like to ask you if you can confirm the impression I got when I was in Europe in the summer of '47, while the Marshall plan negotiations were on foot but when nothing had been completed, that the rank and file of people that I met had sort of the feeling of fatalism. They had had two invasions—I am speaking now of the western European countries—and they felt that now it was going to be a question simply of the two great powers, the United States and Russia, and they were sort of pawns in the game, and that sort of thing. I got that feeling in talking with some people, you might say of the lower ranks themselves, and also in talking with some of our own officials in our embassies. I understand from your testimony that there is a complete change so far as that is concerned. The man in the street does not have that fatalistic feeling that, after all, there is nothing to life; "We might as well make up our minds to go along."

Is there a spirit of get up and go among the people as a whole that is going to put some real life into this so-called mutual aid business that we have been discussing this morning?

First, am I right in the observation I made in 1947; and secondly, in the change of feeling today?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, you are absolutely right about it. At least that was my impression. I was there in the summer of 1947 and talked to a good many people. In 1947 there was complete lack of hope, as you say—fatalism. Whatever hope there was was based on reaching for the concept that this was a conflict looming up between the Soviet Union and the United States, and that they wanted to put their heads in the sand and believe that somehow the storm would blow over the top of them and not across them.

MORALE IN EUROPE TODAY

Now, with the idea proposed by Secretary Marshall and the implementation which has been developed under the leadership of this committee, there started to grow very rapidly, even in the autumn of 1947, a feeling of hope, a feeling that a real life could be developed. We saw that in France. There was a general strike in the early winter and at the end of 1947, which was defeated, and the growth of the free trade-union movement in France, the will to resist internal aggression and external aggression, has developed month by month until I feel that with the discussions of the Atlantic Pact in all countries there has been a growth of confidence and a growth of the basic feeling which is so important in the concept of the Atlantic Pact, that free men must stand together, and this issue is theirs.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. You feel that we are awakening that sense and that morale by the ECA program and its success, and I want to congratulate you, as I have congratulated Mr. Hoffman and Mr. David Bruce, on the great job you have done. You have the feeling that there is a change-over from the obvious feeling that I have had, especially in France and Italy?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I must make clear that in those two countries—in the other countries I think it is fairly safe to say that the battle is won against the Communist internal aggression—but in Italy and France I think it is being won, and that we are resolute through the policies and determination that it will be won. But you have seen in the press that the Communist leaders have said the Red armies should be welcomed in their countries to protect them against American aggression, and so forth, and the Communist Parties do have a considerable following, they do have in those two countries a substantial press, and they do affect a minority of public opinion. But the majority of public opinion is similar in its views to those of the other countries.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Do you think the situation is better in Italy than it was just after the election?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Oh, progressively better; and progressively better in France, too.

FINANCIAL BURDEN ON UNITED STATES

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I think you are aware that I have been a staunch supporter of the ECA program and I am a staunch supporter of the North Atlantic treaty, and I expect to support the military implementation. But I am troubled, as is everyone else in the Senate, with this problem. Here we have, in our ECA program, from the dollars-and-cents standpoint and the effect it has on the American economy, $5,000,000,000 plus of the ECA program which we have authorized.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. That is for 15 months, of course.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Oh, yes. The military program is $15,000,000,000 plus, making an over-all total of something like $21,000,000,000, and then this military implementation program calls for another $1,130,000,000 more.

POSSIBILITY OF FINANCING MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FROM DEFENSE AND ECA APPROPRIATIONS

The question constantly comes to me in talking with people, with all those enormous requests for appropriations and authorizations, isn't it possible, by change of conditions or whatever it may be, or by sharpening our pencil, to take care of this military implementation, which after all is a token of good will rather than an over-all defense program? I do not think anyone would claim that a billion dollars is a final over-all defense program for Europe. It is an indication of our willingness to participate and be behind it.

Could we not deal with that, in your judgment, from our over-all appropriations when they are made in the ECA program and the military program for this country?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, it is my strong opinion and earnest hope that the Congress will support the three programs of which you speak. I believe our success in winning the struggle which we have increasing right to believe will be successful, that the situation will see peace in Europe, is based on four pillars. One is our own military strength; one, of course, is the European recovery program; the third is the Atlantic Pact; and the fourth is the military assistance program. And if you weaken today you weaken the whole program, and I believe this is not the time, when we have every evidence that we are attaining success, to turn aside and wonder about whether we can save a little here or there. I think it is too dangerous. The implications are too serious to turn aside at this time and weaken our determination. The program will not be as effective, and it will have an effect behind the iron curtain in adding encouragement that they could sit us out and we will gradually become weaker and weaker in our determination to carry through.

I think if there ever was a time when we should go along courageously and with determination it is today, when we are winning, and I do earnestly hope that members of the Congress will support the recommendations of the Administration in these fields.

PRIORITY OF FOREIGN AID PROGRAMS

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Now, as you are aware, there have been some suggestions from well known and expert economists that there are certain threats of danger to our own economy at home. I am wondering whether you share my view, which is very much the same as you have suggested now, that, with respect to whatever figures we may ultimately arrive at as covering this foreign program of which we are speaking, it has the priority over everything that we are doing in America today. If there have to be economies, we will have to, for the present, postpone some of the so-called desirable but postponable items in the home program. If that is embarrassing to you I want you to say so, and do not answer it. I realize that I am criticizing the apparent over-all demands of the administration today that we go not only into this program but into this enormous welfare program. It seems to me there is a definite threat to our economy and I am greatly troubled by it, and many of my correspondents and constituents are troubled by it. They are wondering where it is going to stop.

I would say that on some things that are preferred things to do, they are "must" things, and so far as our security is concerned, that must come ahead of everything else. And if that is true, don't we have to face courageously the advisability of postponing some of these other things that may be desirable but can be postponed?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It is not embarrassing. I am glad to answer it in this way:

I have been away from this country for 12 months. My trips back here have been related to my work in Europe. I have not analyzed the situation and cannot express any opinion on the subject, because I just do not know.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. No; I do not believe I have any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Ambassador, we have with us two Senators who are not members of the committee but who are here by our invitation. They will ask you some questions.

Senator DONNELL?

GROWTH OF EUROPEAN CONFIDENCE AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ambassador, in your statement this morning, if you will be kind enough to turn to page 2 of it, I note your observation near the middle of the page that you can testify that:

A new factor has developed, a growth of confidence based on the belief that through the North Atlantic Pact security from external aggression can be attained.

I am quoting correctly from your statement, am I not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And on page 3 of your statement you observe: The participation of the United States in the pact is, of course, the factor which is developing confidence—and then again you state:

The proposal for military aid from the United States gives vitality and meaning to the concept of effective self-help and mutual aid to resist armed attack. Then finally on that page you make this observation:

For the pact to have real meaning, I am convinced that there must be a willingness to implement promptly article 3.

Mr. Ambassador, I take it that you heard also the observations, did you not, of Senator Vandenberg, that a momentum of confidence has been attained over in Europe of recent date, or words to that effect?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Ambassador, I note, in view of all these statements about this momentum and this growth of confidence, and the fact that the proposal for military aid from the United States gives vitality and meaning to the concept of effective self-help and mutual aid, in connection with your observation that for the pact to have real meaning you are convinced there must be a willingness to implement promptly article 3; I say I observe with some great interest your further observation on page 4:

A defensive force is relatively small, and cannot be a threat.

Now, Mr. Ambassador, the question that I want to ask you in connection with these various statements is: On the one hand, emphasizing the great confidence that is coming and has arrived by reason of the United States being in, and this reference to implementation, et cetera, and on the other hand your assurance that a defensive force is relatively small. do you not think that this momentum of confidence will rapidly evaporate if Europe should get the idea that we are not going to send sufficient strength of some type or types to hold Europe against an attack by Russia?

What is your answer to that question, please?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Everyone in Europe knows it would take some time before they can afford, from their own means, to maintain a military establishment adequate to defense, but a gradual development will increase confidence rather than detract from it, as you indicate. I believe that as the military establishments will grow moderately there will be increasing confidence.

SCOPE OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator DONNELL. Do you not think, Mr. Ambassador, that as the President of the United States puts it, it is his judgment—I am quoting now from his inaugural address—is not that the view of the President of the United States?

If we can make it sufficiently clear in advance that any armed attack affecting our national security would be met with overwhelming force, the armed attack might never occur—

Ambassador HARRIMAN. You are quoting the President. Of course it is his view.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ambassador, is it not your judgment that the thought which inspires confidence in Europe, all this momentum to which reference has been made, is primarily that with the United States and its power and its military help and its dollars and its men, Russia would be met immediately by an overwhelming force, to use the quotation from the President's address? Would the people of Europe rapidly lose that confidence if the United States did not promptly begin to send and continue to send sufficient force to guarantee that, if Russia did attack, Europe would be held for a reasonable period against such attack?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I do not fully understand your question, but I can say this; that there is a belief in Europe, in my judgment, that the North Atlantic Pact, with participation of the United States, and the knowledge that we have a substantial rearmament program, will be a strong deterrent to war, but if you are living very close to a threat of attack there is a desire to build up some means of meeting that attack. That is all I can say about it.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF UNITED STATES PARTICIPATION IN NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Do you not think, Mr. Ambassador, that the great impetus for confidence is the thought that, through the aid of the United States, the military aid of the United States, Russia will not be able to overrun Europe as Germany overran parts of Europe, but that on the contrary Russia would be held back through this great overwhelming force to which the President alludes in his inaugural address?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have said, sir, that there is a belief that I believe exists that participation of the United States in the North Atlantic Pact will be a great deterrent against any aggressor, but I also say that the spirit and the desire is there to develop continental forces which will be able to be strong enough, on a defensive basis, to protect their soil.

EUROPEAN DEPENDENCE ON UNITED STATES MILITARY AID

Senator DONNELL. By your observation in your statement that "For the pact to have real meaning, I am convinced there must be a willingness to implement promptly article 3," do you refer there at least in large part to an implementation by the United States of America?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No. I have testified that there is a spirit of desire in the suggestions I have had of the development of self-help and mutual aid. That mutual aid has already found evidence within Europe itself, as among the countries. The Brussels Pact countries are a specific example of what is already happening, but naturally the United States is the strongest of all the participants in the North Atlantic Pact, and to have the fullest mutual confidence I believe that the same interpretation of article 3 that they place on it should be placed on it by us; that they should have some evidence that we place the same interpretation on it as they do.

Senator DONNELL. And, if the United States was going to announce that it was not going forward with military implementation of Europe, this confidence in Europe would rapidly subside?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have testified it would be checked. We would never catch the same spirit again that exists there today of mutual confidence.

LOSS OF CONFIDENCE THROUGH NONIMPLEMENTATION OF ARTICLE III

Senator DONNELL. And do you not think, Mr. Ambassador, that if the United States were today to say, "We will not pass a military-implementation bill providing appropriations for that purpose" that immediately the confidence, this momentum of confidence, would begin to evaporate and would very rapidly evaporate?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No; that is too strong.

Senator DONNELL. How strong do you think it should be?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do not think I can put the percentage calculation on that. The spirit of man is something you can not put on a mathematical basis.

Senator DONNELL. You still, however, I take it, adhere to the statement in your prepared statement that—

The proposal for military aid from the United States gives vitality and meaning to the concept of effective self-help and mutual aid to resist armed attack.

NEED FOR AN OVERWHELMING FORCE IN EUROPE

Senator DONNELL. I want to call your attention to an observation which was made by Senator Vandenberg, the Senator from Michigan, who is on this committee, and which was presented also the other day to Secretary Acheson, and I will ask you to answer a question after I have read these few observations from him. This was in an address made on March 22 of this year in Washington to the conference of mayors. He said:

The Neutrality Act of 1939 told Hitler that the United States would keep out of any such conflict, would keep our vessels out of belligerent ports, would refuse credits to warring nations. The North Atlantic Pact, wholly to the contrary, will tell any aggressor in 1949 that—and I call your attention to this language—

from the very moment he launches his conquest in this area, he will face whatever united opposition, including that of the United States, is necessary to beat him to his knees.

I ask you, Mr. Ambassador, whether you understand that from the very moment he launches his conquest in this area, reference is made to the importance of having immediately available forces in Europe to stand against the overrunning of the country which would leave only the alternative of ultimate defeat or ultimate necessity for reliberation of the country.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I am testifying from my knowledge of Europe. The question that you ask I believe should be addressed to the Secretary of State.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been already. He has stated that he agrees with this observation.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The Secretary of State will interpret the political aspects of the treaty. He has already, as I understand it, to the satisfaction, I hope, of this committee.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ambassador, in your study in Europe, have you considered whether or not it would be necessary for American troops to be stationed in Europe in order to prevent Russia from over-running Europe, should an attack be made by Russia?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. All I know is that I do not know any country that wants to have an armed occupation of United States troops.

Senator DONNELL. I did not ask you that question, as to their desire for an armed occupation. I ask you the question whether or not you are of the opinion, or whether you have formed an opinion, as to whether Europe could be preserved from a Russian onslaught, "a conquest launched," to use the language of Mr. Vandenberg, "in this area?" Do you think that such an attack so launched could be successfully either repelled or withheld without addition to the European military forces being placed in Europe?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I am testifying, or trying to testify, about the things that I know about. I am not a military expert. I have testified that the European partners in this number some 200,000,000 people, and I have indicated their productive ability. That is as far as I can go in testifying on my own. I have spoken of the size of the populations and I have indicated that their industrial production is in excess of the industrial production of the Soviet Union and her satellites. I cannot testify beyond that point.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ambassador, you referred to not being an expert, or words to that effect, along military lines. May I ask you whether or not you have had military experience?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have not been in the Army. I have not served in the Army. During the war, I was involved as a civilian in many aspects of supply problems, military supply problems of our allies, stationed in Europe.

Senator DONNELL. You were stationed in Europe during World War II, or a large part of it?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. From the winter of 1941 until the end of the war.

Senator DONNELL. From 1941 until the end of the war in 1945, approximately 4 years?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir; just 4 years.

Senator DONNELL. And you do not care to express any opinion on the question as to whether or not, in the event of a launching of an attack against Europe by Russia, it would or would not be necessary that American troops be there on the spot in order to convey to the enemy this united opposition to which Senator Vandenberg refers, "including that of the United States, which is necessary to beat him" (that is, the enemy) "to his knees"? You do not care to express an opinion on that?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have made a statement, if I can find it, in my testimony, in which I speak about the population and the productive ability of our partners in Europe, and I have said, "It does not seem unreasonable to me to have confidence that in time an effective defense force can be developed to provide a real sense of security."

I do not care to say anything more than that. I am expressing my own opinion and nobody else's when I say that.

And in another place I said something to the effect that I thought it would contribute to our own security. In other words, this is a two-way street, Senator. In my judgment the whole program is a two-way street. It adds to our security as well as theirs.

Senator DONNELL. And we add to theirs very greatly; do we not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. We certainly do at the present time.

Senator DONNELL. The question was asked you as to whether or not any promises were made to European nations, and you have stated none to your knowledge, and you do not believe there were any with respect to military implementation.

DEVELOPMENTS IN NORWAY

Do you know whether or not Mr. Halvard Lange, the Foreign Minister of Norway, came to this country in February of this year?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I understand that he did.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know whether or not Norway was wavering in the balance as to whether she would or would not go into the North Atlantic Treaty, or whether she would go into some pact of Scandinavian countries?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I was in Norway a few weeks ago, and before Prime Minister Lange came to the United States to sign the treaty I had some talks with him when I was in Oslo. As I have testified, there was a sober debate and consideration of whether it was wise in all of the countries to join the pact. That was a sober consideration in Norway, particularly sober in Norway, whether they would trust appeasement and neutrality, or whether they would stand shoulder to shoulder with the free people of Europe.

They made their decision as a matter of basic national policy, considering all of the factors, and they made their decision supported by the legislative branch in an overwhelming vote. As a matter of fact, that vote took place the day before I got to Oslo. I think practically all of them except the Communists, and there were very few of them, voted for the pact. I got the impression there was great unanimity in Norway to make this basic decision of which I speak.

Senator DONNELL. I return to the question which I asked you, which was whether or not you knew if Norway was wavering in the balance as to whether she would or would not enter the North Atlantic Pact, or whether she would go into a combination of Scandinavian countries, and that Mr. Lange came to this country during the pendency of that wavering situation. Do you know whether or not that is correct?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Well, Senator, I do not recognize that your words are a correct description of the type of sober consideration which was given in Norway by the Government and by the people to the question of whether they should trust appeasement or neutrality as against joining the free countries of the North Atlantic and the United States in the North Atlantic Pact. I do not call that wavering, sir. I call that sober, earnest consideration, and I think it is an implication, a wrong implication, if I may say so; I think it is not a correct description of the type of spirit that exists in Norway. They are fine people. They fought with us during the war. Their seamen were as gallant during the war as any seamen, and they took their losses and they took them bravely.

Senator DONNELL. May I say that I have no criticism whatsoever of Norway. I make none. I have implied none. I have asked, during the process which I shall now call sober, earnest consideration, instead of wavering, whether you know whether Mr. Lange came to this country and whether the decision of his country was made after his return from that visit.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Historically, that is known to be a fact. He was over here some time in the early winter, and I was there some time in March, the latter part of March, and the legislative branch of the Norwegian Government the day before I was there gave Mr. Lange the authority to come to the United States a second time and sign the pact. That is an historic fact.

DANISH POSITION ON NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Were you in Denmark along about that time also?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I went to Denmark afterwards.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall the dates you were in Denmark?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It was a date in the end of March.

Senator DONNELL. Were you in Copenhagen on the 22nd of March, which was the date on which Foreign Minister Rasmusson made a statement to Parliament with respect to the North Atlantic Treaty?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No. Mr. Rasmusson was in Washington the day I was in Copenhagen. I did not see him on that date. I know him, but I did not see him on my visit.

Senator DONNELL. Did you see, in the press of that country, or any other country, a dispatch or information substantially to this effect, and I quote now from the United Press statement in the Washington Post of March 23, from Copenhagen:

Foreign Minister Gustav Rasmusson told Parliament today that under the proposed North Atlantic Treaty the United States "would go to war" if any one of the signatory nations is attacked. "To the Danish Government," he said, "there is no doubt that the United States will consider herself pledged to assist an attacked nation with all her force. If armed force is necessary to reestablish security, it is evident that the member countries possessing such force are obliged to use it." That means that, if an armed attack occurred on one of the member countries, it could have only one answer. The United States would go to war.

Did you see substantially that in the press in Denmark?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I did not.

Senator DONNELL. Did you hear substantially that information while you were there?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No; I did not.

FUNDAMENTALS OF PREPAREDNESS

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Ambassador, there are three fundamentals of preparedness, are there not, and I am not using my own language; I am quoting from the Secretary of Defense, who testified yesterday: manpower, materials, and suitable positions from which to employ them in the event of attack.

You would agree with that from your observation; would you not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do not care to comment on it. I have no reason not to believe it is so. I do not know what this is leading to. I have no reason to take any issue with that statement.

Senator DONNELL. Regardless of what it is leading to, that is a correct statement!

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have no comment to make. I have no reason to believe it is not true. I do not know whether it covers all the points. I have not given it consideration.

MILITARY IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Very well. You have given consideration, I take it, to whether or not military implementation by the United States is important to maintain that confidence; is it not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. I have said it would indicate concrete evidence that we take seriously the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Have you given consideration to whether or not the observation of Senator Lodge of this committee would be helpful in maintaining confidence in Europe, which observation was made as follows yesterday. Senator Hickenlooper interrupts Senator Lodge, and perhaps I had better read the statement by Senator Lodge.

Senator LODGE. So it is not the case of subtracting something from what you have got. You are getting rid of something that really is not doing you any good. It is doing you harm.

Then, following that, this is what Senator Hickenlooper says:

Senator HICKENLOOPER. If I may interrupt, I understand the Secretary to say that what we expected to furnish over there was late equipment and not obsolete equipment.

Senator LODGE. But the point is, Senator, the thing that is obsolete for us is not necessarily obsolete for another country, because the employment which the other country wants to make of it is entirely different. That, to me, is perfectly clear. There are an awful lot of things that you can use if you are engaged in suppressing fifth-column activities or if you are engaged in a purely defensive role that you can get very little good of if you are trying to go into an offensive mission.

Do you think that that view, suggested by Senator Lodge, would tend to increase the confidence that the people of Europe would have in the operation of this pact, from your observation of their temper since you have been over there?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No. 1, the military equipment which will be sent, if it is authorized by the Congress, will be military equipment which these countries ask for, and the needs of the different countries are different. Our needs are different. And it may well be that there are certain types of equipment which one nation may need which are not adaptable to our needs and may be in surplus, or may be in surplus but which may be of great value to that country.

Beyond that, I would not care to comment, except to say that the shipment of equipment they ask for and want certainly will add to confidence and not detract from it, as you appear to suggest, sir.

Senator DONNELL. I have asked you the question as to whether or not the observation of Senator Lodge with regard to the use of types of equipment that we cannot use would tend to increase the confidence or otherwise affect it.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Everybody knows what I have stated: That some countries need certain types of equipment. As a matter of fact, some of the western European partners are sending equipment which they have in surplus, which they either cannot use or because they may have need for something new. That is well known. I do not think anybody would pay much attention to a statement of that kind.

You see, most people in Europe have fought, you know. They know what military equipment is.

Senator DONNELL. In fact, Europe has been engaged in war for many centuries, has it not, off and on, with great frequency?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. And that is one of the points that was made as long as approximately 150 years ago by Washington in his Farewell Address. You recall that comment, do you not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE TO EUROPE

Senator DONNELL. I note, Mr. Ambassador, and it is certainly creditable to you, that you have studied the question of whether or not it is advisable and important to send military equipment over to Europe to implement this treaty. You agree to that?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I certainly do.

Senator DONNELL. And your statement here this morning says, among other things—that is the decision to sign the Atlantic Pact—was based on two principal articles in the pact, namely, article 5 and article 3; first, that an armed attack against one shall be considered an attack against all, and secondly, means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid to resist armed attack.

The decision—

Then you proceed:

In the European mind, these two concepts have been, I feel, inseparable.

Is that correct?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. That is correct.

POSSIBLE NEED FOR UNITED STATES TROOPS

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you, Mr. Ambassador, inasmuch as you have given sober and careful and earnest consideration yourself to the question of the importance of sending over military equipment, how does it happen that you have not given such serious, sober, and careful consideration to the question as to whether manpower must also be sent over by this country to guarantee that if Russia should make an attack, she would be immediately confronted, to paraphrase somewhat the language but certainly not the meaning of Senator Vandenberg, by opposition that would beat her to her knees? Why haven't you studied that question?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Because I have never heard anyone in Europe suggest it.

Senator DONNELL. You have not heard anybody in Europe suggest that, and that is the reason you have not studied it?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It is not in the European mind at the present time, as I see it. I have said they do not like armies of occupation.

Senator DONNELL. Are you prepared to state whether or not the armies of the United States have been quite acceptable in Germany, at any rate? Have they not been received in a very friendly manner?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I think you would ask that question of our military people who are responsible for the occupation. No people like to have armies of occupation. I think American troops have behaved well, by and large, and insofar as any army of occupation can have any reasonable good will, I think our American troops wherever they go have it. No army of occupation is welcomed.

Senator DONNELL. I may say, Mr. Ambassador, that I have not suggested even remotely that this country should send over an army of occupation to occupy France or any of these other countries. The question to which you have addressed your thought is whether or not, in order to guarantee that if Russia should start in with a great number of troops from the east side it would be necessary, in order to hold that country for several weeks, to send over American troops or to have them already stationed there with the full concurrence of the parties to the pact, in order to guarantee that Russia could be successfully withheld.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. You should ask that question of our Military Establishment. So far as I am concerned, I have never heard anyone discuss that matter in the discussions I have had regarding the Atlantic Pact and the implementation of article 3.

Senator DONNELL. Have you investigated, Mr. Ambassador, the question of what is the armed strength of the various other signatories?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have some very general information about it, but not in detail at all.

Senator DONNELL. You would prefer not to give an offhand statement, I take it, on that?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins?

Mr. Ambassador, this is Senator Watkins, of Utah.

ECONOMIC COLLABORATION AMONG ATLANTIC PACT NATIONS

Senator WATKINS. I would like to have Mr. Ambassador make some comments on article 2 of the North Atlantic Pact, inasmuch as he has been connected with our economic establishment in this country and abroad for some time.

Article 2 provides—

They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

What particular economic policies do you think the negotiators had in mind when they put this in the treaty?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I think that question should be addressed to the Secretary of State, sir. So far as Europe is concerned, the participating nations of the North Atlantic Pact are also participants in the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, and they are sitting around the table every day to find ways and means, by cooperative action, to help each other in the economic field. There is evidence that our European partners in the Atlantic Pact are already at work in the economic cooperative field.

CONFLICTS IN ECONOMIC POLICIES

Senator WATKINS. This states—will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies . * * *

What economic policies do they have that are now in conflict which they can eliminate or probably have agreed to eliminate by this very paragraph?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I was not involved in the negotiations for the treaty. I believe your question as to what was meant, and the interpretation of that article, should be addressed to the Secretary of State.

Senator WATKINS. I was addressing it to you. I realize probably he would be the one to get at what they had in mind at the moment, but since you have endorsed the pact and said it is a good pact for us, I thought probably you would have some judgment on what could be eliminated and what should be sought to be eliminated by reason of this agreement.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I cannot speak of my own knowledge as to what the discussions were that led up to that language and the interpretation which the United States Government places on that, and therefore I think it would be confusing if I, as an individual, attempted to speak of matters of which I have not intimate knowledge.

Senator WATKINS. I am not asking you to interpret the treaty now, as to what the intention was when they negotiated it, but what in your judgment are the economic policies which we could eliminate as between the signatories to the treaty, including ourselves. I mean by that the United States. I am speaking of conflicts.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do not know what that word "conflicts" relates to, specifically, and I would rather not confuse the testimony by giving a personal opinion.

Senator WATKINS. Would it include tariffs?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I would not think tariffs were a conflict. Of course, tariffs do interfere with the freest flow of multilateral trade, but each country is entitled to decide itself as to whether its well-being is served by a tariff on this or that commodity, and what is involved in it. We also have other agreements, as you well know, under our tariff-treaty policies, which relate to international agreements on that subject.

Senator WATKINS. Have you observed in your meeting with the foreign countries that are now part of the ECA program any conflict which you think might possibly come within the scope of that paragraph?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I think that it is more appropriate, if I may say so, to ask the question of interpreting this article of the Secretary of State, and individual testimony on this question I do not think contributes to an understanding of the committee on what this article is intended to cover.

Senator WATKINS. I do not know myself what it is intended to cover.

MEANING OF ARTICLE 2

Ambassador HARRIMAN. In general it indicates economic cooperation, which, from my observation, countries are today engaged in. They are not engaged in conflict, but are trying to find ways and means by which they can help each other economically.

Senator WATKINS. Would you be willing to approve this paragraph without any more knowledge than you say you have of it, or what it means?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. If I were a member of the committee considering it, I naturally would want to understand from the Secretary of State all aspects of what it was intended to cover. I am not overly concerned about it, frankly, personally.

Senator WATKINS. I am not overly concerned about it, but I would like to know what possibilities there are in that paragraph. I thought possibly, inasmuch as you had given us your judgment and your opinion that this pact ought to be approved, that you probably had studied it, and know what it means and what it is intended to cover in making up that judgment of yours, and you would be willing to give us whatever light you have on that subject, because after all, the Senators individually have to make up their minds on the information they can get. About the only source of our information is what we read in the newspapers and what we get from the witnesses in the hearings.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It seems to me the article is clear. But you want to get an interpretation of it and what was in the minds of the negotiators, and it is in that field that I cannot contribute to you.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION IN EUROPE

Senator WATKINS. My last question did not go to the interpretation of it. I wondered if you had observed any conflicts over there which ought to be eliminated between nations.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I am testifying, Senator, to the fact that the Organization for European Economic Recovery, of which the European associates in the North Atlantic Treaty are members, are daily at work, and I am constantly in touch with them, and the members of my staff, on the work that they are doing in attempting to encourage and develop the closest type of economic cooperation among the members. I can simply testify to the fact that our European partners are already at work on increasing economic cooperation to the fullest extent which they feel is possible.

TRADE TREATIES WITH IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

Senator WATKINS. May I direct your attention to trade treaties that are now in existence between Great Britain and Russia, Great Britain and Poland, and France and Russia, and possibly Poland, whereby Great Britain ships large quantities of steel, steel rails and locomotives, and copper products, motors, aluminum, and other articles, that are war-potential articles, to both Russia and Poland. Would that be considered, in your judgment, in the nature of a conflict with the general policy of ECA as declared by the Congress, that that policy should be to strengthen our friends over there and not go to our enemies?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. These treaties that you speak of are barter deals between different countries in western Europe with the different countries in eastern Europe. The governments of those countries have complete control of their foreign trade, and they deal on a barter basis. That is their way of doing business.

Under the ECA there is a section, 117 (b), which provides that the things we send them should not be used to make products which we do not ship from this country for security reasons, and they are adhering to that. From all information I have they are adhering to that provision of the act.

Senator WATKINS. Would you consider aluminum as one of those materials that ought not to be sent? If we ship it to England, for instance, it ought not to be reshipped by England.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have no evidence that England is shipping aluminum which is financed by ECA.

Senator WATKINS. Would it make any difference if the aluminum were shipped from some that England manufactured herself out of materials or from financial aid from the United States under the ECA program?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The act provides that materials which we send them, raw materials we send them, should not be used in the manufacture of things which are excluded from export by the United States for security reasons, and I am stating that so far I am informed, and it is my belief, they are rigidly adhering to that. The question of what products it goes into, there are things which are excluded from shipment by the United States for security reasons. There are also things that are excluded from shipment by the United States for short-supply reasons, as you well know, under the authority granted to the Secretary of Commerce.

Senator WATKINS. Aluminum is one of those articles, is it not, one of those short-supply items?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The ECA Act only relates to those things which are excluded from shipment by the United States for security reasons.

LIMITATIONS ON EAST-WEST TRADE

Senator WATKINS. Do you believe that it is in keeping and in harmony with our help to Europe, and also in harmony with the spirit of this present pact that is now presented to us, for England to be shipping materials that can be used in building up the war potential of Russia and her satellites?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It is a question of interpreting what is war potential.

Senator WATKINS. I am submitting to you the exact items, steel rails and locomotives.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The exact items will have to be discussed in detail, and I am not prepared to testify on that question today. I do say that the British, as well as other participating countries, are not shipping the things which they believe are against the security interests of this country. Of course the question of what is war potential has been discussed many times by different committees here and different people have expressed different views about that. What is or is not dangerous at the present time—we have our policies, and the other countries, generally speaking, have similar and parallel policies, and generally speaking they are substantially in conformance with our own.

Senator WATKINS. I take it for granted you are acquainted with the trade treaties I have called to your attention between the countries named?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. There are people in Government who study those things, and I am saying that these countries have established restrictions on exports which are similar and parallel to the countries you speak of, to our own. We are not always in full agreement on all items, but generally speaking in their policies they recognize fully they are in the same boat as we are. They recognize fully what is involved in the problem that is concerning you and concerning all of us. They, generally speaking, have the same point of view we have, and are implementing that concern in restricting exports.

Senator WATKINS. The reason I called it to your attention, we have had in the Congressional Record copies of the trade treaties in which are named some of the articles I have already called to your attention. I thought probably you had made a study of that in the course of the conduct of your official duties, and probably would give us some light on whether or not that actually is dangerous to our country in the way of helping to build up possible enemies.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I am not prepared to discuss individual items except in executive session. I can only say that from my observation, these countries recognize the same interests that we have in our security, and are taking measures to carry out parallel restrictions of things that we do not export for security reasons.

ARTICLE 2 AND THE ITO CHARTER

Senator WATKINS. In your judgment would there be any binding effect of this article 2 on the United States to ratify the international trade agreement that has been negotiated recently—anything in this paragraph?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I would not think they had any overlapping relationship at all.

Senator WATKINS. You are acquainted with that proposed International Trade Organization treaty, are you not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes.

Senator WATKINS. I have not studied it, and I was wondering if there was anything in this article 2 which would lay down a policy which would, in effect, normally or otherwise, bind us to ratify that pact as possibly something in the nature of moving in the direction of the elimination of economic conflicts.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I would naturally prefer you to ask that question of the Secretary of State. I am not conscious of any overlapping.

Senator WATKINS. In other words, your answer is that you do not know anything that would be in conflict?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do not know of anything. I have never assumed there would be.

EUROPEAN UNDERSTANDING OF ARTICLE 3

Senator WATKINS. I think you have spoken at some length on article 3, but unfortunately I was required to answer a quorum call. I do not have permission to be away from the session, so I had to answer the roll, and I didn't get all the answers, but I would like to ask one or two questions about article 3.

The first is, What in your judgment, as you have mingled with the officials and people of Europe, is their interpretation of what the United States is required to do under article 3? You have been giving the sentiment of those peoples. How do they view that? What do they think our obligations are?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Each country is free to interpret that article in whatever way it believes it is the intent.

Senator WATKINS. What do you find to be their sentiment? That is what I am trying to get at.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. They take that provision of self-help and mutual aid seriously, and are prepared to do what they can.

Senator WATKINS. Do they think that that absolutely binds us, binds the United States and the Congress, to go ahead and vote money and goods?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have stated before that I think it is perfectly clear to them that there is no agreement on our part to do anything to implement that article, and it is for the Congress of the United States, if it approves the treaty, to interpret that article. Mr. Acheson has testified at length in that respect. I listened to his testimony, and I cannot contribute anything more to what he said. I can only say, as I have said, that there have been no promises given.

Senator WATKINS. I am not asking you that. I am asking, How do the people of Europe feel about it? What is their view about it? Do they think whether we ratify this treaty we are bound to do something in the way of giving them help?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have stated that I have not found anyone, none of the Government people that I have seen, or any under them, who has any impression that any promises have been made under that article. They have hopes, yes.

Senator WATKINS. I direct your attention to article 3. I am somewhat confused now. I thought that you had made a direct commitment in your statement that articles 3 and 5 went together.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have said that in their consideration of it they do.

Senator WATKINS. That is what I was trying to get at.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. And I have testified that if we do not implement it properly, it will cause some loss of the growing confidence.

Senator WATKINS. Do I understand you correctly now, that the European people, including the officials, feel that it is entirely up to us to say whether or not we are bound to do anything under that article?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No. I can only say that they interpret it seriously, want to implement it, and have hopes that we will feel the same way they do; but there have been no promises made.

Senator WATKINS. What is the public sentiment on the point of the implementation of it?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have testified to that, that they have hopes; and if no action is taken it will tend to reduce this growing confidence to which I have testified.

Senator WATKINS. Do you mean the only thing they get out of it is that there is a hope? They do not feel there is any binding effect on us to really do something?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. That is why I said it was so important psychologically to see the flow of some equipment promptly, in order to prove that we had a real interest in helping them defend their soil.

AMERICAN UNDERSTANDING OF EUROPEAN COMMITMENTS UNDER ARTICLE 3

Senator WATKINS. Now, as an American citizen of the United States, what do we think it means with respect to what they are required to do under that same obligation, that same article? Do we feel, or is it your belief, that they are not required to do anything, that they are not actually bound, that we just have a hope that they will do something?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Well, the interpretation of that will become solid when each country takes positive steps in regard to it.

Senator WATKINS. I am aware of that. I am trying to get at something else.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The interpretation that each country has of that article is determined by what it does. We are free to interpret it as the Secretary of State testified.

INTERPRETATION OF COMMITMENTS UNDER ARTICLE 3

Senator WATKINS. You do not have any well-defined idea as to what they think over there or what we should think about the binding effect of that particular section?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have testified to the fact that I have not found any Government official under the belief that there were any promises made. I am testifying also to the fact that they have high hopes and they welcome recommendations of the administration for the implementation of that article through the military assistance program which will be before the Congress shortly, and they have high hopes that Congress will take favorable action on that program.

Senator WATKINS. I understand they have hopes, but I am wondering what they think we have agreed to do. I hope I have not failed to make it clear that that is the answer that I would like to get, as to just how they feel about it; what their interpretation of that is. The reason I am asking you this, Mr. Harriman, is that I really want to get their feeling on it. I don't know; and you have been there.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I am not trying to evade, but I am trying to be as definite as I can. I think they fully understand that that article provides that each country must interpret that in its own way, and analyze its obligations under that article in its own way. Further understanding of what it means will come after the action in each of the countries, including the United States. And I am adding to that the fact that they have hopes that we will take an interest in their own self-defense. They have a conviction that they can as a group, not individually, but collectively, develop a military establishment in Europe which would not only add to their security but make a contribution to the security of the United States. And they believe in that article 3.

It is important to them as a two-way street. They have capabilities, a readiness to fight and capabilities of developing military establishments which will not only contribute to their security but also to ours. This word is "mutual," and they do not look upon it as a one-way street. But they do understand that they cannot effectively develop their forces without some help at this time, and certainly particular types of equipment.

I testified that there would be great disappointment and a certain lack of confidence or diminution of confidence if we did not promptly implement article 3 by the shipping of some equipment.

Senator WATKINS. You recognize the fact that that article is rather vague and rather indefinite, do you not?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It is a general statement of purpose.

ADVISABILITY OF CLARIFYING ARTICLE 3

Senator WATKINS. Do you think it would be wise, in view of the fact that you say each country will have the right, after the pact is signed and ratified, to interpret it in its own way, that we ought to have a reservation clearing up just what we think about it, so they will know just what we understand it to mean?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. So far as I am concerned, speaking as an individual, I think the article is satisfactory as it stands. The interpretation of that will be by the concrete steps that are taken. There is a desire for mutuality of interest, and I am not concerned over the interpretation the participating countries of Europe will place on that provision. I think they are earnest about it. Their capabilities are limited today, but they are talking about what they can do for the common cause, all of them.

Senator WATKINS. You realize that if we do not have some meeting of the minds on the question of what we are to do that they, if they have a different view, may be terribly disappointed in us and it may bring us more ill will if we do not meet their interpretation of the treaty?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do not think you could write it more specifically because conditions change from year to year. The situation in different countries changes from year to year, the needs change from year to year. I don't see how one could write into a treaty what any country, including the United States, would do next year or the year after or the year after. I wouldn't have thought we would want to bind ourselves to that. We are dealing with countries in this treaty that in my judgment, from close observation, are like-minded, and I have confidence that they will in their way do their share.

Senator WATKINS. But I have seen members of a family, certainly a father and son, to be like-minded, yet they have had a disagreement over the meaning of agreements even in a relationship as close as that. I just wondered whether you felt the situation was such that we ought to be made aware of it so we could know what they expect of us, so we could be governed accordingly. In other words, the American people ought to know pretty much what they are being let in for in this agreement, what it is going to bind future Congresses to do, to make appropriations to go on to carry out this so-called mutual aid. If you can give us any light on this view over there, we have had certain dispatches from over there giving quotations from speeches made by some of their premiers and other government officials, but if you have first-hand information, that is what I would like to get.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Will the Senator yield for a question? Did the Senator hear Secretary Acheson's testimony when these hearings opened up?

Senator WATKINS. I was not here that morning.

COMMITMENTS FOR COMING YEAR FOR MUTUAL AID

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Might I not ask Mr. Harriman, then, whether my understanding is correct, that Secretary Acheson made it very clear to us that there had been discussions between the Joint Chiefs of Staff as to what might be needed for a proper implementation of this defense program. In arriving at this figure of $1,130,000,000 they thought in terms of what would be needed in order to bring the existing divisions, this year's military program of these various countries, up to adequate strength, or something along that line. I got the impression, at least, that there was an understanding up to that point, and that he would be prepared to present the program to this committee or the Armed Services Committee specifically for the plan of this military pact.

Am I wrong about that?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. That is right as to this year.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. Everybody admits that the future will depend on what happens, what develops, what the effect of this is this year. So far as this year is concerned I understand there was a pretty clear understanding of what this mutual aid meant.

EUROPEAN REACTION TO ARTICLE 3

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The Senator has asked me what the reaction in Europe is. One is the government, and the other is the people. I think that if there was some evidence that would satisfy the people that we had an interest and interpreted this article as having an interest in helping them to help themselves, that would be adequate. Now, as to this program, I rest on Secretary Acheson's testimony in regard to the manner in which this particular proposal, which will be submitted to the Congress, was developed.

I would like to add that with the spirit which exists in Europe today, if we meet it with a recognition that we can help them contribute to their own security and our own, by shipping arms, I think it will cement the relationship of the growing confidence, the mutual confidence, and I do not think that it is a serious matter for the future, assuming that the Congress of the United States continues to carry out the article in the spirit in which it is begun. There may be a time when it isn't necessary at all. But they all recognize that that is a free decision. When you have a partnership relationship it is a partnership relationship, and everybody does what he thinks can be done.

I am not afraid, Senator. There will be discussions, yes, of course, but I am not afraid of its leading to any major difficulties in the future.

Senator SMITH of New Jersey. I just wanted to ask Senator Watkins whether that helped to clarify his thinking on this very relevant question, this very important question. It seems to me in presenting to us Secretary Acheson's statement it has been clear that these other countries, or at least their representatives, have in mind a fairly definite program.

Senator WATKINS. One reason I am asking this question is because as I glanced over the statement here—I did not hear it all; he was practically finished when I came in this morning—Mr. Harriman was giving practically unlimited endorsement to this program, and while that is very helpful to have his opinion, and I have great respect for it, still at the same time, under our Constitution the Senate has to advise the executive department with respect to these treaties, and I take the position that we should have as nearly as possible the same factual information as the Executive has in order to make up our minds. We should not rely entirely on the judgment and opinions of responsible officials any more than they should rely on our judgment.

The American people, I think, under the Constitution, require more of us than to merely get the opinions of these generals and Cabinet members and the President of the United States. If we are going to get advice that is worth anything for the protection of America, we must have the facts as well as the other agency of Government, and that is the view I take in the matter of these investigations, and I would like to get as much information as I possibly can from the witnesses on the facts which enable them to make a judgment in favor of the pact or against it, whichever way it happens to be. So you see what I have in mind.

DIFFICULTY IN MAKING TREATIES TOO DETAILED

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt just a minute right there, and you can answer this, too. I will ask you, Mr. Ambassador, if it is not impossible to put in a treaty all of the details as to what each government shall furnish and not furnish and what actions they shall take. These countries that signed this treaty are obligated to do the things that the treaty incorporates, just as we are obligated. We have got the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other visitors working on these plans, and if one of these countries should not do all that it can do, it certainly could be called to their attention through the appropriate agencies, and they could be stimulated into living up to the obligations of this Charter. It seems to me absolutely physically impossible to put in a treaty every detail affecting the various countries and what they shall do.

For instance, one country can better do one thing than another country, and adversely that country might be able and qualified to do certain things that the other country could not do. Are those general observations not true, Mr. Ambassador?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Absolutely, Senator.

May I say something to try to clarify to Senator Watkins my position with regard to this. I have come here this morning to testify as a reporter of what I see in the European scene. I opened my remarks with the statement that I welcomed the opportunity to express to you what I feel to be the meaning of the North Atlantic Treaty to our European partners, and how it relates to the recovery program.

LIMITS OF TESTIMONY

Now we are discussing this morning the Atlantic Pact, and I was addressing myself to the reaction in Europe to article 5 and article 3. We are not discussing this morning the recommendation of the administration, or the executive branch, I should say, on the military assistance program. When that comes before us, or this committee or whatever committee is appropriate, then the executive branch will submit the details of that program, and if I am here in the country

I will be very glad to contribute whatever I can to an analysis of that program.

Obviously it is the duty of the committee before which it comes to analyze the reasons and to review the facts which are presented at that time, but we are not here this morning, as I understand it, Mr. Chairman, to review the details of a program which has not yet been submitted. I am only testifying as to the reaction in Europe, the meaning of the pact to the Europeans, and I am discussing, or trying to discuss, article 3 and article 5, which are considered in Europe the two principal—I suppose by all of us the two principal—articles of the pact.

Senator WATKINS. I submit my questions I do not think have gone to asking any details. I have been trying to get the facts upon which I have formed a judgment. I may say this: That I think, as I read your testimony, that you have not only come here as a reporter to report what you saw and give a factual statement, but you have come here as a pleader and as a person who, by reason of his official position and experience, is enabled to form an opinion that is worth something to the Senate, and you have expressed that opinion and have done it very well.

I think you are more or less in the nature of an expert witness as well as someone who is just trying to give us the facts. That is what I wanted to get, if it is possible, and not all the details. I realize it is impossible to sit down and write all the details in a treaty, although the general principles are usually laid down, and if there are some firm commitments with respect to financial assistance and all that sort of thing they are more or less outlined so you can identify them and so there can't be any misunderstanding between the parties as to what they are to be.

Having made that explanation and that statement, I think you have said all you want to say about it, probably, and I do not want to prolong the investigation on that point, but to me it is a very important point in this treaty to know just what we are getting into and what we are letting ourselves in for, and it will help me to make up my mind finally on this treaty, whether we ought to have a reservation on this particular section to make it pretty clear to the people of the world just what we are agreeing to.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, I feel this question so deeply that I come to this committee and express the earnest hope that the pact will be ratified and that at a later time, when you consider all of the aspects of the proposal which will be submitted by the executive branch for the military assistance program, you will take similar action on that. I believe we are winning the struggle for a peaceful outlook in Europe, and I believe this is the time to carry through on the program which is showing evidences of real success. And the spirit of the people in Europe is most important of all.

MORALE IN EUROPE BEFORE ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator WATKINS. I would like to ask you something more about that. As I understand it, when you went there a year ago—I think you went there at the beginning, did you not, of the Marshall program?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir, I went over in May of last year.

Senator WATKINS. And you found that they were not too hopeful at that time?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No; my testimony about that relates to the trip I made to Europe in the summer of 1947. There already had been, between the summer of 1947 and the spring of 1948, as a result of the Marshall plan proposal and the implementation of that by the Congress, a tremendous improvement in the morale of the people. I testified to that at some length in answer to other questions.

Senator WATKINS. What did you find when you went there at the beginning? I want to find out what it was as compared to what it was before we ever announced the Atlantic Pact.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have said that the momentum which we attained up to, I said in my testimony, February, which clearly stated what had been achieved today, was based on hope. As Senator Smith said, when he was in Europe in 1947 his observations were the same as mine, it was pretty close to despair, and we saw month by month the improvement of conditions, the hope carried through to this point, that since the discussions of the Atlantic Pact—and I have made some trips during the period when the pact was under consideration—there was a new factor, namely, confidence was developing. I testified to the fact that I thought confidence was essential to recovery in Europe and to the development of the will to resist internal and external aggression, and therefore I expressed the view that the implementation of the pact, under article 3, was important to the European program, and attainment of our major objectives, which is the development of conditions which can lead to an assurance of peace in Europe.

RECOVERY IN EUROPE

Senator WATKINS. As I understand it from your testimony, the Marshall program, the European recovery program, has succeeded and has succeeded very well.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It is making progress and is ahead of what I had hoped it would be when we undertook the task.

Senator WATKINS. Did you not tell the House committee or one of the committees before whom you testified, as I remember the quotation from your testimony it was that it had succeeded very well in accomplishing the purpose the Congress had intended?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Yes, sir. I think we must bear in mind it is a 4-year program, and I testified to the fact that I thought it was ahead of what I thought it would be in the first year. More progress had been made toward the ultimate goal than I believed would be the case in 1 year.

Senator WATKINS. Do you remember at that time, when that program was up for discussion, it was said that if we did that it would help prevent a third world war, and it would also make it unnecessary for us to render any military assistance?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I never testified to that effect.

Senator WATKINS. I didn't say you; it was testified to that effect at that time.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I don't know who testified to that effect. I felt and hoped for a number of years that we would develop the policies which are now before the Congress, and I have said so many times, that I believed that if these policies would be developed, and the committee has heard me testify over the years since I came back from my post in Russia, that policies along the lines we now have before us would, in my judgment, assure us of a peaceful situation in Europe.

MORALE IN EUROPE BEFORE THE ATLANTIC PACT

Senator WATKINS. What was the sentiment of the people in Europe immediately before the announcement of a possible Atlantic Pact? How did they feel then about their situation under the recovery program?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. It is awfully hard to define it. I have used the word "hope." Hope was expanding, and the discussions and conclusion of the Atlantic Pact have developed this wave of confidence. I cannot find words to describe it any more definitely than that.

Now, the question of the Atlantic Pact and the military assistance is not new to them, because the resolution which was developed by this committee and passed by the Senate gave an indication of the trend of opinion in the Senate. It is on that resolution that the Atlantic Pact has been developed, in addition to which the House discussed, in connection with ECA last spring, whether there should not be in ECA a provision to permit the transfer of military equipment, so this subject and the fact that we are considering it—when I say "we," the American people and the Congress—is not new to the people in Europe. They were fully alive to the fact that this subject was in public and general discussion among the people and in the Congress last year.

Now, that has contributed to the hope, and to find that the Atlantic Pact is actually signed and before the Senate for ratification, and the expectation that it will be ratified, and with that the consideration and implementation of article 3, all has led to a wave of confidence as I have described.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt a minute?

How long will you take to conclude?

Senator WATKINS. I can tell better if I can tell how long the answers will be. I have only a few questions, but I seem to have to ask them a good many times to try to get what I want to get.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I am sorry, sir.

Senator WATKINS. I have no means of anticipating the length of the answers.

The CHAIRMAN. Nor the length of the questions.

Senator WATKINS. My questions have not been so long, I think the record will show.

RECOVERY AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE

What I wanted to find out, if possible, was just how the people felt, whether they had confidence in going on under the European recovery program without any military alliance or pact.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I don't think we have a completed program in Europe to attain our objectives in Europe unless we go forward.

Senator WATKINS. How do they feel?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I will put that as my opinion of their belief. What I say, I believe is their opinion.

Senator WATKINS. You put that as their opinion?

Would they give up hope now, for instance, and not do anything more to help themselves, and just give in to appeasement if the Senate should not vote anything, or Congress should not vote anything to implement the pact?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No. I think they will go ahead, but I think it will raise doubts. I think you will have a serious set-back if we don't go ahead with the pact.

Senator WATKINS. I meant the implementation. I said, suppose we ratify the pact but we do not vote any military relief.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I testified, Senator, at length this morning that I believed we would never recapture the present wave of enthusiasm and spirit of mutual cooperation which exists and which is growing today in Europe.

Senator WATKINS. What would happen if we did not ratify the pact and would just go on with our European recovery program?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I think there would be a reorientation. Those people in each country that have some confidence in appeasement and neutrality would see that there would be a rediscussion of all of that, and a restrengthening of those that believe in appeasement and neutrality would result.

NEED FOR AMERICAN ASSISTANCE

Senator WATKINS. Is it a fact that they feel that they cannot, for any foreseeable time now, stand on their own feet without our assistance?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do not know what "foreseeable" is. I believe they feel that with our assistance they can strengthen their military establishment to the point where they can live in a sense of security and go to bed at night feeling that they can get up in the morning without some bad news.

Senator WATKINS. I get from one of the statements you made here in your general statement that without the United States their case is practically hopeless. I wondered how long that would be that way, how long we would have to be their mainstay.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. The European recovery program was undertaken as a 4-year program and accepted as a 4-year program by the European nations, and they have worked to carry out what they have to do to make it a success. I cannot discuss the military aspects of it, as that is not before us at the present time.

Senator WATKINS. You can discuss how they feel.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. They have great confidence in their ability, talking about the Europeans. The Europeans feel that they will fight, and they have fought well in the past, and will do so again to protect their soil, but at the present time it will take them so long to reestablish their military establishments that they want our help to expedite the day.

RECOVERY AND THE ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator WATKINS. Do you think they would give up completely if we did not ratify this pact but went on with our economic assistance?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Without any economic assistance? They wouldn't give up; they would battle it through. But it is my judgment economic conditions would deteriorate again and there would be the same difficulties, or similar difficulties, that existed in 1947, and what we put into it would be lost.

Senator WATKINS. In other words, after having had the European recovery program in operation a year, it is your considered judgment that these people feel over there that without the pact they are practically lost, and their condition will disintegrate again back to 1947?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. Senator, they look upon this as a 4-year program. No one over there felt the job could be done—no informed person; I don't know what the individual people felt—that it could be done in a year.

Senator WATKINS. I said, let us carry out the European recovery program to the full 4 years. If we do not take in the pact, or if we do not ratify the pact, then do they take the position that without the pact they will not be able to get on their feet and they will disintegrate again back to 1947 conditions?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. No. I thought you meant if we stopped the European recovery program.

If you carry along the European recovery program without the confidence that comes from the pact itself, it will be more difficult to achieve the objective. The economic situation, in my judgment, will not be as sound at the end of 4 years as it would be with the pact. But certainly progress will have been made, but it won't be the full realization of what I believe is in our national interest to development of, as I said, strong partners in the struggle for freedom and peace in which we are engaged.

POSSIBILITY OF WAR

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Ambassador, in your opinion are we moving away from imminent war or are we moving nearer to it?

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I have testified before this committee that I did not believe that war was inevitable, and I felt if the programs that we had before us could be developed, war could be avoided, and I am more encouraged in that conviction now than I ever have been. I am extremely optimistic, personally, that our policies as they have been developed are bearing fruit.

Senator WATKINS. I do not think I got quite what I asked for. I wanted to know whether in your opinion we were moving toward war or away from it.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I thought I testified to that effect. We are moving away from it.

Senator WATKINS. What I would like to get your opinion on is this: Whether or not the present situation is such that if we do not adopt this pact we are likely to face war, and that that prospect is imminent.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I do not think that anyone can answer that categorical question.

Senator WATKINS. All I want is your opinion.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. My opinion is that we further the interests of peace by carrying through this program, and we will develop strong partners which we need, in my judgment, as we look around the world, to help us further the interests of peace all over the world.

That is all I can say, Senator.

Senator WATKINS. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand in recess until Monday at 10:30.

We thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador. You have made a very clear and very comprehensive statement in view of the questions that have been asked you, all of which were not, in my opinion, pertinent to the issue before the committee.

Ambassador HARRIMAN. I am grateful for the opportunity you have given me to appear before you.

(Whereupon, at 1:25 p. m., the committee adjourned, to reconvene on Monday, May 2, 1949, at 10:30 a. m.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

MONDAY, MAY 2, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment on April 29, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, at 10:30 a. m., Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Connally, George, Thomas of Utah, Green, McMahon, Fulbright, Vandenberg, Hickenlooper, and Lodge.

Also present: Senators Donnell and Watkins.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order.

This is the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, holding hearings on the North Atlantic Pact. We are fortunate this morning in having present Mr. Lovett, former Under Secretary of State, whom we wish to interrogate. Mr. Lovett is familiar, I assume—I assume it is a sound assumption—with the North Atlantic Pact, and is reputed to have been one of the early people who had contact with its formation, and so forth. We will be very glad to hear you on the matter, Mr. Lovett, and we shall try to accommodate ourselves as much as possible to your convenience.

Mr. LOVETT. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I have a short prepared statement here, copies of which are on the way up to the committee now, and if it meets with the wishes of the committee I will read from this as an initial statement.

The CHAIRMAN. That is very good, and we will interrogate you afterward.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT A. LOVETT, FORMER UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. LOVETT. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the opportunity to appear before this committee in support of the North Atlantic Pact with which I was directly associated in its origin and early development.

I shall not take the time of the committee by discussing the importance of this treaty in relation to our foreign policy or the interpretation of the actual text. These and many other points dealing with the treaty have been authoritatively and fully covered in the statements and testimony of the Secretary of State and other witnesses who have appeared before you. I shall likewise try to keep my preliminary statement brief and will then be at the disposal of the committee for any questions concerning the particular aspects of the treaty with which I was intimately and directly associated.

It is important, I believe, that there should be a full understanding as to how this treaty was conceived, the need which gave birth to its concept, and the manner in which the executive branch of the United States Government came to the decision that United States association in a measure of collective defense of this nature was necessary in the interests of its own security and that of world peace.

INSECURITY IN WESTERN EUROPE

Even while the European recovery program was still in a state of formulation, it became obvious that the problem of security in western Europe could not be ignored in connection with the general problem of European recovery. The policies and practices pursued by the Soviet Government and the Communist Parties subservient to it since the end of hostilities had created a sense of insecurity in the free countries of western Europe who had joined together to promote, with American assistance, the reconstruction and recovery of their community.

COMMUNIST ACTIONS AGAINST ERP

This general sense of insecurity had been intensified by the savage reaction of the Soviet Government to the program of cooperative undertaking between the United States and the nations of western Europe then known as the Marshall plan for the reconstruction and revival of the European community. The organization by the Soviet Government of the Cominform and the announced purpose of the Soviet Government of its intention to use every method at its disposal to sabotage and defeat the return of health and stability to the European community and the subsequent implementation of that intention had raised immediately and directly the problem of security for the nations of western Europe. They knew from experience and from the open announcement of the Soviet Government that they could expect neither help nor mercy from the Soviet Union and the Communist Parties which operate under the direction of the Kremlin.

NEED TO ASSIST RECOVERY BY INCREASING SECURITY

It became obvious to the European countries and to the executive branch of this Government that recovery would not be fully achieved unless some method could be devised to enhance the sense of security of the participating nations and restore, insofar as possible, confidence that the fruits of the constructive enterprise in which we were jointly engaged would not be destroyed by external aggression. With the encouragement of this Government, five European governments joined together in the Brussels Pact as a first step in dealing with this problem of security for the European community.

It was, however, obvious to them, as it was to us, that these European countries—no matter how far they progressed along the program which they had set for themselves of coordinating and integrating their defense capabilities—were not able by their efforts alone to deal with the situation. The problem then arose in our minds as to whether or not it was in the interest of the United States to associate ourselves with certain European nations in order to create those conditions of security and confidence essential for recovery and to make a contribution for the preservation of peace in an area so vital to the national security of the United States.

The support given to the European recovery program, which during this period was before the Congress of the United States, had already made it plain that a primary objective of the foreign policy of this country was the survival, revival, and recovery of the free community of western European nations. It seemed hardly logical to us to make the effort required under this program and to ignore the possibility that if this great enterprise was not given the protection that it needed, its whole aim could be defeated. Then all the consequences which the European recovery program was designed to avert might be upon us.

EARLY CONSULTATIONS WITH FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

The President of the United States, in his address to the joint session of the two Houses of Congress on March 17, 1948, made clear our interest and intentions in regard to this problem of security. However, the executive branch did not wish to take even the first step in so important a matter without obtaining the views of this committee. Accordingly, under the instructions of the President, Secretary Marshall and I began a series of consultations with the Committee on Foreign Relations. I shall not go into any detail as to the nature of these consultations, since they were done with this committee and they are familiar to many of its members.

I would like to say here that while the State Department placed at the disposal of the members of this committee the information which we had concerning the situation abroad, and discussed with them our opinion as to where the interests of the United States lay, the Senate Resolution 239, which was reported out unanimously by this committee and subsequently adopted by the Senate on June 11, 1948, was not drafted in the Department of State. It was—as this committee knows—the product of this committee after many consultations with us. The contents of this resolution, with which you are all familiar, became our guide in the discussions and subsequent negotiations which led to the conclusion of the North Atlantic Pact.

EXPLORATORY CONVERSATIONS WITH BRUSSELS PACT COUNTRIES

From July to September 1948, as Under Secretary of State, I conducted a series of conversations with the representatives of the Governments of Canada and the five countries forming the Brussels Pact—Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxemburg. These conversations were in the true sense of the word exploratory, and were specifically without commitment on the participants. We did not attempt to draw up any text or draft of a treaty. We wished to ascertain whether or not all the countries then involved were in sufficient accord as to the problems we were dealing with and the measures suitable to deal with them before we would embark on any more formal course. We wished above all to be certain that the European nations understood clearly the point of view of the United States Government and the sense of the Senate as set forth in Resolution 239.

I do not wish to burden the committee with any details concerning these conversations in my statement, but I hope in my testimony I will be able to clear up any questions on this point that the committee may have.

In September these exploratory talks came to an end and the results were reported back to the governments for their consideration. They were not resumed until December.

BEGINNING OF NEGOTIATIONS FOR THE TREATY

Through diplomatic channels, at the end of October, the governments which had participated in the exploratory talks in the summer had made known their views that a treaty of this nature was considered most necessary by all of them, and in December the discussions in Washington were resumed for the purpose of drafting the type of instrument that would give expression to the common purpose we had in mind. An outline of the subject matter which such a treaty should contain had been agreed upon in the exploratory talks during the summer and subsequently approved by the respective governments. This outline was developed into a series of preliminary draft articles during negotiations which started in December. No draft of the treaty as a whole was introduced by any government at any time. The drafting was a collective effort. The drafting had not been completed when I left Government service on January 20.

INTERESTS OF OTHER GOVERNMENTS IN THE TREATY

It was during the last week of December and early January that certain other governments whose participation in the treaty would be welcomed if they so desired, were informed of the general nature of the treaty in contemplation. I would like to say here that this information was conveyed to these governments at their request and no government at this, or as far as I know any other, time was ever subjected to any pressure in regard to joining the North Atlantic Pact. The participants did not wish even to place any government in the awkward position of receiving an invitation unless it had previously indicated its desire to be invited. We had very firmly in mind that this association of nations for collective self-defense must be entirely voluntary on the part of any of its members or it would fail of its purpose.

SUBMISSION OF PRELIMINARY DRAFT TO PARTICIPATING GOVERNMENTS

A preliminary draft of certain articles of the treaty was completed late in December and on the 24th of that month was submitted to the participating governments for their consideration. I think it is important to emphasize that although the representatives who had met in Washington had worked out this preliminary draft, it was clearly understood that it was without commitment on the part of the governments they represented; it was, in effect, a working paper which all realized would be subject to probable change before it became anything approaching a final text. We made abundantly clear our intention to regard this draft as a working paper and as a basis for consultation with the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. This was clearly understood by all participants.

Shortly after this, as you know, I relinquished my duties as Under Secretary of State, and Secretary Acheson took over the conduct of these negotiations. He has appeared before this committee and has testified concerning this period.

ADVANTAGES OF THE TREATY

It is, I hope, superfluous to tell the committee how warmly I welcomed the signature of the North Atlantic Pact on April 4 in Washington. We would not have embarked on this venture had not the President, General Marshall, and those of us in the State Department associated with him, as well as the National Security Council and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, felt strongly that an association of this nature was essential to the national security of the United States and for the furtherance of peace and security, which has been and remains the great goal of our foreign policy.

Nothing that has occurred since I left office has changed my own strong convictions upon this point. On the contrary, I believe that the signature of this treaty has in itself enhanced the chances of successfully achieving these goals.

There has, in fact, already been concrete evidence of this. Within a few days of the signature of the treaty, comprehensive agreements on Germany, agreements I may say which we had been trying unsuccessfully for more than a year to reach, were concluded with the United Kingdom and France. Without the new sense of confidence provided by association contemplated by the treaty I doubt whether it would have been possible to reach such satisfactory agreements.

Recent events have only deepened my conviction that this treaty reflects the basic interests of the United States. I feel confident that fluctuations in our relations with any foreign power will not succeed in diverting our attention from these basic interests.

I firmly believe that this treaty gives accurate expression to the determination of the American people to play their full part in the maintenance of peace and security. I earnestly hope, and I am confident, that the Senate will make that determination unmistakably clear in its action upon the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all, Mr. Lovett?

Mr. LOVETT. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

SOVIET ATTITUDE TOWARD ECA

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Lovett, you made reference to the ECA having been under consideration during a certain period. With regard to the Soviet Government's attitude respecting the ECA, I want to ask you some questions about my own views. Am I correct in the assumption that one of the chief motives of the opposition of the Soviet Union to the ECA is their fear that the operation of the ECA will strengthen the weaker countries, the smaller countries, like Denmark, Holland, and others of western Europe, and thereby damage the opportunities of the Soviet Union to infiltrate and aggress against them, and probably incorporate them into the system that we know as the satellites? Am I correct in that view?

Mr. LOVETT. I think, Mr. Chairman, that is generally correct, sir. They have found that communism spreads in a period of great distress and turmoil, and these countries had not had an opportunity to regain strength since the war and were a fertile field for agitation.

The CHAIRMAN. And economic hardship and disturbance would aggravate that situation, would it not?

Mr. LOVETT. Very definitely.

The CHAIRMAN. And incline those who were in want and those who were dissatisfied and those who have no hope for the future, and have despair, to grasp any new proposal that might be made to them?

Mr. LOVETT. I think that is correct, sir.

MOTIVES BEHIND THE RUSSIAN OPPOSITION

The CHAIRMAN. What other motive could a government have to depress its neighbors and to bring about or to encourage economic disturbance, except that that I have indicated? Why should one country that itself is prosperous and getting along successfully be jealous of another country because it was rehabilitating itself and coming back into a normal state of economic and political life?

Mr. LOVETT. Well, Mr. Chairman, I find it quite impossible to follow the devious mental processes of the Politburo, but it is clear that they have in the past profited by unrest and disorder, and in fact have very frequently had a hand in generating it through fifth-column activities, so I think it is fair to assume that their ambitions for expansion may have been an element in their desire to move toward the West.

The CHAIRMAN. Have not those conditions that you mentioned a moment ago preceded practically every movement that the Soviets have made toward taking over these various countries?

Mr. LOVETT. That has been generally so, sir.

DRAFTING OF SENATE RESOLUTION 239

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke of the resolution which the Senate passed, and you said that it was not drafted by the State Department. As a matter of fact it is true, however, that the State Department did draft an outline or rough plan, and that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations worked it all over and changed it and adopted our own draft?

Mr. LOVETT. My best recollection, Mr. Chairman, is that the State Department had two or three drafts presenting their views on certain of the matters which were subsequently covered in 239, and the staff of the Senator Foreign Relations Committee went over them carefully, and then they were transmitted to the committee and there were frequent conversations. What came out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had very little resemblance to what initially went in in treatment. The basic points, however, were covered.

The CHAIRMAN. As I recall it, the Senate resolution finally adopted was much shorter and terser than even the drafts which the State Department had theretofore submitted.

Mr. LOVETT. Oh, very much.

The CHAIRMAN. And we thought we had made a great improvement over the tentative drafts that had been submitted.

NO PRESSURES ON COUNTRIES TO SIGN THE TREATY

You spoke of the negotiations and conversations with the other nations who subsequently signed the North Atlantic Pact. As I get the effect of your testimony, it was that no pressure was exerted by the State Department or by our Government to push them into the treaty, is that correct?

Mr. LOVETT. It was even stronger than that, Mr. Chairman. All participants were careful not to give information about the treaty except on the request of the countries, so that it was not merely a question of pressure, which was not exercised in any case, but we did not want to embarrass them, as I pointed out in the statement, even by discussing it, unless they asked for such discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. However, is it not logical to assume that with a number of the nations expressing their desire to adhere, that that no doubt influenced some other countries to come along and join up?

Mr. LOVETT. I think that is a reasonable assumption. Certainly there was enough coverage of the discussions in the press to indicate that some important events were taking place. No doubt those were among the elements which influenced other countries to inquire as to the purpose of this and the status at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. And each time a nation would express a desire to adhere, it would give strength to the North Atlantic Pact, and that fact would have an influence upon others who were wavering to join up, is that not true?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir; that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true in ordinary life and negotiations of a group character.

All right, Senator Vandenberg.

Senator VANDENBERG. Well, Mr. Secretary, first of all I want to welcome you back even temporarily into this forum where you rendered such distinguished service to the country.

Mr. LOVETT. Thank you.

Senator VANDENBERG. The Senate Resolution 239 is really the root source of the thing which is now under consideration, is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir.

INABILITY OF THE UNITED NATIONS TO INSURE SECURITY

Senator VANDENBERG. I think it is of considerable importance to spend a moment on that resolution, because heretofore in these hearings we have not seriously explored it.

Was not the chief inspiration of that resolution the fact that the operations of the Security Council of the United Nations were demonstrating so many road blocks that we found it necessary to give our attention primarily to the possibility of exploring every possible method to make the Charter work. Was that not the primary inspiration of this entire enterprise?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct, sir.

SENATE RESOLUTION 239 AND STRENGTHENING OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Senator VANDENBERG. Indeed, out of the six points in Senate Resolution 239, is not the very first point and key point the one which calls for voluntary agreement to remove the veto from all questions involving pacific settlements of international disputes and situations and from the admission of new members? In other words, is that not the take-off point from which this consideration started?

Mr. LOVETT. That was the take-off point.

Senator VANDENBERG. Furthermore, out of the six objectives certified in Senate Resolution 239, three of the six deal specifically with this effort to find a way to make the Charter of the United Nations practicable as a factor in preserving international peace and security. Is that not true?

Mr. LOVETT. That is true, Senator Vandenberg.

Senator VANDENBERG. I would like to identify the other two. I have read the first objective in the resolution. The fifth objective reads as follows:

Maximum efforts to obtain agreements to provide the United Nations with armed forces as provided by the Charter, and to obtain agreement among member nations upon universal regulation and reduction of armaments under adequate and dependable guaranty against violation.

The sixth point reads as follows:

If necessary, after adequate effort toward strengthening the United Nations, review of the Charter at an appropriate time by a general conference called under article 109 or by the General Assembly.

Now, the point I want to reiterate, and I want to see if you agree with me, is that this clearly shows that the entire impulse of this enterprise was to find a way, if possible, within the framework of the Charter of the United Nations, to more nearly approach those protections for international peace and security which were being interrupted by the unanticipated obstructions of the Soviet Union and its satellites in making the Charter work. Is that not true?

Mr. LOVETT. That is true, Senator Vandenberg.

Senator VANDENBERG. Having, then, in three of the six paragraphs of Senate Resolution 239, dealt directly with this question of the veto, was it not, in your opinion, a perfectly logical evolution that the Department and the committee should turn, then, to chapter VIII, dealing with regional arrangements, and still more particularly to article 51, to identify a very specific opportunity to achieve the results I have indicated, even though they found it impossible to remove the veto from questions involving pacific settlements and even though we found it impossible to progress dependably toward disarmament?

I will state the question again more briefly: Was it not the fact that we found ourselves driven to an exploration of chapter VIII of the Charter, and article 51 in particular, in order to achieve these peace objectives, even though we continued to find it impossible to liberalize the Charter itself?

Mr. LOVETT. That is quite correct, sir.

AUTHORITY IN CHARTER FOR NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. So when we turned to chapter VIII and article 51, we found, did we not, that here was the authority under which congenial nations could proceed in individual and collective self-defense, whenever the Security Council, for whatever reason, was failing in its obligation to defend adequately the objective of international peace and security?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct, Senator.

RIO TREATY AS A PRECEDENT

Senator VANDENBERG. And we found, did we not, and by "we" I mean the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee, that already a very significant precedent was available in the Rio pact, under which what seemed to be a highly hopeful formula had been developed which would permit member nations of the United Nations to individually and collectively defend themselves not only at the instant moment of a sudden armed attack, but also through that continuing period until and unless the Security Council made adequate arrangements to protect and restore international peace and security?

Mr. LOVETT. I believe the Rio pact, Senator, was the signpost for both the Brussels pact and our own efforts.

THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. So that in this evolution we finally arrive at the North Atlantic Pact, which does specifically provide, and wholly within the jurisdiction of the United Nations, the means by which the congenial peace-loving nations of the North Atlantic community can defend themselves, within the Charter, not only at a moment of initial armed aggression but also until such time as the Security Council has taken adequate action to function as was anticipated when the Charter was written?

Mr. LOVETT. That was our definite purpose.

Senator VANDENBERG. So that we are at this point operating strictly within the jurisdiction of the Charter, but outside the reach of the veto, until such moment as the Security Council exercises the responsibilities which are presumed to attach to it under the obligations of the Charter?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct, Senator Vandenberg.

EMPHASIS ON SELF-HELP AND MUTUAL AID

Senator VANDENBERG. Now, Mr. Secretary, in the course of all of those preliminary conversations which you had with the first group of allied nations which have joined in this adventure, to what extent did the conversations turn on article 3 and the supplemental military implementation of the pact?

Mr. LOVETT. I will just check article 3, Senator Vandenberg. During the conversations and exploratory discussions which were held here it was tiresomely repeated by the United States Government representatives that we were talking about a collective self-defense system here, on the definite understanding that anything which might be done in the way of a pact must necessarily stem from absolute assurance that every member of this would do his utmost not only in his own defense, but in the defense of his associates in this pact. The matter of military supplies was not discussed during my time in these exploratory talks. In fact, there was no figure or estimate. It was, however, clearly recognized by all that there would be, under the mutual-aid aspect of this, a necessity at some time for help from one country to another, those countries not being specified. During those discussions it was clearly understood by all that there was no commitment on the part of this country or any other participant in the talks to do a specific thing in the way of supply.

The whole purpose, and certainly the majority of the time, was spent on devising a method whereby we could deter the aggressor, stop a war before it starts, if possible, and in any event make the position of these countries of common heritage and common ideals so clear that if anyone did attack them, he would do so at his peril and after adequate advance warning. It was our hope that we could profit from the past and stop aggression in an area which has so vitally affected the national security of this country as well as the peace of the world.

OBLIGATION ON UNITED STATES TO IMPLEMENT ARTICLE 3

Senator VANDENBERG. Now in that phase of those discussions, even though you did not reach any inquiry into specific implementation, the situation as I understand you comes down to about this, that clearly there is some sort of an obligation involved in our signature in this treaty. The situation certainly does not remain as totally unobligated as it would be if there were no treaty. But you are undertaking at all times to leave the Government of the United States in complete and unquestioned control of its own decisions in this aspect, without any sort of mortgage or commitment in respect to its right to make those decisions?

Mr. LOVETT. That is absolutely correct, Senator. Not only that, but there were other participants who were equally insistent on such right.

NO COMMITMENTS ON MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator VANDENBERG. And so long as you were in charge of these negotiations, there was no commitment made of any nature, directly or indirectly, in connection either with the military implementation of the pact or in respect to the type of action which the United States would take if, as, and when it confronted armed aggression and had to decide for itself what its contribution should be to defeat it?

Mr. LOVETT. None whatsoever.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. I believe I have no questions, except just to thank Mr. Lovett for coming back down here and assisting us again.

Mr. LOVETT. Thank you, Senator.

FORESHADOWED IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

Senator GEORGE. I think, Mr. Lovett, you might say that even when we were considering the resolution to which you have referred there was at least a consciousness that ultimately there would be an obligation to extend mutual aid and assistance?

Mr. LOVETT. Well, Senator, you will remember in our repeated conferences on this with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee the question of the constitutional processes was reiterated. My recollection is mentioned two or three times in the language of 239. That was expanded and explained to the participants repeatedly, and it was pointed out that the manner of action, the form of action which this country would take, would necessarily be within the power of the Congress, and not an automatic affair controlled by this treaty itself. On the other hand, if the treaty is to be effective, it must clearly indicate in advance what the obligation of this Government is, and as I recall it, that is covered in article 5. I am not speaking of the governmental obligation; that is, to take such action as this Government may deem necessary, or any other government dealing with its own affairs may deem necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area. So that the obligation was always an obligation of some sort dealing with this pact. It was always in contemplation and was, of course, discussed, hence the introduction into 239 of the repeated warning to the negotiators and to the executive branch to take such obligation within the constitutional processes of the country.

Senator GEORGE. That is in accordance with my recollection of our early discussions and subsequent discussions, so far as that goes.

DETERMINING UNITED STATES OBLIGATION UNDER THE TREATY

I think it would be very difficult, Mr. Lovett, and perhaps you would agree, to formulate final action before events were beginning to shape themselves also.

Mr. LOVETT. I think it would be impossible, Senator George. I do not think it would be possible.

Senator GEORGE. You do not think it would be possible?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir.

Senator GEORGE. That is what I meant to say, that until events began to shape themselves, even aggressive moves, it would be most difficult, if not impossible, to make final determinations as to what our obligation would mean under the treaty.

Mr. LOVETT. The order of magnitude of the event would certainly be a vital element. If armies marched in and overran a country, that would appear to be at one scale of magnitude. If, on the other hand, there was a border incident with some border guards shooting at each other, that would be toward the low end of the scale. Between that you would have the wide range in which some judgment must enter.

Senator GEORGE. Yes, sir. That is all.

CHANGES IN THE DRAFT MADE BY THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

The CHAIRMAN. May I go back just a moment, while it is on the point that has just been covered? In article 5, after outlining certain other things, we find the language:

by taking forthwith individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary * * *.

The Committee on Foreign Relations, in its discussions with the State Department and the drafters of this treaty, is responsible for the insertion of that language. The committee insisted that the language "such action as it deems necessary" should be included in that particular article, and that was for the purpose—you were not here at the time, as I remember—of reserving to the United States, and for that matter to the other signatories of the treaty, the provision that the action which it would take would be the action which the Government taking it deemed necessary, and so on and so on.

Mr. LOVETT. That is entirely consistent, Mr. Chairman, with the basic principles set out as guideposts in Senate Resolution 239, and the position taken in the negotiations with the participating countries.

The CHAIRMAN. I thank you. I wanted to let the country know that the Committee on Foreign Relations was insistent upon the insertion of that language so as to preserve the understandings that we had in the exploratory and other conversations.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I think you might well add that the phrase "including the use of armed force" was moved from its original context at the instance of the Foreign Relations Committee in order to make sure that the use of armed force was not automatic, one of the things which had to be embraced within the preventive measures which might be undertaken in this collective security.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator is correct, and I recall very vividly the discussion in the committee with respect to that point. It was contended by some that the language "including the use of armed force" would require the use of armed force, but we made it very clear, and the State Department representative agreed with it, that among the actions which it could take if it deems necessary was armed force. But that was reserved to the decision of the United States and other signatories to the treaty. There was nothing automatic about it. It was simply a recitation of things that it could do. Already the general proposition of aiding all it could had been named, so the language, "including the use of armed force" was simply a particular statement that it was within the measures which the United States could take or could not take, and therefore any idea that it was automatic was negated and it was made clear that there was no obligation to do that but only on the idea that among the things we could do would be the use of armed force.

Senator LODGE?

FLUCTUATIONS IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

Senator LODGE. I am much obliged to Mr. Lovett for giving us this very helpful statement. I notice the last sentence in the next to the last paragraph of Mr. Lovett's statement, when he says, "I feel confident that the fluctuations in our relations with any foreign power will not succeed in diverting our attention from these basic interests."

I think it is true that in the last year or two there have been a number of international actions which have been provocative and which have aroused anger and irritation in this country, but as I read that sentence of yours, you feel that the foreign policy on which we are engaged should be continued whether or not we are irritated or angered by the actions of some other country.

Mr. LOVETT. Senator, I was trying to point directly to the danger of being lulled to either laziness or to sleep by a temporary incident or a temporary set of circumstances. I think a fair example can be found if you recall the swings from anger to disgust to hope that we went through in the 2 years that I was down here, notably with respect to endeavors to reach agreements with the Soviets. And I was trying to point out in the record that I feel we must deal with this on the basis of the long-range policy of this country and not be diverted by some temporary or transient element in the negotiations between any countries.

Senator LODGE. So that even if international communism should stop punching us on the nose and should start using honeyed words, we should continue along this moderate, firm line that has been outlined?

Mr. LOVETT. Most definitely, sir; because what we want to do is to insure, if possible, the continuation of some peace which we hope to attain some day.

Senator LODGE. I think there is no question, is there, that the tactics of international communism in punching us on the nose have had a good deal to do with some of the legislation we have enacted?

Mr. LOVETT. I have no doubt of that.

Senator LODGE. And I just express the hope that we do not need that in order to keep us on the beam.

STATE DEPARTMENT-CONGRESSIONAL RELATIONS

Now I would like to bring up one more point, and then I will be through. When you were Under Secretary of State, you seemed to me to be making a very comprehensive and wholehearted effort to keep in touch with the United States Senate, in the only way that was open to you to do it, which was through the Foreign Relations Committee. First of all, am I right in that belief?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, Senator Lodge, you are certainly right. It would have been quite impossible for the Department of State, in my time there, or I think at any time, to have dealt with the multitude of confusing problems without somebody to go to and discuss the various alternatives with complete frankness and complete security. I emphasize the latter, and I am glad to say that we never, so far as I know, were let down in those efforts on our part to obtain guidance and help. By that I do not mean that we were not given restraints, from time to time, or questioned very pointedly, which served the purpose of clarification, but when a line was agreed on, and when it had the imprimatur of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, we could go back to work and know that we were going to be backed up, and that is of tremendous importance in negotiation, as you know.

Senator LODGE. In preparing yourself for these negotiations, did you have occasion to look into past history and see to what extent there has been cooperation with the Senate in past days on other treaties?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, I have.

Senator LODGE. Did you ever find a case in which there had been closer or more comprehensive cooperation than took place in connection with this one?

Mr. LOVETT. I do not know of any, Senator Lodge. I think this is an extraordinary collective effort between the legislative and the executive branches.

Senator LODGE. So if we can't make a go of it after all the effort that has been made this time, the outlook for future cooperation is not very good, is it?

Mr. LOVETT. Not very, sir.

Senator LODGE. Thank you; thank you, Mr. Chairman.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE UNITED NATIONS AND STATE DEPARTMENT COOPERATION ON SENATE RESOLUTION 289

The CHAIRMAN. Reverting just a moment to these drafts of this resolution, as I recall it we had a great number of resolutions by various Senators affecting the foreign policy, and as I recall it now, we referred all of those things down to the State Department, and that was more or less the basis for the original two or three drafts which you suggested a moment ago were finally brought back to the committee, and we then reworked them and agreed upon the final draft of the resolution.

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct, Senator Connally. There were a very large number—the precise figure escapes me at the moment—of suggestions as to what to do about the problem which Senator Vandenberg has earlier outlined. There was a large number. We were asked our opinion about it, notably in order to bring in the experts on the United Nations organization, and there were several suggestions made in alternative forms by the Department to the committee, but Resolution 239 came out of a series of consultations and not from the State Department. It is, as was said earlier, substantially more pointed, it is substantially shorter, and it deals with a more limited area than was in some of the original suggestions arising out of the large number of bills which had been submitted to your committee.

The CHAIRMAN. As I recall it, five or six of those resolutions or bills contained suggestions about the amendment of the Charter and dealing with the United Nations, and almost every Senator that had an idea about how he thought the foreign policy of the United States should be conducted had introduced a resolution, so the committee referred them down to the State Department and you boiled them over and reduced them to three or four drafts. Those drafts were then submitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations and then we boiled them down, and after the final boiling process there was evolved the Senate resolution which was adopted by the Senate. Is that not correct?

Mr. LOVETT. That is generally correct, Mr. Chairman. I think it was pointed out, sir, that of the six objectives mentioned here there were three which were designed to strengthen the United Nations on a universal basis, and one of the problems which was posed to the Department of State was, of course, the fact that any major operation on the United Nations Charter would require the agreement of all the major powers.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly.

Mr. LOVETT. And we had had the lengthy and somewhat saddening experience of the effect of the veto in the Security Council.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Senator Thomas?

Senator THOMAS of Utah. I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Fulbright?

Senator FULBRIGHT. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator McMahon?

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Lovett, I am delighted to see you and to see you looking so much better than when I saw you last.

Mr. LOVETT. Thank you, sir.

FLUCTUATIONS IN INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND AMERICAN POLICY

Senator McMAHON. I do think it is worth emphasizing the context of the last paragraph about which Senator Lodge spoke to you: namely, that any temporary day-to-day fluctuations shall not be considered by this Government or by the American people as any basic change in policy unless and until there are certain developments in very important matters having to do with the relations between our two countries. Are you not in agreement on that?

Mr. LOVETT. That is absolutely correct, Senator.

Senator McMAHON. And I think perhaps the precaution you voice there is well worth while.

I presume, Mr. Lovett—and I think you have said so, but I think it is worth emphasizing—that the improvement that we have today in our foreign relations, in your opinion, in some part at least is due to the fact that we have taken the steps that we have already taken with regard to the formulation of this treaty?

Mr. LOVETT. I think so, sir; very definitely.

Senator McMAHON. And the American people ought to know that it is only because we have processed along a definitely marked and intelligent line of conduct that we have gotten as far as we have.

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir.

Senator McMAHON. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper, I beg your pardon. I did not know you were back there.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I came in while Senator Lodge was asking his questions.

COTERMINATION OF ERP WITH THE TREATY

Mr. Lovett, I think perhaps you have been questioned about most of the phases of this treaty that I might examine into, and if you have been asked this question please do not burden the record by answering it again. But with reference to the treaty itself, and your interest in its development and its connotations, do you envision any commitment in the treaty that might bind us to a continuation of the ECA program or something of its kind in the economic field for a long continued period, or during the life of the treaty?

Mr. LOVETT. No, Senator Hickenlooper; I do not see that in any language in the treaty, or in its intent.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think that is all. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Fulbright?

INTEGRATION OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I might digress a moment with regard to some of these other resolutions. Mr. Lovett, do you feel, with the economic program we will assume satisfactorily taken care of by ECA and the security by the pact—assuming it is adopted—that any political change or any change in the political structure of Europe will contribute anything to the stability of that area?

Mr. LOVETT. Senator Fulbright, if I understand your question correctly, I think it is virtually impossible to separate the economic, political, and military influences in western Europe. Therefore, I will try to be responsive. I think anything which politically in Europe can improve the sense of unity and cohesion and determination among those people is definitely an asset both economically and militarily.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Is it your impression that our Government recommends or urges that they bring about greater political unity among those countries?

Mr. LOVETT. Senator, I can only answer in the light of the past. I have not, of course, been in touch with the Department since I got out. But it was, and I believe still is, our purpose to do what we properly can to influence the western European countries to a better-integrated unity of system, and I think, as I recall it, the steps are being taken now through an organization, I think, called the Council of Europe, or some such name, looking toward a degree of unification which would have been thought quite impossible just a few years ago.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do we have any participation in the so-called Council of Europe?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir; we do not. It is, of course, restricted to the sovereign governments of western Europe.

Senator FULBRIGHT. In a sense, we are almost part of the sovereign government of Germany; are we not?

Mr. LOVETT. Germany, so far as I know, is not presently participating in that group.

POLITICAL UNIFICATION OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. I do not recall any official expression or statement by our Government that we did look with favor upon the unification of Europe. Do you recall any such expression at any time in recent years?

Mr. LOVETT. I do not, Senator Fulbright, recall any public statement offhand. I do recall repeated conversations at the Government Foreign Office-State Department level with respect to the possibility of that, and I believe in the initial ERP discussions there were statements which favored a closer economic integration of those countries. In connection with the customs union in particular, it is my recollection that Mr. Clayton had a number of conversations with the heads of governments abroad pointing out that that economic association would necessarily have to involve, to be fully effective, a closer political tie-in.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You are familiar with the fact that the Senate recently eliminated the word "federation" which had been put in by the House, indicating that we do not approve of that idea; that we think the sovereign quality of all these states should be maintained in their present pristine purity. Isn't that the indication of that move?

Mr. LOVETT. Senator, I am just reminded by one of the officials of the Department that there was a public press release put out last summer.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I am very familiar with it, which did not include "political." It has always been the idea that it was purely economic, and Mr. Hoffman in his testimony here clearly said he had nothing to do with the politics and thought it would be a mistake if there were any political implications in the ECA. That press release likewise was limited to the economic, which has been the policy all along.

ECONOMIC AND MILITARY INTEGRATION

Mr. LOVETT. On that point, I do have a fairly accurate recollection. In the European recovery program, the present ECA, the handling of the aid program was specifically limited to economic considerations.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That's right.

Mr. LOVETT. And the Administrator, as I recall it, both by the legislative history and the act itself, was restricted to the economic field.

Senator FULBRIGHT. And this program is to be restricted to the military. There is nothing political in this pact; is there?

Mr. LOVETT. This is restricted in its language to the security of the North Atlantic area and the effort to preserve peace in that area. But, as I tried to point out earlier, the effects of this will, I believe, be economic, political, and security. ✓

Senator FULBRIGHT. I thought I understood you to say it should be; but, whether it will or not, there is nothing in the language of the act in either of the two programs mentioned which would indicate that this Government wishes to bring about political unity in Europe.

Mr. LOVETT. I believe, Senator Fulbright, that that would be undesirable in this particular case, because, while I am trying to guess what its effect would be, I think that the pact itself must stick to those things which deal with its own field.

ADVISABILITY OF ENCOURAGING THE FEDERATION OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. That being so, and since the economic and the military—and I don't quarrel with that; it might very well be the proper way—are bound; if I understand you correctly, you feel political unification of some sort will be brought about, would there be anything wrong with our Government at least giving its blessing and approving of it? I am unable to understand why we have never been willing to say, "Yes, we think it is a good thing and it would add to the effectiveness of these two programs."

Mr. LOVETT. Senator, I am afraid I cannot answer that question. I don't know. I think it is something that perhaps the Secretary of State and the Department could be of some assistance on. I do not know of any specific public recommendation.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I did not mean that. Do you see any reason why it should not be done? I think it is agreed that it has not been done. Do you see any reason why it should not be done? In other words, would it not add something to it to express officially what you say has been done unofficially right along?

Mr. LOVETT. Well, Senator, I am always troubled by words like "federation" and things of that sort. I am not sure—

Senator FULBRIGHT. You used the words "greater unity."

Mr. LOVETT. I suggested that it was in the interest of the countries immediately involved and of this country, in my personal opinion, to have as great a degree of unity as possible among the western European countries.

Senator FULBRIGHT. And you mean political unity?

Mr. LOVETT. I mean unity in all of its aspects, which are both economic, political, and military. Therefore, I believe that the Council which I mentioned earlier is a heartening step in a direction which seems to me to be appropriate, but I think the Department of State would have to give you an opinion as to whether it is in the interests of this country or the other countries to make that a matter of public pronouncement.

Senator FULBRIGHT. If that Council of States were given some political power, do you think that would be a good thing for the future security of Europe?

Mr. LOVETT. My personal opinion would be that it would.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That is what I mean, and leaving out the word "federation," you mean giving them some governmental authority to make decisions. Isn't that what we really mean, in the final step?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes. I think the moves which Mr. Churchill has made and which the Brussels Pact signatories have initiated are definitely a heartening thing.

ADVANTAGES FROM POLITICAL UNIFICATION

Senator FULBRIGHT. I agree with that. I have only been a little chagrined that our Government would take no interest in that field when it has taken such a tremendous interest in the economic field, but somehow that is a part of the picture that is taboo so far as the Government is concerned, and that to me is the real core of the problem. It would make possible the much more effective use of ECA and the resources of the pact, because in the pact the part that bothers me most about the pact is that we finally end up with only, we will say, 12 little armies, if you would like to look at it that way, or 12 defense establishments that have no real coordination under a joint chief of staff. If we are going to pursue the pact, it seems to me it should be a unified security organization only because it would otherwise not be effective. I cannot believe that it would be any more effective than what we had prior to the war, when you had each country with its own little relatively small military organization, all of which fell very easily. As a purely practical matter, that is the principal part that disturbs me: that it won't be effective. I think you are entirely correct in the emphasis upon the Council, because that is the element that gives the other elements, economic and military, its binding and permanent coordination, because these people are likely to coordinate or cooperate only so long as conditions are difficult. As soon as they get fairly easy, then they are not as cooperative.

Would you not say that had been your experience in the past?

Mr. LOVETT. It can be definitely, I think, encouraged from without, but I know of no substitute for the internal desire for it among these countries.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I takes both. They have evidenced a great deal of desire, haven't they, all along?

Mr. LOVETT. I think so. It is hard to measure it, but in my time there was evidence of it.

But, Senator Fulbright, for the benefit of the record, if it is agreeable to the committee, sir, I will ask to put in that statement issued by the State Department.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It was put in the record before, but it is all right with me to put it in at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. I think, in fairness to Mr. Lovett, it ought to be put in.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I discussed it with Secretary Acheson in the ECA discussions. The only difference about it was that to me the language does not mean political unification, but economic, which is the same as the ECA.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the statement will be inserted at this point.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT READ TO THE PRESS BY MR. McDERMOTT, DEPARTMENT OF STATE, AUGUST 27, 1948

As stated in the preamble of the Economic Cooperation Act, this Government strongly favors the progressively closer integration of the free nations of western Europe. We believe that the world of today requires the taking of steps which before the war would have seemed beyond the range of practical politics. We favor the taking by the Europeans themselves of any steps which promote the idea of European unity or which promote the study of practical measures and the taking of such measures.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Lovett, along the lines you were interrogated by the Senator from Arkansas, this treaty deals only with defensive arrangements?

Mr. LOVETT. It is a defensive arrangement, Mr. Chairman, aimed at the preservation of peace in the North Atlantic community. It deals only with that.

DANGER OF ENCOURAGING THE FEDERATION OF EUROPE

The CHAIRMAN. To link in with that any suggestion of political action, would that not leave us open to the charges of the Soviet and others that the whole plan is based on the imperialistic attitude of the United States, bringing within the scope of its power the nations of Europe?

Mr. LOVETT. I think that it might very well do that, but I believe that one of the controlling factors, of course, is that in such a pact, with such tremendous impact on the world as a whole, it is necessary to confine the agreement down to the point where there can be no misunderstanding as to what each person understands it to mean. The moment you get into the political aspects of these various countries you are treading on the doubtful ground of the sovereignty and the parliamentary systems which differ between these countries. So that, in my opinion, it would be wise to deal with the pact as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, this so-called Council of Europe is working along the lines for greater unity.

Mr. LOVETT. At the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be wise to leave that, which is a European organization, to advance these things, rather than for us to undertake to dictate or suggest what course they shall pursue?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I understood from Senator Fulbright that only the question as to whether or not we, so to speak, gave it our blessing, and attached importance to their activities, was involved, and my answer to that was that while I didn't recall accurately whether there had been a public statement representing the views of this Government, but speaking purely as an individual, I thought that it was a desirable thing for those countries directly involved to get together in such degree of unity as they found possible.

ENCOURAGING FEDERATION OF EUROPE OUTSIDE THE TREATY

Senator FULBRIGHT. Before you leave that I want to clarify one point. I did not say that it ought to go in this pact. I only was developing the point that not in any pact or in any way had we done it, but your answer that it would be imperialistic, and we would be subject to the charge, I cannot follow that. It seems to me the least imperialistic attitude for this country would be to encourage a strong Europe. The policy of Russia in eastern Europe is to prevent any unification. When those countries proposed that they have a Balkan League, Mr. Tito was one of the proponents of that view, and they immediately said they should not do anything. They would not permit it. Now, if one is strictly accurate here, the imperialistic approach for this country would be to discourage unity in western Europe, because then we would be able to dominate them one at a time. If we contribute to building a strong western Europe, a politically integrated Europe, that would be the opposite of imperialism, is my view, because we would be constructing a possible competitor, for example, in the economic field and in the military field, because they have possibilities of being very strong. I do not understand at all, or I can't believe, that you believe it is imperialistic to promote a political unification of those countries.

But you agreed with the chairman when he said that, that that would subject us to an accusation of imperialism if we encourage the political unification of Europe, which seems to me exactly the opposite.

Mr. LOVETT. I think the chairman's inquiry of me related to whether or not the inclusion of some political advice in this North Atlantic Pact would or could be construed by the Soviet as a part of their propaganda line.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I did not mean in this pact. I mean as a governmental policy at any time or in any way that is understandable by the people. You do not think that would be imperialistic, do you?

Mr. LOVETT. I think the Government has already, if my faint recollection is correct, indicated that we feel it is desirable and in the best interests of the countries directly involved in western Europe, as well as in the over-all search for peace and security, that there should be as high an order of unity as is possible for them to accept at this time. Therefore I believe this country has looked with favor on the efforts being made over there among the Brussels Pact signatories to improve their political associations.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. The Council of Europe, of course, is purely an idea. It has not had a meeting yet. We do not know what will come out of that. It would be a good vehicle, I think, with proper encouragement, that it be given political power, but they have had one or two meetings preparatory to establishing the Council. It has not really functioned, and if I interpret the reports correctly they had not agreed to give it any real power to make a decision on anything. It is another consultative assembly, so to speak, or organization, and I think that would be the proper place that we cooperate, we will say, or help them evolve some kind of organization that has political power.

Mr. LOVETT. Senator, I am not informed on the Council of Europe and its activities at present. My information, of course, comes only from the press. But going back to your initial question as to a public statement which might give support to some move toward unity on the part of the European countries, there is in the March 17, 1948, address by the President to the Congress this expression:

Its significance—

referring to the Brussels Pact—goes far beyond the actual terms of the agreement itself. It is a notable step in the direction of unity in Europe for the protection and preservation of its civilization. This development deserves our full support.

THE TREATY—NOT A COMPLETE ANSWER TO OUR DIFFICULTIES

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Lovett, since the end of hostilities we as a nation have supported UNRRA, the United Nations, Bretton Woods, the British loan, the ECA, and now a proposed military pact. I have supported as a Member of the Senate every one of these proposals and every one of these policies. I think it is important that the American people not get the idea that this pact, if it is entered into, is the answer to all of our difficulties. I think perhaps one of the human mistakes that was made along the line was to regard each one of these proposals as the complete answer to all of our difficulties. I take it that you do not believe that even though we are successful in working out the ECA program and even if it meets our fondest expectations, and even if this pact is ratified and put into full validity that we will have then reached the apogee of perfection in the situation between the Soviet Government and ourselves.

Mr. LOVETT. Senator McMahon, I am fairly confident that this is not the end of our activities as we try to find a solution for a peaceful existence. It is a most important one, I am sure, but I agree with you, sir, that we cannot say that this, if enacted, thereupon makes it unnecessary to do anything else. To the contrary, I feel that this is one, and perhaps one of the most important, steps that this country could take or has taken. But it will inevitably, in view of the dynamic quality of relationships between countries, require us to meet whatever circumstances come up a month, a year, or 10 years from now.

DANGER OF AN ARMAMENT RACE

Senator McMAHON. Perhaps my knowledge of history is deficient, and perhaps you will correct it, but I seem to have no recollection of any occasion in all history where an armament race ever resulted in anything except conflict. As I recall history, wherever you have had two nations of approximately equal size where you have engaged in an armaments race there has inevitably followed conflict. That is why I have personally been of the opinion that we must, in some fashion or other, end this arms race, in order to assure ourselves of permanent peace. I also appreciate that one of the ways of ending it is to have the proper kind of strength when you go into a discussion of disarmament.

I merely emphasize that fact for this record because for my part I want the people to know that I do not regard this pact as any 100-percent guaranty of peace, and I do not think it ought to be sold to the American people on that basis.

The CHAIRMAN. If it will be a 50 percent guarantee it will be something.

Senator McMAHON. Don't misunderstand. I think I have made it clear that it is a necessary step, but we will get much more support for future moves in our foreign policy if we do not add an extravagant sales price or an extravagant value to this particular step.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Lovett, we have today with us, through the courtesy of the committee, Senator Donnell and Senator Watkins of Utah, and it is our intention to permit them to interrogate you if that is agreeable with you.

Mr. LOVETT. Certainly, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

ENHANCEMENT OF OUR SECURITY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Lovett, in your statement I observe, on page 8, that you have expressed a belief that the signature of the treaty has in itself enhanced the chances of successfully achieving the goals mentioned in your statement of our foreign policy. Is that correct?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, Senator. You refer to the paragraph starting, "Nothing that has occurred since I left office. * * *?"

Senator DONNELL. Yes, as read in conjunction with the immediately preceding paragraph, where you defined what is at least one of the great goals of our foreign policy.

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, that is correct, Senator Donnell.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Lovett, I assume from this belief on your part, namely that the very signature of the treaty has enhanced the chances of successfully achieving these goals, that there isn't any very great doubt in the minds of the European nations, so far as you have observed, that the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate is favorable to this treaty.

Mr. LOVETT. I am unable to answer that, Senator Donnell. I do not know what the attitude of the foreign governments is. I would have no means of knowing. I would assume that they would be hopeful that this country would approve the treaty.

SENATE RESOLUTION 239

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Lovett, you referred in quite considerable detail, and I am very glad you did because it was a matter that we had interrogated Secretary Acheson about also, to the history of Senate Resolution 239. You recall reading the Congressional Record of June 11, 1948, which was the date on which the debate on and the action on that resolution occurred in the Senate, do you not?

Mr. LOVETT. I did not read the Congressional Record, sir, but I do remember its adoption.

Senator DONNELL. Did you know at the time that Senator Vandenberg, who presented the resolution, made numerous statements as to what in his opinion the resolution did and what it did not do, and the fact that the Senate was to be completely free later on to decide whether it would go further on?

Mr. LOVETT. I read the accounts of it in the papers.

CONSTITUTIONAL PREROGATIVES OF THE SENATE IN THE RATIFICATION OF TREATIES

Senator DONNELL. In connection with this treaty, I observe here on the wall a large map, showing in very heavy black, states signatory of the North Atlantic Treaty, April 4, 1949. That signature to the treaty, I take it, you would agree imposes no duty whatsoever upon the Senate if in its judgment it deems proper not to ratify the treaty, does it?

Mr. LOVETT. You mean the signature to the pact itself. Why no, Senator DONNELL. It is clearly understood that this treaty cannot be binding on this country until the Senate acts.

Senator DONNELL. So it is entirely possible, is it not, Mr. Lovett, that it is a little bit premature for the great confidence that you speak of, the new sense of confidence, to have arisen in Europe until the Senate has determined, after hearing the testimony and hearing the arguments, whether it will or will not approve the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. LOVETT. Senator DONNELL, I don't think you can keep people from having hope, and I think the people of Europe have hope, based on our past performances in ECA and in the general effort to find peace, that the Congress, represented by the Senate in this case, will find it wise and appropriate for this country to sign the pact.

Senator DONNELL. At any rate, I take it as you have indicated so fairly and correctly, that the Senate is no more obligated today to approve this treaty than it was before the signature of the pact. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. I am not able to answer that, Senator DONNELL.

Senator DONNELL. You know as a matter of law that the Senate has the right either to approve or not to approve this treaty?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. And it has precisely the same right today that it had prior to the signature of the treaty?

Mr. LOVETT. I do not think the right is in question.

Senator DONNELL. I say it has precisely the same right it had before the signature to the treaty.

Mr. LOVETT. Certainly. The right has not changed.

GENESIS OF SENATE RESOLUTION 239

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Lovett, you have told us of the progress made on Senate Resolution 239. Would you tell us, please, who it was, if you know, who first conceived the idea that a resolution to that general effect would be desirable? Was it the State Department or was it the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. LOVETT. I haven't any idea, Senator DONNELL. I just don't know. My recollection is that the suggestion derived from the committee activities. Certainly, so far as I know, there was no such communication from the Department of such an idea.

Senator DONNELL. You have no recollection, however, as to who it was, whether someone on this committee or someone in the State Department, who first conceived the idea of a resolution to that general effect?

Mr. LOVETT. No, I haven't, Senator Donnell; but my guess would be that it came out of the committee's activities with respect to the United Nations bills.

Senator VANDENBERG. Will the Senator yield? I think I can clear that up for him.

Senator DONNELL. I would like it if the Senator would.

Senator VANDENBERG. I have no doubt that the original impetus came from the committee in its efforts to see, as to all of these various resolutions which had been presented by many different Senators dealing with many phases of these related problems, whether it was possible to lay down a general philosophy which would cover them all.

Senator DONNELL. Might I ask the Senator, if he will permit me, whether or not this thought which he says he has no doubt originated, as I understand it, in the committee, was by someone on the committee communicated to the State Department? Was that the initiation of the State Department's connection with the matter?

Senator VANDENBERG. I suppose so, in connection with the continuous conversations we were having with the Department regarding this flood of resolutions with which we were confronted.

Senator DONNELL. I do not want to ask the Senator more questions unless he is perfectly willing to answer them. I appreciate he is not the witness this morning.

What I wanted to ask him is, If he recalls with certainty whether or not it was a member of the committee who first communicated the thought of such a resolution to the State Department, or whether it was someone with the State Department who communicated that thought to the Foreign Relations Committee?

Senator VANDENBERG. I just do not think you can categorically identify the initial impulse, because we were dealing jointly with the problem of trying to find out what we ought to do with this flood of resolutions which was before us from various Members of the Senate.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you, Senator.

REASONS FOR THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Now, Mr. Lovett, am I correct in the understanding of the early portion of your statement that the birth of the concept, to quote the language in your statement, of this treaty arose from conduct by the Soviet Government? Is that correct?

Mr. LOVETT. That is not entirely correct, sir, because it presumes that the conduct of the Soviet Government was the proximate cause of this entire enterprise, whereas it was one of a number of factors included among which were, of course, this problem of the United Nations veto, the obstructionism which they had shown, and their openly declared antagonism to the recovery of western Europe.

Senator DONNELL. Yes. And as you have indicated in your statement, and I read from it:

The policies and practices pursued by the Soviet Government and the Communist Parties subservient to it since the end of hostilities had created a sense of insecurity in the free countries of western Europe who had joined together to promote with American assistance the reconstruction and recovery of their community.

That is correct, is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. And I ask you if you continued in the next paragraph:

This general sense of insecurity had been intensified by the savage reaction of the Soviet Government to the program of cooperative undertaking between the United States and the nations of western Europe then known as the Marshall plan—and so forth? That is correct, is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. So the activities of the Russians, and particularly with respect to the veto power in the Security Council of the United Nations, had at least a very large part in the birth of the concept mentioned in your statement, namely the concept of this treaty?

Mr. LOVETT. It was certainly one of the factors, but included, of course, were the failure of the Council of Foreign Ministers meeting in London in December 1947 and our long experience of obstructionism toward the efforts of the United Nations to perform the functions with which it was charged.

SIGNING OF BRUSSELS PACT

Senator DONNELL. On the 17th of March 1948 you have told us that there occurred the signature of the Brussels Pact. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Was that pact, as you recall it, a defensive pact, solely?

Mr. LOVETT. As I recall it, it was a defensive pact which had certain aspects of association both economically and politically.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S SPEECH OF MARCH 17, 1948

Senator DONNELL. And you quoted in part this morning from President Truman's speech to the joint session of the Congress on March 17. At that point, if you do not mind, and for the purpose of a little further questioning, I should like to have the record show these three sentences from his speech:

This development—

the President was referring to the Brussels Treaty—deserves our full support.

I pause, Mr. Lovett, to ask whether or not the speech by the President was delivered on the identical day on which the treaty was signed.

Mr. LOVETT. It was, sir.

Senator DONNELL. So that the President knew of the fact that the treaty was to be signed, and his address was prepared in advance of the expectation that it would be signed. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. I do not know when it was prepared, Senator Donnell, but of course he knew that it would be signed on a given date, as it had been carried by the press.

Senator DONNELL. And his language in his speech continues, after the sentence which I read, namely—

This development deserves our full support—with this:

I am confident that the United States will, by appropriate means, extend to the free nations the support which the situation requires. I am sure that the determination of the free countries of Europe to protect themselves will be matched by an equal determination on our part to help them to do so.

You recall substantially that language in his address?

Mr. LOVETT. Oh, yes; I recall that very well.

Senator DONNELL. That address was delivered on March 17, 'was it not, 1948?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir, it was.

Senator DONNELL. And the action by which the Senate approved Senate Resolution 239 was not until nearly 2 months later?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

SUBSEQUENT ADOPTION OF SENATE RESOLUTION 239

Senator DONNELL. So that notwithstanding this advice from the Senate, which was embraced in Senate Resolution 239, and I use the term "advice" because of the fact that the President, in his letter of March 17, 1949, to Senator Watkins, uses that term and puts it in quotation marks, the advice given by Senate Resolution 239 was not given until almost 2 months after the President had himself expressed certainty that the determination of the free countries of Europe to protect themselves would be matched by an equal determination on our part to help them to do so. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. The times are correct.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Lovett, you referred to the frequent use of the expression Senate Resolution 239 "constitutional processes," and I have observed that fact, too, and the fact that assurance is given more than once in that document of the fact that the constitutional processes were to be preserved. I am correct in that; am I not?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir.

CONGRESSIONAL POWER TO DECLARE WAR

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Lovett, in whom, under the Constitution of the United States, is the power to declare war vested?

Mr. LOVETT. The Congress.

Senator DONNELL. And the Congress consists of two Houses, and not only the Senate? Of course we realize, by the term "Congress" in that expression is meant the two Houses; is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you this hypothetical question which was suggested to one or two of the witnesses previously: Suppose, for instance, that Norway, 6 weeks after the ratification of this treaty, if it be ratified, should be attacked some day by 500,000 Russians. May I ask you, please, Mr. Lovett, whether or not it would be necessary as you construe the law, for Congress to be consulted before the President of the United States, acting under the North Atlantic Treaty, could send troops and take efforts to repulse Russia along that front?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes; I think that is clear.

Senator DONNELL. You think what is clear?

Mr. LOVETT. That the President would, before declaring war, have to leave the matter to the Congress.

Senator DONNELL. Before declaring war he would have to leave the matter to the Congress?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Do you think he would have no power to send troops?

Mr. LOVETT. I think it would depend on the circumstances as to whether our own troops were involved.

Senator DONNELL. Suppose, for instance, that none of our own troops was involved whatsoever in Norway at that time, but that Norway should be attacked by 500,000 Russians. Do you not think that the agreement on the North Atlantic Pact by which it is expressly stated in Article 5—

The Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all—would give the President the same power with respect to that attack on Norway that he would have if an attack were made on the United States of America along its own coast line?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir; I do not. I think the power of the President is clearly fixed by the Constitution and I see nothing in this treaty which in any way runs counter to it.

Senator DONNELL. And what is that power of the President which you see so clearly placed and fixed by the Constitution?

Mr. LOVETT. The power of the President, and the limitations on that power, would require a declaration of war to be made by the Congress.

Senator DONNELL. So that if Congress were not in session at the time it would have to wait until the declaration of war, and any action by the President—am I correct in that?—toward sending troops would have to wait until the Congress convened? Is that correct?

Mr. LOVETT. Senator, I am sure the members of this committee here are more familiar with the procedures followed by Congress while they are not in session. I suppose a special session would be called, an emergency session. I believe that has occurred in the past, and I would assume that that would be the procedure followed in the future.

Senator DONNELL. Do you think, Mr. Lovett, that if New York City were attacked when Congress was not in session that the President would or would not have power to send troops and take all necessary military action to protect our shores and our country before Congress came back?

PRESIDENT'S RESPONSIBILITY AS COMMANDER IN CHIEF

Mr. LOVETT. I don't know the legalistic answer to that, Senator Donnell. I am not a lawyer. But I think the realistic answer to it would be an immediate response, since it is clear that our own troops in the area, Navy yards, and so forth, would be at once attacked, and I should think that his powers as Commander in Chief, and his responsibility for the protection and well-being of those troops, would give him some special latitude, but I want to emphasize, sir, that I am not a lawyer and not competent to pass on that type of question.

Senator DONNELL. Suppose, Mr. Lovett, that instead of the attack occurring on the American shores at New York, where there is a navy yard near at hand, that the attack should occur upon some other portion of the American shore, at any point where there are no troops whatsoever. Suppose that any act, atom bombs, or immediate landing of troops, or whatever illustration you might think of, of the actual physical attack on our country, were to occur at a point where there were no American troops. Do you think the President would be powerless to act under those circumstances until after Congress had come back together?

Mr. LOVETT. I say again, Senator Donnell, I do not know the legal responsibility of the President as Commander in Chief in those circumstances which you put in this hypothetical case, but I would assume that the President, as Commander in Chief, would react immediately.

Senator DONNELL. In other words, the presence of troops of the United States at that particular point where the attack occurred would not be the decisive element in determining whether he had power to act to save our country or not?

Mr. LOVETT. I do not know what the legal answer to that is, but I think from a practical point of view, if any portion of this country were attacked the President, as Commander in Chief, might have some special authority with which I am not fully familiar.

Senator DONNELL. I thought you said a moment ago, when I asked you one of my earlier questions, that the power of the President is clearly set forth in the Constitution, and its limitations also.

Mr. LOVETT. I was speaking specifically of the limitations and specifically in answer to your question as to the declaration of war.

Senator DONNELL. What are the limitations that you refer to that are clearly set forth in the Constitution with respect to the President of the United States?

Mr. LOVETT. That the Congress of the United States has the authority, and is the sole body that has the authority, to declare war.

ARTICLE 5 AND THE CONSTITUTIONAL POWER OF THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS

Senator DONNELL. Then if the President in your opinion would not have power to send troops over to Norway, or to take immediate action before Congress came together, much of this talk about the great advantage of this treaty from the standpoint of the promises, so that we could act instantly, as Mr. Vandenberg has indicated, and as article 5 refers to by the word "forthwith," and much of the force of that argument, is lost immediately if the President does not have power to act instantaneously, is that not correct?

Mr. LOVETT. No, Senator Donnell; I do not think that is correct. With great respect, sir, I think that the reaction of this country to an obvious act of aggression such as you gave in your suppositional case would require great promptness in action.

Senator DONNELL. It might require much greater promptness than the assembling of Congress from the four corners of the United States might permit? In other words, it would require action prior to the return of Congress?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir: I don't think that I would go that far.

Senator DONNELL. You would think the President would have to wait until Congress got back before he could send any troops or take action toward repelling Russia under the circumstances I have cited in Norway?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir. I think he would have to leave it to the Congress to declare war, but certainly the Military Establishment could be pulling itself together and getting material and personnel collected in the event that the Congress did declare war. That would be a tremendous saving in time.

Senator DONNELL. But the President, you do not think, could send troops over to Norway, or send bombers, or take any overt action with respect to repelling Russia, until Congress had declared war?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir. Again, let me caution you; I am not a lawyer. My answers are simply based on the reasonable understanding of the authority of Congress with respect to the declaration of war.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROCEDURE UNDER ARTICLE 5

Senator DONNELL. Now, referring again to article 5 of the proposed treaty—

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all; * * *

I understood you to say a few minutes ago that if an attack should occur on the shores of America at a point where no troops are present whatsoever, the President, in your judgment, would immediately, as you put it, react, which I understand you to mean that he would not only be startled, but that he would take action. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LOVETT. I said that my best judgment would be that the President, as Commander in Chief, would have certain express powers there in his capacity as Commander in Chief.

Senator DONNELL. Then the agreement that—the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all—is to be read, is it not, in connection with the fact that the President would, as you have indicated, have some powers in the event an attack were made against our own country?

Mr. LOVETT. I am not sure I understand your question.

Senator DONNELL. Perhaps I had better state this. Let me ask you another question or two along this line. You ceased to be Under Secretary on January 20, did you not, of this year?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Up to that point had there been incorporated in the draft of the treaty any language to the effect that—the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all?

Mr. LOVETT. That was in some of the drafts.

Senator DONNELL. You understood the legal meaning of the language, or else you would not have concurred in its incorporation in the draft?

Mr. LOVETT. We not only understood it but we spent long hours explaining that any treaty which might subsequently be developed as a result of these exploratory talks would not be binding until such time as it had been through the constitutional processes of this country, and at no point was there any question but what the Constitution fixes the respective powers of the President and of the Congress, and the treaty in no way changes, so far as I know, the respective powers of the President or the Congress.

Senator DONNELL. Do you say, Mr. Lovett, that at the time you ceased to be Under Secretary, then, that it was understood in the State Department that this provision that I have read to you from article 5 did not impose any obligation on this country to forthwith go to war or to send troops or to take any action, even though the statement in this article is that every one of these signatories agrees that an armed attack against any one of them is to be deemed an armed attack against itself?

Mr. LOVETT. Senator Donnell, I think it is perfectly clear that in the discussions the manner of the armed attack was probably the item on which more time was spent than any other. It was always understood, and there has never been the slightest doubt, that the reaction of any participant, not just the United States, must take place under its constitutional procedures, whatever that might be. And so far as I know, there has never been any question.

COMPARISON OF RIO TREATY WITH NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Lovett, Senator Vandenberg referred in his interrogation to the Rio Pact. Are you familiar with the Rio Pact of 1947?

Mr. LOVETT. I was familiar with it; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You recall that in article 3 of the Rio Pact there is this provision, do you not?

The High Contracting Parties agree that an armed attack by any State against an American State shall be considered as an attack against all the American States and, consequently, each one of the said Contracting Parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you think that this proposed treaty is based, as I have rather understood Senator Vandenberg to indicate, at least in part on the Rio Pact, this pact that I have just read from?

Mr. LOVETT. This pact is based in part on the Rio Pact. It differs from the Rio Pact in several particulars.

Senator DONNELL. And may I call your attention to the fact, and ask if I am correct in this statement, that among the things in which it differs from the Rio Pact is that the Rio Pact contains article 20, which reads as follows:

Decisions which require the application of measures specified in Article 8 shall be binding upon all the Signatory States which have ratified this Treaty, with the sole exception that no State shall be required to use armed force without its consent.

Do you recall that that provision is in the Rio Pact?

Mr. LOVETT. I recall such a provision.

Senator DONNELL. And there is no such provision in the Atlantic Treaty? That is correct?

Mr. LOVETT. There is no similar provision.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Lovett, you say that the negotiations for the North Atlantic Pact were based on Senate Resolution 239, and that that was the guidepost of your negotiations; is that correct?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you this question. In the negotiations was there any consideration given to the fact that among the elements that would make this treaty succeed would be the fact that there should be such an overwhelming force developed by the parties to the treaty as would act as a deterrent against any foreign nation attacking any of these participants? Do you remember that?

Mr. LOVETT. It was clearly in contemplation that the unified purpose of the participants in this group would enable us to show a degree of determination which we hoped would stop an aggressor before war began, and not compel us to become involved at some later date after war was under way.

Senator DONNELL. And that thought was expressed, was it not, by the President of the United States in his inaugural address of January 20, 1949, in which, among other things, he said this:

If we can make it sufficiently clear in advance that any armed attack affecting our national security would be met with overwhelming force, the armed attack might never occur. I hope soon to send to the Senate a treaty respecting the North Atlantic Security Pact. In addition, we will provide military advice and equipment to free nations which will cooperate with us in the maintenance of peace and security.

Do you recall that part of his address?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir; I do.

DISCUSSION OF NECESSITY OF SENDING UNITED STATES MANPOWER TO EUROPE

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Lovett, it is, therefore, of very great importance, is it not, if the theory of the President is to be followed, that we shall have collected together here overwhelming force, to adopt his language, to be furnished by this country to the countries signatory over to Europe adequate supplies which, when added to their own supplies, shall provide that overwhelming force. That is right, is it not?

Mr. LOVETT. I am not able to give you the complete definition of the degree of force that the language "overwhelming" contemplates, but I have no doubt in my own mind that if this country ever undertakes to fight a war and attempt to restore the peace and security of the North Atlantic area that we will bring overwhelming force to bear.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know whether or not it was considered by the negotiators, and particularly the United States, as to whether, in order to stop Russia in her tracks if she should come across the borders of the other European countries, it would be necessary or advisable that there be United States troops on hand in addition to the troops of the European countries?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir. I have no such recollection.

Senator DONNELL. You have no such recollection?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You do not know whether that was ever discussed?

Mr. LOVETT. I have an accurate recollection of the negotiations in which I participated, but I do not recall that question being raised by anyone. No suggestion was made to us that we should have United States troops spotted around Europe.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Lovett, you spoke of not being a lawyer. Did your Department have counsel on the preparation of this treaty from Mr. Bohlen and others?

Mr. LOVETT. It had counsel from both the geographical desk officers and from the legal adviser's office and from the counsel, but Mr. Bohlen also is not a lawyer, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Bohlen is not a lawyer, sir?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. He is described in the booklet that I have here, which is a series of addresses made over the Columbia Network, as "counselor of the Department of State."

Mr. LOVETT. He is the counselor of the Department of State, but that is not in itself necessarily legal.

Senator DONNELL. What is Mr. Bohlen's profession or business?

Mr. LOVETT. He is a Foreign Service officer.

Senator DONNELL. And if you do not mind telling us, what is your profession or business, Mr. Lovett?

Mr. LOVETT. I am a private banker, sir.

Senator DONNELL. In New York City?

Mr. LOVETT. In New York City.

Senator DONNELL. What is the organization with which you are connected?

Mr. LOVETT. I am a general partner of Brown Brothers & Harriman, a private commercial bank.

Senator DONNELL. I was wondering whether or not the Harriman that is mentioned is in any way related to Mr. Harriman—

Mr. LOVETT. There are two. W. A. Harriman was formerly a general partner, and is now a limited partner, having resigned from general partnership; and his brother, E. Roland Harriman, is at the present time a general partner.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. W. A. Harriman is Mr. W. Averell Harriman, who is the Ambassador who testified here a few days ago?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

INABILITY OF THE UNITED NATIONS TO FUNCTION

Senator DONNELL. I would like to just briefly—and I shall not trespass much longer on your time, Mr. Lovett, or that of the committee, read these three sentences from Mr. Bohlen's address over the Columbia network on March 23 of this year. He says:

I shall not recite the dreary record of Soviet frustration and obstruction in the United States, the abuse of the veto, the defiance of resolutions of the General Assembly. I mention them merely to show that the fault lies not with the United Nations, nor in the mechanism set up under the Charter, but in the policies and attitude which the government of one of the great powers has pursued in relation to the organization. As a result, the United Nations has not been permitted to establish throughout the world the condition of security for which it was designed.

Do you concur in the observations so made by Mr. Bohlen?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes; I do.

Senator DONNELL. I think that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt here to say that while Mr. Lovett is not himself a lawyer, and has not practiced, I suppose, I want to say that his father was one of the most distinguished lawyers in the United States. He attained distinction first down in Texas, where he resided.

He then moved to New York and was the attorney for the elder Mr. Harriman, and was also the general counsel and chairman of the board, as I recall it now, of the Union Pacific Railroad. Is that correct?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. He was one of the most remarkable men that our State has ever produced, and was distinguished not alone in his own State but throughout the United States, and was a member at one time of the largest law firm in Texas, at Houston.

Thank you, Senator, for permission to interrupt.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Chairman and Mr. Lovett, I say at the outset I regret that I couldn't be here when you gave your main statement. I was required on another committee in order to make a quorum, and they would not let me leave. I did want to hear your principal statement. I have tried to glance at it and get some information out of the examination which would indicate just what you said in your main statement. I may possibly cover some of the same ground you have covered before, but it is not with any intention to be repetitious, but to clear up some matters that bother me, and I would like some light on them.

GENESIS OF NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

Going back to the negotiations for the North Atlantic Pact, how long were you connected with those negotiations, Mr. Lovett?

Mr. LOVETT. They started in July of 1948, sir, and continued through September, were adjourned in September and picked up again in December of 1948, and I was connected with them actively from July to September and again from December until the termination of my office in January.

Senator WATKINS. How long did you serve in the State Department?

Mr. LOVETT. I served from the 1st of July 1947 until January 20, 1949.

Senator WATKINS. That was your first service with the State Department?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, sir. I had previously been about 5 years Assistant Secretary of War for Air, in the War Department.

Senator WATKINS. I have been trying to find out just who would be able to give us the information on the genesis of this North Atlantic Pact, and the reason I say that is because it has been suggested to me by a very expert newspaperman that he observed at the time of Bretton Woods that this pact had its genesis, that it was already then in contemplation by some of our planners in the State Department, and I would like to find out if I can from somebody in the State Department if that is true.

Mr. LOVETT. I cannot, of course, answer for what might have been in the mind of someone long before my period of service in the State Department, but I can give you positive assurance as to how this particular pact arose, and that was covered at some length earlier this morning in the testimony, Senator Watkins. You will find it in full there.

Senator WATKINS. If you will note, what I said was that this newspaperman indicated that he saw it. He was covering that particular conference, and he said he saw its beginnings then. Of course that would be—

Mr. LOVETT. I would doubt that very much, sir, as the genesis arose through a series of circumstances in the United Nations, and circumstances associated with the United Nations Organization, and that was only evident in 1947 and 1948, whereas the Bretton Woods business was many years before that.

INCLUSION OF ARTICLE 51 IN THE CHARTER

Senator WATKINS. Then I read also, and it also whetted my curiosity to this point, a statement attributed to Mr. John Foster Dulles, who stated, or at least my recollection of the press story sometime back was, that he and the Senator from Michigan provided, or helped draft, to get into the United Nations Charter, article 51, a provision for regional arrangements of this kind, so that in the event we had difficulty with the United Nations procedure or the Security Council we would always be provided with something of this type to take its place.

Mr. LOVETT. Senator Watkins, I read some of the transcript last night, and I think you will find that Senator Austin dealt with that at some length. Certainly there are on the Foreign Relations Committee at least two Senators who were actively associated in the meetings in San Francisco.

Senator WATKINS. Maybe sometime they will be testifying and we can ask them about it and find out just how this thing did get into the United Nations Charter, and just where it began.

Senator VANDENBERG. I am sure the Senator doesn't mean, when he says "how it got in," and does not infer, any sinister implication or something terrifically criminal about it.

Senator WATKINS. I do not. It may have been a very wise thing, the way the United Nations thing was set up, that we should have some safety escalator, and, as somebody said the other day, provide a backstop in the event the United Nations did not function.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no porch climbing in this matter. The San Francisco Conference understood it perfectly when they adopted it, and the Senate understood it perfectly when they adopted the Charter.

Senator WATKINS. I am glad to know that, because I have some serious questions as to why they did what they did at that time, and I thought probably we would have a way out even for them. If they did not have full information they probably would not have adopted it as it was adopted.

Senator VANDENBERG. If the Senator will yield, just on the point, this is no time to argue it and I do not want to interrupt the examination, but for the Senator's basic information I would like to make this fundamental statement, that in my opinion the South American countries would never have signed the United Nations Charter without article 51, and its original inspiration was from the pan-American countries.

Senator WATKINS. What inspired chapter VIII, which follows?

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt right there to supplement what Senator Vandenberg said? The Dumbarton Oaks preliminary draft of the United Nations contained a clause on regional arrangements which was developed and perfected by article 51 at San Francisco.

Senator VANDENBERG. There was nothing in Dumbarton Oaks comparable to article 51.

Senator WATKINS. I am talking about Bretton Woods.

The CHAIRMAN. I said Dumbarton Oaks. I said, in Dumbarton Oaks there was a section (c), "Regional Arrangements," but it did not go to the extent of article 51, and when the San Francisco meeting took up the Dumbarton Oaks arrangement then it was developed and perfected by article 51, so that it did not originate over at Bretton Woods. It originated elsewhere.

Senator WATKINS. I merely asked the question. Some newspaperman said it was apparent.

I want to take up some of the provisions of the treaty that you helped negotiate, to see what your understanding is of the meaning of those particular provisions. You have already testified some about article 5, and I want to ask you some more questions about that, and also article 3. I am referring now to the North Atlantic Pact.

INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 2

Article 2, so we will have it in the record at this moment, and I will direct discussion to it, I read:

The Parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

I refer first to the language:

by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being.

Do you know just what conditions they had in mind, chiefly, that they might undertake to promote?

Mr. LOVETT. The conditions of stability and well-being, of course, relate to the stability of the country both economically and politically, and the permanence of the establishments which related to the individual freedom and other implements of justice that are covered in the language prior to it.

Senator WATKINS. Do you think they had any specific project of any kind in mind in providing that language?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir.

ELIMINATION OF CONFLICT IN ECONOMIC POLICIES

Senator WATKINS. Then let us come to the last sentence:

They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

What specific thing did they have in mind there? Was that discussed in any way?

Mr. LOVETT. That whole sentence there, as I recall it, Senator Watkins, arose out of the efforts to make it abundantly clear that these countries who participated in the treaty would do their utmost, through the principle of cooperation economically, to improve themselves, so that they would be in a position for self-help and mutual aid. In other words, our economic program abroad as represented by the ECA was here again referred to, and they certified there was a continuing purpose of cooperation amongst them.

Senator WATKINS. I understand the affirmative side of it, but they specifically mention that they will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies. They must have had a recognition of some conflicts which they were going to seek to eliminate.

Mr. LOVETT. There were at that time, and there have been throughout, a number of instances of difficulties arising between the countries as a result either of their customs union activities or of their financial policies. You remember specifically when France readjusted her currency the British felt very definitely it might have an unsettling effect on other currencies.

Senator WATKINS. They were to eliminate these conflicts over their currencies?

Mr. LOVETT. No; any element of their economic life. They were to try through peaceful means, which are mentioned notably in the United Nations Charter, to dispose of those difficulties.

Senator WATKINS. You will note that this not only applies to the European nations, but also applies to the United States.

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator WATKINS. In other words, we are bound to seek to eliminate conflicts in economic policies. Do you have any in mind, or did they have any in mind at that time, that affected the United States?

Mr. LOVETT. No; we had no specific items in mind. It was a statement of general principles, not a statement of a specific purpose at the moment.

ARTICLE 2—A STATEMENT OF GENERAL PRINCIPLES ONLY

Senator WATKINS. The thing that bothers me about a reference of this kind in a contract, if it does not have any meaning at all, that is, any specific meaning, is, why it was put in there. Usually in a contract you try to cover, and I am sure in your business experience you have had a great deal to do with contracts, the elements or any conflicts on which there may have been disagreement, and put it in express language so that the relationships will be better and that there will be unity of action on that particular matter.

Mr. LOVETT. This particular section deals, of course, with the explanation of the purposes, the goals, among others, that they are aiming at.

Senator WATKINS. This is outside of the preamble, as I get it.

UNITED STATES TRADE POLICIES AND ARTICLE 2

Mr. LOVETT. It is outside of the preamble, but it does not relate, of course, to any one particular conflict or any one item, but outlines a course of action.

Senator WATKINS. Does it bind us in any way to a continuation of the principle of reciprocal trade treaties?

Mr. LOVETT. I do not see that it binds us to anything other than what it says.

Senator WATKINS. Was it discussed at that time that it would bind us to continue that policy?

Mr. LOVETT. No. It was not discussed.

Senator WATKINS. There was no discussion of tariffs as being some of the conflicts that might need to be eliminated?

Mr. LOVETT. None whatsoever.

Senator WATKINS. Even between the European nations?

Mr. LOVETT. Not during my time. There was no specification at all.

Senator WATKINS. I would ask specifically if there was any discussion on this particular paragraph among the negotiators as to any tariffs or customs between the various European signatories or proposed signatories to the treaty.

Mr. LOVETT. No. It was only an expression of a course of action, Senator Watkins.

Senator WATKINS. I understand that, but what I am trying to get at is, what did they have in mind, specifically, if there were any specific ideas, when they drafted and put this into this agreement?

Mr. LOVETT. They had in mind, as I tried to indicate earlier, the definite purpose to eliminate, insofar as possible, anything which would retard the unified growth of the economy of this group. And it was an expression, if you choose, of a general philosophy. It was felt that it would be extremely desirable as an indication of the good intentions of the participants in this pact.

Senator WATKINS. I understand that, and I think they probably have tried to do that sincerely in this pact, but as one who has to make up his mind in giving advice to the executive department as to whether or not it ought to be ratified, I wanted to know just what this section contemplated. You do not think it contemplated the elimination of any tariffs, it does not contemplate binding us to a continuous policy of reciprocal trade agreements. Do you think it in any way hints at—

Mr. LOVETT. Not at all, sir.

Senator WATKINS. I had not finished. Do you think it in any way hints at or binds us to adopt the International Trade Organization Treaty which is now prepared and which will soon be submitted, as I understand, to the Senate for ratification?

Mr. LOVETT. Not at all.

Senator WATKINS. It does not indicate that in any way, and you would not construe this to bind the United States as a matter of policy to go on eliminating its tariffs or to adopt permanently, or for the life of the treaty, a reciprocal trade program?

Mr. LOVETT. No.

Senator WATKINS. Or to even ratify the international trade agreement?

Mr. LOVETT. I would not.

Senator WATKINS. None of those matters I have mentioned was contemplated or even discussed in connection with this particular section?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator WATKINS. And you were present at most of these discussions when the negotiations were taking place?

Mr. LOVETT. I was.

Senator WATKINS. And the legal counsel for the State Department was present and advised in all these matters?

Mr. LOVETT. They were in all of the working parties.

Senator WATKINS. Who was the legal aide that took part in these negotiations for the State Department? I think we ought to have him here to give his opinion.

Mr. LOVETT. Mr. Gross; Ernest Gross.

Senator WATKINS. What position did he occupy at the time?

Mr. LOVETT. He was the legal adviser. He was at that time of which we are speaking the legal adviser of the Department of State. He is now an assistant Secretary of State.

Senator WATKINS. You do not have a solicitor for the Department of State, do you?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir.

Senator WATKINS. They used to have a solicitor for the State Department. I was acquainted with a number of men who occupied that position with great distinction.

Now let's go over to article 3:

IMPLEMENTATION OF ARTICLE 3

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

In the negotiations was there a discussion of the ways in which self-help and mutual aid might be accomplished?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes, there was.

Senator WATKINS. And did the idea of mutual aid go to the extent of including military measures, the furnishing of arms and armament by the United States to the other signatories, the proposed signatories to the treaty?

Mr. LOVETT. There was never any specific covering of that.

Senator WATKINS. Let's leave out the word "specific."

The CHAIRMAN. Let him answer it in his own way.

Senator WATKINS. All right; I apologize. I do not want to interrupt you.

Mr. LOVETT. It is all right, Senator. There was never any discussion direct or implied, or obligation, on the part of this country, to do any particular thing with respect to military supplies and military assistance. The language was perfectly well understood by the negotiators, and I think has been covered in the testimony of the Secretary of State here, that the self-help and mutual aid language related to a measure of earnest determination to put themselves and their neighbors in the best possible position to resist aggression if it occurred, and it was understood that the mutual aid meant that there would be no purely selfish attempt by one country to take care of itself, and then its neighbors go by default.

It was always in contemplation that good faith would require each of them to help within the measure which he deemed necessary and possible in the building up of the participant strength.

DISCUSSIONS OF IMPLEMENTATION OF ARTICLE 3 BY MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator WATKINS. Since we have gone into this question of what happened and how this treaty was negotiated, I think it would be fair and probably perfectly proper and material to the discussion to inquire along the lines that I am now inquiring. Was there not a discussion of the practical situation of the signatories or the proposed signatories at the time as to what this would need in the way of help, arms, economic help and all other help? Was that not discussed in these negotiations?

Mr. LOVETT. You will recall the Brussels Pact signatories were at that time meeting abroad, and at those meetings there were representatives of the National Military Establishment of this country present. We therefore, in the Military Establishment end, were receiving information dealing with the studies that were then undertaken, and which are now of course public knowledge through the combined commanders in chief organization of the Brussels Pact signatories. Those studies were being made then.

Up to the time I left, Senator Watkins, there had been no report issued or received by us which gave an estimate either in amounts or in dollars. As of January 20th there was no such figure. Those figures were being collected at the time that I was here, and I believe that they came out some month or so later, probably some time in February.

Senator WATKINS. Without meaning any offense, I think the answer is not responsive to what I asked. I asked, was there any discussion among the negotiators of the various items I have called to your attention? You told me about what was done somewhere else.

Mr. LOVETT. I have tried to say previously that there was discussion of the principle of self-help and mutual aid; that the precise detail of the competence of each country and its requirements was not developed at the time I left, so it was understood that as and when the figures were ultimately provided there would, of course, be a more precise study made. That has been done, and I think it has been reported to this committee by the Secretary of State.

Senator WATKINS. Was there general discussion? You have used the word "precise." I would not restrict you to that. I think probably it would not be far enough developed at that time to make it precise, but was there a general discussion of what their needs would be and how that could be accomplished under the principle of mutual aid?

Mr. LOVETT. There were frequent general discussions as to the ability of the various countries to contribute to their own self-defense, and to the aid of their neighbors.

Senator WATKINS. Did they not indicate the needs they would have?

Mr. LOVETT. No, they did not.

Senator WATKINS. In the way of armament?

MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM DISCUSSIONS SEPARATE FROM NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. LOVETT. No, they did not; only in the most general terms, that they would need armament. I was going to say, Senator Watkins, that it was stated by the negotiators for the United States at the outset that we would have to have a very precise understanding of the competence and the potential of each participant before we could get anywhere in that area of discussion, which was properly one for the military authorities, and it was also abundantly clear throughout that anything which any country might do, this country included among the others, would be supplementary and not a replacement for the efforts of the individual country in its own self-defense, hence the importance of the words "self-help and mutual aid," which we had learned the value of through the ECA procedures.

Senator WATKINS. As a matter of fact, then, in these negotiations there was a general discussion of the necessity for this type of an agreement, taking and keeping in mind the threats that had been made or the lack of cooperation of one of the great powers in the United Nations, that need of the various nations taking part in the discussion for some help to defend themselves against whatever aggressor might appear on the scene and what the United States could do, if anything, to help them. Wasn't there all that discussed in this?

Mr. LOVETT. Not in any precise detail.

Senator WATKINS. Let's leave out the word "precise." I recognize that.

Mr. LOVETT. As I said earlier, the general principle of self-help and mutual aid was, of course, discussed at considerable length, but there was no commitment made by any participant in the discussions as to what he might do or what he might expect anybody else to do. Up to the time I left it was not even possible to get into that phase of it.

Senator WATKINS. But it was intended that the United States would help, and was committing itself, or would commit itself, if it ratified this particular treaty with this clause in it, economically and with armament?

Mr. LOVETT. It was not directed to the United States at all, Senator Watkins. Each participant took a similar obligation of self-help and mutual aid, and the concept of the treaty was that it should be a two-way thing, and not a one-way thing.

CONSIDERATION OF CAPACITY OF EUROPE TO DEFEND ITSELF

Senator WATKINS. Was it not understood, and did they not take into consideration the situation that existed? In other words, didn't they face the facts of life that we were then putting up billions to put them on their feet, that they didn't have the means themselves to rearm themselves or to go ahead and establish their economy as they ought to be to be strong? Wasn't that all taken into consideration and discussed?

Mr. LOVETT. Everything was discussed that related to their economic position and their military competence, but there was no commitment made.

Senator WATKINS. I realize that. Discussion is what I want.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute. Let him answer your question.

Mr. LOVETT. There was no commitment made as a result of any of the discussions, and the discussions were in general terms based upon the principle of self-help and mutual aid.

NO COMMITMENT TO MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator WATKINS. Would you say now that as a result of those discussions or in the discussions there was nothing that took place, or intimated, that in any way bound the United States, or looked to the United States, to furnish substantial military rearmament for the European nations who were to be part of this treaty?

Mr. LOVETT. I say again, Senator Watkins, what I said earlier this morning, that there was no commitment taken on the part of this Government or any other participant as to what they might do in amount, type, time, or form, of assistance.

Senator WATKINS. But is there not a commitment in this very paragraph, and so understood by those negotiators, that the United States would do something? At least it was committed to something.

Mr. LOVETT. All participants.

Senator WATKINS. All right; let's put them all in. That takes in the United States as well. I am talking about the United States. We have to act for the United States, not for the rest of them.

Mr. LOVETT. Certainly, but I want to make sure that there is no misconception that it was some sort of a unilateral obligation.

Senator WATKINS. I do not think so. They have to help too, but didn't they face the facts of life that they could not help and were not in a position to help?

Mr. LOVETT. I do not agree with that particular conclusion that they were not in position to help.

Senator WATKINS. I have been told that. I have been voting on the theory that we had to tax the American people to send billions of supplies over there because they could not help themselves without it.

Mr. LOVETT. The help we give them is just a small portion of their total help, of what they are doing. In this particular case, the military supplies program, which the Secretary of State has previously testified on, I believe it was brought out in testimony that the amount of mutual aid that we have been considering is one-sixth or one-seventh of the total that the participants require.

OBLIGATIONS UNDER ARTICLE 3

Senator WATKINS. You understood that we were binding ourselves to do something, at least, to take some affirmative action to help?

Mr. LOVETT. Of course, Senator.

Senator WATKINS. And they were, of course, likewise binding themselves the same way?

Mr. LOVETT. Exactly.

Senator WATKINS. And what the possibilities of that help would be were discussed among the negotiators?

Mr. LOVETT. Yes.

Senator WATKINS. That is what I wanted to find out. I can't imagine men sitting down and facing the situation we face today without actually going into some of the details—

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead and ask your question, Senator. It is not necessary to make a speech. Just ask the questions.

Senator WATKINS. I will appreciate it very much if the Senator will permit me to ask my questions in my own way.

The CHAIRMAN. I want you to ask questions, but I do not care for you to make a speech not in reponse to some suggestion of the witness. I want to be courteous, but we have other considerations here.

Senator WATKINS. I understand so, and I think I have not unduly trespassed. I am not here just as a visitor, and entirely by the courtesy of the committee. I am a Member of the United States Senate charged with the same responsibility that the Senator from Texas or any other Senator is charged with, to do my part in giving the advice to the Executive on this treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. What I am suggesting is that the Senator is free to ask any question that he wants to, but after the witness has answered the question fully, then the Senator from Utah has proceeded to say what he couldn't imagine, and so on and so forth, that did not call for an answer at all, but was a mere general observation.

Senator WATKINS. I probably have been following the example I have been set for so many days in these hearings. I have heard so many members do it that I have probably just lapsed.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. We want to be courteous and to give you every consideration, but we want you to also give us some consideration.

Senator WATKINS. I have tried to give that consideration, and I think the record will show that I have used but very little of the time, and that at the tail end of the proceedings.

OBLIGATION TO TAKE SOME ACTION UNDER ARTICLE 3

Now, as to article 5. I do not want to cover all the same ground that was covered before, but as I get it from your interpretation, you think what that means, or what you have told the committee it means, is that we are not bound in any respect to do anything under that treaty, but the matter is entirely left to the Congress, and it will have to consider it when a question would arise. Is that a true interpretation of what you have said?

Mr. LOVETT. Senator Watkins, I said something which places the emphasis elsewhere. We are bound by the treaty.

Senator WATKINS. Just what do you think we are bound to do? That is what I want to know.

Mr. LOVETT. I was just going to say, sir, that I think we are bound by the treaty, under article 5 and elsewhere, as a government, first under article 3 and then under article 5, to take such steps as the representatives of the people of this country deem necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area. That seems to me to be a perfectly clear, unequivocal obligation.

Senator WATKINS. As I understand you, then, we are bound to take some steps in order to protect and to secure the North Atlantic area. In other words, we are bound to take some action.

Mr. LOVETT. We are bound to take such action as we deem necessary to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 5

Senator WATKINS. I ask you what interpretation you give to the meaning of the first part of that section, down to the first semicolon:

The Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all;

Mr. LOVETT. That is perfectly clear to me, sir. It would be hard to make it clearer.

Senator WATKINS. Do you follow me, and am I correct in my statement, and I will ask you that as a question, that an attack upon London, an attack upon Paris, an attack upon Copenhagen, or any of those capitals, or any of the capitals of any of the signatory powers in Europe, would be the same thing as if an enemy had attacked the United States?

Mr. LOVETT. It does not say that, Senator.

Senator WATKINS. It says, if you attack any one of these signatories it will be an attack upon them all, and that would mean an attack upon us.

Mr. LOVETT. It does not say it will be the same thing. It says it will be considered as an attack against them all, and then, in those circumstances, if the hypothetical case you put occurs, we have the obligation which I referred to previously, and that is to assist the parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as this Government deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

Senator WATKINS. Does it not, in effect, bind us to consider an attack upon London, for instance, the same as an attack on our own country, and aren't we bound to do and to take such steps as we would take if one of our own cities were attacked by another?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir; it does not. I think the language is clear on that point, because it draws the sharp rule here that if an attack occurs, we consider that as an attack on us, but the measures that we take in response to that are within the determination of this Government.

Senator WATKINS. I understand that, and I will agree with you. The measures we would take would be within the power of this Government. That is true, and we will probably have to take them by Congress. But does it not bind us, and does it not bind Congress in advance, to take exactly the same steps that it would take if its own territory were attacked? Would that not be the interpretation of that clause, that we shall regard an attack upon any one of these nations the same as if our own Nation were attacked, and we would proceed in the same way to react, to do the things we would do if our own Nation were attacked?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir; that is not my understanding.

Senator WATKINS. That is not your understanding?

Mr. LOVETT. No, sir.

Senator WATKINS. You do not claim to be a lawyer, but you think that is not the understanding that these other powers had?

Mr. LOVETT. I am confident in my own mind that that is not the understanding in general terms, because we have here set up the rule which leaves to the Congress the determination as to whether or not the facts are such as to require, for example, a declaration of war.

Senator WATKINS. You understand, of course, that it is possible to have a state of war actually exist without a declaration of war, do you not?

Mr. LOVETT. I understand that that is possible.

Senator WATKINS. In fact we did have.

Mr. LOVETT. This does not contemplate it.

Senator WATKINS. We did have that at least during the time when the Japs struck at Pearl Harbor until the declaration by Congress which recognized, not declared a state of war but recognized a state of war to already exist. We had that situation, did we not?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator WATKINS. And under the circumstances here, if New York City or Washington were attacked by a foreign power, we would still have a state of war without the Congress enacting a declaration of war.

Mr. LOVETT. I do not know that you would have a state of war, but you would certainly have a prompt reaction on the part of the Commander in Chief and the military services if this country itself were attacked. The question you are posing is, what happens if some other country is attacked which is a participant in this enterprise.

Senator WATKINS. I am getting an interpretation now that is different than I understood a good many others have placed on this, and a large number of people that have communicated with me have insisted that if one of these other countries were attacked we are more or less bound to react the same way as if our own country were attacked.

EUROPEAN INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 5

I think, and preliminary to this question I want to ask, that that is the very view that the European people themselves are taking of this situation and of this particular section. They feel satisfied now with this section. They were very much disturbed at one time at what took place in the United States Senate when it was generally expressed there on February 14 of this year that there was no moral commitment to go to war or to fight, and they were very much disturbed over that, and so expressed themselves. Later on that alarm practically disappeared, and it is now thought by a great many of our own citizens here that it disappeared for the reason that they were assured, and that they now understand this to mean that when they are attacked the United States Government is bound to respond and to do the things that it would do the same as if one of its own cities were attacked or its own territory were attacked.

I can see that construction of this particular clause would give them great assurance, because they all know, from their own experience and their own minds, what the reaction of the United States would be in a specific matter. Legally Congress might say "No" and they might not fight, but if anybody would agree to do for them the same as they would do for themselves if they were attacked, they would feel much assured about it.

Mr. LOVETT. I am not aware, of course, what interpretation the foreign countries put on it. I can only give you my own impression from my conversations.

Senator DONNELL. Would the Senator permit just a brief interruption?

Senator WATKINS. I yield for a moment.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask Mr. Lovett whether he saw this observation which is stated to be made in a dispatch of the United Press from Copenhagen, quoting an address by Gustav Rasmussen, who signed the pact, you will recall, for Denmark:

If armed force is necessary to reestablish security, it is evident that the member countries possessing such force are obliged to use it. That means that if an armed attack occurred on one of the member countries, it could have only one answer. The United States would go to war.

Did you see that, and you agree with that?

Mr. LOVETT. No, I did not see it; and no, I do not agree with it except with the reservations which I have previously made indicating that it would require the judgment of the Congress.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN AN ATTACK ON UNITED STATES AND AN ATTACK ON A COSIGNATORY

Senator WATKINS. Let me ask you if you would agree with this situation, that by reason of the statement made in that first part of article 5 up to the end of the first semicolon, we have created, by this agreement, a situation which binds the United States in the future to take the same action with respect to the foreign countries that have been attacked as it would take on its own.

Mr. LOVETT. I have tried to answer that earlier, Senator. I do not think that article 5, and I stress this as being my personal opinion on a subject which is properly the field of the Secretary of State to answer and which he has previously covered, and I do not think that the language in article 5, gives any assurance that the line of action we take must be identical if an act of aggression occurs in some other country with the line of action we will take if the act of aggression occurs against one of our own cities. I see no assurance in this pact that such a conclusion is warranted.

Senator WATKINS. I would understand that probably it would not be identically the same action or the same precise action, but it would mean fight, would it not?

Mr. LOVETT. That would depend on the circumstances.

Senator WATKINS. And would not Congress be bound to declare war just the same as it would if New York City and Washington were attacked?

Mr. LOVETT. Senator, I can only refer again to the Secretary of State's full answer on that point, where it was pointed out that there is a direct obligation on this country to consider what measures are necessary to restore and maintain peace in the North Atlantic area. The method of restoration, the time of it, and its extent, are within the control of this Government, and I do not know how I can make that point any clearer as representing my own opinion.

Senator WATKINS. The time and the way and the method, all that sort of thing, I think you are right on that, but haven't we agreed specifically to take some action?

Mr. LOVETT. We have agreed to take some action, and that "some action" is specifically defined as action which we deem necessary.

Senator WATKINS. And to take it forthwith.

Mr. LOVETT. That is right.

MORAL COMMITMENT TO DECLARE WAR IN CASE OF ATTACK ON A COSIGNATORY

Senator WATKINS. As a matter of fact, have we not, in effect, by making the statement we do that the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all, created a situation in advance which will make it, as a matter of practical operation, impossible for any future American Congress not to declare war and to go to the rescue of these nations, having once adopted that principle?

Mr. LOVETT. No, Senator Watkins, I cannot agree that that is a reasonable interpretation, or was the intent. I am not sure whether you were here when we covered this point earlier, but I tried to explain my own understanding of the difference which the order of magnitude of the offense itself would have in the conclusions of the Congress. It would be one thing, certainly, if formalized armies invaded and occupied another country. The Congress would have to determine whether or not that, in their judgment and in good faith, a declaration of war was necessary to restore and maintain, I think the language is, the security of the North Atlantic area a declaration of war. On the other hand, if a couple of border guards started firing at each other, the lesser order of magnitude might not require a declaration of war, but some other steps.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF THE TREATY

Senator WATKINS. With respect to the statements that have been made in behalf of this pact that it would be a great deterrent for war because it would say in advance that at the moment an attack was made on any one of the signatories it would meet an overwhelming force, will that statement not be robbed of its effect if the Congress, as it has the utmost freedom when that should occur to decide whether or not it was bound to take any armed action whatsoever, should decide not so to do?

Mr. LOVETT. I can only answer that in the affirmative, by an affirmative statement. Senator Watkins, that I believe the importance of that pact is difficult to overestimate, largely because it puts a group of countries with a common point of view toward human life and justice and freedom on the record in advance that they will oppose with determination and with unified resources any act of aggression.

Senator WATKINS. Are we committed to oppose in advance?

Mr. LOVETT. What we are committed to has been pointed out in article 5, which I have tried repeatedly to interpret, and I think it would be hard to find a method of making it clearer, that the ultimate decision on a declaration of war, if that is what is deemed necessary must rest with the Congress of this country as far as this country is concerned; and incidentally, Senator Watkins, of course, with the appropriate bodies in the other participants, who likewise have constitutional procedures to go through.

Senator WATKINS. Do you think the statement in this agreement we have signed, which you say is not binding upon any future Congress to act with force to regard, that they would have the freedom of choice to decide whether we will or will not act with force, will be of any practical help to stop future aggression?

Mr. LOVETT. I think the pact, as I understand it, will be of the greatest help.

Senator WATKINS. And that Russia, or any other nation which might possibly be an aggressor, in view of the interpretation which you have given here this afternoon, would be worried at all about an agreement of that kind?

Mr. LOVETT. I think any potential aggressor who reads this pact, and if he is well advised he will, cannot escape the clear understanding that an act of aggression will be reacted to promptly by this group within their judgment as to what is necessary to restore and maintain the peace and security of the North Atlantic area. He is on notice in advance that he has opened the door to an endless amount of trouble.

Senator WATKINS. And then we are committed to restore and secure that peace?

OBLIGATION TO MAINTAIN SECURITY IN NORTH ATLANTIC

Mr. LOVETT. In such form as we feel necessary.

Senator WATKINS. I am not talking about the form; I am talking about the substance. Are we agreed in substance that we are committed to secure and protect the security of the North Atlantic area?

Mr. LOVETT. The language seems to me to be completely clear.

Senator WATKINS. I am trying to get your opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The treaty is what we are talking about.

Senator WATKINS. And it is what we interpret that treaty to mean that counts, and as the Senator well knows, we take the interpretation, the understanding, of those who were present at the negotiations to help us find out what the language means.

Mr. LOVETT. My answer to the question, if you want my personal view, is that the language of article 5 means yes, we do have, this Government does have, an obligation, otherwise the treaty would have little or no value.

Senator WATKINS. I am agreed with you on that 100 percent, that it does have an obligation, a very binding one, and considered just the same as if we were attacked ourselves.

GERMANY AND THE TREATY

Now I want to go to another question. I do not want to prolong this. What was said about Germany during the negotiations in connection with its future and what part it would play in the defense of the Atlantic area?

Mr. LOVETT. My best recollection is that Germany was discussed at some length but we found that its circumstances at the present time make it impossible to be considered as a participant, notably western Germany.

Senator WATKINS. What about the future?

Mr. LOVETT. And the future is left, I think, covered by article 10 of the treaty, which would presumably cover any future adherent, and I believe there has been testimony given before this committee that in the case of any future adherent it would be regarded as a new element in the treaty and therefore would be either discussed with the committee or referred to the Congress. My recollection of the precise language is not accurate on that point. But Germany would be treated, I should imagine, as any other applicant for membership.

Senator WATKINS. I notice you used the word "imagine." It went just a little further than imagination, did it not, when you discussed the future of Germany with relation to the defense of the North Atlantic area?

Mr. LOVETT. I am not sure that I understand you, Senator.

Senator WATKINS. You said "I imagine." I wanted to know, to get right down to your memory on the matter, if there was not some concrete discussion of what part Germany would take in the defense

Mr. LOVETT. My personal opinion is that it would, on the same principle that the Algeria departments are a part of metropolitan France.

Senator WATKINS. But you think that Hawaii is now in a state where it is not entitled to the same protection it would have if the government were changed to that of a State?

Mr. LOVETT. I am not speaking of the protection involved.

Senator WATKINS. There is no protection under this treaty, is there?

Mr. LOVETT. I am speaking on questions which relate to whether or not it was or was not in the pact. The answer to that question is that it is not in the pact, because it falls without its limits.

Senator WATKINS. An attack, then, upon Hawaii would not call into operation the terms of this pact?

Mr. LOVETT. That is my understanding.

Senator WATKINS. But an attack on the Aleutian Islands would?

Mr. LOVETT. On our portion.

Senator WATKINS. An attack on Japan, of course, and on our forces in Japan, would not call into operation this pact either, would it?

Mr. LOVETT. That is correct.

Senator WATKINS. I think that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will recess until tomorrow morning at 10:30, at which time General Bradley will be the witness before the committee.

(Whereupon, at 1:30 p. m., a recess was taken to the following day, Tuesday, May 3, 1949, at 10:30 a. m.)

---

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment on May 2, 1949, in room 318 Senate Office Building, at 10:30 a. m., Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee), presiding.

Present: Senators Connally, George, Thomas of Utah, Green, McMahon, Vandenberg, Wiley, Hickenloper, and Lodge.

Also present: Senators Donnell and Watkins.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

This is the Committee on Foreign Relations holding hearings on the North Atlantic Pact. We are very glad indeed to have with us this morning a distinguished soldier and distinguished American: General Bradley, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, whom we shall be pleased to hear at this time on the treaty and its importance.

Let me announce first: At 12:30 the first ratification of this treaty will be deposited with the United States. It is a ratification of Canada; the treaty was ratified unanimously by the Canadian Parliament.

All right, General Bradley.

STATEMENT OF GEN. OMAR N. BRADLEY, CHIEF OF STAFF, UNITED STATES ARMY

General BRADLEY. It is an unusual but welcome occasion when a soldier is called to speak of peace instead of war. In the North Atlantic Treaty, I believe we have found a new strength for common defense without abandoning our determination for permanent peace.

Your committee has heard far more expert testimony than mine on this treaty, and what it means to the United States, and what it can mean to a friendly world. At this point in your hearings, gentlemen, my part is relatively simple. I can tell you what this pact, as a deterrent to war, means to the military security of our country today, and what it may mean if our plans for peace are subverted, and war is thrust upon us.

Twelve nations have signed this treaty with the common determination, according to article 3, to—separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid * * * maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

In addition, they have in common with us, according to their treaty signatures, a desire for—the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being.

MILITARY SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TREATY

There is a military significance in these simple declarations. There is no better basis for common defense plans than mutual confidence, similar aims and objectives, and a common worthy purpose.

And in the event of war, there is no greater strength than mutually avowed ideals and purposes.

According to this treaty, 12 nations in the world have joined a common pact for security and peace. It would be our good fortune, from a security standpoint, if we were to become a member. Within the framework of these subscribed intentions, we, with our friends, can progress collectively toward added strength and security.

In considering this treaty and its important corollary, the military assistance program for our friends, we ought to ask ourselves: Are we following a national pattern fully supported by the American people? Our avowed purpose has been to rebuild western Europe in order that it may be self-sufficient and secure.

Economically, through the European recovery program we are attaining this purpose.

Politically, through the North Atlantic treaty we would be strengthening their will and their institutions for self-help.

As a soldier, I feel that the natural and essential sequel is to strengthen them security-wise with a military assistance program.

ADVANTAGES TO UNITED STATES FROM THE TREATY

However, it is unrealistic to assume that any one of these member nations has cast its lot without consideration of concrete gain. Certainly we of the United States, and especially we members of the National Military Establishment, expect increased military potential from the treaty, and any subsequent mutual aid endeavor. Here are some of the things we expect to gain by joining this pact of collective security:

First, 11 friendly nations assure us that they will stand with us.

Second, 11 friendly nations signify that, to the limit of their abilities to resist, no aggressor could count them among his satellites.

And again from a purely military standpoint, the combined population of these 12 nations is more than 300 millions of people—an important military-political factor to the group of nations, and especially to our Nation, in the event we are ever called upon to defend ourselves in another total war.

Fourth, the industrial potential of our 11 friends is not small. Their combined steel production in 1948 is estimated at 37,000,000 tons, while we produced 89,000,000 tons in the United States. Their natural resources, and their ability to manufacture the weapons of war as well as the basic life-giving commodities of peace are important contributions to the security of the western world. And like the population question, the transfer of the industrial potential of any one of these nations, from our combination to any aggressor, would be a double liability.

ESTABLISHMENT OF DEFENSE FRONTIER IN EUROPE

As a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who are responsible for our strategic planning, I point to a fifth, and very important contribution that these nations make toward our security. Geographically, many of these member nations are already in positions where any aggression into western Europe would be a conquest of their homelands. I assure you that our frontiers of collective defense lie in common with theirs in the heart of Europe.

In World War II we had the costly experience of making, on the Normandy beaches, the greatest amphibious assault in history to gain a toe-hold in Europe from which we could launch the final attack for victory. That beachhead cost the United States 21,000 casualties in the first 10 days. I was a commander in that sea-to-land assault and I hope that the occasion shall never arise when I might again be called upon to participate in such a hazardous and costly operation.

I have outlined briefly the five important contributions that the other signatory powers are making to the United States and to each other. There is no price tag on these pledged commodities in security, for they are never for sale.

Any plotting aggressor realizes—just as friendly Europeans realize—that in the final analysis, western Europe can be saved only by the western Europeans. Americans realize that neither American dollars nor American arms can—in themselves—give Europe security. But if we Americans, together with the western Europeans, believe that economic assistance can bring economic stability, we should also believe that military assistance can bring military stability to us all.

GREATER SECURITY FOR NORTH ATLANTIC AREA

The North Atlantic Treaty would supplement ERP by furnishing improved military security already begun with growing economic recovery. Military assistance is not specifically required by this treaty. However, this pact, and some military assistance, would provide both an assurance of collective aid, and would provide additional means to resist. Given the sorely needed materials, and given the proper training, European divisions, established on their own home territory in western Europe, will be in a firm position of readiness. I have no doubt that given the assurance of aid, and the means to resist, that they will contest resolutely any threat of aggression.

Finally, after studied appraisal of the future security provisions for our country, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are in unanimous agreement that our strategy, in case we are attacked, must rely on sufficient integrated forces of land, sea, and air power to carry the war back to the aggressor, ultimately subjugating the sources of his military and industrial power. Plans for the common defense of the existing free world must provide for the security of western Europe without abandoning these countries to the terrors of another enemy occupation. Only upon that premise can nations closest to the frontiers be expected to stake their fortunes with ours in the common defense.

In conclusion, let me state that I believe our national objective is permanent peace and security. Both peace and security are necessary to maintain our way of life, and to sustain our standard of living.

At no time in our history has it become so important that we be utterly sincere, and profound in our integrity. If we are convinced that the European recovery program promotes peace through economic stability, and that the North Atlantic Treaty establishes strength for democracy through political stability, then we should adopt the treaty wholeheartedly.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, General. We want to ask you some questions along that line.

AMOUNT OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE CONTEMPLATED

In the current issue of the United States News appears a report that the United States can ship abroad up to $5,122,000,000 in ground-force arms not needed for our M-day forces of 18 divisions. I do not know whether that is true or not. I want to interrogate you. To what extent will military aid over and above the authorization requested come from our surplus military supplies?

General BRADLEY. It is hard to say that any piece of military equipment is surplus to your eventual needs. Except, however, that certain articles are surplus in that, until production catches up, you can not arm more than a certain number of divisions. So that the equipment we have in certain categories over and above that required for that particular balanced equipment, would probably be available through production after the war, and would not seriously affect your own equipment standpoint.

To make myself clear: Supposing you had balanced equipment for, say, 40 divisions, and you had certain items of equipment above that particular need, in say a dozen articles, you could not mobilize but the 40 divisions until production of all of those catches up, so that the 12 items, over and above the requirement of 40 could be provided to somebody else without seriously affecting your own mobilization.

CONTEMPLATED MILITARY STAFF ORGANIZATION

The CHAIRMAN. It is to be assumed, I suppose, that when and if the treaty is ratified, there will be some kind of a military contact between the governments on the line of staff consultations and things of that kind, is it not, General?

General BRADLEY. I believe that is reasonable to assume. However, this primarily, and to start with, certainly, is a political union.

The CHAIRMAN. That is very true.

General BRADLEY. As to what staff organization or military organization will be formed within that pact, I do not believe it has been determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The details have not been determined. But is it not a fair assumption that if and when we ratify the treaty, and especially if we later do supply them with equipment or arms, that there would have to be some coordination and contacts between the different governments and the United States?

General BRADLEY. I think that naturally follows; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That, of course, as far as we are concerned, would be under the direction of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, would it not?

General BRADLEY. I think it would be primarily under the governments themselves to determine that. Undoubtedly when it comes to the organization of a military staff set-up for all the nations, if such were determined to be necessary by the nations, undoubtedly they would ask for military advice on it. But as I see it, whatever organization is finally formed, would be that decided upon by the governments themselves and not by the military.

The CHAIRMAN. I grant you that, of course, it being a political matter. But assuming after that has been attained is it not entirely likely there would be a military committee or military staff or some organization so that there would not be one country going one way and the other the other?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. I think such an organization would be best qualified to determine what each nation should furnish toward a collective security organization. Some countries can furnish one thing, and others another. In order to determine what each of the members could best furnish toward the collective security, I think that that would have to be done by some kind of a military staff.

MUTUAL AID IN MILITARY ASSISTANCE

The CHAIRMAN. In the case of furnishing arms and equipment, is it not true that some governments probably are already supplied in certain lines, and another one is not, so that those matters would have to be taken into consideration and some systematic plan adopted?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. And different nations might have surplus in some items that we could furnish to someone else—I mean countries other than ourselves might be able to furnish to some other country some things. As I see it, it would have to be a collective use of the things available.

NATURE OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE

The CHAIRMAN. It is contemplated, is it not, that a foreign military assistance program would be in the form of either financial aid, equipment and materials, and services? What would "and services" mean? Advisers? Military advisers?

General BRADLEY. I think that would cover it. Military advisers and possibly an exchange of facilities on schools, and maybe an exchange of tactical doctrines in the way of textbooks, or anything of that kind that would contribute to the common security.

The CHAIRMAN. What we would supply, and the kinds of materials that we would supply, would be determined, of course, largely by our own military authorities in consultation with other nations, would it not?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I think I will turn the examination over to you, Senator Vandenberg. I will ask you some questions later, General. I do not want to cover the whole field now.

Senator VANDENBERG. I want to make only one or two inquiries, Mr. Chairman.

NEED FOR A MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

I think you have made a fine statement, General Bradley. I think you have tuned it to the real objectives of the North Atlantic Pact, which is peace. While you emphasize the importance of some degree of subsequent military implementation, as I read your statement the great importance of the North Atlantic Treaty, as an element in our national security, from your point of view, is the over-all, overriding unity of total cooperation to meet any ultimate contingency, rather than the specific importance of this immediate military implementation. Is that not true?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. As I see it, we are interested in our friends in the western European countries, and particularly the ones who have joined this pact. We are interested in their regaining some of the strength they had before the last World War.

They need to do that; they need economic recovery; they need some assurance that they will not be picked off one by one. In other words, they need something to lift their morale. And they possibly need to regain their ability to defend themselves.

I would think that if left alone, without any of these things, they might eventually regain that position. It might be a long time. As I see it, this country has adopted a policy of trying to speed up their reaching that point where they have a will and a means to resist.

We started in a year ago by helping them on economic recovery and speeding that up. We now are talking about a political pact in which we pool our resources to a certain extent, those of us who have common ideals and purposes, and it seems that the third thing, military assistance, follows. If you do not furnish it I think eventually they would arrive at a point where they could defend themselves, but it seems it falls in the same category as your economic recovery.

You did not try to do everything for them; you tried to assist them. And the same thing on the military assistance program. You are merely trying to speed up the time when they will reach that condition where they can defend themselves individually and collectively.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF THE TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. Putting my question a little differently: Is it not a fact that your plans in connection with the pact and its implementation do not contemplate the creation of sufficient forces in being to win another world war? You are simply proposing to create an organized and friendly nucleus through which you can more effectively anticipate a satisfactory ultimate net result.

General BRADLEY. That is correct. And by acting collectively you will probably avoid a war.

Senator VANDENBERG. Precisely.

General BRADLEY. I am one of those who believe that had we had such an agreement before the last world war it probably would never have happened, because I do not believe any country would ever have tackled such a combination of friendly countries, that is, friendly to each other. But where they were allowed to pick off one at a time they finally went so far that they found themselves at war, and as I understand it, to their own chagrin at that time, because they did not think it would bring war, as they had gotten away with one or two others.

As I see it, the principal purpose of this is to serve notice on anyone that they cannot do that again, and therefore I think it would prevent a war, so that you would never have to go to that point.

Senator VANDENBERG. In other words, the potentials in this program are far more important than the immediate physical aspects?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. Potential of countries thinking alike and acting in concert in case of an emergency.

CONTRIBUTION OF MASS MANPOWER

Senator VANDENBERG. I only want to ask you this further question, if you can appropriately answer it: In connection with any discussions of implementation of this treaty, is there any thought that we must contribute mass manpower under any circumstances connected with the implementation of the treaty?

General BRADLEY. I do not see how it is implied in the pact itself. In case of war you probably would act in concert with them, and that would, of course, depend upon the circumstances, and eventually would be at the will of the people, expressed through their Congress, after due consideration.

Senator VANDENBERG. I am speaking about the self-help and mutual aid in this peace effort, and I am asking you whether our contemplated contribution does not exclude mass manpower at the beginning, before there is any fracas?

General BRADLEY. I do not see that it excludes or includes. I do not see how it is involved at all.

Senator VANDENBERG. Is it involved in your plans on the subject?

General BRADLEY. No, sir. In my opinion it is not involved.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is what I was trying to get at. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. Not involved except in event, of course, of global conflict growing out of some aggressive movement, and in that event you would be controlled by the circumstances as they arise. That is true, I suppose.

General BRADLEY. That is correct; yes, sir.

Senator GEORGE. No further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wiley?

PEACEFUL PURPOSE OF THE TREATY

Senator WILEY. General, just a question or two. As a man of large experience, and not simply a commander of men, but in world affairs, you have naturally arrived at certain conclusions as to what the world is like today. I understood for your answers to the Senators from Michigan that it is your opinion, your mature judgment, that this is in the best interests of the American people, our joining up in this pact. Is that right?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. I believe it increases our own national security.

Senator WILEY. And knowing Europe as you do, and knowing those people over there, acquainted also, I take it, with the factors involved behind the iron curtain, you feel that joining up in this pact makes for peace, rather than for war?

General BRADLEY. I do.

Senator WILEY. I think that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Thomas?

Senator THOMAS of Utah. I have no questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I have no questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator McMahon?

Senator McMAHON. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Lodge?

Senator LODGE. General, I have a few questions that I would like to get answers to, not so much on my account as I think one of the important tasks confronting this committee is to make a record in which answers can be found to questions which may be asked.

IMPORTANCE OF MUTUAL AID AND SELF-HELP

Now, on your first page you quote article 3, in which the stipulation is made that there shall be continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid. I presume that means, does it not, that if the other nations in this pact do not exercise continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, we are not obliged to help them?

General BRADLEY. I would interpret it that way. As I have stated before, we cannot, in ourselves, save western Europe. It must be mostly done by themselves, or by self-help. We merely speed that up by giving them help now, so that the eventual goal, through their own worth, their own self-help, will be attained the quicker.

Senator LODGE. So there is no question of all those nations just laying back and saying "Uncle Sam will take care of use, and we do not have to do anything," is there?

General BRADLEY. I suspect if you find out that that is what they are doing, that there might be a change in policy.

Senator LODGE. I imagine so.

COMPARISON WITH OLD MILITARY ALLIANCES

On page 2 you speak of the mutually avowed ideals and purposes which animate the nations that joined in this pact. Does not that give it a certain moral force and enthusiasm that is lacking in the type of old-fashioned military alliance in which people banded themselves together without regard to common ideals simply for opportunistic conquest?

General BRADLEY. I believe that you had asked the State Department for a definition of military alliance. I do not know that the definition means too much until you get down into the meaning of it.

As I see it, the purpose and meaning of this is entirely different from the normal military alliances as we have known them in years past. Here we are binding ourselves together with some other nations who have free institutions and ideals like our own. Some of the military alliances in the past were a sort of combination of people who did not have such common ideals. You might say a combination of strange bedfellows, but for different purposes. Some of them were for purposes of offense, some for defense, that is true.

It seems to me like this one is entirely a different one, where we are joining together nations of like thinking and like ideals, with the purpose of trying to prevent aggression and the starting of a war. There is certainly no offensive implications in this pact whatsoever, because none of these nations could start any offensive war without our assistance, and certainly we would never start one.

So that as I see it, there is no danger in the world in this pact of its being interpreted by anyone, really, as a gesture for offensive aggressive action.

MILITARY CONTRIBUTION OF COSIGNATORIES

Senator LODGE. On page 3 you say :

First, 11 friendly nations assure us that they will stand with us.

That statement means, does it not, that those nations have got a contribution to make in a military sense, which can be definitely helpful?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. And when considered collectively it is quite impressive.

Senator LODGE. The very pertinent question has been raised here in the past week that because western Europe became very disorganized and collapsed in 1939, when their armed forces were much greater than they are in 1949, that therefore there is reason to doubt whether their strength can be worth while in the future.

That point has been raised, and I think it is a legitimate point worthy of consideration, but is it not true that the French Army, for example, which was disorganized in 1939, was subsequently reconstituted with American help, and rendered a very good account of itself in 1944 and 1945?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

Senator LODGE. Is it not true that the Italian partisans were helpful?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

Senator LODGE. Then I notice in the next sentence :

Second, 11 friendly nations signify that, to the limit of their abilities to resist, no aggressor could count them among his satellites.

Is not the significance of that statement that even if these nations could not make a contribution the very fact that they are being denied to somebody else is in itself an advantage to us?

General BRADLEY. That is what I intended to convey by that sentence. You expressed it very well, sir.

OTHER CONTRIBUTIONS OF THE COSIGNATORIES

Senator LODGE. You also point out that these countries have industrial potential. In the event that the worst should happen, and that they should be hostile, that potential would be of great value for service of supply activities, would it not?

General BRADLEY. It would be of great assistance to us and at the same time, as a second point here, it denies it to any other group as a satellite potential.

Senator LODGE. On page 4 you refer to the fact that you commanded the sea-to-land assault on the Normandy beaches. I gather from that that you draw the conclusion that it is better from every standpoint,

American and European, if western Europe is not swamped and invaded, and then with a costly liberation to follow, that it is far preferable for western Europe to preserve its integrity and identify at the outset?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. So that we would never have to go back in the manner that we did before.

EFFECT OF A COMMUNIST SEIZURE OF POWER IN A COSIGNATORY

Senator LODGE. You are satisfied, are you, General, that the provisions of the treaty protect the United States in the event that one of these nations should fall into the hands of the Communists? I will rephrase that question:

We would not be obliged under the terms of this treaty, would we, to go on furnishing military aid to a country which had fallen under the control of the Communists, would we?

General BRADLEY. I should think that that would be a proper question to ask the State Department. However, in my personal opinion we would not be expected to, under those circumstances, because you would have a change of government which would probably repudiate the previous signing of the pact by that nation.

Senator LODGE. You do not think, do you, that the Communist reaction to this treaty would be so violent as to make military aid to Europe unjustifiable?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

FUTURE COMMITMENTS ON MILITARY AID

Senator LODGE. Does this treaty impose a commitment for future years, insofar as money is concerned? Does it commit us to spend a certain amount of money beyond this $1,100,000,000 which is set up for the next year?

General BRADLEY. My understanding is that the pact in itself does not imply any expenditure; that that is a third point: the European recovery program being one, the pact the second one, and that a third one which must be considered separately. However, whatever you would decide on that third step, whether it is a billion dollars or whatever it is for any one year, I do not see that that commits you to any particular program.

I should think that any assistance to be furnished in the following years would depend upon the progress the nations have made for themselves. At some time they will reach the point where they do not need any, and if on the other hand they did not do anything to help their own recovery you probably would decide not to continue it anyhow.

So as I see it, whatever you decide on that third step, if you do decide to give any military assistance, it does not commit you to any future year whatsoever.

Senator LODGE. Is it true, if you did set up a program of definite dollar amounts for 3 or 4 years, that there would be a tendency in human nature to assume that they were surely going to get that amount and they would relax their own efforts accordingly?

General BRADLEY. Yes. You might have a long-range plan yourself, but I do not think you should make any promises beyond any one particular year.

Senator LODGE. There is also no commitment, expressed or implied, as to the precise way in which military operations would be conducted if they ever were to be conducted; is there?

General BRADLEY. There is nothing stated in this as to that; no, sir.

Senator LODGE. And there is nothing stated as to the particular place in which any activities would be undertaken, is there?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

Senator LODGE. There is complete freedom to do whatever seems best at the time, is there not?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

Senator LODGE. Thank you very much, General.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator McMahon?

COMMON DEFENSE LINE IN EUROPE

Senator McMAHON. General, on page 4, if you do not mind referring to it, you state at the top of the page:

Geographically, many of these member nations are already in positions where any aggression into western Europe would be a conquest of their homelands. I assure you that our frontiers of collective defense lie in common with theirs in the heart of Europe.

When I read that sentence I was reminded of the statement by President Roosevelt in 1939 that our frontier was on the Rhine, and there was a great uproar about it. I take it from this sentence that you agree that that certainly is true today, even though it were not true then.

General BRADLEY. You notice that I used the words "collective defense," assuming that we are talking about the defense of the 12 nations joining this pact.

Senator McMAHON. We are one of the 12 nations?

General BRADLEY. We are one of the 12. So if we go into this collective-security arrangement, then our common defense line lies, for the 12 nations, in the center of Europe.

Senator McMAHON. We found out since 1939 that what the late President said at that time was true. I take it it is far more true today, with the increase in destructiveness of weapons and the increased speed with which they can be delivered, and every development since then reiterates and fortifies the statement that our defense line is in Europe, because that simply takes cognizance of the fact that if war breaks out anywhere in the world today, unfortunately we are going to be involved in it. That is what you are really saying, is it not?

General BRADLEY. That is right. And going back a little bit, within the last 2 or 3 years, without this pact, had war broken out we would have found ourselves fighting in the center of Europe because we have troops there at the present time on occupation duties.

Senator McMAHON. Now, General, I presume that when the military implementation bill is presented that you will naturally appear as a witness to testify on that specific proposal. Many questions occur to me of a military nature having to do with that implementation bill which I do not think it is necessary to ask now.

EFFECTIVENESS OF THE PACT WITHOUT THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

I merely state that to explain why I do not ask some questions that go that far, but I will ask you this: Even without military aid, the pact does have considerable power, do you not think so?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir; I do. I think it is desirable whether or not you want to go on with the military aid.

Senator McMAHON. In other words, the might of this country, backed by $16,000,000,000 worth of appropriations for our rearmament, is certainly not to be taken lightly when it is married to a pledge to use it, and use it effectively if aggression takes place. Do you not agree with that, sir?

General BRADLEY. I agree.

Senator McMAHON. We guarantee, in the Rio Treaty, the territorial integrity of the whole South American Continent, and they in turn guarantee ours. We have no arms program for the implementation of that pact. It rests upon our assurance that we will resist any aggression, under the Monroe Doctrine.

If you regard this pact as the extension of the Monroe Doctrine theory, to the line around these 11 countries of western Europe, it might be that our power and our might might be sufficient to deter an aggressor without putting a ground army in western Europe. Is that so?

General BRADLEY. I think very definitely so. As I understand it, a lot of the people in Germany stated at the outset of the last world war that if the United States got into the war Germany was sure to lose it. They did not know when they started it for certain that we would get in it.

As I stated before, I believe that had we had a pact such as this, where there would have been no doubt in their minds that we would get in it if they started it, it might never have started.

Senator McMAHON. And that is so whether or not we have a gun or a man or an airplane on the continent of Europe.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir; because of our potential of putting it there later if it is so decided.

Senator McMAHON. Thank you.

RATIO OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM TO EUROPEAN DEFENSE BUDGETS

The CHAIRMAN. General, it is stated, of course, here in the treaty, that each one of these nations shall exert itself by means of continuously effective self-help and mutual aid to maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

It is proposed, or has been suggested, that we should appropriate $1,130,000,000 the first year if we undertake the arms program. Can you not verify the statement that that $1,130,000,000 that we contemplate appropriating is matched by the budget requirements in the other 11 nations by something like 6 to 7 billion dollars for their own defense?

General BRADLEY. I understand that that is correct, that this aid would be on the ratio of about 1 to 6, or 1 to 7, of the total that would be available for the nations; the nations themselves furnishing the rest of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The reason I ask you that, it was brought out in the testimony that there might be some slackening on their part, on their reliance on us to do it all. That would be an earnest that they do not expect to do that, if they lived up to their budget provisions; would it not?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. They are supposed to furnish about 6 or 7 times as much as we are talking about furnishing them from here.

The CHAIRMAN. And that would be under article 3, to meet their obligations under article 3; is that correct?

General BRADLEY. I am afraid I am not familiar enough with that.

COMPARISON TO TRADITIONAL MILITARY ALLIANCES

The CHAIRMAN. Article 3 is the self-help and mutual-aid provision. Some mention was made about military alliance. You mentioned that. The traditional military alliance as we knew it in the European countries, was not confined to self-defense or to preservation of peace at all; was it?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; it was not. Quite often it was formed for purposes of aggression, really.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, in a sense, instead of being formed for the sake of peace, it was sometimes formed for the sake of war; was it not?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. It was sometimes formed for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. And in those alliances, if one of the nations became involved in a war, the others automatically were supposed to join in that war; were they not?

General BRADLEY. They were, and regardless of why they got in the war.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly. Without going into the reasons or the justification for the war, if one of their associates became involved in the war, they were supposed to rush to its aid and enter the war.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You remember, no doubt, in World War I, Italy was in a treaty with the Central Powers. She did not stick to the treaty. She found an excuse to get out of it. But there was a bitter complaint of her associates in that Central Powers agreement that she did not rush into the war on their side without any justification on her own part at all. Is that not true?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir; that is true. And as I understand it, Italy pulled out because she did not agree with the causes for which the Central Powers were fighting.

The CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all I have.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the general a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

NATURE OF OLD MILITARY ALLIANCES

Senator VANDENBERG. It is rather in the form of a statement. I am one of those who have constantly been saying, General, that this proposed North Atlantic Pact is not in manner, form, spirit, or character anything like what we traditionally know in history as a military alliance. Sometimes it is difficult to identify the difference in the mere text, as you yourself have indicated. Sometimes it is necessary to go behind the text to identify the reality. But just at this point, Mr. Chairman, I think I would like to call attention, for the purpose of the record, to one sentence in the Holy Alliance which was signed November 30, 1815, and which is probably the greatest of all the so-called military alliances in history.

The sentence reads as follows:

The three contracting monarchs will remain united by the bonds of a true and indissoluble fraternity, and considering each other as fellow countrymen, they will, on all occasions, and in all places, lend each other aid and assistance.

That is what I have had in mind as a typical example of the true character of the old traditional, historical military alliance. And certainly we cannot apply the term "military alliance" to the North Atlantic Pact in any such manner as I have indicated by this quotation. Is that not true?

General BRADLEY. I agree.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I had not intended to pursue this subject, but I think it has been again reemphasized. General, do you recall an agreement between France and Britain prior to World War I with regard to coming to each other's assistance if some other country, specifically connoted as Germany, attacked France?

General BRADLEY. I remember that agreement. I do not remember the details of it.

SIMILARITIES WITH OLD MILITARY ALLIANCES

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I do not have the text of it here, but as I recall it, the phraseology of that treaty was that they would come to each other's mutual assistance in the event of attack or aggression by some outside power. I believe that was generally considered to be a military alliance.

It seems to me that there was also an agreement, at least between especially France and Russia, that if the Central Powers committed an aggression that they would come to each other's mutual assistance. I believe that was considered to be a military alliance as between those countries.

It also seems to me that prior to World War II there was an agreement or an understanding between Great Britain and Poland that the violation of their territory or their sovereignty by way of military advancement by any country would call for certain definite and immediate assistance on the part of Britain.

I am thoroughly convinced that this pact is a peace pact. I do not believe it has any aggressive intentions; in fact, I am certain that it does not. If it is aggressive, it is aggressive for peace. But I am not certain that it is not, in the long run, an alliance for military purposes subject to certain contingencies.

If these countries are attacked it is a military alliance, in my judgment, among other things, and while it certainly connotes peace, it is pointed toward peace, and I think peace underlies every motivation of this pact, yet I see the same high declarations of resisting invasion and resisting aggression in many other treaties that have been formed in, let us say, the last 20, 30, or 40 years.

I cannot follow the philosophy that just because some treaties a great many years ago probably secretly protected another country, if that country decided to go out and take some more territory, we could necessarily say that a military alliance is an aggressive alliance. I think a military alliance is just as righteous, if it is a peace alliance, or it is just as much of an alliance if it is a peace alliance or if it is an aggressive alliance, and I think there are various kinds of military alliances.

So that as I view this pact, it is, in some of its particulars, and under some eventualities, a military alliance.

The purpose of the alliance may be different from some ancient alliances, but I think the purpose of this alliance follows quite well the verbiage and the declarations of some more recent alliances that we have seen in history. To that extent I have expressed the opinion that this is actually a military alliance in its last effect.

General BRADLEY. I wonder if it makes much difference what you call it.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I do not know if I asked you a question, but if you have a comment, I would like to hear it.

General BRADLEY. I do not know whether it makes much difference what you call it, so long as we know the definite purpose of it.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I do not think it makes much difference what we call it, but what it does do is fix the time when we will fight, and that is the end result of this thing. We hope that we never will fight. We hope that it will insure peace, but it does fix a contingency under which we are determined to fight in a military way in conjunction with these other 11 nations, and I think it is very important that we clearly understand that.

DIFFERENCE IN PURPOSE FROM OLD MILITARY ALLIANCES

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true, General, that the purpose and the objectives are the things that determine the character of the pact, or the treaty, or whatever it is? If it is for peace, that is one thing; if it is for aggression or conquest or war, it is another thing.

General BRADLEY. I should think that the purposes of the pact will certainly determine the policies which are followed by the members of that pact through the years. And if the pact is formed for the maintenance of peace, as we know this one is, I do not see how it can ever result, or even be construed as, an alliance or anything else, whatever you want to call it, for starting a war or for aggressive action.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. May I just pursue that one question?

ACTION IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

Senator LODGE. I would like to comment on something Senator Hickenlooper said. I would like to have you elucidate it. I think as you phrased it, it gives an impression that I do not think you mean to convey.

You said that this treaty—

The CHAIRMAN. Whom are you interrogating?

Senator LODGE. I am going to comment on Senator Hickenlooper's statement and then ask General Bradley to comment on it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator LODGE. As I understood Senator Hickenlooper, he stated that this treaty—and I wrote it down as he said it—"fixed the time when we will fight." It does not do that; does it, General?

General BRADLEY. Except that at the time that any one nation is attacked. I assume that is what he meant.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Substitute the word "conditions" for the word "time"; the conditions under which we will fight.

Senator LODGE. It does not commit us to any particular time to fight, or to fight in any particular place, or in any particular way, does it?

General BRADLEY. No, but I believe it does imply that if any one of these nations is attacked by aggressive action on the part of someone else, we will all pool our resources to stop that aggression.

Senator LODGE. We will react, we will take such measure as we deem necessary, I think is the language, including the use of armed force.

General BRADLEY. At that time.

Senator LODGE. Yes. It does not compel us to use armed force; does it?

General BRADLEY. No. Because I think you would decide on the circumstances under which the aggressive act had taken place. You would decide at that time.

Senator LODGE. Does it either fix the time, the way, the place, or the conditions under which we will fight?

General BRADLEY. Not specifically. But I think it is implied that if the nation that was attacked was not at fault, I think the pact implies that they would render military assistance. If it was her own fault I do not think that is implied, necessarily, because as you say, it would then depend upon the conditions.

Senator LODGE. "Going to their assistance," that is the phrase you used. That is not the same thing as fighting; is it?

General BRADLEY. Not necessarily; no, sir.

Senator LODGE. Thank you.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead, Senator Hickenlooper.

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH WE WILL ACT

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Again let me reiterate that I am firmly convinced that this is the strongest and perhaps the most concerted peace effort that has ever been made in the world, as a world-wide effort. But on this question of the fighting end of this treaty, I take it, General, that there are many ways of fighting: Blowing up bridges, without necessarily being armed, sabotage of various kinds, infiltration, and then you can fight with guns and with other weapons. But this does, in my judgment—and I wonder if you will agree with me—this does set up conditions which we cannot necessarily anticipate in particular at this moment, but it does set up conditions under which we will bring to bear whatever strength—which means fighting, by whatever means we deem proper—in unity with these other countries, to repel aggression against any of these countries, and in my judgment that fixes the conditions under which we will fight.

Now, "fight" is a pretty broad word, and I do not use it in the sense that we will begin to shoot rifles immediately, but we will begin to fight with all that we have in conjunction with the cooperative efforts of these other nations to repel aggression.

That is why I phrase my statement that it furnishes perhaps the word "time." The word "time" might have been ill-advised, so I will substitute the word "conditions" under which we will fight.

Senator LODGE. Do you include the word "blockade" under the word "fight"?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Yes. Blockade, sanction.

Senator LODGE. Psychological propaganda?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. All manner of power which we could bring to bear in conjunction with our pact. I do not limit fighting necessarily to shooting guns.

Senator LODGE. When you said "fight," I thought you meant "shoot."

Senator HICKENLOOPER. You can fight with your fists. I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. General Bradley, we have present today two Senators, by the courtesy of the committee: Senator Donnell of Missouri and Senator Watkins of Utah. The committee allows them to interrogate the witnesses. I recognize Senator Donnell.

PROCEDURE IN CASE OF AN ATTACK

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, and General Bradley, pursuing for a moment the point under discussion by Senator Hickenlooper and Senator Lodge, I understood, in substance, that you concede that the North Atlantic Treaty does mean that if we come to a point where there is aggression against one of the signatories to the pact, and that signatory is not at fault, it is an aggression by some outside aggressor, we will pool our resources to repel that aggression. That is your view; is it not?

General BRADLEY. Yes, depending upon the circumstances at the time and the decision being made at that time, as to what collective action you would take.

Senator DONNELL. And if the decision be made at that time that it is necessary, in order to repel the aggression, that you fight with guns and ammunition, this treaty would contemplate that we should pool our resources to repel the aggression by fighting with guns and ammunition. That is correct; is it not?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. And the decision, of course, at that time would be made by the Congress itself in declaring war.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you, General, to take the case that has been mentioned before, both to Secretary Acheson and Mr. Lovett, in which we got different responses from those gentlemen. Suppose that a force of 500,000 Russians were to enter Norway in an attack upon Norway. Do you think that the President of the United States, as the Commander in Chief, would have power to send forces immediately to repel that attack without congressional action?

General BRADLEY. I think that would be a question for decision by the President and the State Department, and not by the military, and I am afraid I could not answer that question.

Senator DONNELL. General, along some other lines: Senator Connally made mention at the outset this morning of some article in the United States News. I do not know what that article was, and have not seen it—consciously, at any rate.

ORIGINAL COST OF CONTEMPLATED MILITARY ASSISTANCE MATERIAL

I notice in the edition of May 6, 1949, of the United States News and World Report, this statement:

Military alliance—

this is in what is known as the Newsgram—

The military alliance of the United States and western Europe will be made effective.

I am not asking for your conclusion as to whether this is or is not an alliance. I am reading this in conjunction with the next part:

Lend-lease is likely to be approved. Europe, in the first year, is to get $4,520,000,000 of United States arms written down to $452,000,000 to calm taxpayers. Replacement cost of arms to be given might be around $8,000,000,000. Armament for United States will be approved at around $15,000,000,000.

Can you tell us, General, whether or not there is contemplated that in the sending of equipment to Europe in pursuance to the Atlantic Treaty obligation, there is to be a charge made against Europe in determining how much is being sent to Europe?

General BRADLEY. A charge to Europe?

Senator DONNELL. A bookkeeping charge.

May I explain what I mean? We have heard here about the appropriation of one billion, or so many million dollars, that is going to be asked for the first year. Is that money going to be used in part to acquire from the United States Government, arms at a written-down figure, and then those arms be transported on over to Europe?

General BRADLEY. I think I know what you have reference to. I might say to start with that there is no definite list as yet; we do not have a final list of what would be of the most use to them, collectively—included in any such list there would undoubtedly be certain items of equipment which we do not need immediately upon mobilization.

REHABILITATION COST

It is planned, I believe, that those articles would be furnished to them out of our surplus, and that the only money necessary to be appropriated for that transfer would be that required to rehabilitate the equipment and to transport it, to put it into their hands.

Senator DONNELL. So that the appropriation then to be made, would not be made to repay the Government for what is being sent over, but merely to rehabilitate, in the instances you have described, that which we already have?

General BRADLEY. Rehabilitate and transport it.

Senator DONNELL. So that in an appropriation, we will say, of $1,000,000,000, to be used in rehabilitation, there may be actually sent equipment which has been rehabilitated by the use of the $1,000,000,000, equipment which itself is worth many billion dollars. That is correct, is it not?

General BRADLEY. I would say the original cost of it might have been a great deal more. The present worth of it might not be anything in our own hands, but might be worth a great deal in somebody else's hands.

Senator DONNELL. I understand that. But the point I am getting at is that the mere figure in the appropriations bill does not at all, necessarily, indicate the original cost of the equipment which will be rehabilitated and sent over to Europe. I am correct in that, am I not?

General BRADLEY. That is correct, because certain items will be given to them, and the only money necessary in the way of appropriation is that necessary to rehabilitate that equipment and get it transported to the nation concerned.

Senator DONNELL. Do you have any idea, General, roughly speaking, as to what the original cost of the equipment was which will require a billion dollars to rehabilitate it?

General BRADLEY. No, sir. Because all of that billion dollars is not rehabilitation and transportation. Some of it would have to be new equipment. So that I have no idea what the original cost of that particular part would be. When the program is finally decided upon it could be figured out then, of course.

Senator DONNELL. I understood from Secretary Johnson, when he was on the stand a few days ago, that the experts are vigorously at work, and actively at work now, on preparing these figures and this detail information. Am I correct in that?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. They are working on such a list.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know, General, approximately when that list will be completed, if you feel at liberty to tell us?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; I do not know just how soon it will be.

RATIO OF MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM TO EUROPEAN DEFENSE BUDGETS

Senator DONNELL. I understood you to say that the other countries to this Atlantic Treaty are expected to furnish about 6 to 7 times as much as the United States does. Did I correctly understand you?

General BRADLEY. In money value; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Would you tell us if there is anything in writing, General, to the effect that they are expected to furnish 6 to 7 times as much as we do?

General BRADLEY. Not that I know of. That was a State Department figure. Whether or not they have it in writing I do not know.

Senator DONNELL. When was that State Department figure given out? Or has it ever been given out publicly?

General BRADLEY. I do not know whether it has been given out publicly or not. I have been given to understand that that is about the ratio, of 6 to 1.

Senator DONNELL. General, I do not want to impose on any confidence, and I assure you of that. If there is anything I ask you that you feel you cannot answer because of confidence, I want you to express your desire not to answer it.

The CHAIRMAN. That covers security also.

Senator DONNELL. Yes. Anything that he considers is contrary to the interests of national security.

General, would you mind telling us who told you that it is contemplated that the other countries are expected to furnish about 6 to 1 compared to what we are to furnish?

General BRADLEY. It came to me through one of my staff members who had been working with the State Department on it. What member of the State Department told him I do not know.

Senator DONNELL. Do you mind telling us which member of your staff told you?

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt? I think Secretary Acheson testified about that before this committee.

Senator DONNELL. If he did, it will do no harm to have this further testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. You asked what the source was.

Senator McMAHON. That is the amount of their published military budgets, Senator. They aggregate about 6 or 7 billion dollars. That is where that figure comes from.

SOURCE OF RATIO FIGURE

Senator DONNELL. What I am getting at is the source of General Bradley's information, that it is expected that the other countries will furnish about 6 to 1, as compared with what we furnish. Would you mind telling us which member of your staff so informed you?

General BRADLEY. General Gruenther, who is sitting right here, said that he heard Secretary Acheson make the statement in a speech.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know where the speech was made, and when it was made, and to whom?

General BRADLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that that particular statement referring to Secretary Acheson be stricken from the record? I understand that that statement was made when he was talking off the record, sir. The member of my staff who informed me of that was General Lemnitzer, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We will strike it if you like. But his testimony here before this committee was not off the record.

General BRADLEY. No, sir. I understood that he made it here when I first said that. In conferring with General Gruenther, at the time he heard it, was when he was talking off the record some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Senator McMAHON. That is published in the whole world, General. For instance, the Belgian budget is known to the whole world, and you can take the amount of that. Everybody has that.

General BRADLEY. I believe there are two or three of these which have not. I do not think the statement hurts, because it does not concern two or three which have not been announced. If you want it on the record that is all right. It came to me from two sources.

Senator DONNELL. Those two sources are whom?

General BRADLEY. General Gruenther and General Lemnitzer.

Senator DONNELL. General Persons is sitting behind you now?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. In your prepared statement, which you gave us this morning, I notice that at page 1 you refer to the Atlantic Treaty as "a deterrent to war." That is correct, is it not?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And you regard it as a deterrent to war?

General BRADLEY. I do.

Senator DONNELL. That is the primary reason that you are favorable to it?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. In that connection, General, I want to recall to your mind this language by the President of the United States in his inaugural address, January 20 of this year:

If we can make it sufficiently clear in advance that any armed attack affecting our national security would be met with overwhelming force, the armed attack might never occur. I hope soon to send to the Senate a treaty respecting the North Atlantic security plan.

Then I would like also, before asking this question, to recall to your recollection these contents as I have them set forth in a question to Secretary Johnson, at page 373 of the record, with respect to your own Army Day address of April 6. This is what you are quoted as saying:

At present the balance of military power is centered in the United States, 3,000 miles from the heart of Europe. It must be perfectly apparent to the people of the United States that we cannot count on friends in western Europe if our strategy in the event of war dictates that we shall first abandon them to the enemy with a promise of later liberation. Yet that is the only strategy that can prevail if the military balance of power in Europe is to be counted on the wings of our bombers and deposited in reserves this side of the ocean.

Now, General, am I correct in understanding that you are indicating here, in this Army Day speech, and in your opinion that the President, when he talks in advance that any armed attack would be met with overwhelming force, am I correct in understanding that you have in mind that in order that this treaty may act as the utmost "deterrent to war," to quote your testimony this morning, that Russia should know as soon as possible that she is going to be met with such force as will prevent her from taking possession of Europe?

Is that the best possible deterrent to war, if she cannot take Europe?

WHAT CONSTITUTES A DETERRENT

General BRADLEY. The question of whether or not she can take Europe was not implied in that particular statement. The statement was that the great reserve—and by that I mean manpower and primarily, however, industrial potential—lies in the United States. No country is any stronger than its industrial capacity. At the present time we have that great potential which is a deterrent to any country if they know we are going to get into it. Particularly if we are going to have friends in it.

What I was referring to these as reserves was not only manpower but industrial capacity and potential.

Senator DONNELL. The expression "reserves this side of the ocean" does include, however, not only the industrial potential, but manpower, as you have just mentioned.

General BRADLEY. Everything which is a potential for making war.

Senator DONNELL. General, if Russia should think that she could take possession of Europe and leave the future to this process of later liberation mentioned by yourself, she would not be so much deterred as if she knew—that is, deterred from war—as if she knew in advance that there would be such an overwhelming force pitted against her at the outset that she could not take possession of Europe.

That is correct, is it not?

General BRADLEY. I would not say that the nations of this pact have the capacity today to either stop or not stop the taking of Europe by any aggressor. What you are hoping for is eventually to have those countries in such a condition that such a thing could not happen, that there would be no question about it.

Senator DONNELL. The particular point, however, that I have in mind, and I know that you were directing your answer to it, the particular point that I have in mind is this: Here we have a treaty, the purpose of which is to act as a deterrent to war, to make it concrete—whether you feel you want to say it or not, I want to say it—to make it clear to Russia that if she starts in she cannot take possession of Europe and just leave us to come back later on and by the slow process of war, liberate it.

If she thinks that she could take possession of Europe—and just leave us the slow process of future liberation—she would not be as greatly deterred from starting a war as if she knew right at the start that if she was going to start across the river she would be stopped in her tracks. Am I correct in that?

General BRADLEY. I think that is a question which cannot be answered "Yes" or "No," Senator. May I pass the answer to that. I do not think it can be answered "Yes" or "No." Whether or not they could do such a thing, and the conditions under which they can do it, get into certain questions of security which I do not believe should be discussed here.

Senator DONNELL. If it gets into questions of security I certainly shall not press it further. I want to confine my questions to questions.

I observed that some of our friends on the committee have not only asked questions, but have made statements. I want to make this very brief observation: That it would seem to me perfectly clear that if Russia knew that she could not step across the river without being ruined—in other words, she is going to be repelled—that she would be much greater deterred from starting across than if she knew she could take possession and then make us, over a period of years, perhaps, try to push her out again. That is the point to which I was getting.

I shall not push that question further, however, because of the effect on security reasons to which you refer.

OBLIGATION UNDER THE TREATY

General, I want to ask you something along this line: Senator Lodge brought out, in considerable detail, the point that this treaty does not say in any precise way or any precise time, or any precise method, or any exact time, just exactly how we are going to do all this defending and so forth.

I want to ask you, however: this treaty does create an obligation of some kind, does it not, or else we would not go into it?

General BRADLEY. Yes, but what action you take as a result of that obligation would depend upon the circumstances at that particular time, and the nature of the act.

Senator DONNELL. I can readily understand that. And I think Senator Lodge is quite correct in indicating that we cannot tell exactly, precisely when, where, how, we are going to do these things.

But the point I wanted to get perfectly clear in my own mind is whether or not you agree that the pact does create an obligation, namely, an obligation set forth in article 5, and an obligation set forth in article 3, particularly those articles referring to military matters.

I am correct, it does create an obligation in those two considerations?

General BRADLEY. To take some action. But it does not prescribe exactly what that will be.

OBLIGATION TO MAINTAIN AND DEVELOP DEFENSIVE CAPACITY

Senator DONNELL. General, in connection with article 3, the provision there is that the parties separately and jointly—in order—

by the way—

more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty—which carries us back to the objectives—

separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

Am I correct in understanding that that article is talking about maintaining and developing capacity to resist the attack by armed forces?

General BRADLEY. Not necessarily, because your potential to make war does not depend just on the number of people in your service. It depends upon your industry, the stability of your government, and of course your armed forces are included. But many things are included in your ability to resist such a moment.

Senator DONNELL. Pardon me, General. I do not think I made my question quite clear. I appreciate that, and I think that is exactly true, but what I was getting at is this: When article 3 obligates the parties separately and jointly to do certain things, to develop collective capacity to resist armed attack, the armed attack that is mentioned therein is an attack by military forces, is it not?

General BRADLEY. I would assume so.

Senator DONNELL. And at least one of the most successful methods of resisting armed attack is by military defense. That is correct, is it not?

General BRADLEY. That is one way.

Senator DONNELL. So that among the methods that are contemplated by article 3, and to which we bind ourselves to adopt, are in the instances where armed attack is made, to use military defense if that seems necessary in repelling the armed attack. Is that necessary?

General BRADLEY. It might or might not. As has been brought out here before, the methods to be used at the time would depend upon the circumstances and would be decided at the time by the Government.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

Senator DONNELL. If 500,000 troops were to enter into Norway some morning, coming over from Russia, and were making an armed attack on Norway, the normal, common-sense method of repelling that attack, the physical repulsion of it, would be by military procedure, would it not?

General BRADLEY. That is about the only way you could meet them.

Senator DONNELL. And in fact, it is the only way, is it not?

General BRADLEY. Whether or not you would do that would be decided at the time.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. But I say that is the only way that you could meet 500,000 troops, to meet them by military force; is that right?

General BRADLEY. If you want to get them out, that would be the only way to do it.

Senator DONNELL. And I understand that this treaty, by the term "restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area," indicates at least a slight desire to get them out. Is that true?

General BRADLEY. I should think so.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. Your answer was "Yes" on that one.

General, a question was asked you as to whether massed manpower is contemplated. I would like to ask you a few questions along this line. I asked some of them of Secretary Johnson the other day, and he referred me to you. I want to say, by the way, to take this opportunity to express—if I am not violating any confidence—my thanks for the fine cooperation emanating from your office, if not yourself personally, in having Major Button come in to see me and help get together whatever was necessary. I told him only in general terms what I had in mind.

NECESSITY FOR MASS MANPOWER IN WESTERN EUROPE

Are you able to say, General, first, in determining this question as to whether if Russia were to start across the Rhine, we will say, as to what military force would be necessary to prevent her from coming? I would like to know, if we can find out, about whether or not it would be necessary for United States troops to be there in addition to European troops, in order to prevent Russia from coming across.

Have you gone into that question? Or would that consideration of national security preclude discussion of that?

General BRADLEY. You certainly could not discuss any details, in answering such a question, without getting into questions of security. I doubt whether any of our people on this side have tried to make a study to determine even the number of divisions that it would take to stop a crossing of the Rhine because so much would depend upon the state of training, morale, and equipment that were available, and whether or not those divisions came from one country or three countries would not make any great difference as long as they had a division of fighting strength and equipment as we understand it.

I have never made any attempt to try to figure out the number of divisions it would require to hold the Rhine River.

Senator DONNELL. So that your office has not yet looked into the question as to whether, in order to prevent Russia from coming in and taking charge of Europe, leading us up to this slow process of liberation thereafter, your office has gone into the question of whether United States troops would be essential, in addition to the European troops. Am I correct?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. But if something happened there now we would have some divisions on the Rhine, because we have our troops in Germany.

Senator DONNELL. That is true. But I say you have not yet gone into the question of whether it would be necessary, in order to hold the Rhine against a Russian crossing, it would be necessary to have American troops in addition to European troops. Am I correct?

General BRADLEY. That is correct.

CONTRIBUTION OF OTHER SIGNATORIES

Senator DONNELL. General, in connection with the mutual aid that we are to receive, one from the other, have you looked into the question as to what amount of mutual aid Portugal, we will say, would provide in the event of an attack by Russia?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; I have no details on that.

Senator DONNELL. Or Luxemburg?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Or Denmark?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Or any of the other signatories to the pact?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

COMPARISON TO PAST MILITARY ALLIANCES

Senator DONNELL. General, referring to the question as to whether this is a military alliance or not, we find here, as I have indicated, the May 6 issue of the United States News says: "Military alliance of the United States and western Europe will be made effective."

That may be or may not be right. It is not true, General, that many of the pacts, alliances, or agreements of history have purported to be entirely defensive, and have not only purported to be but have been, as in the case of this one right here, actually contemplated as defensive pacts? Is that not true?

General BRADLEY. A lot of the combinations in the past have been for defensive purposes. Again I say I do not think this business of a definition of a military alliance means a thing. Whether it is a military alliance or not I do not think means a thing. I do not know that there is much to be gained by trying to compare this one with previous ones, because we do not know enough probably of what was in the minds of the people who made them or the people who implemented them at the proper time.

We do know that we pretty much control this one for the time being because we are the only nation of the 12 which really has any capacity at the present time. So we know that we control the results that are going to be obtained as far as any military action is going to be taken.

Senator DONNELL. I have no doubt, and I assure you that I am raising no question, as to the fact that our motive in going into this pact, the United States motive, is purely defensive, and it may be entirely so with the other nations. Of course, that does not answer the question as to the difficulties or danger, if any, that may inure.

Did you observe, General, Senator Vandenberg referring back to these other treaties in history? He said it may be necessary sometimes to go behind the text of those treaties. At least my understanding was that he was indicating that some of those pacts on their face say they were purely defensive, but he thinks we could go back of them and possibly find out that they were not.

I ask you whether or not you have gone back behind any of the texts of any of the preceding treaties to ascertain whether they were, in fact, offensive or defensive?

General BRADLEY. I have not made such a study.

COMMUNIST COUP AND ARTICLE 5

Senator DONNELL. Article 5 says:

The parties agree that an armed attack against any one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all.

Do you mind telling me whether or not you think that the term "armed attack" would include a boring from within situation, for instance, as I gather took place in Czechoslovakia? Would you think that would be an armed attack from the outside force whose interests were in boring within?

General BRADLEY. I think a situation similar to that one would be very questionable, which it was, and would have to be determined upon the merits.

I do not believe that you could say, in advance, whether or not any similar one is an armed attack or not. Normally we do not think of that as an armed attack. We think of them as an internal change of government.

Senator DONNELL. If, however, General, it were to be developed that the attempt to take over the government by, we will say troops, right there in the country, domestic troops, if it would be developed that those had been instigated by Russia on the outside, might it not be that that would constitute an armed attack by Russia?

General BRADLEY. I am not too sure that this example has application here, because in Czechoslovakia you had a condition where she was already under the domination of Russia because of occupation duties, and that condition does not exist in any of the countries we are talking about now.

Senator DONNELL. Is it not true, General, that it is at least likely that if an aggressor could do so, that instead of coming in by evident, obvious aggression from the outside, it would prefer to use the devious means of boring from within in order to accomplish the overthrow of the country into which it actually wanted to enter?

General BRADLEY. I believe that is part of the Communist doctrine.

Senator DONNELL. And such a plan as that would not, or might not, be covered at all by the Atlantic Treaty; am I correct in that?

General BRADLEY. I say that it would be questionable, and would be, in my opinion, decided upon at the time, as to whether or not it was armed aggression. Normally it would not be, in my opinion.

Senator DONNELL. I want to ask you one or two points, very briefly. And again if this is contrary to the interests of the public security, I will not push it.

Senator McMAHON. I think it ought to be stressed, General, that it might be. I am glad that you reserve that it might be.

General BRADLEY. It might be, and would be determined at the time.

Senator DONNELL. Might be what?

AIR POWER AND THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

General BRADLEY. Might be an act of aggression or might not be and would be determined by the circumstances at the time.

Senator DONNELL. General, the power of Russia is in large part due to its air power, is it not?

General BRADLEY. The power of Russia?

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir; today.

General BRADLEY. The power is included in not only air power but an army, submarines, and its total armed force.

Senator DONNELL. And air power is a very material part of that power in Russia?

General BRADLEY. It is a very material part of any power.

Senator DONNELL. Are you willing to tell us, or do you think that you should, from the standpoint of national security, whether it is contemplated that under this Atlantic Pact obligation of mutual aid, that this country is going to furnish air power to the signatories?

General BRADLEY. What do you have reference to? Furnishing air power in what means?

Senator DONNELL. I mean furnishing them with airplanes and bombers and so forth. Is there any intention to do that, in carrying out this mutual help under article 3 of the Atlantic treaty?

General BRADLEY. It is certainly not part of this pact. It may be part of the military aid program. There is nothing provided in the pact that you will give them any arms.

Senator DONNELL. There is no specific obligations, I take it. But there is an obligation, quoting from article 3, "by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid," to "maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack."

And the power of resistance to armed attack now is largely embraced in air power, is that not true?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; I would not say that is so.

Senator DONNELL. You would not say it?

NEED FOR MASS MANPOWER IN EUROPE

General BRADLEY. Not against a land force such as Russia has, if you are talking about Russia, which has a tremendous army and has also in the past been traditionally ground-minded and has usually won her wars by ground troops in conjunction with supporting air force.

Senator DONNELL. If the land force is of great importance, in favor of Russia, from her previous success in it, would it not follow, General, that it would require very large land forces in Europe to be placed there either by Europeans or the United States, or both of us, in order to repel a land force attack by Russia on Europe?

General BRADLEY. The size of that force would depend upon its training and equipment, and how good a team you had of ground troops and tactical air. Ground troops in themselves are limited in their value unless they do have that ground-air team.

When you speak of ground troops, if you are talking about effective ones, you must also include the air that works with them.

* UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES

Senator DONNELL. The United States today has 570,000 men in the Army, has it not?

General BRADLEY. A little more than that.

Senator DONNELL. Of that number approximately 400,000 are supply men and are not in divisions, is that correct?

General BRADLEY. I do not have the accurate figures with me at the present time.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know whether that is approximately correct?

General BRADLEY. If you want to get technical, sir, I would have to go into a little bit of a discussion of what we mean by a division. When you get down to a division, for example, in the last World War, you had only about 3,340 riflemen in the front line. Pretty near everything else behind that was to get those particular men forward. That included the other 11,000-plus, men in that division, plus all the corps troops, plus everything else.

So that when you talk about a division you are not talking about the ones that are included in the tables of organization of a division, but you must include everyone that supports them at the front, whether they are right with them in the division or backing them up behind. So that it is not fair to say that you have 400,000 people in supply jobs and 200,000 in divisions, or something, because they are all to support the man at the front.

The ratio of those behind and in front depends on a lot of things. How much you depend upon civilian help, and the length of your lines of communication, and a lot of other things. So I do not think it means much when you say that 400,000 are in supply and 200,000 in divisions.

It does not mean a thing because they are all necessary to carry on modern war.

Senator DONNELL. I did not mean to be technical on it. What I was getting at, is that we have about 570,000 men in the Army today, of whom about 400,000 are supply men, as distinguished from combatant forces.

General BRADLEY. I do not have the figures here. I would have to go into a definition of what you call supply troops before I could say whether your figures are right or wrong.

Senator DONNELL. The number of combatant forces in a division is about 17,000, is it not?

General BRADLEY. The present division is 18,804.

Senator DONNELL. That is all, General. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins?

Senator WATKINS. General, I have been very much interested in the argument that has been made, that had such an arrangement—

RATIO OF THE MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM TO THE EUROPEAN DEFENSE BUDGETS

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, may I interrupt just a moment? We were talking about the testimony of Mr. Acheson with regard to the budgets of the European countries who are members of this pact. I have before me here the stenographic report of his cross-examination on April 27. Senator Hickenlooper was conducting cross-examination. And then the chairman said:

Would you mind if I intervene for just a moment?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that while under the budget and this proposed bill we give them $1,130,000,000 for the next current year, their own budgets providing for arms and so on are something like six or seven times as much as that?

Secretary ACHESON. Somewhere in that neighborhood, Senator.

He did not give the exact figure, but his answer was "Somewhere in that neighborhood." I offer that because of the discussion a while ago as to where the general received his information, and I thought I had a distinct remembrance that Secretary Acheson testified to that before this committee,

That is all. Thank you, Senator. Go ahead.

DETERRENT NATURE OF THE TREATY

Senator WATKINS. General, I started to point out that I am impressed and somewhat concerned with the argument that has been presented repeatedly here, and I think was emphasized by you this morning, that had there been such an agreement or pact in existence between us and the European nations that we are now talking about, in connection with this pact, back in 1917 or back in 1914, that there possibly would not have been World War I. I understand that that was your opinion this morning.

General BRADLEY. I do not believe I mentioned World War I. I mentioned World War II specifically, I believe, in my statement.

Senator WATKINS. Of course, it has been said about World War I. But you do not think you expressed any opinion as to that?

General BRADLEY. I did not. But I would also add that in my opinion, had there been such a pact in 1914, the chances are that there would not have been a war then.

Senator WATKINS. With respect to World War II, it is your definite opinion that had there been such a pact as this, the aggressor nations would have known that they would have been met with overwhelming force, and under those circumstances they would not have attacked? Is that your opinion?

General BRADLEY. That is correct. Knowing our potential, that they would not have started a war had they been sure that we would get into it. Of course, that is merely an opinion, and it is pretty hard for anyone to say conclusively now that Hitler would not have started a war under any conditions.

Senator WATKINS. As a matter of fact, men of his type are fanatics, and they do not reason like other people, or they would not have done the things that they have been doing. Is that not right?

General BRADLEY. Yes, but even he was shrewd about some things, and he might have been convinced that he had no chance to win. Certainly some of his staff were convinced that if the United States got into it they would eventually lose it.

Senator WATKINS. But he in the final analysis, as we know now, was the man who said whether they did or did not do things.

General BRADLEY. Yes. But he undoubtedly took some advice from his staff. And of course, as I say, you cannot say conclusively that it would have prevented war. But certainly, in my opinion, it would have had a good chance of preventing a war.

Senator WATKINS. That, of course, is highly speculative, is it not, to speculate on that, and say as a matter of fact if they had been threatened with this overwhelming force, if they had been assured it would have been forthcoming, they would not have made the attack? We speculate on it. But it is difficult for us to get back into those times, we do not realize what the times were, so after all it is just a guess.

General BRADLEY. You can call it a guess. You might say it is a question of opinion. I know it is pretty much believed by the students of history that had Hitler been stopped when he marched into the Ruhr, he might have been stopped right there.

Senator WATKINS. France could have stopped him there.

General BRADLEY. And undoubtedly had we had some strong agreement between nations it would have been certainly a deterrent and make a man think twice before he pulls an aggressive act.

THE TREATY AS A PREVENTIVE

Senator WATKINS. With respect to this present pact, as I understand it, it is your firm opinion that the mere existence of the pact will be such a threat, or such an obstacle to anyone who wants to wage an aggressive war, that the thought of the overwhelming force that is committed there will stop him?

General BRADLEY. Yes. And it prevents, maybe not prevents, but at least discourages trying to pick off one at a time by armed aggression.

Senator WATKINS. And that of course is based on the assumption that if they do make an armed attack on any of these signatories to this treaty, that they will meet with overwhelming force?

General BRADLEY. That they will be faced then with some action on the part of all 12 nations.

Senator WATKINS. Anything short of force will not be much of a deterrent, will it?

General BRADLEY. Of course that is its greatest deterrent. But there are other methods that could be used. I do not know what they would be. It would depend on circumstances. Several of them have been mentioned here this morning. Sanctions, blockade, psychological warfare, and trade.

Senator WATKINS. In World War II did not Hitler and his generals and admirals all know as a matter of fact that they would be met with a blockade, and that the nations that were fighting them: France, Great Britain, and others, would have the world markets open to them and the manufacturing industry of the United States from which they could purchase weapons? They knew all those things about economics and blockade. They knew that they could get equipment, that their enemies could get equipment, did they not? They had had the experience of World War I.

General BRADLEY. Yes. However, the conditions they met in World War II were considerably different from World War I. In World War I we were furnished equipment by our allies, and in World War II we furnished it to them.

Senator WATKINS. They were furnished many other things that were necessary. We furnished the food, and they might have starved to death had they not received it.

General BRADLEY. Yes.

ECONOMIC AND MILITARY AID AND DETERRENT EFFECT

Senator WATKINS. That is as important as bullets or guns. Do you think that mere economic assistance to the signatories to this pact with us would be any deterrent in stopping a nation, say like Russia, from attacking if she really intended to attack?

General BRADLEY. It might have some.

Senator WATKINS. Would it not, as a matter of fact, require the idea that overwhelming forces would be there, before there would be any deterrent whatever to an aggressor nation as powerful as Russia is today?

General BRADLEY. Certainly military action is the biggest deterrent, the one they would fear, of course.

Senator WATKINS. That is the one they count on in the final analysis. If they do not know that there is going to be force, and plenty of it, armed force, with whatever it means, almost immediately, then there is no deterrent, is there, actually, to a nation that is well armed and has the economic resources that a nation like Russia has?

General BRADLEY. I do not believe that I am in a position to answer that, because no one knows what they are thinking about.

Senator WATKINS. I understand that. Of course you have taken the position of giving a judgment on what they are thinking. In other words, you have said to us that if they know about this overwhelming force they will not attack; it will be a deterrent. So you have to go into their minds to a certain extent to arrive at that opinion, as I understand it.

General BRADLEY. You can certainly list the pros and cons, and the things that they must take into consideration when they consider aggression. What decision they will arrive at after considering all these things that we have mentioned, only they can tell us.

NATURE OF COMMITMENT TO TAKE SOME ACTION

Senator WATKINS. As I understand it, this treaty does not bind the United States to render armed assistance. Is that your understanding of the treaty? There is no commitment to render armed assistance to our allies?

General BRADLEY. Under every circumstance, no. I do not believe it commits us to armed assistance under every condition. I think it is going to depend upon conditions at the time, and the Government will decide at that time whether or not it includes armed assistance.

Senator WATKINS. Knowing that, if the Russians or any other nation that has aggressive ideas know that it does not bind us to armed assistance, it does not bind the Congress of the United States to declare war, does not bind the United States Congress to appropriate moneys to go and fight, where would be the deterrent to that nation, knowing that the United States, under our own interpretation, takes the position that we are not bound to do anything except to consult and take probably some action short of war?

I think the war action, it is agreed by everybody, must be taken by Congress. I would like your comment on that situation.

Senator McMAHON. General, they might give us credit for having common sense.

Senator WATKINS. I appreciate the Senator's comment, but I would like to have the General's answer.

Senator McMAHON. I am going to get mine in first. I think it is in point, and probably better comes from a Senator on the committee, or another Senator, than the General.

General BRADLEY. It is pretty hard for me to tell you under what conditions this country would go to war, because you are the gentlemen who decide whether or not we use armed force, depending upon the circumstances at the time.

Senator WATKINS. I am going to the state of mind of these people that you say we will deter by reason of entering into this pact. We are going to keep them peaceful, we are going to stop their aggression, as I get it, because we have signed this treaty.

In order to arrive at that conclusion we have to do some mind studying, and I think you have done that when you indicate that your opinion is that they will stop and think twice about that.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A DETERRENT?

Now, if they take us seriously over here, that we are not bound to declare war, that Congress can exercise its own sweet will whenever that time arrives, because that power is inherent within the Constitution of the United States, and that they are not bound to appropriate money for any more than 2 years at a time, and that is in the Constitution, then knowing that, and believing that we are sincere about it, where is the strong deterring power in this pact?

General BRADLEY. I should think if they were considering the starting of a war, knowing this pact exists, and even assuming that they have read the testimony given before this committee, and have decided that we are not absolutely committed to a war in case of aggression, certainly they might guess that under certain circumstances the Congress would declare war and go to war, because we have done it twice within our lifetime under conditions which might not be too different from what you are talking about.

Regardless of whether we say absolutely that we will go to war if one man comes across the border and shoots up somebody, regardless of whether or not we say that definitely, certainly she is going to consider that there is a darned good chance that we will go to war under certain circumstances, whether or not we say it here today or say it absolutely in the law.

Senator WATKINS. As a matter of fact, I think you would agree, and I think we probably all would agree, with the hint given by Secretary Acheson, and as characterized by a radio commentator when asked whether we made any commitment or not—he did not say it, but this is a characterization of his testimony: "We sort of" made a commitment.

ADVANTAGES OF THE TREATY

It seems to me, General, that there is not any real benefit in this pact, as I look at it. If it is absolutely necessary that we have it, then I would certainly support it. But it does not seem to me that there is any benefit of this pact under modern war conditions if we have got to wait, for instance, if a nation should attack while Congress is not in session, to get them together, because under modern war conditions the blows could be struck and many of those European nations could be overtaken before we could ever get the Congress together to declare war.

COMMITMENT TO DECLARE WAR

I understand that, and I have a feeling that probably the drafters of this treaty put into this article 5 the language which seems to me creates a condition where no Congress could possibly refuse to declare war.

And they said in this first clause, the first part of that sentence:

The Parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all.

In other words, we are saying there, in effect, that an attack on London is the same as an attack on New York for the purpose of defense, or on Washington.

We all know what would happen if anybody dropped a bomb on Washington or one of the other cities of the United States. We would immediately be on our toes and fighting. It seems to me that that situation puts us in a position where no Congress or no President could ever refuse to declare war.

Some of us could say that is in the Constitution. But it seems to me we are declaring war under certain conditions by the President of the United States, because when that attack is made on London or Paris, that is an attack on us. And we have got to act just the same—if we are fair and honest about it, just the same as if they had attacked one of our cities.

I would like your comment on that situation. Am I entirely wrong in that point of view?

General BRADLEY. No, sir. I think that if they attacked England, we will say, or any other country, with a large force, you certainly would be in a situation similar to the ones you had before, and I think that the Congress would very seriously consider declaring war. However, if one stray plane came over and bombed London, or a few individuals crossed into Norway and started something, you probably would not declare war. It would depend on circumstances at the time.

COMMITMENT TO TAKE SOME ACTION IN CASE OF ATTACK

Senator WATKINS. But we are committed to some action, are we not? You go on to say, in the treaty—consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in the exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by Article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the Party or Parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other Parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

We are committed to assist, are we not?

General BRADLEY. As to whatever would be necessary at the time, possibly.

Senator WATKINS. Let us forget that. Let us get down to the point and see first if we are committed to assist, and then get into the modifications.

But we are committed to assist, in your judgment; are we not? That is a commitment that is a first commitment to assist them?

General BRADLEY. It seems to me that the definition as to when and how much you should do in going to the assistance of the members in each of these cases, depending upon the circumstances at the time, could be answered much better by the State Department than by the military. We usually go in when we are told to do so, and when our Government has said it is now time to fight.

The time to fight is not determined by us. My opinions on when we would fight and under what conditions we would fight would not be worth very much because the military has nothing to do with determining that particular time. I doubt if my opinions as to under what conditions we would fight and would not fight are worth a thing.

Senator McMAHON. That is a wonderful statement, General.

Senator WATKINS. You have given your opinion here, General, that this pact has tremendous power just in and of itself to hold back an aggressor. That part that I just read to you, down to where we would assist, is that not really a commitment that would do the very thing that you have been contending?

General BRADLEY. I am not too sure that I am following your reasoning, Senator. I am sorry. But it seems to me—and I will restate it, in different words—that by signing this pact with 11 other friendly countries who have the same ideals and the type of institutions as ours, that we are offering a common front politically, whether it is writing notes or what not, that we would take combined political action; and I think that by signing this pact we also are saying, in effect, that under certain conditions we will go to whatever steps are necessary to aid these countries. Whether or not it was military aid or some other aid, I am not in position to say.

Senator WATKINS. But we have to do something for them. We have to assist them. We are bound to do that. Is that not your interpretation?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir. I am not the one who is ever going to have any say in it. Certainly we would have to do something, according to the pact, whatever it was thought was necessary to do at that time.

Senator WATKINS. We are not going to hold a consultation about it. We say we will assist them. Then we go on to say:

* * * by taking forthwith, individually and in concert with the other Parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force.

It would just simply follow as night to day that in case of attack about the only thing that you can do when they start to attack is to use armed force. We have therefore agreed to do that, and that ought to be necessary under any reasonable interpretation of the word "necessary."

General BRADLEY. Senator, again may I say that it is not the military that is going to interpret the pact.

Senator WATKINS. I thought you were giving a sort of a broad interpretation to it when you said it was one of those kinds of an instrument that would hold the aggressor back. That is the reason I am asking these questions, to get at the facts in your mind that enabled you to form such a judgment.

General BRADLEY. The reason that I stated that is that any aggressor nation which contemplates any aggressive action against one or more of the signatories of this pact, certainly must consider the possibility that war and armed conflict will follow, in accordance with that. There is a good chance that it might follow as a result of this particular article. I do not say that it absolutely would follow. It would depend upon the circumstances. But I think any country, in weighing the pros and cons, must very seriously consider that certain action going so far would bring armed conflict, and by all 12 signatory nations. What point they would have to reach before armed action would be taken is not for me or the military to interpret.

Senator WATKINS. As a matter of fact, any guaranty that we gave them, unless it was a guaranty that we were going to come to their assistance, will not be worth a tinker's dam, will it?

UNITED STATES DEFENSIVE FRONTIERS

General, I want to go to another matter. I think you stated—if I understood you correctly, and I tried to follow you closely, because it is a matter of vital importance to us—that you took the position that our defensive frontier is in Europe, as far as going east from here is concerned; that our frontiers, the defensive frontier, I think you used that phrase, is in Europe. May I quote from the fourth page of your statement [reading]:

I assure you that our frontiers of collective defense lie in common with theirs in the heart of Europe.

Do you stand on that statement?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

Senator WATKINS. Will you tell us now where our defensive frontiers are in the Pacific? Or on the west? Of course we have a back door, and we have another shore line to defend.

General BRADLEY. We have troops in Japan, Okinawa, a few in the Philippines. I assume that you might consider that that is where it is at the present time.

Senator WATKINS. That would be our defensive frontier?

General BRADLEY. At least they are on that particular line at the present time.

Senator WATKINS. They are there, but that is not quite the answer; that is not quite responsive to what I asked. Let me put it this way—

Senator McMAHON. I think it is responsive.

Senator WATKINS. I will ask it again, if I didn't get what I wanted.

Senator McMAHON. That is exactly where we would fight, is it not?

Senator WATKINS. Do you think our defensive frontier in the Pacific, then, lies in Japan, the Philippines, and Okinawa?

General BRADLEY. As far as our present disposition of armed forces is concerned, yes.

Senator WATKINS. Looking to the future, like we are looking to the future in Europe.

General BRADLEY. Where it would be in the future would be determined not by the military but by the Government itself.

Senator WATKINS. As I understand it, when we had the Secretary of State in here, he said we have to talk to General Bradley about the military side of it, about defenses.

General BRADLEY. As far as the present situation is concerned, that is our defensive line in the Pacific.

Senator WATKINS. And you would not think that we would have to hold Japan or have a treaty of alliance with Japan, in order to have our defense over there?

General BRADLEY. Not necessarily. We have certain political obligations and commitments as a result of the last war, which puts us there. We have certain duties to carry out there under the Far Eastern Commission, and as long as those troops are there certainly that is your defensive line.

Senator WATKINS. With that I heartily agree. But I want to get your opinion, if we have a defensive frontier in the heart of Europe, I just wondered where the one in the other direction would be, and if it is in Japan, all right. It would not be in China, by any manner of means?

General BRADLEY. We have no troops in China at the present time.

Senator WATKINS. We do not have any troops in Norway, and we do not have any troops probably in France or Italy at the present time.

General BRADLEY. We have them just beyond there.

Senator WATKINS. I realize that. But it is not the intention to keep them there permanently, is it, the full 20 years of this pact?

General BRADLEY. No, sir. You notice I used the word "collective" there.

Senator WATKINS. Let us use the word "collective" on the Pacific. What about that?

General BRADLEY. If you are acting in concert with France, Luxemburg, Belgium, Netherlands, Italy, and you are acting collectively, that is where they are, in the center of Europe.

EMPHASIS ON EUROPE, NOT ON ASIA

Senator WATKINS. The thing that bothered me about this, and it is difficult for me to understand all of this situation, and that is the reason I have to ask so many questions, is what seems to me to be—maybe I am mistaken in it—it seems to me to be the view of our military and our political planners, and I mean international political planners, in a broad sense, that they are putting all their defensive eggs in one basket in Europe, and that they are rather neglecting the Pacific. I live halfway in between, or somewhere near, so it does not make an awful lot of difference as far as we are concerned from the standpoint of immediate defense.

But have you any comment to make on that, General? Can you throw any light on that situation?

General BRADLEY. No, sir. The policy of our Government toward Europe, or toward Asia, is not a proper subject for me as a military man to comment on, I do not believe, because that is the job of the Government other than the military, because the military does not set any policy, foreign policy.

WIDER AREA OF SECURITY

Senator WATKINS. From strictly a military point of view, which you can express, I think, and probably are the best expert in the country today on that, is it absolutely necessary to have our defense frontiers in Europe, in order to defend the United States?

General BRADLEY. It is certainly much better to have them there. The farther away we get a security line, the better off we are. As I see it, ECA, this pact, and future military aid, are all part of a program intended to increase our own national security.

Before the last World War we had friends in Europe who were capable of certain amounts of defense by themselves, and in addition to what we had here at home, and we had a pretty wide ocean in between. The last World War pretty much destroyed that line of defense, or line of security, which was ours through friendship, you might say, in Europe. In the meantime, the ocean in between has been narrowed because of progress and science, in aircraft particularly, so that we now find ourselves in an entirely different situation from what we had in World War II.

As I see it, this whole program of aid to Europe, our friends, is an attempt to secure our security by establishing more security than we have on this side of the ocean. And the more security we could get for ourselves or our friends on the other side, the better off we are here.

POSSIBLE COMMITMENT TO A GROUND WAR

Senator WATKINS. If we put many billions of dollars into the rearmament of our friends in Europe, it is going to strain our economy, is it not?

General BRADLEY. Undoubtedly.

Senator WATKINS. If we go on the theory that you are now talking about, of rearming them to the point where they can fight a ground war, are we not in a measure committing ourselves to a ground war, with the only possible aggressor in sight, that could be any danger to us, and I do not mind naming it, the nation of Russia? I do not know whether you want to comment on any other nation or not, but we might as well be realistic about it. You cannot by any stretch of the imagination bring any other power into the picture.

General BRADLEY. Would you repeat your question in connection with that, sir? I did not get it.

Senator WATKINS. It just slipped my mind at the moment. Are we not committing ourselves, in effect—I cannot repeat exactly—by what we do in rearming them, so that they can start the fighting there? I understand that a good defense is a good offense. Are we not committing ourselves to a ground war if war should come with Russia?

General BRADLEY. Again you are getting into definitions if you start talking about ground war. Modern war is total war, by every means that you can use, and certainly the last war was won on the ground, in the air, and on the sea. And I think any future war, while it may vary in relation to the importance of each of those from the last war, certainly it is going to involve all three again. Whether or not the preponderance will be more air or more ground—we certainly know it will not be more sea because at the present time the country you are talking about has no particular surface Navy—when you try to define a land war it is pretty difficult to confine it to any one thing.

Certainly an army cannot fight without air closely supporting it, for example, if it is going to contend with another army which is so supported. I am not too sure that I get the total import of your question. Certainly it would be desirable if the security of Europe had been built up to the point where their combined forces could stop any aggressor in his tracks, with or without any aid from us.

IS REARMING EUROPE SUFFICIENT TO DEFER-AGGRESSION?

Senator WATKINS. As a military man do you think it is possible for those nations, just by us rearming them, to stop any aggressor in his tracks, without our sending troops to help them?

General BRADLEY. Given time, yes.

Senator WATKINS. How much?

General BRADLEY. It depends upon the length of time, it would depend entirely on the rate of aid you wanted to give them, and the internal conditions, how much they want to help themselves, and as I see it, your question might vary over a very wide period. I do not believe anybody could answer it.

Senator WATKINS. The assistance we are now giving them, in addition to giving them arms and armament, without going into a pact, would that accomplish the same purpose?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Senator WATKINS. We could rearm them without going into a pact?

EFFECT OF REARMAMENT WITHOUT THE TREATY

General BRADLEY. No, sir. I do not believe it would accomplish the same thing as the two of them together, because arms in themselves are not sufficient. You must have a will to fight, morale, organization, training, collective action, in a modern war, and a lot of other things.

Mere arms aid in itself I do not believe would accomplish it because you would lose that something which would inspire them to help themselves. I do not believe that you can ever furnish them enough arms—I mean ourselves—furnish them enough to accomplish this thing. Most of these must be furnished by themselves.

And by furnishing them aid, as I see it, we are only speeding up the time when they will arrive at a condition where they can properly defend themselves. And how much you speed it up is going to depend on how much you are willing to give them year by year, and how much they do for themselves.

RELATIONSHIP OF TREATY TO MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator WATKINS. As I understand it, from what has been given to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, it has been announced that we are going to give them $1,100,000,000 in help of some kind, most of which is, as I understand it, to be in equipment.

General BRADLEY. As I understand it, that is military aid aside from this particular ratification of this pact.

Senator WATKINS. It all has to do with it. It gets its genesis, its beginning, and its authority to some extent, from this pact.

General BRADLEY. I think it is a natural sequence to this.

Senator WATKINS. Then we should get some light on it. We should not take this piecemeal. In other words, the Senate itself has to know what the over-all picture is, it has to know pretty much the same facts that you know in making up your mind and judgment.

We cannot just take one segment and say take the treaty today, and we will talk about the arms tomorrow, or some other day, and give you that information. We ought to have, do you not think, in order to make an intelligent decision and to give intelligent advice to the President, substantially the same facts before us that you have and that the President has or that the Secretary of State has, in order to make up their minds?

General BRADLEY. I believe the Secretary of State has outlined the program as far as the State Department is concerned, in that this ratification of this pact would be followed by a request from the State Department for the third step: some military aid. And I believe he has indicated to you that that military aid to these particular nations for the first year, which he would submit to you, would be in the nature of $1,100,000,000.

So that that is a sequence which I believe the State Department would follow if you ratify this pact. Then he would follow with that request for this aid.

ACTUAL COST OF THE MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Senator WATKINS. It has already been indicated, I understand, in the Foreign Relations Committee, if you can believe the present stories on it. Do you think that that is actually the price tag on the first year: $1,100,000,000? Is that what you have been asked to prepare for, to ship just that much?

General BRADLEY. That covers the amount of equipment which we think could be furnished and used during the first year after this pact was signed.

Senator WATKINS. That is at the marked-down price of about 20 percent of its actual cost?

General BRADLEY. I do not know whether you can use any percentage or not. Actually the rehabilitation and shipping costs, on an item which we will say is surplus, and we are not going to charge anything toward replacement or any of the original cost, runs between 10 to 15 percent to rehabilitate it and ship it.

Senator WATKINS. And that would be put on the books at so much against this equipment, whatever the rehabilitation cost.

General BRADLEY. I do not know what you mean by going on the books.

Senator WATKINS. You have to keep some kind of an account to know whether or not we have given them the $1,100,000,000.

General BRADLEY. The rehabilitation and cost of shipment would come out of that $1,100,000,000, yes.

Senator WATKINS. And what would be the charge against this particular activity for the goods themselves, or the equipment itself?

General BRADLEY. As I understand, there would be no charge against that $1,100,000,000 for the original cost.

Senator WATKINS. I say that they may be over and above. They may be surplus, and you declare various equipment surplus at various times.

General BRADLEY. Certainly.

ORIGINAL COST AND REHABILITATION COST

Senator WATKINS. They may be over and above our present needs, but they still cost us something; they are still worth something.

General BRADLEY. Yes; they are still worth something.

Senator WATKINS. Why should not that amount, whatever they are worth, or whatever it costs, be charged against this particular item so that the American people will know the full cost of this first year, rather than just the shipment cost, the rehabilitation cost?

General BRADLEY. That could be done, of course, at the time. You could tell them what this equipment cost originally. But I am not too sure that would mean anything and it certainly is not worth that to us today.

Senator WATKINS. Do we not have to replace it?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Senator WATKINS. Why not?

General BRADLEY. Because what we are talking about are things over and above our needs for peacetime, and for the first part of any mobilization. Collectively they might be worth a lot more to us in somebody else's hands than in a storehouse over here.

Senator WATKINS. If we get into a war, would we not eventually have to replace it?

General BRADLEY. Yes, but you would probably replace it by something newer, and better equipment, than what we were giving. That does not mean necessarily that that is an obsolete piece of equipment, or no good. But when you start out to make something new, you take advantage of all developments and research since the last war.

Senator WATKINS. I understand that. What I am trying to get at is this: Should not the American people be told what this equipment costs us, and not be led to believe, as I was for some time, that the price tag on this help was going to be $1,100,000,000? When I got to investigate it I found that was just the shipment cost, the rehabilitation cost. We are actually going to give it without making any charge against the cost of it, or any other item, except those two.

General BRADLEY. That is a policy matter which you gentlemen can determine, and at the time we finally decide how much is going to be given, if you want it we can announce the original cost of it, but I think it should be made clear if you do that, that that is not necessarily the present value of it.

If you keep it on for years and in storehouses, or out on a lot, somewhere, it may not be worth anything to anybody, whereas in this case some of this equipment adds to our own security if it is in somebody else's hands.

Senator WATKINS. Will it not deteriorate in Europe just the same as it will here if it is not used?

The CHAIRMAN. May I intervene?

General Bradley, would those matters that you are discussing in answering questions be included in the arms program? We could lay down standards in that program as to how much.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Leave it up to the War Department to say what percentage of the original cost these things are now worth at the moment.

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Some item may be worth 10 percent, another item a different percent. It would be impossible in this treaty or in the arms program itself to fix a particular valuation on any kind of equipment, but that would no doubt be covered in the arms act when it is passed; would it not?

General BRADLEY. I should think it would be, and it would be up to you gentlemen at the time as to how you want to announce it.

REPLACEMENT OF SURPLUS BY MODERN EQUIPMENT

Senator WATKINS. I may say, general, I am not blaming you for giving out this information. It was given out by some responsible Government official—I think through the Secretary of State, to the committee. I think what the people are entitled to have is what I called your attention to. I want to know how this bookkeeping arrangement is being made, because Secretary Johnson told us that you probably could give us more of the details on it. He indicated that the general statement that you made would probably be the way it would be handled.

He also told us that we were not sending them junk. He indicated it was not obsolete; that it was usable material; if we had to go into war it would become good material. And I have a feeling that probably it is just as good or better than any possible enemy would have over there at the present time. Would not that be your judgment?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

I might give you one example. Take the 90-millimeter guns, for example. We have enough of those in stock to equip a very, very large number of divisions, and supporting troops for that number of divisions. We could very easily spare a lot of those, because by the time any future war came along, and we got to a point in mobilization where we would need those extra ones, way beyond this particular number of divisions, we certainly would have developed a better gun.

So that as I see it, it does not hurt us one bit to give a certain number of those guns to somebody else who can use them in any early stage of collective security.

DEVELOPMENT OF NEW ARMS

Senator WATKINS. That brings up a question in my mind that maybe we ought to explore, and I do not know whether you can answer these questions in open session or not. You say we will develop a better gun, we will develop better planes and better ships and better equipment of all kinds, which is very good. Then just what are we developing all these better weapons against?

And that leads to the next question: Just how strong is our only strong possible opponent? I mean in military resources, in weapons, and what not. I think you know the nation I mean. If you can answer that question I would like to get an answer to it.

General BRADLEY. Certainly we would be very remiss, as your Military Establishment, if we did not take every step possible to develop new equipment and improve upon equipment from year to year so that in case of a future emergency, if one should come, we would be able to provide the best possible equipment that could be developed. We owe that to the people who are going to serve it and use it, as well as to the whole Nation.

So that we feel that we are obligated—and that is one of our duties—to carry on research and development. We would like to say that there would never be another war, and there is no use to have any armed forces or any development. But we are not sure of that. Therefore we feel it is obligatory to carry on the development.

Now, then, in answer to the first part of your question I think you would agree that we must carry that on, so that in case of a war we would have the best possible equipment to pull off the drawing board and put into production.

Senator WATKINS. I agree with you, General.

STRENGTH OF ONLY POSSIBLE AGGRESSOR

General BRADLEY. As to the second question, as to how strong any possible aggressor might be—and you mentioned Russia—I do not believe that is a question that should be answered here. Of course, we have a certain amount of information as to her present armed strength in all the services.

Senator WATKINS. That is more or less public?

General BRADLEY. No, sir; it is not public, and in general I think the fewer people who know the figures, the better off our security.

Senator WATKINS. I did not want to press it, that is the reason I put the question the way I did. But sometime, somewhere, before we vote on this treaty, I would like to have that information. Because to a certain extent it will help me to determine whether or not we need an alliance to meet whatever threat there might be.

General BRADLEY. Could I put it this way: In my opinion, whatever that strength is, if the countries of western Europe are given time, sufficient time, to accomplish economic recovery, rearming and building up their own defenses, I do believe that those western countries can stop that strength. Is that sufficient to answer your question, sir?

Senator WATKINS. It will answer it for the present. But I am still inclined to think that we ought to have some more detailed information. We can get it at some other time. I think you are the man to give it.

DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN WEAPONS BY OTHER COUNTRIES

From newspaper and magazine stories that have appeared frequently in our press, the public has been led to believe that some of our possible enemies have developed rather extraordinary weapons of various types and kinds, without naming each one. Can you give us any light on the possibility that a possible enemy may have some extraordinary weapons that might make them more formidable than they ordinarily would be?

General BRADLEY. Senator, I do not believe that is a question that ought to be answered in detail here, sir.

Senator WATKINS. Some of these questions have been submitted by some constituents that would like some answers. They are concerned about this, that is the reason I put it to you.

Here is one that I think possibly you might be able to answer. As I remember, Ambassador Bedell Smith, who is in the Army now, and was on leave for a time at the time he was Ambassador to Russia, made a speech some time ago, which as I recall was reported that he did not think the Russians had the atomic bomb at this time, but that they knew how it could be made; that they had enough secrets to know how it could be made.

Is that one of the questions you can comment on?

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is a security matter and ought not to be discussed here.

Senator WATKINS. In view of what the Ambassador said, do you—

The CHAIRMAN. The Ambassador is not on the stand.

Senator WATKINS. He is a representative of the United States Government. It has become public. I would like to know.

The CHAIRMAN. You might like to know, but I do not think it would be proper for us to call here on the General to discuss these matters which are clearly within the security range and scope. I leave it to him, though. He can answer if he wants to.

Senator WATKINS. So far as I am concerned I have already left it to him. I said and I say again that I do not ask you to give any answers that you think would endanger the security of the United States. But in view of calling that specific situation to your mind, I ask you if under those circumstances the former general of the Army, now in the Army, has made such a statement. Is there any light that you can give us on it?

General BRADLEY. I do not have the exact statement in front of me, and unless you have that exact statement I would rather not comment on it.

Senator WATKINS. That is all right, General, if you feel that way. I am not pressing. I was just wondering if there was any light you could throw on it, because a lot of people are concerned with what has been said. And if we could be enlightened it might reassure them. It might and might not, depending on what the answer would be.

General BRADLEY. As we remember that statement by the Ambassador, it was that they had the secrets of fissionable material, but they did not have the atomic bomb. I think that is the way he expressed it, but I do not have the exact statement in front of me.

Senator WATKINS. And you do not care to comment on it.

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

MILITARY STAFF ORGANIZATION UNDER THE TREATY

Senator WATKINS. To go back to the treaty for a moment, you mentioned, in the examination by the other Senators, about the council and its work in connection with the military program, the council in the Atlantic Pact nations to be set up by this treaty if and when it is ratified.

Is it your understanding that this council will have the direction of any military defense measures which the so-called alliance will undertake?

General BRADLEY. Certainly some kind of an organization must be set up to coordinate the efforts of the various nations. I should think that one of the parts of that set-up certainly would be an Atlantic Pact Council, or whatever you want to call it, which would consist of the representatives of the various governments, maybe foreign ministers of the various governments, and then whatever organization was set up under that I think would have to depend entirely on what is agreed upon by the 12 nations.

Senator WATKINS. Has it been discussed with you by the negotiators representing our country, by the State Department, as to what place the military should have in it? I mean our own military.

General BRADLEY. Of course, as your military advisers, we have thought a great deal about it, and discussed various plans that we think might be thought of. But as far as a decision is concerned upon which one of those organizations you will finally adopt, it has not been determined.

POWER OF THE COUNCIL

Senator WATKINS. Will it have power to direct the military of the various signatory nations?

General BRADLEY. The military of the various nations are controlled by their governments themselves. Certainly somebody has to do some coordinated planning, if that is what you mean.

Senator WATKINS. What I am trying to find out: Will this be the grand council if we get into a fight, this group? Will this council be the group that will direct the campaign of the generals?

General BRADLEY. Certainly some group would have to be set up to control the over-all strategy.

Senator WATKINS. Do you know whether or not it is the program to have this council do that very thing that you are talking about, rather than set up some other organization?

General BRADLEY. I think the final direction of a war would be some council set-up of military people, rather than foreign ministers. They would get their orders from the government, of course, in the over-all guidance—from the governments—but the actual planning and military strategy would be actually planned by some kind of military group.

Senator WATKINS. You can see in this treaty itself it is very vague about the council. There is nothing spelled out. I would like to know, before we go into that, what is planned.

General BRADLEY. I think the State Department would be better qualified to give you what they have in mind for an over-all organization.

Senator WATKINS. Can you give any light on it as far as what connection the military may have with it? I mean our own country and the other countries.

General BRADLEY. They would probably call some of us in to discuss various organizations for it. But the final decision would be left to the governments of the 12 nations concerned.

Senator WATKINS. Let us go over to another matter for a moment.

CONTRIBUTION OF COSIGNATORIES

As I understand it, the Atlantic Pact nations would furnish about six or seven times as much as we give to them in the way of equipment or help in the initial stages of this program, if it is finally entered into.

General BRADLEY. As the chairman read a while ago from the Secretary of State's testimony, he indicated it would be somewhere in that neighborhood of six or seven times as much as we contemplated discussing here.

Senator WATKINS. Is that your understanding, also?

General BRADLEY. Yes. I got it from that particular statement.

Senator WATKINS. In the matter of the over-all strategy and the matter of their ability to deliver on that kind of an assignment, has your organization checked to see whether or not they could do it?

General BRADLEY. No, sir.

Senator WATKINS. As I understand it, it is general information that we are now helping them to get on their feet; we are having to furnish them $5,580,000,000 in the next 15 months to help them get on their feet.

Can you see, as a military man, in connection with military planning, how they are going to supply six or seven times as much as we are going to furnish to them for this first year?

General BRADLEY. As I understood the statement of six or seven times as much referred to efforts to build up their defenses, not to expand an industry or something like that.

Senator WATKINS. I mean defenses. How are they going to have budgets of that size? Altogether they would have to have a budget, if ours was $1,100,000,000, they would have five times as much. How can they rely on us now? How can they go ahead and do those things, to carry on this particular assignment, to turn their resources, that much money, into armament?

General BRADLEY. It is not all into armaments. It is the upkeep of their military establishments, which would include pay, clothing, food for them, and so on.

Senator WATKINS. Of course, it includes many extraordinary expenditures that they would not have on just a maintenance basis, otherwise it is not really adding to the general pool for fighting, is it?

General BRADLEY. It builds up the potential to fight.

Senator WATKINS. Of course, we can keep them clothed and fed, and they will be alive when the time comes. But it does not build up weapons too much, in that proportion of 6 to 1, what we are sending.

General BRADLEY. I do not have any figures in front of me as to how they arrived at the 6 or 7 to 1. That is the State Department's figures. What they included in the amount being contributed by the various countries I have no way of knowing.

I took it that the total being spent by those countries for national defense was 6 or 7 times as much as the $1,000,000,000 that you were talking about here.

Senator WATKINS. I was quite encouraged to think that maybe under this arrangement we would not have to do all the rearmament because they are going to put up 5 or 6 to 1. Under those circumstances we might get a real contribution, but then I began to wonder how they could do it if we have to help them in these other fields so much.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask a question?

Senator WATKINS. Certainly, sir.

MAINTENANCE OF DEFENSE ESTABLISHMENTS OF COSIGNATORIES

The CHAIRMAN. These countries, even in their depressed state of their economy, have all had to maintain military establishments, have they not?

General BRADLEY. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. They have had their military budgets all along, and necessarily have to have them, not alone for defense against outside attacks, but for police powers within these countries.

Now, may I quote Secretary Acheson on this point? He was asked a question about how the recovery program and the arms program would go along. He said, and this is the Secretary I am quoting:

The first primary necessity is the economic recovery of western Europe.

That has been made very clear in a number of statements that economic recovery has priority.

That means that there are very definite limitations on the size of the military forces which western Europe can maintain, because if you withdrew greatly increased numbers of men from production and put them into military service, you would impair recovery and would impair the very ability of these nations to resist and to remain as free nations.

Therefore, the recovery comes first. That means that under the military assistance program we have started with the forces as they exist in 1950 budgets of these countries, and we are trying to give better armaments to those countries. As Senator Connally pointed out, the great bulk of this effort is being undertaken by the European countries themselves—and so on.

What I was trying to point out was that they have had to have their military establishments all along, they have had their military budgets. They could not be expected to strip themselves to the bone and have no armed forces, no armed establishment, not alone for their temporary defense but in the long run they have got to maintain that sort of an organization to ever have an army or armed forces ready for an emergency which may break upon them at any time. Is that not true?

General BRADLEY. That is true. And they have to have a certain size force for maintenance of internal security, too.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Senator.

Senator WATKINS. What the Senator has stated, of course, is enlightening. But what I want to know is, What they are to do to match the new effort we are going to make to help them? Is part of it to be considered as part of their regular budget, or are they going to add an additional budget at match what we are adding, additionally?

General BRADLEY. I do not know, sir.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE SINCE END OF WORLD WAR II

Senator WATKINS. Two of those countries—France and Great Britain—received considerable equipment from the United States during the latter part of the war; all the way through the war for Great Britain, and the latter part of the war for France. Do you know what has happened to the equipment that we left with them that they now have?

General BRADLEY. They have some of it.

Senator WATKINS. Is it usable?

General BRADLEY. Some of it.

Senator WATKINS. As I recall, the statement has been made—I am not sure about this, General, you probably have the information, but it will give you an indication of what I am driving at and what I am trying to get information on—it was said that we sold to them, by Foreign Surplus Disposal, some $10,000,000,000 worth of equipment. Do you know anything about that? Can you throw any light on that?

General BRADLEY. No, sir. I have no figures on that.

Senator WATKINS. We did sell them a lot of equipment after we pulled out? For instance, from England?

General BRADLEY. Yes. As I remember it we sold quite a number of things like trucks, tractors, and things that can be used in the peacetime economy, and in many cases they were pretty much worn, and it was a question of whether or not they were worth the expense of bringing home and storing.

We followed more or less the same policy here. We sold many things in this country to help the civilian economy.

Senator WATKINS. I understand that. What I have in mind is strictly what we disposed of overseas. As I recall, the figure I saw lately was about $10,000,000,000 of equipment at a mark-down price.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean $10,000,000,000 of original cost?

Senator WATKINS. I do not know, Senator. That is what I am trying to find out, what it really meant.

General BRADLEY. I do not have those figures. We sold such equipment not only in Europe but all over the world. We sold surplus equipment of that type. You may remember that a couple of years ago Congress passed a bill which made use of part of that money for education in the Fulbright bill. That set up funds for 15 or 20 countries where we had sold such property, and the money was used for educational purposes.

Senator WATKINS. Do you know where we can get information on that rather accurately so we could know what happened?

General BRADLEY. I do not, offhand. But if I can find out exactly what you want, we will try to get it for you.

Senator WATKINS. I would like to know what we furnished to members of this North Atlantic Pact, following the conclusion of the war, in the way of equipment that could be used for military work.

General BRADLEY. When you added the last clause on that I am not too sure.

Senator WATKINS. Then I will leave that off.

General BRADLEY. It may not be fit for military use any more, and might not have been at the time. It might have had limited military use. As I understand it, you want a list in money value of the goods turned over to the other 11 countries of this pact.

Senator WATKINS. In a general classification. I do not want you to give the detail of it, so many tractors and so much of this. I would like a general classification of what it was.

General BRADLEY. We will see if we can get that from the Foreign Liquidation Commission for you, sir.

[The committee has been informed that the Department of State is preparing this information for submission in connection with the proposed military assistance legislation.]

LOYALTY OF ALLIES

Senator WATKINS. In considering plans for conduct of a defensive war in Europe, of course you have to take into consideration many elements, including probably the loyalty of your allies who may be fighting along with you, with our divisions. How do you feel about the situation, for instance, in France and Italy, where it is said that every fourth Italian or every fourth Frenchman is a Communist?

I do not want to ask too pointed a question, but I wonder if you could throw any light on what risks we would be taking in rearming those two nations, or helping to rearm them, and what we can count on if we get into a fight?

General BRADLEY. Of course any country which tries to fight a war with any considerable percentage of her people disloyal, is working under a handicap. However, I do not believe that any percentage of people considered disloyal now can be taken as anywhere near accurate of the percentage that will be disloyal in the event of war.

A lot of people talk one way until the test comes, and then you find that they are loyal and patriotic citizens. I might cite as an example, a few years ago we had in this country a movement by the Veterans of Future Wars in which a lot of youngsters said they would not fight, yet when I got to Africa I found one of the ringleaders of that group on my staff, and he was decorated several times for bravery. It may be that a lot of these people included in the 25 percent that we talk about now would be loyal to the country when the test came.

Senator WATKINS. However, at the present moment they indicate, if you can judge by the expressions of some of their leaders, that they would not fight on the side of the United States in the event of war.

General BRADLEY. Undoubtedly there would be some such people.

Senator WATKINS. At least they would not fight with their own countries to in any way assist the United States.

General BRADLEY. If that percentage caused too much trouble, I would guess that the country concerned would have to take a realistic view of the matter and take such steps as may be necessary to cope with it.

Senator WATKINS. Can Italy be of any real assistance to us in a future war?

CONTRIBUTION OF ITALY

General BRADLEY. I would like to answer that, in general, I think they can. Specifically, I would not want to answer it here.

Senator WATKINS. I wondered in view of the past record whether or not they would be of any particular good, particularly in view of the treaty which was entered into between Italy, the United States, and the Soviet Republics, as we have limited their armament very materially, and to what is now very obsolete armament. That is one thing that prompted my question. Do you know any way whereby we could rearm them and keep within the law?

General BRADLEY. I would rather not go into that. If I might answer it in a general way, in my opinion, even under those treaty-restrictions, they can contribute something to the Atlantic Pact. However, the inclusion or exclusion of any particular country does not fall in the province of the military. That was decided on a very high government level, and the State Department decided for our Government that it was proper that they be included. Militarily I think that they are in general an asset.

Senator WATKINS. You could not answer it one way without violating security?

General BRADLEY. I would rather not answer it here, sir.

SENDING OF UNITED STATES TROOPS ABROAD

Senator WATKINS. I have noticed from time to time statements by some people who are more or less responsible, that a part of our program contemplates the sending of considerable detachments to members of the Atlantic Pact not only for the purpose of instruction but also to bolster their forces. What can you say about that, General?

General BRADLEY. If any decision has been made as to sending any particular size group and for any purpose to these nations, I do not know about it.

Senator WATKINS. It is not contemplated at the present time?

General BRADLEY. It may be on some levels—

Senator WATKINS. I mean as far as you have been advised.

General BRADLEY. Certainly we have not been in any planning for sending any particular groups. Certainly if you furnish arms aid then somebody has got to go over and see that they are properly received and distributed. But that does not come into this particular thing.

Senator WATKINS. I think, General, that this concludes most of the questions that I want to ask you. There are some that I do not know if I will be permitted to ask at someplace where you can answer, that involve security. But I want to thank you for the very gracious way you have answered my questions. I appreciate your cooperation. I want to assure you that I was trying to get information that would help me, as one Senator, to make up his mind.

General BRADLEY. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. General Bradley, the committee thanks you for your presence here and for your very able and clear statement of the issues involved in the treaty. On the questions that are outside of the treaty at the moment, on arms and so forth, we think you have made a very comprehensive and able statement. We very greatly appreciate it.

You have gone directly to the point at issue, with a great degree of clarity, and perspicacity. You have enlightened the committee, and I hope have enlightened those who are here by our courtesy.

This committee will adjourn until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning. At that time Mr. John Foster Dulles will be the first witness.

(Thereupon, at 1:20 p. m., the committee recessed, to reconvene at 10 a. m., May 4, 1949.)

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY AND TRADITIONAL MILITARY ALLIANCES

(Prepared by the Department of State)

The question has been raised whether the North Atlantic Treaty, since it envisages the use of armed force as a last resort for the suppression of acts of aggression, is a military alliance.

Throughout the course of history there have been military alliances of every conceivable type. Some have been high-minded in intent; others have been cynical steps toward aggrandizement. Some have been purely defensive in motive; others have been offensive. Some have been automatic; others have depended on the judgment of the parties. All traditional military alliances, in the accepted sense of the word, were designed to advance the respective nationalistic interests of the parties, and provided for joint military action if one of the parties in pursuit of such objectives became involved in war.

Most traditional alliances of the past, while piously denying aggressive or expansionist intentions, nevertheless made it clearly evident that the parties anticipated military action in contingencies other than defense against armed attack. Sometimes the parties to such arrangements were in a position themselves to provoke the anticipated crisis, or casus belli, if it did not otherwise arise. Typical among such treaties are the following:

1. The Act of the Holy Alliance (September 26, 1815)

This act provided that the parties "will, on all occasions and in all places, lend each other aid and assistance."

2. The Triple Alliance (Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy) May 20, 1882

"Article 4: In case a Great Power nonsignatory to the present Treaty should threaten the security of the states of one of the High Contracting Parties, and the threatened Party should find itself forced on that account to make war against it, the two others bind themselves to observe towards their Ally a benevolent neutrality. Each of them reserves to itself, in this case, the right to take part in the war, if it should see fit, to make common cause with its Ally." [Italics added.]

The terms of article 4 envisaged the possibility that one of the allies might precipitate a war under the terms of the treaty if it felt its security threatened. The obligations of the other allies in such a case were not to include entry into a war brought about in this way, but the possibility of their entry to assist an aggressive ally was specifically provided for. The text of this treaty was not published until 1920.

3. The German-Italian Treaty of February 20, 1887

"Article 3: If it were to happen that France should make a move to extend her occupation, or even her protectorate or her sovereignty, under any form whatsoever, in the North African territories, whether of the Vialayet of Tripoli or of the Moroccan Empire, and that in consequence thereof Italy, in order to safeguard her position in the Mediterranean, should feel that she must herself undertake action in the said North African territories, or even have recourse to extreme measures in French territory in Europe, the state of war which would thereby ensue between Italy and France would constitute ipso facto, on the demand of Italy and at the common charge of the two Allies, the casus foederis with all the effects foreseen by Articles II and V of the aforesaid Treaty of May 20, 1882 [the Triple Alliance], as if such an eventuality were expressly contemplated therein.

"Article 4: If the fortunes of any war undertaken in common against France should lead Italy to seek for territorial guaranties with respect to France for the security of the frontiers of the Kingdom and of her maritime position, as well as with a view to the stability of peace, Germany will present no obstacle thereto; and, if need be, and a measure compatible with circumstances, will apply herself to facilitating the means of attaining such a purpose." [Italics added.]

The terms of this treaty contemplated the possibility that Italy, in view of certain French measures in north Africa, might attack French forces in Africa or even France itself, in which case Germany would enter the war against France. German support was also promised for contemplated Italian claims for French territory along the Franco-Italian frontier. The German-Italian Treaty of 1887 was by its own terms to be kept secret and was not published until 1920.

4. The Austro-Italian Treaty of February 20, 1887

"Article 1: * * * However, if, in the course of events, the maintenance of the status quo in the regions of the Balkans or of the Ottoman coasts and islands in the Adriatic and in the Aegean Sea should become impossible, and if, whether in consequence of the action of a third Power or otherwise, Austria-Hungary or Italy should find themselves under the necessity of modifying it by a temporary or permanent occupation on their part, this occupation shall take place only after a previous agreement between the two Powers aforesaid, based upon the principle of a reciprocal compensation for every advantage, territorial or other, which each of them might obtain beyond the present status quo, and giving satisfaction to the interests and well founded claims of the two Parties." [Italics added.]

This treaty clearly envisaged the possibility of territorial changes in the Balkans and in the Adriatic and Aegean regions either by the action of nonsignatory powers or "otherwise," i. e., by the aggressive action of Austria-Hungary or Italy, if either of those powers should find itself "under the necessity of modifying" the status quo. In this case there was to be previous consultation between the two allies with a view to assuring both of them "reciprocal compensation" in territory or otherwise for the gains of either of them. The Austro-Italian Treaty of 1887 was by its own terms to be kept secret and was not published until 1920.

5. The Anglo-Japanese Alliance of January 30, 1902

"Article 1: The High Contracting Parties, having mutually recognized the independence of China and Korea, declare themselves to be entirely uninfluenced by any aggressive tendencies in either country. Having in view, however, their special interests of which those of Great Britain relate principally to China, while Japan, in addition to the interests which she possesses in China, is interested in a peculiar degree politically as well as commercially and industrially in Korea, the High Contracting Parties recognize that it will be admissible for either of them to take such measures as may be indispensable in order to safeguard those interests if threatened either by the aggressive action of any other Power, or by disturbances arising in China or Korea, and necessitating the intervention of either of the High Contracting Parties for the protection of the lives and property of its subjects.

"Article 2: If either Great Britain or Japan, in the defense of their respective interests as above described, should become involved in war with another Power, the other High Contracting Party will maintain a strict neutrality, and use its efforts to prevent other Powers from joining in hostilities against its ally.

"Article 3: If, in the above event, any other Power or Powers should join in hostilities against that ally, the other High Contracting Party will come to its assistance, and will conduct the war in common, and make peace in mutual agreement with it." [Italics added.]

This alliance envisaged the possibility of the necessity for taking "measures" which might involve one of the parties in war. Japan found its position sufficiently strengthened by the terms to the alliance to precipitate the Russo-Japanese War in 1904.

6. The Russo-Japanese Convention of June 20/July 3, 1916

"Article 1: The two High Contracting Parties, recognizing that their vital interests demand that China should not fall under the political domination of any third Power hostile to Russia or Japan, will frankly and loyally enter into communication whenever circumstances may demand, and will agree upon the measures to be taken to prevent such a situation being brought about.

"Article 2: In the event that, in consequence of the measures taken by mutual agreement as provided in the preceding article, war should be declared between one of the Contracting Parties and one of the third Powers contemplated by the preceding article, the other Contracting Party will, upon the demand of its ally, come to its aid, and in that case each of the High Contracting Parties undertakes not to make peace without a previous agreement with the other Contracting Party." [Italics added.]

This secret convention envisaged the possibility that Russia or Japan might take "measures," based upon mutual agreement, which would lead to war with another power—probably the United States—over their interests in China. In this case, providing that sufficient cooperation was forthcoming from other allies, the other party to the convention would enter the war. The terms of the treaty did not require that either of the parties be attacked, the key article having been drafted in such a way that the measures precipitating the war might very well be aggressive measures.

7. The Soviet-German Treaty of Nonaggression of August 23, 1939

"Article 1: Both High Contracting Parties obligate themselves to abstain from any act of violence, any aggressive action, and any attack on each other, either individually or jointly with other powers.

"Article 2: Should one of the High Contracting Parties become the object of belligerent action by a third power, the other High Contracting Party shall in no manner lend its support to this third power."

Secret Additional Protocol of August 23, 1939

"1. In the event of a territorial and political rearrangement in the areas belonging to the Baltic States (Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania), the northern boundary of Lithuania shall represent the boundary of the spheres of influence of Germany and the U. S. S. R. In this connection the interest of Lithuania in the Vilna area is recognized by each Party.

"2. In the event of a territorial and political rearrangement of the areas belonging to the Polish state the spheres of influence of Germany and the U. S. S. R. shall be bounded approximately by the line of the rivers Narew, Vistula, and San.

The question of whether the interests of both parties make desirable the maintenance of an independent Polish state and how such a state should be bounded can only be definitely determined in the course of further political developments." [Italics added.]

The published articles of this treaty provided merely that neither party would attack the other or lend its support to any power with which the other party might be at war. The secret additional protocol, however, envisaged major territorial "rearrangements" in eastern Europe which could take place only through Soviet or German aggressive action. These agreements led directly to the German and Soviet attacks on Poland in September 1939.

The North Atlantic Pact differs from the traditional military alliances of the past both in letter and in spirit. When one examines the terms of the North Atlantic Pact, there can be no doubt as to the character of the commitments undertaken. Specifically, the Pact forbids "the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the UN," and authorizes the use of force, in accordance with the inherent right of collective self-defense expressly recognized and preserved by article 51 of the Charter, only when a nation has completely violated the obligations of the Charter by launching an armed attack on a Party to the Treaty, and only until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

The North Atlantic Treaty is entirely free from provisions directed toward territorial changes for the benefit of its signatories. It has no clauses recognizing special interests of certain signatories. It gives no nation a "free hand" to take unspecified "measures" likely to lead to hostilities. It contains no ambiguities or evasive generalities which could possibly sanction aggressive action on the part of one of the signatories in the expectation that the resulting conflict would constitute a casus foederis. The full text has been made public, and it has no secret additional protocols.

It is inconceivable that 12 nations, all predominantly democratic in organization, could or would negotiate any secret "deals" of the type associated with many traditional bilateral alliances and ententes. The size of the membership in the North Atlantic Pact is in itself a guaranty that the pact, published to all the world, means precisely what it says.

The treaty contains no obligation to defend any territorial status quo. It does obligate the parties to assist in suppressing attempts to change the status quo by armed attack. It obligates the parties to defend the purposes and principles of the United Nations, the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of the parties and their free institutions, based upon the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law. It obligates them to act in defense of peace and security. It is directed against no one; it is directed solely against aggression. It seeks not to influence any shifting "balance of power" but to strengthen the "balance of principle."

The North Atlantic and Rio Treaties represent developments in the concept of collective security. Like the United Nations Charter, they contemplate the use of armed force only as a last resort for the suppression of acts of aggression. The first purpose of the United Nations is stated in article 1 of the Charter as being "to maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression." Article 42 authorizes the Security Council to "take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security." Article 51 provides that "nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to maintain international peace and security."

In the words of former Secretary of State Byrnes:

"We have covenanted not to use force except in the defense of law as embodied in the purposes and principles of the Charter. We intend to live up to that covenant. But as a great power and as a permanent member of the Security Council we have a responsibility to use our influence to see that other powers live up to that covenant, and that responsibility we also intend to meet. Unless the great powers are prepared to act in the defense of law, the United Nations cannot prevent war. We must make it clear in advance that we intend to act to prevent aggression, making it clear at the same time that we will not use force for any other purpose."

The North Atlantic Treaty does exactly that. In Senator Connally's words the treaty constitutes not a military alliance but "an alliance against war itself."

THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10 a. m., pursuant to adjournment on May 3, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), George, Thomas of Utah, Tydings, Green, Fulbright, Vandenberg, Wiley, Hickenlooper, and Lodge.

Also present: Senators Donnell and Watkins.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

This is the Committee on Foreign Relations, sitting in hearings on the North Atlantic Pact.

We have the pleasure to have Mr. John Foster Dulles with us, a very distinguished lawyer and great student of international affairs. Mr. Dulles has participated, I think, in all of the conferences including and following the United Nations at San Francisco. He has a very great scope of knowledge and a great reputation for his attainments. We will be glad to hear you, Mr. Dulles.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN FOSTER DULLES, MEMBER OF THE UNITED STATES DELEGATION TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. DULLES. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate very greatly this opportunity to appear before this committee to express some views I have about the Atlantic Pact. I should make clear that, although I am at the moment serving as a United States official representative to the General Assembly of the United Nations, the opinions which I here express are personal, and I do not purport in any way to speak for the administration.

Mr. Chairman, I support the Atlantic Treaty as a great historic landmark. Of course, its words do not, of themselves, create new realities. But there come moments when words that formalize an existing situation also serve to dramatize it and bring a new awareness of responsibility and of opportunity. I believe that the Atlantic Pact has that quality, or at least that it can be given that quality, and for that reason I support it.

UNITY OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC AREA

The underlying reality is that the peoples who make up the Atlantic community, the so-called west, do form a natural grouping, having much in common. When in the west that community has been imperiled from without, its members have united their blood and their treasure in a common defense. Thus the Atlantic Pact does not attempt a new and artificial creation, nor is it a mere military expedient of the hour. It reflects a natural and oft-demonstrated unity.

It may be asked, why is there occasion now to formalize unity if, in fact, it exists? There are, I think, good reasons.

In the first place, the pact is needed to eliminate doubt that the Atlantic community will act quickly and unitedly for common defense.

REMOVAL OF DOUBTS ABOUT UNITED STATES ACTIONS

There are here at home some doubts or, more accurately, some hesitations. I think there are few who, in their heart of hearts, really doubt that we would react quickly and wholly against any war-intentioned armed attack within the North Atlantic area, for that would in reality be a war against us. But some would like to put off the day of decision. The European members of the Atlantic community have considerable doubt about our intentions, and there may be doubt in the minds of potential aggressors. Such doubts and hesitations increase the risk of war, and they need to be resolved for, as this committee said a year ago, last May, "the best deterrent to aggression is the certainty that immediate and effective countermeasures will be taken."

The proposed treaty poses clearly the issue of certainty and immediacy. It says that an armed attack against one of the parties in the North Atlantic area "shall be considered an attack against them all." That seems to me to be reasonably plain English. It means, I take it, that an armed attack upon Denmark, for example, is hereafter to be treated by the United States as an attack upon it.

If there is an attack upon the United States, then something happens, and it happens surely and quickly. Of course, what happens is not necessarily war. There have been many armed incursions into United States territory and armed attacks on United States ships and planes which have been successfully countered, and security restored, by measures short of war. The Atlantic Treaty says that the countermeasures to restore the security shall be such as each party "deems necessary." Thus, each case depends on its own facts. The situation may be one that can be dealt with by Presidential action, or it may be that Congress would be called on to declare war or to declare that a state of war already existed. It is certainly not necessary that each attack should be met by counterattack of the same kind, at the same place and at the same time. Much depends on the design of the aggressor state and how, in fact, evil designs can best be parried. But, if an aggressor wants to make war, our Constitution cannot stop him. During the last 100 years, the United States has been at war with many countries. But the Spanish War is, I think, the only such war that came about through congressional declaration. In the others, the Congress found that a hostile attack had already created a state of war.

I repeat, any aggressor can make war. That choice lies with him, not with us. But this treaty, as I read it, takes away from him one choice, one tempting choice, that he used to have; that is, the choice of making war on the parties singly, one by one. If he chooses to fight one party to this pact, he must fight them all, and all at the same time.

DETERRENT TO WAR

The treaty, by saying that in words that no potential aggressor can misunderstand, greatly reduces the risk of armed attack on the North Atlantic area and thereby, in my opinion, makes a great contribution to future peace.

PROBLEM OF GERMANY

In the second place, the pact is needed to make it possible to solve the problem of Germany.

There are still 70,000,000 Germans, possessed of great qualities of industriousness, discipline, and ambition, painfully compressed in a strategic area between the east and west. The Soviet Government is making determined efforts to enlist those Germans in its service. If the Soviet now lifts the Berlin blockade, that may be an act of conciliation toward the west. I hope it is. But until that is shown by other deeds it would be wise for us to look on it as a change of Soviet method, not a change of Soviet intention.

Soviet leaders had hoped to win Germany by blockade measures that would drive the Western Allies out of Berlin and so damage their prestige that the Germans generally would accept the Soviet Union as the dominant force in Europe. That method backfired, due to the magnificent resourcefulness of the Air Force. The Western Allies hold in Berlin, and the Soviet, by attempting to starve the Germans we were feeding, lost greatly in influence in Germany. It is understandable if Soviet leaders seek a different environment which might give them a better chance of success.

Under the circumstances that exist, Germans will be strongly tempted to develop a bargaining position between east and west and they might even come into a temporary alliance with the Soviet. It has much to offer the Germans at the expense of Poland, and the Soviets and Germans, in partnership, could readily dominate the Continent.

The statesmanlike course is to provide the Germans with a decent and hopeful future within the orbit of the west. But again the Germans would be too strong for the comfort and safety of our European allies, unless the west is strengthened by the adhesion of the United States. Germans can be brought into the west if that west includes the United States. They cannot safely be brought into the west if the west does not include the United States. The Atlantic Pact will superimpose upon the Brussels Pact another western unity that is bigger and stronger, so that it does not have to fear the inclusion of Germany.

Unless the Council of Foreign Ministers can plan on that assumption, another meeting would have little chance of success. In that respect also the Atlantic Pact can make a vital contribution to peace.

ECONOMIES IN ERP AND UNITED STATES MILITARY BUDGET

In the third place, the pact is needed to make possible substantial economies both under the European recovery plan and under our military budget.

As regards the European recovery plan, that plan is abnormally costly because it has to offset fear, which paralyzes constructive effort, and disunity, which curtails economic possibilities.

Fear is rampant in western Europe. Those who are best informed do not believe that Soviet leaders actually intend an armed invasion of Europe. But Communists, in France for example, gain adherents by spreading rumors that the Red Army will soon march in. Premier Queuille told me that he estimated that nearly half of the members of the large French Communist Party had joined up merely to gain security as against that risk. Many in Europe have been thinking of how, in an emergency, to get out and how to hide away some resources abroad. Few have been concentrating on long-range creative effort.

Also, the disunity of the countries of western Europe seriously curtails their economic opportunity. There are no single markets big enough to justify the great capital investments needed to produce goods cheaply for large-scale consumption.

The Atlantic Pact should do much to abolish fear, and the Atlantic Pact plus the European recovery plan can provide a great impulse toward increased unity. That should pave the way to reducing the cost and the duration of the European recovery plan.

As regards arms expenditure, the pact should also make it possible to cut that. On the one hand its political commitment of one for all and all for one greatly reduces the risk of war. On the other hand, it combines for defense the military resources and facilities of 12 nations. It means that from now on, for example, the navy available to defend the United States is not only the United States Navy, but a combined United States, British, and French Navy. Similarly, there would be combined air and land forces and common facilities. The most effective collective defense will probably require us to build up military establishments abroad, particularly on the Continent, where a dangerous vacuum exists. But the cost of that should be more than offset by economies made possible by the pooling of defense resources.

I am well aware of the present need for a strong Military Establishment. But I am also aware of the need to avoid a rate of unproductive expenditure that may itself destroy the free institution it is designed to preserve. The political commitments of this pact appreciably reduce the risk of war. Also, the pact combines, for common defense, the resources of some 350,000,000 people. Many, here and abroad, will be skeptical that the pact is indeed a peace measure if it is made an occasion for increasing military expenditures. The pact ought to make a beginning toward realizing the Atlantic Charter promise "to lighten for peace-loving peoples the crushing burden of armament."

RISKS AND DISADVANTAGES OF THE TREATY

I have spoken of some of the reasons for the Atlantic Pact. Of course, with every great enterprise there are risks and disadvantages.

I think these should be seen and not covered up, because the risks are of such a character that if seen they can be guarded against.

In that respect I would say that first of all the pact should not be operated primarily as a military instrument.

WAR IS NOT INEVITABLE

There are those who believe that war with the Soviet Union is inevitable and that we must now concentrate on gaining tactical and strategic advantages which will help us to win that war when it comes. They would use the pact in that spirit.

I do not question the sincerity of those who hold such beliefs, but for myself I utterly reject them. I do not know of any responsible high official, military or civilian, in this Government or any other government, who believes that the Soviet now plans conquest by open military aggression. They have other and more efficient methods. If, for example, Soviet leadership, without using the Soviet Army, can win in China all that Japan there fought for so desperately and so futilely, why should Soviet leaders start a shooting war?

But if our international affairs are conducted on the assumption that war is inevitable, that fact alone will make it inevitable. Therefore, I consider it of the utmost importance that the pact should not be operated primarily as an instrument of military policy designed to win a particular war.

Of course, common defense is a usual and legitimate reason for people drawing together. One reason for the formation of our United States was that it made it possible, as said in the Federalist Papers, to "apply the resources and power of the whole to the defense of any particular part." But a purely military alliance is not conducive to peace. I hope that the Senate may see fit to register its hope that the Atlantic Pact will be operated, not as a military instrument, but as a step in a political evolution that has behind it a long and honorable history and before it a great and peaceful future.

NO DIVISION OF WORLD INTO SPHERES

The Atlantic and Rio Pacts should not be understood as tacit offers to divide the world with Soviet communism.

There is danger that these two pacts, each delineating a geographical area that cannot be attacked with impunity, will be interpreted to mean that the only major concerns of the United States are with the American Hemisphere and North Atlantic areas and that so long as they are free from attack, we are relatively indifferent to what occurs elsewhere. This interpretation, in the eyes of some, seems confirmed by our conduct in relation to the events of the Far East.

I do not believe that the lines that demark the American and Atlantic areas, shown here in your booklet, are intended to demark the limits of our vital interest, and I feel sure that that ought not to be the case. Twenty-five years ago Stalin said:

The road to victory of the revolution in the west lies through the revolutionary alliance with the liberation movement of the colonies and dependent countries.

He particularly mentioned China and India in this connection. We ought not to forget those words; at least, we ought not to forget them so long as they remain an integral part of the Soviet Communist "bible."

I know that the administration is aware of the risk of which I allude and that the President and Secretary of State have recently reasserted the concern of the United States with areas other than those marked out by the Rio and Atlantic Pacts. I believe, however, that the Congress may usefully reinforce that view and help to obviate a miscalculation so dangerous that, if it were allowed to persist, it might undo all the good otherwise potential in the pact.

NO BYPASSING OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Again, Mr. Chairman, the pact should not inaugurate a system of group consultations which would destroy the value of the United Nations as the "town meeting of the world."

There are some who argue that the Atlantic Treaty violates the United Nations Charter. I see no merit in that argument, assuming, as I do assume, that the pact is not an artificial military alliance, but a stage in a process of natural political growth. The Charter cannot stop such growth, and it does not attempt to do so.

The pact might, however, gravely impair the usefulness of the United Nations if consultations under its article 4 committed the pact members, or crystallized their views, in advance of United Nations discussion. The risk is greater because the occasions for consultation under article 4 are not merely "attacks" in the "Atlantic area" dealt with by article 5, but threats anywhere to any of the parties. Since the parties have interests and possessions throughout the world, the consultations under article 4 might relate to matters of deep concern to friendly nations of Asia, Africa, the Near East, the Pacific, and the Americas.

The United States does have a community with the west, but we have other communities as well and so many look to us for leadership that we ought not to seem to play favorites. Also, if we really believe in the United Nations, we shall, on matters which are within United Nations jurisdiction, give its processes an opportunity to influence our thought and conduct before making up our mind.

The United Nations, while weak in many respects, has shown a real capacity, through debate and exposure, to develop moral judgments that actually influence the conduct of member nations. The United Nations ought not to be weakened in this, its greatest field of usefulness.

I am confident that those who drew up the Atlantic Pact did not intend that consultations under it should encroach on the efficacy of the United Nations. But it might be useful if the Senate, in connection with the ratification of the pact, reaffirmed, as it did last year, the policy of the United States to use the United Nations to the full extent of its possibilities.

DANGER OF RELIANCE ON MATERIAL THINGS

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the pact should not lead the American people to feel that their primary reliance is in material things.

There is danger that concentration of attention upon the military aspects of the pact, following closely the authorization of new eco-conomic appropriations under the European recovery plan, my lead the American people to feel that material things are all-important. That would be a gross miscalculation.

Napoleon said that in war the material counted for one-quarter and the nonmaterial for the other three-quarters. I suppose that the disparity is even greater in a "cold" war. Certainly, events seem to prove that. Soviet communism uses largely two imponderables, hope and fear. It offers leadership to the discontented and the idealists who want to change radically the existing order, and it tries to frighten into inaction those who oppose such change. Through playing on men's hope and fears Soviet leadership has won great victories.

There was a time when the western democracies were honored throughout the world because of their dynamic pursuit of liberty, equality, and fraternity; their great experiments in political freedom and their inventiveness in providing human labor with better tools. Our American people played a leading part in that, although materially we were then a weak and debtor nation and virtually without military power. But then we were carrying on the "great American experiment", as it was known throughout the world—the great American experiment in human freedom.

It is time to recapture those qualities. For most men are not interested in defending the status quo merely because communism attacks it. They want a part in what is dynamic and creative.

We have made a beginning. The European recovery plan has given us our greatest success, not because it threw a great weight of dollars to sustain what is, but because it sought something new. The Atlantic Pact should be imbued with that framework for constructive programs that will catch men's imagination and enlist their support.

We Americans know the great possibilities that reside in Europe. Most of us derive from Europe. We have taken from Europe the conception that the individual is the highest unit of earthly value and that has made our institutions what they are. We have long shared with Europe the richness of a society that encourages individual diversification and experimentation. Our Nation would not be what it is had it not been for the Magna Carta, the industrial revolution, and the declaration of the rights of man. We want Europe, which has produced so much, to find in new unity the strength, the courage and the hope needed to make that land again a land of economic, intellectual, and spiritual richness. We want that, not merely for Europe's sake, but for the sake of all of us. Also we want western Europe to be the mighty magnet that will set up an irresistible attraction which will gradually break down the artificial barriers that now dangerously divide east and west.

That, I take it, is our vision: and because the Atlantic Pact can help to make it real, I support that pact.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

PROGRESS OF ECA

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Dulles, I notice in your testimony that you make reference a time or two to the ECA. May I ask what your general observations are, from your contacts in the United Nations, respecting the success or the nonsuccess of the ECA so far as it has progressed to date?

Mr. DULLES. I think that the ECA has done extremely well to date. So far, however, it has operated primarily as a relief operation, you might say, and I do not think it has yet completed the more constructive fundamental reforms in Europe which are needed for permanent recovery, but it has made a very good start.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true, though—and you spoke quite eloquently on the subject of material matters—that in addition to the material aid which it gives to Europe toward rebuilding its economy it does have very great value as evidence of the interest of the United States and its people in the substantial recovery of Europe and the strengthening of the forces in the countries that are associated with us in the ECA?

Mr. DULLES. It has made possible a great revival of hope in Europe. Certainly conditions in Europe now are much better than they were 2 years ago, and that improvement can be ascribed very largely, in my opinion, to the European recovery plan. Of course, most of the individual people in Europe are rather unaware of the extent to which they are the beneficiaries of the European recovery plan, so that the influence in that respect of the United States upon the people is not as great as I wish it were. It has a great influence upon top people in government and business, but unfortunately the propaganda of Soviet communism reaches down to the rank and file of the people much more effectively than anything we do under the European recovery plan.

The CHAIRMAN. One reason for that, is it not true, is of its newness? They do not realize yet. And as time goes on will not that information gradually seep down through the whole public, rather than be confined to governmental authorities? In other words, if, as a result of the ECA, conditions improve in Europe, will they not finally learn to trace that back to what we have done for them in the United States?

Mr. DULLES. I hope so, but I am not confident of that, Senator, because we deal through the ECA so much with governments. We supply wheat and flour, but the governments sell it for a going price in the market and the individual does not feel that he is getting his wheat free from the United States, or his bread free.

The CHAIRMAN. He knows he is getting his wheat, though.

Mr. DULLES. Yes, but he does not have any idea where it is coming from. It is hard to correct that. I think it is seeping down to some extent, but not to the extent which I would hope.

IMMEDIATE ACTION IN EVENT OF ATTACK

The CHAIRMAN. I notice in one paragraph in your statement you say, "The proposed treaty poses clearly the issue of certainty and immediacy." If I understand your terms, you mean the immediate necessity for acting in case of an armed attack by an aggressor, that the treaty emphasizes that and makes our joint action applicable to that sort of situation. Is that correct?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir. I used the word in, I think, the same sense that this committee used it a year ago. I tried to catch the spirit of what this committee said, and I think I was in agreement with that.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, under the treaty it will not be so easy for an aggressor to pick off one by one of the weaker countries without action by the remaining members of this treaty.

Mr. DULLES. That is the case. In the First World War and the Second World War we took about 2 years to make up our minds, during which the aggressor had great opportunity to make great gains. I would expect that this treaty would bring about an awareness in the mind of any potential aggressor that it would not have a couple of years to consolidate its position before we had carried through the great debate as to what we should do. If there is any doubt as to what we are going to do under those conditions, I think the time to debate that is now. We can afford the time to do it now; once a war starts, we can't afford to have that great debate, because it is too costly and the enemy gains too great an advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not also true that one of the main objectives of the treaty is to advise aggressors before they start an aggression that if they do start an aggression they will be faced with the combined opposition of all the signatories to this treaty, rather than a weak nation which they know they can easily overwhelm?

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

FREEDOM OF ACTION FOR EACH SIGNATORY

The CHAIRMAN. I was also interested in your statement that if there is an attack on one of these nations the Atlantic Treaty says that the countermeasures to restore the security shall be such as each party deems necessary. The committee knows something of the origin of that language and of its being placed where it is. In other words, the treaty leaves to each nation, each country, the discretion of deciding what measures it deems necessary to meet the issue provoked by the armed attack. Is it not true that there might be a great variety of factors entering into the action and into the decision—the geographical location of the countries involved, and things of that kind? But the United States, for instance, would have the right to determine its own course and the particular method in which it would meet that situation in cooperation with the other signatories to the treaty. Is that correct?

Mr. DULLES. That is my understanding, that there would, of course, be consultation, but in the last analysis the United States decides for itself what part it takes in the common defense.

As you well know, during the last war there were some nations that were at war but it was generally agreed that they could make their greatest contribution not through contributing military contingents. That was particularly true of some of the South American countries who were able to do more in an economic way than they could have done in a military way. Obviously the treaty does not attempt, in my opinion, to prescribe any military plan of action. As I said, it would be folly if the treaty were interpreted as meaning that because a certain country attacks in a certain particular way we have to respond in that particular place and in that particular manner. There is a flexibility about our strategy, which the treaty fully preserves, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. What you might properly add to that is that the treaty does not impose upon the United States any automatic obligation of going to war or declaring war on a great number of those occasions which we might otherwise; is that true?

Mr. DULLES. Certainly the treaty does not impose any automatic duty to declare war.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I mean. Of course, also, as I say, the decision as to whether or not there is war is a decision which is primarily made by the attacking party, and not by the party that is attacked.

ATTITUDE OF NON-SOVIET STATES IN EUROPE

I would like to ask you this question: Would you have any evidence or opinion that the signatures by these cosigners of this treaty will meet any resistance in countries in Europe other than those that have already spoken out on the subject? In other words, would this treaty be more or less accepted by the other European powers, leaving out the Soviet Union, which has already protested vigorously against the treaty?

Mr. DULLES. Do you mean, do I anticipate difficulty in the ratification of the pact by the other signatories?

The CHAIRMAN. No; I don't mean that. I mean the nonsignatories, other countries in Europe outside of the Soviet and its satellites. There is no opposition, is there, to speak of, that you know of?

Mr. DULLES. No. I don't know of any great criticism of the pact outside of the Soviet bloc. I have had contact with the United Nations Assembly here with the representatives of virtually all of the nations of the world, and the pact has been discussed a good deal and I have not found any sentiment running against the pact except in the Soviet bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I was directing attention to. There is no concern that it is an aggressive pact as against any of the nations of Europe, except from the Soviet Union and its satellites; is that correct?

Mr. DULLES. I think there is an assumption that it will not be operated as an aggressive pact. There is a little concern about that, but no great concern.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. You have studied the treaty, of course. Is there anything in the treaty that has any objective or purpose other than that of the common defense of this territory? Is there any suggestion of aggression on the part of the treaty signers, or of conquest, or of overextending their influence or authority, except to preserve the peace?

Mr. DULLES. There is certainly nothing in the language of the pact to suggest that. But I have had too much experience with international treaties and pacts to be wholly satisfied that one can tell by reading them just what is going to happen under them, and I personally think that it is important to make sure that the intent is to carry out that spirit of the pact. There are some people who believe that the best defense is an offense, and that they can interpret a pact which calls for defense as leading to offense. There have been a great many defensive pacts and nonaggression pacts to which the Soviet Union was a party, and they did not operate that way at all.

I am quite sure we have no intention of doing that, but, as I say here, I think that the pact should be operated, and no doubt it will be operated, by people who believe that war is not inevitable and that this pact is an instrument for peace and not an instrument for the winning of a future war.

EMPHASIS ON MILITARY ASPECTS OF TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. You mentioned arms. As I get your idea, it is that we should not emphasize or overestimate the treaty as a military instrumentality; we should not play up the military parts of it, is that correct?

Mr. DULLES. I think that if the intent of the treaty is carried out, with respect to developing a common defense, that is the most important military aspect of the pact; namely, whether the existing resources and facilities of the 12 nations will effectively be usable as a unit for common defense. If we can produce that result, then, in my opinion, the aggregate of those military resources and facilities is so great that it would permit us, I believe, to cut down very materially upon the expenditures we would otherwise have to make if our only defense was our own Military Establishment.

Now, I believe in the process that it is important to increase somewhat the military strength that exists in Europe. I am not a military person, of course, but I have talked with a great many, and the impression that I have is that it is not going to be possible to develop a military land force on the continent of Europe for a good many years which would be a serious obstacle to Russian invasion if Russia decided to do that. On the other hand, there is a great psychological value in having a little more military establishment on the Continent than is the case at the present time. They feel naked, you might say, because they virtually have no military establishment at all, and I believe, for instance, that France would feel more self-reliant and would take a more constructive part in working out some of the problems, particularly the problem of Germany, if France had some military force of its own. I think that is of greater psychological value than of military value, although, as I say, I have to qualify that as not being my own opinion, because I am not a military authority, but I have talked with military people on the Continent, both American and French and British, and that, in my opinion, is the consensus of their judgment.

PSYCHOLOGICAL EFFECT OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that one of the values of the treaty is the psychological effect, not only on the signatories but to possible aggressors, the unity of action, and so on?

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I made a very extravagant statement some time ago. I said that the treaty would be a valuable contribution even though there were no arms program under it at all, because the potentialities are there. An aggressor would know that the United States and other signatories, while maybe not acting immediately with arms aid and other things would have the possibility to go ahead much more promptly than we did in World War I and World War II. I do not advocate that. I am for the arms program.

Mr. DULLES. I entirely agree with you, Senator Connally. It has been often said, and perhaps this committee has said it, and I know at least some of the members of the committee have said it, that if it had been known in 1914 that the United Kingdom would go to war if Germany attacked France, and if it had been known in 1939 that the United States would go to war if Hitler attacked France and England, probably those wars would not have occurred.

Of course, we all know that in 1941 England was without military strength. We also know that in 1939 the United States was without actual military strength. Nevertheless we all feel that because of their potential military strength, if it had been known that they would go into the war the war might not have occurred, and that seems to me to illustrate the point that you make, that while the military aspect is, of course, important, the potential military strength is most important, coupled with confidence that it would be used.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Dulles.

COMPARISON WITH PAST MILITARY ALLIANCES

Just one other question, and then I will leave you to the other members. There is a charge by some people, at least, that this has the character of a military alliance. You are a great historian and are familiar with foreign relations over many hundreds of years. It is our contention, and that of those associated with us, that this is in no way a military alliance in the sense of the military alliances of the past 100 years. This treaty is purely one of defense. It does not contemplate conquest; it does not contemplate aggression. And is it not true that most of the old military alliances, the Holy Alliance and the alliances of Germany and the Central Powers in World War I against the other powers more or less partook of a league or an agreement that when one of the powers should go to war, regardless of the reasons for or causes of the war, the others would join. Their purposes were to strengthen themselves and to have in view military action and conquest in some cases, and things of that kind, that distinguish the military alliance from the present treaty? I would like to have your views on that.

Mr. DULLES. I do not interpret this as a military alliance. If I thought it were a military alliance I would oppose it unqualifiedly.

The distinction, it seems to me, is this, that as you say, most military alliances are made between powers as a matter of temporary expediency in pursuit of some particular ambition that one or the other of them has. This is a treaty for the common defense which grows out of a common unity and a disposition to have a common defense as has been demonstrated historically on at least two great occasions within the last 35 years, and as I say, to me it formalizes a reality in a way which makes that reality more effective, more pregnant with meaning, and more significant and more peaceful, because by formalizing it it carries more effective notice of potential aggressors and it gives a sense of unity and hope and opportunity for growth to the parties to the pact.

COMPATIBILITY WITH UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

The CHAIRMAN: Do you find any conflict between this treaty and the United Nations or, on the other hand, does not this treaty specifically recognize the overriding authority of the United Nations, and the fact that the treaty is being made in subordination to the authority of the United Nations?

Mr. DULLES. I do not consider there is any conflict at all between this treaty, the Atlantic Pact, and the United Nations Charter. I draw that conclusion not from the fact that the opening words of the Atlantic Treaty pay deference to the United Nations Charter. You could draw up a treaty which would have those words in it and which in substance would be in conflict with it. The thing, as I see it, is that this Atlantic Pact is a stage in a political evolution of a certain political grouping. During the last few days the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations have been meeting in London to decide about their relationships between themselves, and I have not heard anybody in the world suggest that the working out of that relationship with the British Commonwealth is a question which cut across in any way, or was subject to, the provisions of the United Nations Charter, because that is a natural political growth and evolution. If this treaty were essentially a military alliance, then I wouldn't care how many times it paid deference to the United Nations Charter; I would think in substance it would be violative of its spirit, if not of its words, but because I believe it is a normal political evolution, a drawing together for common defense of people who do have a community of interest, I do not think that the United Nations Charter operates against it at all.

Of course you know, from San Francisco—you and Senator Vandenberg, who worked so ardently on the thing—that it was very much in our minds that the Charter of the United Nations should not prevent things of this sort.

The CHAIRMAN. You were active in this matter?

Mr. DULLES. I helped you and Senator Vandenberg, I think, in drawing up article 51.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Dulles, you make a statement about the United Nations. You say, in article VI of your statement—

The United Nations, while weak in many respects, has shown a real capacity, through debate and exposure, to develop moral judgments that actually influence the conduct of member nations. The United Nations ought not to be weakened in this, its greatest field of usefulness.

I agree with you in that, and I want to say I am glad to have your view about the United Nations. While I personally have been disappointed because of some of its developments, because at San Francisco we all assumed that the great powers would cooperate and go along together, and while that has not been possible under the practices of the United Nations, still I do not desire to withhold from the United Nations the fact that it has accomplished many things. You point your finger to it when you speak of its real capacity in debate and exposure to develop moral judgments.

I think one of the chief values of the United Nations is its provision whereby member nations can drag out into the open controversial questions and turn the white light of publicity upon them, and to influence thereby the nations not only participating, but the formation of public opinion of the world. Is that not true?

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

I am greatly impressed by the fact that the United Nations, and particularly through its Assembly, does exert a great influence upon the actual conduct of the nations. I know so far as the United States is concerned that we have hardly ever taken a proposition in the United Nations but what we have changed it as a result of the debate and discussion and the views of other people that we heard there.

DANGER OF BYPASSING THE UNITED NATIONS

There has been no particular public discussion, so far as I know, about the scope of this article 4 of the Atlantic Pact. That could be operated, in my opinion, to cut the heart out of the United Nations. I do not think it is intended, but if it means a little group of nations representing the west are going to get together privately and make up their minds about the matters which affect the whole world, and come to the United Nations with the prearranged positions, that will take the whole value out of the United Nations, and particularly out of the United Nations Assembly, and I think it is extremely important to have that matter clarified so that the members of this Atlantic Treaty, if matters come up affecting the Far East, for example—well, that could be a matter for discussion under article 4, because, let's say, the United Kingdom has possessions in the Far East. It has Hong Kong. Suppose there is a threat to Hong Kong and we get together and have a little group discussion of the Western Powers about what to do with the great events that are occurring in the Far East. If this little group of Western Powers then comes to the United Nations, having discussed matters of very general concern, with a preconceived position, that would take out of the United Nations its greatest possibility of value through having a general discussion, and I hope and believe that it is not the intention to operate these consultations out of article 4 in a spirit to cut the heart out of the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. I may say it is not the purpose of this committee to follow such a course but, as a matter of fact, even in the absence of article 4, they might do it now.

Mr. DULLES. They might do it anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the United Nations Charter they could get together and form little groups, but that is what we are trying to prevent. It says:

The parties will consult together whenever, in the opinion of any of them, the territorial integrity, political independence or security of any of the parties is threatened.

That is undertaking, at least by limitation, to narrow the scope of any such consultations to preserving the integrity and freedom of the nations signatories to this treaty, but it gives them no more power than to consult. The treaty nowhere gives them any other authority except when one of them is the subject of an armed attack. Is that not true?

Mr. DULLES. That is quite true, except that this treaty does set up a consultative procedure and formalizes a consultative procedure which could be pretty broad, and I merely put up a red flag at that point, because I think it is a point which needs to be watched.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you are entirely correct, and so far as the committee is concerned, I feel sure that we thoroughly agree with you. This is nothing in this treaty and nothing under this treaty that will be in any wise called into operation that might impede or hinder the operations of the United Nations, and as I recall it now, there is a clause in this treaty, article 7, reading—

This treaty does not affect, and shall not be interpreted as affecting, in any way the rights and obligations under the Charter of the parties which are members of the United Nations, or the primary responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of international peace and security.

That clause was inserted in the treaty to do what you hope will be done, to preserve the integrity of the United Nations and to admonish the members that what we do shall be done in subordination to the overriding powers of the United Nations. Do you agree with that view?

Mr. DULLES. I agree with the view that that is probably the intent of that article.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

I thank you very much. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate Mr. Dulles upon what I think is a very brilliant statement, one of the best I have heard in many a day. I know he is pressed for time, because he has to return to the General Assembly of the United Nations this afternoon, and therefore I shall get out of the way for other members of the committee with just one inquiry which deals with this subject, the latest under discussion.

INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 4

I think this is the first time our attention has been drawn to article 4, and I rather agree with you that it could contain implications which certainly are not intended by its sponsors. You would not think, would you, Mr. Dulles, that there is anything in article 4 which would change in any way the limitation of obligation in respect to self-help and mutual aid within the geographical confines which the treaty itself sets up? You would not find, in article 4, any expansion of that obligation outside the area of the North Atlantic community as defined in the pact?

Mr. DULLES. Yes; I would. I am quite sure that it is not only the interpretation that I think the language carries, but I am quite certain that those in the State Department who drew up article 4 did it consciously, with the realization that the scope of article 4 is world wide, as contrasted with the Atlantic area described in article 5.

Senator VANDENBERG. I do not make myself plain. There is nothing, is there, in article 4, however broad the interpretation may be which you apply to it, which in your opinion expands the area within which we are obligated to self-help and mutual aid?

Mr. DULLES. No; nothing at all.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think it is important that that should be made plain.

I think it is also important that the other point you make regarding article 4 should be made totally plain, and I am asking you whether you think it would be sufficient in the committee report to make emphatically clear that the consultative jurisdiction is as limited as the balance of the pact. Would you consider it sufficient?

DANGER OF BLOCS WITHIN THE UN

Mr. DULLES. I think that could be adequately clarified in the committee report. I find in this Assembly work one of our greatest obstacles is the fact that certain groups of nations which think they have a rather special interest get together before the United Nations meets and comes to an agreed position. Then you have a debate and discussion which often changes the minds of several of the members of that group, and then they say, "Well, we are sorry; we can't change our minds, because we are committed, and unless we are released we have to go through with it. We are sorry, but we have taken these prior commitments," and I hope that the United States, with its tremendous responsibility as a world power and with its growing interest in Asia and the growing feeling of unity, let's say, between India and the United States, and that has grown greatly in the last 2 or 3 years—we don't want to let these nations feel that we are still just a Western Power. We are a Western Power. We have a community with the west which we can properly recognize, as we do, by this pact; but we are also a world power, and a nation like India is entitled to our ear with respect to Far Eastern matters on a basis which is just as free to them as the United Kingdom is to have access to our ears about the great problems of the Far East. That is the reason I hope that nothing will be done under this consultative machinery which will seem to have us be playing favorites with a group of Western Powers with respect to matters which are world-wide in scope and which will interest nations even more than the problems of India and Pakistan, for example, receive the interest of the Western Powers.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. I want to preface a very few questions to you by a statement that I think your statement is an admirable one on this whole subject. It is a helpful one, also, to me with respect to a very troublesome problem that has, from the beginning, disturbed me somewhat.

INTERNAL REVOLUTION AS A THREAT TO TERRITORIAL INTEGRITY

But before we go there, referring to article 4, is it at all conceivable that a member of the North Atlantic Treaty or Pact might think that an internal revolution or disturbance within its own territory did threaten its political integrity or its geographic possessions and desire consultation?

Mr. DULLES. I would think that would be a very strained interpretation of the article.

Senator GEORGE. I know it is very strained, but you do anticipate that probably some member of this pact sooner or later will make some very strained construction of it, do you not?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

Senator GEORGE. I think it is very helpful that you remind us of the fact that we ought to know that there isn't any virtue in mere language. It is, after all, what you are going to do under the treaty that counts, and it is material.

INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 4

Also, this article 4 provides for consultation, provides the machinery for it whenever there is a mere threat to the political integrity. It does not explicitly or expressly, in any part of the treaty, so far as I now recollect, bind us to do anything about it, but nevertheless if they can call us into conference and consultation because of a mere threat, and by a strained construction could even base that threat upon some internal revolution and disturbance within the territory of a member to the pact, it might be necessary to go a bit further than to put something in a report of this committee when we actually pass on this article 4.

I am not suggesting that at the moment, but I am suggesting the possibility that that might be necessary.

POSITION OF GERMANY

You point out, which I regard as most important, that this treaty makes it possible for Germany to find the way out of its present situation, and very forcefully you fortify that position. It has always been most disturbing to me to think that you do very much for the peace and security of western Europe at this present juncture in the affairs of the world, with Germany left entirely out of the picture. And yet, of course, it is a very difficult thing to get the members of this pact, if Germany should ever become a member, actively or nonactively, limited or general, to feel very secure if Germany was actually permitted to regain not merely economic strength but some military strength.

I am curious to know, do you think that this might be a way out for Germany? I know that is posing a pretty large order, but it is here.

MR. DULLES. I would not think, Senator George, that the question of the admission of Germany to the Atlantic Pact ought to come up at any time that we are now thinking about, say 5 years or more, at least. It is hard to say what might happen eventually. But the immediate problem in my opinion is, let us say, the inclusion of Germany in the Council of Europe, or in some other form of European unity that might be devised. I think that some action of that sort is absolutely essential if we are going to have peace in Europe and, indeed, if we are going to save the free institutions of Europe, because Germany is in a remarkably strong bargaining position between the east and the west. And if the Germans should decide to throw in their lot temporarily, at least, with the Soviet Union, there would be nothing left on the Continent of Europe that we could hold. The very psychological effect of that would give the Communist Parties in France and Belgium and so forth such influence that they would probably automatically almost take over.

Therefore, it is absolutely vital that we find a place for Germany which will be reasonably satisfactory and hopeful for Germany within, as I say, the orbit of the west, and not drive Germany into the arms of the Soviet Union, which would be a process which would wipe out everything we have done under the European recovery plan, not to speak of what we did in the last war. We would lose Europe if that happened. Therefore we must find a place for Germany.

Now, the other side of the picture is that Germany still is so strong potentially, with its 70,000,000 people there. There are more Germans in Germany now than there were before the war, because the Germans that were scattered around in Poland and Czechoslovakia and so forth have now all been concentrated in Germany. You have a high concentration there which is really dangerous, because of the degree of concentration, and the little periphery of countries around it—France, Belgium, and Holland—are afraid to bring that strong, powerful, highly concentrated group of people into unity with them if that is all there is to it, because they feel they would be dominated by that, and they probably would be.

Therefore, in essence, they say, "We have got to be sure that the power and the strength, the economic resources, the military power, the prestige, of the United States is tied up with us so that the package is big enough so that we can bring Germany in without Germany dominating the pact."

Senator GEORGE. I agree with you in all that you have said, or substantially, at least, with all you have said. I was intrigued by your statement, in effect, of the assurance that could be given to France, for instance, that Germany's presence in the western orbit in some way would not be disturbing if we were also a member of the pact,

POSSIBLE FUTURE GERMAN AGGRESSION

But then that brings this question: If Germany is within the western orbit, and if you can foresee a time when Germany is prepared to strike again and disposed to strike again, would that be an aggressor from without, as seems to be contemplated by the pact?

Mr. DULLES. Germany is not within the Atlantic area as now defined by the pact, so that if there—

Senator GEORGE. Not now, but we have the peace problem with Germany over and beyond this pact. We have to do something about it. I think you also very properly point out that while this pact does not affect the Far East, it is sort of a byproduct of the pact. Somebody in Europe and somebody elsewhere may say, "Are you concerned about what is going on in the Near East? Are you concerned, for instance, about what is going to happen in Japan? Because, ultimately, we have to do something with or about Japan. That seems to me to be very clear because we have too much direct responsibility there, and we certainly cannot leave that situation dangling in the Far East without very great danger to the peace and security of the world.

So I am just thinking, and I cannot help but come back to the point, that it strikes me that we are not going to do much for the peace and security of Europe unless we can do something about Germany. The thing that can be done about Germany is not very clear to my way of thinking at this time.

PEACEFUL INTENT OF THE TREATY

Now I wanted to ask you a few things about the pact. I agree with you, and it is the only reason why I would support it, that this North Atlantic Treaty, by all of its express terms, is peaceful. It has a peaceful purpose and peaceful intent. It is defensive by all of its express terms. But I also agree with you that when you come to agreements even among men, and particularly when you come to agreements between nations, you have to look much beyond the mere language and the poetry in which you may have phrased your agreement. And I wish now to ask you if this is not true, that without any regard whatever to the language that is used, the express language in the pact, should a terrific armaments race commence in Europe, will it be possible to convince the world that the object of this pact is purely peaceful, entirely peaceful, and wholly defensive in nature and character? In other words, does not the armament program directly affect the intention of the parties to this agreement, whatever we may say in the agreement? If Europe is overarmed and aided and assisted by us to overarm, it occurs to me, and I think you cannot be in great disagreement with the view, that regardless of any language in the pact, the real intent would be disclosed by what we were doing under it.

Mr. DULLES. I do not think that there is any practical risk of what you call overarming Europe. That is a very long and very expensive operation.

Senator GEORGE. I know that is very remote.

FUTURE REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

Mr. DULLES. But I would say this, Senator, that to my mind, in a sense the acid test as to the peaceful purpose of this pact is whether on the over-all basis, we begin to make some reduction of armament. Here is a pact which, as I say, does two things, if it does what its proponents claim for it. On the one hand it greatly reduces the risk of war; on the other hand it puts together the resources of 350,000,000 people for common defense. There has never been anything like that in the world before.

If our purpose is peaceful, and on the one hand we, by this pact, increase the likelihood of peace, and on the other hand greatly increase the assets available for common defense, then I think we ought to begin rather quickly to make some reduction in our own military expenditures, and I think that if that were done, that would prove to all the world the peaceful intent of this pact, that it is not designed to create an armaments race, it is not getting ready for war, not getting ready to dominate the world purely by military power. But if, after we have greatly reduced the risk of war, after we have, by a single stroke, added, let us say, a million and a half tons of United Kingdom fine naval ships to the common defense, we then go on and still pile on us billions in terms of military armament, then I think the pact will be looked upon as a military instrument and not a peace instrument.

Senator GEORGE. That has been my view of it, Mr. Dulles. I may say that I recognize this pact, by its express terms, as being motivated by a desire for peace, and I recognize also that there isn't anything necessarily implicit in the treaty that would make it a military instrumentality. But it is very easy to convert a peaceful charter or pact, or should I say "pervert" it, into a military one, and it depends entirely on what you are going to do. And it seems to me, therefore, that not only is an armament program not a necessary corollary to this North Atlantic Pact. If an armament program, however, does come along and an implementing act is passed which places a great deal of emphasis upon the rebuilding of arms in Europe, and at the same time we are not checking but expanding our defensive program here, let us say, for we always do regard our efforts as defensive, of course, we will have much difficulty in convincing the world over a long period of time that this is a wholly defensive measure that we are taking here.

I find in it the machinery set up for quite a number of things that probably some members of the North Atlantic Pact will be insisting on carrying out, not only in article 4 but elsewhere in it. The suggestion is very strong that we may be brought together to discuss, and presumably discussion implies some appropriate action may follow, the hardening of opinions which subsequently would be embarrassing in the United Nations or the Security Council, or in any of the agencies of the United Nations. Actually that consultative machinery is set up and provided expressly here. It is very difficult to escape the strong implication that at least some appropriate action may be taken as a result of consultations in the face of some threat.

EMPHASIS ON EUROPE

I think that your statement, as I have already said, is a very strong one, and I think it does point the way out for Germany in this treaty. I am equally impressed that we are going to have to find some way out for Japan, although Japan is not in this at all, but is a byproduct of an agreement which deals with belligerents and associates in the last war. It can be pretty forcefully said that in view of the importance of the Far East we have some indifference to what may be taking place there. Indeed our former ally may reach the conclusion that all the efforts that we make are to help Europe, and may say, "The United States is not concerned about what goes on in the Far East."

That is just an unfortunate byproduct of the thing. It is not in this, of course.

Mr. DULLES. The greatest single danger, in my opinion, in the Atlantic Treaty, is the fact that it draws geographic lines, and it is extremely difficult to avoid inferences being drawn from that fact, and when you draw lines like this and say "You can't step across those lines without getting into trouble," all right; then the fellow says, "Well, so long as I don't step across the line, is it all right?" And what do you say?

As I say, that is the greatest danger, and that is a danger which it will take great skill and effort to obviate, but this will be looked upon in effect as a tacit offer to divide the world, and in effect say to the Soviet Union, "Well, our two preserves are this Hemisphere, the American, and western Europe. You can't attack those with impunity. But we are not saying anything about the rest."

If that is what it means, that will encourage them to feel that they can do anything they like in the rest of the world, and if that is not our intent, that encouragement, that unintended encouragement, which may result from the pact, may lead to aggression outside of these areas which may make war more likely. That is the big problem, as I see it; the political problem that flows from the pact, and it will take, I believe, the wisdom both of the administration and of the Senate to make sure that inferences of that sort are not drawn, which, while we decrease the risk of war from events within the Atlantic area and the war, we may increase the risk of war from events outside of those areas.

Senator GEORGE. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wiley?

Senator WILEY. Mr. Dulles, I want to join my associates in complimenting you on a very helpful and constructive statement.

ALTERNATIVES TO THE PACT

In your judgment, is there any alternative except to join in the pact?

Mr. DULLES. I think that the failure of ratification of the pact would be a disaster of inexpressible proportions which would almost surely increase greatly the risk of war. That does not mean you have to ratify the pact without any expression of opinion, without attempting to influence the course of conduct which will take place under the pact. I have indicated quite a few views of that sort.

But I would say this, that a failure of ratification of the pact would strike such fear into the hearts of the people of Europe, and such encouragement to the people of the Soviet Union, that I think that very act would lost for us at a single stroke all our friends and allies in the free institutions of Europe.

Senator WILEY. Thank you.

MORALE IN EUROPE

I was very much interested in that part of your statement about what we might call almost a spiritual rebirth among the downtrodden of Europe. Would you care to amplify that and show how that very situation will add strength and direction to the pact and to the operation thereof? I got from your statement the idea that our aid gave courage and hope, and has to a large extent not only built up the material wealth of the people but it has given them a sort of spiritual cocktail, and given them what we all need, I guess. Is that correct?

Mr. DULLES. It has done a great deal along that line.

Spiritual cocktail? Some of the church people do not believe you can have a spiritual cocktail.

Senator WILEY. What do you think about it?

Mr. DULLES. I think so.

The point I was making, and the point I think you want to emphasize, is that relief which is purely material, in the form of a dole, does very little good. It may keep people bodily alive for another 24 hours or so, but life without hope and spirit is hardly worth while. And, also, merely keeping people alive on a dole basis does nothing at all to curtail the influence of communism among them. They want to be engaged in production, create things, and the important thing is that in everything we do we should tie it up, in my opinion, with some kind of an ideal that will catch their imagination.

IMPORTANCE OF SPIRITUAL INSPIRATION

I was greatly impressed last winter in France. I was out in the country with a friend and a group of French young boys went by. They were shooting rabbits, I think. They were fine, strapping looking fellows, as nice a group of young men as I have ever seen in France, and the friend who was with me said, "Those are all Communists."

I said to him, "Why are they Communists?"

He said, "Because communism gives them their only opportunity to work dynamically and creatively and to create better conditions in France."

That is where communism is getting its strength, and what we do has got to be not just passing out to people a certain number of ounces of bread a day to keep them alive, but we have got to gear our material support into ideas that catch their imagination and indicate that they can help build something new and better.

That has begun in Europe. Europe is a far more hopeful area than it was when I was there 2 years ago. That is very largely because of the help we have given, the inspiration we have given, and because of the fact that particularly under the European recovery plan it has been geared up to some new processes. They have new organizations at work. There is a beginning of unity in Europe. They are beginning to see possibilities in working out cooperatively, let us say, with Africa, where there are tremendous underdeveloped resources. They have all been thinking in terms of the East and West. Well, they cannot see much future in terms of the East and West. They have to think more in terms of North and South, and they find in Africa a kind of hinterland of Europe the way our West was to this country a few generations ago.

Things like that are instilling hope in them, and what we do we must realize has got to be not merely to help by giving them bread, not merely to help by giving them doles, but it all has to be geared to something which is going to capture their imaginations and raise their hopes.

Senator WILEY. My question is, then, that you do see a great spiritual awakening which did not exist several years ago?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

Senator WILEY. There is an esprit de corps which did not exist 2 or 3 years ago?

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

Senator WILEY. Does that mean, if and when the pact becomes a reality, there is a unity of spirit among the comakers and ourselves, that we are not simply the granary and provision merchant, but that there is, because of this rebirth, a gradual unification of the minds and hearts and souls of these people with ourselves?

Mr. DULLES. I think there is that, Senator, but that is not the kind of thing which you can do just by signing a treaty. It means that people like you and others have to speak and work for it. Maybe your committee report can bring that out.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

Senator WILEY. Just one other question: I wish you would give us a little more concretely your own ideas as to what extent there should be this arms implementation to the pact. You have told us very clearly that there is a possibility of a great misunderstanding if we go to a certain extent. I think you imply, as many people imply, that the pact itself would operate as a great torchlight to the world, that here is a unified force that means business. What should we do toward implementing it?

Mr. DULLES. Well, the pact calls for, as I see it, a common defense, a collective defense. What does that mean? That means you look over your assets and then you try to find out where they can be located to the best advantage. That is essentially a military task.

I do not know, as a resident of the State of New York, whether there are any troops in the State of New York or not, or what the defense is. I never worried about whether there was a distinctive defense of the State of New York. I have assumed that there was an effective defense of the United States, and the State of New York is part of the whole; therefore, I never concerned myself about the State of New York, and I assume the residents of the State of Wisconsin or California, and so forth, all feel the same. We never think in terms of a defense in being in each particular State.

I think after this pact comes into force we can think of defense in somewhat those terms. We have a total defense, and if this pact requires us to build up a national defense in each of the 12 countries so that each of the 12 countries will alone be able to defend itself and carry on a successful war, of course that is utter folly.

Now, in considering a total defense of the area there would, I suppose, have to be given consideration to the desirability of having a certain amount of military strength on the Continent of Europe. It may be better to have it there than have it somewhere else. I cannot judge the military factors. I can judge the psychological factors, and as I said, I am quite sure that the morale in France would be considerably improved if there were some appreciable French Army. France has been used to having an Army for a long time, and when they do not have an Army they feel kind of naked in the world, and if they could see a few soldiers marching back and forth with some modern equipment and all, their morale would be much better, and they probably would be more sensible when it came to talking about the problem of Germany, and so forth. And I can see reason for having some increased strength in France, but I would say that I would totally reject the idea that this pact requires us to develop separate national defenses in each of the 12 countries. It permits of a combined defense, and because it permits of a combined defense ought to make the aggregate cost of defense very much less than if you did have a separate 12-nation national defense.

Senator WILEY. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Dulles, I understand, from information that has been transmitted to me, that you have to leave at 12:50.

Mr. DULLES. I had hoped to catch a 1:30 plane so as to be back at some debates at Lake Success at 3 o'clock which it would be useful for me to be at. I would be glad, if the committee wants to hold me longer, to telephone New York and find out the condition of those debates on the calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. You do hope to be there at the 3 o'clock session?

Mr. DULLES. I hope to catch the 1:30 plane.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. Senator Green?

MORAL OBLIGATION TO DECLARE WAR

Senator GREEN. Your opening statement and subsequent testimony have been so comprehensive and so clear that little needs to be added, although there is one point you made that it seems to me might be amplified to the advantage of those of us who believe in the pact, and that is this: The argument against the pact is sometimes made that under article 5 an armed attack against any other nation signatory is an attack against us, and although there is no legal obligation under the pact for Congress to declare war, and under our Constitution it alone can declare war, yet there is a moral obligation because there is nothing else we can do.

You have very well said that in our history there are other measures which have been chosen other than the declaration of war or the recognition of an existing war, and I think it would be very well, in order to meet that criticism, if you would state for the record what these measures have been in the past, and what measures could be used in the future to show that Congress has a choice, and need not necessarily declare war.

Mr. DULLES. Well, it would be a rather long order, Mr. Senator, for me to recite all of the facts.

Senator GREEN. Some of them.

MEASURES SHORT OF WAR

Mr. DULLES. Some American official planes were shot down by Yugoslavia not long ago. That situation was dealt with through diplomatic channels and through the paying of indemnity, and did not involve us in war.

The Panay was bombed and sunk by a Japanese plane in 1937 or '38. Of course, we did eventually go to war against Japan. They attacked us in a way that forced war some 3 or 4 years later. But the Panay incident did not lead to war.

British gunboats have been shot and many people killed a few days ago on the Yangtze River. Nobody thinks that is going to lead to war.

The essential, Senator, in my mind, is this, that if this is a defensive pact, as I think it is, war is going to come about not because we declare war but because somebody else makes war. In other words, the choice between war and peace does not rest essentially with us. We have our Constitution, which deals with war and peace, but unfortunately that Constitution does not bind all the world and they are not bound by our rules about making war. They can make war if they want.

I recall the first conference that I attended—I was 19 years old—was the Hague Peace Conference, and I remember the Chinese delegate asked a question which at the time seemed rather amusing. He said, "Suppose one country wants to make war and the other fellow doesn't want to have war. Then what happens?"

He got a horse laugh out of that. We were dealing at that time with declarations of war and rights and duties and so forth. But the fact of the matter is that we have to judge war intent on the side of the other fellow, and if he chooses to make war upon us, nothing in our Constitution is going to keep us out of war.

Now, if it is a dubious case as to whether or not the other person is acting with war intent, then is where the question of judgment comes in, where the President has the responsibility, where the Congress has the responsibility. But if there is an attack with war intent, then Congress, I suspect, would do what it has mostly done, as I pointed out, namely, declared that a state of war existed.

CHOICE OF MEASURES

Senator GREEN. My point is that I think it is very desirable from the public standpoint to amplify the measures which might be taken as an alternative to war, either the declaration of war or the recognition of an existing war.

Mr. DULLES. So long as we have a choice, sir—the attacker may not give us any choice as to whether we have war or not, but if the nature of the attack is such that we have a choice—then obviously there is a whole series of measures in the way of breaking diplomatic relations, in the way of economic reprisals or threats of a blockade nature, and so forth. There is a whole series of measures short of war which are recognized in international law; they are recognized in the Rio Pact; they are recognized by the Charter of the United Nations. And so long as we have any choice we can use as pressure any one of those methods.

Senator GREEN. In other words, the Congress is under neither a legal nor a moral obligation, under this pact, to go to war just because an attack is made, an armed attack, against one of the other signatories.

Mr. DULLES. I agree with that.

Senator GREEN. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Dulles, I was very much impressed with your statement this morning. There are a great many questions I would like to ask you, but time has gone by so I will confine it to just one or two.

COST OF ERP

I notice on page 3 of your statement—incidentally, you have answered many questions that I was interested in—under (a) at the top of the page, that you make the statement.

The European recovery plan is abnormally costly because it has to offset fear, which paralyzes constructive effort, and disunity, which curtails economic possibilities.

I would appreciate a little amplification of that statement, if you would make it. In other words, precisely the statement that “the European recovery plan is abnormally costly because it has to offset fear.” Does that mean in dollars and cents? Does it mean in effort? What do you mean by that?

Mr. DULLES. I mean that it is abnormally costly in dollars and cents, to bring it down to its crudest terms. I personally know a good many business people in Europe who normally would be putting their money back into developing and enlarging their own plants and factories. They are not doing that to any great extent because they have been afraid of war, and they have been thinking about how they could invest some of their money abroad so that if they can escape with their families they will have some resources and foreign exchange in Spain or the United States.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. The thing that troubles me about this statement is, How does the European recovery plan, which I assume is the ECA program—

Mr. DULLES. That is right.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. How does that made it abnormally costly? How can we get along with less money than we are spending now?

Mr. DULLES. You take the precise illustration I gave. A certain concern in Europe has 100,000,000 francs which it could use in building an added plant. People are afraid to put their money in it, and they have tried to hide their money in Spain, and so forth, so if they are driven out their families will have that 100,000,000 francs there. We come along with the European recovery plan and we provide the 100,000,000 francs to build the plant. In other words, our money is replacing the money which is escaping Europe through fear.

PARALYSIS OF FEAR

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I had hoped that our establishment of the economic recovery plan would do just the opposite, and call that money back into these countries as a result of confidence established through the ECA.

Mr. DULLES. You need more than economic confidence. You need political confidence, and there has been the fear of war. If you have not been there, it is hard to appreciate the extent to which many of them have felt that the Red Army would march in almost any week, and they have been terrified. Those who could afford to do it have been keeping their children and their families away, and there has been very great fear, and I believe that if this pact mitigates that fear it will do what I have in mind.

POSSIBILITY OF DECREASING BURDEN OF ERP

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I was over practically all of Europe a year and a half ago, and I sensed that situation. I got the same sensing of the situation that you have expressed. But that leads me to this question: If we sign this pact, which I hope we do, and if we implement it with some arms stimulus, couldn't we then say that the establishment of the pact and the security which it will add to Europe's feelings there might make it very possible for us to cut down the dollars in the ECA program?

Mr. DULLES. It might make it possible?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Yes.

Mr. DULLES. I think it would make it possible. I may say that I happened to be with, in the United Nations yesterday, a representative of one of the nations which is the greatest recipient under the European recovery plan. He had it open at this page, and read that heading, and he said, "That is a very true statement which has never been adequately emphasized." You can cut down the cost greatly of the European recovery plan if this pact allays fear of a military invasion.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Then the next question obviously is, I think, Would it not be possible for us, in this appropriation for ECA, if the pact is passed and we favorably consider the arms implementation, to cut down the presently proposed appropriation in ECA for next year, in consideration of renewed morale in Europe and confidence which the pact will establish, and, also very important, considering our own economic burdens that we have internally in this country?

Mr. DULLES. I would rather not answer that question because it involves a greater knowledge than I have as to the nature of commitments that have been made and actual programs which may require stuff to be fed into pipe lines.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. One other question. At the bottom of the page, in the last paragraph on page 3, the second sentence in the last paragraph, I find this statement:

But I am also aware of the need to avoid a rate of unproductive expenditure that may itself destroy the free institutions it is designed to preserve.

I do not quite understand what is meant by "the rate of unproductive expenditure that may destroy the free institutions" we want to preserve. Is it possible we can go in there with too much money?

Mr. DULLES. I am thinking, sir, of our expenditure here at home of $15,000,000,000 for our Military Establishment, and $6,000,000,000 for the European recovery plan, which from the standpoint of our economy and free institutions is unproductive. In other words, we are drawing out of our own economy over $20,000,000,000 a year.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. May I ask you this question, then: With reference to your suggestion that renewed morale in Europe and reassurance of their security and our participation in implementing this pact no doubt will make it possible for us to reduce our own great expenditures for military matters here in this country, do you have an opinion at this time as to how soon we may be able to reduce our expenditures in this country for our own defensive program here, assuming that the European recovery program goes on at a satisfactory rate and that the pact and its implementation do create unity in Europe? Would you care to hazard a guess on how soon we can begin to reduce our own internal defensive expenditures?

Mr. DULLES. That involves technical factors which I think would make it unwise for me to attempt to say how soon, whether it could be in this year's budget or next year's budget. I would certainly hope that the constructive consequences of this pact would make themselves felt so that within a year or so the benefits I speak of we ought to begin to garner.

EVENTS IN CASE OF NONRATIFICATION BY UNITED STATES

Senator HICKENLOOPER. On page 4, about the third paragraph in item IV, there is this statement:

But if our international affairs are conducted on the assumption that war is inevitable, that fact alone will make it inevitable. Therefore, I consider it of the utmost importance that the pact should not be operated primarily as an instrument of military policy designed to win a particular war.

Would you care to give an opinion at this time of this proposition, that if we should not go into the pact at all, but merely continue on with the ECA and other things of that kind, in that case war would eventually be inevitable? I am taking into account the factor of our own institutions and our determination to defend them, and the possible encroachment of aggressors if we did not go into this pact, and what the next few years—the next 5, 10, or 15—might bring if we did not go into the pact. Would you say war might be inevitable if we did not go into the pact?

Mr. DULLES. I think war is highly probable if we do not go into the pact. I want to make clear what I mean by that. I do not think that the pact in this particular form was perhaps imperative, although I think it was desirable. But you are not now dealing with the situation as it was a year ago, before there was any discussion of a pact. You are dealing with a situation where there is a pact which has been heralded all around the world, which has been signed with solemnity by the representatives of 12 nations, so that those events have created a situation totally different from what the situation was a year ago. And one could have argued then the pros and cons of the pact with much greater freedom than you can argue them today, because there is an accomplished fact which we have to take cognizance, and if, in view of all that has now happened, there was a repudiation of this pact by the Congress, that would reflect a point of view such that other nations would change their plans, and I think it quite likely that out of that would come a war.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I would like to visit with you at great length, Mr. Dulles, because I value your opinions, but I should not impose on Senator Fulbright any longer. He is waiting.

Thank you very much.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I first would like to associate myself with what was said regarding your statement earlier. I think it is a very excellent one, and that part that you just discussed, on page 3, recalls to my mind a very excellent statement you made a year ago last January in the discussion of the ECA, I believe.

THE UNITY OF EUROPE

At that time, if I recall correctly, you said that several of the leaders of the European countries had expressed to you the view that they needed a little push toward European federation and European unity. Do you consider that this Government is giving them an adequate push in that direction, in this last year and 3 months?

Mr. DULLES. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I may say I agree with you. And I have the feeling that that has been one of the principal failures of our foreign policy.

Now, midway down the page, you say, "Also, the disunity of the countries of western Europe seriously curtails their economic opportunity." By that I take it you mean their sovereign independence which has always existed will continue to exist after this pact is made, will it not?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

Senator FULBRIGHT. And it stands as a difficulty long after the ECA is completed, which is assumed to be completed in '52. Are you still of the view that for real permanent recovery in Europe and security in Europe they should have political unification?

Mr. DULLES. I think they should have a much greater measure of political unification than they have today.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Can you suggest to this committee anything that we might do that would encourage the move toward political federation in Europe, which I believe you thought was sort of incipient a year and 3 months ago, but not much progress has been made? Can you suggest anything that our Government or this committee might do?

Mr. DULLES. Well, in my opinion, if the administration would indicate more clearly its concern about these matters, much more would happen. That is the view of important members of the European governments concerned. The expressions of opinion about the importance of this unity have not come primarily from any members of the administration. I made a speech in Paris last winter about the importance of that, which I am sure had the concurrence of Secretary Marshall. He came to the occasion on which I delivered it and added by his presence moral weight to it. But so far as I can recall, there has been no public statement made by the President or by any one of our recent Secretaries of State which indicated the concern of the United States with respect to this matter.

A good deal of progress has been made in what you might call the scenery of unity. There is very little reality that underlies it. There are great difficulties in the way, and it may be that unity will have to be achieved more along functional lines, restricted functional lines, than is the case in this country. I do believe that it is possible, through achieving a common defense under this treaty, to take a further appreciable step toward unity. We can really bring about an effective unity of the armed forces of these different countries. At present they have a committee functioning at Fontainebleau, I think it is. But again there is no real unity there. You merely have the representatives of the different countries who confer together about what shall be done with their different land and air forces, and it may be that under this Atlantic Pact a beginning can be made in giving a reality to unity which, if we make it in terms of the military establishments, could then spread to economic and political matters.

ESSENCE OF UNITY

Senator FULBRIGHT. Can you amplify a little what you mean by the realities of unity? What is the essence of federation or unification as among these countries? What is the indispensable quality?

Mr. DULLES. Well, I think that there are certain matters which are of common concern to a group of people, and I think the administration's handling of those matters ought to be in charge of a united body, whether it is a parliament or council, and so forth, which has authority to deal with the whole of the matter, and not merely with the national parts of it.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Is that equivalent to saying there must be some merger of their sovereign power.

Mr. DULLES. There must be some merger of their sovereign power, but not necessarily a total merger of their sovereign power, just as in the United States there is still a considerable measure of sovereignty that resides in the States.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That is what I mean. So long as it is nothing but a conference without any power of decision, it has not the character you speak of.

Mr. DULLES. That is right.

Senator FULBRIGHT. And up to this point you are not aware of any significant statement or little push, as you put it last year, that this Government is giving any such movement, are you?

Mr. DULLES. I know that some of the administrators of the European recovery plan are personally exerting certain influence along that line, but there has been no public weight of United States authority put behind that, so far as I am aware.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I am of exactly the same opinion, and officially the administration of the ECA denies any responsibility or interest in this phase of the problem. They have denied it before this committee. They believe and they state that that is not within their authority, and of course that has been the attitude of the Congress, too.

AMENDMENT OF ECA ACT

Mr. DULLES. I am very glad to see—I think I am correct, am I not?—that in this year's review of the ECA there was put in a more explicit statement about the policy of the United States with regard to European unity.

Senator FULBRIGHT. In brief, Mr. Dulles, if you will refresh your memory, after that language was put in by the House and the bill went to conference, that language was taken out, which I think was a great mistake. It was taken out, I assume, by the Senate conferees, because it had been put in by the House. So that we finally ended up with practically the same that we had in the original language. Is that not correct? Are you not thinking of the bill as it went to conference?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, but the very fact that that was in the bill did attract attention abroad.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Yes; but the fact that it was taken out may indicate that we have now consciously thought about it and disapprove of it. It seems to me it leaves certainly an equivocal situation which adds nothing or very little to the movement toward the political federation of Europe.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF UNIFICATION

But I agree. I think the primary responsibility is that of the Department of State to take the lead, but since they have not, and have refused to, I was wondering if there was anything that can be done to urge them along the line, which I think you have advocated now for some years. You do think that whatever we do in the military field and the economic, unless it is done in some political unity it will largely tend to be temporary?

Mr. DULLES. Yes; I think it will be largely ephemeral.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Don't you also think that one of the principal motives for proceeding along this line is the bad conditions, the fears and so on, the difficulties in the economic field, and that as we cure those by the ECA we to that extent lessen the pressure to bring about political unity? Don't you think that is just a lesson in human nature?

It will be more difficult, in other words, to urge them to a fairly radical change in their traditional battle 3 or 4 years hence than it is today? It really should have been done last year, I think, and the time is running out when we might be effective in that field. Don't you think that is the way in the past that nations or communities have responded? When everything is going fairly well they don't want to make any change.

Mr. DULLES. It is quite possible that the historian may judge that the European Recovery Act and the Atlantic Pact were the two things which prevented a unity in Europe which in the long run may be more valuable than either of them. That is a possibility. I do not think it needs to be that possibility, but it may turn out to be that.

I said in the piece I wrote a year or so ago about this subject that a crutch is a very good thing if it helps people to make a healthy recovery. It is a very bad thing if people who could recover get in the habit of leaning on it and using it indefinitely, and there is danger, of course, that what we are doing here may be a kind of a crutch that they will continue to lean on instead of doing the exercises that they need to make their own recovery.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I think that is a very excellent analogy, and while you do not want them to throw away their crutches now, at the same time there should be an insistence that the real remedy be applied. It seems to me that would be the wise policy for us to follow.

THE TREATY AND UNIFICATION

We were speaking in that connection, of course, of European unity, and you were a year ago. Do you feel that this pact, in the sense of bringing ourselves and Canada into it, may lead to a broader political unification, including all of the members of the pact, as opposed to the European? Do you feel that that is politically feasible?

Mr. DULLES. It will, I think, bring about a greater unity with respect to military establishments, and that is one important aspect of sovereignty, but I would think that the kind of unity that you are speaking of, which is envisaged indeed by the Brussels Pact, can be brought about on terms of a European unity more readily than it can be on terms of a unity that includes Canada and the United States, partially because of geographical propinquity and also because of the fact that they need the unity more than we do, so that the pressure of necessity is there. It certainly would be there if we did not relieve the necessity so that they do not feel it. But it is there.

IMPORTANCE OF UNIFICATION

Senator FULBRIGHT. In other words, the necessity at that instant is a very important element in the situation. I have felt that as a practical matter the political federation of Europe is within the realm of possibility providing this country might give it a little leadership and a little encouragement, and we have the instrumentality to give it through, particularly, the ECA, and now with this. But if our policy is negative in that respect, we just fail to get one of the principal, if not the principal, advantages out of these efforts. And I have felt for a year and a half that you were one of the principal, if not the principal, advocates of that view in which I entirely concur, and unfortunately the State Department has not, up to this moment, seen fit to agree with it.

It is my hope, and it is about the only reason I keep bringing it up, that sometime they may be converted to that view, because I think the time element is extremely important. If nothing is done until the end of ECA, in '52, the principal reason and motive for doing it, that is, necessity, will have passed, and then we will have a return to exactly the same political pattern you had prior to World War II, and if that is true, would you say there was any reason to believe the same gradual evolution toward another war would take place? Because within such a political pattern there are the germs of the same kind of conflict, are there not?

Mr. DULLES. I believe that the disunity of Europe has been the underlying reason for the recurrent war in Europe.

Senator FULBRIGHT. So if we do not cure that, we do not cure the real reason. We have only alleviated their temporary distress growing out of the war.

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

Senator FULBRIGHT. So that it seems to me the emphasis in both of these programs should always be, or the conduct of them should be, directed toward that underlying cause.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like very much to further amplify this point, but I know Mr. Dulles is anxious to leave, so that I will forego the pleasure of pursuing it in other directions in more detail.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. Dulles, we have present Senators Donnell, of Missouri, and Watkins, of Utah, who, by courtesy of the committee, are permitted to ask questions. I will turn you over to Senator Donnell.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Dulles, it happens that unfortunately for me I have an engagement that was made some weeks ago, and I am not going to be here during the examination by Senator Watkins, and I shall also attempt to make my questions very brief, so that he may have a little more time. I am sorry that he will probably not have as much time as I imagine he could very well use in most interesting questions.

I want to say, Mr. Dulles, first, that your testimony this morning, to me and I believe to others, has been quite refreshing, particularly because of the fact that, as distinguished from so much of these other witnesses, you recognize that there are risks in this Atlantic Treaty. We have had witnesses here who, one after the other, tell us that all of these dangers and possibilities and so forth do not exist, because of one reason or another.

RISKS OF THE TREATY

As I understand, and I ask you if I am correct in this, you recognize as a possibility that the pact could be operated primarily as a military instrument, and you have warned us against the advisability of so doing. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. DULLES. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. You have also recognized that the Atlantic and Rio Pacts might be understood as tacit offers to divide the world with Soviet connivance, and you have warned us against conducting ourselves so as to leave that inference. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. DULLES. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. You have also pointed out, have you not, Mr. Dulles, that article 4 of the treaty, which is the one which provides for the consultation by the parties whenever in the opinion of any of them the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any of the parties is threatened, that it would be possible that that should be construed, as I think you said, to cut the heart out of the United Nations, and you have warned us against any such conduct? Am I correct in any such understanding?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You have warned us that there is a possibility that this pact might be so operated as to lead the American people to feel that their primary reliance is in material things, and you have warned us against so conducting ourselves as to leave that inference, have you not?

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. I think you have agreed also with Senator George, that some of the parties to this pact may in the future, as you said, make very strained constructions of the obligations under the pact. You have agreed that that is entirely possible and might happen. I am correct in that understanding, am I not?

Mr. DULLES. I think I agreed with Senator George that human nature is such that if people got in a very tight spot they would try to put strained constructions on it. Whether the other parties would agree to that or not I do not think I said.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Dulles, this pact runs for 20 years, does it not?

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. And there is no provision in the pact for any termination of the pact or the obligations under the pact within that period. I am correct in that, am I not?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

DANGERS OF THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Dulles, I take it that you agree with me that many things can happen in 20 years in our governmental structure, in the attitude of the different departments of our Government. In that connection I want to ask you whether the New York Times of March 9 of this year; in an article headed "Dulles fears pact could stir Soviet; cautions against commitments that Russia may interpret as threat to homeland" quotes you correctly in this observation. This was an address made at the National Study Conference on World Order, sponsored by the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, at Cleveland:

Furthermore, history shows that whenever a nation has a great military establishment it is under a powerful temptation to rely on the use or pressure of that power to gain its ends. The greater a nation's military establishment is, the greater should be the gulf between its military leaders and those who make its national policy.

Is that a correct quotation from your observations at that time?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Dulles, in a period of 20 years, which is the period since the depression of 1929 up to now, to illustrate the length of it, it is entirely possible that different views as to whether or not the Military Establishment should rise or decrease, should increase or be minimized, might prevail. That is true, is it not?

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

OBLIGATIONS UNDER THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Dulles, this treaty does impose some kind of an obligation on the signers, does it not?

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. You mentioned on page 1 of your statement that, of course, what happens in the event of an attack is not necessarily war and, of course, obviously the illustrations that you used are apropos. You say there have been many armed incursions into United States territory and armed attacks on United States ships and planes which have been successfully countered and security restored by measures short of war. I do not know what those armed incursions into United States territory are, but I will not inquire about that for the moment.

Mr. DULLES. There have been some from Mexico.

Senator DONNELL. But not of any material nature. There have never been any instances where 100,000 or 500,000 troops have crossed our border without war resulting. In fact, we have not had any instances of that kind at all, have we?

Mr. DULLES. No.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Dulles, I want to pose to you a question which has been present and somewhat differently answered by Mr. Acheson on the one hand and Mr. Lovett on the other. That is this question: Suppose that 500,000 Russian troops were to cross the border of Norway 6 weeks after this treaty shall have been ratified, making an attack on Norway. May I ask you whether or not you would consider that to be an armed attack upon one of the signatories within the meaning of article 5?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And would understand, therefore, that that would be, by article 5, an attack which should be considered an attack against the United States?

Mr. DULLES. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. In the event of an attack against the United States by 500,000 troops who should come upon our shores some morning, would you consider that the normal thing to do would be immediately, by military force, to repel the attack if possible?

Mr. DULLES. Well, I would certainly do something about it.

Senator DONNELL. And the something you would do would be by way of military operations to the further incidence of the 500,000 troops. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. DULLES. Not necessarily.

Senator DONNELL. Can you envision a case where 500,000 troops would land on American shores with a hostile purpose and our country not take immediate action to defend our shores and to repulse that enemy?

Mr. DULLES. I certainly said we should do something about it.

Senator DONNELL. And you cannot envision any possibility that we would not immediately respond by armed force against the 500,000 troops; is that not correct?

Mr. DULLES. I certainly can envisage a possibility that we would not attempt to hurl armed force against those 500,000 men. If, for example, we had only 100,000 men available, it might be very well to march them backward instead of forward.

Senator DONNELL. But you would have in mind that so soon as possible, would you not, Mr. Dulles, this country should engage in armed military opposition to the onslaught of 500,000 hostile troops?

Mr. DULLES. I think that whether or not you have this pact, if the Soviet Union starts marching troops through Europe, that, for all practical purposes, is an attack upon the United States. We would be the only object of that attack. And I think we should do something about it.

Senator DONNELL. If we were not in the pact we would be under no obligation to do it, would we?

Mr. DULLES. No contractual obligation.

Senator DONNELL. But the fact creates a contractual obligation between us and 11 other nations, does it not?

Mr. DULLES. It does, but it creates an obligation to do what in my opinion we would do otherwise.

Senator DONNELL. Yes. In other words, the reasonable, the genuinely sound thing to do is what you think the pact creates an obligation on us to do.

Mr. DULLES. Yes.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

Senator DONNELL. And in the case, such as I have recited of 500,000 Russian troops coming into Norway, the thing that genuine, honest judgment would demand that we do would be to immediately cooperate with military force, which would mean an actual state of war. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. DULLES. I think that attack would create a state of war; yes.

Senator DONNELL. Now, with regard to the creation of the state of war, do you agree, Mr. Dulles, that if Congress were not in session the President might, if he desired, within his power as Commander in Chief, take immediate action, in compliance perhaps with this word "forthwith" in article 5, to repel that attack over in Norway? Or would he have to wait until Congress came together?

Mr. DULLES. I would think that if 500,000 Soviet troops marched into Norway and if the President were to try to send American troops to Norway to try to drive them out, he ought to have his head examined.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Dulles, suppose it became obvious that the smart thing to do was to send bombers immediately to try to do all the damage to the 500,000 troops that could be done. Is there any doubt in your mind as to the right of the President, as Commander in Chief, to take that action, even though Congress had not assembled?

Mr. DULLES. I think that certainly if the President, as Commander in Chief, under those circumstances, gave the orders, the orders would be carried out. I take it that that, however, is not your question.

Senator DONNELL. No; that is not.

THE CONSTITUTION AND ARTICLE 5 OF THE TREATY

Mr. DULLES. The question is whether constitutionally that would reside within the President's authority.

Senator DONNELL. Yes, sir; that is my question.

Mr. DULLES. I think that is an extremely difficult question to answer on the basis of the facts you give. Certainly there is, in my opinion, a constitutional power in the President to take reasonable steps to repel an attack if, for instance, Congress is not in session and not in a position to act. I think that there is an inherent right to protect the vital interests of the United States which is normally exercised by the concurrence of the President and the Congress, but where physical or practical reasons make that concurrence impossible the President has certain emergency power.

Senator DONNELL. So if New York were attacked by 500,000 troops you would have no doubt as to the power of the President, if Congress were not in session, to go ahead and protect our interests with military force?

Mr. DULLES. I think so; yes.

Senator DONNELL. And under the pact an attack on any one of the signatories is agreed to be an attack against all the signatories?

Mr. DULLES. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. I must not infringe more on Senator Watkins' time. I have already taken a little more than half the time that was available. I did want to conclude by saying that I note with much interest that you say conditions were quite different than they were a year ago because, although we were told when the Vandenberg resolution, Senate Resolution 239, was before us that the Senate would have absolute power to decide whether we should go to war or not, now we find that by reason of that act and by reason of the signature here with all that peageantry in Washington, it would be a disaster of the first magnitude if we were not to go ahead. That is not critical of your statement. I am just commenting on the situation.

I do not wish to trespass on Senator Watkins' time any more.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins?

Senator WATKINS. I want to say that I think you have given us the clearest statement that has been made here before this committee. You have, in my opinion, clarified the issues and taken away some of the fog that has been brought into this room by some of the statements we have had.

I have 8 or 10 pages of notes here that I wanted to ask you questions about. Manifestly in the 5 minutes left I can't do it. I do not like to do it under pressure, because I take it that this is one of the most important questions ever to come before the Senate of the United States and the American people.

Mr. DULLES. I agree.

Senator WATKINS. And I regard you as one of the best-qualified men to give us light and information on it, and I want to get that very light, and if I am only going to be confined to the time allotted it is going to be very difficult to do anything.

I would like to ask you this question. I think it is the only one I will ask you, under the circumstances. Can you be made available, or can you come back to this committee upon the request of the chairman for further examination and investigation?

The CHAIRMAN. That is on assumption that the chairman is going to ask him. The chairman has not promised that. It seems to me a very unreasonable request, that Mr. Dulles should return all the way here from New York simply to answer the questions of one Senator.

Senator WATKINS. That may be, but I happen to represent 600,000 people, and a lot of other Americans want some of these question brought out by people who are not already committed to this pact.

I put it this way: If the request comes, can you come back? That is what I would like to know.

The CHAIRMAN. May I intervene and suggest that I assume, Mr. Dulles, that if the Senator from Utah would desire to write you and specify these things, you would be in position to answer them in writing.

Mr. DULLES. I would be very happy to try to answer in writing any of your questions, Senator.

Senator WATKINS. That is not exactly the same as testifying under the same circumstances.

Mr. DULLES. I realize that. Naturally I would hold myself at the disposal of the committee. I hope the committee would have regard for the fact that at the moment I am engaged in the very critical phase of a very important matter before the United Nations Assembly—namely, this question of the disposal of the former Italian colonies—and I cannot be as free to absent myself as I would like to be.

Senator WATKINS. I realize that, but it may be some time before this committee finishes its hearings, and I thought some time during those hearings you might be available. Would you be willing to come?

Mr. DULLES. I would treat a request from the chairman of this committee as a virtual command.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances and the fact that I would be under pressure and have only a very few minutes to ask these questions that cover such a very important subject, I decline to question under such circumstances, and I ask now of the committee that Mr. Dulles be requested to come back at some convenient time before this hearing is finished, so that I may ask such questions as I desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator has 13 minutes at his disposal if he wants to ask any questions.

Senator WATKINS. I decline in that limited time to start in on the examination, because I cannot any more than get started. It would not be fair.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Dulles, we want to thank you very much for your presence and your admirable and comprehensive statement. You, of course, have had an exceptional opportunity to gain information and contacts and experience with these foreign problems, and we always read your views and find out your views and give them the utmost consideration, because we have high respect for the source from which they emanate.

We are obliged to you, and we hope we will not have the necessity of recalling you at any time that would interfere with your performance of the high duties and responsibilities which are imposed upon you regarding the United Nations.

Mr. DULLES. Thank you, sir. I appreciate the opportunity. I appreciate what you have said.

The CHAIRMAN. We have two witnesses scheduled for this afternoon, Mr. Clayton and Mr. Carey. The committee will take a recess at this time until 2:30 this afternoon, in this room.

(Whereupon, at 12:50 p. m., a recess was taken until 2:30 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

We have with us today Mr. Will L. Clayton, a very distinguished Texan, who is a man of wide business experience and is also familiar with foreign affairs. He was in the State Department for a number of years and was active in negotiating foreign trade agreements in conversations at Geneva, Cuba, and other places, and is intimately in touch with and familiar with our foreign relations and foreign affairs.

We are very happy to have you, Mr. Clayton, to testify on the North Atlantic Pact.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILL L. CLAYTON, VICE PRESIDENT, ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE

Mr. CLAYTON. I appreciate this opportunity of appearing before the committee. The greatest value of the Atlantic Pact lies not so much in the unification of the defensive strength of its members, valuable as that is, but in the proof which it will give to the democracies themselves that they can effectively unite, freely and openly, for peace.

For perhaps the first time in modern history, the democracies have seized the initiative by this bold stroke and have thus brought new hope and new courage to the world.

SELF-DEFENSE

Just as self-preservation is the first law of nature, intelligent self-defense should be the first order of business of a community of free nations whose independence and integrity are gravely threatened, within and without, by the menacing pressures of a powerful and ambitious dictatorship.

The separate strength of these free nations is not sufficient to resist these pressures. But their combined strength, pledged in the Atlantic Pact, will give pause to the aggressor, will impart courage to the harassed peoples of western Europe, and will afford time to consider and prepare for the larger enterprise which lies ahead.

FEDERAL UNION

For this pact is a natural and necessary step on the road to a federal union. We are in the midst of a world revolution, the implications of which are not yet fully understood. The seeds of this revolution were sown thousands of years ago when an unknown genius produced a wheel, said to be man's greatest invention. Vast reaches of time separate that event and the present state of scientific and industrial progress.

But all of us should now realize that man's victory over time and distance and matter renders completely archaic the present political and economic structure of the world. The machine has freed man of his physical handicaps, but he still remains bound by mental concepts, deeply rooted in the dead past. One machine calls for another and another, and so it will be until the end of time; and all machines cry out for freedom.

National boundaries and national sovereignties grew out of the limitations of nature on man's movements and communications; but they still remain long after man himself has broken down the barriers to his travels and to the range of his voice.

Like the old doctor in the Tale of Two Cities who continually went back to his prison job of shoemaking, long after regaining his freedom, we cannot break away from the habits and vested interests of the past.

CONTINUATION OF COLD WAR

When the Atlantic Pact is ratified, as it must be, the danger of a shooting war in the foreseeable future will have been greatly lessened; but, make no mistake about it, the cold war will go on and with perhaps greater vigor than heretofore.

Soviet Russia's principal objectives in the cold war are to frighten democratic governments into excessive expenditures for defense, and to frighten private capital and initiative so that it will not operate freely. If both objectives can be achieved, economic disintegration will likely ensue. Economic disintegration is usually followed by political disintegration.

Soviet Russia is a past master at this type of warfare; she wages it on all fronts simultaneously, and at relatively small cost to herself. The cost to the democracies, on the other hand, is enormous.

We have won the battle of Berlin because that was a problem in transportation, a field in which we excel. But we have not won the battle of Greece, although we will soon have sunk a billion dollars there. The battle of the Middle East is still to be fought. And we have practically lost the battle of China and with it probably the entire Pacific area, so vital to our interests and security.

The mainland of Asia can live without Japan, but Japan cannot live without the mainland, except by the indefinite use of great sums of United States money, and probably of United States troops.

I read this morning in the Washington Post a very interesting article from Tokyo by Joseph Alsop. I think it is well worth reading.

Yesterday General Bradley, I believe, spoke of the fact that our frontier is in the Pacific—as long as we have troops in Japan and the Philippines and other nearby areas. Of course, I think we would all agree with that. But if the mainland of Asia falls to the Communists, we will maintain that frontier with a great deal of expense.

We have not as yet won the battle of western Europe. The cold war is still raging there. Billions of private capital and the creative genius and activity of its owners remain in hiding because of the danger of war and the fear of the integrity of certain European currencies.

Governments have thus been compelled to undertake the greater part of the job of recovery. But if western Europe is to be restored to a condition of financial independence and a decent standard of living, the job must be done largely by private enterprise. Government cannot do it.

IMPROVEMENTS IN WESTERN EUROPE

Mr. Dulles this morning spoke very well indeed of the handicaps that we find in Europe due to the fear that people have of war. He did not speak of the fear that they also have regarding the integrity of certain currencies, but that also exists. Private capital and private initiative and private enterprise are enormously retarded and handicapped in Europe by just that fear.

Private enterprise will operate freely in Europe only when there is peace and confidence in currencies. Today there is neither.

ECA is doing its work well indeed. Without it, the battle of Europe would be lost. But, even with ECA, Europe will not be in balance with the rest of the world by 1952, nor, in all probability, by 1962, unless the democracies radically alter their present course, because, on balance, Russia is winning the cold war.

DEMOCRACIES ON THE DEFENSIVE

The democracies are on the defensive. Wars are not won that way. Total costs to the democracies are taxing their economies excessively. In our own case, the burden may get too heavy, even for our strong back.

But we dare not lay it down. Soon we must decide between additional taxes and deficit financing. Either route is fraught with grave danger to democratic government and free enterprise. Some less costly road to peace than the one we are now following must be found. Our victory in the battle of Berlin may be followed by a peace treaty on the German question. But there can be no peace in the world until Russia returns to her prewar boundaries.

The problem then of world peace is the problem of getting Russia back on her own ground without a shooting war and without a long cold war, the cost of which might bring the democracies to the verge of bankruptcy.

BENEFITS OF ATLANTIC UNION

The Atlantic Union, in my humble opinion, should make such a peace possible. The total military, industrial, economic and manpower strength of the democracies of the world so greatly exceeds that of Soviet Russia that it would not dare attack.

Atlantic Union would bring the armed forces of all its members under one command, with bases wherever needed. Enormous savings would result. Soviet Russia could get nowhere in a cold war, or a shooting war either, without her European satellites.

In nearly every case, the satellite governments are dominated by Communist minorities—15 percent or so of the Czechoslovakian people, 25 percent at best of the Poles, for example.

A federal union of the democracies would be so powerful, so prosperous and free, that the pull on these satellite states lying in between would be so much greater from the west than from the east that in time Soviet Russia would surely lose them—and her drive for world conquest would end in failure and without World War III.

Federal union should take the offensive in the cold war in every country in Europe. And we would win that war, because federal union would fight with the weapons of freedom, of prosperity, and of a rising standard of living.

Senator WILEY. You used the word "federal" in the last two instances, and previously you used the words "Atlantic union." Do you differentiate?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think so. I use them in the same sense. I mean a federal union of Atlantic democracies.

Senator WILEY. Under the pact?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; I do not associate it with the pact, except indirectly. It is broader than the pact. By federal union I mean a political and economic union.

The United States, having more to lose than any other country, should take the lead in calling a convention of representatives of the nations composing the Atlantic Pact, to explore how far they can go, in forming a federal union within the Charter of the United Nations.

CREATING A PEACEFUL CLIMATE

I would like to add, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the committee: it seems to me that it is absolutely essential that the political climate of the world be promptly shifted to one which is hospitable to peaceful plans and objectives, and away from the present climate which calls for preparations for war, such as this Atlantic Pact necessarily is.

So long as we have this warlike climate the democracies not only are saddled with the enormous cost and waste attendant upon preparations for war but those very activities, those very preparations frighten private capital and initiative and prevent them from doing their full job in reconstruction and recovery.

The best way, of course, to fight communism is to make democracy work, and the best way to make democracy work in an economic sense is to bring about those conditions which contribute to a rising standard of living so that people will have more to eat and more to wear and better homes in which to live.

Obviously conditions in which you are preparing for war do not permit of any such situation; so much of the economy is diverted to warlike preparations that there is not enough left to provide for a rising standard of living for the peoples of the world. And in my opinion the best way to bring about this change in climate and to make democracy work is to bring about a federal union of the democracies of the world. These democracies could work together in a permanent way and not only in a military sense. A pact, by the very nature of things, is impermanent and the world has not learned by experience to rely too much upon pacts.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that conclude your statement?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

DIFFICULTIES IN FEDERATION

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Clayton, you realize, do you not, that to bring this about would meet with very serious difficulties, would it not? It would take a good long while to set up the organization of a world union with so many diverse states with different backgrounds and different traditions and things of that kind.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You said a moment ago that your idea was to incorporate into the union the democracies that were in the United Nations.

Mr. CLAYTON. I beg your pardon. I said that I thought we ought to start it by having the President of the United States call a conference of representatives of those governments which are members of the Atlantic Pact that we are now discussing, as a starting point.

The CHAIRMAN. I must have misunderstood you. I thought you said the United Nations.

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, you would not draw any line as to where you would stop. You would take in all nations?

Mr. CLAYTON. That would be for the convention of the conference to decide.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, it would. I am trying to get your conception.

NATURE OF THE ATLANTIC UNION

Mr. CLAYTON. My idea would be that in the beginning the union would be composed of all countries that have our ideas and ideals of freedom, and that are composed of the white race.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you exclude others? Would you bring in others and teach them things that we believe in?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think that others would have to be admitted, and the group would want to admit others as they showed a willingness and a capacity to follow the ideals of democracy and of freedom. Others should be admitted if they are willing to agree to the constitution of the union and have shown their willingness and ability to live up to its conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. Would your idea be to consolidate all of the debts of the various countries that might join, or leave the debts to be dealt with by each nation?

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course, Mr. Chairman, that was one of the big thorny questions that the 13 Colonies had to decide.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. CLAYTON. You remember Alexander Hamilton was a great exponent of the idea that the new Union should not only assume the debts of the Confederacy that preceded it but also assume the debts of each individual State of the 13 States. His position prevailed in the end, but after a great deal of difficulty. It was proven to be a very wise decision.

METHOD OF CREATING AN ATLANTIC UNION

I am just suggesting now that we should call a conference of representatives of these countries to discuss this matter to see how far they could go. Whatever I would say would be my own personal idea on it. I have checked on some of these statistics, however. If you take the debts of most of the democracies and convert them from their currency into ours at realistic rates of conversion, in other words, at market rates, and measure them by population, by national income and things of that kind, their debts are not so much greater per capita than ours.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand you now, you are not undertaking to lay down the rules by which this union would be formed, or how it should progress. You want the question examined and understood, and therefore suggest the calling of a conference by the President of the United States to consider these matters. Is that correct?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is correct; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wiley?

Senator WILEY. Mr. Clayton, as I said, you had in your statement the term "Atlantic Union" and you used the term, also, of "Federal Union." In the previous part you meant it is contemplated the states would sign the pact, I take it?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Senator WILEY. And in the latter part, Federal Union, you had in mind a union of nations with similar ideals, similar objectives, that you hoped could be brought about some time in the future?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir; that is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. May I intervene?

Senator WILEY. However, you endorse the pact?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

NATURE OF THE ATLANTIC UNION

The CHAIRMAN. By "Federal Union" you mean the states would be federated?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. They still would have their individual character, but be federated?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly. In very much the same way in which our own Union was formed.

Senator WILEY. That is a consummation devoutly to be wished. I think. Have you any basis in mind that would indicate that out of the 2,300,000,000 on earth there are more than those that we have practically gotten together under the Atlantic Pact that would consider a question of some kind of federated union?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; I think so. I think that, for example. Australia and New Zealand would do so if such a conference were called and they were invited to send representatives. I imagine they would be delighted to send them. That is just my own personal idea.

UNITED NATIONS AND THE ATLANTIC UNION

Senator WILEY. Do you not think, for all practical purposes, that that is what we have gotten a stepping stone of, in the United Nations?

Mr. CLAYTON. You mean the United Nations or the Atlantic Pact?

Senator WILEY. No. The United Nations—a sort of stepping stone to a federation that we hope will eventually be consummated.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; I think all of these things, Senator Wiley, that we have done during and since the war to bring countries together, are stepping stones to an eventual union. But I think from what we have learned since the end of the war, and learned in the United Nations, that we have to consolidate our progress by a series of further steps.

I do not think it will be possible to work out at any time in the foreseeable future conditions under which all the nations of the world could join in one world government. I think that is very visionary.

I agree with everything Mr. Dulles said about the United Nations, and that was said here generally. It has been an extremely useful organization. We all ought to support it. I hope it will continue forever. If it had done nothing else, it has proven its worth by furnishing a forum in which the representatives of nations of the world can talk about these different serious matters as they arise and help form world opinion in reference to them.

WORLD SPLIT

Senator WILEY. Do you not think that if we can avoid a third international conflict that with the so-called rising spiritual temperature of people we may find more vitality in the United Nations to handle these very problems?

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope so. But we must recognize that Soviet Russia has split the world into two parts—the Communist world and the other part. And sooner or later every country is going to find itself in one or the other camp.

Senator WILEY. Then you would have two worlds.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right. We have got them. We have them. We have them today.

Senator WILEY. Have you any hope that even that difficulty can be rubbed out through reason and judgment in the United Nations?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir. I have no hope that that difficulty can be worked out in the United Nations, because it will never be worked out, Senator Wiley, until Russia returns to her prewar boundaries. The United Nations will never get her to do it, in my opinion.

Senator WILEY. Do you not know that there is a philosophy to the effect that time cures many ills?

Mr. CLAYTON. I know.

Senator WILEY. Suppose that the leadership of Russia is obliterated by time, and this psychological warfare that is being carried on, back and forth over the iron curtain, results in international revolution and disintegration, and things that are apparent right now on the horizon; do you not think that even with that the United Nations might be changed so that the matter of the veto, which Russia has exercised so potently, might also be changed and men's minds might be changed as the advisability of carrying on in unity develops?

Mr. CLAYTON. It might very well happen, if there should be the kind of disintegration of which you speak behind the iron curtain. But I think it would be extremely unwise for us to count on anything of that kind. We might have to wait so long that the cost of fighting the cold war would bring the democracies to the verge of bankruptcy.

PROGRESS IN EUROPE TOWARD UNITY

Senator WILEY. Do you see any great signs in Europe of this unity of nations, any signs that they have obliterated this thousand years' internal strife—any real signs that have not been brought about by economic pressure? Do you see this love between nations and so forth?

Mr. CLAYTON. I see many signs of a growing feeling for unity, many signs of it. It needs leadership, and I am afraid it has not gotten it. If vigorous leadership could be supplied, I do not think it would be difficult to get the countries of western Europe together in a western European union.

Senator WILEY. You mean a political union?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes. But I am afraid that that leadership is not there.

Senator WILEY. Do you attribute that to economic pressures, this feeling?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it is perhaps due more to political pressures and fear.

Senator WILEY. Fear of Russia?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; fear of Russia more than it is a fear of economic pressure, although economic pressures are playing their part. You see France and Italy, for example, coming together in a customs union, which they have, proceeded very far in that direction, and there is very good reason to expect that it will finally be consummated. Of course, we have the Benelux Customs Union, and we have the Scandinavian countries considering a customs union.

These things usually are spurred by economic reasons. But I think the political reasons in the last 2 or 3 years have been just as powerful, if not more powerful, in the case of western Europe, than the economic.

Senator WILEY. Then you see many hopeful signs on the European horizon, and you see but one disintegrating thing, and that is the overpowering might of Russia?

FEAR OF WAR

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; that is the only thing. If it were not for the fear of war, the world would go forward economically, in my opinion, at a very fast rate. It is the fear of war which is paralyzing free enterprise over the world except in the United States and the rest of the Western Hemisphere.

As long as that condition exists it is going to be extremely difficult to bring the world back in economic balance.

Senator WILEY. But you do reach the same conclusion as Mr. Dulles that the execution of this pact will have disintegrating influence on that fear?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it will have—I would not say a disintegrating influence—I think it will have a very substantial influence on it, and ameliorate it, but it will not dissipate it entirely, not by a great deal.

I think that the people of Europe are a little more cynical about these things than we are. We are a little naive about them, and they have had a great deal of experience with them.

I do not think that the execution of the pact will restore—certainly not 100 percent, and perhaps not 50 percent—the confidence of capitalists and entrepreneurs in Europe.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

Senator WILEY. Do you think it is necessary after the pact is executed and signed, and becomes the vital law of this land, that we supplement it with arms?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would think so, unquestionably. I agree fully with what Mr. Dulles said about that. If you just make a pact and do not do anything else, and let western Europe go on as it now—and it is practically helpless so far as arms are concerned—you do not do anything.

Europe itself will say "This does not mean anything, it is just a nice gesture." If you do not help them with arms I think the pact will lose most of its value.

Senator WILEY. Is it your conclusion, the same as Mr. Dulles, which he derives from interviewing military men, that in the foreseeable future you do not think there will be armed overt acts on the part of Russia?

Mr. CLAYTON. As far as I am concerned, that is just a matter of opinion which is not worth much. But I have not believed, since the end of the war, that there was any immediate danger, serious danger, of a shooting war with Russia. She is getting what she wants too easily the other way.

Senator WILEY. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

ECA AND EUROPEAN UNITY

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Clayton, of course, you do not expect this plan to be accomplished just by our signing a paper and going on. It has to be developed, does it not?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Over a long period of years.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am afraid so, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you not recognize, however, that economics and political matters are very intimate and very intertwined, one reacting on the other?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. We have made, in the ECA, substantial steps toward making the people of Europe realize the importance of co-operating economically in rebuilding their broken fortunes; is that not true?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is true, Mr. Chairman. I am not in position to know to what extent they have cooperated, as required by the enabling act under ECA, to reduce tariffs and other impediments to trade among themselves and between themselves and the rest of the world. I have not looked into that.

I do not know to what extent they may have lived up to that condition of the agreement which the United States made with each of these countries in the consequence of the act. But I think that the post-war history in matters of that kind has been very encouraging.

We have had a great deal of international cooperation in the economic sense since the war, and in fact beginning during the war, at Bretton Woods. They attempted to write a charter for the International Trade Organization, what we call the GAT agreement, the agreement between 21 countries that we wrote and negotiated at Geneva, as you recall, in the summer of 1927. This dealt with over one-half of the trade of the world.

Then this last one, ECA, that has brought about very real cooperation among the countries in western Europe. And now this Atlantic Pact, which is not economic but at any rate has some economic implications and is a further evidence of the belief and feeling and desire of these countries to cooperate each with the other for their mutual benefit, protection, and security.

The CHAIRMAN. You say that this treaty does not have any economic implications?

Mr. CLAYTON. I beg your pardon. I said it did have some.

ECONOMIC EFFECT OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. I was going to suggest to you: is it not true that if we could remove the fear of war and the constant dread of war, that it would lift the economic level of every one of the countries which is signatory to this treaty?

Mr. CLAYTON. Indeed it will, of course. There is no question about that. If it should have the effect of removing the fear of war then private capital and private enterprise would operate freely again in Europe, but I do not believe it will have that effect.

I think you will see, after a while, a redoubling of the efforts of Russia in the cold war, maybe in a different way, at a different place, with different technique. But I feel sure you will see it, and that will keep everybody stirred up all the time and fearful. So I do not think that this pact alone will dissipate the fear of war in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not mean to imply that, because there is no way of foreseeing something that might stir up a war irrespective of this pact. But to the extent that this pact may remove some of the fears, to that extent it will help the economic situation in these countries?

Mr. CLAYTON. Indeed.

IN FAVOR OF THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. I understood you to say a while ago you are for the pact, you want to see it ratified.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, I am strongly for the pact. I think if we should fail to ratify the pact it would be a world disaster. I agree with everything Mr. Dulles said about the probable consequences of that act. It would be a kind of notice to Russia that they could go ahead. It would let the people of Europe down in a way that they have never been let down. They would lose all confidence in us. And I think that it would be a major disaster.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you agree with the view that there is nothing in the treaty that is of an offensive character, but that it is confined to the peaceful conditions in the world?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I have not made a letter study of the treaty, but I just know that is what it is, because I know our intentions and I think I know the intentions of the democracies of western Europe. I do not think anybody has in mind any intention of any offensive action under this treaty; nothing except purely defensive action.

The CHAIRMAN. Does not the language of the treaty itself confine it within those areas?

Mr. CLAYTON. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Fulbright?

Senator FULBRIGHT. Mr. Clayton, I would like first to say that I am happy to see you back in Washington. I hope you will stay around here and give us your advice on many occasions.

Mr. CLAYTON. Thank you, sir.

COSTS OF THE COLD WAR

Senator FULBRIGHT. Is it fair to say that under the present conditions, as there is no change made in the political relationships in the democracies, that we are liable to disintegrate before Russia is with regard to the question asked by the Senator from Wisconsin? While many people may hope that this regime in Russia, especially that part of it devoted to aggression may disintegrate, your point is that the burden is so great on our economy that we may disintegrate first. Is it not fair to say that?

Mr. CLAYTON. Either disintegrate first or lay the burden down. And when we lay it down then that also is notice to Russia that she can proceed as actively as she likes. I say that I think Russia is winning the cold war because I notice the great expansion that is taking place in two or three items in our budget. If you would refer to one military item for ourselves, the ECA, lend-lease, which is military arms, which is sure to come, and things of that kind, you will see that they compose at least one-half of our total national budget.

While there are good reasons to argue that the Atlantic Pact should have the effect of reducing those costs, I think that we would be a little naive to expect that that would be the actual result. I think the result is likely to be the other way around. I think that the casts are likely to increase instead of reduce. And I think that under the present conditions of our economy, if we should have a moderate recession in economic activity in the country—which is not entirely out of the cards—we would find the burden very heavy. Our tax revenues would, under those circumstances, considerably decline.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Which would require an increase in the rate to compensate for the decrease, which in itself tends to depress the business. It is a rather vicious spiral when it starts.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is correct. And as I said in my prepared statement, we must decide pretty soon between additional taxes and deficit financing, and either road is fraught with a great deal of danger to our type of government and free enterprise.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That decision must be made within the next 2 or 3 months.

Mr. CLAYTON. That decision must be made very soon.

ESTABLISHMENT OF ATLANTIC UNION

Senator FULBRIGHT. Coming to you views about the Atlantic union, do I understand it correctly that the reasonable beginning to that would be to take these same countries that have evidenced already at least sufficient unity to join this pact, tentatively joining it by signing it, that that would be a political union? Is that what you had in mind?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir. That is what I had in mind. To start with the sponsors of this pact.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Further pursuing that, you do not mean to say that that is exclusive or ultimate at all, that that is a proper place to start, and that if that is started the future may develop according to the desires of the various other countries?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right.

EUROPEAN UNITY AND NORTH ATLANTIC UNION

Senator FULBRIGHT. I think it is a very interesting idea. I think you are familiar with the fact that some of us have urged that European countries should join in the union at the beginning. I think the difference between that and the Atlantic union that you mention is probably one of feasibility, that is, our ideas as to whether or not it can be brought about as a practical political matter today.

I have had the view that it is purely as a practical point of view, that that would be more likely brought about than the broader union, including the other members of the pact who are not in the western European community. That, I think, was the main difference.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think you are right, Senator Fulbright, provided the western European idea could get strong, vigorous leadership, and I am afraid it lacks it now.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think that this country ought to provide some leadership, and ought to promote or encourage it?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think that we should do so to the extent that we would be justified in doing so by reason of the aid which we are giving under ECA. I think perhaps that justification would be more secure and more easily defended in the economic field than in any other, but if there were some way in which the western European countries, or the ECA countries, could be brought together economically, I think the other would follow.

USING ECA FUNDS TO ENCOURAGE CUSTOMS UNIONS

Senator FULBRIGHT. To use as an example, you mentioned the proposed treaty between Italy and France, looking to economic union. My understanding is that the terms of that treaty look to a considerable period of time before it is achieved, some 6 years, I think. Would you think it is a legitimate use of ECA funds to help them bring that about much sooner than that? What I have in mind is this:

You are thoroughly familiar with the economic situation. Under ECA we look at each country separately, and try to analyze, the administration does, their needs in textile mills, and so on, in each country, as they each present their program.

That is one way to approach it. The other would be that in this proposal to obliterate their barriers to trade, we say "We will use this money to specifically assist you in that project." In other words, if there is dislocation in certain industries, if there is money required for temporary employment, we will use it for that purpose.

Whatever the dislocation that arises from an economic union, a full economic union, by which I mean the free movement of goods and persons and capital, it seems to me that would be a direct assistance to an economic union between those two countries, contrasted with the other approach, which tends to build up the national efficiency of each country, which contributes in the long run nothing to the economic circumstances.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think you have put the problem very well. It is an extremely difficult one. I do not know, to begin with, to what extent such funds could be legally used for that purpose.

Assuming they could be legally used for that purpose I do not know, Senator Fulbright, the extent to which they might be needed for that purpose, because that purpose could be served purely with local funds. If there is some question of unemployment in Italy, the Italian money will handle that situation, and the same thing in France—French money would handle that.

I would think that possibly some of the counterpart funds could be very well used for the purpose which you outline. These funds accumulate in these countries by reason of the sale of goods which we ship over there at local currencies—and those currencies are impounded. It is a new thought to me.

Senator FULBRIGHT. What made you think that it might be illegal?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not know whether it would be legal or not to use dollars for that direct purpose. But I feel quite sure that it would be entirely legal to use the counterpart funds, and that is all really that would be necessary, to use the accumulations of lire in Italy, and the accumulations of francs in France, arising from the sale of these goods that they get from us.

I would not think there would be any question about the legality of that.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I never thought there was any question of that. One of the expressed purposes of ECA was to bring about the free movement of trade and destruction of all barriers of trade.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right. There may be nothing in it.

CONVERTIBILITY OF CURRENCIES

Senator FULBRIGHT. The inconvertibility of currency today is one of the principal obstructions to trade.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That would be one of the principal objectives of such a program.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I was told, for example, by a leading member of the Belgian Government that to make the currency of the Netherlands and Belgium convertible, we will say tomorrow, that it would impose a terrific burden on the Belgian economy because they have the production and the goods which the Netherlands need, and they would have to bear the burden.

I asked, "Could you give an estimate of what it would be?" He said, "It is purely an estimate but it might cost as much as 75 to 100 million dollars to satisfy the immediate demands for durable goods, especially durable goods. But once that is achieved and the immediate demand is satisfied, it would tend to level out."

It seemed to me it would be much more profitable to us to get them over that hump, and save money in the long run in making their currencies convertible. This would require, of course, many changes in their internal fiscal policies to maintain it—I mean the alterations in taxes, their social security, and all of the internal taxes. But he was prepared to undertake that or he said they were.

He said the great burden of the immediate demand from the Netherlands was something beyond their resources now. It struck me as much more beneficial to use our funds for that purpose than to, we will say, construct more oil refineries in each country, and more textile mills in each country because the two economies are fairly comparable.

One is highly industrialized, and the other is highly agricultural. Would you say that is a fair description of that situation?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is a fair description, Senator Fulbright, and I think it is something that ought to engage the very careful consideration and attention of the ECA administration. It is something they ought to look into very carefully.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Unfortunately they reject the idea that the union and political objectives are legitimate objectives for them to consider. That proposition was submitted directly and it was turned down by the committee and the Senate, of course, with the advice of the ECA.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL MATTERS

There seems to be a very clear-cut distinction in their mind between political and economic matters and that they should deal only in the economic field, which I mention only because you say there is a lack of leadership in their move toward unity. There are a great many people in those countries that would like to see it come about, but there is no leadership.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It comes back to the problem: Should we not try to give some leadership, and how could we do it if we had to decide? And it would be through the ECA, would it not, now, immediately?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would think that would likely be the most fruitful avenue to do it, yes.

FEDERATION OF EUROPE FIRST

Senator FULBRIGHT. Would you not think that if a federation of European countries could be brought about that that would be a very large step toward your further idea of an Atlantic federation?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, I would think so. Of course, if the Atlantic federation is a long way off, as I dare say it is, the western European federation would go a very long way toward helping dissipate these war fears and helping in bringing about the economic recovery of Europe.

It would not go nearly as far as an Atlantic federation. I think in time, if we had the European federation, we would have the Atlantic federation. I think it is the right thing, and I think it is coming.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Then as a practical matter it seems to me it is better to try to take the smaller step first, the one we think is most clearly within our reach, rather than skipping over it to one which people generally feel is so far off that we cannot do anything about it now. The European union could be done today, could be done tomorrow, that is, you could make the start toward it if our leaders had the idea that we ought to.

But to my knowledge they have not yet officially ever said they really thought we had any part to play in that field.

Mr. CLAYTON. Senator Fulbright, if this convention, of which I have spoken here, were called by the representatives of the governments that formed the Atlantic Pact, do you not think that the immediate effect of that would be to give a great impetus to the western European union, political union? It would give leadership to the idea, and while it might be recognized that here is something that will take a long, long time to perfect, at any rate it should not take nearly as long to perfect the union of western European countries, or at any rate the countries that are in this pact in Europe.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I do not know. There is such great difficulty in obtaining the attention of people on matters of this kind, as opposed to that of giving food or guns, that I am not very optimistic about the feasibility of focusing their attention on it, or for that matter, even getting a convention called, unless the President of the United States should all of a sudden decide that he is for it, or the Secretary of State.

But as an educational matter I think it is extremely difficult to get any attention on it. There are many things already done in Europe. They have tentatively made a move in this council of Europe, but it does not have any substance. They have not delegated to it, and there was an article in today's paper, this morning's Times, describing that there is no delegation of power to it. It is just another meeting of foreign ministers, which is all to the good.

I am not saying they should not do it. But with a very little urging you have got up to the point where something very important could be done immediately, practically, within a few months, if the little push that Foster Dulles has spoken of could be given by this country. The other undertaking, on the other hand, I cannot help but believe is a very good educational program, to begin with, in this country, to a great extent, and in Canada.

It has not been promoted in the past. It is a relatively new idea, whereas the idea of a European union has a respectable history for 300 years, and it is not new at all. It is one of the good ideas that is just waiting for the right time, and a little leadership.

That has been the distinction, it seems to me, as to which one we should pursue and devote attention to. If you go to the broader one, which you might say is the ultimate, I am afraid you will miss the boat on the immediate objective and make no progress toward it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am for the western European union. I have said long ago that I seriously question if Europe will return to a condition of financial independence and a satisfactory standard of living for her people so long as they continue to operate in these little watertight economic compartments that they have had going there for so many years.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Even before this war they were not really self-sustaining. They were using up their savings before the war, were they not?

Mr. CLAYTON. They were using them up at the rate of about half a billion dollars a year.

PROBLEMS OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. So it is not just a wartime situation that we are dealing with. It is an inherent deficiency in their economy due largely to this political fragmentation.

Mr. CLAYTON. Senator Fulbright, the beginnings of Europe's troubles go back even to the period prior to the First World War. They started then. And this is very simple. Europe had built herself up to where she was sort of a factory for the world, a workshop. You can stop the movement of goods by tariffs, but you cannot stop the machines. The machines move all over the world, and get installed, and commence doing the work of the machines that are way off somewhere else.

The rest of the world started before the First World War to industrialize, a natural ambition, and they gradually built up their industrial capacity to the point where they are not so much dependent on Europe as they formerly were. I am speaking now of the Southern Hemisphere and the Eastern Hemisphere, rather than the northern part of the Western Hemisphere.

So that Europe, with a highly industrialized population, for which she had to import a great deal of food and raw materials, and for which she paid with manufactures, had troubles even before the first war. There was a change coming about in the world before the First World War which started her troubles then.

The two wars, of course, enormously increased and hastened it.

THE TREATY AS A BREATHING SPELL

Senator FULBRIGHT. Would it be fair to say that your attitude is that this pact is a fine thing, but of a temporary nature, there is no lasting solution to it, and one of its principal merits is to give an opportunity to something along the lines you mentioned, of unity, to come about?

MR. CLAYTON. That is the way I look at it. I think it gives a breathing spell.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That seems to me to be its principal function. We long since learned that we cannot rely on permanent protection, unless they turn into a political affiliation. If that should come about, then there might be what we call permanent solutions at least to that part of the world.

WEALTH HOARDING IN EUROPE

I think that is about right. You mentioned one matter that is not related to that, and a good deal of interest has been evidenced by the committee at other times, as to how much wealth is in hiding, so to speak, in western Europe, say in France and Italy, because of this condition. Would you venture to make an estimate at all? It is a matter of some curiosity.

MR. CLAYTON. I could not, Senator Fulbright, but I am sure it is a very large sum. It is not only the money, but it is the daring and the initiative and the enterprise of the people who own that money that is lost. They are off on a holiday somewhere, they are taking things easy at home, they have their money outside of the country or, in the case of the peasants in many countries, they have got it soaked away in gold, maybe. Anyway that money is not working and the people who own it are not working and using their ingenuity and their enterprise as they would if they could freely employ their money.

This means that you throw a great deal of the burden of recovery and reconstruction on governments, and governments cannot do the job.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It is your view that if that could be brought out of hiding by restoration of confidence, it would have a great effect upon the ECA program; that is, it would lessen the necessity for an ECA program?

MR. CLAYTON. Well, it would probably, if it could be brought out completely and if Europe could be relieved of the awful fear of war; then I think that the objectives of ECA would be accomplished by 1952. Otherwise, I do not think they will be.

The I. M. F. has just published some very interesting figures which show that Europe was in the red with the rest of the world last year by $5,600,000,000 in 1948. That is a decline of $2,000,000,000 from 1947, which is very gratifying. But nobody who studied the matter carefully and thought over the matter believes that Europe will be in balance with the rest of the world by June 1952 if we go on as we are.

The best opinion that I have been able to get on it is that Europe will still be  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to 3 billion dollars in the red a year in 1952.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That was approximately the estimate made from their own programs?

MR. CLAYTON. That is right.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I believe that is all, Mr. Chairman. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Clayton, we have here, with the permission of the committee, Senator Donnell and Senator Watkins, who desire to interrogate you, if it is agreeable to you.

All right, Senator Donnell.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Clayton, I am sorry that because of an earlier engagement I did not get to hear your testimony. I hastily scanned this, and there are only a few questions I want to ask you. I have no doubt Senator Watkins will ask other questions.

ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE

I notice that you appear here on behalf of the Atlantic Union Committee. I do not know whether you explained into the record what the Atlantic Union Committee is, what its composition is, how many officers it has. Have you done that?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not, Senator.

Senator DONNELL. Would you be kind enough to do that, Mr. Clayton?

Mr. CLAYTON. The Atlantic Union Committee was formed to solicit public support for the introduction in Congress of a resolution which would authorize the President of the United States to call a conference of representatives of the governments which are members of the Atlantic Pact to explore the idea of a federal union of such countries and to explore how far they could go in forming such a union.

The chairman of the committee is former Supreme Court Justice Owen J. Roberts, and former Secretary of War Robert Patterson is a vice chairman, and I am a vice chairman.

I have not with me a list of its membership, but it is very large and covers prominent people in the different walks of life scattered over the country geographically.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know, Mr. Clayton, about how many members there are? You say it is a very large membership?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am sorry. I did not mean to imply that it was a very large membership, because it is not. It was only organized 2 or 3 months ago, and we are just getting the committee set up and organized. I am sorry; I do not know just exactly how many members there are at the present time.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know within reasonable limits? Are there 1,000, 5,000, 100, or what?

Mr. CLAYTON. We have a council of several hundred members, and I do not know just exactly how many members of the committee there are, but there is a council of at least two hundred members.

Senator DONNELL. Are there as many as 1,000 members of the Atlantic Union Committee?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think so, Senator Donnell, but I just do not know.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know whether there are as many as 500?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; I could not tell you. The headquarters of the committee is in New York. That is where they meet, and I live in Texas and I have not been able to attend very many meetings lately.

Senator DONNELL. If it would meet the approval of the chairman of the committee, I wonder if it would be agreeable to Mr. Clayton to furnish to the committee the information as to the number of members and also as to the geographical distribution of them?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would be glad to do that.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you. You will furnish the secretary of the committee with that information?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

COUNCIL IN PROCESS OF FORMATION

Business and professional affiliations are listed for identification purposes only.

AIMS OF THE COMMITTEE

Senator DONNELL. Now, this committee was not formed in advocacy of the adherence to the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; it was formed before the North Atlantic Treaty was negotiated and signed; but the committee does advocate the ratification of the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. I take it that the primary interest of the committee in the treaty is that it considers that the treaty is a step which might well be availed of in the ultimate organization of the Atlantic Union for which the committee stands pledged? Is that right?

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, that; and in addition, the committee feels that this is a necessary step to be taken at the present time.

Senator DONNELL. I am not quite clear whether the committee has membership independent of the council, or is it just a committee?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not quite get what you mean.

Senator DONNELL. Here is what I mean. You say you have a committee of possibly a couple of hundred members. You are not able to tell us how many members the Atlantic Union Committee itself has.

I am unable to distinguish between the organization that you say has about 200 members, which is some sort of a council or committee, and that known as the Atlantic Union Committee, the membership of which you do not know as to the number.

Mr. CLAYTON. There either are, or will be, Senator Donnell, a good many more than 200 members of the committee. There are about 200 members on what we call the council of the committee, but the committee will be larger than that.

Senator DONNELL. I understand, then, you are going to furnish this other information?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir; I will.

Senator DONNELL. That is fine. Now, Mr. Clayton, were you in the Department of State as late as February 14 of this year?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. When did you leave the Department of State?

Mr. CLAYTON. I resigned as Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs in October 1947; but I stayed on for about a year as adviser to the Secretary on certain economic matters.

Senator DONNELL. Did you have anything to do with the negotiation of the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; I did not.

Senator DONNELL. Did you hear the matter discussed from time to time in the Department of State?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, not specifically. I resigned definitely from the Department of State, I think, the 1st of November or the middle of October 1948, and went back to Texas.

Senator DONNELL. That is, your formal resignation was presented in October 1947, but you stayed on until about 1948, and then you went back to Texas?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir; that is right.

Senator DONNELL. Have you studied this treaty itself in detail, Mr. Clayton?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; I have not.

Senator DONNELL. Have you read all of it?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Are you familiar—well, I shall not examine you on this particular article, but are you familiar with article 2, which is the one which says that the signatories will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any and all of them?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not read that.

Senator DONNELL. You have not read that?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. How much of the treaty have you read?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not read any of the treaty itself, but I have read several reviews and digests of it from time to time that appeared in the magazines and in the newspapers; and I have read statements of Secretary Acheson on the treaty and I have read other statements of authoritative people in connection with it.

Senator DONNELL. Have you read any statements by anyone who was raising any question as to the advisability of entering into the treaty?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; I have read some of those statements.

Senator DONNELL. Can you tell us who were the authors of those statements?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not recall just now. I read the other day some church statement that was opposed to it.

Senator DONNELL. Was that the Methodist organization?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; the Methodist Church.

Senator DONNELL. You read that in the newspaper, did you not?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Did you see the entire resolution of that organization?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; I did not, Senator Donnell. I just read the newspaper account of it.

Senator DONNELL. How recently have you been in Europe, Mr. Clayton?

Mr. CLAYTON. My last trip was in September 1947.

Senator DONNELL. So you have not observed at first hand whether or not there has been an increase in the confidence of the European nations since the signature which occurred here on April 4?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; I have not, Senator Donnell.

Senator DONNELL. I do not think I will ask you any further questions, Mr. Clayton. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Clayton, some of the questions I will ask you may have been asked in part before, but I want to be sure that I get your point of view as you want to give it.

NEED FOR NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

As I understand it, you feel that this is a necessary step, the adoption of the Atlantic Pact, in order to form a federal union?

Mr. CLAYTON. No, sir; I do not. I said that I felt that this was a step on the road to federal union; but I do not think that it is necessary to the formation of federal union at all.

Senator WATKINS. In what respect do you think that it is necessary, then? Whether you say it is on the road——

Mr. CLAYTON. I think that this is a step that is necessary in order to convince Soviet Russia that the members of this Atlantic Pact will stand together for the preservation of their independence and integrity.

Senator WATKINS. As I understood from your main statement, you thought that there was no imminent danger of a shooting war?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think I said, Senator Watkins, that my opinion was of no value on that subject.

Senator WATKINS. Well, for whatever it is worth——

Mr. CLAYTON. That is, my opinion for whatever it is worth, that there has not been and is not now in the near future danger of a shooting war.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt a moment. I do not know whether you know it, Mr. Clayton, but the State Department has announced, and so has New York, that the airlift and the counterblockade are to be lifted within a few days. That is the agreement of the Four Powers.

Mr. CLAYTON. Thank you, sir. That is good news.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought it might help you in your being interrogated to know that.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like, Senator Watkins, if I may, to amend the statement a little bit and say that I do not think that there is serious danger of a shooting war, and I have not felt so for a long time.

DEPARTURE FROM TRADITIONAL POLICY

Senator WATKINS. Do you not agree that this entering into the Atlantic Pact will be a departure from a very old and much revered foreign policy of the United States?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, certainly it is; and times have changed so greatly that we are departing from many things that 50 years ago we would have thought we never would have departed from.

Senator WATKINS. That is, sometimes from policies, but have we departed from principles on which some of these policies are based? You may have a difference of policy, but a new application of an old principle.

Mr. CLAYTON. Senator Watkins, the world has gone through such a revolutionary change in the last few years that I cannot help feeling that if George Washington and our other forefathers lived in this present time, they would do exactly what we are doing; because I think they would realize that the times require it.

Senator WATKINS. The reason I ask the question: I am not passing on the wisdom of Washington's statements about foreign policy, but I am trying to get your state of mind and whether or not you agree with me that in the changing of our policy, we should have a complete investigation and have all the facts laid before us so that we know whether or not it is a wise move to make.

Mr. CLAYTON. Indeed. I am in full agreement that all the facts should be before us in these matters.

Senator WATKINS. And, in other words, the burden of proof, the burden for getting the evidence, is upon those who propose the change in our foreign policy.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think they should lay all the facts before the public.

Senator WATKINS. And should make a case that would convince us that it ought to be changed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Senator WATKINS. Otherwise there should be no change.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right. I think they should.

COST OF COLD WAR

Senator WATKINS. I do not want to ask you too many questions, but I am interested in your statement that, in effect, we are now losing the cold war. As I get it from your main statement, which I did not get to hear you read, but I glanced over rather hurriedly, you said on page 3:

Soviet Russia's principal objectives in the cold war are to frighten democratic governments into excessive expenditures for defense, and to frighten private capital and initiative so that it will not operate freely.

If both objectives can be achieved, economic disintegration will likely ensue.

Economic disintegration is usually followed by political disintegration.

Are you aware that under the proposed North Atlantic Pact, a part of the program is to rearm Europe partly at their own expense and partly at ours?

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, I know that that is the program, because measures to that effect have been introduced, I believe in Congress.

Senator WATKINS. At least this committee probably has been advised that the cash outlay, or the first year's price tag, on the program is about $1,100,000,000.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Senator WATKINS. And in connection with that, it has been said, and I think it was probably admitted by General Bradley yesterday to be substantially true, that we expect Europe to more than match that by putting up about six times as much for the defense rearmament as we are putting up.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Senator WATKINS. What would you think such an expenditure now on the part of these European countries would do to their economy?

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, it is going to have an influence, of course, on their rate of recovery; and that is the reason that I say I think Russia is winning the cold war, because while we are doing the right thing in my opinion to enter into this pact, just the act of entering into it is going to increase the cost to the democracies of fighting the cold war. But they have no other alternative, in my opinion.

As that increase takes effect, it is going to naturally have an ill effect on the economies of the countries that are involved.

Senator WATKINS. Can they afford to lose the cold war at the expense of rearmament? In other words, is that a wise policy?

Mr. CLAYTON. If they do not get ready, and if we do not assist them in getting ready, and if we do not assist them economically, then I think that the Russians will step in. I do not think that Mr. Dulles made an overstatement this morning when he said that if we failed to ratify this pact, he thinks we would lose Europe. I think we would.

I have spent a great deal of time in Europe since the war and have taken considerable part in connection with the Geneva Conference on Trade and Tariffs, and in connection with the early organization of the Marshall plan there with those countries. I had some opportunity to observe conditions there.

It is my opinion, as Mr. Dulles said, that if we should fail to ratify this pact we will lose Europe to communism.

DANGER OF LOSING THE COLD WAR

Senator WATKINS. What I am trying to get at is the statement that you have made in effect that we are likely to lose the cold war irrespective of whether we enter into the pact.

Mr. CLAYTON. If we do not change our course—

Senator WATKINS. In what way—

Mr. CLAYTON. And fight it in a different way. I think, Senator Watkins, that the only way to fight the cold war is in union.

Senator WATKINS. In a federal union?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; I do.

Senator WATKINS. In other words, you do not think we can win that cold war the way we are going? As you say here, there will be economic disintegration, and that will bring political disintegration if we do not win that cold war.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not state it dogmatically, but I think there is grave danger that, if we and the other democracies go on spending so much money in getting ready for a shooting war, we may lose the cold war. By these excessive expenditures, and not only by the excessive expenditures but by frightening people with capital and people with ability to make things go, we may keep people of that kind out of the economic picture because of fear of war. Then there is grave danger that we will get to the point where the burden will be so great that people will insist that it be laid down.

Then, if you lay it down, you run the risk of losing these countries to communism.

Senator WATKINS. As I understood, you rather feel that merely by entering into the pact we will not give the assurance to these individuals in Europe who have means to invest to the point where they will invest them or take their part? That will not do it?

Mr. CLAYTON. It will give some assurance to them, but I am afraid it will not give enough.

Senator WATKINS. In other words, not enough is dangerous? When you say it will not give enough, that means we are in danger on that point?

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, it is not so dangerous as now, because up until this time there is a great deal of capital that is hiding out and a great many people who could do things and know how to do them and have the money to do them with that are afraid to do them in the way of economic recovery and reconstruction in Europe.

I think that the consummation of this pact will give a good deal of courage to a good many of those people, but I am just afraid that it does not go far enough to give them all the courage that will be required to put them to work with their capital so that economic recovery and reconstruction can be finished within a reasonable time.

COST OF IMPLEMENTING PROGRAM

Senator WATKINS. I called to your attention a few moments ago the probable cost of the first year's program, wherein we are to send about $1,100,000,000 in goods or cash, or whatever we do in the way of shipping goods, and Europe, these 11 nations, are to put up about six times that amount.

Suppose that the program increases and we extend our support to the extent of, say, $3,000,000,000 next year; and, if Europe is still working on the same formula, you would see where that would put them in a very short time. If they put up six times what we put up, that would be in the neighborhood of $18,000,000,000, which is completely beyond their ability, is it not?

Mr. CLAYTON. I imagine they would not go to any such length, but of course that would be a very, very heavy burden for them. I imagine they would not go to any such extent as that.

Senator WATKINS. There is not any guide whatsoever, is there, as to what may happen when we get into a contest such as we are now having with Russia, for instance, in the cold war, which is continuing and which you think will continue, even though we adopt the North Atlantic Pact?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; I think it will continue.

Senator WATKINS. As a matter of fact, is this not the way human nature reacts—and nations are very much the same because nations are made up of individuals—that if one group, such as Russia and her satellites, see the opposing group, with which they are in a deadly contest, strengthen themselves, increase their armaments as we are preparing to do with Europe and preparing to do ourselves because of our heavy budget, that they likewise take the same steps as a matter of self-protection?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is usually the course of events, but I think that what Russia will probably do will be just to intensify the cold war without spending a great deal more than she is spending today for offensive armaments and for starting an offensive shooting war.

As I say, my opinion on the subject is no good; but I have talked with a great many people whose opinions I value and who know the Russians better than I do and who have the opinion that they do not have any intention at any foreseeable time of starting a shooting war. These people feel that the Russians are doing so well in the cold war that they just keep that up and intensify that and that costs them very little.

Senator WATKINS. As a part of their cold war, is it not a fact that they are going ahead with their preparations, doing everything within their power now, to rearm themselves, to get the finest equipment, the best equipment, to get the atomic bomb and all the other weapons that they can get, so they can meet finally in this head-on clash which they say must take place?

Mr. CLAYTON. I assume that they have been doing a great deal of that, but the point I made was I doubt very much whether the consummation of the Atlantic Pact causes them to spend any more in that direction than they are spending now. I do not know.

REARMAMENT RACE

Senator WATKINS. That is a recognition of the fact, then, is it not, that we are already engaged in an armament race with Russia?

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, I think that Russia, of course, started it.

Senator WATKINS. There is a race then; if one has been started there must be a race.

Mr. CLAYTON. If you wish to call it that, a race. I do not think that it will be any race—I hope it will not be—on our part.

Senator WATKINS. What would you say to the $15,500,000,000 that we are appropriating this year in what is supposed to be times of peace, if that is not a rearmament program, and a pretty heavy one at that?

Mr. CLAYTON. That certainly is, and it is a very heavy item; but I think in the state in which we find ourselves in the world today, that there is nothing else that we can do.

Senator WATKINS. I voted for it on that theory, but it seems to me it is a clear indication that we are in an armament race with somebody and that somebody has to be Russia because it cannot be our friends overseas.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, let us put it this way. We are certainly spending a vast sum of money to get ready to defend ourselves.

OFFENSIVE WAR AS A DEFENSE

Senator WATKINS. I would like to take it that way, and I am sincere in believing that it is that way. I do not think my country has any offensive intentions whatsoever, and I do not think any of these 11 nations in this proposed Atlantic Pact have any offensive ideas whatever of going ahead with an offensive war unless by chance they become converted in time to the fact that sometimes the best defensive is an offensive.

Of course, that is always possible in military matters. We do not wait for the other fellow to hit us; we sometimes lead out after we get ready.

I can see circumstances arising where, if we are having a tough time, for instance, in this economic war and it looks as if we are going to have economic disintegration, we have gone ahead and rearmed, that we might finally determine that the best thing to do for this country is to end that suspense and to stop that economic disintegration by striking out offensively in order to defend ourselves.

Would that sound as though it might eventually come out of the condition that you have indicated here in the economic disintegration?

MR. CLAYTON. I do not think that would ever come, Senator. I do not think that would ever come.

Senator WATKINS. You do not think for a moment if we get in a tight place we are going to wait for somebody to attack us before we strike; do you? Is that your view, after your experience?

MR. CLAYTON. I do not know whether we would wait to be attacked, but unless we were sure that we were going to be attacked, I do not think that we would take any offensive action in the way of starting a war.

Senator WATKINS. Is it not the tendency, as history shows, that where you have two nations or two groups each building up its defenses and quarreling back and forth, each piling on its budget as we understand Russia is piling on theirs and we know we have increased ours tremendously over any other peacetime budget in our history, eventually they get to the point, back and forth, give and take, in the cold war or whatever you want to call it, which finally results in a blow-up and you have a war?

ATLANTIC UNION AS A CURE

MR. CLAYTON. Yes, that is the lesson of history; and it may be that something like that will follow in this case. I frankly think that the only way to avoid it is to form a union of the democracies of the world; and if you have that, you have got so much strength—you have got 350,000,000 people with by far the greatest industrial and economic financial strength in the world; you have got 90 percent of the naval strength of the world—that I just do not think any power left in the world outside that group would be so foolish as to attack it.

Senator WATKINS. That is precisely the argument, as I remember in substance, that General Bradley used yesterday arguing for the Atlantic Pact, rather than a Federal union.

Now you use substantially the same ideas that he advanced to justify the Federal union.

Do you not think the Atlantic Pact itself would be enough to accomplish the purpose of using all of these resources and the millions of people—some 350,000,000, say, altogether—rather than to go one step further and take us into some kind of Federal Government like the one we now have in the United States?

MR. CLAYTON. I think the Atlantic Pact, as I said in answer to one of Senator Fulbright's questions, gives us a breathing spell—time to look ahead and consider what we are going to do about the conditions in the world.

Circumstances have thrust this country into a position of world leadership, which we did not want but which we cannot avoid, and this pact will give us a little time to consider what the next step ought to be.

History shows that these pacts are not permanent, and there have been instances in history where they have not been lived up to. So that they do not give the full sense of protection and security and confidence to the world that something else would give—something stronger, something of a political nature.

EFFECT OF LOSING EUROPE TO COMMUNISM

Senator WATKINS. May I press you with another question in that direction. Do you believe that if we take this step now and go into the Atlantic Pact, that will put us in such condition, I mean have us so intermingled with the affairs of Europe for their protection—in other words, practically underwriting their peace for the next 20 years—that it is almost inevitable we would have to form a Federal union of some kind?

MR. CLAYTON. No; I do not think so, and I would like to say that I do not think we would ever enter into this pact if the only product of it was the peace of Europe. I think we are entering into it to underwrite our own peace.

If the peace of Europe is destroyed, if Europe is overrun by the Russians, then I think this country would face an extremely grave situation; and I think we want to avoid that if we can.

As General Bradley said yesterday, under this pact our combined frontier with these countries is in the heart of Europe, and you cannot escape that.

Senator WATKINS. I would say there are military men who disagree very violently with him on that assumption.

MR. CLAYTON. If western Europe is overrun by communism, I think the situation which we would face in this country would be a very grave one, even if we faced no great military danger—and we would. The economic consequences of such a disaster would be very, very great to us. We would have to reorder and readjust our whole economy in this country if we lost the whole European market.

ECONOMIC COLLABORATION

Senator WATKINS. I would like to switch over to another subject here a moment that Senator Donnell directed your attention to, and that is the article 2 of the Atlantic Pact which you said you had not read, but you had read comments on it and some general statements.

I take it, as the adviser to the State Department on economic matters, that you probably were called upon to advise them with respect to what, if any, economic conflicts were now interfering with the economic collaboration between our friends in Europe and ourselves?

MR. CLAYTON. I was not called upon, Senator Watkins, to advise the State Department with reference to any aspect of this pact. I had left, I think, before the pact was written. I had certain duties with respect to the International Bank, International Monetary Fund, the administration of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, and the Habana Charter of the ITO, and perhaps one or two other things. I had nothing to do with this pact.

Senator WATKINS. You regard, do you not, since you have been working in that field—for instance, tariff barriers as between the nations—ourselves and these 11 nations as an economic barrier?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Senator WATKINS. I understood that you had taken the position in favor largely of free trade between these various groups?

Mr. CLAYTON. Not free trade, Senator Watkins. I have long been an advocate of freer trade than we have, and of a substantial reduction in the barriers to trade.

Senator WATKINS. And you are strongly in favor of the reciprocal trade program as it is now being carried on?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Senator WATKINS. You think that removes and eliminates economic barriers of conflicts?

Mr. CLAYTON. It reduces them.

Senator WATKINS. Well, it goes in the direction, of course, then, of eliminating them.

Mr. CLAYTON. Under the act, as you know, the administration is only authorized to reduce duties by 50 percent, so they cannot go further than that.

Senator WATKINS. I understand that that is the limitation, but what I am trying to find out is if, in your judgment, this article 2, when it states that the signatories, and I quote—

* * * will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them—

could possibly be referring to a greater program for the elimination of tariffs than we now have, and also for the adoption of this International Trade Organization agreement.

Mr. CLAYTON. I just could not say, Senator Watkins. I had nothing to do with the formulation of that sentence, the writing of that language; and I just do not know what the authors of it had in mind.

But I think we can pretty safely say that it means exactly what it says and does not refer particularly to the ITO or to reciprocal-trade agreements or anything else.

ELIMINATION OF ECONOMIC CONFLICTS

Senator WATKINS. Could you illustrate by some specific thing? That is what I would like to know. When you just simply say economic conflicts—you have been in this economic field and working on it and working on these treaties, International Trade Organization, reciprocal trade treaties, and adviser to the State Department—I would like really to know if you could give us some information as to what possible conflicts they could have in mind.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would think that in that respect, they might, for example mean some discrimination that one country might be practicing against another in their international trade.

Senator WATKINS. Could you be more specific with that?

Mr. CLAYTON. Country A, for example, might have certain import quotas with respect to the import of a certain commodity, and they might so construct that quota system that it would be more favorable to one country exporting to them than to another country. So you would have discrimination there.

Now, that would bring on what I call conflict.

Senator WATKINS. That could be one that they might have had in mind?

Mr. CLAYTON. It could be.

Senator WATKINS. That is the first time anyone has ever been able to give me any light on that. I wondered what the clause meant; the whole paragraph, as a matter of fact. I thought we should know what they meant before we went into it. No one up to this point could throw any light on it.

Can you think of any others?

Mr. CLAYTON. When you speak of conflict, that means some very serious disagreements. I would not think you could include high tariffs in that.

Senator WATKINS. That causes a lot of trouble, does it not, in the world?

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, yes; high tariffs do cause a great deal of trouble. But I do not know that you could speak of it as a conflict unless there is some discrimination that is involved.

These impediments to the movement of goods certainly engender bad feelings between countries, and in time set up irritations which may lead to some kind of conflict.

Senator WATKINS. In your opinion would it not be very, very desirable to eliminate all tariffs between nations?

Mr. CLAYTON. I just do not think the world has quite got to the point yet where it can do that suddenly. It would bring about problems which it would take some time to work out, such as Senator Fulbright mentioned with respect to the attempt of Italy and France to come together in an economic union or customs union.

ELIMINATION OF TARIFF BARRIERS

Senator WATKINS. Suppose, Mr. Clayton, that the American people should authorize the President to immediately call a convention such as you have suggested as possibly the only way left to bring peace and to stop this idea of communism spreading, and we should go ahead and adopt that union and the nations would vote.

Would not that act alone eliminate tariffs as between the signatories, or I mean those who would come into the union?

Mr. CLAYTON. That would be a matter for the members to decide.

Senator WATKINS. That would be the ultimate goal, would it not, to eliminate immediately such barriers between the states—

Mr. CLAYTON. I would hope so. That was a decision which our Thirteen Colonies had to make when they federated, when they formed the Union later—as to whether they would have tariffs or not.

Our forefathers very wisely put into the Constitution that there could be no tariffs between the States.

Now, whether this Federal union that we are talking about here now would so decide, I have no means of knowing. I would hope they would so decide.

Senator WATKINS. That would be the aim of those who are sponsoring this particular movement, to have all of these trade barriers between the members of this particular union all removed; would it not?

Mr. CLAYTON. That would be my own idea, but I cannot speak for others.

Senator WATKINS. I want to get at just what is behind it, what is the ultimate aim of this particular organization you are talking about.

As a matter of fact, if that is the aim, all of these states that would come in, say Italy, France, Belgium, and all the rest of them, Denmark, Great Britain if she should come into this union, and we should form that type of union, in order to make it operate and to promote good feeling and a peaceful feeling, it would of necessity require that all trade barriers between those various countries, including ours, would have to be removed as we have removed them in this country.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think so; certainly not in the beginning. But as I said a moment ago, I would hope that that would be their decision; and as I also said, it was something that the Thirteen Colonies had to decide. They decided it, I think, as you would admit and as I believe, in the right way.

DIFFICULTIES IN REMOVING TARIFF BARRIERS

Senator WATKINS. I think that was absolutely right. Of course, we all lived on one continent; our economic conditions were very much the same, and we had common boundaries back and forth between us.

But you have got an entirely different situation when you take nations that have existed for many thousands of years, with all their extreme nationalities and the industries they have developed, many of which are in competition with ours. You would have a lot of difficulty, would you not, if you bring that group together and remove all barriers?

Mr. CLAYTON. May I say, Senator Watkins, that the distance in miles and in time between these Thirteen Colonies at the time they were formed into a union was much greater than it is between the countries represented in black on that map today. There were a great many better arguments for the retention of tariffs between those States at that time than there would be for the retention of tariffs between the members of the union that we are speaking of now under conditions as we find them today.

Senator WATKINS. You think the conditions then were much more difficult to overcome than this—

Mr. CLAYTON. These colonies were much more isolated, in the conditions of that time, than these countries are today.

Senator WATKINS. But they were without any industry. They were without any great conflicting interests, were they not?

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course, there was not any industry much anywhere.

Senator WATKINS. That is right. But now you take, for instance, to follow your analogy, and I think it is quite important to see whether this whole movement you are talking about is a substitute or a next step following this North Atlantic Pact.

COMPETITIVE POSITION OF UNITED STATES INDUSTRY

You have England, which has a large textile area; Belgium, the same way; France, more or less that way—all of them, Holland, probably not so much; Denmark, not so much; but you have strong competing countries with the United States. England and Belgium are strong competitors of the United States in an industrial way.

We had no colonies that were really competitors in an industrial way in the days when we formed our Federal Union.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; but nearly every one of them had something they wanted to protect.

Senator WATKINS. They all had something, but they were minor as compared with what would happen—

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly minor, because values in those days just did not run as high as they do today, and production was, of course, very minor then as compared with what it is now.

But you speak of competition. The difficulty that a great many of these countries have over there today is that they cannot compete with us. Just look at the exports from the United States.

Senator WATKINS. They would, though, if the barriers were taken down. They would in many respects if the barriers were taken down.

Mr. CLAYTON. No, no; I mean in the markets of the world, where the barriers to us are the same as they are to them.

Senator WATKINS. I mean in our own market.

Mr. CLAYTON. In the markets of Cuba, in the markets of South America; I mean in the free markets of the world, they have great difficulty in competing with us. All you have to do is to look at the commodities and the volume of the commodities that are exported from the United States today to see that our industries can compete with the world in the free markets.

Senator WATKINS. In some respects I think that is true, but as between England, today it wants to ship us woolen goods, worsted manufactured goods, in competition with our manufactured goods in New England. We have shipped them machinery so that now they are in a condition to compete with us.

They have a different standard of living, as I understand most of Europe has a much lower standard of living than the United States has.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, Senator, we get into a very difficult problem there. I could talk with you, if time permitted, about the woolen situation.

It so happens that we have never imported more than 5 percent of our total consumption of woolen goods in the United States for many, many years back, way back. We are exporting today a good deal more woolen goods than we are importing, which shows that we can meet these producers in the markets of the world.

There may be some specialties, certain kinds of goods, that they excel in, in the manufacture of certain specialties that our people like for example. We import those things.

But we are exporting a great deal more woolen goods than we are importing.

Senator WATKINS. I understand, but I cannot understand why, if that has been true, many of our mills in New England are closed today or running only part-time, a few days a week; and the English mills, as I understand it, are running full-time.

Mr. CLAYTON. We are importing extremely little of textiles, relatively; I mean relative to our consumption of either woolen or cotton textiles.

Senator WATKINS. I realize we are both getting into deep water here in these particular fields, but I was interested to know just what the objective of this group that you represent is.

AIMS OF ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE

Mr. CLAYTON. Senator Watkins, the only objective is, at the present time, to get a resolution through Congress authorizing the President to call this conference so that these representatives of these countries can sit down and explore as to how far they could go in this enterprise. That is the only objective.

Senator WATKINS. You have a belief also that if we once get into this North Atlantic Pact, it would be a much easier job to do what you next want to do?

Mr. CLAYTON. All of these evidences of cooperation among the democracies that we have had during and since the war have made it easier. Otherwise we would not be sitting here talking about this matter at all. It would not have been broached. There would not be any committee to promote it if the recent history of cooperation had not been written in the war and since the war, in many respects.

It is a gradual evolution up to this point.

Senator WATKINS. Then, the answer is, if I gather from what you say, that it would be much easier if we get into the Atlantic Pact to take the next step.

Mr. CLAYTON. The mere fact, Senator Watkins, that these countries have been willing to sit down and negotiate and agree upon this document and sign it makes it easier, of course.

Senator WATKINS. And if we get tied up with our affairs for 20 years, practically underwriting the peace over there for 20 years, we will be in so deep it will be difficult for us to get out. Then we may have to take them over and take them in as a part of the country, because there will be no other way out. Is that not right?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think it will come to that.

Senator WATKINS. It may not, but is that not a likely possibility?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to repeat that I think this document underwrites our peace as much as it does theirs.

RUSSIA AND HER PREWAR BOUNDARIES

Senator WATKINS. I will pass that over for the time being. I see we will never settle it this way. I would like to go to the statement you have made—I am quoting from page 5:

But there can be no peace in the world until Russia returns to her prewar boundaries.

If Russia does not voluntarily give up or return to her prewar boundaries, there will be war?

Mr. CLAYTON. Not necessarily, but there will not be peace. We have not got war today, that is, shooting war; but we have not got peace either.

Senator WATKINS. You cannot stay in that condition very long either, can you?

Mr. CLAYTON. I would hate to, but we have been that way now for nearly 4 years, and I do not know how much longer we will be that way.

Senator WATKINS. There is only one way, then, to get peace in the world, and that is to get Russia back to her prewar boundaries?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think that is the only way we will get anything like a lasting peace in the world.

Senator WATKINS. That should be our objective, should it not?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not say that it is our objective in a sense that we would go to war with Russia. I think I made it clear here that the problem is—

Senator WATKINS. I was just coming right up to a logical development of what you said, there cannot be any peace until Russia returns to her prewar boundaries, and our objective is universal peace or a lasting peace; the sooner we get Russia back within her boundaries, the sooner we will get that lasting peace. Does that not logically follow?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is absolutely right.

Senator WATKINS. That is what I have in mind, and the United Nations cannot do it. We have found that out.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think they can.

Senator WATKINS. And even if we did away with the veto and Russia would agree to the veto being eliminated, and we would say by passing the resolution here in an executive council that Russia is to get within her prewar boundaries and Russia said no, we would still have war and put her there, would we not, if we went through with the order?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not favor going to war to put her there.

Senator WATKINS. I do not either. But I am saying even if we did away with the veto in the United Nations—everybody has complained about that and said that is holding us up. But even if we did away with it, we could order things done by a majority vote, and the matter was finally put to a vote and the council would vote, say, 4 to 1 which would be, of course a majority, that Russia was to give up, that she was a threat to the peace of the world and she should get back within her boundaries, and Russia would not do it voluntarily, and apparently she would not, veto or no veto, it would mean a war to put her there or else going on as we are.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not think it would. I think that—

Senator WATKINS. What would happen under those circumstances?

DESEDITION OF SATELLITE COUNTRIES

Mr. CLAYTON. I think if we play our cards right, these satellite countries will, one by one, in time, fall away from Russia.

Senator WATKINS. Suppose they all did?

Mr. CLAYTON. Then she is back to her prewar boundaries.

Senator WATKINS. In Poland she already has something by agreement there, does she not?

Mr. CLAYTON. I beg your pardon?

Senator WATKINS. Russia has already taken over part of Poland by virtue of her agreement with Hitler.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is right.

Senator WATKINS. Suppose we told her to get back over the line where she was in the beginning before that war started, before Hitler gave her any of Poland?

Mr. CLAYTON. If she loses Poland and Czechoslovakia and the other central European countries, she will go back to her prewar boundaries.

Senator WATKINS. That of course is a possibility that she might, but she would not lose that unless we tried to set her back. In other words, if she is strong enough now to challenge us and to challenge these 11 nations, she certainly will not be in any military difficulty with the nations that lie immediately on her border, the way she has her people in complete control. Is that not right?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am sorry. I did not get your statement.

Senator WATKINS. What I have in mind is this, that if she now has control of these nations that are on her border, most of them are satellites, she has her people in control and in power, I say if she is strong enough to challenge us and to make us spend $15,500,000,000 a year, and to want to increase the armament of all the other people, she should not have any difficulty holding these satellites.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think she will.

Senator WATKINS. That is a different—

Mr. CLAYTON. Even if we go on as we are, she is going to have difficulties holding them, because their economy is not complementary to the Russian economy. The economies are too much alike.

The central European countries need much that Russia cannot furnish them that they must buy from the west. They need to sell much that Russia does not want, because of the things she produces herself; therefore the economies of Russia and her satellite countries in central Europe are not complementary.

The economy of these satellite countries is complementary to the west, not to the east.

Senator WATKINS. Politically how would they get out from under her control?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not say that politically, if we go on as we are now, she is going to lose them. I do not say that. I say she would have difficulty in holding them, and I think what has happened in Yugoslavia is proof of that.

OVEREXTENSION OF RUSSIA

Senator WATKINS. She has taken on more, in other words, than she can comfortably digest?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think so.

Senator WATKINS. And if she takes on the rest of Europe, she will still have a heavier digestive load?

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, yes, she will have plenty of trouble.

Senator WATKINS. If she has trouble with what she has now, her troubles will be multiplied and probably will be way out of her control.

Mr. CLAYTON. They are used to trouble.

Senator WATKINS. But if they get too much of it, like all other big nations of history, they go down from having bitten off more than they could chew.

Mr. CLAYTON. They may, Senator Watkins, but they might take all the rest of us down with them.

Senator WATKINS. That could happen, of course. That all depends on how we behave ourselves over here, whether we watch our steps, whether we keep within our means, and whether or not we keep from taking on more than we can masticate.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish it depended on that.

Senator WATKINS. Well, it does to a certain extent. I think you will agree.

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, to a certain extent, yes.

Senator WATKINS. We can go beyond our capacity. I say it is a very easy matter for us to go beyond our capacity. I think you have already indicated that.

Mr. CLAYTON. We could.

Senator WATKINS. And there is a danger now, even with this rearmament and in this cold war, of political disintegration not only for Europe but for us. You have already mentioned this in connection with this depression that might come.

Mr. CLAYTON. There is danger that the burden will get too heavy for us.

Senator WATKINS. And it is even threatened now, if we should get a depression. You have mentioned that.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; that is right.

Senator WATKINS. I think I have nothing more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much, Mr. Clayton. You have made a very splendid statement, and I will leave that copy of that treaty with you, if you care to take it along.

Mr. CLAYTON. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I had a question or two, but the discussion has been protracted, so I will waive my right to interrogate you.

Mr. Carey.

STATEMENT OF JAMES B. CAREY, SECRETARY-TREASURER, CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. CAREY. My name is James B. Carey. I am secretary-treasurer of the Congress of Industrial Organizations—

The CHAIRMAN. Popularly known as the CIO?

Mr. CAREY. Popularly known as the CIO—and come before this committee to testify on behalf of the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

CIO STATEMENT ON ATLANTIC PACT

On March 20, 1949, the CIO issued the following statement on the Atlantic Pact:

The Congress of Industrial Organizations supports firmly an American foreign policy aimed at strengthening the political and economic condition of freemen everywhere. The European recovery program has had the CIO's unwavering support from its inception, not only from the point of view of organized labor, but also from the traditional American point of view of helping a freeman to help himself. The astonishing and heartening comeback of western Europe proves that our faith in the ERP was well-founded.

The CIO regrets the present-day conditions which make the North Atlantic Pact necessary. But no man can work effectively in an atmosphere tense with fear and foreboding. A pact with our neighbors will prove conclusively to them and to the rest of the world that America stands on her word and is ready to cooperate within the limits of her resources to preserve the social and political freedom of the North Atlantic community.

The Soviet Union has done everything in its power, short of war, to wreck the ERP. The powerful Russian propaganda machine has lost no opportunity to sow the seeds of fear and distrust among the nations of western Europe. In the opinion of the CIO, the North Atlantic Pact is the necessary reply to this terroristic campaign.

More important than that, however, is the fact that the pact will insure the full operation of the ERP. The CIO would not support a pact which diverted money aimed for reconstruction to the purchase of arms. Fortunately that is not the purpose of this agreement, and the CIO is happy to go on record as a firm supporter of the principles and purposes of the North Atlantic Pact.

REASONS FOR ATLANTIC TREATY

It is our opinion that the conclusion of the North Atlantic Pact with the democratic countries of western Europe is sound American foreign policy in the light of international conditions as they have developed during the last 3 years.

The break-down of the wartime unity between the United States and the Soviet Union was followed by the excessive use of the veto power by the Soviet Union to disrupt the work of the United Nations and a series of tactics in the international field which are known as the cold war. The United States has been compelled, because of its desire to support free political and economic life, to elaborate a series of policies in complete conformity with the United Nations Charter but outside of the United Nations structure. It is our opinion that the Atlantic Pact is a necessary development following the Truman doctrine and the European recovery program.

PRIORITY OF ECONOMIC RECOVERY

In the statement which I quoted above, our organization said that it would not support a pact which diverted money from reconstruction to military purposes and it is our understanding that this pact will not require any such diversion. We still believe that one of the major threats of communism against the free world is the exploitation of economic distress and economic chaos.

The Tenth Constitutional Convention of the Congress of Industrial Organizations held in Portland, Oreg., in November 1948, adopted a resolution on foreign policy which read in part as follows:

We condemn the organized opposition to the ERP by the Soviet Union and its satellites and the method by which the economic misery of Europe is used for political advantage and to promote chaos and confusion. One of the ways to peace is the abandonment of this short-sighted and unjust opposition.

Although, therefore, economic reconstruction remains a major task, as we constantly learn from our trade-union friends in western Europe, economic recovery itself is being handicapped and delayed by the uncertainty and insecurity that arises from the fear of military aggression from the east. An outstanding example of this hindrance to economic recovery, although a slightly different character, is provided by the discussions regarding the revival of the industries of the Ruhr Valley.

Our European friends who in the past have had so much reason to fear the potential military value of this area have naturally been reluctant to agree to its economic restoration unless there were reasonable grounds for believing that its tremendous productive capacity would not be transformed into yet another military assault against them.

It would, indeed, be ironic if, after having taken all the necessary steps to prevent such a use of the Ruhr industries in the hands of Germans, western Europe was left so undefended that after they have been reconstructed they could be seized by another potential enemy for the destruction of what remains of western European democracy.

DEFENSE NATURE OF THE PACT

We support the Atlantic Pact because we believe it is purely defensive in character. It is the answer to fears of aggression in Europe which result from the presence of enormous standing armies in the east. The resolution already cited above also states:

We condemn vigorously all assumptions of the inevitability of another world war. We reaffirm the basic devotion of the American people to peace and reject as absurd and unfounded the charge of the Soviet Union of warmongering unfairly directed against us. We are confident that the will of the people in every country, if freely expressed, would quickly end minority propaganda for war. The Soviet-imposed blockade of Berlin is a danger to the preservation of peace.

We condemn the use of military power to enforce economic policies which deprive 2½ million men, women, and children, of medicine, food, clothing, and fuel. We commend the courage and fortitude of the men and women operating the airlift which has prevented the success of such callous action. A solution to the present crisis in Berlin can be found if the use of political and economic coercion is renounced and the four powers can resume discussions free from economic and military threats.

It is because of the continued existence of these threats that the western European powers have welcomed the opportunity to join with us in this treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much, Mr. Carey. Your considered opinion is that this is a treaty in behalf of peace, and that there is nothing in it suggestive of aggression or conquest or anything of that kind? Is that true?

Mr. CAREY. Yes, sir; that is true of our own Nation, and the purposes of our Nation in attempting to bring this treaty about, as well as the people of the nations I visited recently.

I have had the opportunity of being in Europe a great number of times in the last few years. In addition to that, I have been in the Soviet Union three times in the last few years. The last time was just a year ago at this time.

I do believe that the ratification of this Atlantic Treaty will help clarify the atmosphere in Europe as well as in the United States and also, I might say, especially in the Soviet Union.

The CHAIRMAN. I thank you very much for the committee. We greatly appreciate your presence and your testimony.

The committee will stand in recess until tomorrow at 10:30 a. m., in this room.

(Thereupon, at 4:40 p. m., the committee recessed until Thursday, 10:30 a. m., May 5, 1949.)

THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to adjournment on May 4, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee), presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), Thomas of Utah, McMahon, Fulbright, Vandenberg, Wiley, and Hickenlooper.

Also present: Senators Ferguson, Donnell, and Watkins.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order, as well as the audience.

We have been having the Committee on Foreign Relations hearings on the North Atlantic Pact. We have been hearing a good many witnesses on the pact, principally those who favor its ratification. Today we will hear some of the witnesses who are opposed to ratification.

We have the pleasure of having with us former Vice President Wallace, also the former Secretary of Commerce, whom we invite to discuss the matter and submit his views to the committee. You have a prepared statement, I assume, Mr. Wallace?

Mr. WALLACE. I have, Senator Connally, and thank you for the kindness of the introduction. And, if you do not mind, I was Secretary of Agriculture for a little while.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right. Insert that in the record, Mr. Reporter.

After you shall have concluded your formal statement you will be willing to submit to questions, of course?

Mr. WALLACE. Of course.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well, Mr. Wallace. Proceed.

STATEMENT OF HON. HENRY A. WALLACE, REPRESENTING THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF AMERICA

Mr. WALLACE. Two years ago when President Truman announced the Truman doctrine of containing Russia and communism at every point I predicted it would cause us to bleed from every pore. I said that it was a vain and hopeless policy to contain an idea with guns; that the cost would be fantastically high, that it could have no end but war.

DANGERS OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

The North Atlantic Military Pact is now taking us toward that end. It would make all Europe into a Greece, and perhaps a China.

It demands spending by Americans without limit in dollars or time. It will create an intolerable burden on our own people, exacting lower living standards and the loss of fundamental freedoms.

The pact destroys the chances of European recovery. A permanently militarized Europe is doomed to living on an American dole. And it will accelerate all those social strains and increase that poverty which are the breeding ground for the very doctrine that it would contain. The pact is not an instrument of defense but a military alliance designed for aggression. It bypasses the United Nations and violates its Charter in a most flagrant manner. It takes away from Congress the power to declare war and lodges it in the hands of a military staff 3,000 miles from the seat of our Government. It becomes the instrument for intervention in the internal affairs of Europe. It divides the world permanently into two armed camps. And it provocatively establishes military bases on the borders of the Soviet Union.

DOCTRINE OF CONTAINMENT

I am confident that if we examine the maze of contradictions and difficulties into which the pact leads us, we shall reject it, as well as the arms program with which it is linked, and the doctrine of containment on which both rest. That doctrine is not an American doctrine, but a policy first advocated and since pursued by Mr. Churchill. It has failed ever since Mr. Churchill failed to "strangle bolshevism," as he puts it, in 1919. With but a short interlude during the war, Mr. Churchill has steadily adhered to a doctrine which can serve only the domestic purposes of reaction and the narrow interests of a decaying imperialism.

It is not the business of an American, in or out of the Senate or executive branches of Government, to further the policies of Mr. Churchill—and the small group of military men and imperialists who join him.

It is the business of an American to look after our own national interest. For more than 3 years now, we have been wasting our resources in furthering the narrow interests represented by Mr. Churchill. The end of that policy can only be a war from which we have nothing to gain—even should we be fortunate enough to win a military victory.

There will be only the loss of trillions of dollars and untold millions of American lives, and, in all likelihood, the end of our system of government.

It is the plain duty of every American to stop and reconsider this policy which will bankrupt our people, create intolerable burdens on both America and Europe, and can have no end but war. I assert that that policy has been a failure in any realistic sense during the past 3 years, a failure that is spelled out for us every day in the headlines from China. It is written into our tax payments. It is apparent in the bogging down in this Congress of the promised program of domestic reform, and in the lengthening lines of the unemployed.

I say that the time has come to substitute for the war policy a peace policy which will restore the basis of great-power unity within the United Nations and build a productive world.

INCOMPATIBILITY WITH UNITED NATIONS

I ask this committee—in this spirit—to examine with me the pact and the testimony which has been presented to you in its support.

In his appearance before your committee, Secretary of State Acheson said: "The hopes of the American people for peace with freedom and justice are based on the United Nations." To this statement I most heartily subscribe.

But when Mr. Acheson claims that the pact "is an essential instrument for strengthening the United Nation," he is being far less than frank with the American people.

For the plain fact is that the pact substitutes for the one world of the United Nations the two hostile worlds of a "divided nation." Moreover, it flagrantly violates the plain provisions of the Charter itself.

The United Nations as envisioned by Franklin Roosevelt arose from the determination of the war-weary peoples to abandon power blocs and military alliances for a world organization based on the agreement of the great powers to work together as sovereign and equal nations for the maintenance of world peace.

Secretary of State Stettinius, appearing before this committee just 4 years ago, made our choice clear. He told you that there were two postwar roads open to the United States—one the road of great-power alliances, the other the road of collective security through the United Nations.

He made it clear that the United States was rejecting the first road because it was alien to our traditions, because it was warlike, and because it could not secure the peace.

He said:

We know that for the United States—and for other great powers—there can be no humanly devised method of defining precisely the geographic areas in which their security interests begin or cease to exist. We realize, in short, that each is a world-wide problem and that the maintenance of peace, and not merely its restoration, depends primarily upon the unity of the great powers.

There were theoretically two alternative means of preserving this unity—said Secretary Stettinius.

The first was through the formation of a permanent alliance among the great powers. This method might have been justified on narrow, strategic grounds, but it would have been repugnant to our traditional policy. It also would have contained elements of danger because it might have been interpreted as a menace by nations not party to it. Accordingly, this method was rejected.

The second method was through the establishment of a general security system based upon the principle of sovereign equality of all nations. The provisions for the Security Council recognize the special responsibilities of the great powers for maintaining the peace and the fact that the maintenance of their unity is the crucial political problem of our time.

This is from the report to the President by Secretary Stettinius on the results of the San Francisco Conference on June 26, 1945, appearing in hearings before the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Seventy-ninth Congress, first session, July 8, 1946, page 72.

Yet today, Mr. Acheson presses upon your committee a treaty which embodies the very policy that our Nation rejected 4 years ago. And he does so in the name of strengthening the United Nations.

The Wall Street Journal, with which I do not often agree, spoke the blunt truth when it said that "propaganda notwithstanding, the Atlantic Pact does nullify the principle of the United Nations," and marks "the triumph of jungle law over international cooperation on a world scale."

The pact not only rejects the basic principles upon which the United Nations was founded. It violates the plain provisions of the Charter.

REGIONALISM AND THE TREATY

Initially an attempt was made to justify the pact as a regional agreement under article 52. That attempt now appears to have been abandoned. The argument that a pact covering all the territory from the Aleutian Islands to the Mediterranean and from north Africa to Scandinavia constitutes a "regional agreement" is too thin even for our State Department. Indeed, the argument now runs the other way. It is now insisted that the pact is not a regional agreement. For the State Department has belatedly recognized that if it were, any enforcement measures would require Security Council authorization under article 53, the very procedure which the authors of the pact want desperately to avoid by bypassing the United Nations entirely.

SELF-DEFENSE AND THE TREATY

The proponents of the pact argue that it is authorized by article 51 of the Charter which preserves the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense "if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations." But this article affords no support for the military alliance contemplated by the pact. It simply preserves the inherent right of every nation to repel invasion. It is not a blind behind which military alliances outside of the United Nations can be freely entered into. No armed attack has "occurred" against which the Charter authorizes measures of self-defense. Article 51 does not permit a group of nations to determine for themselves that there is a potential threat of aggression and to enter into an alliance outside of the United Nations for the purpose of resisting it when it comes. To do so would destroy the supreme power of the Security Council to determine the existence of aggression and threats to peace.

The emergency situation to which article 51 addresses itself is similarly dealt with in section 10 of article 1 of our own Constitution.

This section prohibits the separate States, without the consent of Congress, to make an agreement or compact with another State or engage in war, "unless actually invaded or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

I cannot believe, if the State of Michigan feared a possible attack from Canada—that Senator Vandenberg would argue the constitutional right of his State to enter into a compact with Texas, or Florida, to raise an army, organize a joint military council, and engage in other armed preparations in the name of self-defense. Section 10 of article 1 of our Constitution does not supersede the war and treaty-making powers of the National Government.

No more does article 51 of the Charter supersede the peace-making powers of the Security Council.

Yet that is exactly the interpretation which our State Department would place upon it.

Not only does the pact destroy the basis on which the United Nations was founded and violate its Charter. It would also appear to make impossible a return to the one-world principle.

AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

For article 8 of the pact provides that "each power undertakes not to enter any international engagement in conflict with this treaty."

The pact, in purpose and effect, is directed against the Soviet Union. Once signed, the obligation of article 8 would preclude the United States from negotiating a treaty of peace and friendship with the Soviet Union. Thus, the pact not only denies that peaceful one-world understanding is attainable. It would make the attainment of that understanding impossible.

If, as Mr. Acheson has said and as I believe, the hopes of the American people "for peace with freedom and justice are based on the United Nations," then I say with all the earnestness of which I am capable that ratification of this pact which violates the solemn pledge our Nation took when it signed the Charter and destroys the principle on which the United Nations was founded, will doom these hopes and betray the peace that America and its allies won at so great a cost.

It is urged, however, that we must abandon the one-world principle upon which the United Nations is based, return to the old way of power blocs and armaments races, and incur the terrible risk of war because of the threat of Soviet aggression.

Is there really such a threat?

THREAT OF SOVIET AGGRESSION

Every spokesman for the administration who appeared before this committee insisted that the pact is an essential measure of self-defense against Russian aggression. But none of them suggested that the Russians threaten or even intend to use armed force as an instrument of their national policy. On the contrary, the two principal Republican leaders of the bipartisan foreign policy have given us the most explicit assurance that the contrary is true.

Speaking in Cleveland on March 9, John Foster Dulles told the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America:

So far as it is humanly possible to judge, the Soviet Government does not contemplate the use of war as an instrument of its national policy.

I do not know any responsible high official, military or civilian in this Government or any government, who believes that the Soviet state now plans conquest by open military aggression.

And only last month, Senator Vandenberg wrote:

War is the last implement they (the Russians) want to invoke.

Thus the warlike alliance implicit in the Atlantic Pact and the tremendous show of armed might with which it is proposed that the pact shall be implemented is concededly not prompted by any military threat from the Russians.

It is urged, however, that the Soviets are intransigent and uncompromising; that agreement with them is impossible of attainment, and that only a show of force can bring them to terms.

UNITED STATES-SOVIET RELATIONS

The first question to which I submit that your committee must find an answer is: What are our Nation's terms? What are the conditions on which we are prepared to end the undeclared war we are now waging and negotiate a settlement with Russia?

These terms have never been stated. Instead, the administration has persistently refused every invitation extended by the Russians to state them.

If it is unconditional surrender that we would exact from the Russians, then indeed we will have to wage a war to gain it. For unconditional surrender cannot be won from a strong and proud people. It can only be imposed on a defeated enemy.

If the demands are for something less, then why the hesitance to state our terms? Why the cold rejection—at least three times in the past year, of the Soviet offers to talk peace?

It is not my purpose here to review the difficult and tragic course of Soviet-American relations since the death of President Roosevelt in April 1945. But I say that no honest and objective student of the events of these 4 years can conclude that the failure of agreement can be laid wholly on the Russian doorstep.

BERLIN CRISIS

Let me cite but one example—the question of the Berlin blockade. As you all remember, Premier Stalin took the initiative last summer in proposing a settlement of this highly controversial and most dangerous question by offering to lift the blockade simultaneously with the acceptance by the western powers of the Soviet mark as the exclusive currency for Berlin.

The agreement which resulted in Moscow and raised the hopes of the whole world for an over-all settlement with Russia was blocked in Berlin. Was the failure to solve the Berlin crisis and thus to pave the way for a general settlement of the whole German question a result of Russian intransigence and refusal to compromise?

Senator Connally is authority for the fact that the exact contrary was true. In a transcript of his press conference on November 29, upon his return from Europe, he said:

The plan proposed by the earlier talks was not looked on with favor by the military governors who did not accept it.

In plainer words, the agreement reached by our diplomats in Moscow was kicked overboard by the military men in Berlin.

Is it not clear that last fall it was the Americans and not the Russians who were intransigent and uncompromising—who really didn't want a settlement of the Berlin question?

More recent events only confirm this view.

On March 21 of this year, the Russians confirmed to our State Department what was clearly foreshadowed in Premier Stalin's interview with Kingsbury Smith 2 months before—that they were prepared to lift the Berlin blockade on the sole condition that a meeting of the Foreign Ministers be convened to discuss the German question.

Yet, for a full month the State Department concealed from the American people this further Russian concession in an effort to settle a key controversy. It was revealed only when the Russian news agency, Tass, disclosed that the offer had been made and that negotiations were pending. I wonder how many members of this committee heard this important and hopeful news from the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue before they read it from Moscow?

In the meantime the State Department was filling the press and the radio with stories about Russian aggressiveness, intensifying the atmosphere of fear and hostility which it evidently thinks necessary to assure the ratification and implementation of the Atlantic Pact.

I charge that the story of this Russian initiative for peace was deliberately withheld from the American people and the American Congress because it explodes the myth on which the North Atlantic Pact is based and destroys the basis on which it is being sold to the American people.

Last night's and this morning's headlines carry the welcome news that agreement has now been reached to lift the Berlin blockade and convene a meeting of the Foreign Ministers.

SETTLEMENT OF DIFFERENCES WITH RUSSIA

Nothing must be done to prejudice the success of these negotiations. Every delay in arriving at an understanding with the Russians has cost us dearly in American dollars, American prestige, and world peace.

We would have been in an infinitely better moral position if my exchange of letters with Premier Stalin last spring had been followed up with the discussions that were then proposed. We would have been in a stronger position if the Stalin proposal to lift the Berlin blockade had been consummated last summer—and we would have saved at least $13,000,000 a month in the cost of the air lift.

I propose, therefore, that this committee withhold any action on the North Atlantic Pact pending the outcome of the Foreign Ministers Conference which it now seems certain will be convened.

If our Government sincerely desires a peaceful arrangement with the Soviet Union on the vital German question, then we must approach her with the peace of good faith negotiations not with the sword of the Atlantic Pact.

This is our great, and it may be our last, opportunity to arrive at a peaceful settlement of our differences. By withholding action on the pact pending the Foreign Ministers Conference, this committee can make a material contribution to the successful outcome of the Berlin negotiations and this new hope for world peace and understanding.

I have shown that even the most ardent proponents of the pact do not contend that the Soviet Union threatens or plans a war against the West. I have shown too that here is no evidence that peaceful understanding with Russia cannot be obtained if our Government frankly states its terms and sits down in good faith negotiations to obtain them.

EFFECT ON RUSSIA OF THE TREATY

If this be true, as I believe it is, then how must the North Atlantic Pact appear to the Russians? Can they interpret it as anything but a plan of aggression on our part? Stripped of legal verbiage, the pact moves American military and air bases up to the very borders of the Soviet Union, establishes a general staff on the European Continent, arms western Europe and places it on a war footing.

Recently a national conference of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, representing all Protestant denominations, declared:

No defensive alliance should be entered into which might validly appear as aggressive to Russia, as a Russian alliance would undoubtedly appear to us.

If we apply this Christian principle to the Atlantic Pact, its meaning to the Russians becomes clear.

Suppose the Soviet Union entered into an alliance with Mexico, Canada, and Cuba, built airstrips on their soil, established a joint chiefs of staff in Habana, and supplied its allies with billions in arms?

Could we be convinced that the treaty which surrounded us with this military might was a pact of peace?

Could we be prevailed on to avoid the countermeasures for our own defense which would inevitably take us down the road to war?

CONSTITUTIONAL ASPECT OF TREATY

The American people too, are entitled to a fuller, franker, and more candid exposition of American aims and objectives under the pact than they have yet been given.

I have read Secretary of State Acheson's efforts to reconcile the pact with the constitutional power of Congress to declare war. I am no lawyer—let alone a constitutional lawyer. But I think I can understand the English language. And when the pact says that an armed attack (provoked or unprovoked) against one of the signatory nations shall be deemed to be an attack against them all, I regard this as not only a moral, but a contractual commitment to go to war without a declaration by the Congress.

And when I know, in addition, that the pact provides for American participation in the Joint General Staff, already established at Fontainebleau, with power to command the movement of troops, long-range bombers, and warships, then I must conclude that the power to commit this country to war has been moved 3,000 miles away from the Chambers of this Capitol, to quarters in an ancient French palace.

SUPPLYING AMERICAN TROOPS TO EUROPE

Another vital question to which the American people are entitled to a full and frank answer is whether any American troops will be quartered in Europe and subject to the command of the Fontainebleau military staff.

I have not had an opportunity to read the testimony before this committee in full. My information comes from the press. There, on April 28, I read that Secretary Acheson assured the committee that—

There was absolutely no intention to send substantial numbers of American troops to Europe in any eventuality short of war.

But on April 29, I read that Secretary of Defense Johnson—declined for what he called the "best interests" of the United States and western Europe to respond to a question by Senator Donnell as to whether a plan was in preparation to provide manpower to Europe along the Rhine.

I ask the members of this committee, in all conscience, whether you are prepared to act on the pact on the basis of such contradictions, half truths, and evasions? Shall we wager the peace of the world and the lives of Americans on this kind of testimony?

ECONOMIC RECOVERY IN EUROPE

Mr. Acheson told your committee that one of the objectives of the pact was—to establish an arrangement which would * * * promote full economic recovery through removing the drag of a sense of insecurity.

Last year the American people were assured by Mr. Acheson's predecessor that the Marshall plan, by contributing to the economic recovery of western Europe, would make an arms program unnecessary. Today, we have the Marshall plan. It has not succeeded. The report of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation made it perfectly clear that at the end of the Marshall plan, Europe will be suffering from a deficit of $3,000,000,000 annually and the standard of living of her people will be 10 percent below the not-too-prosperous year of 1938.

Now, we are told that the cure for this failure is exactly the medicine that the Marshall plan was to make unnecessary—a military alliance and a rearmament program. This is bad politics and worse economics.

There is not a nation in western Europe which is not suffering from inflation, which does not have difficulty balancing its budget, which does not need every single able-bodied man and woman to rebuild its economy. Yet the pact and its arms program now propose to saddle these nations with an intolerable burden of armaments.

Mr. Acheson made it clear just how great that burden would be when he said that for every dollar of American arms sent to Europe, the European nations would be required to furnish 6 or 7 dollars. We plan to supply them with 1.1 billions in arms next year. Their military budgets already exceed 5.2 billion dollars annually.

Does Mr. Acheson seriously think that his requirement that the European nations shall more than double their arms spending next year will "promote full economic recovery"?

Does Mr. Acheson, or anyone else, seriously believe that the "drag of a sense of insecurity" will be removed when a nation is forced to double its military budget?

I submit the answer to a vote of this committee. Senator George, as chairman of the Finance Committee, has expressed grave doubts about the addition of 1.1 billion dollars of arms under the pact to our present military budget. But that amounts to a little more than a 7-percent increase. It is only  $2\frac{1}{2}$  percent of our total budget. Yet we are genuinely worried about the effect such an increase would have on our economy—and most important, on the confidence of our businessmen.

EFFECT OF ARMS PROGRAM ON EUROPE

Does Mr. Acheson think that there are one set of economic laws that operate in America and quite another in Europe? I say that the effect of the arms program will be to destroy forever western Europe's chances of recovery. And what will be its effect on the people of western Europe to whom we look as allies? It is bound to result in sharp cuts in their programs for social welfare and a serious deterioration in their living standards.

Senator Giua, a member of the Italian Senate who is visiting me, has told me something about the growing problem of unemployment in Italy at the same time that large-scale Italian industries such as Fiat are turning from the making of tractors to the making of tanks and machine guns.

Does this sit well with a half-starved people? Let me read you what an active French political leader has written in judgment on this policy:

Under present conditions it is impossible to increase both civilian and military production. To impose a program of military production on western Europe is to paralyze a civilian production that is already far from sufficient. That would mean creating living conditions socially and politically favorable to the Communists. (From an article by David Rousset, in the Nation, April 9.)

But even as the pact creates the conditions favorable to Communists, it also sets up the machinery, according to Mr. Acheson, for military intervention in the internal affairs of the pact nations, after the pattern we have followed in Greece.

I submit that a pact which has these consequences is too dangerous for sane men to adopt. It creates the conditions of uncertainty and despair. It lowers living conditions and creates the conditions for communism. Then it provides the means for suppressing the very condition it created.

Such a policy can serve no good. It can only earn us the hatred of every European, regardless of his politics.

COST OF THE ARMS PROGRAM

Senator Vandenberg said last week that the 1.1 billion-dollar arms program that has been tied to the pact is "comparatively trivial" and "relatively insignificant."

That judgment may well be prophetic. It is trivial by comparison with the fantastic and endless spending for arms that the pact will set in motion. And it is insignificant relative to the costs that weigh more heavily than money costs—the cost in less welfare, the cost in reduced freedom, the cost of a growing militarization of our way of life.

The money cost of the pact will be fantastic. Mark Sullivan, the most conservative of the columnists, pointed out only last week that the doctrine of containment having failed so miserably in China means that there is no end to the billions we shall have to spend in western Europe and Japan. The House has recently approved more than $15,000,000,000 for the military budget for next year, an increase of almost a billion over the President's budget estimate. And it has been estimated that we have already spent over $24,000,000,000 on the cold war to date.

I measure those expenditures in terms of what we have been deprived of—housing, slum clearance, cheaper power for farms and industry, the development of our great river valleys, hospitals and schools, better social security. But these losses are as nothing compared to the greater losses to come as the full impact of the arms program is felt.

The relatively low estimate for the first year of this military program is in itself a gross deception. The administration asks for only 1.1 billion dollars. We are told that about half of this will be in "surplus arms," valued at 10 cents on the dollar. But Colonel Johnson, in his testimony on April 21 before this committee, made it perfectly clear that the National Military Establishment wants this surplus replaced. The New York Times reported as follows:

Secretary Johnson was understood, however, to have made it plain that the National Military Establishment expected to be paid back in time for all equipment that might be taken from its arsenal.

The bill for replacement will not be 10 cents on the dollar, nor even a dollar on the dollar, but considerably more because the equipment shipped abroad will be replaced at higher prices and with more expensive models.

The United States News put it this way:

Europe in the first year is to get $4,520,000,000 of United States arms, written down to $452,000,000 to calm taxpayers. Replacement cost of arms to be given might be around $8,000,000,000.

The New York Times characterized this transaction as "A liberal system of bookkeeping." I would call it a plain fraud on the American taxpayer. It is the method of confidence men, not of statesmen. It is the obligation of this committee to read the fine print on the contract they are being asked to sign on behalf of the American people; to determine the full cost, and the real cost, not only for next year but for succeeding years.

MILITARY DEFENSE OF EUROPE

There are apparently two schools of thought concerning the military defense of Europe. Both are equally costly. One school would use American long-range bombers and European manpower. That is the Air Force point of view, so callously expressed by a venerable Member of Congress last week. His comment may rank with young Mussolini's description of the "beauty" of dropping bombs on defenseless children in Madrid. The other school is represented by the leaders of most of the western European nations and by General Bradley—if I understand his Army Day speech and recent testimony before your committee. They would send sufficient American soldiers abroad to hold the Rhine or Elbe or whatever line is chosen as the new Maginot line of western Europe. Since the arms program is so definitely tied to the pact, it is the duty of this committee to scrutinize the costs of these two different strategic concepts.

The Brussels Pact powers recently said they required 36 to 70 divisions of their own. The cost of equipping a modern division is estimated at between $200,000,000 and $400,000,000. The story from Brussels gave the latter figure. That means a total of fourteen to twenty-eight billion dollars for a small force which has comparatively little defensive value. This figure does not take into account the billions for planes, for ships, for military bases, for equipment docks and airfields, and for raw materials and equipment. It is reasonably certain that the minimum rearming of western Europe will exceed $20,000,000,000—more likely it will come to $30,000,000,000. But this is minimum rearming, and it must be squeezed into a very short time.

If there is a war, 36 to 70 divisions will only make a Dunkerque of all Europe. Hitler's 300 divisions could not stop the Russians. And M. Queuille, the French Premier, has hinted that America must defend all of France. Military experts say this would require a million American soldiers. So the cost will soar into many times $30,000,000,000. It will mean a compulsory draft; it will mean strict controls over manpower to provide American manpower overseas and reserves in this country.

That way may be one way of eliminating the unemployment that is already upon us, but it is scarcely the way that sane men would choose when they have an alternative.

If we choose the method of long-range bombers, the bill is not appreciably less. The cost of a bomber is anywhere from two and one-half to four million dollars. New models cost more. Bombers need protection and they need bases and they need servicing, and above all, they still need ground force somewhere along the way.

NEGLECT OF WELFARE NEEDS

Last January when the President released his budget I warned that the size of the military spending was seriously endangering our welfare needs, that it was unnecessarily cutting appropriations for housing, for veterans, for schools, for roads and power, and for the development of natural resources.

Dr. Nourse, the President's Economic Adviser, has since confirmed this statement. On April 7, he said:

To provide even $15,000,000,000 for military spending he [Truman] had to hold down on recommendations for maintenance or expansion of the Nation's natural resources and its public plant and limit the scale of social services for education, health, and social security far below the level of his own deferred civilian needs are still there, ready to employ any manpower or block of materials made available by reduction of our preparedness effort * * *.

Any increase in military spending takes its toll in human welfare. In the same week that the House voted to increase the military budget, the Agriculture appropriation was cut by $25,000,000 and Public Works by 15 percent.

I should like to point out to any who think that an arms program is the cure for economic crisis, that Government spending is now running at the rate of six to seven billion dollars a year above 1948. Much of the increase is for the military. Yet industrial production is today down 7 percent. Farm income is off $2,000,000,000 a year. Small business failures are rising to alarming proportions. Pay rolls of factory workers are off $4,000,000,000 per year. Unemployment and part-time employment are becoming major problems.

In Detroit, 60,000 jobs were lost in 4 months.

In the Chicago Federal Reserve District unemployment has mounted to 575,000.

The New York City relief commissioner estimates that more than a million residents belong to families whose principal breadwinner is unemployed.

The arms program to date has not meant jobs or profits to the 98 percent of Americans who neither own nor work in munitions factories. Arms spending is definitely not a WPA with guns.

Since January it has become perfectly clear that the President's Fair Deal program has virtually collapsed under the pressure of a foreign policy that demands more and more money for military uses and more and more compromise to achieve its ends.

THREAT TO LIBERTIES

Two months ago, the administration abdicated on civil rights and now it is abdicating on repeal of Taft-Hartley. Equality for the 13,000,000 Negro Americans and a free labor movement for American workers have both fallen victim to the growing atmosphere of repression and restraint that is the inevitable accompaniment of a war-breeding foreign policy. In the name of the anticommunism which dominates our foreign policy, precious freedoms are being lost. Men are afraid to speak because they may lose their jobs in an atmosphere of terror and repression.

And now, freedom of thought itself is again under attack as the Senate Judiciary Committee rushes hearings on the 1949 versions of the Mundt thought-control bill.

The loss of freedom of thought—the loss of freedom to criticize what you think is wrong; the loss of the right to say no—is even more serious than the hundreds of billions we will eventually lose in the cold war.

That is why I was so appalled by the deliberate denial of visas by the State Department to my good friends Pierre Cot of France and Konni Zilliacus of England, members of Parliament in both countries, leaders in the fight against the forces of fascism in the days when theirs was not everywhere a popular cause and leaders today in the fight for peace.

It is shocking that we should subject members of the oldest parliament in Europe, our fellow democracies, to such a humiliating experience.

But it is indeed more shocking and indeed sobering that they were barred from this country by a man who once was an associate of the late Justice Holmes, our most eloquent advocate of free trade in ideas.

It is indeed a tragic commentary on the state of our American democracy that the anti-Communist fear complex has claimed the mind of our own Secretary of State.

AMERICAN POLICY IN GREECE

The policy of the pact has been given a laboratory test in Greece. The results in that country to date scarcely commend it extension on the vastly greater scale now proposed.

An enterprising reporter who examined and compared the successive reports of the President on Greece calls our experience there the greatest military miracle of all time.

After 2 years and the expenditure of more than a quarter of a billion dollars, with a reputed casualty rate of 640 percent, there are more guerillas in Greece today than when the Truman doctrine was first invoked on behalf of that unhappy country.

Should we not seriously examine a policy which has yielded such results? The truth is that the Greek impasse is susceptible of settlement—and has been for over a year.

Last year Herbert Evatt, who undertook conciliation on behalf of the United Nations, complained that it was not the three-border countries that were holding up a settlement of the Greek situation, but the American-dominated Greek monarchy which refused to settle because it would not give up its claim to land beyond its present borders.

If Greece reveals the folly of our policy, China demonstrates its complete bankruptcy.

AMERICAN POLICY IN CHINA

In the case of China, Mr. Acheson has shown an awareness of the irreparable nature of our failure. Some 2 weeks ago, he answered Senator McCarran's proposal for an appropriation of one and a half billion dollars to Nationalist China. That answer delivered, I believe to you, Senator Connally, is as good a summary of the case against the pact as I have seen anywhere.

Mr. Acheson admits that our Chinese policy has failed. But more important than this admission of failure is his analysis of the fatal defects of the policy.

Mr. Acheson says that the economic and military conditions which Senator McCarran would tie to China aid, would be deeply resented by the Chinese people as an extreme infringement of China's sovereignty. It would arouse distrust of this country's motives in extending such help.

Further, says Mr. Acheson, to try to reverse the present military situation in China, would "require the use of an unpredictably large American armed force in actual combat."

Such action would represent direct United States involvement in China's fratricidal warfare and would be contrary to our traditional policy toward China and the best interests of this country.

I take these quotations from the New York Times, account of his letter on April 15.

Now I submit, gentlemen, that Mr. Acheson has not only pronounced a judgment against the McCarran proposal. He has indicted the policy that underlies the pact as well. For the McCarran proposal is nothing but the policy of the pact—applied to China. We have tested that policy in action and it has failed. It has failed for one thing, as the Wall Street Journal and the Washington Post have both pointed out, because you cannot fight ideas with guns.

Another reason for the failure is that in the effort to fight an idea like communism we inevitably make compromises with the worst reaction and even with fascism.

OPPOSITION TO COMMUNISM

We are adopting methods at home in fighting communism that are completely repugnant to free men. We are doing the same thing abroad.

The Salazar dictatorship of Portugal is now proclaimed in the preamble to the pact as a member of a group of nations with "common heritage and civilization * * * founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law."

But Portugal is only a way station on the road to alliance with reaction.

The State Department and the military are apparently planning to bring Franco Spain into the pact as well. This very day, efforts are being made to sneak Franco into the back door of the United Nations. And only yesterday, the State Department authorized Spain to apply for a large Export-Import Bank loan.

To me and to millions of freedom-loving men and women in Europe and America, this consorting with the butcher Franco in the name of defending democracy marks a new and shocking low in international morality.

Even worse is the rebuilding of the western German war potential. Mr. Acheson said in his press conference on the pact that Germany is not to come into the pact "now." But he has made it clear in previous speeches, as early as May 1947, that he regards Germany and Japan as the workshops of western Europe and Asia. So again we begin the grim journey over which we and western Europe have twice already traveled.

Already, even before a peace treaty is signed, the American military governor defends the hiring of Nazi cartelists to run Germany industry. Again German industry is to become the arsenal of Europe, in the hands of the same men who twice before have used it for wars of conquest.

Is this the way to win the friendship, the support and the allegiance of the people of western Europe, twice in a generation the victims of German aggression? If we are ever to fight a war of self-defense, if ever we are in danger of attack we shall need all the friends we can get. We will not find them among the reactionaries, the enemies of democracy.

We can find them only among those people who love democracy and whom we have helped find their way to its full expression.

Gentlemen, the North Atlantic Pact and the arms program which is tied to it has been offered to the Senate and to the American people, in the name of self-defense, national security, and the preservation of our democratic system. It will gain us none of these.

CONSEQUENCES OF THE ATLANTIC TREATY

As I have pointed out, any fair appraisal of its consequences demonstrates that it can lead only to national insolvency, the surrender of our traditional freedoms, war, a possible military disaster, and the certain sacrifice not only of life and treasure but of the very system of government which it is supposed to preserve.

I say that there is an honorable, a peaceful and a practical alternative to this mad course. I say that great nations which really believe in peace can find the road to peace.

The Russians have shown their willingness to travel that road by lifting the Berlin blockade that seemed to stand across it. If the administration sincerely desires peace, let it state its terms to the Russians. Let the heads of both nations, after preparation at the expert level, sit down to negotiate. Peace will require compromise and accommodation on both sides.

But no government that sincerely wants to serve its people can refuse to discuss the terms of peace and instead engages in war alliances and initiate armaments races.

PRINCIPLES FOR UNITED STATES-SOVIET AGREEMENTS

I present again as a basis for such discussions the major points on which agreement can be reached without sacrifice to any American principle or interest.

First, the conclusion of a treaty that would establish a unified and democratic Germany dedicated to peace and stripped of its war potential.

Second, agreement to refrain from interference in the internal affairs of other nations.

Third, agreement by both nations to give up all military bases in other UN countries and to halt the export of weapons to other nations.

Fourth, the resumption of unrestricted trade, the establishment of the free movement of citizens and the resumption of free scientific and cultural exchanges between the two countries.

Fifth, a general reduction of armaments that would free the economics of all the world of the burdensome weight of arms and enable them to devote their energies and resources to peacetime production.

Finally, the establishment of a World Reconstruction and Development Agency within the UN to build a productive and economically unified Europe, without barriers between east and west, and to assist the free development of the industrially backward countries of Asia, Latin America, and Africa.

This program is the practical, the same, the peaceful alternative to the Atlantic Pact.

By withholding action on the pact, it is within the power of your committee to create the atmosphere in which this program can be discussed by the diplomatic representatives of the United States and Russia as they bring the Berlin blockade to an end and prepare to tackle the German problem.

It is a program which can end the cold war and avert the atom war.

It is a program completely in our own national interest that yet serves the best interests of a growing and united world.

We insure our own enduring prosperity by helping other nations to a better life.

It offers security based on friendship, not fear.

It opens up a new century of hope for mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, your statement seems to encompass not only the pending treaty that we are considering, but the whole field of international policy, does it not?

Mr. WALLACE. The relationship of the treaty to the entire structure of our foreign policy. I do not see how the treaty can be considered except in this framework of reference.

ATTITUDE TOWARD AMERICAN POLICY IN GREECE

The CHAIRMAN. Take the case of Greece, for instance. You complain about our policy in Greece. Were you opposed to our entering into the Grecian situation and aiding Greece originally?

Mr. WALLACE. In the very first instance, Senator, when I was still Secretary of Commerce, in August of 1946, I made representations, not in any official sense but in an informal way, to the Export-Import Bank, pointing out that there was very great misery in Greece and that I thought that Greece should be helped by an Export-Import Bank loan. I was informed, however, by the officials of the Export-Import Bank at the time, and also, I may say, by certain members of the State Department, that the big financial men of Greece were conducting affairs in a very bad way, that money was fleeing the country, that graft was rampant, and I was convinced while I was still Secretary of Commerce, by the presentation made by Government officials, officials of the Export-Import Bank, and the State Department, that that was an unwise course.

The CHAIRMAN. Aside from that particular aspect, did you oppose or favor our aiding Greece in the methods we have pursued?

Mr. WALLACE. I have made as complete a statement as I can about my attitude in August 1946. If you are referring particularly to the statement as made by President Truman on March 12, 1947, at which time he announced the so-called Truman Doctrine and used aid to Greece and Turkey as the illustration of the implementation of the Truman doctrine, I can assure you, Senator, that I opposed it with all the vigor at my command, and made a strong statement over the radio against the policy on March 13.

The CHAIRMAN. And you have, have you not, steadily resisted that policy since in the press and on the radio?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. I have been convinced it was most unwise.

The CHAIRMAN. I say, you have aggressively opposed that in the press and on the radio.

Mr. WALLACE. In every way I could.

UNITED STATES-SOVIET RELATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. You open your statement on the Russian situation, largely. You say that Russia has made several efforts to have conferences with the United States with a view to settling these difficulties. Was there ever any official communication from the Premier of Russia, or any responsible authority, to the President of the United States, asking for such a conference?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not aware of any official document, sir. Undoubtedly Stalin made various statements to individuals that indicated that he was willing to consider something of the sort, and I believe there might have been something in the nature of a semiofficial interchange about a year ago between our Ambassador Bedell Smith and the Russians. I am not aware of the exact wording of that interchange. I think Molotov at that time did make a precise and more or less official statement to Bedell Smith. It was along in April or May of 1948, as I remember it.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it a general statement or did he point out particular matters?

Mr. WALLACE. It indicated a willingness to talk business.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Molotov at that time, of course, was Secretary of Foreign Relations of that country, and you assumed that he was speaking for Mr. Stalin, is that correct?

Mr. WALLACE. I think that would be a correct assumption, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But he did not point out any particular objective of such a conference, did he?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not have a copy of it here. It is in the record. You can verify the precise nature of it. It would be surprising to me if he went into any very great details. It would be altogether against diplomatic procedure to go into any very minute details in opening up negotiations.

WALLACE LETTER TO STALIN

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke of a letter that you wrote to Mr. Stalin, I believe, did you not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you consult with the President of the United States before you wrote that letter, or with the State Department?

Mr. WALLACE. I did not, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You assumed——

Mr. WALLACE. I may say it was an open letter. It was not a letter that was transmitted in any underhanded way.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand that. It was in the press, of course.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not believe it was in contravention of the Logan Act of 1798, if that is what you mean.

The CHAIRMAN. I have no reference to the Logan Act. I am just referring to your assumption that on account of your position, your prestige, and your former connection with the Government that you thought that an approach to Mr. Stalin on your part would have the desired effect. Is that correct?

Mr. WALLACE. I felt the points which I had in my letter would help contribute some to peace, and I have reason to think that those points listed in my letter did contribute some to peace, just as I think that a certain statement made to Kingsbury Smith by Stalin was utilized to bring the crisis to an end. I think statements of that kind often-times serve as a very useful and important prelude to actions that are taken later.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kingsbury Smith is a British citizen and a representative of the press. He is a very capable man, no doubt. But do you regard it as proper or desirable for the President to take up a matter that was only communicated to Mr. Kingsbury Smith instead of being communicated to our State Department or to the President himself?

Mr. WALLACE. I regard anything as proper and desirable if it works toward peace, and I very much question whether anything improper was done in this case. I know I am very grateful and very happy indeed to see this Berlin crisis working out the way it is at the moment.

BERLIN CRISIS

The CHAIRMAN. Has not the Berlin crisis, as you call it, worked out because the United States has for a long period of time been urging its settlement and making overtures to get a settlement of the airlift?

Mr. WALLACE. I think there is considerable difference of opinion with regard to that.

The CHAIRMAN. It worked, didn't it? They got the airlift lifted.

Mr. WALLACE. Returning to the earlier part of your statement, I remember a statement that appeared in the United States News last fall by Mr. Hawkinson, I think it was. It was in the September 10 United States News, in which Mr. Hawkinson said:

We had failed at London to present a concrete program for the unification of Germany, and I have the feeling we went to that meeting convinced that it would not work. We did not want unity then, and seemed determined to push ahead with a west Germany. We thus were vulnerable. Somehow we had gained the idea that we could tell off the Russians. They surely were aware of this, and I think we greatly underestimated them.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a statement from a paper. That does not necessarily represent your view?

Mr. WALLACE. No. It is interesting as coming from what is generally looked on as being a rather conservative publication.

THE ATLANTIC TREATY AND MR. CHURCHILL

The CHAIRMAN. On the second page of your statement you level your guns on Mr. Churchill. You say:

It is not the business of an American in or out of the Senate or the executive branches to further the policies of Mr. Churchill and the small group of military men and imperialists who join him.

Do you regard Mr. Churchill as being the author of the North Atlantic Pact?

Mr. WALLACE. I do in effect. In all reality I look on him as the author of the North Atlantic Pact, more than any single individual.

The CHAIRMAN. Did he participate in any of the negotiations looking toward the formation of it?

Mr. WALLACE. No, but he has been the architect, I would say, looking toward this consummation. While the war was going on I talked with Churchill myself, and heard him express his views. There is no question in my mind about his being the architect of this whole approach. I remember so well when he made his Fulton, Mo., speech. It was generally interpreted—perhaps to some degree unwarrantedly at the time because he did not express his full mind on that occasion—in foreign quarters that that was a straight-out plea for a military alliance.

The CHAIRMAN. You believe in free speech, you say, and he has a right to express his views; has he not?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not criticizing that at all. I want to have the other side presented also.

The CHAIRMAN. He is a strong international figure who contributed very greatly to our success in the war. Is it not natural that he have some concern as to the future of Europe?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir. He has that right. I agree with you completely and enthusiastically about the great contribution he made to the victory in the war. I want to make sure he does not spoil the peace.

The CHAIRMAN. He did not write the North Atlantic Pact, I may say to you. Negotiations were carried on among the nations that were signatory thereto, and the State Department was in constant consultation with the Committee on Foreign Relations, and revealed to us every step that took place in that treaty, and so far as I know, Mr. Churchill's name was never mentioned.

Mr. WALLACE. I would assume that the statement you made is utterly correct, but I would hope that you would also agree with me that he was the architect of it.

The CHAIRMAN. No, I do not.

Mr. WALLACE. We just don't have the same point of view, then.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not agree with that. His views may be in accordance with it; I do not know about that. But so far as the construction of the pact, I know of nothing that Mr. Churchill did or said—

Mr. WALLACE. I am sure you are correct in that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. It may have had some agreement with his views. It no doubt had, because his country is a signatory to the treaty.

Mr. WALLACE. What I mean to say is, he is one of those world statesmen who can, by making statements at strategic times and places, so influence public opinion as to cause those who are in legislative bodies and in foreign offices later on to embody that which he originated. That is what I meant to say, and what I shall continue to say.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN THE UNITED STATES AND THE ATLANTIC TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. You attribute the unemployment, that you say is growing, to the Atlantic Pact?

Mr. WALLACE. No. I did not say that.

The CHAIRMAN. I know you didn't. I am asking you now.

Mr. WALLACE. No. Of course, the Atlantic Pact is not yet in effect. But I think we can say this: That from the behavior of the stock market yesterday, the prospect of settlement of the Berlin crisis did create confidence. When the stock market moves up, often employment later on also moves up, so I would say that if some way could be found to obviate the Atlantic Pact there would be a marked strengthening in business confidence and in employment.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the settlement of an international difficulty like the Berlin air lift would stimulate confidence in business and have an effect on the stock market; would it not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

SETTLEMENT OF THE BERLIN CRISIS

The CHAIRMAN. For that result at Berlin I think you ought to give credit to the authorities of the United States who have been working for the solution of that problem, not simply for a short period, but for months and months and months.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not agree with your analysis, then.

The CHAIRMAN. What analysis do you have, that the United States did not have anything to do with it?

Mr. WALLACE. I hold to Hawkinson's analysis.

The CHAIRMAN. Let's stick to your analysis.

Mr. WALLACE. I would say that there was abundant opportunity to have settled the Berlin situation last fall if we had wanted to settle it.

The CHAIRMAN. How?

Mr. WALLACE. And we didn't.

The CHAIRMAN. How would we have settled it?

Mr. WALLACE. We could have settled it by talking with the Russians. They wanted to settle it at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you know they wanted to settle it?

Mr. WALLACE. All I know is what I read in the press.

The CHAIRMAN. You say the Russians did want to settle it at that time but we would not settle it?

Mr. WALLACE. We did not want to settle it at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think your statement is quite fair to our people, because my understanding—and I read the papers occasionally—

Mr. WALLACE. I will try to find some quotations for you on that if you care to have them.

STEPS TOWARD PEACE

The CHAIRMAN. You say that the time has come to substitute for the war policy, which I do not admit, a peace policy which will restore the basis of great power movements within the United Nations and build a productive world. What are your views? What should we do to bring about this condition?

Mr. WALLACE. I tried to outline the possible alternatives in the last page or two of my printed statement. The all-important thing, it seems to me, is to have an agreement on general reduction of arms, prohibition of export of arms by any nation to any other nation, and, above everything, the routing of international relief through a United Nations agency rather than the United States carrying it on directly. I believe that when the United States carries on international relief directly she is continually being suspected of interfering in the internal affairs of other nations, and she will be accused by one nation or another or one group or another within nations of having imperialistic designs. My program is to build up a strong United Nations, have such an understanding between Russia and the United States that both, without either one appeasing the other, will be happy to see a strong United Nations and route these international matters through United Nations agencies instead of through either regional agencies or by one particular country carrying on the activity unilaterally.

The CHAIRMAN. That is easy to say, but how are you going to convince Russia that she ought to go along?

Mr. WALLACE. I think we have the door open part way now. Let's talk things over.

THE UNITED NATIONS AND RUSSIAN ACTIONS

The CHAIRMAN. Let's wait a minute, please. When Russia 30 times in the Security Council has vetoed the overwhelming vote and the overwhelming sentiment of the other members of the United Nations, how do you expect her just to cave in and go along with us and others through the United Nations now?

Mr. WALLACE. It is not my business, and never has been my business, to condone what the Russians do. But I think it is altogether appropriate to indicate how they got that way if we are going to act intelligently ourselves. I can understand very well how they got that way, because in late April and May of 1945, when the United Nations was formed out at San Francisco, I was still a member of the Government of the United States. I was Secretary of Commerce at the time. And I knew pretty well what was going on.

We had an observer for the Department of Commerce out there reporting several times a week as to just what was going on, and I know his grave concern. This man I inherited from Jesse Jones; it wasn't a man that I had hired nor had I changed his position. His report told of the very greatest concern. He said in some of his reports that the Russians were right in the stand that they were taking, and that we were setting up a situation that would result in an era of power politics.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was that?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not want to mention his name. You can readily find out, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I could readily find out if you would answer the question.

Mr. WALLACE. Frankly, I don't want to cost any man his job in this present state of anti-Communist hysteria. It might very readily cost him his job. I would not mind telling it to you face to face.

The CHAIRMAN. We are face to face now.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not mind telling it to you privately.

The CHAIRMAN. I will not press you.

You were for the United Nations?

REASONS FOR RUSSIAN ACTIONS IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. WALLACE. Very strongly for the United Nations, and if I might continue with the statement which has to bear upon how the Russians got that way, and exercised the veto right on 30 occasions——

The CHAIRMAN. You know why they did things, and you were acquainted with their motives and all that; were you?

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, before you infer matters of that sort——

The CHAIRMAN. I am not. I am just saying, you are going to tell me why.

Mr. WALLACE. If you will allow me to complete my answer——

The CHAIRMAN. I will allow you, but I want to tell you what I want you to answer. You are assuming to say why Russia did this and that and the other, and I want you to answer frankly how you know that.

Mr. WALLACE. That is what I want to speak about now, if I may.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead, Mr. Secretary.

Mr. WALLACE. In early May of 1945, after a considerable part of the work had been carried on at San Francisco, one of the members of the State Department who now occupies high elective public office attended a gathering in my home. I am inclined to think you yourself were there on that occasion.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know whom you are talking about, so I cannot say whether I was there or not.

Mr. WALLACE. Anyhow, this particular gentleman stayed after the other guests had left, and he told me of his very grave concern, in view of the fact that the United States had insisted on Argentina coming into the United Nations and of the strong feeling of Russia with regard to Argentina coming in. He told me of the very grave concern of the Russians.

This is how I got the information. It was through this particular gentleman. He said the Russians felt that from now on out, so far as the Assembly was concerned, there would be against them the votes of all the American nations plus Liberia, the Philippines, plus, on occasion, any Latin nations in Europe that might later join the United Nations, plus on occasion a number of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations. And he was very much discouraged—just like the representative from the Department of Commerce at San Francisco—about the outcome.

Now, about the same time Averell Harriman had a conference with some 12 newspapermen at San Francisco. He was our Ambassador to Russia, as you may remember, and in this conference you may remember he took his hair down with regard to Russia in a very frank and very complete way. That was noised all over San Francisco. As you know, newspapermen will talk, and I assume that the Russians must have heard that. I do not know that they heard it, but I do not see how they could have avoided hearing what Averell Harriman said to these 12 newspapermen, and it was very strong medicine, a week before the war with Germany was ended.

That same first week in May of 1945 Nelson Rockefeller, appearing before the House Appropriations Committee, put in a strong plea for more money for his work with Latin America. He was Assistant Secretary of State in charge of Latin-American relations. He spoke, as I remember the press reports that came to me, along this line. This was supposed to be an off-the-record statement, but even Congressmen will leak news on occasion.

This is the way the press reported it to me, that Nelson Rockefeller had spoken of how important it was to have some four or five million dollars for Latin-American relations, and cited specifically that it was a great triumph to have brought about this unity in Latin America, taking great credit for bringing Argentina into the unity, basing it on the fact that Argentina hated Russia so much.

Well, now, that kind of thing got about generally in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask you, though, right there: Was not Russia contending for White Russia and the other Russian states to have votes—

Mr. WALLACE. At that time she was contending, as I remember it, for some 17 seats in the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. She got two on her own insistence, White Russia and the Ukraine.

Mr. WALLACE. That is what came out of it all. I think we put forward the proposal informally that we get 48.

The CHAIRMAN. We did that in the papers; there was nothing official about it.

Now, Mr. Secretary, I want to interrogate you on one other point.

Mr. WALLACE. Could I finish the statement with regard to the 30 vetoes?

The CHAIRMAN. You can, but I do not think it is very material. Go ahead, though.

Mr. WALLACE. If I might, I will just say that in view of the atmosphere that resulted at that time, Russia apparently concluded that she was going to be in a minority at all times. As we know, when people are in a minority, sometimes they take steps which psychologically are unsound. I think Russia has taken those steps from time to time. She has not considered adequately and fully world public opinion. But she felt that the veto was her only protection.

The CHAIRMAN. You talk about her being in a minority. The man that gets in a minority is the one that chooses where he goes. He gets in a minority because he wants to, not because he is forced to.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think you want to follow up that statement too far, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You always want to follow up your statements.

Mr. WALLACE. I will follow it up for you, if you wish, but I do not think you want to follow it up too far.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think you had better.

WORLD SPLIT

You say that this treaty and our policy and acts have split the world up into two systems, is that right?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Let's see what Mr. Stalin thinks about that, or Mr. Lenin.

Mr. WALLACE. Do you happen to have the date of the quotation?

The CHAIRMAN. I am going to find it if I can. It was before Lenin died, I will say that.

Lenin has said that the Soviet and capitalistic state "cannot live in peace. In the end, one or the other will triumph. A funeral dirge will be sung over the Soviet or over world capitalism."

That was in 1920, a good way back. It is quoted from the English edition of International Publications, and so on.

He also said:

If war is waged by the proletariat after it has conquered the bourgeoisie in its own country, and is waged with the object of strengthening and extending socialism, such a way is legitimate and holy.

Does that not envisage a view that the rest of world has got to be conquered for their type of socialism?

REASONS FOR RUSSIA'S ATTITUDE

Mr. WALLACE. Well, Senator, it is not my purpose to condone anything that Communists may say, or that Russian leaders may say, but again I think it is important for our own safety that we inquire how those people got that way. And I do know that in 1919, and Bill Bullitt told me this himself, in February or March of 1919, he, on behalf of the Allied Powers, went to call on Lenin, in Moscow or Leningrad. He put up to Lenin the proposal that the Bolsheviks should be satisfied with a relatively small area in central Russia. It did not include the Ukraine or cross the Urals, and Lenin agreed.

Bullitt returned with the proposal, but Churchill said, "No; we can get rid of the whole crowd," and they went ahead and tried to get rid of the whole crowd.

When I was Secretary of Commerce I sent over to Russia—this was at the time the British were endeavoring to find out about Russian trade—one of the representatives of the Department of Commerce whom I had inherited from Jesse Jones, and he in turn had inherited from Harry Hopkins, and he in turn had inherited from Dan Roper and he in turn from Secretary Hoover. He was a reputable man. I sent him over there, and as I remember, he had conversations with Mr. Mikoyan, who was the Russian Secretary of Commerce, and it was either he or his associate, who also went over as a member of the Department of Commerce who told me that Mikoyan had been one of 19 men who had been captured by the British when they were driving on Baku at that time. The other 18 were shot, and Mikoyan had survived.

I am mentioning that on this occasion merely to indicate that Lenin, in 1920, might have been acting under considerable stress of feeling. I think Mr. Mikoyan perhaps to this day acts under considerable stress of feeling as he contemplates his recollection of near approach to death.

I think you can understand how those people feel. But I think also it should be said that men's opinions in course of time change. I think many capitalists have said very strong things against the irreconcilability of the two systems. I do not happen to hold to that irreconcilability. I do not agree with Lenin. I do not agree with the capitalists. I think we can live in the same world, and to a degree I think the Lenin doctrine was denounced. Stalin has made some very strong statements from time to time, but during the past 2 years he has made repeated statements that the two systems could live together in the same world, and I noticed in last Sunday's New York Times an article in which it stated that Mr. George Malenkov is coming to the fore in Russia now, and Mr. Malenkov stands very strongly for this idea of it being possible for capitalism and communism to live in the same world at peace. That happens to be my feeling.

But I am sure you can get very strong quotations from Stalin on the contrary back 15 years or so ago, and perhaps even more recently.

STALIN'S ATTITUDE TOWARD THE WEST

The CHAIRMAN. Let's come around a little nearer to this date. In 1938 Stalin justified war "to liberate the people from capitalist slavery." That is documented in A Short History of CP USSR, Moscow, 1945. If that was Mr. Stalin's view and idea in 1938, he has made no public pronouncement of repudiation of that statement, has he?

MR. WALLACE. I think his statements of the past few years are of quite a different character from the statements he made in 1938.

You can say, of course, "How can you believe him?" I would say the only way you can believe him is because it is to his self interest to have a different attitude now.

HOLY WAR AGAINST RUSSIA

The CHAIRMAN. Did you or did you not, in a May Day speech in Detroit some time ago, term the pact "merely another line-up of nations under the cover of anticommunism for another holy war on Russia, just like Hitler's?"

Mr. WALLACE. It sounds familiar to me. I do not mind saying it again, if you want. I do not have a copy of my speech here. At the moment you have an advantage over me there. It is the kind of thing I have been saying.

The CHAIRMAN. You have the advantage over me. You said it first.

Mr. WALLACE. But, Senator, you cannot verify the complete text with accuracy from memory.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not want to embarrass you.

Mr. WALLACE. It is the kind of thing I have been saying steadily all the time. I still hold that view.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to ask you about this "merely another lineup of nations under the cover of anticommunism for another holy war on Russia." When was the other holy war on Russia? You say "another holy war on Russia."

Mr. WALLACE. The other holy war to which I am referring in that statement, the particular holy war on Russia, was the holy war of Italy and Germany on Russia, especially Germany. Japan did not really join it at the time, although she was a member of the anti-Comintern pact.

The CHAIRMAN. But in your statement you say "a holy war on Russia just like Hitler's." Are you referring to the last war?

Mr. WALLACE. That is right. That is what I am referring to.

The CHAIRMAN. As being a holy war against Russia?

Mr. WALLACE. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. We were not against Russia, were we?

Mr. WALLACE. No, no. We were an ally. I am talking about Hitler.

The CHAIRMAN. We gave Russia arms and munitions and lend-lease and a great many aids in the last war, didn't we?

Mr. WALLACE. We certainly did.

The CHAIRMAN. And we fought by her side, with her?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So how do you get the idea that the United States, if they adopt this treaty, is engaged in another holy war against Russia?

Mr. WALLACE. You are putting a misconstruction on my sentence, Senator?

The CHAIRMAN. I quoted you.

Mr. WALLACE. I am referring to the holy war Hitler waged against Russia. It was proclaimed as a holy war against communism.

The CHAIRMAN. So you say we are participating in just another scheme?

Mr. WALLACE. We are whipping up another holy war against communism; that is what we are doing.

MATTERS ON THE FLOOR

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, I have the pending amendment in charge, and offered it for myself and three other Senators. I very much want to question Mr. Wallace on several statements which he has made today, and I think it is important that I have an opportunity to do so. I would assume that the questioning will proceed until you adjourn for lunch, but I wanted to make sure, if I leave now, Mr. Chairman, to go to the floor, that Mr. Wallace will return later in the afternoon, so that he and I might have a brief conversation.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume that we will not finish with the Secretary prior to lunch. I assume he will be ready to come back this afternoon.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, certainly.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, it happens that immediately after Senator McMahon's amendment shall have been disposed of it is my plan to offer another amendment to the same bill to which this pertains, and the subject matter of the two amendments is at least of joint interest, although we may not approach them from the same angle. It will therefore not be possible, in my judgment, for me to remain at this time, although I, too, have a few questions I should like to ask Mr. Wallace. But I am fearful I cannot get back this afternoon, because I think the amendment I have proposed will require at least several hours of consideration by the Senate.

I just wanted the record to show that fact.

Senator McMAHON. If I can govern the disposal of mine, it will take about 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. If you do that, the Senator from Missouri will want considerable time to develop his. It is going to disrupt the committee action. You are a member of the committee, however.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not asking that the committee take any action with regard to having Mr. Wallace back. I simply want the record to show why it is that I am not remaining at this time. I feel that I should go to the floor for the reasons indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. We will give you an opportunity this afternoon.

Mr. WALLACE. I would appreciate it if I could leave here by 4.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope we can let you go.

Mr. WALLACE. I will be at your disposal to come back at any moment you indicate.

The CHAIRMAN. We will undertake to accommodate you in every way we can, but this is a most important matter.

Mr. WALLACE. I agree with you it is very important. I will be at your disposal completely, of course.

ARMED FORCES OF RUSSIA

The CHAIRMAN. You speak about the danger under this military treaty of rearming. Do you know what the military strength of Russia is?

Mr. WALLACE. No, I don't. All I know is what I read in the papers. They speak about 200 divisions. I do not know whether it is true or not. Generally they have been disbanding some of their armament recently, according to the press, but I assume they still must have about 200 divisions. I do not know the size; I do not know just how they compare with ours. I know it is a very great land force.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the greatest land force on earth, is it not?

Mr. WALLACE. I think undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it for? Is it just for protection, for defense?

Mr. WALLACE. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Just for defense?

Mr. WALLACE. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. And it does not tie in with their foreign policy?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say to about the same degree as armaments tie in with the foreign policy of any great power.

RUSSIAN ACTION IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The CHAIRMAN. Speaking about interfering in the internal affairs of other nations, you do not subscribe to the policy of what we call infiltration and the pressure from outside governments on the independence or integrity of other governments, do you?

Mr. WALLACE. No. I think it is bad business.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you approve of what Russia did in the case of Czechoslovakia?

Mr. WALLACE. No; but there is a very interesting thing that ought to be cleared in the record at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute, now. You do not approve of it?

Mr. WALLACE. No; but the question is just what Russia did, and that was the point which I made—I don't know just what Russia did in Czechoslovakia, and I still don't know.

The CHAIRMAN. You read the papers, you say, and you have been quoting from the papers here all morning.

Mr. WALLACE. I quote from the papers and believe the papers when it fits in with credibility.

The CHAIRMAN. When it fits in with your views, is that it? What do you mean by "credibility"? What you think ought to be said?

Mr. WALLACE. There are some things that are obviously false.

The CHAIRMAN. Some things obviously false?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, definitely.

The CHAIRMAN. I commend that to the attention of the press.

Mr. WALLACE. And I do not say it is deliberate at all times on the part of the press, either. Oftentimes the press is very poorly informed.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you know better than the press as to what happened?

Mr. WALLACE. On a great many things I know better than the press, and so do you.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know better what happened in Czechoslovakia than the press did?

Mr. WALLACE. I think I know better than was customarily reported back in February of last year.

The CHAIRMAN. How did you gain that information?

EVENTS IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to quote from an article by Bruce Lockhart, of the British Military Intelligence, an article which appeared in July of 1948, entitled "The Czechoslovak Revolution." Said Bruce Lockhart, "The Communist coup was in fact a spontaneous and quickly organized counterstroke to a legitimate but inept tactical move by the anti-Communist ministers to force out the Communists."

The CHAIRMAN. What do you offer that for? It was quickly organized, you say, and spontaneous among the Communists, and they overpowered the legitimate government and threw it out of power.

Mr. WALLACE. Let me read it again.

The CHAIRMAN. I remember what you said.

Mr. WALLACE. I think you did not hear it correctly, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I heard it just as you said it.

Mr. WALLACE. No; the word "legitimate" is used in a different context.

The Communist coup was in fact a spontaneous and quickly organized counter-stroke to a legitimate but inept tactical move by the anti-Communist ministers to force out the Communists.

The CHAIRMAN. That says they were legitimate. It says that the government of Czechoslovakia was a legitimate government.

Mr. WALLACE. No; it says it was a legitimate but inept tactical move by the anti-Communist ministers.

The CHAIRMAN. It may have been inept. Evidently it was, from what happened, because Russia marched in and took possession of the government and installed its own premier, and has dominated and controlled Czechoslovakia ever since. Mr. Vishinsky—I think it was Vishinsky—went down to supervise the matter and bring it about, did he not?

Mr. WALLACE. So far as I know, there is no proof of that contention that there was any relationship between the coup and Mr. Vishinsky.

The CHAIRMAN. He was down there.

Mr. WALLACE. I think he was supposed to be taking the cure at some baths.

The CHAIRMAN. He took the cure—and he gave it to the Czechs.

REASONS FOR COMMUNIST COUP

Mr. WALLACE. At any rate I think it should be said—and I am a great admirer of the old Czechoslovakian democracy. I was in Czechoslovakia in 1929. I am a great admirer of the old democracy, and I expressed great regret that that democracy had disappeared at the time, but there were some provocations in view of the pressure we had put on in France and Italy to get Communists out of the government, in view of the fact that we had made it clear that we were making Marshall plan money available only to governments that had no Communists in them; and in view of the fact that we had stated that we would be glad to have Marshall plan money going to Czechoslovakia. All of that added up in a way which could not help but convince the Communists, who were the strongest single party in Czechoslovakia at the time, with 38 percent of the vote in the previous election, that they, the strongest party, were going to be forced out as a result of, well, this inept move.

The CHAIRMAN. The press also carried statements that Russian military forces were not in Czechoslovakia, but they were around the borders of Czechoslovakia with armed military might. Do you approve of that?

Mr. WALLACE. I question the statement of the press. I was informed by a Columbia commentator broadcasting from Geneva at the time, a Mr. Howard K. Smith, that there were fewer Russian soldiers in Czechoslovakia at the time than there were American soldiers. The American soldiers were there on leave.

The CHAIRMAN. I am speaking with regard to the border.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not necessarily believe the press with regard to that, because I know the press reported altogether false statements with regard to the disposition of Russian troops in the Iran incident. That was completely disproved.

The CHAIRMAN. Let's stick to Czechoslovakia. Czechoslovakia was one of the outstanding democratic states of Europe, was it not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And Czechoslovakia back through history for four or five centuries was struggling for freedom and independence and a democratic form of government, was it not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. They have a marvelous and glorious history.

The CHAIRMAN. And the democratic forces were in power, with Mr. Benes as president, and Mazaryk as Foreign Minister. They were in power in Czechoslovakia, and this coup of the Communist forces ousted them and substituted a corps of Communist leaders, isn't that true?

Mr. WALLACE. That is true, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. At the dictation of Russia.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know of anyone who has any means or any knowledge to indicate that, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you anybody who has any knowledge that disproves that?

Mr. WALLACE. I just say we don't know. We do know this, that oftentimes Communist leaders in other nations are in disagreement with Russia. We do know that.

The CHAIRMAN. I have never heard of that. Tito is the only one I know of.

Mr. WALLACE. You have heard of Tito. You hear reports also that Mao Tse Tung is not in agreement with Russian communism.

The CHAIRMAN. You have better sources of information than I have, evidently, about the Russian situation and their views.

Mr. WALLACE. We just have different sets of information, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I try to have what I figure is the truth.

EVENTS IN RUMANIA

Do you remember the transactions in Rumania by which Rumania was incorporated into the Soviet system, the satellite system, to be accurate?

Mr. WALLACE. I believe they had some kind of an election. I have forgotten. They say Russia doesn't keep her word, and I think the instance that can be most successfully cited has to do with the free elections in the states on her border, of which Rumania would be one, in contravention to the Yalta agreement. I may say also, however, that in the fall of 1946, in October or November, I stated repeatedly, and this was based on information I had obtained from one of our military men who had been in Rumania and the other Balkan countries, that I assumed that Russia would break her Yalta agreement in that respect, because we were moving in there very quietly and very determinedly to influence the outcome of the elections. That was especially true in Rumania. We moved in with a certain group; the Russians were moving in with another group. I said I assumed that the Russians would make dead sure that they had friendly governments on their borders and that they would not hesitate with regard to the methods employed.

I do not condone that kind of thing, but in view of the very definite and specific actions we were taking inside of those countries at the time I can understand why she did what she did.

UNITED STATES-SOVIET RELATIONS

The CHAIRMAN. Under that system where you have to have all the border countries friendly, as soon as you get the ones that border on your country friendly then you have some more borders, haven't you, beyond that? And the Russian idea now is to go out and get some more of these new borders and incorporate them. Will that not result in an absolute system of Russian domination of all the countries she faces and touches?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say, Senator, that many of the smaller countries would feel that both Russia and the United States were moving on that hypothesis.

The CHAIRMAN. What countries have we annexed?

Mr. WALLACE. Our method is somewhat different. We establish bases close to Russian borders. Russia hasn't established an air base in Cuba. If you look at the map—

The CHAIRMAN. What do you want us to do, just sit down and let Russia absorb the world and do nothing about it?

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, I have made my views on that subject abundantly clear in congressional testimony from time to time. I have indicated very clearly that I think it would be a very serious matter indeed if Russia would take over the Dardanelles, for example. I think that both the United States and Russia, in the interest of their respective securities, should have a clear-cut and positive idea as to what the limits are on the part of both the nations.

The CHAIRMAN. You are opposed to her taking over the Dardanelles. Was not our Greek and Turkish policy intended to prevent that very thing? And you are against them both.

Mr. WALLACE. I am, indeed, against them both.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you have sat still and let Russia come in and have a coup and take over Greece and take over Turkey and thereby insure the control of the Dardanelles?

Mr. WALLACE. Of course, as I have said, and I have said it repeatedly, and it has appeared many times in the press and before congressional committees, that in case Russia moved in to take over the Dardanelles, that would be a war matter. I have said that. That has appeared many times.

But on the other hand, I think that when we move in with air bases in Turkey it becomes seriously close to being a war matter so far as Russia is concerned. It is very dangerous, and John Foster Dulles apparently looks on it in that light.

The CHAIRMAN. We have had Mr. Dulles here, and got his views.

Mr. WALLACE. All this adds up to is, with our bases distributed as they are, we can bomb any point in Russia without passing over anybody else's territory, whereas Russia cannot bomb any place in the United States without passing over somebody else's territory.

The CHAIRMAN. If we can reach Russia without passing over anybody else's territory, what is to prevent her from reaching us without passing over anybody else's territory? That is a new wrinkle, that this is only a one-way street.

Mr. WALLACE. The points in particular are Greenland, Iceland, and Spitzbergen that Russia has to pass over. I do not say that we own those countries, but under our system we have effective control.

The CHAIRMAN. We did not put up a coup to get them, did we?

Mr. WALLACE. Our own methods are very effective, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You want them effective, do you not? If you are going to do something, you want to do it effectively?

Mr. WALLACE. I want peace. I do not want war.

The CHAIRMAN. We want peace.

NATURE OF THE TREATY

I want to ask you a categorical question. Is it not true that this treaty is purely a defensive treaty against an armed attack and in the interest of peace and not of war?

Mr. WALLACE. If I believed that, Senator, I would not be here for a moment. I do not believe it. I believe it is most emphatically driving directly toward war, and I shall do everything I possibly can to oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. Who is going to start a war, with this peaceable arrangement that we will only act when one of the signatories is attacked by an armed attack? Who is going to start a war over that?

Mr. WALLACE. Or internal aggression when one of the signatories suffers—and how do you define internal aggression?

The CHAIRMAN. No, no; the treaty does not say that.

Who has any right to fear this treaty unless he is an aggressor or intends to become an aggressor?

Mr. WALLACE. It depends on how you define aggression, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. We all have a pretty fair knowledge of aggression. It is armed attack. It goes beyond attack. We know what an armed attack is.

Need anybody fear this treaty unless they contemplate an armed attack on another nation? Need any nation fear this treaty unless it contemplates an armed attack on some other nation?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; I think they do have definite reason to fear it.

The CHAIRMAN. You do?

Mr. WALLACE. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. You have already, I assume, pretty well explained what you mean by that term?

Mr. WALLACE. I have submitted a very long statement.

RUSSIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. In that long statement you have undertaken to do that. You think Russia, then, is afraid of this treaty; is that right?

Mr. WALLACE. I do; very much so. I think there is grave danger that following these tactics we will, in effect, make Russia—

The CHAIRMAN. Attack us?

Mr. WALLACE. Make her into the very thing that we have said she is; that is, we will make her into a wild and desperate cornered beast.

That may be the objective of the pact. I do not know, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that Russia contemplates an armed attack after we signed this treaty because she protests the treaty?

Mr. WALLACE. I certainly do not. I think Russia will do everything she can to avoid war.

The CHAIRMAN. If she does, we will have peace.

Mr. WALLACE. If John Foster Dulles is correct, there is grave danger if we establish bases too close to her.

The CHAIRMAN. That is another matter. John Foster Dulles was here yesterday. He unequivocally approved the treaty. He unequivocally supported the reasons that actuated us in writing the treaty.

Let me ask you, do you think we ought to have asked Russia's consent to our forming this arrangement with these other nations?

STRENGTHENING THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. WALLACE. I am for strengthening the United Nations, and frankly, I think this kind of thing should be passed on more specifically by the United Nations than it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not specifically provided in this treaty that we recognize the authority of the United Nations, and there are several references to it, and is it not provided that any action that is taken under this treaty shall immediately be reported to the Security Council of the United Nations?

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, as much as I do not like to do it, with regard to this particular point, I agree completely and utterly with the Wall Street Journal, that it vitiates the United Nations. I think the Wall Street Journal in this point is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. You are taking the Wall Street Journal as your text and Bible?

Mr. WALLACE. I say, much as I dislike to do it, I think the Wall Street Journal's analysis is sound.

The CHAIRMAN. You are picking out anything that supports your view.

Mr. WALLACE. It happens to be a human failing which does not affect only myself.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not only a failing; I consider it is a clear-cut objective that you have.

Mr. WALLACE. I want peace, obtained through the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you not for peace in any way we can get it?

Mr. WALLACE. No. I want no appeasement of Russia, but peace after the two great principals of the world have talked over the fundamental points of difference.

COMMUNIST COUPS IN SATELLITE COUNTRIES

The CHAIRMAN. You think, then, in effect, that we ought to have consulted Russia and got her consent before we made this treaty. If that be true, did she consult us before she incorporated Czechoslovakia into her military system?

Mr. WALLACE. Of course Czechoslovakia is an independent nation.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean it was an independent nation.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, 2 years ago you would have said that with regard to Yugoslavia. Now Yugoslavia is standing up very sternly, and you cannot tell when Czechoslovakia will do the same and when China will do the same.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Russia consult us before she incorporated Hungary and Bulgaria into her system, and made them a complete tool of Russia?

Mr. WALLACE. There are local Communists. We do not know how the local Communists were trained in each case. These were local Communists who did the work. It was not done by Russia as Russia.

The CHAIRMAN. Many of these Communists we speak of were trained in Russia and sent back down to Bulgaria, Rumania, and other countries to work their will.

Mr. WALLACE. But, Senator, I will say this, and I think it is very important for the committee to bear this in mind, that Communists can bring about results of this kind without any arms from outside. They cannot bring about results of that kind unless there is great misery in a country or very unequal distribution of wealth.

The CHAIRMAN. They take advantage of those conditions.

Mr. WALLACE. Therefore I say that our objective is, rather than to provide arms, to make sure that those conditions do not exist, and that is why I have stood at all times for what certain people have called "globaloney." I have stood for it steadily ever since in the early 1940's, spending money through the United Nations. It will cost a fraction of what this present program of ours is costing, spending money to eliminate the causes of communism.

POSITION OF UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY

The CHAIRMAN. I am going to ask you a question, and you do not need to answer it unless you want to. As between the course of the United States and the course of Russia in the international field, would you choose the course of Russia or would you not?

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, I have stood steadily for what I call progressive capitalism and I have stood for it at all times—I have very strong feelings against reactionary capitalism. I have stood for progressive capitalism, and that certainly is not the course of Russia. I have stood for complete civil liberties, and that is not the course of Russia. I also stand, however, for the equality of the races, and that is not the course of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. You did not answer my question. I said, as between the two courses, you prefer the Russian?

Mr. WALLACE. No. I prefer to live in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. I know, but that is not necessarily answering the question. I said, as between the two policies—

Mr. WALLACE. You are talking about purely foreign policy now, is that correct, Senator?

Senator CONNALLY. Yes. Which would you choose, the United States foreign policy or Russian foreign policy?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say that neither one has been devoted to attaining peace. I do not hold a brief for either one of them.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not hold a brief for your own country as against a foreign country?

Mr. WALLACE. Now you are shifting the base of your argument. You are talking about a country and not foreign policy. A foreign policy is a policy of a particular administration. I disapprove of the foreign policy of the present administration, and that is an American privilege to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. In your statement you oppose pretty nearly everything else that the present administration does, do you not?

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, with regard to domestic policy I am on record during the last campaign for very much what the present administration said at that time it stood for. But with regard to foreign policy it is another matter. I do not agree with the present administration on foreign policy.

The CHAIRMAN. I fail to find anywhere in your statement an approval of anything that the present administration has agreed to, and I am not trying to make this critical at all.

Mr. WALLACE. All I ask you to do, Senator, is to put in the words "foreign policy," for I disagree completely and utterly with the foreign policy of the present administration. I will agree with you on that. There is just one thing that I approve of at the present moment, and that is, I do say that Mr. Jessup did a very good thing in pushing along his conversations with Mr. Malik, and that was very hopeful and should be followed up.

MR. JESSUP AND THE STATE DEPARTMENT

The CHAIRMAN. That is part of the American foreign policy we have been trying to put over for months and months and months.

Mr. WALLACE. I say we were not trying to put it over for months and months and months. Quite the contrary. And I say it is greatly to Mr. Jessup's credit that he reversed what had been the trend.

The CHAIRMAN. He did it alone? He did not do it after consultations with the President and after consultations with the Department of State? And what he did was not in harmony with their intentions or their purposes? Is that what you mean to say?

Mr. WALLACE. I have no means of knowing what conversations he may have had, but I would say that in all probability Mr. Jessup is entitled to a very great deal of credit.

The CHAIRMAN. He is. Of course he is. I give him credit. But I am not assuming he would pursue that policy unless he had consulted with the President of the United States and with the Secretary of State. As a matter of fact, I know that he did consult at least with the Secretary of State. I do not know about the President. I think he deserves a great deal of credit. You are trying to distinguish between what Mr. Jessup did and the policy of the governmental authorities who directed his actions.

Mr. WALLACE. What we have available in the newspapers is what Mr. Jessup did. I must say I am rather attracted to Mr. Jessup's face. He looks like a serious, earnest man.

The CHAIRMAN. But you are trying to draw a distinction, and kick the other authorities in the State Department and the President into the ash can by elevating Mr. Jessup to the top of the pile.

Mr. WALLACE. He happens to have been the one who tried to accomplish something constructive, and the other actions have been destructive, in my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. He was the agent, though, the representative, of the United States in the United Nations, and it was his function and his business to be the hand that executed the orders of his superiors. Is that not true?

Mr. WALLACE. I have been in government.

The CHAIRMAN. I know you have, and you did not let your subordinates run the show, either. You ran most of it and you were in the paper nearly every other day, were you not?

Mr. WALLACE. But every once in a while there would be someone down the line who would come forward with a bright idea, and I was glad to accept that bright idea and help implement it. I am quite willing to agree with your statement that Secretary Acheson was glad to push this along. I am quite happy to agree with that, but I still have a suspicion that Mr. Jessup had the bright idea in the first place.

The CHAIRMAN. You think he originated it?

Mr. WALLACE. I don't know.

EFFORTS OF THE UNITED STATES TO SETTLE BERLIN QUESTION

The CHAIRMAN. You say you think that. As a matter of fact, we have been irked and irritated by this airlift ever since it was begun, and we have been trying to bring about measures to alleviate it.

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, I will be happy to do this, and maybe we can come to an accord with regard to this point. I will be glad to do this. I will be glad to assume that when Secretary Acheson was appointed it meant a slow, certain, and gradual turn in the whole administration policy. It may be true. I hope it is. This may be the first sign of it. I hope it is.

The CHAIRMAN. You think he is coming over to your view on everything?

Mr. WALLACE. It may be that the President himself is. I hope so. At any rate, I know the President at one time was quite completely in accord with my view.

The CHAIRMAN. Everybody knows who reads the papers that we have been making an effort to get rid of the Berlin blockade ever since it started, and I assume that you know, because you read the papers, although as you said this morning, you did not have much faith in some of them when they published some things that did not agree with your views.

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, this is sort of interesting. Speaking about the papers, in the New York Times this morning we find a most intriguing juxtaposition of headlines: "Berlin blockade to end May 12th. Big Four meeting set for May 23." Then, under it, "Note of caution sounded by Clay. General is worried."

The CHAIRMAN. He was not talking about the immediate question of the air lift. He is over in Germany, and this happened up in New York. All he said was that communism was still on the rampage, and that it wanted to incorporate all the countries that it could. Wasn't that the effect of his statement? You did not read it? You are testifying here about the paper and you have not even read it?

Mr. WALLACE. I was interested in that interesting juxtaposition of the headlines. Yes, I read the Clay statement. Referring to your belief that Russia wants to incorporate all the countries of the world—

The CHAIRMAN. Do you deny its expansionist intentions? I do not mean all the countries of the world.

Mr. WALLACE. I think in her own interest, so far as any foreseeable future is concerned, she would be utterly foolish to engage in any expansionist policy, from the standpoint of her own self-interest.

The CHAIRMAN. Why don't you tell the Russians that? You wrote them a letter about wanting to negotiate with them. Why don't you tell Stalin, "Look here, Mr. Stalin. You are all wrong about this expansionist doctrine."

Mr. WALLACE. You will find essentially that in my letter to Mr. Stalin, as a matter of fact. If you want to put it in the record, you will find it there.

The CHAIRMAN. I haven't got it with me.

VETO IN THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Now, Mr. Secretary, I want to terminate my interrogation. Do you favor the abolishment of the veto on the ground of peaceful settlements in the United Nations?

Mr. WALLACE. In my letter to Stalin, Senator, I put it this way, that the veto was not a cause but a symptom of lack of understanding between the United States and Russia, and the veto would cause no concern once the points of difference were settled. I think that is where the difficulty really lies. It is not in the veto itself, and I have no doubt that if the real points of difference were cleared up it might be possible to arrive at an agreement on the part of both the United States and Russia to abolish the veto with regard to certain matters. Just what those matters would be I do not know. I do know that in the first instance the United States would be more interested in the veto than Russia would. I assume there are still many Senators who would think long and seriously before giving up the veto.

The CHAIRMAN. On armed measures. But I am talking about the wide scope of authority in the United Nations for peaceful settlement of issues.

Mr. WALLACE. I think that is a matter that might well be discussed between the United States and Russia in the hope of coming to an accord.

The CHAIRMAN. Did Mr. Stalin answer your letter on that point?

Mr. WALLACE. He did not go into detail. He just said it served as a basis for getting together.

The CHAIRMAN. We think, or some of us do at least, that the veto could be very safely abolished on peaceful settlements; on the issue of war or armed action it could still be retained, if necessary.

Mr. WALLACE. I think that is a very hopeful statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you agree with that?

Mr. WALLACE. You cannot answer a matter of that sort briefly, for this reason, that there is such a thing as economic warfare, and the use of economic tools in a way which eventually works out toward military objectives. So I do not think you can give any complete yes-or-no answer. I think it is an approach that ought to be explored.

The CHAIRMAN. I am speaking, though, about direct issues that come before the United Nations. If they regard peaceful settlements as desirable, why shouldn't they settle them peacefully, without invoking the veto?

Mr. WALLACE. I think eventually that kind of approach can be brought up fruitfully. I doubt if the time has yet come.

THE TREATY AND THE CHARTER

The CHAIRMAN. One other question, Mr. Secretary. You say on page 4 of your statement, "The pact not only rejects the basic principles upon which the United Nations was founded; it violates the plain provisions of the Charter."

What provision of the Charter does this treaty violate?

Mr. WALLACE. Where is that sentence?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 4, line 9. It is in the third paragraph on page 4.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, Senator, you will find the succeeding paragraphs dealing with that very point. It is just simply an elaboration of the flat statement.

The CHAIRMAN. You say, though, that it violates the plain provisions of the Charter. If the provisions are plain, why can't you find them and point them out?

Mr. WALLACE. First, I would like to know, does this committee look on the pact as a regional pact?

The CHAIRMAN. We do, but we do not base it solely on that ground.

Mr. WALLACE. If you do look on it as a regional pact, I believe it violates the plain provision of the Charter.

The CHAIRMAN. What plain provision of the Charter?

Mr. WALLACE. If it is a regional pact, I believe there are some members of the pact that are not members of the United Nations, as a matter of fact.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true.

Mr. WALLACE. If it is a regional pact, the enforcement measures would have to come before the Security Council, and it is obviously the design, under the Atlantic Pact, not to bring matters before the Security Council.

The CHAIRMAN. Doesn't it specifically provide that any actions taken have to be immediately reported to the Security Council?

Mr. WALLACE. But article 53 provides that no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements or by regional agencies without the authorization of the Security Council.

The CHAIRMAN. That is why we report them to the Security Council.

Mr. WALLACE. You are saying "report." This has to do with enforcement action. The Charter of the United Nations has to do with enforcement action. You speak about reporting.

The CHAIRMAN. I am talking about this treaty.

Mr. WALLACE. It gets around to a question, after it is reported, whether the action is going to be authorized by the Security Council. If you do look on it as a regional pact and do intend to have any action taken authorized by the Security Council, I think that places a considerably different light on the whole matter from what the public has had reason to believe heretofore.

The CHAIRMAN. It is plainly written in the treaty. Here is what the treaty says:

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all, and consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in the exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense, recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations, will assist the party or parties so attacked by taking forthwith individually and in concert with the other powers such action as is deemed necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area. Any such armed attack, and all measures taken as a result thereof, shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

Does not that particular provision require that, just as soon as the Security Council takes means to restore the security of this area, the activity of the various countries under the treaty will terminate?

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, it seems to me that the governing point, if this is a regional pact, is in article 53.

The CHAIRMAN. I am talking about the article that I have quoted, and I have asked you a plain question. Does it not provide that, as soon as the Security Council takes measures to restore the safety and security of this area, the action of the nations shall terminate? Is that not true, by the plain words of the treaty?

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, you have quoted the second paragraph of article 5 of the treaty, saying:

Any such armed attack, and all measures taken as a result thereof, shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

That is a matter of report.

Now, article 53 says:

But no enforcement action shall be taken under regional arrangements, or by regional agencies, without the authorization of the Security Council, with the exception—and so on, which seems to me to be a plain contradiction.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Senator Vandenberg, I will turn over the examination to you.

Senator VANDENBERG. I do not think there is very much that the distinguished friend and I have to discuss this morning, because of a fundamental disagreement regarding objectives. I would like to say, first of all, just as Mr. Wallace himself said that he agreed with the Wall Street Journal in some observation that it made which was contrary to his usual policy, that, contrary to my usual policy, I agree with Mr. Wallace when he says that two different ideologies can live together in this world, in a live-and-let-live world, and I think any other concept would be very, very fatal.

MOTIVES OF TREATY AUTHORS

Mr. Wallace, it seems to me the fundamental difference between us is one in assessing motives. Do you think the authors of the North Atlantic Pact want war?

Mr. WALLACE. No; I don't think so. Whom do you mean as the authors?

Senator VANDENBERG. I wouldn't know. You said this morning it was Churchill. You said in Detroit the other day it was I. I hope you are not retracting that compliment.

Mr. WALLACE. I said Churchill was the architect.

Senator VANDENBERG. I mean when I say "Do you think the authors of this pact want war?" the President of the United States, the State Department, and the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. WALLACE. No; I don't think any of those want war.

Senator VANDENBERG. Do you not think that your whole campaign in the country, and even abroad, because you have taken your doctrine abroad, attributes to all of us who disagree with you on this matter belligerent motives and unworthy motives?

Mr. WALLACE. Well, I would say that my attitude is fundamentally this: That, whether it is from ignorance or from design, there is an intent at the present time on the part of many influential and highly placed people in the United States to try to impose our will by force in many parts of the world, and that effort to impose our will by force can end, in my opinion, only in ultimate bankruptcy and disaster.

Senator VANDENBERG. I understand that is your opinion.

Mr. WALLACE. I have known many people, the effect of whose actions I feel to be utterly evil, who themselves, as individuals, I know have the greatest internal sense of rectitude. That does not prevent me from opposing them with everything that I have got. It makes them more difficult and dangerous antagonists, in my opinion.

Senator VANDENBERG. I quite agree with that estimate, and I reciprocate the estimate so far as you and I are concerned.

The point I make is that it is possible for honest men to disagree as to the methods of pursuing peace, and just because you disagree with my belief as to the proper method, that does not assign you to a category of infamy, but I decline to accept any such category either just because I disagree with you.

Now, do you insist upon attaching bad motives to those who honestly believe that this is the very best way to get peace? I know you think they are crazy. I am not talking about that.

Mr. WALLACE. No; I wouldn't insist that they are crazy.

Senator VANDENBERG. Can they not be perfectly honest, sincere, conscientious, patriotic Americans?

Mr. WALLACE. Sure, sure. I would like to have the same privilege accorded to me, however.

Senator VANDENBERG. Well, I hope you get it.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been asserting it everywhere.

POSSIBILITY OF ROOM FOR DIFFERENCE OF OPINION

Senator VANDENBERG. Wherever you have presented a challenge in fact, Mr. Wallace, I think your challenge is entitled to complete exploration. As I have sensed your attitude toward this problem, it has been one of insisting that your country is imperialistic in its attitudes and objectives, and that all of us who have any responsibility in government are determined upon world conquest in some form or another. I think you have even gone to Europe and told them over there that we are imperialistic in our objectives.

All I am trying to get you to say to me, and I think perhaps you have said it, is that there is room in this field for honest differences of opinion, and that you will concede that some of us who disagree with your method of reaching peace may be just as sure that we are seeking peace as you are.

Isn't that true?

Mr. WALLACE. There is no question about that, Senator.

Senator VANDENBERG. You have assigned particular infamy to the resolution adopted by the Senate on June 11, 1948, as being the source of most of this evil. I assume you have read that resolution?

Mr. WALLACE. Not for some time.

SENATE RESOLUTION 289

Senator VANDENBERG. There are six sentences describing six objectives in this resolution. The first one says:

Voluntary agreement to remove the veto from all questions involving pacific settlements of international disputes and situations, and from the admission of new members.

Would you condemn that objective?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say it is premature. I said that other things have to be done first before you can get that. I say it is likely to be mischief-making at the moment.

Senator VANDENBERG. So you are opposed to efforts to remove the veto from pacific settlements?

Mr. WALLACE. I say there are some other things that have to be removed first. I am for the objective.

Senator VANDENBERG. The objective is O. K.?

Mr. WALLACE. The objective is O. K. It is the timing.

Senator VANDENBERG. Another objective:

Maximum efforts to obtain agreements to provide the United Nations with armed forces as provided by the Charter, and to obtain agreement among member nations upon universal regulation and reduction of armaments under adequate and dependable guaranty against violation.

Do you condemn that objective?

Mr. WALLACE. That particular thing, in slightly different words, was in my letter to Stalin.

Senator VANDENBERG. So you do not condemn that objective.

Mr. WALLACE. Calling for general disarmament; no.

Senator VANDENBERG. No. 6:

If necessary, after adequate effort toward strengthening the United Nations, review of the charter at an appropriate time by a general conference called under article 109 or by the General Assembly.

Do you disagree with that?

Mr. WALLACE. I think a great deal can be said on behalf of that.

Senator VANDENBERG. In other words, that is exactly half of this resolution, and at least that half has some elements of virtue.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. Would you not think that the gentlemen who proposed three out of six suggestions which meet with your approval might have been well intentioned when they also suggested—

Progressive development of regional and other collective arrangements for individual and collective self-defense in accordance with the purposes, principles, and provisions of the charter—and might have been moving in the right direction also?

Mr. WALLACE. No; I would not.

Senator VANDENBERG. You would not agree with that?

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Senator VANDENBERG. I repeat that wherever you present facts I think, so far as I am concerned, facts coming from you are just as challenging as from any other source, and just as entitled to complete and honest consideration. I would like to test out one or two of these facts, however.

AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

I call your attention to page 5 of your statement, the next to the last paragraph, beginning, "The pact and the purpose in effect is directed against the Soviet Union," and then I call your attention to the next two sentences:

Once signed, the obligation of article 8 would preclude the United States from negotiating a treaty of peace and friendship with the Soviet Union.

Will you show me upon what you base that conclusion?

Mr. WALLACE. Article 8 of the pact reads:

Each party declares that none of the international engagements now in force between it and any of the other parties, or any other third state, is in conflict with the provisions of this treaty and undertakes not to enter into any international engagements in conflict with this treaty.

My contention is that article 8 would make it very difficult for the United States and Russia to engage in a discussion to eliminate the outstanding points of difference; that the United States, having been committed to the Atlantic nations, to a kind of union with the Atlantic nations, will then find it very difficult to settle the outstanding points of difference.

Senator VANDENBERG. Do you find anything in the text of this treaty which precludes treaties of peace and friendship with anybody? I wish you would point it out to me if you do.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, that is my point, just as I have read it there. It makes it difficult to enter into a discussion with Russia.

Senator VANDENBERG. The pact itself, on the contrary, by its text, would invite total cooperation for peace and security, would it not? Is that not its stated objective?

Mr. WALLACE. That is its stated objective, and I underline the word "stated."

Senator VANDENBERG. You do not think that the Government means what it says?

Mr. WALLACE. I think its real objective is to get an alliance with nations against Russia. It is for the purpose of shipping arms to Europe.

NEGOTIATIONS ON THE BERLIN CRISIS

Senator VANDENBERG. On page 7 you say, "The agreement" referring to the Berlin agreement) "which resulted in Moscow and raised the hopes of the whole world for an over-all settlement with Russia was blocked in Berlin." Then you raise the question as to who blocked it.

What is your understanding of what happened, first in Moscow with respect to currency in Berlin, and then what happened in Berlin when the agents of the four powers in Berlin were given a week in which to implement the agreement? What is your understanding of what happened?

Mr. WALLACE. My understanding is that in Moscow there was an agreement with regard to currency problems, which had so deeply concerned the Russians, and matters were all set to go ahead. And then the military people in Berlin decided not to go ahead.

Senator VANDENBERG. Which military people?

Mr. WALLACE. Here again I am relying on Hawkinson, who says that the unwillingness to proceed came from the United States, and I quoted Senator Connally in his press conference on November 29. He said, according to the press, "The plan proposed by the earlier talks was not looked on with favor by the military governors, who did not accept it." That does not indicate whether Senator Connally had in mind—

The CHAIRMAN. That is part of my statement, just one sentence.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, or course. I do not know whether the Senator had in mind any particular military governors when he said that. The military governors, whoever they were, did not carry out that which had been arrived at in Moscow.

The CHAIRMAN. The military governors were the ones that were in practical operation of those zones, were they not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And naturally they faced this issue of currency probably more intimately than anybody else?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. I assumed that it was common knowledge, Mr. Wallace, that when this agreement came down from Moscow to Berlin and was referred to the military governors that it was the Russian representative who flatly declined to implement the directive from the four powers in Moscow, in keeping with its clear and explicit undertakings.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, Senator, I have as much respect for facts wherever they may be found as you have, and if you have some facts along this line, I will certainly be glad to have them.

Senator VANDENBERG. I would like to call your attention to just one other thing, not meaning by these limitations upon myself that I am agreeing with the things I do not discuss with you.

MILITARY EXPENDITURES

At some point in your statement you were discussing the military implementation and the pact, stating that the allied powers in western Europe would be required to spend on the basis of 6 or 7 to 1. Where is that?

"Mr. Acheson made it clear just how great that burden would be when he said that for every dollar of American arms sent to Europe, the European nations would be required to furnish $6 or $7." Then, subsequently, you draw from that premise, I believe, the assumption that this means we are requiring these nations practically to double their existing budgets. Is that not stated in here somewhere?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. That is on the bottom of page 12 and on the top of page 13.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is your information on the subject?

Mr. WALLACE. The statement with regard to six or seven times as many dollars to be spent by the European nations as we would spend I got from the New York Times. Apparently Secretary Acheson had made some such statement. I assume he had.

Senator VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. With regard to the doubling, the matter is not altogether clear. It is a question of whether that $6 or $7 that the European nations would spend for each dollar that we would spend applies to the new money that will be added or whether it applies to their total. If it applies to the new money, it would mean that the European nations, instead of now spending $5,000,000,000, would be spending a total of perhaps 12,000,000,000, which would be more than double their present expenditure.

Senator VANDENBERG. You would put that construction on it?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; I put that construction on it. It is obvious I have put that construction on it to have said what I said.

Senator VANDENBERG. I agree you had to set up that premise in order to reach your conclusion. If you were dependably advised that that is not the proper construction, and that this $6 or $7 to our $1 is merely the measure of the existing budgets of these countries for the next fiscal year, which I believe is the fact, and that there is no intention to apply the measure—

Mr. WALLACE. I think the American people ought to know that that is what the truth is.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think I can say to you that that is the plan, insofar as it has been disclosed to us in any authentic degree.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to have the facts, sir.

Senator VANDENBERG. I think that is all.

Mr. WALLACE. In that case it would indicate that the European countries would have to increase their own domestic budgets by only $2,000,000,000, as they are now spending $5,200,000,000, according to the information I can get, and if we furnish $1,100,000,000 this coming year they would be under the necessity of raising the $5,200,000,000 to maybe 6 or 7 billion, and if we send 2 billion next year I presume it will be expanded in like ratio.

Senator VANDENBERG. I want to say to you quite frankly that we do not yet have detailed information regarding military implementation, but it is the general understanding from the witnesses who have testified insofar as they could on the subject up to date that there is no intention to increase the over-all military budgets of the western European countries in connection with this next fiscal year's program. The only intention is to gear them together and to increase their efficiency within these existing limits, which would put quite a different face on the thing than you have indicated in your comment.

I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. That was made quite clear in the hearings, Mr. Secretary, that they have a normal, and have had a normal, budget for military defense through the years, and that it is not intended to increase that by 6 or 7 billion dollars but that all of their present budgets would amount to about six or seven times as much as we would contribute under this treaty. And I hope you won't get that confused in your mind, because you say in your statement yourself that their budgets are now $5,200,000,000.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad that the committee has made that clear. It certainly was not clear before.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Fulbright?

SOVIET ACTIONS OF LAST FEW YEARS

Senator FULBRIGHT. Mr. Wallace, I do not want to take up much time, but hasn't it occurred to you that perhaps one reason why last year, when the proposal by Mr. Stalin through Mr. Smith was not taken too seriously, was that after 3 years of such grave difficulties there was not much confidence on our part that anything would come of it? Do you not think that that was probably one of the reasons?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know what the real reason was. I will say this, that each year we delay, our bargaining position from a strictly selfish point of view will be lessened.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I believe I understood you to say a moment ago that you felt Russia had not lived up to the requirements of the Yalta Pact, but that you thought she had good reasons not to. Is that your position?

Mr. WALLACE. I said I did not condone her actions, but I could understand why she had acted as she did.

Senator FULBRIGHT. To make it a little clearer, do you feel that Russia has lived up to the Yalta agreements with regard to the elections in the Balkan countries?

Mr. WALLACE. No. I have never claimed that she has.

Senator FULBRIGHT. She has not lived up to them?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say that neither nation has acted as I would like to see them act. I think we have both interfered in the internal affairs in various undercover ways.

INTERFERENCE IN THE INTERNAL AFFAIRS OF OTHER COUNTRIES

Senator FULBRIGHT. What did you have in mind that we have violated our undertaking?

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say we violated the Yalta agreement, but I say we endeavored to influence the outcome of the elections there.

Senator FULBRIGHT. What did you have in mind in that connection?

Mr. WALLACE. This is just testimony that I get from returned soldiers who have seen the way things have gone. I don't want to get any of them into trouble. But on the matter of carrying out agreements, I would say that we are much more guilty for failing to carry out the demilitarization of Germany under the Potsdam agreement than Russia has been guilty of anything in the nature of having to do with free elections in the Balkan States.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think that the conduct of Russia during the last 3 years has not had some effect upon the attitude of our Government toward carrying out in the last detail the agreements?

Mr. WALLACE. There must be some explanation. I can understand how the United States got that way just as well as I can understand how Russia got that way.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You can understand that there is less confidence in being able to get along, and therefore, that is the reason?

Mr. WALLACE. On this matter of elections, and this does not happen to violate any agreements, the United States certainly is not guiltless with regard to any other countries. I went to Mexico in September of 1940 as Ambassador Plenipotentiary to attend Camacho's inauguration, and I know at that time that we were interfering in Mexico's election in a way.

The CHAIRMAN. The elections were over.

Mr. WALLACE. I should not say with the elections, but with the final outcome. It was a very interesting situation, but I have seen us do that on many occasions.

Senator VANDENBERG. We were not doing that through our Special Ambassador on that occasion, were we?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; in a way, we were. It prevented, to a degree, a revolution at that time.

But as Secretary of Commerce I sat on the National Advisory Committee that has to do with the making of loans, and I know that—and I disapprove of this altogether—we hastened the loan along to France in the hopes of affecting an election outcome in France, and we have done an awful lot of that kind of thing.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think our relations with Mexico are the same as those between Moscow and Rumanian today?

Mr. WALLACE. You can never make an exact analogy.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You said it was very similar.

Mr. WALLACE. There are many points in common.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do we dictate who holds the offices, and so on, in Mexico?

Mr. WALLACE. We influence Mexico in many unusual ways.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think the result, just to take an example, of what happened in Mexico with regard to the oil properties of Americans is the same as what happened to the oil properties in Rumania?

Mr. WALLACE. I happen to know the details of how we happened to arrive at the oil settlement in Mexico.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Regardless of the merits in either case, do you think they were handled in a similar way?

Mr. WALLACE. No; but I also know that if it had not been for Roosevelt the outcome in Mexico would not have been as it was, and it was not the intent of a great many people in government that the outcome should be the way it was. It was due to Roosevelt himself that the outcome was what it was.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN FASCISM AND COMMUNISM

Senator FULBRIGHT. You made reference to our possible attitude toward Spain and Portugal as being dictatorships. Do you see any difference between the character of the Government in a so-called Fascist government and that of Russia?

Mr. WALLACE. I would draw the same distinction, for example, that the United States Army draw in the report which it put out in 1944 or 1945—March 24, 1945. The United States Army, anticipating the question, perhaps, says, "What is the difference between communism and fascism? Aren't they essentially the same?"

And the United States Army answers in this fact sheet:

In any discussion on fascism there will some who will argue that there are strong similarities between fascism and communism. Under both systems there is neither freedom of speech nor of press as we know it. Both forms of government permit only one political party. Both have a secret police. But beyond this there are important and fundamental differences in philosophy, aims, purposes, and methods.

Then it goes on at some little length:

Let us take three fundamental concepts, war and peace, race, and the purpose of the state, and see how the two systems stack up. Since the Soviet system is associated in most minds with communism and is the only working example, reference is frequently made to Soviet practice in comparison with characteristic Fascist practice.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Can't you sum it up in your own words? I am sure we do not have time to go into the whole philosophy of communism. But do you feel that there is much distinction, or are they very similar?

Mr. WALLACE. As the Army points out, and I am in complete accord with the Army in this particular, the ultimate objective is entirely different. The objective in the case of communism is peace. I do not think there is any question about that. And the attitude with regard to race is totally different.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Was not the objective of Hitler peace—on his terms?

Mr. WALLACE. I think you ought to read this Army pamphlet. I think it will do you a lot of good.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I was seeking information from you. I thought you would probably know more about their differences than anyone else. You think they are different?

Mr. WALLACE. I do, very definitely. I think with regard to civil liberties they are very similar.

ANTI-COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA

Senator FULBRIGHT. Don't you think basically that the difficulty, or the caution with which in recent months the West has had to proceed, has been due to that distrust which has been generated during the prior 3 years with regard to former agreements?

Mr. WALLACE. No; I do not think it went fundamentally to that at all. I think there was a consciously and carefully cultivated propaganda, an anti-Communist campaign most extraordinary in nature, and that campaign—

Senator FULBRIGHT. Where was that campaign, here?

Mr. WALLACE. Here in the United States, a terrifically, very strongly motivated, anti-Communist crusade.

Senator FULBRIGHT. What do you think was the reason for that?

Mr. WALLACE. Well, sir, I think there were certain very specific interests in the United States—

Senator FULBRIGHT. What interests?

Mr. WALLACE. I can name them.

SOURCES OF ANTI-COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA

Senator FULBRIGHT. I think you ought to name them, for the benefit of the committee. I am sure I do not know what those interests are.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, maybe you wouldn't, in Arkansas.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That's right.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not reflecting in any way on the people in Arkansas. But I think, for example, that there are certain elements in the hierarchy of the Catholic Church in this country and abroad which have carried on, since the war came to an end, in the same, and even in a more bitter fashion than they did before the war. Because the Vatican has had very great interests in eastern Europe, for example, it has carried on a continuous and most vigorous campaign. It is not a matter than anyone cares to deal with. I share with nearly everyone else in the United States the abhorrence of anything in the nature of religious intolerance. I have no feeling of intolerance with regard to the Catholic religion as a religion. But when it gets into politics—and I don't think the rank and file of the Catholics are in any way immediately concerned with this, and many of them are not even aware of it—it has to meet the battle on the political level, and I think the Catholic Church is in world politics to an extraordinary degree at the present time. I would go so far as to say exactly what Rabbi Stephen Wise said before he died.

SENATOR FULBRIGHT. What was that?

MR. WALLACE. I do not have the precise quotation, but it was to the effect that there were elements in the Catholic Church that wanted war.

SENATOR FULBRIGHT. Is that the interest? Are there any other interests that you think are behind this?

MR. WALLACE. Yes; of course, you have the British imperial interest, which is a very great one, indeed; and we do have some common interest with the British, I am quite willing to grant. I think the balance of the world would be destroyed if Russia would move in all the way to the Persian Gulf. That is why the matter of the Dardanelles is quite important. I think there is an area there that should be dominated neither by the British nor the Russians. I think that is a very important thing, under the doctrine to which both Senator Vandenberg and I adhere, that it is possible for both systems to live in the same world. I don't care whether Russia is under the Czar or under the Communists; there is a geographical entity that has long pushed to get to the Persian Gulf and to get other warm-water outlets. It is entitled to a certain degree of satisfaction if it can be obtained without overbalancing the world.

I think the United States does have some community of interest in seeing that the British Empire is not destroyed, but I do not think that we should go along with Britain, shall we say, in backing up Arab States; I don't think we should go along with Britain in engaging in a lot of things, carrying the whole British load all over the world. I think we are going to bankrupt ourselves doing that all over the world. There are only certain points of identification.

Now, I want to mention one other interest, and that is our American big business interest, which has made common cause at times, not in a completely systemic fashion but in a very effective fashion, with these other two interests. The three, at the present time, in my opinion not in any completely worked-out plan, have been engaged in this anti-Communist campaign which has so completely blacked out all other news that is not in conformity with the anti-Communist crusade.

REASONS FOR ANTI-COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA

SENATOR FULBRIGHT. You think those interests have inspired the anti-Communist crusade on their own initiative, and this did not arise as a reaction from the actions of Russia in the Balkans?

MR. WALLACE. When you talk about action and reaction you have to go all the way back to the early incidents in 1919, when the various nations were trying to choke the Bolsheviks at the start. You have to go through that entire period, and there was only the briefest intermission during the war, and the whole thing was picked up again.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You do not think our actions in the war had any real bearing on that?

Mr. WALLACE. We began before the war ended in April, after Roosevelt's death, of 1945, as I pointed out, at San Francisco, to give the Russians very real cause to distrust us. There are a large number of specific instances that can be documented with regard to that, and the Russians immediately gave us, because they are that kind of people, equal cause to distrust them. It was just a get tough and get tougher policy on both sides all the way.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I believe that is all.

SCOPE OF THE ARMS PROGRAM

Senator VANDENBERG. May I call the Secretary's attention to one thing I forgot when I was running over his address. At the top of page 14, Mr. Wallace, you include a quotation from me which I will read:

Senator Vandenberg said last week that the $1,100,000,000 arms program that has been tied to the pact is "comparatively trivial" and "relatively insignificant."

The literal phrases are quite correct. I was wondering if you saw the total statement in which they appeared.

Mr. WALLACE. All I saw was what appeared in the New York Times.

Senator VANDENBERG. I am sure you would agree that you would not want to take words out of their context and misinterpret them, and for your information, I want to say to you that those words were used in respect to a billion dollars in two comparisons which I made: No. 1, comparatively and relatively insignificant as compared with the cost of another world war, which, in my opinion, I believe just as completely the North Atlantic Pact helps prevent as you believe otherwise; secondly, it was used to compare what to me is the relatively inconsequential part of this program, to wit, the limited contribution to arms in western Europe, compared to the fundamental obligation which underlies the pact, which involves, of course, all the assets and resources of the whole people of the United States and all the other 300,000,000 people who are involved in the pact.

I do not ask you to agree with my use of the phrase, but I want you to understand that I am not one who thinks that a billion dollars, just abstractly, is trivial or insignificant.

Mr. WALLACE. I was saying it was insignificant using somewhat your own reasoning. I guess.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, you have denounced and ascribed to certain interests a campaign against communism; is that correct?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

ANTI-AMERICAN PROPAGANDA

The CHAIRMAN. You are aware, are you not, of the bitter, and I think unprovoked and baseless, campaign that Russia is making every day through Pravda and through all of these sources of propaganda and information against the United States, are you not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; and I have, as a matter of fact, recognized that as I have made public appearances from time to time. For instance, when I appeared on this recent program of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, I deplored the name calling. I did not speak of it specifically; I was referring to the way in which Mr. Lysenko has called some of our western scientists names, which I felt did not contribute to good feeling.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that almost daily, through official sources, their propaganda has denounced the United States as being an imperialist power trying to spread our imperialism, and that this treaty here is evidence of our desire to incorporate these countries of Europe into an imperialistic system? And they have denounced us as warmongers and all the other vicious things that they can say about us.

Mr. WALLACE. I would say, Senator, if you were to weigh up the tons of ink spilled in Russia in calling us names, and the tons of ink spilled in this country in calling them names, our tons of ink would be 100 times as great.

The CHAIRMAN. You insist on your former expressed statement that in a contest between Russia and the United States you are for Russia?

Mr. WALLACE. No, Senator. You are twisting—you are doing more than twisting; you are utterly misrepresenting what I said.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not mean to misrepresent you.

Mr. WALLACE. All I am saying is that we call Russia names just as well as Russia is calling us names, and I deplore name calling on both sides. That is the point I started out making and the point I shall continue to insist on making.

The CHAIRMAN. If I misquoted you, I did not intend to. But I am doing it to your face so as to give you an opportunity to correct it. I am not saying it behind your back. But your insistence now is that by many, many more times all the slush that is being carried over the Russian propaganda machine is multiplied here in the United States against them; is that it?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; that is what I am saying.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what you are saying?

Mr. WALLACE. Right.

The CHAIRMAN. And you insist on that view?

Mr. WALLACE. I will not say that our adjectives are as picturesque as their adjectives.

The CHAIRMAN. You would not say they are as bitter and as mean as their adjectives?

Mr. WALLACE. I will say their statements are a little stronger, but I say we make it more continuously, and I would say on the whole more effectively.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you blame anybody who resents the attacks of Russia on us?

Mr. WALLACE. No; but I would say that Russia must have been gravely disturbed when the chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the House of Representatives talked so specifically and directly about bombing her. I say that kind of thing, while it may not be name calling, was far more provocative than any of the picturesque names that the Russians use with regard to us.

The CHAIRMAN. That was only quite recently that that occurred, and has it not been true that ever since the end of World War II Russia has turned her heaviest artillery pouring out denunciations upon the head of the United States, who sent her arms to help her in the war and gave her lend-lease, and aided her in every way in the world she could during the World War? It is not true that immediately when the war ended they turned their guns on us and have been abusing us and denouncing us ever since?

Mr. WALLACE. Well, Senator, I have entered into the history of that already, as to how I think that came to pass. I do happen to know, with regard to lend-lease, that our lend-lease representative told Russia we were helping her not because we were doing it for Russia's sake, but because we thought by helping Russia we were most effectively helping ourselves. I happen to know that for a fact.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was it who told them that?

Mr. WALLACE. I will tell you privately if you wish it.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a public hearing, and you asked to come here and testify.

Mr. WALLACE. Frankly, I do not want to get other people into trouble; in the current state of anti-Communist hysteria I would be getting somebody into trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. You should not quote people unless you can tell who they are.

Mr. WALLACE. I will tell it to you privately. I have no objection to telling it to you privately. I am not going to tell it for the benefit of the press. It just causes hardship.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not have to tell it unless you want to. You asked to come here to attend this public hearing, and I thought you were going to bring your views with you.

Senator Wiley, take the witness.

Senator VANDENBERG. May I just ask one more question?

Mr. Wallace, what is your opinion of Americans, if there be any, who say that in case of war between Russia and the United States they would not fight on the side of the United States?

Mr. WALLACE. At the time that statement was made I said I deplored it, and I still deplore it.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Wiley?

RUSSIAN ACTIONS SINCE THE WAR

Senator WILEY. In your approach to your conclusion, which I take it is sincere, you feel that there are possibilities for peaceful arrangements between Russia and this country. Do you differentiate between what we call the Russian people and Stalin and his subordinates?

Mr. WALLACE. Of course, I differentiate between the people of any country and the officials.

Senator WILEY. Then do you feel that with the people of Russia themselves there is a bigger chance for peace than there would be with Stalin and his subordinates?

Mr. WALLACE. I think the people of all nations want peace and want it tremendously. I think the people of all nations want peace more even than their elected officials.

Senator WILEY. How do you explain the activity of Stalin and his subordinates in relation to the better than 100,000,000 people in the various countries they have taken over since the war. Is that indicative of imperialism, or what?

Mr. WALLACE. I think Stalin, moved by the same motives that have animated us since Roosevelt died in April of 1945, wanted to do everything he could to make sure that they are secure. Both sides have been moving in every possible way to make sure of security.

Senator WILEY. Have you personally talked with Stalin about peace?

Mr. WALLACE. I have never been in Soviet Russia. I have been in Soviet Asia. I have never seen Stalin.

Senator WILEY. Have you had personal contact with him?

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Senator WILEY. Through anyone else?

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Senator WILEY. Have you any reason to believe that what has been set forth here as the philosophy of communism has changed any in the last year or 2 or 10?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say the answer that Stalin has made to Alexander Werth, the British correspondent, to Elliot Roosevelt, to Harold Stassen, and now more recently to Kingsbury Smith, add up in my mind to a very definite desire on the part of Russia at the present time, and I think for specifically selfish interests, to come to an agreement. I think she has every reason, from a strictly selfish point of view, to come to an agreement.

POSSIBILITY OF AN AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

Senator WILEY. Do you think, from history that has passed, that a treaty or an agreement would be effective? Do you think it would express the intent and the will to maintain and continue peace?

Mr. WALLACE. I think such a treaty could be arrived at. I do not say it is certain to be arrived at. I say there is an even chance to arrive at such a treaty, and I believe it will be carried out by both parties because it is in the interest of both parties.

Senator WILEY. Do you think until that time has arrived, when we can sit down together and beat our swords into plowshares, that we should keep our powder dry?

Mr. WALLACE. You won't be keeping your powder dry by the Atlantic Pact. You will be getting your powder awfully wet.

Senator WILEY. You know your friends of the CIO said to the contrary yesterday. They are in favor of it.

Mr. WALLACE. I am quite aware of the way the CIO testified.

Senator WILEY. You would not include them with big business and the other factors that wanted war?

Mr. WALLACE. No. I simply say with regard to them that in their ranks there are certain elements in the Catholic Church that have a tremendous influence, a very tremendous influence.

Senator WILEY. I am sorry that I was not able to hear all of your statement. I shall read it with interest.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for this opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Mr. Secretary.

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, if I can get away this afternoon I will appreciate it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think maybe you can. We will take you back at 2:30, if you will.

(Whereupon, at 1:30 p. m., a recess was taken until 2:30 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(The committee reconvened at 2:30 p. m., upon the expiration of the recess.)

The CHAIRMAN. Come to order, please.

Senator Wiley was interrogating you, Mr. Wallace, was he not, when we recessed?

TESTIMONY OF HENRY A. WALLACE—Resumed

Mr. WALLACE. I think he was through, but I am not certain.

The CHAIRMAN. I saw him a while ago. He might come up. We will go on with Senator McMahon.

CONSPIRACY AGAINST RUSSIA

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Wallace, as I read your statement, and as I heard you give it, it struck me that it really consists of an allegation that your country and my country is engaged in a gigantic conspiracy to make an aggressive war upon the Soviet Union. Do you agree with that analysis of your statement?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say, Senator, that we are in very grave danger of getting into that position.

Senator McMAHON. I am glad that you modified my analysis of it. I still think my analysis of it is valid, based upon what you have said.

Mr. WALLACE. I think with the adoption of the Atlantic Pact that we would be in essentially that position.

Senator McMAHON. That would be the thing that would convince you that we were engaged in a gigantic conspiracy to make an aggressive war upon the Soviet?

Mr. WALLACE. I did not and would not use the word "conspiracy." That suggests something subterranean, underground, hidden, which is not an integral part of my testimony, because the Atlantic Pact is very open. I think conspiracy conveys a wrong impression.

Senator McMAHON. Conspiracies are not always hidden. Sometimes they are very open for all the world to see. I could give you and describe a couple to you, and may a little later in my questioning, which were undoubtedly conspiracies and were open for the whole world, including people who would see, in this country, that they were conspiracies.

ACCUSATIONS AGAINST THE STATE DEPARTMENT

On page 8, Mr. Wallace, you charged the State Department, as I read it, with "a deliberate misrepresentation" in the fourth paragraph, starting:

In the meantime the State Department was filling the press and the radio with stories about Russian aggressiveness, intensifying the atmosphere of fear and hostility which it evidently thinks necessary to assure the ratification and implementation of the Atlantic Pact.

That is a very great, very severe indictment of the American State Department. Do you feel that that allegation is warranted by the facts?

Mr. WALLACE. I will be glad, for the purpose of the record, to give you documentation along that line.

Senator McMAHON. I think it would be a good thing if you would proceed. I think the American people ought to know whether or not Mr. Dean Acheson, our Secretary of State, is making an attempt to use his official position and the position of the Department in order to intensify the atmosphere of fear and hostility between Russia and ourselves.

That is a very grave accusation which comes pretty close, in my mind, to an accusation of treasonable conduct.

Mr. WALLACE. I will be glad to furnish documentation along that line. I do not happen to have it with me at the moment, but I can furnish that documentation for purposes of the record.

Senator McMAHON. I doubt whether you will ever furnish it, because it does not exist.

My analysis of your statement is, as I say, in my opinion at least, a charge of a gigantic plot—if you do not want to call it a conspiracy—on the part of the American Government to make aggressive war on the Soviet Union.

DEMobilIZATION BY THE UNITED STATES

I would like to ask you which country it was that tore down the greatest Air Force, Navy, and Army in the world and demobilized them and put them away in moth balls. Was it Russia or was it the United States?

Mr. WALLACE. Both countries reduced their armed forces and reduced their armed budgets. We reduced ours in a somewhat greater proportion.

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Secretary, we found ourselves a year and a half or 2 years ago practically denuded, with the exception of the atomic weapon.

Mr. WALLACE. I find it hard to believe that we were practically denuded when we were spending more than 10 times as much for military purposes as we did before the war. I would hardly call it practically denuded.

Senator McMAHON. I do not think it is necessary to press the point. I think the record speaks for itself.

In the spring of 1946, the winter of 1946, I think the record will show that the Army and Navy and Air Force were at an extremely low ebb.

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, could I interject there, that when the war came to an end, as I remember it, we were spending almost half of our entire national income for war purposes. I think the figure amounted up pretty close to $100,000,000,000. I think it is unthinkable that we would, in time of peace, continue to spend in the neighborhood of 90 or 100 billion dollars for war purposes.

Senator McMAHON. Of course, it is unthinkable, and of course it would be impossible for us to continue the expenditures at that rate. But the point that I wish to make to you—and I think you have got to admit it if you want to be fair about this thing at all—is that the United States of America went into a period of demobilization after VJ-day, did it not?

Mr. WALLACE. I think it is exactly the same kind of demobilization that any nation would go into after a war comes to an end.

Senator McMAHON. At least it was not the kind of conduct that was consistent with this plot to conquer the world that you have suddenly found in the American Government and in the American people, Mr. Wallace, is it?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say it was consistent with making America strong; that is all.

THE IRON CURTAIN

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Wallace, you seem to find good cause for the conduct of the Soviet Government at each and every point. It was not the United States Government that erected the iron curtain, was it?

Mr. WALLACE. No, it was Winston Churchill.

Senator McMAHON. Did he erect it, or did he give it a graphic name?

Mr. WALLACE. He borrowed the name from Mr. Goebbels.

Senator McMAHON. No matter where he got it, your answer signifies that it is a creature of his imagination, and that it does not exist. It is your contention that there is no barrier to the transmission of ideas from this country to the Soviet Union?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say that the fact of Mr. Churchill making that speech on March 5, 1946, helped to make that which he declared a fact.

Senator McMAHON. You evade the answer to my question. Do you contend that there was no barrier to the transmission of ideas and information from the west to the east before Mr. Churchill made that speech?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say that Mr. Churchill had made any separation that had begun to grow—as a result of what had happened in May of 1945—grow very much faster than before had been the case.

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Wallace, do you not realize that the Soviet Government, the Soviet Union, has never permitted the transmission of the ideas and culture of the west into the east, into her own borders?

Mr. WALLACE. I may say that as a part of my letter to Stalin I listed, as one of the points for consideration, free exchange of ideas and free movement of citizens.

Senator McMAHON. And you got no response on that, did you?

Mr. WALLACE. Well, there was no response on any one of the six items which I listed. But there was a statement that the approach was worthy of discussion.

I listed the free exchange of scientific information, and the free exchange of newspapermen, scientists, and so on.

With regard to this iron-curtain thing, I may say that I have had a little experience with that just recently. I tried to bring in Pierre Cot as a guest of mine, from France, and Konni Zilliacus. Mr. Zilliacus, is in print as against Russia sitting astride the Dardanelles, is not a Communist, and has gotten into the Communists' hair from time to time.

I invited them over as my guests, and—it seemed to be part of this paper curtain that we are endeavoring to erect now—both of them were denied visas by our State Department. I do not know how to explain that on the part of our State Department. I think they were very foolish in doing that kind of thing.

Senator McMAHON. Without disagreeing or agreeing with you on that, you would not compare the barring of these two gentlemen—if you say they have been barred—from the shores of this country, with the policy that has been pursued in the Soviet Union?

Mr. WALLACE. Compared with what?

Senator McMAHON. Compared with the policy that has been pursued in the Soviet Union, where even officials of the United States Government have been refused permission to visit their own Embassy in Moscow. You know that is so; do you not, Mr. Wallace?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not happen to know the particular case.

Senator McMAHON. You can take it from me that the Assistant Secretary of State, in my presence, tried to get permission, in 1946, in Paris, to go to Moscow; and he was refused permission to go.

Mr. WALLACE. I have insisted on not being put in the position of condoning what the Russians do. As a matter of fact, there are many things with which I disagree most heartily, especially on this particular front. That is not my purpose, to condone what they do.

On the other hand, my voice can be heard more effectively here in the United States than it can in other countries, and I can condemn what is being done here in the United States without condoning what Russia does.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS IN THE UNITED STATES AND RUSSIA

Senator McMAHON. In fact, Mr. Wallace, your voice cannot be heard in Russia at all, except at the whim and caprice of 14 men who sit in a place called the Kremlin, and who have the power of life and death over 300,000,000 people.

Mr. WALLACE. I would assume that in Russia what appears in the press is very closely controlled.

Senator McMAHON. You would assume it?

Mr. WALLACE. I would assume it; yes.

Senator McMAHON. You are in no doubt about that?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know all the details. I am sure I do not know to what extent a village paper can print this, that, and the other thing. But I would assume it is very closely controlled. I would also assume that we have more freedom in our own press here.

Senator McMAHON. Relatively, just a little more?

Mr. WALLACE. It is a different kind of control we have here. We have very substantial control here, very substantial control.

But if, momentarily, a particular paper can have enough money to put out other ideas, that particular paper is at freedom to express itself. Ordinarily it is very effectively denied advertising, however.

Senator McMAHON. It is rather rudimentary, and yet perhaps not, pointing out that you are here in this room before Senators of the United States, and here assembled are 50 or 75 representatives of the press and radio. It is obvious, of course, that there is not any such performance in the Soviet Union, is there? Any comparable performance?

Mr. WALLACE. No. That is obvious.

CIVIL LIBERTIES IN RUSSIA

Senator McMAHON. When you disagree with the government in Russia, Mr. Wallace, you die; do you not?

Mr. WALLACE. I beg your pardon?

Senator McMAHON. You die, do you not, when you disagree with the government in Russia?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not know whether you die or not, but that is what the American press says.

Senator McMAHON. And the only reward that is preserved for you here is to weigh your ideas, and to accept them or reject them, as their worth is indicated to the people of the United States.

Mr. WALLACE. I certainly want to keep the United States that way, and I say there is grave danger that the United States will not be kept that way if we allow ourselves to be overcome by this anti-Communist hysteria.

Senator McMAHON. And there is grave danger that the United States will not keep the privileges which you are exercising now if we retreat in front of their determination, evidenced from the time they founded their conspiracy in 1917 and which they still persist in in every speech that they have made and by every bit of conduct and every peace conference that has been held since the end of the war.

And, Mr. Wallace, if the same conduct were applied here, as it was for the citizens of Czechoslovakia and Bulgaria and Rumania and Hungary and Poland and Finland, believe me, you would not be permitted to sit here and say anything.

Mr. WALLACE. Senator, I want to say that so far as the United States and her free institutions are concerned, there is at the present moment 100 times, at least, as great a threat from the right, as from the left.

Senator McMAHON. Well, Mr. Wallace, I suppose you are entitled to your own estimate. I know you are, and I want you to have it. I cannot agree with you. But that is neither here nor there for the moment.

I am sure that you will agree with me, because you quote Justice Holmes, our most eloquent advocate of free trade and ideas, as you call him—and certainly if he was not the most eloquent he was one of the most eloquent—on page 18 of your statement. You thoroughly endorse the free trade and ideas.

BROADCASTING THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. Wallace, what would you think of a proposition to broadcast in every nation, including Russia, the proceedings of the United Nations Assembly?

Mr. WALLACE. I think it would be marvelous if that could be done.

Senator McMAHON. Do you think that the Soviet Government—

Mr. WALLACE. I would also like to see the proceedings of the United States Congress broadcast to the American people. I have long advocated that that be done.

Senator McMAHON. We do print every word that is said. Maybe very few people read it; sometimes I suspect that very few read it.

But let us stick to the idea. Would you be willing to advocate that the Russian Government accede in the United Nations to a proposal that the proceedings of the United Nations be broadcast inside the Soviet Union?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say that probably any contention for that at the moment would not get very far, because there are other matters that have to be cleared away first. But as an ultimate objective, I say that that would be a very admirable outcome.

EXCHANGE OF IDEAS BETWEEN COUNTRIES

Senator McMAHON. You come out strongly here for free trades, free exchange of ideas. I take it that you believe that the exchange of ideas, as between people of the same country, and as between the people of all countries, is of very great importance; do you not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, certainly.

Senator McMAHON. You make the point that wars are not won with guns, they are won with ideas, at least achievements of nations are won with ideas.

Mr. WALLACE. I would say ideas in friendly competition.

Senator McMAHON. I am not asking you as to the possibility of the Russian Government agreeing with the United Nations to any such simple proposal. I have my own ideas as to whether or not they would agree. I am asking you whether you, as a man in public affairs, will publicly advocate that the United Nations be permitted to broadcast factual reports within the Soviet Union of the doings that take place in the General Assembly.

Mr. WALLACE. At the moment, in the present state of international tension, I would say advocacy of that kind of proposition would tend to increase international discord, rather than allay it, and I would not advocate it. I would advocate, if you are so much interested in having ideas broadcast of that sort, that we start that kind of thing right here in the United States and broadcast the proceedings of the American Congress to the American people.

Senator McMAHON. The proceedings of the United Nations are broadcast over one network every single night. I am rather surprised at your reluctance to advocate such a proposal when you believe—

Mr. WALLACE. If I thought it would decrease international tension at the present moment, I would advocate it, but I do not. I believe there are other things that will have to be done first before you can get away with that.

Now as a Congressman you know that sometimes there are admirable proposals which you cannot push very hard at a particular moment, for one reason or another. This is one that I just do not think you can get very far with at the moment.

POSSIBILITY OF A SETTLEMENT WITH RUSSIA

Senator McMAHON. Do you honestly believe that a nation which refuses to permit its own people to hear the views of the leaders of a nation that is having difficulties with that nation, do you really believe that it is possible to come to a lasting and durable peace?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I do.

Senator McMAHON. You do?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, of course. That does not mean that I condone their system or their methods. But I do think, as I thought when President Roosevelt was alive, and when he believed it was possible to arrive at an agreement, I do believe that it can be done with Stalin, just simply because of what Roosevelt told me about Stalin.

Senator McMAHON. And you, based upon what Mr. Roosevelt told you about Stalin, are now willing to predicate the course of your country and its 140,000,000 people, regardless of everything that has happened since Mr. Roosevelt's death? Have these events not affected your judgment in the slightest? Are you still going on the basis of what Mr. Roosevelt told you about Stalin, is that right?

Mr. WALLACE. I would say that in the interval Mr. Stalin has made at least five different statements to different individuals, indicating that he would like to have a discussion of the elements entering into peace with the United States.

MANNER OF CONDUCT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Wallace, you certainly are not going to make the Nation understand that you approve of the way the Russian Government has been approaching this Government with cries that they want peace? What would you think of the President of the United States if he called in a newspaperman, one of our eminent correspondents, and said to him, "Say, Joe, or John, you know I am thinking about calling a peace conference."

What would you think of that kind of a performance?

Mr. WALLACE. If it resulted in a peace conference, I would be all for it.

Senator McMAHON. Yes. But is that the way the President of the United States would conduct that kind of an operation? Or would he not send, to his Ambassador in Moscow, word to carry certain definite proposals to the Kremlin? He would do it, Mr. Wallace, just exactly the way Mr. Stalin conducted his negotiations with Von Ribbentrop, when they had the Germans in Moscow and were negotiating with them, and he sent his Ambassador in to Von Ribbentrop and made the German deal.

That is the way he would conduct his negotiations if he really wanted to do business. This conduct of a gigantic crusade to the peoples of the world on the spurious ground that what he wants is peace, when he will not permit the views of our own Government and other governments of the world to get behind the iron curtain, Mr. Wallace, just does not add up.

Mr. WALLACE. I would say your view certainly does not add up, and your view can only end eventually in war. You have got to break through this extraordinary tension in some manner. Any manner of breaking through it is all to the good, so far as I am concerned.

CONTROL OF ATOMIC ENERGY

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Wallace, I suppose you are in complete agreement with the proposals of the Russian Government for the control of weapons of mass destruction?

Mr. WALLACE. I think that there should be discussion at the same time of the problem of controlling all weapons of mass destruction; yes.

Senator McMAHON. You realize, do you not, that every country except Russia and her satellite states, has agreed on a proposal to control the atomic bomb, for instance?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Senator McMAHON. But Russia has seen fit not to agree with that proposal. If she did see fit to agree with that proposal, I should think the cause of peace would be somewhat advanced.

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Senator McMAHON. You do not?

Mr. WALLACE. No. I suggest the Senator read Mr. Blackett's book, three or four chapters.

Senator McMAHON. I have read it. I think you will find a review of it in the Scientific Bulletin, which, without any pride of ownership, completely demolishes Mr. Blackett's thesis.

Mr. Blackett, Mr. Wallace, happens to be a very fine physicist, but as a person dealing in political ideas, I think you will find that people who have studied the problem are unanimously of the opinion, at least those who are not infected with virus, that he is very far from the truth. He makes a persuasive case only to those who are convinced before they start.

Mr. WALLACE. As the Senator well knows, I have, as early as July 1945, expressed my opinions with regard to this matter in a letter to President Truman, and I have not changed my opinions with regard to this particular matter. It is based fundamentally on human nature, on how we would act if we were in the same position as Russia was, how we would act if, on one day, Russia dropped a bomb, and on the next day demanded air bases all over the world.

That is exactly what happened here in the United States. On August 8 we dropped a bomb on Hiroshima; on August 9 President Truman came out in a speech and asked for air bases all over the world, and said we are going to get them.

That unquestionably, at that particular moment, started very great grief for the whole world. That is a matter of human nature. It is not a matter of being an expert physicist, or an expert political scientist. It goes deeper than that. How do people react to declaration of force?

Senator McMAHON. We could continue, I suppose, the argument in this field for a long while. Mr. Harold Laski, who was never noted for his sympathy with us, particularly, and is nearer to you ideologically certainly than he is to me, in commenting on the policy which we have pursued in regard to the atomic weapon, and not too long ago, stated that in his opinion it was probably the most generous, the finest, and the most statesmanlike policy that had ever been pursued in history.

Mr. Wallace, you were in the Cabinet in 1946, until November; you were in the Cabinet when we were forging the policy, both domestic and international. As I recollect it, you approved very very much of the Acheson-Lilienthal report when it was released in April 1946. I think you are on record to that effect.

Mr. WALLACE. If so, I may say, Senator, that you will find within a very few months, at any rate by July of 1946, I was not embracing that approach.

Senator McMAHON. I see.

Mr. WALLACE. I felt that the situation was becoming gravely tense.

Senator McMAHON. I trust, Mr. Wallace, that was not after Mr. Gromyko, on June 16, 1946, said that it was unacceptable either in whole or in part to the Soviet Union?

Mr. WALLACE. I will assure you that my comments and my attitude were in no way governed by what Mr. Gromyko or any other representative from Russia said.

Senator McMAHON. I want to believe that. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have any other questions?

Senator VANDENBERG. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, I think we will excuse you now, and thank you very much for coming. We are very glad to have your views and opinions. Thank you very much.

VISA QUESTION

Mr. WALLACE. I certainly wish to thank you. I would hope, in the interests of the high ideals which the Senator from Connecticut has expressed, that the members of this committee, having very strong influence, I am sure, with the State Department, will use that influence to permit Mr. Konni Zilliacus and Mr. Pierre Cot to get their visas to enable them to come to this country. Also Sonia Branting, the daughter of the ex-Premier of Sweden, to permit her to come to this country.

The CHAIRMAN. That is something that I will have to consult the committee about. That is a little beyond our scope of activity, getting visas for people. Are they coming over for propaganda purposes?

Mr. WALLACE. I have invited them as my guests, sir. If you want to consider what I stand for as propaganda, you can call it that they are coming for propaganda purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not intend to be offensive.

Mr. WALLACE. No; I know you do not.

The CHAIRMAN. I just wanted to know if that is what you wanted them for.

Mr. WALLACE. I have invited them to come and present to the people of the United States what they believe are the ideas and attitudes of their respective countries which have not received any attention from the press of the United States, and which I think should receive attention. Since I cannot get it in the press of the United States, I want to find some way of getting it to the people of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not have any fear that their views and their opinions and their statements about their government would in anywise conflict with yours as you have expressed repeatedly?

Mr. WALLACE. About their governments?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. About the attitude of their governments. You said that is what they wanted to tell us.

Mr. WALLACE. I wanted them to tell the people of the United States the attitude of their people.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand. But I say you do not fear any conflict between their estimate of how their people feel and the statements that you have been making all over the country?

Mr. WALLACE. There may be conflicts. But in the interest of this free exchange of culture and ideas, in which Senator McMahon has expressed such great interest, it seems to me all points of view should be made available in these United States, and especially between non-Communists and this western world. There are lots of non-Communists who agree completely and heartily with the points of view which I represent, and Sonia Branting represents, as well as Miss Lunden, Mimi Sverdrop Lunden, in Norway, and Pierre Cot in France, and Zilliagus in England. There are lots of non-Communists that hold to that point of view. And they are all from the western world, where we are supposed to have free exchange of ideas and where we are not supposed to have either iron curtains or paper curtains. It does seem to me, in the interests of what both Senator McMahon and I hold very, very dear indeed, that there should be permitted free exchange of those ideas.

The CHAIRMAN. Are all these people non-Communists?

Mr. WALLACE. They are non-Communists; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Yet you want them to come over here to lecture?

Mr. WALLACE. There are two of them, I may say. Pierre Cot and Konni Zilliagus, who is a Member of the House of Commons in England. Pierre Cot is a Member of the Chamber of Deputies in France. Hitherto, as I understand it, all that was necessary was for a Member of the House of Commons to go to the Speaker and say that he wanted to come to the United States and the matter was arranged with great speed in a day or two. But now things seem to be different.

The CHAIRMAN. We will consult the State Department. I cannot promise you what action they will take. They have the authority. We do not have it.

Mr. WALLACE. I know you do not have the authority, but you undoubtedly have very great weight with them.

The CHAIRMAN. We will consider it and get their reasons. They must have some reasons for their action. I do not know what the reasons are.

Mr. WALLACE. If they have reasons, I would appreciate it if they would publish what they are.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know about publishing. I am sure they answered, told the people to reply, the sponsors—

Mr. WALLACE. We have not been able to get anything. And as far as I know Konni Zilliagus and Pierre Cot have not been able to get anything out of them, nor Miss Lunden or Miss Branting.

The CHAIRMAN. How are these matters taken up with the State Department? By correspondence?

Mr. WALLACE. I have wired Acheson repeatedly with regard to the matter myself. We talked with his office on the phone. On the other side, application has been made through the American Embassy.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. We are glad to have had you.

At this point we will announce that Mr. Dennis, Secretary of the Communist Party of the United States, was scheduled to follow Secretary Wallace, but I have a telegram from Mr. Winston, of New York, which says:

In view of refusal of Judge Harold R. Medina to adjourn trial permitting General Secretary Eugene Dennis to testify in person this Thursday in opposition to the North Atlantic Pact, he is preparing and sending a written statement in behalf of the Communist Party.

It is signed by Mr. Henry Winston. I suppose he has some connection with the party.

So we will not have the opportunity to listen to Mr. Dennis, who is the secretary of the Communist Party, but he will send down a statement, which we can all understand. That is, we can read it. I do not know whether we can understand it.

Mr. James S. Martin, of the Progressive Party of Maryland. Is he present?

(No response.)

The CHAIRMAN. We do not seem to be progressing much. He is not here. We have some others. Mr. Gitt, representing the Progressive Party of Pennsylvania, was supposed to be here, but he is sick and will not appear.

Dr. Annette Rubenstein, representing the American Labor Party.

STATEMENT OF DR. ANNETTE RUBENSTEIN, ON BEHALF OF THE AMERICAN LABOR PARTY

Dr. RUBENSTEIN. I represent the American Labor Party of New York State. I am their present candidate for Congress in the Twentieth Congressional District in the special election, May 17.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want to make a campaign speech?

Dr. RUBENSTEIN. No; I want to make a statement. I cut it down because Mr. Wallace' statement covered so much of the material it will not take very much of your time. I think.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Proceed with your statement.

Dr. RUBENSTEIN. I am here as a representative of the American Labor Party, its candidate for Congress in the special election, May 17, in the Twentieth Congressional District of New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the district which Mr. Bloom formerly represented?

Dr. RUBENSTEIN. That is right. The district young Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. MacIntyre represented.

The CHAIRMAN. The feeling and policy of that district must have changed violently from that pursued by Mr. Sol Bloom, who was an eminent Member of Congress, a leader in the very things that this treaty is supposed to carry out. He was a peace advocate.

Dr. RUBENSTEIN. We are peace advocates and that district gave a very big majority to President Roosevelt in 1944 on a platform that we still are fighting for.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Go ahead.

DANGERS OF RATIFICATION

Dr. RUBENSTEIN. But I am here also as a woman and as an educator. I speak for the working people, the women and children of America, in pleading with our Senate to take a stand for life, and not for death; for peace, and not for war; for the United Nations, and not for the Atlantic Pact.

The ratification of the North Atlantic Pact would be the first definitive step on the suicidal road to a third world war. Attempting to deter the Senate from giving full and calm consideration to the chain reaction which would be set up by its acceptance of this war-breeding military alliance, the Executive and its State Department have set up a hysterical clamor to create the impression that this pact has a de facto existence, and that Senate approval is a mere technicality.

Presenting the pact as a fait accompli, they warn the Senate of the terrible consequences its denial of the United States' obligations—which in reality the Senate alone has the right and duty of undertaking—would have.

Yesterday Mr. Dulles had the effrontery to tell this committee it is dealing with a totally different world situation today than it was a year ago. The pact then was only being discussed, he said, whereas now it has been formally signed by each of the participating nations. It has already become apparent in this testimony of Secretary Acheson that if the Senate allows itself to be involved by such tactics it will no longer be free to decide independently about military assistance to any signatory nations.

COMMITMENT TO DECLARE WAR

Furthermore, the Senate would actually have compromised its most sacred and solemn responsibility as the final guardian of our Nation's peace. It would have implicated itself in advance to a declaration of war under an appalling number of ill-defined circumstances.

For example, it is terrifying to know that article 4 of the pact has already been interpreted by Secretary Acheson to mean that an uprising inspired, armed and directed from the outside, would be considered an armed attack under the pact. The charge of outside inspiration in the event of strikes or popular movements is the easiest refuge of a reactionary government.

The Netherlands could today claim our protection in Indonesia under this interpretation. Who knows what further interpretations might be made by the State Department were the pact ratified.

Almost 100 years ago Stephen Douglas, arguing for the continuation of slavery under the mistaken belief that it would be the basis for an enduring and powerful nation, said America would then become the scourge and terror of the world. Our great leader, Abraham Lincoln, said he had no desire to see America become the scourge and terror of the world. He wished rather that it should become the wonder and admiration of the universe.

VIOLATION OF UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

The United States set out on this path of peaceful and constructive leadership under Franklin D. Roosevelt. Even the Wall Street Journal, which is not the organ of the American party, admitted that all propaganda notwithstanding, the Atlantic Pact does nullify the principles of the United Nations.

Both articles 1 and 53 of the United Nations Charter are very clear in requiring authorization by the Security Council for action against aggression, and the North Atlantic Pact is equally clear in ruling such authorization as being unnecessary. We can scarcely hope to gain confidence in our professions of peace when we are so casual about violating the Charter of the international agency for peace which our country joined with other countries in creating.

ALTERNATIVES BEFORE UNITED STATES

There are today two alternatives before us: Prosecution of a world war with, as Mr. Clayton said, perhaps greater vigor than before, through ratification of the pact, or the brightening prospect of peace created by the successful initiation of the Berlin negotiations. The American Labor Party urges the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to defer all further actions on the North Atlantic Pact in view of the agreement to lift the Berlin blockade.

A settlement of the Berlin situation can lead to a settlement of all the outstanding difficulties in the relationship between the United States and Soviet Russia. It can lead to a lasting peace. The women of America want a lasting peace. I therefore beseech you to search your hearts and your consciences and exercise your constitutional power in defense of America's future and the peace of the whole world.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg.

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. You are excused. Thank you very much.

Mr. Dobbs, representing the Socialist Workers Party. Are those two different ones? One is the Workers and one is the Socialists?

STATEMENT OF FARRELL DOBBS, NATIONAL CHAIRMAN, SOCIALIST WORKERS PARTY

Mr. DOBBS. It is a Socialist party, but a different party from the party that is known as the Socialist Party headed by Norman Thomas. We used to be members of that party, but we are not any more.

The CHAIRMAN. What caused you to break away? Did you break away, or did they break away?

Mr. DOBBS. We left them over the question of the last war.

OPPOSITION TO WORLD WAR II

The CHAIRMAN. You were against the war, and they were for it?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. You are still against it?

Mr. DOBBS. I am still against war, and I will always be against it.

The CHAIRMAN. You were against that war. You were against the war we fought?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And you did not fight in that war?

Mr. DOBBS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you did not let them get you in that war?

Mr. DOBBS. I registered for the draft.

The CHAIRMAN. You registered, but you did not get in?

Mr. DOBBS. No, they decided to jail me instead because I said war would not bring peace to the world and would not do the American people any good. And history has shown I was right.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they jail you?

Mr. DOBBS. They did, under the Smith Act.

The CHAIRMAN. How long did they jail you?

Mr. DOBBS. Sixteen months.

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as the war was over they let you out?

Mr. DOBBS. No. I got out just a few months before the war was over. When I served my time I got out.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead.

OPPOSITION TO ATLANTIC TREATY

Mr. DOBBS. I am opposed to ratification of the North Atlantic military pact. You will find my position different from that of other witnesses appearing before you on this question, for I speak neither as an apologist for bankrupt capitalism, nor as a tool of treacherous Stalinism. I speak as a genuine advocate of socialism, which I sincerely believe represents the only road to lasting peace.

In my opinion, although the Atlantic Pact is represented as an instrument to preserve peace, its real aim is to preserve outlived capitalism. While propaganda in support of the pact is directed only against Stalinism, the pact itself is directed against the movement for socialism. This is demonstrated by the record of postwar diplomacy and by the presence of Fascist totalitarians in the Atlantic alliance.

PRESERVATION OF CAPITALISM

From the Tehran Conference down to the present moment, the central objective of American foreign policy has been to safeguard European capitalism against the mounting pressure of the European working people for socialism. All the evidence indicates that Roosevelt and Churchill as the leading spokesmen for world capitalism, made a deal with Stalin at Tehran whereby he agreed to support the capitalists in western Europe in return for which Stalin was to be granted his present sphere of influence in eastern Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. That is from the Tehran Conference?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have a copy of it here?

Mr. DOBBS. Of the conference?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. DOBBS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Then how do you get that? What makes you say that?

Mr. DOBBS. First, and most striking of the evidence—

The CHAIRMAN. Were you in attendance on the conference?

Mr. DOBBS. No, I was not.

The CHAIRMAN. You were not?

Mr. DOBBS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. DOBBS. Do you want me to answer your question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. What basis have you for making that statement?

Mr. DOBBS. First and foremost, I say that the character of the Stalinists' policy, following the Teheran Conference, is the clearest indication of this.

The CHAIRMAN. You are just testifying from your imagination, then, and not from facts?

Mr. DOBBS. I am stating my opinion, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. You did not state it as your opinion. You stated it as a fact.

Mr. DOBBS. I said all the evidence indicates.

The CHAIRMAN. All the evidence?

Mr. DOBBS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is all the evidence, it must be a fact.

Mr. DOBBS. That is my definite opinion of what happened.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Go ahead.

STALINISM AND SOCIALISM IN EUROPE

Mr. DOBBS. Toward the end of the war, hundreds of thousands of European workers poured into the Stalinized Communist parties, mistakenly believing the Stalinists would help them establish socialism. But the Stalinist leaders in western Europe entered capitalist coalition governments and helped to prop up the weak capitalist class. In the countries of eastern Europe, they set up totalitarian regimes modeled after Stalin's brutal police dictatorship over the Soviet Union.

With the socialist aspirations of the European working people thus betrayed by the Stalinists, the puppets of the Kremlin were driven out of the coalition governments in western Europe. World capitalism then launched the present cold war against the Soviet Union, a cold war that is growing dangerously warm.

The propaganda of the cold war is focused on the police-state methods of the Stalinists wherever they are in power. This propaganda has struck a responsive chord because of the terrible crimes the Stalinists have committed against the world working class.

The criminal Stalinists must be overthrown in the course of the struggle for world socialism, but the working people dare not entrust that task to the capitalists. For it is the aim of world capitalism to destroy the system of nationalized economy in the Soviet Union, impose upon the Soviet people the rule of monopoly capitalism under a Fascist-like dictatorship, and in the process stamp out all Socialist movements everywhere in the world.

PRESERVATION OF CAPITALISM

To serve this sinister aim, a reactionary coalition is forming under the leadership of imperial America, whose only requirement for membership is support of the capitalist system.

Examine the list of governments that have signed the Atlantic Pact, with its fraudulent pledge to safeguard the freedom of the people, founded on the principles of democracy and individual liberty.

Among signators to the pact you will find the Salazar Government that has kept the people of Portugal under totalitarian police rule for the last 23 years. Even before the Senate has acted on the pact, a campaign has started to include in the so-called freedom alliance the butcher Franco, who maintains his brutal fascist rule over the Spanish people by executing his political opponents.

As the Dutch foreign minister signed the Atlantic Pact, his government arrogantly decreed that "Indonesia is outside the spirit of the pact," and the Dutch imperialists, with the aid of American dollars and military equipment, continue to suppress by force and violence the heroic attempt of the Indonesian people to win their freedom, founded on the principles of democracy and individual liberty.

No less hypocritical are the democratic pretensions of the French Government, which seeks to crush by force of arms the struggle for freedom of Viet Nam, Algeria and Madagascar. By what stretch of the imagination can the Italian Government be called a champion of democracy when it demands restoration of its imperialist rule over the people of its former African colonies?

The people of Puerto Rico, ruled by the United States Government in defiance of their democratic right to rule themselves, also have a right to question the sincerity of the high-sounding motives proclaimed in the Atlantic Pact.

Another candidate earmarked for membership in the so-called freedom alliance will be the capitalist government, well-staffed by Nazis, which the State Department is trying to carve out of the western zone of partitioned Germany.

REACTIONARY COALITION

The watchword of the reactionary coalition now gathering in the North Atlantic military alliance will be, "Preserve the status quo!" Secretary Acheson provided the diplomatic cover for this objective when he indicated at a recent press conference that a revolution against any government in the coalition, alleged to be inspired, armed and directed "from the outside," would constitute an attack on that government within the meaning of the pact.

Secretary Acheson may have gotten the idea from the Dutch Government, which launched its imperialist attack on Indonesia with the fantastic charge that the Indonesian Republic was a "Communist movement instigated from the outside." If the people of Portugal should rise up against the Fascist dictator Salazar, he could falsely pose as the victim of a revolution "from the outside" and demand armed aid against the Portuguese people from the other governments in the Atlantic alliance.

EFFECT OF COLD WAR ON THE UNITED STATES

For the American people the cold war has already meant high prices, heavy taxes, a peacetime draft and a vicious attack on their civil liberties. Billions are appropriated for war, but the people can not get homes, schools or hospitals. The Negro people are abominably mistreated. The Taft-Hartley Act remains on the books.

An unrestrained witch hunt is raging among government employees and in the public-school system. Conscientious objectors to the draft are persecuted. Liberal-minded religious leaders are harassed. Minority political parties are subjected to thought-control prosecution. A flood of bills curtailing traditional American democratic rights have been poured into the hoppers of Congress and the State legislatures.

These hardships and evils inflicted upon the American people are a natural consequence of the Government's war-like foreign policy, for there is a direct and intimate connection between foreign and domestic policy. If the Senate should ratify the Atlantic Pact, conditions here will rapidly grow ten times worse as further steps are taken to impose military police-state rule over the American people in preparation for impending war.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I ask you to recommend the following measures for adoption by Congress:

RECOMMENDATIONS

Repudiate the Atlantic pact and censure the President and Secretary of State for their unseemly haste in rushing to sign it.

Require the State Department to make public all the details of secret negotiations concerning the pact, so that the Senate and the American people may have all the facts about this unprecedented military alliance for atomic war into which the Truman administration is dragging this country.

Order the withdrawal of all troops from foreign soil.

Repeal the peacetime draft law.

Cancel the military budget and all financial grants to foreign imperialists.

Halt the witch hunt.

Initiate a measure to provide for a referendum vote of the people to decide whether there shall be war or peace.

The CHAIRMAN. You want all the military budgets canceled?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right.

OPPOSITION TO ARMY, NAVY, AND AIR FORCE

The CHAIRMAN. Have no army, have no navy; is that right?

Mr. DOBBS. I am in favor of—

The CHAIRMAN. Answer that.

Mr. DOBBS. I am in favor of a military training, of a militia of the people, under the control of their unions and other organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. But you are not in favor of any army at all?

Mr. DOBBS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not in favor of a navy?

Mr. DOBBS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not in favor of an air force?

Mr. DOBBS. I am not in favor of any instrument for aggressive war.

The CHAIRMAN. Then why do you want to train a militia?

Mr. DOBBS. They need training for defensive war.

The CHAIRMAN. Would the army not be a defensive army? You are not for an army or navy.

Mr. DOBBS. I am not for an army as it is based now.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not for the Russian doctrine in any sense?

Mr. DOBBS. No, sir. I am irreconcilably opposed to Stalinism.

The CHAIRMAN. You are opposed to the Russian system?

Mr. DOBBS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are opposed to our system?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any system that you are not opposed to?

Mr. DOBBS. I am for socialism.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that in operation in any place on earth right now?

Mr. DOBBS. No; there is no socialism.

The CHAIRMAN. The British have made very long strides toward socialism.

Mr. DOBBS. They have carried out a few acts of nationalization; that is not socialism.

TEHRAN CONFERENCES

The CHAIRMAN. You say in your statement that from the Tehran Conference down to the present moment the central objective of American foreign policy has been to safeguard European capitalism against the mounting pressure of European working people for socialism?

Mr. DOBBS. That is my belief.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the United States exert any pressure on the United Kingdom to prevent their socializing their industries?

Mr. DOBBS. There has been a great deal of pressure. I was not there, as I was not at Tehran. But as I read the reports in the press, I have seen manifold signs of pressures put on England to curtail and hold back their program of nationalization.

The CHAIRMAN. But she did not do it. She did not hold back. She went right on doing it.

Mr. DOBBS. They have nationalized a few industries.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. That is a capitalistic press. I do not know how the gentleman could believe what was printed in it.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I just say, reading of those things in a capitalistic press, I did not think you would believe what you read there.

Mr. DOBBS. I do not know what the basis of that statement is. I read the press, and glean such an impression of what goes on in the world as I can out of it. And on the basis of my own studies of history and the operation of social forces, arrive at the best conclusion I can as to what I believe has happened and what I believe should be done. It is on that basis that I have submitted this statement to you.

The CHAIRMAN. You say all the evidence indicates that—

Roosevelt and Churchill, as the leading spokesmen for world capitalism, made a deal with Stalin at Tehran, whereby he agreed to support the capitalists in western Europe in return for which Stalin was to be granted his present sphere of influence in eastern Europe.

Mr. DOBBS. That is my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Opinion? You have no proof of it, have you?

Mr. DOBBS. That is exactly the way the situation looks to me, on the basis of all the knowledge I have obtained of what happened since the Tehran Conference.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your reconstruction, as it were. When the police get a murder, they usually reconstruct the crime to show just how it was done. So you are just reconstructing the Tehran Conference out of what you imagine took place?

Mr. DOBBS. Out of such clues as I can get as to what took place.

SOCIALIST WORKERS PARTY

The CHAIRMAN. You have got some pretty nifty clues, but they do not nifty-out in actuality. I do not want to be personal, but what is your business? How do you make a living?

Mr. DOBBS. I spend full time working for the party.

The CHAIRMAN. You are a paid party man?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right. I get $40 a week.

The CHAIRMAN. How long have you been on the Socialist pay roll?

Mr. DOBBS. About a year and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. How do they derive their funds? By contributions?

Mr. DOBBS. Contributed by the members.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they assessed? Do they assess the members, or are they contributions?

Mr. DOBBS. They pay $1 a month dues, and occasionally make contributions.

The CHAIRMAN. So they are a sort of a capitalistic organization, collecting money from members in it.

Mr. DOBBS. We live in a capitalistic world, and we have to adjust ourselves to it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is exactly what I was getting at.

Mr. DOBBS. That does not negate the concept of socialism.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all. Socialism might be entirely desirable, and yet it might pursue capitalistic methods. How many members have you got?

Mr. DOBBS. About 2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a local?

Mr. DOBBS. No; that is the national organization.

The CHAIRMAN. You have just 2,000 members in the entire United States?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Socialist Workers Party?

Mr. DOBBS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not the regular Socialist Party?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. That Mr. Thomas heads up?

Mr. DOBBS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. How old is your organization?

Mr. DOBBS. We celebrated our twentieth anniversary last year.

The CHAIRMAN. What sort of a celebration did you have?

Mr. DOBBS. A banquet and ceremonial affair.

The CHAIRMAN. That is nice. I believe that is all. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. That seems to conclude our list for this afternoon.

We will adjourn until tomorrow at 10:30 o'clock, when we will have the Honorable Charles P. Taft; Owen Roberts; Mr. Allan Klein, American Farm Bureau Federation; Mr. Gerard, of New York; Mr. Frederick McKee, chairman of the Committee on National Affairs; Mr. Clifford W. Patton, National Association of Consumers.

I wish we had some of them here now, but we have not. The committee stands in recess.

(Whereupon at 3:35 p. m., the hearing was recessed, to reconvene at 10:30 a. m., Friday, May 6, 1949.)

THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

FRIDAY, MAY 6, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The session convened at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to adjournment on Thursday, May 5, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Connally, George, Thomas of Utah, Fulbright, Vandenberg, and Lodge.

Also present: Senators Donnell and Watkins.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the committee come to order.

The committee is meeting in consideration of the North Atlantic Pact, and we have the pleasure of having with us a distinguished American, Judge James W. Gerard, who was former Ambassador to Germany, and who has rendered great and distinguished public service. We will be glad to hear you, Judge, at this time.

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES W. GERARD, ATTORNEY AND COUNSELOR AT LAW, NEW YORK CITY

Mr. GERARD. This is one of the decisive moments of history.

The failure to ratify the Atlantic Pact and to arm the nations of western Europe will mean war, the end of democracy everywhere, and the domination of the world by Russian communism.

I have sent to you gentlemen a little sketch of Russian history. It was written to show that the Russians always have been, in the words of Mr. Acheson, "aggressive and expanding."

Do not fail to ratify this pact and to arm Europe because of any change in the attitude of the Soviets. That change is due to the organization of the pact. Do not be fooled.

ATTITUDE OF EX-AMBASSADORS TOWARD THE PACT

Several years ago I organized a council of ex-ambassadors. All, with one exception, joined. I recently sent them a circular asking their position with reference to the Atlantic Pact. I have here the short answers of the 23 who responded. If you are interested, I shall submit them. There is only one objector.

The CHAIRMAN. You may submit the list, and we will put it in the record.

EXTRACTS OF REPLIES BY FORMER AMBASSADORS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO JAMES W. GERRARD TO THE QUERY, ARE YOU IN FAVOR OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC PACT?

In answer to the question, Are you in favor of the North Atlantic Pact? the following replies have been received from ex-ambassadors:

"I am heartily in favor of the North Atlantic Pact and trust that not only the pact itself but the important supplement to it in the form of furnishing military equipment will receive the emphatic endorsement of our Congress."—Norman Armour.

"Certainly I am in favor of the North Atlantic Pact. The Russians can start a war whenever they feel like it, yet this may make them less anxious to commence one."—F. Lamot Belin.

"Given the faulty policies and actions of the United States and Allied Governments of the past, which have brought us to the present situation, it is my opinion that the North Atlantic Pact is a necessary result and that we should carry it through to its logical conclusion."—Robert Woods Bliss.

"I am in favor of the North Atlantic Pact. I do not think it adds very much to the plan of the United Nations, but if it can give confidence to democratic nations of Europe it will be well worth while because it is confidence, more than anything else, which will make them stand firmly against the Russians."—William R. Castle.

"Are you in favor of the North Atlantic Pact? No. At best it is 'just another,' but with this added situation, that if the language of the pact is interpreted to mean anything near what it might be interpreted to mean, any little country in the central European Balkan area could involve us in a global war by thumbing its nose at Russia over some little bit of policy or action which would have no effect whatever on the rest of the world and of which the rest of the world might really not even know till it was all over.

"The situation of the Atlantic Pact versus the United Nations reminds me in one way of the remark of Canning on the Congress of Verona, who is quoted as saying: 'The issue of Verona has split the one and indivisible alliance into three parts as distinct as the constitutions of England, France, and Muscovy. * * * Villele is a minister of 30 years ago—no revolutionary scoundrel; but constitutionally hating England, as Choiseul and Vergennes used to hate us—and so things are getting back to a wholesome state again. Every nation for itself and God for us all.' To which may be added the old dictum, 'and the Devil may take the hindmost.'"—J. Reuben Clark, Jr.

"I strongly favor it."—William Miller Collier.

"Yes."—John W. Davis.

"I am strongly in favor of the Atlantic Pact. I trust it will be followed by—and that soon—a Mediterranean pact, a Near Eastern pact, an Asian pact, and a Latin-American pact. Africa and Australia may line up where they choose."—Fred Morris Dearing.

"A good beginning in lining up United States popular understanding and support for realism."—Wesley Frost.

"As to your second question as to whether I am in favor of the North Atlantic Pact, my reply is emphatically in the affirmative, and in a recent speech in Boston on the subject Faith and Freedom I expressed my support of the treaty in no uncertain terms. I do not think I need to argue the reasons for my approval of the pact, which should be patent to all."—Joseph C. Grew.

"I am in favor of the North Atlantic Pact."—Lloyd C. Griscom.

"The answer to question 2 is in my mind quite simple. I am heartily in favor of the North Atlantic Pact."—Harry F. Guggenheim.

"Not in favor but think it necessary."—Ogden H. Hammond.

"The answer to question II in your circular letter of April 1 is easy for me. I am in favor of the North Atlantic Pact, although I hope that in due time, with general consent, Spain may be included in the pact. The strategic importance of the whole Iberian Peninsula should be self-evident."—Carlton J. H. Hayes.

"In favor."—Boaz Long.

"I am in favor of the North Atlantic Pact."—John Van A. MacMurray.

"I am heartily in favor of the North Atlantic Pact."—John Van A. MacMurray.

"I am wholeheartedly in favor of the Atlantic Pact."—Lithgow Osborne.

"I am heartily in favor of the Atlantic Pact."—William Phillips.

"I am strongly in favor of the North Atlantic Pact and believe that both national safety and honor require that the pact be ratified as soon as possible.

Whether we as a people realize it or not, we are living in a great historical moment comparable, as Mr. Churchill pointed out a few days ago, to that period when the eastern hordes were before the gates of Europe and only the death of the Stalin of that time saved the civilization of the world. We can, of course, say that Europe is not our affair and for a certain time go our complacent way, but that only puts off the day of reckoning."—Robert P. Skinner.

"Yes; in the absence of any enforcing agency for the United Nations, the Atlantic Pact is, in my opinion, a good substitute."—William H. Standley.

"I am strongly in favor of the North Atlantic Pact. I regard it as a positive step toward collective security under the United Nations. I hope, however, that this Government will take every opportunity during the months to come to use the pact as a means of strengthening the authority of the United Nations and as a means of encouraging the Federation of Western Europe."—Sumner Welles.

"On balance, I favor the Atlantic (North Atlantic) Pact. The advantages deriving therefrom or the reverse vary considerably for the different regions in which it may affect our policies.

"The United States of America: The Truman policy, now rarely mentioned, committed us to rendering assistance to those peoples disposed to resist Communist aggression. That policy is morally decent and has the strategical advantage of bespeaking allies and bases in the event of a shooting war. It is true that economic and financial implications of this policy are serious; on the other hand we tried to make single-handed preparation for war on an isolationist basis, adequate measures would probably have been frustrated by public indifference and the claims of pressure groups. The Atlantic Pact, if ratified, will make it more difficult for the American people in general and professional pacifists in particular to evade those preparations, which afford the best chance of avoiding war.

"Other signatory countries: The pact should have a good propaganda value, provided that it is properly implemented from a military point of view; otherwise it may prove a boomerang.

"Other friendly, but nonsignatory countries: The limited participation may have a bad propaganda effect in the Moslem world. For instance it may be asked if the Mediterranean forms part of the Atlantic, why not all the Mediterranean area and not merely Italy and Algeria?

"Soviet satellite countries and Yugoslavia: The pact should have a good propaganda effect—if implemented adequately—for what that may be worth.

"The Kremlin obviously cares not a jot for what we may say or write; the pact will only produce an impression to the extent that it is followed up by military coordination. Indeed as far as the Soviets are concerned, unobtrusive military arrangements would have been better without the publicity of the pact, which given an opportunity for counterpublicity, as to encirclement, etc."—John Campbell White.

Mr. GERARD. Norman Armour [reading]:

I am heartily in favor of the North Atlantic Pact and trust that not only the pact itself but the important supplement to it in the form of furnishing military equipment will receive the emphatic endorsement of our Congress.

The next one is from F. Lamont Belin:

Certainly I am in favor of the North Atlantic Pact. The Russians can start a war whenever they feel like it; yet this may make them less anxious to commence one.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those two fair samples of all of them except one?

Mr. GERARD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg, have you any questions?

Senator VANDENBERG. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Thomas.

Senator THOMAS. No questions.

ATTITUDE OF J. REUBEN CLARK, JR.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask Judge Gerard who the objector was, and what did he say? Who was the one who objected?

Mr. GERARD. The one who objected was Mr. J. Reuben Clark, Jr., who, I think, at one time was in Mexico, and comes from Utah.

The CHAIRMAN. He was at one time Under Secretary of State; was he not?

Mr. GERARD. I am not sure.

The CHAIRMAN. Then he was Ambassador to Mexico during the Republican administration.

Mr. GERARD. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. I am glad the Senator mentioned the Republican administration.

I just wanted to ask Judge Gerard if he has at hand the observation made by Mr. Clark. Do you have that, Judge, and would you be kind enough just to read that one into the record, and let us hear what he says?

Mr. GERARD. He is much longer than any of them.

"Are you in favor of the North Atlantic Pact?" That was the question put to him. He answered:

No. At best, it is "just another," but with this added situation, that if the language of the pact is interpreted to mean what it might be interpreted to mean, any little country in the central European Balkan area could involve us in a global war by thumbing its nose at Russia over some little bit of policy or action which would have no effect whatever on the rest of the world and of which the rest of the world might really not even know till it was all over.

The situation of the Atlantic Pact versus the United Nations reminds me in one way of the remark of Canning on the Congress of Verona, who is quoted as saying: "The issue of Verona has split the one and indivisible alliance into three parts as distinct as the constitutions of England, France, and Muscovy. * * * Villele is a minister of 30 years ago—no revolutionary scoundrel; but constitutionally hating England, as Choiseul and Vergennes used to hate us—and so things are getting back to a wholesome state again. Every nation for itself and God for us all." To which may be added the old dictum, "and the Devil may take the hindmost."

Senator DONNELL. May I ask, Judge, do you know where Mr. Clark lives now?

Mr. GERARD. He is living in Utah at the present time.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Judge.

Senator Watkins?

Senator WATKINS. I just came in, so I have not heard anything and I could not very well ask any questions.

Since he mentioned Mr. Clark of my State, I just heard the last two or three sentences. Was that a letter?

The CHAIRMAN. Judge Gerard wrote 21 or 22 ex-ambassadors, and asked them their views, and Mr. Clark was the only one who said "No," so he read his statement and we are putting it into the record.

Senator WATKINS. May I state, then, if it is not already in the record, that Mr. Clark was not only an Ambassador to Mexico, but he was also Solicitor to the State Department at one time, and also Under Secretary of State.

The CHAIRMAN. I stated that, except that I did not mention his having been Solicitor. I mentioned his having been Under Secretary of State and Ambassador to Mexico.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Gerard, would you be kind enough, if it is agreeable to the committee, to insert into the record also the letter which he sent to these various gentlemen?

The CHAIRMAN. Insert a copy of your letter to them along with the list of responses.

(Communication from the witness to the ambassadors previously identified appears in the record, as follows:)

NEW YORK 22, N. Y., April 1, 1949.

To the Members of the Council of Ex-Ambassadors:

Robert P. Skinner, long in the diplomatic service and for 5 years Ambassador to Greece, has made the following suggestion:

"The news from Greece is unsatisfactory. We have spent large amounts of money upon limited projects such as reconstruction, rehabilitation, and public health leading to nothing in particular, in spite of which, as the Department of State admits, 'the number of indigents and refugees continues to increase.' The military measures have not succeeded in terminating the guerilla war, the Greek Government is feeble, and it is high time to adopt a program giving at least some promise of pacifying the country.

"The guerilla army is Communist-led but only in small part composed of Communists. Recruits are impressed into the rebel troops and terrorized after being put under arms. The whole country is disorganized, and we cannot get out until order is restored. It is believed that many if not most of the guerillas would like to give up but they fear punitive measures from the Government.

"The suggestion I have put before the Secretary of State is that until work, wages, bread, and security are offered to the rebels the present situation will probably continue. It will cost far less to provide these things than to try to shoot them. There are vast areas in Greece that need drainage, irrigation, and so on. Why not set up an organization under American management and control and boldly offer work and wages for a period of 5 years, an offer which would bring the rebels out of the mountains, first in a trickle and soon in a steady stream. In less than 5 years' time these same men would have their minds turned to other than their present political thoughts, and would become the cultivators of the areas prepared by themselves. In the long run the project would yield some return upon its cost.

"I have suggested, as one capable of directing such a movement as described, Mr. Charles House, now the head of the American Farm School at Salonika. Through the years he has acquired the confidence of all classes of the Greek people. Technical advisers we can offer in plenty.

"The present attitude in Washington is that economic recovery will not be possible 'until the guerilla menace has been overcome.' But the guerilla menace cannot be overcome except with economic assistance. This is a vicious circle through which we must break."

I. What do you think of this proposition?

II. Are you in favor of the North Atlantic Pact?

The Council of Ex-Ambassadors can exercise great influence but not unless the members answer promptly questions sent to them.

Please answer immediately your opinion on the two questions above to

JAMES W. GERARD.

Mr. GERARD. The letter included a question about the handling of Greece, submitted by Mr. Skinner, and as all the ambassadors were doubtful and said they did not know enough about it, I have not made any reference to it here, because this is only the Atlantic Pact, and these gentlemen to whom I sent this request are all of the ex-ambassadors of the United States, and I give the responses of all who answered—25 out of about 35. The others, some of them, are away, abroad, or someplace else, and of the ones who answered me who are all ex-ambassadors there was only one who was against the Atlantic Pact, namely Mr. Reuben Clark, who, as you correctly said a moment ago, was Ambassador to Mexico, and also Assistant Secretary of State.

The CHAIRMAN. Under Secretary of State.

FAILURE TO RATIFY

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you just one further question: As I understood you, you mentioned at the outset the thought that the failure to ratify the Atlantic Pact and to arm Europe would mean war?

Mr. GERARD. I said it would mean war. If we retreat now, after this Atlantic Pact has been signed by all the nations, that is an announcement to the world that we are retreating before Russia, and it will mean that they will continue an aggression so fierce and distinct that we will be driven into war.

Senator DONNELL. Do you not think, Judge, that when the treaty was signed on April 4, here, with all these gentlemen present, it certainly ought to have been known that that was only the signing, and that the Senate's ratification was just as necessary to the effectiveness of the treaty as the signatures—the fact that the treaty cannot be made effective until the Senate ratifies?

Mr. GERARD. That is, you might say in international law, a technicality. If we have signed this treaty, even if it requires the consent of the Senate, and retreat from that position, we will be in a war within a year as sure as anything.

OBLIGATION TO RATIFY

Senator DONNELL. Judge, do you think that is good public policy, for a plan to be carried out under which the ratification by the Senate is made virtually obligatory upon it? Is that not bad public policy, and is it not tending away from the very thing the Constitution had in mind, namely, that the Senate should have the right to ratify or not to ratify as it deems proper?

Mr. GERARD. Well, of course, any treaty has to be ratified by the Senate.

Senator DONNELL. That is, it may or may not be ratified, is what you mean.

Mr. GERARD. That is known all over the world.

Senator DONNELL. And every Senator has the absolute right in his own conscience and judgment to refuse to vote for this ratification, just as much as he has the right to vote in favor of it. That is right, is it not?

Mr. GERARD. Certainly every Senator has the right, but any Senator that exercises that right and votes against it will be helping to send the young men of our country into certain war.

Senator DONNELL. Judge, when this treaty was ratified, or when it was signed, I should say, do you not think that those present, and who signed it on behalf of the other countries, fully understood that the Senate had a right to refuse to ratify as well as to ratify?

Mr. GERARD. I do not know what the other people thought. But I think that Europe and the other countries of the world, since the affair of the League of Nations and the failure to ratify that, understand thoroughly that the Senate is the final judge.

Senator DONNELL. And it should be the final judge and is the final judge under the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. GERARD. Absolutely.

Senator DONNELL. And should not be precluded by the fact that the executive department has caused the treaty to be signed. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. GERARD. Of course, the Senate is the final judge.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know, judge, that Senator Watkins, who sits here on my left and who is a Senator from Utah, called attention by letter to the President of the United States to the very fact that you are now mentioning, namely, that after it is signed, that then the whole argument will be made that because it is signed, we must go ahead with it? And do you know that Senator Watkins suggested that the President give 60 days in which to study this treaty before it was signed? Did you hear that?

Mr. GERARD. I don't know what the Senator said at the time.

Senator DONNELL. Do you not think, judge, that it is a very unwise course to put a compulsion on the United States Senate by getting the treaty signed, with all the pomp and pageantry of it, and then saying to the Senate that because it has been signed, "You have got to approve it"? Don't you think that is very poor public policy?

Mr. GERARD. No; I think it is excellent, for the good of the country.

Senator DONNELL. And do you think, therefore, that the Executive, by having the power to get the treaty signed in advance, has the right, and do you think it is excellent policy that it should have, to virtually compel the Senate to approve the document? Is that right?

Mr. GERARD. The Executive has the right to manage our foreign policy up to the point of signing the treaty, and then the Senate must come in.

Senator DONNELL. And as I understand it, you say that now that the treaty has been signed, the very fact of its signature would make it a grave mistake for the Senate to refuse to ratify it. Is that your thought?

Mr. GERARD. That is my point, yes.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for your attendance.

We have the pleasure of having with us this morning Mr. Charles P. Taft, of Cincinnati, a very distinguished American who has rendered splendid public service in several capacities.

Mr. Taft.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES P. TAFT, FORMER PRESIDENT, FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, CINCINNATI, OHIO

Mr. TAFT. Thank you, Senator.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am appearing to urge a favorable vote of this committee and of the Senate upon the ratification of the Atlantic Pact. I believe this step is and has been essential for the preservation of peace, but at this stage a failure to ratify would be the greatest encouragement to ultimate war. Idealists who now withhold support of the pact do great disservice to the cause of peace which they serve.

DANGERS IN THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

With support of the Atlantic Pact I would give vigorous warning of the dangers still involved in its implementation. Its success depends entirely upon the effective continuance of well-considered group decisions on foreign policy in the National Security Council, under the leadership of the Secretary of State, with the withholding from such consideration of no important policy which touches our security in relation to the Soviet Union.

The ideology and the methods of the Soviet Politburo have made the Atlantic Pact inevitable. It has not been a question simply of the Red Army and the reestablishment of the boundaries of the Czars, which was the thesis of Mr. Lippmann some years ago. The accomplishment of that military fact is not what has frightened all of western civilization. It is the infallible dogma of a fanatical religion whose high priests have carried Machiavelli's prince to a point which neither Machiavelli nor his prince, I think, would have considered seemly—or effective. The Soviets as the exponents of a state socialist system of economics proved through 20 years quite able to live with us in peace; they were far less upsetting to international trade than the Nazis.

INTERNAL WEAKNESS OF RUSSIA

It is the development of internal political weaknesses which has in part driven the Politburo to such extremes. The sudden discovery by the Soviet Army of the standard of living of what they called "decadent" western capitalist countries, even such relatively backward countries economically as Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Hungary, upset much internal political balance in Russia, and 6,000,000 heroes of the Soviet Union, who won the war with no help from the West, as they were told, could not be pushed around quite so easily. The absence of any real understanding of human nature in successful organization has further undermined administration and shaken the confidence of the dictators. That produces more repression, more suspicion, and a tougher exterior to those with whom they deal abroad.

But it is the missionary spirit of this religious fanaticism that has produced an unscrupulous dual system of agents abroad on a world-wide scale, dealing in violence wherever it is considered safe, and in infiltration propaganda and incitement elsewhere.

Are they really seeking to undermine and destroy the western world? Many people of good will think not. I can only say to them that they have not read the record. That record as compiled by Historicus in Foreign Affairs for January 1949 from the most popularly distributed words of Stalin in Russia over the 30 years since the revolution, is no mouthing even of a ranting German corporal after an unsuccessful putsch, and that turned out to be dangerous enough. It is the religious canon of a most successful revolution, from its greatest leader, based upon an ethic which sees in deception of its enemies its most accepted tool. We are up against an organization for world revolution.

It seems to be foolish, in the face of such a threat, to close one's eyes and vote for universal simultaneous reduction of armaments, for the United Nations plan for the control of atomic energy, although I am in favor of both of those, or even for world federation. There is no way for the fellow attacked to end a cold war insistently waged by the other fellow with obvious determination. It seems to me equally foolish to start a holy war against the Communists, although their methods, their materialism, and their complete reliance on man without God, is profoundly contrary to Christianity. They represent a heresy which is the exaggeration of some of our own faults, not the less dangerous on that account, but subject eventually to conversion so far as the Russian people are concerned, in my opinion at least.

The policy of the United States which was so brilliantly set forth by George Kennan in the July 1947 article of Mr. X in Foreign Affairs seems to me therefore the only solution, and it seems to have been carried out in the last 2 years with great success under Marshall, Lovett, and Acheson.

CONTAINMENT OF RUSSIA

It involves the containment of Russia within her present boundaries of influence by diplomacy and not by war. The strength of our diplomacy does depend in turn first upon our physical power, and upon the economic health, first of the United States, and then of everybody on our side. We cannot place our army of American soldiers at every point where Russia might seek to break her boundaries. That is not necessary. All that is necessary is the knowledge that certain steps by the Soviets will bring war. The Soviets have not attacked Iran, where heaven knows we cannot put a defending force; and they have not stopped the airlift or taken the allied sectors of Berlin, which they could have done very readily.

Our weakness during these 2 years has not been the determination of the American people, but the determination of our allies. The Marshall plan, the conduct of the Soviets themselves, and the Atlantic Pact, have eliminated that weakness in the West. The task of maintaining that determination is political and not military. We have lost ground in China, although I do not agree with the common criticism of our policy there, but I do not care to discuss that question here when it is not involved in the question before you.

The pact must therefore be ratified, but I cannot urge that without stating why I believe its implementation is critically important.

I do not believe that the issue is whether the pact undermines the constitutional prerogatives of the Congress. As I have already said it is impossible for American troops to defend against a sudden attack by the Russians. We can only plan a defense in depth, as General Vandenberg described it the other day, and our share in that need be no such commitment as would deprive the Congress of its entire discretion.

At the same time, I believe with Mr. Acheson that any such truly aggressive action against any of the signatories to the pact as the pact contemplates, would impose on the American people, almost irrespective of the pact, a profound moral impulse and obligation which would be reflected at once, and overwhelmingly so, in a special meeting of the Congress to consider the situation. Such a situation will not arise if the pact is signed, and if its implementation is adequately administered.

The Atlantic Pact was inevitable, but war is not, and it is not in my opinion, probable. But the cold war will continue, with intervals like the present of temporary relaxation. Those intervals cannot be permitted to slacken our determination to maintain our policy. The cold war will continue until there is still greater failure in the integration and control of the politburo, something which will certainly be no interior revolution, but a gradual and perhaps imperceptible, almost, deterioration.

Arming the Atlantic Pact members is not, in my opinion, the first implementation, but rather standardization of armaments of all types with our American equipment and production. That must begin with the United Kingdom, since my impression is that the continental members are presumably using American equipment to a considerable degree already.

STANDARDIZATION OF ARMAMENT

I am deeply concerned with the procedures by which this standardization and rearming takes place. During 1944 I was the chairman of a State Department working committee on export of munitions of war, a committee which worked under a policy committee consisting of Mr. Acheson and the heads of the four geographical—political—offices. We were directly concerned with the effort of the Air Corps and of the Joint Chiefs to secure standardization of arms on the American model in the Latin-American countries, where you may not realize that somewhere between 80 and 90 percent have been supplied by European armament makers, and to furnish them with surplus American munitions and planes, either on lend-lease, or later by specific legislation. The experience was not one to inspire confidence in the effects on political policy of military missions. A distinguished admiral promised Peru 15 divebombers, and certainly upset the equilibrium, then not at all stable, between Chile, Ecuador, and Peru. A distinguished general of high rank by somewhat similar conduct incurred two reprimands on State Department insistence, and on a third occasion we were begged not to request another because of the effect on his service record. The military missions to the Latin-American countries returned with recommendations that would have increased some Latin-American military budgets to 30 percent of their total budgets, would have completely upset civilian control through existing civilian police by increasing the army beyond what could be managed by the police, and recommended a number of fighters, bombers, and transport planes for Argentina which would seriously have disturbed the balance in the southern area. The knowledge in those countries of what these recommendations were did not make the task of preserving the peace any easier.

While the ambassador was theoretically in charge of these discussions in each country, he had no actual control. There was no adequate process for coordination in Washington. Pressure on the State Department was such that while it stood firm against lend-lease as a means for providing these arms, its representatives much against their better judgment had to appear before the Congress as sponsors for the legislation when it was introduced.

DRAWBACKS OF MILITARY MISSIONS

I would be the first to recognize that the western European powers are more stable and responsible. But it is equally true that the situation in Europe is far more dangerous and precarious and less able to stand any kind of boners by military missions. Such boners have not turned up too frequently recently under the competent hand of Lucius Clay, but military missions to each country are a different matter. I repeat that our problem is the state of mind of the people of western Europe, to which military preparedness contributes only a small part, in my judgment. They would feel far safer for instance if they knew more about the weakness of Russian transportation facilities across eastern Russia and Poland, or about the effectiveness of united direction of all western European armies, than by the knowledge of many millions poured into their own individual military establishments and left for them to maintain at substantially greater annual costs. The problem is broadly political, and not military.

One of the political problems not to be minimized is the danger of commitment of the Allies, including the United States, by the act or omission of a weak ally or, for that matter, of any ally. I need only refer to our difficulties in Greece on the one hand, or some of our problems in earlier collaboration with the United Kingdom in the Middle East when action by the United Kingdom was assumed by observers to be the policy of the United States when it was not.

STRENGTHENING THE NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

The success of implementation under the pact therefore depends on administration of foreign policy. In Washington the thoroughly sound procedures under the National Security Council need to be even more firmly established, and no area and no policy, which even vaguely affects our relation to Russia, not even Israeli and the Arabs, should be withdrawn to domestic politics at the White House. This success has depended upon the particular people running the operation. The Merger Act should be amended as proposed to include the Vice President on the Council and eliminate the secretaries of the three services. I hope that the Armed Services Committees, however justified their feelings about the famous flat-top, will not for that reason block this necessary step. The greatest weakness in our foreign-policy operation is in the process of being cured, and nothing should prevent its complete progress.

In the field there must be established through the National Security Council, with the State Department and, I suppose, ECA as its agents in part, a discipline over all United States representatives, especially those from the Army, Navy, and Air Force, which demands agreement on a United States policy and position, and then close-mouthed adherence to it. We cannot afford the luxury abroad of the kind of interagency feuds we have permitted at home, or of one-man policy-makers in the field.

If there exists real determination at the top, and if that is based on the conviction beyond question that our national safety depends on good foreign-policy administration at home and in the field in western Europe, then the Atlantic Pact will prove what it should be, the turning point toward a peaceful world.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Taft, in discussing the particular provisions of the treaty, do you agree with the view that it is a purely defensive pact?

Mr. TAFT. I think there is no question about that, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anywhere in the treaty any suggestion or intimation or implication that it has any other purpose except the defense of the security and integrity and safety of the nations who signed the treaty?

DANGER OF MILITARY BASES CLOSE TO RUSSIA

Mr. TAFT. There is none to me, Senator. I think I would say this, however. I agree entirely with Mr. Dulles that the establishment of actual military bases in which we share in any country which is directly neighboring to Russia it seems to me would not be justified, although it might be authorized under the operation of the treaty, because in that case it would seem to me a step that to a reasonable nation would appear as a threat.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no specific provision in the treaty authorizing or directing that, is there?

Mr. TAFT. No, sir; that is correct, and that is why I am for the treaty; but I am pointing out that its administration is something which is extremely important.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, though there is no direct statement in the treaty as to offensive action, your view is that if the treaty should be utilized to create offensive action then it would be a bad step?

Mr. TAFT. By what I described I did not intend to describe as an offensive action. The establishment of a base at an advance point is not necessarily offensive at all, and in this case it would not be, in my judgment, but it might be taken as such.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course it might be so construed by a nation that felt itself imperiled or threatened by that action.

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. But so long as it did not trespass upon the rights of the other nation it would not be pertinent, would it?

Mr. TAFT. I think that the sample which was given by Mr. Dulles, which certainly was given at the Federal Council conference at Cleveland, was the establishment of a base in which any European power shared in Colombia. It would be taken as a threat to us, even though it was put there only as a defensive proposition in actual intent.

The CHAIRMAN. You said something about Colombia?

Mr. TAFT. I mean Colombia, Latin America. We would take that as a threat, no matter what the intent was.

The CHAIRMAN. I see your point.

Mr. TAFT. And I am saying only that it should be approached considering it from a reasonable consideration of what the Russians ought to feel about it. I do not mean what they actually would say, because they would say anything about anything.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the terms of the treaty, if carried out properly, could any nation level a legitimate objection to the treaty except—and it would not be legitimate—a nation that contemplated aggression?

Mr. TAFT. I think that is absolutely correct, Senator. I agree with that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. It is defensive as against the action of any foreign power that would violate the integrity, the safety, or the security of any of these nations?

Mr. TAFT. I agree with that completely. I think it follows the exact model of the Latin-American treaty of the same character.

The CHAIRMAN. You refer, of course, to the Rio Pact?

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

COMPARISON WITH PAST MILITARY ALLIANCES

The CHAIRMAN. You are a student of history and things of that kind. I would like to have you comment on the claims of some people that this is a military alliance. I want you to contrast this treaty with what was the traditional theory and foundation of the old-time military alliances of a hundred years ago or 50 years ago, or even more recently.

Mr. TAFT. I am not too much of an expert, Senator. But my impression is that most of those were both offensive and defensive alliances. That is to say, they contemplated the association of the nations concerned if anyone were attacked, but also to a pretty considerable degree if any one of them should undertake an offensive operation. That is certainly not the case in this instance at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it not true of the historic alliances like the holy alliance and others that they had offensive intentions? For instance, the holy alliance hoped to reconquer the western world and place it back under a monarchy. It failed, but still that was understood generally to have been the motive of the holy alliance.

Mr. TAFT. They would not have put it quite that way. They felt that they were restoring the legitimate authorities in Europe, first, and in other parts of the world afterwards; but certainly the effect of it was certainly an offensive alliance.

The CHAIRMAN. While it was not perhaps explicitly stated in the alliance, their objectives were that these three monarchs, and they regarded themselves as more or less ruling the European Continent, at least, would act together in whatever war or whatever enterprise might follow, is that not true?

Mr. TAFT. I think that is true, although they attempted to state a general objective which on the surface had certain moral foundations but which in fact came out as an offensive alliance.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that the Monroe Doctrine had its birth and sprang from the ambitions and protections of the holy alliance?

Mr. TAFT. I think that is unquestionably true. The original suggestion of it from Canning was an effort to balance somewhat the powers in the holy alliance.

The CHAIRMAN. The purpose of Canning in making that suggestion, and his correspondence shows it, was to offset or discourage the formation in this hemisphere of the old regime.

Mr. TAFT. That is right, Senator. I have not read his correspondence. You are getting a little out of my depth in history, I may say.

The CHAIRMAN. It is pretty well understood generally.

Then let me ask you one other question and I will have finished.

Prior to World War I you recall, I think, that the so-called Central Powers had a treaty or an alliance with Italy, in which Italy bound herself to go along with the Central Powers. She did not do that. She did not follow that in World War I. But she was charged with having breached her treaty and her agreement because she did not. Is that not true?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, and I think she probably did.

The CHAIRMAN. I think she did too, but still the basis of the whole thing was that she had been in one of these military alliances pledged to go to war when Germany or Austria went to war.

Mr. TAFT. There was a similar claim, of course, in World War II, and that time Italy jumped the other way.

The CHAIRMAN. Still, the same principle was involved.

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Taft, I like your statement very much, particularly the note of warning you put into it. I have no trouble whatever with the pact itself. I think it is just elementary common sense in behalf of peace. But I think the problem of implementation requires the precise cautions that you indicate.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE PACT

You point, in this connection, to the difficulty that arose in pan America in connection with efforts to provide limited armaments. Is it not true that under the pact the requirement for continuous self-help and mutual aid, and the requirement for the constant integration of western European defense plans, is calculated, if properly carried out, to integrate these decisions to a point where none of the difficulties found in South America would arise?

Mr. TAFT. I think that is absolutely correct. There was no such provision for coordination—at least none that was working—in Latin America, and there was no provision for coordination in Washington at that stage.

Senator VANDENBERG. In the second place, in your statement you note the danger of our commitment through an act of omission of a weak ally, and perhaps an act of commission by a weak ally. Is it not true that under the terms of article 5 of the pact we are left in a completely obvious and completely legitimate right of self determination in judging the character of the crisis and the nature and extent of our contribution to the restoration of peace and security?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir; I think there is no question about that. I think it should be emphasized at every stage, however, that that is the fact.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. I have no questions of Mr. Taft.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Thomas?

Senator THOMAS of Utah. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Fulbright?

Senator FULBRIGHT. Mr. Taft, I associate myself with Senator Vandenberg's estimate of your statement. I think it is a very informative one in raising questions I have not seen raised prior to this time in these hearings regarding the influence of the military in the implementation.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

There is one paragraph particularly that I would like for you to amplify. That is on page 3, where you say:

This success has depended upon the particular people running the operation. The Merger Act should be amended as proposed to include the Vice President on the council and eliminate the secretaries of the three services.

Who proposed that?

Mr. TAFT. I understood there was a bill actually introduced, Senator, in one House or the other, which did provide for the elimination of the three secretaries. The addition of the Vice President I think was simply a casual suggestion, but one which seemed to me to have much merit, because in my own thinking, in connection with the operation of the State Department and, in fact, of the entire foreign and domestic policy of the Government, the place where the Vice President, it seems to me, could do the most good would be as the chairman of a committee like the National Security Council, but covering a somewhat larger area, so that I thought of myself, and when I saw the suggestion in the papers it seemed to me a very wise one. It also provides a contact with the Senate which is a very desirable one.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I would gather from the whole statement on that page that you realize how very difficult it is to coordinate the civilian and military, and in military affairs they usually tend to go their own way, do they not?

Mr. TAFT. I was very much encouraged, however, Senator, by the Alsops' article in the Saturday Evening Post, to which I was referring in my statement, actually, in discussing the success of the National Security Council. I had heard that that was the case before, and their article amplified it with a good deal of detail on a basis that seemed to me quite accurate and sound.

MILITARY BUDGET OF THE UNITED STATES

Senator FULBRIGHT. When you mentioned, up at the top of that page, that Latin American countries, as a result of the military recommendations, would have increased their budgets to over 30 percent of the total budget for military expenses, our budget is over 30 percent for military items. The percent of our budget which includes foreign aid, which really has a very close association—

Mr. TAFT. I am referring strictly to the military budget.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Our own budget is nearly 50 percent.

Mr. TAFT. You are dealing with countries in which there is no such necessity for military operations, and in which a percentage of thirty is a burden on their economy which they are quite unable to bear.

ECONOMIC AND MILITARY ASSISTANCE

Senator FULBRIGHT. There is some question—at least the matter is being discussed here—as to how long we can bear 50 percent for this purpose including, as I say, the two items of ECA and the military.

Mr. TAFT. I would not include the ECA, myself.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Its ultimate purpose is the same, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. I do not think so. I was involved in the setting up of the first European Economic Committee in the fall of 1944, which was the forerunner of the ECA, and the objective at that time was not military but was in a broad sense commercial for the prosperity of this country, rather than the military considerations that subsequently made it possible to put it through.

Senator FULBRIGHT. What I mean, the object is the security of the western democratic people.

Mr. TAFT. That is one object.

Senator FULBRIGHT. One is military and the other is economic in its approach, but I did not understand and do not understand that the principal objective of the ECA is better economic opportunity for this country. I thought that was entirely incidental. In fact, I could not support it if that was its only purpose.

Mr. TAFT. I would support it on that basis, and I was for it before any question of military defense came up. The military defense is unquestionably the consideration that put it through the Congress of the United States.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I am not able to accept the idea that we can be prosperous by giving away goods. It seems to me prosperity must depend upon a real economic exchange of values.

Mr. TAFT. I think there is no question about that, but I think also that our prosperity could not exist if the rest of the world were in the economic status that it was at the end of the war, and it would be worth giving a good deal in order to restore it to its situation in western Europe as the other great workshop of the world.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That is purely temporary. The objective of it is to establish them where they can stand on their own feet.

Mr. TAFT. Certainly. There is no question about that.

Senator TAFT. One of the principal objectives or ingredients in that is this question of security, first security from invasion by the Communists.

Mr. TAFT. That is correct, and it has been a very successful implementation of the policy that was described by Mr. X.

POLITICAL INTEGRATION OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. At one point you say the problem is broadly political and not military. In that broad sense I agree with that. I wondered if you had given any thought to the political problems that exist in Europe; that is, the political fragmentation of that area. Do you think that there would be any advantage to this country in rearranging the pattern of political associations in Europe?

Mr. TAFT. I think it might, but I think it is a very long-term project. I don't think it is anything which the United States could do from the outside, and I think we have to approach the problem in the light of the situation as it is. In that situation, the moral determination of a nation like France, in my judgment, is the key to the defense of Western Europe, rather than their military budget. I think in that respect there is probably the greatest progress in the course of the last 2 years.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think that if these countries remain independent sovereignties they will become strong enough to support themselves either economically or militarily?

Mr. TAFT. That is a very difficult question, Senator. We are out of balance to the extent, I think, of some $5,000,000,000. They, I see from the latest figures, taking western Europe as a whole, were out of balance to the extent of $5,600,000,000 for last year, for the year 1948. I think that is our most serious economic problem, as to whether those two imbalances can be corrected. I hope they can, but I do not think it is at all certain that they can.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think if these countries in western Europe to some extent merged their sovereignty so that they could rid themselves of the economic barriers that it would be beneficial to that area?

Mr. TAFT. I think there is no question about it. I only say that that certainly is not a project which the United States can put over, so to speak. It has to be done by them.

Senator FULBRIGHT. If we are investing our money and our efforts and taking considerable risks of even greater dangers, do you think we have no interest in suggesting to them that they do what you feel, and I think a good many others feel, would contribute to the ultimate objective?

Mr. TAFT. I have the greatest interest in that. I still would say that the problem has to be solved in the long run by a self-starting operation in Europe. We cannot do it by any pressure that we would put on from the outside, although we may definitely insist on doing so, and in view of our investment I think probably we should.

Senator FULBRIGHT. We are seeking to do that in the economic field.

Mr. TAFT. That is right, and we have made some progress.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF UNIFICATION

Senator FULBRIGHT. And many of us feel those efforts will be fruitless in the economic field unless it is accompanied by political change. It seems, therefore, we have every reason to at least suggest to them that that ought to be done.

Mr. TAFT. I think so. I only say that as a practical matter I think we have done so. I do not think as a practical matter we can compel it.

Senator FULBRIGHT. When do you think we did so?

Mr. TAFT. My impression from the reading of the press for the last 3 years has been that we have assisted and given such push as we felt was appropriate in that direction.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Can you think of any instance in which we officially gave any such push?

Mr. TAFT. No; I cannot think of any instance where we did it officially, and I am not at all sure that that would not react if we did.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Unofficially?

Mr. TAFT. I can only say, in reading the papers, the New York Times and other organs of opinion and of fact, there have been reported instances where we have attempted to assist in that direction. I am very, very skeptical of how much can be done by us from the outside, Senator. I do not think that just because we put $5,000,000,000 a year in there that we can compel them to do anything. We may stop the money, but that still will not compel them to do it.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You have no faith in persuasion, either?

Mr. TAFT. Well, I am for persuasion. I am saying that it has to be internal and self-starting in order to accomplish the purpose.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You know that they themselves have been talking about this on and off for 300 years. It is nothing new. And they have a very strong movement now in Europe.

Mr. TAFT. Conversation for 300 years is not significant, because the national problem has not arisen until the 19th century, but during the last 50 years there certainly has been a lot of discussion about it, starting with Mr. Briand's proposal for a United States of Europe, which I think was the first official statement about it.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You know that even yesterday, or the day before, they did finally sign the so-called statute of Europe setting up a Council of Europe. You saw that?

Mr. TAFT. I saw that; yes.

Senator FULBRIGHT. So it is not imposing something on them that they do not want. There is a great sentiment there. I am not aware of any efforts on our part, or even strong expressions of approval of those efforts, and there are people who believe that this country does not approve of a federation of Europe because it might interfere with the objective you said ECA had, which was to keep free markets for this country. It is obvious if you had a strong Europe economically and politically it would be a competitor of this country, not only in Europe but throughout the world, and there are people—I am not saying you do—who think that in considering this for our future economic profit we ought to keep these countries in a state in which they are not too strong, but just strong enough to keep out the Communists.

Mr. TAFT. That was not the objective I described for the ECA which I was supporting. What I was saying was that you cannot have nations which are flat on their backs economically and have the United States prosperous, and therefore it seemed to me it was an obligation, in fact a necessity, for the United States to do in any event what we have attempted to do in the ECA. That does not in any sense support the objective that you have just described, which may be somebody's objective. I don't know.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I may say it is not mine. I think temporarily perhaps we might profit a little more by them not being too strong and becoming a real competitor, but over the long run, if we are really looking after the security of the West, we would be in a much better position to have a really strong consolidated Europe.

Mr. TAFT. I think there is no question about that, and if, as you said, the administration has not supported it, then I think they should. My impression was that they had.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I am certainly not aware of their taking any steps or making any statements specifically approving or encouraging a move to political unity. Their idea is it is premature, and we should not do it now, and we would be interfering in their internal affairs. But we interfere in every other direction. This military obligation is certainly not free from that charge, nor is the economic, because we tell them that we pass judgment and plan what kind of plants they shall build, whether they shall build a refinery or whether they shall build a textile factory, how much they can build, whether they shall electrify their railroads or not, and so on. There is no hesitancy in that field, but for some reason in the political field it is beyond good taste.

Mr. TAFT. Senator, we are only disagreeing on the facts, and if you are correct then we are not disagreeing at all.

Senator FULBRIGHT. In any case, I think it is a very good statement. I did not intend to be arguing with you.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. TAFT. I think I would like to go back, however, to one suggestion you made, and that was what I had to say about my experience in dealing with the Latin-American problem was still an effective criticism of the present situation. What I know about the operation of the National Security Council and the coordination which it has brought about in foreign policy would indicate that it now provides something in the Government that absolutely did not exist at the time that I was in the State Department. It was one of the most necessary elements, and it was not there. Apparently it is there now, but it is there in my judgment primarily because of the people that are operating it, and therefore it should be made as firm and as established as Congress can help to make it.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I think that is an excellent suggestion. I am thoroughly in accord with that suggestion.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Mr. Chairman, may I just say here, with regard to the creation of the National Security Council, under the original Merger Act or bill which did not become law there was no provision in it for the Secretaries who were called the Secretaries for the Army, for the Navy, and for the Air Forces. They were definite subordinates, and the Security Council, had it been set up as it was planned in that bill, when the bill was on the Senate Calendar and reported out, was of course made up of, first of all, the President of the United States, who would be represented by his aide if he had one, you see; the Secretary of State; the Secretary of Defense; with the Chief of Staff, who would be Chief of Staff of all of them, and then the Chairman of the National Resources Board and then the Secretary. So that in that way you would have the type of representation which you have been suggesting here, and not a military dominated National Security Council.

Mr. TAFT. Apparently it has worked effectively with general civilian control, even in its present set-up. But it does seem to me that it should be brought back closer to the original plan of the Merger Act.

The second thing I should say, because in both my statement and what I have said here I have left it out, is that the relationship of the President to the Security Council has been the most important factor in its success. It has been his confidence in the Secretary of the Council and their daily contact, the daily advice to the President of what is going on, and I assume the fairly continuous word from the President that he is for it or he is against it or commenting on whatever is being done that is in a sense the most essential thing in making it successful up to date. The President must be in it and must cooperate. He has done so with the one exception to which I have called attention, and that is the withdrawal of certain specific policies from the consideration of the National Security Council. None of them should be withdrawn from it. All of them should be discussed and decided in that council.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Lodge?

STANDARDIZATION OF ARMAMENTS

Senator LODGE. I would like to direct your attention to the next to the last paragraph on page 2 of your statement, in which you make the following observation:

Arming the Atlantic Pact members is not the first implementation, but rather standardization of armaments of all types with our American equipment and production.

Well, now, does that mean that you do not think we would undertake any assistance of any kind until they have standardized their weapons?

Mr. TAFT. Oh, no; I do not think that. But I think the standardization should be the first effort, and certainly should parallel any effort to supply arms. As I say, my impression is that in the case of all but England most of their arms come from the United States, and therefore standardization in the sense I am talking about has been accomplished. To a substantial degree the standardization must have been accomplished with the British during the war, but I should think that that is the place where we would have to begin.

Senator LODGE. You do not mean we ought not to do anything until complete standardization has been achieved, because even during the war, under the pressure of war, we did not achieve standardization with the British in artillery and a whole lot of other things.

Mr. TAFT. I know. I recognize that difficulty, Senator. I was only pointing out the necessity of standardization, which has not been referred to in any of the publicity coming from these hearings.

Senator LODGE. You just feel we ought to make a good effect to get it.

Mr. TAFT. Exactly, because the supply of goods coming out of our factories to equip our Army they can then divert immediately, and that becomes the greatest defense.

Senator LODGE. I think it is very desirable, but I also know what a terribly slow job it is to get it accomplished.

Mr. TAFT. Is it not also your impression that most of the continental countries have achieved a considerable degree of standardization due to the fact that their equipment comes from this country?

Senator LODGE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. We have present Mr. Taft, through the courtesy of the committee, Senator Donnell, of Missouri, and Senator Watkins, of Utah. They are not members of the committee but they desire to ask questions and the committee has consented to that. I will turn you over to Senator Donnell.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, I wanted to ask you a few questions with regard to the text of your prepared statement, and then some further questions.

URGENCY FOR IMPLEMENTING TREATY

I notice that on page 3, about the middle of the page, you say:

I repeat that our problem is the state of mind of the people of western Europe, to which military preparedness contributes only a small part.

I notice, however, that on page 2 there is this language:

The pact must therefore be ratified, but I cannot urge that without stating why I believe its implementation is critically important.

Well, now, if military preparedness contributes only a small part over in western Europe, why is it that implementation is critically important?

Mr. TAFT. Well, I have tried to state in all of the second half of the statement why I think it is critically important, Senator. What I am trying to emphasize, however, is the fact that, taking France, for instance, in the state of mind that it was 2 years ago I do not think it would make any difference how many arms you gave them. You still would have a serious weakness at the heart of western Europe. The tremendous progress in the political operation of France, a large part of which is economic but which, on the other hand, depends almost entirely on the courage and backbone of the Government in establishing and collecting taxes and establishing a fiscal policy and maintaining it, that, it seems to me, is much more important in the case as the situation existed during these last 2 years than supplying military forces to them, and it is part of the implementation of the Atlantic Pact, because without that kind of backbone and solidity in the heart of western Europe the arms and all of the obligations under the Atlantic Pact become useless.

Senator DONNELL. Then am I correct in understanding, Mr. Taft, that your view of this is that two things are vitally essential to the operation of this pact: One, the creation of a spirit of confidence and determination and psychological strength on the part of Europe; and, in the second place, the implementation by military equipment?

Mr. TAFT. That is right.

EXTENT OF MILITARY OBLIGATIONS

Senator DONNELL. I wanted to ask you whether or not there is anything in the treaty which defines at all accurately the extent of the obligation into which we are entering in regard to the military implementation over this period of 20 years.

Mr. TAFT. I would agree with Senator Vandenberg that that is a matter of judgment which is reserved under article 5 to the United States. All the United States operation is under the Constitution in any situation may arise.

That does not mean to me that the United States is going to sit back and take a cold-blooded view of whatever the Soviets or anybody else may do. It does mean to me that it will have to be a step taken by the Soviets or by any other country which is so clearly and unquestionably aggressive that the United States, both its Government and its people, are united in believing that that is a threat to their security.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, I was not referring particularly to article 5, which relates only to the contingency of an armed attack. I was referring, and perhaps I should have stated it more clearly, primarily to article 3, which does not refer solely to the contingency of an armed attack, but refers to "continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid." There will be maintained and developed the individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack. That means, does it not, that by the term "continuous and effective" certainly there is the reference to continuity throughout the period of the treaty, 20 years. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And by "effective means," some kind of aid which really will have some effect. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And the type of mutual aid, in your judgment, includes, as you have earlier indicated in response to one of my questions, as I understood you, first the aid in creating a spirit of confidence and psychological strength in western Europe, and, second, the mutual aid in implementation by arms. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I would say so. If your question is the extent of the obligation assumed under article 3, I would say exactly what I said with reference to the arms or the situation of an armed attack on any one of the European nations, and that is that the extent of that help is certainly something to be decided by the United States, in view of all the circumstances and without any compulsion other than the obligation that it feels in the interest of its own security.

Senator DONNELL. I am very much interested in that observation, Mr. Taft, because article 5 is the only article which contains any provision as that which you suggest, namely, "such action as it deems necessary."

Article 3, as I read it, says affirmatively that there is a positive obligation to do something specific. I do not mean that it is going to say how many guns or how many tanks, but there is nothing in article 3 that says, so far as I have observed, anything about leaving it to this country to decide what we are to do. Article 3 reads, does it not:

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

LIMITATIONS ON ARTICLE 3 OF THE TREATY

Now I want to ask you, in your judgment is there not a distinct difference between article 3 and article 5, inasmuch as article 3 does not contain any such language as "as it deems necessary," but contains this positive obligation to do this, to give this continuous self-help, et cetera, to maintain and develop individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack?

Mr. TAFT. I would agree that the language is different, but I do not agree that the obligation is any different in that respect.

Senator DONNELL. Then why was it necessary, if you know, Mr. Taft, to put in the language "such action as it deems necessary"?

Mr. TAFT. That I cannot say, sir. What you are referring to is the old legal principle of interpretation that if you put it in in one place it means you leave it out in the other. I do not think that applies to article 5 and article 3.

If I may give you a sample, for instance, it may well be that the provision of $10,000,000,000 of aid in 1 year, under the Economic Cooperation Act, would in fact produce a more effective self-help and mutual aid. That nevertheless, in the judgment of the Congress, would be considered as more than we could economically provide. There is no question that a limitation of that kind is to be implied. We cannot be asked to do more than we economically can do.

If that is a limitation, certain I would have no question whatever that there is also a limitation which leaves to our own individual judgment, through the parts of our Government that have to decide that question, how much we should contribute in order to produce continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid.

Senator DONNELL. Do you not think, Mr. Taft, that the fair meaning of article 3 is that there is a positive, definite, final obligation on the part of every signatory to give such effective mutual aid as is reasonably necessary to maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack, and it is not left to each signatory to decide what is reasonably necessary, but there is an outright obligation to do whatever is in fact reasonably necessary to effect those results?

Mr. TAFT. I think the judgment of each individual country is the only basis which is in this treaty for deciding that issue. I cannot agree that there is any body set up by this treaty which as any authority to establish what you call the fact. The fact is something which is certainly not like the fact of this being a hardwood table. It is a fact on which there are bound to be differences of opinion, and the judgment of the individual country as to what is continuous and effective self-help, and what is the mutual aid which it owes to others, is something which it will have to decide, and no one else.

I might say that one reason for the difference in the language is because there, in article 5, you are dealing with the possibility of war, which is such a wholly undesirable eventuality that the writers of the treaty did not desire to have any doubt as to the question that you have raised. In the case of article 3, my own judgment would be that there could be no possible doubt, and that not being the case of the possibility of war, there was felt no necessity of spelling it out any further than it is clearly implied in the present language.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, I think you are quite correct in your view that there is no provision in this treaty for any specific council or body to decide what is the duty of each nation, and that each nation, of course, has the physical power to decide for itself. But to my mind, the fact that article 3 imposes, as I see it, a direct definite obligation, not in the numbers of tanks or guns but a direct obligation, not to do what the signatory thinks is proper but to do what is in fact reasonably necessary to maintain and develop individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack, can lead to what your answer a moment ago suggests, namely, a very grave difference of opinion between the different signatories as to what is necessary and ultimately as to whether the respective parties have complied with their obligation.

Mr. TAFT. Well, Senator, may I say, certainly any treaty offers the possibility of some difference of opinion as to its interpretation, and some parts of the treaty are possible of determination by the World Court, others are not, where it is a question of judgment of the kind that was called for under article 3. All I can say is that what this treaty does, as one of a number of other steps, is to attempt to build up a moral determination to resist aggression and to stand together for effective self-help and mutual aid, which is good only so long as that moral determination continues. And I do not think that you can avoid the possibility of some possible future differences of opinion when the national interest of some particular nation seems to have moved in a slightly different direction.

NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, in the second paragraph of your statement you mention the National Security Council. Are you referring there to the Council of Resources, the one to which Mr. Wallgren was recently nominated by the President?

Mr. TAFT. No, no. I am referring to the National Security Council, under the Merger Act, which Senator Thomas described in the original form, which now consists of the chairman of the body to which you refer as one member, to the Secretary for Defense, to the Secretaries of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, to the President's representative, Secretary of State, and such others as they may invite to sit with them, and they have invited others. I understand the Secretary of the Treasury now frequently sits with them.

Senator DONNELL. In that same sentence you say:

With support of the Atlantic Pact I would give vigorous warning of the dangers still involved in its implementation.

I want to come back to those dangers here in a few minutes. Then you continue, "Its"—that means the Atlantic Pact, does it not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; that's right.

Senator DONNELL (reading):

Its success depends entirely upon the effective continuance of well-considered group decisions on foreign policy in the National Security Council, under the leadership of the Secretary of State—

And so forth. Is the National Security Council placed under the leadership of the Secretary of State?

Is the National Security Council placed under the leadership of the Secretary of State?

Mr. TAFT. I think he is the Chairman of it, if I am not mistaken.

Senator THOMAS of Utah. Yes; he is the Chairman.

Senator DONNELL. And he exercises, as you regard it, of course, a very great position of power and influence on the Council?

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

CONTROL OVER FOREIGN RELATIONS

Senator DONNELL. I notice over on page 3 that you refer to what to my mind is a very serious situation which has developed, you point out, in which the State Department seems to have been not free from outside compulsions. I am talking about the leadership of the Secretary of State. Let me ask you about what you mean here. You say, on page 3, near the top:

Pressure on the State Department was such that while it stood firm against lend-lease, its representatives much against their better judgment had to appear before the Congress as sponsors for the legislation when it was introduced.

Who was it applied that compulsion which made these men, against their own better judgment, come here as sponsors for legislation?

Mr. TAFT. I do not know, but I would assume the President of the United States.

Senator DONNELL. The President of the United States? That is exactly what I am getting at. So that this Security Council, under the leadership of the Secretary of State, is at least subject to the possibility of danger of one man, the President of the United States, requiring those men to go ahead on policies that they did not believe in at all; is that right?

Mr. TAFT. Senator, the first thing I would say is that I was describing here, as I just said to Senator Fulbright, the situation at the time I was in the State Department, which was in 1944 and 1945. The presentation of that legislation I think followed in the spring of 1946. At that time the Merger Act had not been passed, the National Security Council was not in existence, and there was no body, no effective body, before which the State Department, the military services, and the others concerned with foreign policy could meet and thresh out a coordinated policy.

As the National Security Council is now working, that kind of pressure would not exist except out on the table where the matter was fully discussed.

Now, so far as the President of the United States is concerned, the Secretary of State, under the legislation which creates the State Department, is required to administer the Department of State in accordance with the instructions of the President of the United States. It is just as broad and just as simple as that. I don't have the exact language, but it is approximately that. So that the President is always in the position to decide a question in favor of the military and against the Secretary of State, and to instruct the Secretary and his subordinates to follow that policy. Under the Constitution of the United States there is no other possible result.

I can only say that the operation of the National Security Council during the last year and a half or 2 years that it has been in existence has gradually developed what I have described here as a group decision in which the President participates and which in the ordinary case he has supported and implemented.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, you have touched on something that I think every Member of every committee and of the Senate has observed right up to this time, and that is, that when the administration, the President of the United States, determines upon a policy, we find one witness right after the other coming before us from the administration, all of them heartily in favor in every respect of what the President has suggested, and I want to ask you whether you know that in the instance you described on page 3 the representatives of the States Department had to appear, to quote your language, "before the Congress as sponsors for legislation much against their better judgment."

Do you know that to be a fact?

Mr. TAFT. I do not know it to be a fact from a direct conversation with any of the people who were concerned, or from any direct information about that particular instance. I do know about the attitude of the State Department in connection with that whole proposal at the time that I was in it, and some of the gentlemen who were concerned were not in favor of what they subsequently supported before the Congress. That is all I can tell you.

Senator DONNELL. So that they came before Congress expressing opinions which were not actually their opinions?

Mr. TAFT. I am not sure that I would say that. They came and stated that the State Department was in favor of it.

Senator DONNELL. And that was much against their better judgment?

Mr. TAFT. Their individual better judgment; but, Senator, I think I would have to say that I do not believe the Government can operate unless in the end on questions of policy the President decides it. One of the things that turned my hair gray during 4½ years in Washington was the fact that we could not get the President to decide some of these things.

TESTIMONY ON ATLANTIC PACT

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, the point that I am disturbed about, as you, of course, observed, is this: Here sits a committee of 13 gentlemen of the Senate, trying to get the facts and the views of people about this North Atlantic Treaty. If the President of the United States controls the opinion of every man that comes here, why not just get one of them to say "That is the opinion of the President, and it is our official duty to follow it"? In other words, are we getting anything of any special value when we get witness after witness, all of them exactly and precisely convinced that this thing is right? Are we getting anything of value?

Mr. TAFT. Well, Senator, I read with care—in fact I have here—Mr. Acheson's statement before this committee. I worked for Mr. Acheson for a year as his direct assistant. I have a very high opinion of him. I think the statement that he presented was a very carefully worked out statement which represented his opinion, which he stood for, and stood back of in every respect, especially in connection with his interpretation of the language of this particular document. He did not quite agree in that in every detail with Mr. Lovett, who happens to be a classmate and very close friend of mine also.

Senator DONNELL. And who is no longer in the Department, is he?

Mr. TAFT. And who is no longer with the Department; but I think nevertheless Mr. Lovett would equally have expressed his judgment about it had he been in the Department at that time, as one of those who negotiated it.

Certainly the stronger the caliber of the associates and assistants whom the President employs the more likely they are not to come down here and present anything in which they do not believe.

MILITARY BASES NEAR RUSSIA

Senator DONNELL. You spoke something about the matter of bases being established right up close to Russia, and I believe you indicated that it might be that Russia might feel that such establishment of bases up close there by the parties to this treaty would indicate aggression. Am I correct in so understanding and interpreting your observation?

Mr. TAFT. I was referring to the establishment of bases which Russia, acting as a reasonable people might consider as a threat to them, not what the present Politburo would consider as a threat or not what they might say they considered as a threat.

Senator DONNELL. I was not particularly differentiating between the two.

Mr. TAFT. I do, and I think it is very important to differentiate in that matter.

Senator DONNELL. I was not particularly differentiating between the two because that is not the question to which I desire to address myself. I understood you to indicate that you think that somebody in Russia, whoever the proper parties are, might feel that there was aggression intended by the establishment of bases at some strategic point or points near them. That is right, is it?

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. Now, Mr. Taft, Senator Connally then said, in substance, to you, "Well, now, Mr. Taft, there is no provision in the treaty, no specific treaty provision, authorizing and directing bases near Russia," and you said—I may not quote it exactly, but that is the substance of his statement as I understood it—and you said, "That is the reason I am in favor of the pact."

Remember, now, he had stated that there is no specific treaty provision authorizing and directing establishment of such bases.

I want to ask you, Mr. Taft, although there is no provision in here that directs that such bases be there placed, there certainly is authority under this pact for the signatories to go ahead and establish them there if they want to do it, is there not?

Mr. TAFT. I would say there is the possibility under the pact without any violation of its terms, and perhaps as a result of some of the processes which the pact sets up. That is exactly why I have stated as strongly as I have that there are dangers involved in its implementation, and that no such steps should be taken except as a result of a group decision in which the political considerations are the ones that have the final decision.

Senator DONNELL. I understand, then, that one of the dangers, and I quote from your statement on page 1, at the top, "still involved in its implementation," is precisely the situation that I have described, namely, that of bases.

Mr. TAFT. That is one of them; yes, that is right.

DANGERS IN IMPLEMENTATION

Senator DONNELL. Now I want to ask you in a few minutes about some others. In the first place, the Military Department in our country has its opinions, and not only is the State Department under the Executive, but the Military Department likewise.

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. It may come in with plans too which may attract the President—not this particular President but some other President, perhaps—saying that we should vastly increase our military implementation. That is entirely possible, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Senator DONNELL. And, as you have pointed out here at the bottom of page 2 of your statement, sometimes the military authorities make mistakes like anybody else. That is right, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. And the particular ones to which you have referred here are the mistakes made by the admiral and the distinguished general mentioned in your statement. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. So you have emphasized the fact that while it is possible, while it is advisable, to take up this matter of implementation and safeguard us, there is at least a danger and a possibility that there might be a bad implementation. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly there is. The danger, however, of not signing the pact is far greater.

Senator DONNELL. Well, of course, that is a question for opinion, but there is a danger and a possibility of actual bad errors being made in implementation. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. That is always true in foreign policy.

Senator DONNELL. And it is true now in connection with this Atlantic Treaty, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

COMMITMENT TO POLICIES OF ALLIES

Senator DONNELL. You mentioned another thing that I do not recall having been mentioned in these hearings, and I think it is tremendously interesting and important. On page 3 you talked about the political problems, the third full paragraph. You say:

One of the political problems not to be minimized is the danger of commitment of the Allies, including the United States, by the act or omission of a weak ally.

Mr. TAFT. And I added, "or any ally."

Senator DONNELL. That is not in the text, but I will add it.

Mr. TAFT. I added that, because I did not, of course, consider the United Kingdom as a weak ally.

Senator DONNELL. That is certainly true, that the same problem not to be minimized is the danger of commitment by the Allies through the act or omission of any one of our allies.

Mr. TAFT. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Now suppose, Mr. Taft, that we ratify this treaty which has already been signed. Obviously we are associated, then, with its 12 signatories, is it not 12, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Eleven nations other than ourselves, and we are subject for 20 long years to the very danger that you point out, of commitment of ourselves by the omission or act of some one of those 11 other allies. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir. I would only say that that is the danger to which any mature nation has long since been subject, but which the United States has avoided by not reaching its full maturity in foreign policy. I am in favor of the signing of this pact, which brings the United States into a situation in which it has never existed and never has been in in its past history, because I believe we have reached a state in the world situation in which it is absolutely essential and necessary to do so for our own security. That danger is one of the dangers which is involved in growing up in the world today. Nobody can avoid it by anything, whether you sign this pact or do not sign it.

Senator DONNELL. Referring to the situation where we do not sign it, we are certainly not under any contractual obligation to do anything unless we do ratify the pact; are we?

Mr. TAFT. That certainly is true, yes.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Taft, suppose that during those 20 long years, which is as long as the time since the beginning of the depression in this country in 1929 until now, some 1 of these 11 other allies, as for illustration Italy, should make some material blunder, should irritate a prospective enemy, should cause such action to be taken as would precipitate an attack by that other enemy by committing an act that you or I or the United States would never have agreed to. We are bound contractually by this obligation, are we not, for the entire period of that 20 years, in the event of an armed attack by that enemy, to forthwith take such action as we deem necessary, which Mr. Acheson has indicated means in our honest judgment, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area?

That is true, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; and the only way that you can avoid that is by having an administration and foreign policy which keeps up with what is going on and, in the event anything as serious as you are describing arises, knows about it in advance and takes some steps to prevent it.

Senator DONNELL. Just how could our administration and our foreign policy prevent Italy or France or Denmark or any one of these other countries, including even little Luxembourg, whose Minister is a close friend of mine and for whom I have great admiration, step in and tell those countries what they should or should not do?

Mr. TAFT. The administration of foreign policy is, among other things, to induce other nations to do what you want them to do or not to do what you do not want them to do. It is not an easy task which is assigned to the State Department in that connection, but it is one which you certainly can attempt to do and which you can accomplish more or less successfully.

Senator DONNELL. I emphasize the fact that you have put in, very properly, the word "less." It is entirely possible that the administration of foreign affairs of our country might not be persuasive enough to induce the other country to do what we wanted it to do?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly. A war could happen. My own judgment is that I believe it is not probable, because the effect of the pact as well as the other steps that have been taken, as well as the greatly forward steps in the administration of foreign policy, have made it impossible.

EFFECT OF COMMUNIST COUP IN ONE OF SIGNATORIES

Senator DONNELL. Is there anything in this treaty, from beginning to end, that provides that if 1 of these 11 other signatories should become Communist that it could be expelled from the combination formed by the treaty?

Mr. TAFT. No, sir. I think that the danger of any one of them becoming Communist was greater in the last 2 years than it is likely to be in the course of the next 20.

Senator DONNELL. Of course it is entirely possible, is it not, that in a country like Italy or France, and possibly some others, the Communist influence might become very strong gain, and perhaps is not so weak as yet? Is that not true?

Mr. TAFT. I would say it is possible, but not likely.

Senator DONNELL. There is nothing in the pact, at any rate, that says that at any time during this 20-year period if any one of the nations shall become Communist it can be expelled from the pact.

Mr. TAFT. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, in the sixth paragraph on page 2 of your statement you say you believe with Mr. Acheson that any such truly aggressive action against any other signatories of the pact as the pact contemplates would impose on the American people, you say almost irrespective of the pact, a profound moral impulse and obligation, et cetera, and I will come to the et cetera in a minute.

MORAL AND LEGAL OBLIGATIONS UNDER THE PACT

Up to that point, however, you say you believe with him that any such truly aggressive action against any one of the signatories to the pact as the pact contemplates would impose on the American people a profound moral impulse and obligation. Am I not correct, Mr. Taft, that in addition to any moral obligation the pact would impose a legal obligation, a binding legal obligation to take, as the pact says, in the event of such an attack, "forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force," not only to restore but to maintain the security of the North Atlantic area?

Am I not correct?

Mr. TAFT. That is correct. I was attempting, however, to paraphrase what Mr. Acheson said, which, as you will recall, was along a very delicate line, a very sharp ridge, should I say.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you, Mr. Taft, this question: You are familiar, of course, with the fact that Mr. Acheson, first in his radio speech when he discussed the pact with the American public, second in the State paper called the white paper, and third, I believe in a subsequent address—I might be wrong about the subsequent address, but certainly in the other two—referred to the pact and said that this provision about "as it deems necessary" still leaves it obligatory upon us to do what in our honest, genuine judgment is required. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. TAFT. I think that is correct. However, I nevertheless believe that what I have said here is a fair transcript of what Mr. Acheson said in his testimony to the committee.

Senator DONNELL. I am not questioning the fairness of it, Mr. Taft. It may be quite accurate. But the point I am getting at is twofold, one of which I have stated, namely, that the pact creates, as I understand you agreeing, do you not, a legal obligation and not a mere moral obligation, under the circumstances recited, where there is a truly aggressive action against any 1 of the 12 signatories?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly that is true. I was only pointing out here that at the same time it creates a moral obligation it creates it in a situation in which I believe the overwhelming probabilities are there would be a very profound moral obligation at the same time.

Senator DONNELL. You may be quite right. The point I am getting at is that we have here created a legal obligation so we are no longer free to determine for ourselves what is the moral obligation. We might have no moral obligation. It might be an obligation of prudence that would lead us into war, but we might have no moral obligation at all.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

I wanted to ask you this, speaking of Mr. Acheson's testimony. There was put up to him, as the Secretary of State, and there was put up to Mr. Lovett, as the man who participated in all of the initial negotiations up until the day Mr. Acheson became Secretary of State in January of this year, there was put up to the two of them, substantially the same question, namely: Suppose that 500,000 troops were to be sent by Russia in an armed attack against Norway 6 weeks after this treaty has gone into effect. Would you consider that there is any obligation under article 5 of this treaty for the United States to take immediately some action of a very pronounced military character, in view of that action?

Mr. TAFT. Well, Mr. Lovett said "No." His answer was that the President would have to consult Congress before there was a declaration of war. I think that is correct.

What I have said here—

Senator DONNELL. What did Mr. Acheson say?

The CHAIRMAN. Let him answer the question.

Mr. TAFT. What I said about that here is something which amplifies that a little bit. I cannot find the place, but it is a statement something like this, that I do not believe that such preparatory steps for a defense in depth as our military department might take would in any way prevent a complete discretion in the Congress when it was called in in such a situation, which goes a little bit further than what Mr. Lovett said, although I do not say it is inconsistent with it, necessarily.

As to Mr. Acheson, I am afraid I could not put my finger on what he had to say to that subject without going through his statement and taking too much time.

Senator DONNELL. Is it your opinion, Mr. Taft, that in the supposititious case that I mentioned, of the 500,000 troops being sent by Russia in an armed attack against Norway, if the Congress were not in session the President would have no power and no duty under this treaty to take immediate military steps of such nature as he deems proper in view of that contingency?

Mr. TAFT. I think the obligation on the President would be to call Congress into session at once.

Senator DONNELL. Suppose that it was obviously—

Mr. TAFT. And to take such steps as I have described, as the preparation for a defense in depth, which is the only kind of defense you could put on anyhow, so far as we are concerned.

Senator DONNELL. Suppose, for illustration, that a situation should develop such as did develop in the First World War, when the troops of Germany came across Belgium, and when every minute was of great importance. Suppose that the 500,000 troops should come into Norway, and that military advisers of the President should say to him, "Unless bombers are immediately sent from this country to reinforce the European bombers it is going to mean a million other troops will come in and Europe is going to be conquered subject only to the ultimate slow process of reliberation." Suppose Congress were not in session. Do you think the President would be powerless then, or without obligation, to act under the terms of this treaty, which says "forthwith"?

Mr. TAFT. I can only answer as I did before. I think the President's first obligation would be to call Congress into session, which would certainly not take over 2 days if that, and that in the meantime he would make all preparations so that he could begin to operate. I do not think that he would be obligated to send bombers at once, and I question your statement that sending bombers at once would stop an additional million from coming into Norway.

Senator DONNELL. I did not say it would. I said, if his military advisers advised him it was important and necessary to send them promptly in order to prevent further aggression, or words to that effect.

Mr. TAFT. I think he would call the Congress into session.

Senator DONNELL. That is your opinion as to what he would do. I am asking whether he would have power or authority to proceed to send the bombers on the exercise of his judgment as Commander in Chief without waiting for Congress to convene.

Mr. TAFT. That is a question of constitutional law in which I do not really find myself qualified to answer.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

May I ask you this question: In the first place, you are a lawyer and have practiced many years; have you not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, suppose an attack were made on New York City by 500,000 men and bombers, and the Congress was not in session. Would you say that the President could not take immediate steps by military action to defend New York City?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I think he could.

Senator DONNELL. Does it not say, under the terms of this treaty in article, that "the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all," which of course would include an attack against this country. Does it not say that?

Mr. TAFT. It says that; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Then, if the President would have the power in the case of New York, as I referred to it, would not have precisely the same power in the case of a sudden attack upon London to send bombers or take any other action he deemed proper before waiting for Congress to come back together? Would he not have that right, under the terms and obligations of the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. TAFT. He might conceivably. If he did, then he also has it under the terms of the Rio Treaty.

Senator DONNELL. He does? Well, let's see about that.

Mr. TAFT. That is my impression. I have not a copy of the Rio Treaty here. My impression was that the language was taken from that.

COMPARISON WITH RIO TREATY

Senator DONNELL. I am very glad you mentioned the Rio Treaty, because it involves a very important point. The Rio Treaty we will get in this book which is provided for us by the Foreign Relations Committee. The Rio Treaty is at page 20 of this little booklet which I now hold in my hand. I refer you to article 8. Would you like to have a copy of it before you, Mr. Taft?

Mr. TAFT. If you will read the parallel provision to that, that is all I need.

Senator DONNELL (reading):

For the purposes of this treaty, the measures on which the organ of consultation may agree will comprise one or more of the following: recall of chiefs of diplomatic missions; breaking of diplomatic relations; breaking of consular relations; partial or complete interruption of economic relations or of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and radiotelephonic or radiotelegraphic communications; and use of armed force.

That is article 8. Article 20 reads as follows:

Decisions which require the application of the measures specified in article 8 shall be binding upon all the signatory states which have ratified this treaty, with the sole exception that no state shall be required to use armed force without its consent.

Mr. TAFT. Yes. But, Senator, the comparable provision is not article 8, it is article 3, which has exactly the same language as article 5. It says:

The high contracting parties agree that an armed attack by any state against an American state shall be considered as an attack against all the American states and, consequently, each one of the said contracting parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations.

Senator DONNELL. Yes; it says that.

Mr. TAFT. Well, all right. Then I would say that the obligation under the Atlantic Pact in the case of an attack on any one of the American states of the kind that you are talking about would have exactly the same effect, and give the President exactly the same powers that he has under the Atlantic Pact. I do not see any difference whatsoever.

Senator DONNELL. With respect to the powers of the President, let us just pass that for the moment.

Mr. TAFT. That is what you are asking me about. You have gone off on to various other kinds of provisions. The thing that we were discussing is the power of the President to send bombers as soon as Norway is attacked. I am saying that he has exactly the same power under the Rio Pact, as soon as any American state is attacked, within the language of article 3.

Senator DONNELL. I think I did digress from the question I asked you, and I ask your pardon for so doing, and I shall come back to it.

Since you mentioned article 3 of the Rio Pact, which does contain the language:

The high contracting parties agree that an armed attack by any state against an American state shall be considered as an attack against all the American states, and consequently, each one of the said contracting parties undertakes to assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations—

I call your attention to the fact that when we get down to article 20 of the Rio Pact, which refers to article 8, which contains all of these different items that I have mentioned to you, including the use of armed force, the Rio Pact contains something that is not in the North Atlantic Treaty, namely—

Decisions which require the application of the measures specified in article 8 shall be binding upon all the signatory states which have ratified this treaty, with the sole exception that no state shall be required to use armed force without its consent.

Do you find any provision reading as that in the North Atlantic Treaty?

PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

Mr. TAFT. No; I do not; but I do not think that changes the situation at all. I think the power of the President to order bombers to meet an attack on Norway is a power which exists or does not exist under the Constitution of the United States, as covering a case where the United States is attacked. There has been a long argument about that. In general, I would say the conclusion is that the President does have such power.

Senator DONNELL. Very well.

Mr. TAFT. Certainly he has exercised it in certain instances without having had a declaration of war by the Congress.

I still say that the President's first obligation is to call the Congress together, and if he feels that the situation is so exactly comparable to an actual attack on the city of New York I think that he might order the bombers. He would do it under either pact, under the Rio Pact or under the North Atlantic Treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, I am pleased that you called me back to the question of the President's powers, and you have explained your point there, and very clearly. I want to ask you, if he has the power to order bombers to protect New York, would he not likewise have the power as Commander in Chief of this Nation, under a treaty which says that an armed attack against any of them, in Europe or North America, shall be considered as an attack against them all, would he not have the same power independently of congressional prior action in respect to the Norway or London situations as he would have in respect to New York?

Mr. TAFT. He might, and you are drawing the difference between the North Atlantic Pact and the Rio Pact by referring to article 20. I do not think that that makes any difference whatsoever, because under article 20 the language is "without its consent," and that gets you back simply to an interpretation of the Constitution as to what is its consent, whether it requires the approval of the Congress of the United States to declare war, or whether it is something which is within the implied power of the President.

Senator DONNELL. I think you are precisely correct.

Mr. TAFT. So that the difference in language between the two does not help you out a bit.

Senator DONNELL. I think you are precisely correct and I think you have properly answered the question with respect to the President in connection with the two documents, the Rio Pact and the North Atlantic Treaty.

But may I ask you this question? Under the North Atlantic Treaty there is a provision outright that the parties agree that an armed attack against any one or more of them shall be considered an attack against them all, and in the exercise of the right of self-defense that each of them will individually, and in concert with the other parties, take forthwith such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force.

DIFFERENCE OF OBLIGATIONS UNDER RIO AND ATLANTIC TREATIES

Now, the point to which I address myself has nothing to do with the President at all. It goes back to the comparative obligations of the United States as a country under the two instruments, and I want to ask you this: Is there not an entire difference of obligation under the two instruments as regards the obligation of the nation in this respect, that whereas article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty obligates this Nation forthwith individually and in concert with the other parties to take such action as it deems necessary, which Mr. Acheson concedes does not mean any arbitrary decision but what we honestly and genuinely believe necessary, there is no restriction or provision that we are released from the obligation to use armed force; whereas in the Rio Treaty, in article 20, referring as I have just done to the decisions which require the applications of the measures specified in article 8, one of which is the use of armed force, it expressly says that while those decisions are binding upon all the signatory states, there is "the sole exception that no state shall be required to use armed force without its consent."

There is a great difference in obligation under the two treaties in that respect.

Mr. TAFT. No, sir; I do not agree with you at all. Article 20 refers to article 8, which is the measures on which the organ of consultation may agree, which is not necessarily a direct implementation of article 3; and in the second place, you are assuming that the provision "No state shall be required to use armed force without its consent" means that the consent can only be given by the Congress.

I just said a moment ago that that is not my interpretation, that there may well be situations in which the consent may well be given by the President, because of the urgency of the situation.

Senator DONNELL. You agree that article 8, referring to measures on which the organ of consultation may agree, includes "use of armed force"?

Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Senator DONNELL. And under article 3 of the Rio Pact, which is the article from which you have quoted, the statement in the agreement that "an armed attack by any state against an American state shall be considered as an attack against all the American states" contains in section 2 thereof this language:

The organ of consultation shall meet without delay for the purpose of examining those measures and agreeing upon the measures of a collective character that should be taken.

Mr. TAFT. That is correct, but that refers to measures of a collective character, and not to those which any individual nation might take on its own, so that I would say that section 1 of article 3 of the Rio Treaty could be implemented without having the organ of consultation meet.

Senator DONNELL. So you do not think the measures mentioned in article 8 include the measures referred to in article 3 of the Rio Pact?

Mr. TAFT. They may or may not. I am saying they do not necessarily include the measures under paragraph 1 of article 3.

Senator DONNELL. They certainly do, do they not, Mr. Taft, include both the measures under article 3 of the Rio Pact and possibly some other measures not contained in article 3?

Mr. TAFT. Not necessarily. The action under paragraph 1 might be taken before the organ of consultation met at all, in which case article 8 and article 20 do not apply.

LIMITATIONS ON OBLIGATION UNDER RIO AND ATLANTIC TREATIES

Senator DONNELL. I do not want to argue this indefinitely and I shall not, but I shall observe that, of course, while I only read the concluding sentence of subdivision 2 of article 3, there is a provision in the first sentence that—

On the request of the state or states directly attacked and until the decision of the organ of consultation of the Inter-American system, each one of the contracting parties may determine the immediate measures which it may individually take in fulfillment of the obligation contained in the preceding paragraph and in accordance with the principle of continental solidarity—and then follows the sentence which provides an obligation on the organ of consultation to meet without delay for the purpose of examining those measures and agreeing upon the measures of a collective character that should be taken; and then article 8 refers to the measures on which the organ of consultation may agree. Certainly that would include those in article 3.

Then it refers to the use of armed force as among those, and then in article 20 excepts from the decisions which are binding upon all the signatory states "the sole exception that no state shall be required to use armed force without its consent."

There is no such statement in the Atlantic Treaty as this statement in article 20 of the Rio Pact, "the sole exception that no state shall be required to use armed force without its consent," is there?

Mr. TAFT. I agree that there is no such statement. I do not agree that the obligation undertaken is any different in character for that reason.

Senator VANDENBERG. Will the Senator yield?

Senator DONNELL. Certainly.

Senator VANDENBERG. I do not want to prolong the argument, but merely for the Senator's subsequent consideration I suggest to him that the organ of consultation under the Rio Pact has affirmative power, whereas the organ of consultation under the North Atlantic Pact has no affirmative power whatever.

Senator DONNELL. I agree thoroughly with the Senator, but the point I am making is that the Rio Pact excepts specifically the requirement that any one of the signatories shall be required to use armed force without its consent.

Mr. TAFT. Under article 8, Senator, it may not apply, therefore, to paragraph 1 of article 3:

Senator DONNELL. I can not bring myself to agree with that. I shall not go through that course of reasoning again, but obviously article 8 refers and specifies, "the measures on which the organ of consultation may agree," and article 3, subdivision 2 thereof says:

The organ of consultation shall meet without delay for the purpose of examining those measures and agreeing upon the measures of a collective character that should be taken.

So it would appear to me perfectly clear that there is an exception in the Rio Pact of the obligation of a state signatory to use armed force; namely, that it does not have to do so without its consent, and I find nothing to that effect in the North Atlantic Treaty.

Mr. TAFT. Even in that case the consent in my judgment in some circumstances could perhaps be given by the President of the United States.

Senator DONNELL. That is entirely possible, and I thoroughly agree with you, and that is the point I was trying to get you to give us your idea on a little while ago, about the New York, London, and Norway cases. I think the President can. I think when we sign this treaty and agree, as we have here, that an armed attack against Norway is to be considered an armed attack against us, that the President does not have to wait until Congress is convened, but can send the number of bombers he thinks proper to Europe, waiting in advance of the coming of Congress, and I think further that the practical effect of the situation would be that Congress would have no alternative except to declare war under circumstances where the President himself had either involved us or been involved in an actual state of war.

ALSOPI ARTICLE IN SATURDAY EVENING POST

Now, Mr. Taft, I do not want to take more of your time or that of the committee except to ask you this: You referred to the Alsop article in the Saturday Evening Post, did you not?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall the date of that article?

Mr. TAFT. I think it is last week. That would be last Saturday's date, Senator.

Senator DONNELL. I am glad you told me that. I had not seen that one. In fact, I hadn't seen the one which I think was earlier, several weeks ago, but I am informed that the Alsop brothers published an article in the Saturday Evening Post, which I think was several weeks ago, outlining consideration of the proposed military features of the treaty, and my understanding is this. It has been given to me, and I think the gentleman who caused it to be given to me was referring to the Alsop brothers' article:

The plan is to organize 40 to 60 allied divisions along the Rhine for the purpose of slowing down, absorbing the shock, and eventually, after being reinforced, assuming the offensive should the Red Army attack.

Is that the Alsop article?

Mr. TAFT. Not in the one to which I am referring.

Senator DONNELL. Have you seen the earlier article by the Alsop brothers?

Mr. TAFT. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Taft, I want to thank you very much for your kindness and your courtesy, and also the committee for permitting me to examine you.

LIMITATION ON OBLIGATION UNDER THE ATLANTIC PACT

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator from Missouri stresses the fact that in the Rio Pact there is a provision that no country shall be forced to take military action without its consent, and he tries to distinguish that from the present treaty. While here is no explicit language in the present treaty like that in the Rio Pact, there is language in the present treaty, however, that each nation is to be the judge of what action it is necessary take under the treaty, in view of whatever action might be taken by other countries. Is that not true?

Mr. TAFT. Yes, sir; that is correct, and my statement therefore that the obligation undertaken by the North Atlantic Treaty is no greater than the Rio Treaty was based on that assumption, that the constitutional methods of giving consent, whatever they may be, are called for before any action is taken under the North Atlantic Treaty, just as much as they are under the Rio Treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. Any further questions, Senator?

Senator VANDENBERG. I want to add this further supplement on that point, that in my opinion the obligation at this point under the Atlantic Pact is less than it is under the Rio Pact, because the consultative body under the Rio Pact can order action up to the point of the use of armed force and make you submit to it, whereas, the consultative organ under the North Atlantic Pact cannot make you submit to anything.

Mr. TAFT. I would not doubt that, Senator. My statement was, of course, in reverse, that the obligation is no greater than that under the Rio Treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Taft, the committee wants to thank you very sincerely for your valuable contribution. Your background and experience in government are such that your views and opinions, at least with the committee if not with all of the visitors, are very persuasive and very splendid, and a fine exposition of the treaty.

Mr. TAFT. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The session will be in recess until 2:30.

(Whereupon at 12:30 p. m., a recess was taken until 2:30 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. The committee wants to notify those who may desire to appear that it will not consider any applications to appear filed later than next Tuesday morning by 10:30 o'clock. I say that for the information of any who desire to testify.

This is the Committee on Foreign Relations, holding hearings on the North Atlantic Pact. We are very fortunate today to have present with us former Justice Owen J. Roberts, of the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Justice Roberts has taken a great deal of interest in international affairs in behalf of peace, conciliation, arbitration, and all the other methods toward maintaining and preserving peace.

The committee is very glad indeed to have you here, Mr. Justice Roberts, and welcomes your advice and counsel and suggestions.

STATEMENT OF HON. OWEN J. ROBERTS, PRESIDENT OF THE ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I have a very brief statement that I would like to give you in support of the North Atlantic Pact.

The board of directors of the Atlantic Union Committee, of which I am president, has wholeheartedly and unanimously voted to support ratification of the Atlantic Pact. I consider it of top priority for those who support the pact to make their convictions known to you. Accordingly, I have brought with me statements in support of the pact, which I have received in correspondence from leaders in a cross section of American communities.

STATEMENTS ON BEHALF OF ATLANTIC PACT

These statements come from author Margaret Culkin Banning; radio commentator H. R. Baukhage; Harry R. Bullis, president of General Mills; Curtis E. Calder, chairman of the board of the Electric Bond & Share Co.; A. G. Cameron, vice president of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Export Co.; Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.; foreign correspondent Louis Fischer; Dr. Arthur H. Compton, Nobel prize winner; Rabbi Norman Gerstenfeld, of Washington; Hon. Clare Booth Luce; Dr. Fritz Machlup, professor of political economy at Johns Hopkins University; Dr. James A. McCain, president of Montana State University; Dr. Robert Millikan, Nobel prize winning physicist; and Thomas J. Watson, Jr., president of the International Business Machines Corp., and I could add a score, indeed a hundred more statements that I have received in correspondence about this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those statements that you just mentioned very long?

Mr. ROBERTS. I have made very short excerpts of them. I have copies of those.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, they will be incorporated in the record.

(The information is as follows:)

"The Atlantic Pact provides the best supplementary method we have for temporarily protecting the free nations."—H. R. Baukhage, radio commentator.

"All Americans who wish to work for peace have a chance personally to be useful by urging ratification of this pact. It is the only way to give the world time to perfect an organization strong enough to maintain peace."—Margaret Culkin Banning, author.

"The preservation of peace requires positive action. The recognition of this fact is the reason for the Atlantic Pact. The wisdom of taking this step can be summarized in the old saying, 'A stitch in time saves nine.' And time is of the essence."—Harry A. Bullis, chairman of the board, General Mills.

"In recent years we have all seen the necessity for those who believe in the preservation of independence and freedom to stand together. I understand that your committee supports a Federal Union of the Atlantic Democracies, and urges ratification of the Atlantic Pact. I strongly support these purposes. My prayers go with this endorsement."—Curtis E. Calder, chairman, Electric Bond & Share Co.

"I should like to add my endorsement of the Atlantic Pact and encourage your committee to use every effort to convince Members of the Senate of the importance of having the pact overwhelmingly ratified."—A. G. Cameron, vice president, Goodyear Tire & Rubber Export Co.

"Anyone with the best interests of a free America, a free West and eventually a free world, must enthusiastically work for the passage of the North Atlantic Pact."—Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.

"I want to join you in endorsing ratification of the North Atlantic Defense Pact."—Louis Fischer, foreign correspondent.

"Events have shown that to forestall war, we must make clear united determination to resist further forcible encroachment on the self-government of democratic peoples. This is why I am for the Atlantic Pact."—Dr. Arthur Compton.

"The Atlantic Pact is the first step toward a union of free nations for which free men pray. If we drift and fail to ratify the pact in time, we will be engulfed by tyranny. It is for such a time as this that God has given us our strength."—Rabbi Norman Gerstenfeld, Washington, D. C.

"The Atlantic Pact is an anchor for peace and a shield against war."—Clare Booth Luce.

"The Atlantic Pact is one of the most important steps taken for the preservation of peace and order in the world. Opposition to the pact is either due to misunderstandings or to a system of values not shared by, and probably inimical to the American people."—Fritz Machlup, professor of political economy, Johns Hopkins University.

"The Atlantic Pact is not only an urgent security measure, but also a momentous stride toward world government."—Dr. James A. McCain, president, Montana State University.

"The only hope of peace lies in such implementation of the principle of collective security as is supplied by the Atlantic Pact."—Dr. Robert A. Millikan.

"I consider ratification of the North Atlantic Treaty essential for the freedom and security of our own Nation and that of our neighbors of the Atlantic community."—Thomas J. Watson, International Business Machines.

SOURCES OF OPPOSITION TO THE TREATY

Mr. ROBERTS. Opposition to the pact, though I think weak numerically, makes up in lung power what it lacks in strength. Four groups oppose it: Well-meaning but impractical pacifists, pseudo liberals, rabid isolationists, and, of course, the Communist Party, with its assorted fronts. These groups are loudly complaining that the Atlantic Pact will divide the world into two hostile camps, which will lead to war.

WORLD DIVISION

Nothing could be further from the truth. The truth is that whenever the democracies have been afraid to acknowledge the fundamental division between dictatorship and democracy, the delay has permitted the dictators to pick off the democracies one by one, just as Hitler did.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

The lives lost in two world wars of our century might have been saved if Germany and Japan had known in advance that they would meet with united resistance. The road to world unity is not through appeasement of tyranny, but rather through strengthening democracy. The North Atlantic Defense Pact is an essential emergency measure to prevent an attack by Soviet Russia.

A fortnight ago I made a similar statement to the American people in an open letter. This letter was printed in some of the great newspapers of the country. It was also attacked in the New York Daily Worker for April 22 as a "letter composed of lies and hate propaganda."

The Communists in this country, in Russia and in Europe, know the truth as well as we do, gentlemen. They are aware that the North Atlantic Defense Pact puts a damper on Soviet aggression. How they must welcome the support of those who are either too stubborn or too short-sighted to have learned the lesson taught by two world wars in 25 years.

That lesson is that there is no such thing as freedom for me and not for you; safety for our national institutions and not for the institutions of other freedom-loving nations. In short, there is no security except collective security, and collective security requires collective action.

These, gentlemen, are the hard facts of international life. The stork does not bring peace. Peace is born of positive union of those determined to prevent war.

ATLANTIC UNION

That is why the Atlantic Union Committee proposes that, after the ratification of the Atlantic Pact, the President of the United States invite pact sponsors to a federal convention. Our committee hopes that such a convention would discuss federal union of the Atlantic democracies as a means of making the Atlantic Pact work to the full.

Atlantic Union would bring great economic and military advantages, savings in defense costs hand in hand with increased military protection. The political and social advantages would include strengthening of the United Nations, and encouragement to other nations to develop representative forms of government, and to protect individual liberty by law. The concept of such a federal union of Atlantic democracies can, however, become a practical reality only if the Atlantic Pact is ratified.

I ask you, then, to consider the fact that delay in ratification of this pact will encourage Russia and will discourage those nations that are resisting aggression. Delay will devalue American leadership and damage our prestige throughout the world. It will stop the clock of history.

I urge you, gentlemen, to go forward with the ratification of the Atlantic Pact now, and then to move on to consideration of Atlantic Union as a practical means of permanently securing the benefits which the Atlantic Pact will confer upon us and upon our sister democracies.

STEPS TOWARD ATLANTIC UNION

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. I only want to make this comment without passing upon the merits of a broadened Federal union in this area.

I know the great devotion that Mr. Justice Roberts has to this concept, and I simply want to say for myself, I think we are all greatly indebted to him for the broad-mindedness and long-range wisdom with which he has subordinated the federal union concept to the immediate necessity of action on the Atlantic Pact.

Mr. ROBERTS. Senator, I just feel that this is one step in a long process, and I think you do. We started with the United Nations, the British loan, the international fund, the Greek policy, the Marshall plan. Now this comes next. Each one of them has been an effort on the part of freedom-loving nations to come closer together, and each one has evidenced a world-mindedness on the part of the American people that I think is unparalleled in history, because it is not mere grimy dollars and cents, and it is not mere economic benefit that we are after.

We have shuddered at the thought that free men who have the same traditions that we have, and live to an extent under a representative government such as we cherish, should be blotted out from the earth. We have taken one step after another, if we can, to prevent that thing, and to let freedom live in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. I believe I have no questions except to thank the Justice for coming down here and talking to us. I concur, of course, in the statement made by Senator Vandenberg.

The CHAIRMAN. I will say, Mr. Justice Roberts, that I have great admiration for your devotion to these principles, and to your labors over a long period of years. While I regret very much to see you leave the Supreme Court, I think you have been actively engaged in a matter that is equally important to your service on the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am facing the sunset, but if I could go down the hill to the sunset, feeling reasonably sure that order, under law, that preservation of individual liberty against aggression, was on its way to accomplishment in this world, I would face the sunset with a happy smile.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. That is a very beautiful statement. I want to ask you just one or two brief questions: Is there anything in the pact that we have before us that suggests any offensive or hostile action contrary to these efforts that we have been making to secure peace and harmony?

Mr. ROBERTS. On the contrary; on the contrary. Anybody who knows anything knows that the people who are parties to this pact want merely to live in peace and to develop their own way of life, and that is all the pact purports to do, to protect them jointly against aggression, and against the destruction of their way of life.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Justice Roberts, we have with us Senator Donnell, of Missouri, and Senator Watkins, of Utah. They are here by the agreement with the committee, and by our courtesy. They are being permitted to ask questions, so if you are willing—

Mr. ROBERTS. May I say a word to Senator Donnell in advance. I think you asked Mr. Clayton something about the personnel of our committee.

Senator DONNELL. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have a sheet here which was printed about 10 days ago, which has the names of the persons who have joined the council. They are a sort of board of advisers, or sponsors. That is not complete, Senator. There are perhaps 50 names that have been added since, of Nation-wide reputation.

Senator DONNELL. May I proceed, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you very much, Mr. Justice Roberts. I appreciate this information and am pleased to have it. May I ask, Mr. Chairman, that this document be included in the record at this point, though I would like to hold it in my possession for a few minutes.

(The list of names is as follows:)

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice Roberts, I want to join with these other gentlemen in expressing appreciation of your being here today and also of your great public service with which we are all familiar. Mr. ROBERTS. Thank you.

MEMBERSHIP IN THE ATLANTIC UNION

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice Roberts, would you tell us, please, whether or not the purpose of the Atlantic Committee is, as expressed on this sheet that you have handed me "For a federal convention of democracies"?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Do you consider that Portugal is a democracy?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. It is one of the signers of the North Atlantic Treaty, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Are there any other signers to the treaty that are not democracies?

Mr. ROBERTS. I would think not.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know why Portugal was included as one of the signatories to the treaty?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not, sir. Our plan is to ask those who brought about the pact to call the convention and to first participate, and then invite any others that they deem democracies, who could come in and join with them. That might leave Portugal out of that convention.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice Roberts, the membership of the Atlantic Union Committee—this sheet which you have handed me—

MEMBERSHIP OF THE ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE

Mr. ROBERTS. That is not a membership. That is a membership of the sponsors.

Senator DONNELL. I wanted to ask you about the membership. I asked Mr. Clayton about it the other day, and he was not able to give us very accurately, as he very frankly stated, the number of members, and the geographical distribution.

Mr. ROBERTS. The committee was organized about 8 weeks ago. The first thing we desired to do was to get a list of sponsors, or council, and we have communed with, I should think, 300 or 350 people, asking if they cared to become such.

Their are about 150 who have so signified. We have not started to create memberships, except that we know that in communities all over the United States there are large groups of people who have been for this idea and have been agitating for it. Those will be asked to become members of this organization, and we hope to have hundreds of thousands of them.

Senator DONNELL. So up to the present time, then, the organization of the Atlantic Union Committee has progressed only to the extent of the officers, directors, and council of the organization?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. And the council consists of about 150?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. And the officers, I would judge—

Mr. ROBERTS. Ten or a dozen.

Senator DONNELL. The board of directors is listed also on this sheet that you have very kindly given to me.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. May I ask you, Mr. Justice, whether the board of directors is substantially all, if not entirely all, with the exception of Mr. William L. White, located east of the Mississippi River?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. Mr. Orgill is on the Mississippi at Memphis, Mr. Bissantz is at San Francisco.

Senator DONNELL. I think Mr. Cowles is of Des Moines, Iowa.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Elmo Roper is in Connecticut.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Earl E. Hart of Washington?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Agar, of Arizona, is that Mr. Agar formerly of Memphis, in the newspaper business?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. Herbert Agar, the writer-lecturer.

Senator DONNELL. Has he moved to Arizona?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir. He is a resident of Arizona.

Senator DONNELL. There are others that I did not observe at first glance. Mr. Bissantz.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, he is an architect at San Francisco.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Cowles, Dr. Davies of Washington, Mr. Flower of New York City, Mr. Moore, Easton, Pa., Mr. Orgill, Mr. Scherman, Mr. Streit, Washington, Mr. Urey, of Chicago, a Mr. William L. White, the son of William L. White.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, he is well known in his own right.

Senator DONNELL. And John Young of Connecticut.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

ENDORSEMENT OF PACT BY ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE

Senator DONNELL. You say in the opening of your statement that the board of directors, which consists of these gentlemen, has wholeheartedly and unanimously voted to support ratification of the Atlantic Pact?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Did the board of directors come together, meet, and discuss this matter?

Mr. ROBERTS. Absolutely.

Senator DONNELL. When was that meeting?

Mr. ROBERTS. At least 6 weeks ago.

Senator DONNELL. Was there a copy of the pact at that time before the meeting?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Was it before—

Mr. ROBERTS. No; it was just before the pact, but it was when the general lines of the pact had been disclosed.

Senator DONNELL. It was before the signature of the pact?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Was it before the official announcement of the contents of the pact had been made?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think not. Just afterwards.

Senator DONNELL. But there was no copy of the pact present at the meeting, so far as you know?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think there was.

FAMILIARITY OF ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE WITH PACT

Senator DONNELL. Was it read to the members present?

Mr. ROBERTS. They were all familiar with it, or said they were.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall whether or not any of them, as did Mr. Clayton, who was here the other day, one of the vice presidents of this organization, state that they had not read a word of it?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think so.

Senator DONNELL. Was Mr. Clayton there also, in attendance at that meeting?

Mr. ROBERTS. He either was or afterwards gave his written assent to what was done. I think he was present.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Clayton testified the other day that he had not read any of this pact, up to the time he testified, that he had not read any of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Clayton testified that he had read a number of articles, that they were discussing it, discussing various portions of it, and read all the newspaper reports. He said he had not read the actual text as it was signed by the signatories.

Senator DONNELL. I think that is precisely what he said, at least in substance. In other words, he had read the newspapers, perhaps the magazines, commentaries, but has never read the treaty, in advocacy of which he appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate. You say he was either at this meeting of the board of directors or joined in its action?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall whether or not a copy of the treaty was read before the board of directors?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think not. I think it was not read in extenso.

Senator DONNELL. Was any part read before the meeting of the board of directors?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think it may have been.

Senator DONNELL. Was it?

Mr. ROBERTS. It is my recollection.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall who read it?

Mr. ROBERTS. I read portions of it.

Senator DONNELL. You had a copy of it at that time?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Was that one of the official copies issued by the Secretary of State or some prior newspaper draft of it?

Mr. ROBERTS. It may have been the one that appeared in the New York Times.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice, the Union Committee, the Atlantic Union Committee, therefore, is not created primarily for the purpose of advocacy of the North Atlantic Treaty as you have observed.

Mr. ROBERTS. Our desire is to go farther, but we think the pact is under all circumstances an essential step to anything more we desire.

CONSTITUTION OF ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE

Senator DONNELL. Does this Atlantic Union Committee have a constitution or other declaration of principles?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Did you bring a copy of it with you today?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Would you be kind enough, if the chairman consents—

Mr. ROBERTS. I would be glad to send you a copy.

Senator DONNELL. And would you furnish a copy for the record?

Mr. ROBERTS. I would be very glad to.

Senator DONNELL. May that go into the record?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not a large document?

Mr. ROBERTS. No. The resolution of purpose would go into 15 lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that will be incorporated in the record.

(The resolution is as follows:)

Resolved, That an action committee be formed for the purpose of—

(a) enlisting public support for a resolution to be introduced in Congress inviting the other democracies, with whom the United States is forming an alliance, to meet American delegates in a federal convention to explore possibilities of uniting in a Federal Union of the Free; and

(b) continuing this support until such a Federal Union of democracies becomes an accomplished fact.

STATEMENTS ON ATLANTIC TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice, you speak of having brought with you today—and I understand you filed, I believe—statements from a number of persons listed in your mimeographed statements.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Did those statements come as a result of a written request, and in response to that?

Mr. ROBERTS. A request as to their point of view on this pact; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you have with you a copy of that request?

Mr. ROBERTS. I will get one. I do not have it.

Senator DONNELL. Will you supply it?

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly.

Senator DONNELL. May that also go in the record, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. It may.

[Wire]

The Atlantic Union Committee was organized to develop support for a Federal Union of the Atlantic Democracies within the framework of the United Nations Charter.

We consider ratification of the Atlantic Pact urgently necessary for the preservation of the independence and freedom of the United States and other countries involved. We invite you to join us and others as sponsors of this pact.

Soviet Russia is using every means to block ratification. Powerful American newspapers are attacking the pact. Some Senators are wobbling.

This pact must be overwhelmingly ratified by the Senate. Soviet Russia must know that not only the governments, but the peoples of free nations, are united in determination to defend their independence and freedom.

If you are willing to add your strength to ours in this great effort, please wire or write us a brief, strong statement supporting the Atlantic Pact. Address 537 Fifth Avenue.

ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE FOR A FEDERAL CONVENTION OF DEMOCRACIES.

OWEN J. ROBERTS.

WILL L. CLAYTON.

ROBERT P. PATTERSON.

Senator DONNELL. To how many persons was that request sent?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think 50.

Senator DONNELL. And you received replies from approximately how many?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think 40 or so. I did not list them all here. I just took the most significant statements out of them.

Senator DONNELL. How was the list prepared; how was it determined?

Mr. ROBERTS. We just picked out prominent people who we knew were interested in the cause of peace.

Senator DONNELL. Did you pick out Professor Nichols, of Columbia University?

Mr. ROBERTS. I could not say.

Senator DONNELL. Do you have a statement from him?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not.

Senator DONNELL. I notice he participated in the town hall meeting the other night. I did not hear him. I gather from the context of the notice he was to appear in opposition to it.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know.

Senator DONNELL. Did you send a request to Mr. Paul Warburg?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think not.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know that he is opposed to the pact? Or, at least, that is my impression.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know that.

Senator DONNELL. I may be in error in that. I am just inferring that from observations that I have seen made, and I want to be quick to say that I do not know.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know, either. I think Mr. Warburg has recently been advocating some amendment to the United Nations Charter.

Senator DONNELL. That is entirely possible. Was a copy of the request sent to Professor Borchard, of Yale Law School?

Mr. ROBERTS. I could not say.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know what the position of Professor Borchard, of Yale Law School, is?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. He has been quite ill. Did you know that?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know him?

Mr. ROBERTS. No.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know he is a man of high standing?

Mr. ROBERTS. I suppose so.

Senator DONNELL. Would it be violative, do you think, of the proprieties if I might ask you to give us a list of the entire 50 persons to whom it was addressed?

Mr. ROBERTS. I shall see if I can find it. If I can, you shall have it.

Senator DONNELL. May it be inserted in the record of this proceeding?

The CHAIRMAN. If the Justice desires that it be inserted.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have no desire. I do not mean to conceal anything that is of value here.

Senator DONNELL. I am sure you do not. We appreciate—and I am sure I do, as the others do—your courtesy in this regard.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think our proceeding was exactly as yours would have been under the circumstances. We took prominent people that we knew had been interested in the cause of peace, wrote them and asked them how they stood on this pact, and if they thought it ought to be ratified, would they express themselves on it. Some did and some did not.

Senator DONNELL. I notice that your council, which is in the process of formation, includes considerably more than 50 persons.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. How many?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think 150.

Senator DONNELL. Here is Mr. Chester C. Davis, Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank, was, and perhaps still is.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall whether you addressed a request to him?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think not. I think we should have had an expression. I may have an expression from him, which may not be as significant as the rest.

Senator DONNELL. He may be in favor of it?

Mr. ROBERTS. I feel sure he is.

Senator DONNELL. Why was it that the request was not sent to the entire 150?

Mr. ROBERTS. It was sent to the people all over the country, not to members of our organization at all. It was not intended to be limited. There are a number of names here who are not on our council, not in our organization, and who I do not think are for the Federal idea that we are, but they are for the pact.

Senator DONNELL. I did not observe the fact that—

Mr. ROBERTS. They are not the same as our council at all.

Senator DONNELL. I appreciate your telling me that. Margaret Cushman Banning, author. Do you know how you happened to include her in the list of persons to whom—

Mr. ROBERTS. She has been very much interested, to my knowledge, in the peace moves.

Senator DONNELL. I observe you have a very distinguished gentleman from my home city, of whom we are very proud, a good friend of mine, Dr. Arthur H. Compton, Nobel prize winner, and his letter I assume is among those placed on file.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. He happens to be a member of our council also.

Senator DONNELL. I see. I had not observed that.

OPPOSITION TO THE TREATY

Mr. Justice Roberts, in your statement, which I have here, you state that opposition to the pact, "weak numerically, make up in lung power what it lacks in strength," and you say "Four groups oppose it—well-meaning, but impractical pacifists, pseudoliberals, rabid isolationists, and of course the Communist Party with its assorted fronts."

Do you mean to say that that is an exclusive list, that there is no one else besides those four groups?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think there may be others. I took four large classes that I thought—

Senator DONNELL. I wonder within which group I should fall.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think that is a matter of choice for you, Senator, if you fall in any.

Senator DONNELL. I certainly am not a pacifist. I would not classify myself as a Communist, or as a pseudoliberal, and I certainly am not a rabid isolationist, although I was against the League of Nations, I was the chairman of the St. Louis World Court Committee, advocated, I think, in this very room, before the United States Senate Foreign Relations Committee, our hearings for it, voted for all these measures, except the original ERP, and I was back in Missouri detained for a day at the time, on account of my mother's death.

Mr. ROBERTS. If you do not fit in these boxes then I will have to classify you as a maverick.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. There are people, are there not, Mr. Justice, that are not what you might term extremists, but are conscientiously, sincerely, doubtful of the advisability of going into this agreement. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Senator, really, I do not want to be unfair, but it is hard for me to understand a thoughtful appraisal that leads you to think that this pact does something to change our position in the world. I think our position—and with great submission, I think your position, as mine—would be exactly what it is toward aggression that would destroy our democratic friends in western Europe, whether we signed this pact or not.

Senator DONNELL. I appreciate—

Mr. ROBERTS. That is what I think. I think that without this pact you and I would both exhort the American people to do whatever, and to use whatever force was necessary to prevent France or Great Britain from being ground to powder. I think we would, treaty or no treaty.

Would we stand for a free people being obliterated by vicious aggression? We would not, would we? I do not think this pact says any more than that, that we would not stand for that and we say we will determine what we will do if such a thing starts. That is what the pact comes to.

SINCERITY OF OPPOSITION

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice, I certainly do not, in the slightest, mean to question the very fine integrity and sound honesty of your position. You served with great distinction on the Supreme Court of the United States. It is frequently true, is it not, or if I may withdraw the term "frequently," it is sometimes true that the Supreme Court divides sharply and one group believes just as earnestly, just as sincerely, as the other, in a position diametrically to that taken by the other. Is that true?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Yesterday, we had on the floor of the Senate consideration of the Everson case involving this matter of bus transportation, in which the Court split 5 to 4. I would take it that you immediately would agree that it is entirely possible, and from your experience on the Court, for men and women, too, of fine discrimination and fine honesty, to divide sharply as a matter of honest division of opinion. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly.

Senator DONNELL. Therefore, Mr. Justice, even though you cannot see the other side of this matter, I am sure that you will immediately concede that perfectly honest persons, and not necessarily extremists, may take a contrary view, and may have some, what they consider honestly to be a basis for their opinion. Will you concede that?

NEED FOR THE TREATY

Mr. ROBERTS. My difficulty, Senator, is the one that I just stated. I believe that the overwhelming sentiment of patriotic and broad-minded people in this country is that we cannot allow the free nations, who are our friends and allies and natural collaborators, to be snuffed out by aggression.

Now, as I understand, the opposition to this treaty is that those who oppose it say, "But we want to decide, when the time comes, whether we will come to the aid of one of these nations on whom aggression is practiced." Both times we came in almost too late, and both times we were forced in at a cost that was simply frightful in blood and treasure and economic status.

If the people of Europe felt perfectly sure that we would come in more promptly another time, that we would not allow the degradation to go as far as it went in Europe before we woke up and came in, we would not need any treaty. This treaty, in my judgment, will guarantee the peace, simply because these people want an assurance that we will lay our hands on our heart as a Nation and say we mean what we say, that we will not see them destroyed, and, by George, we will not stand by and see them destroyed.

Secondly, Russia will not become an aggressor against these democratic friends of ours if she believes we mean it. But as long as we say we will not say so, we will reserve the right to say so until the fire starts, I think you are perpetuating a frightfully dangerous position because you are encouraging the same kind of psychology that Germany indulged in in the First World War.

She thought she could even sink our battleships and we would be too pusillanimous to come along; she thought she could go the ultimate, that we were a bunch of cowards. The way to preserve peace is to have the people of Europe, whether they are our possible enemies, understand our position. Make it plain. That is what this treaty tries to do in my mind. It makes it plain that we cannot contemplate the destruction of these free nations, and we will not contemplate it, without concern, and we will do what we deem necessary to prevent it.

That kind of an assurance is to my mind the greatest guaranty of peace there can be in the world. If Adolph Hitler had known that the moment he crossed the French frontier he would be at war with the United States, we would never have had the Second World War. At least we would not have had it at the time it occurred. I am as sure of that as I am that I sit here.

EFFECT OF TREATY ON POSSIBLE AGGRESSOR

Senator DONNELL. Justice Roberts, as was mentioned by one of the gentlemen, I believe Senator Watkins, a few days ago, there are fanatics, and persons like Hitler, with some insane idea of world conquest, that perhaps could not be deterred by any treaty or any action. You agree with that, do you not?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not agree that Hitler was that kind of fanatic. Hitler calculated his chances with great astuteness, in my judgment. We would never have had the Second World War if England had stood up and prevented his taking over the Rhineland without a fight. He did not think it would happen. He was scared to death and got away with it by bluff.

Senator DONNELL. You refer to the First and Second World Wars. Do you not think that Russia—to mention a specific nation—realizing that this Nation poured her treasure without any contractual obligations preceding them at all to do so, poured her treasure of men and women and matériel into those two wars, went in for the defense of humanity, do you not think that Russia would realize that this country, without any contractual obligation, if this country at the time thought that the interests of humanity demanded it, would go to war, regardless of the existence of any treaty or not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Maybe Russia would figure that we would get our feet under use and get in as late as we did in the Second World War, and it was nearly after the clock struck 12.

Senator DONNELL. But we did get in.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes; but we did get in, at a frightful cost, and almost too late.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice—

Mr. ROBERTS. If Hitler had known what we know now, we would have been in too late. England would have gone before we got in.

Senator DONNELL. Of course, Mr. Justice, I take it we would agree, that whether or not Hitler would have been deterred is a matter as to which there is no actual proof. It is purely a matter of opinion. Your opinion may be right. It is possible that there might be error in it. We would agree to that, would we not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. I have been wrong before.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice Roberts, I hope you will not feel this is in any sense either an impudent or mean question. I do not mean that at all.

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly not.

Senator DONNELL. I claim to be a lawyer, and I want to ask very respectfully: You have been one of the minority at times on the Supreme Court of the United States, have you not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And you believed just as sincerely in your view as the majority believed in theirs.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think so.

Senator DONNELL. As regards this pact, may I mention just one or two things. Of course, you have read it and studied it carefully, I am sure.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have read it carefully; yes, indeed, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And I have no doubt that you are modestly indicating by that language, perhaps, not even indicating it, but I am sure you have studied it and I will not ask you anything further on that.

In that agreement, however, there are certain obligations imposed that do not now exist against this country, are there not, or by this country, I mean?

OBLIGATIONS UNDER THE TREATY

Perhaps I used the wrong preposition. I will restate the question: The treaty does impose on this question certain obligations that do not now exist. That is right, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Well, in a sense; yes. In a sense; yes. I think the clause that makes an attack on any one member of the treaty an attack on all is a position advanced beyond pure selfish nationalism, pure selfish separatism.

Senator DONNELL. And it is a position that does not today exist. We are under no contractual obligation at this minute to—

Mr. ROBERTS. No; that is what is the matter with the world. We are a lot of independent, suffering nations, and each pursues his own selfish way, and can do exactly as he pleases, when everything arises. And this is an assurance that we feel a common interest with these nations, that what is bad for them and injurious to them we consider would be injurious to us.

Senator DONNELL. I get your point, and it is very clear. But returning to my question, which you have in effect answered, though I would like to have it just a little more concretely answered: This treaty does create, on the part of the United States, an obligation which it is not presently under. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is a very difficult question to answer for this reason: Under our constitutional system there is a question whether we can, in advance, automatically bind ourselves to national action. If you say this creates an obligation it creates, if you want to call it an obligation, the obligation seriously to consider, and take appropriate action, under circumstances which may develop. Well, that is an obligation.

If I agree with you that I will seriously consider a proposition that you put to me, I suppose in morals it is my obligation to do it. But, after all, this pact is, to my mind, an expression of the purpose and the mind and the spirit of the people of the United States of America. That is what it is, and it is an assurance to the people of Europe that we look upon this thing as a very serious thing to us, as well as to them.

Senator DONNELL. And the obligation you have described does not today exist.

Mr. ROBERTS. No. Today, under the old nationalistic theory, I suppose we are entitled to turn our back on what is happening in Europe, and say it does not concern us. That is why I say out-and-out isolationists are against this pact, because it was the isolationist's position to shut our eyes to what was going on in the rest of the world.

Senator DONNELL. If the treaty should be ratified by the Senate, we shall not be able to turn our back on Europe and disregard any obligation.

Mr. ROBERTS.—There you use the word "obligation" again. Disregard the deep concern which this treaty says it will be to us if there is an aggression on one of our allies under this treaty.

Senator DONNELL. I want to make the question perfectly clear, and I did not mean to incorporate any new element: The question I am asking is, after this treaty is ratified, we will be under a contractual obligation with 11 other nation. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. And we are not under that contractual obligation today with any of them. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is correct.

NATURE OF OBLIGATION

Senator DONNELL. You speak of the obligation that will be created by this treaty as one to seriously consider. Is there anything in the treaty that says that? Do you find that language anywhere in that treaty from beginning to end?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think the language that an attack on any of them shall be considered an attack on all of them.

Senator DONNELL. Does that say that we are to seriously consider what we shall do? That is an agreement, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. It goes on to say that we shall then do what we think is adequate and proper in the premises.

Senator DONNELL. I beg your pardon, Mr. Justice. It does not say that. It says this: "The parties agree that an armed attack against any one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all."

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. I quoted it exactly. The language to which you evidently refer follows shortly thereafter. That is:

Consequently they agree that, if such an armed attack occurs, each of them, in the exercise of the right—

et cetera, which is not material—

Mr. ROBERTS. I think it is material.

Senator DONNELL (reading):

will assist the parties so attacked by taking forthwith, individually, and in concert with other parties—

now I come to the language you have in mind—such action as it deems necessary, including the use of armed force, to restore and maintain the security of the North Atlantic area.

That does not say, does it, Mr. Justice, that upon this attack we will seriously consider what, if any, action we should take? This obligates us, does it not, as I am quoting, "by taking forthwith such action as it"—that we—"deem necessary, including the use of armed force"; and I take it you agree with the Secretary of State that that does not give an arbitrary right of determination, but such as we honestly and genuinely believe to be necessary. That is the object, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly. That is what we sit down to consider.

Senator DONNELL. But there is an obligation to do what we honestly think is necessary.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is right. And that honest judgment must be reached by consideration of the circumstances.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

Senator DONNELL. Suppose 500,000 troops were to be sent into Norway, which is the illustration that you doubtless heard this morning, were to be sent into Norway by Russia for armed attack. Do you think that we would be complying with our duty under this article 5 if we should say, "All we have to do is to take such action as we deem necessary. We think that just sending over 10 gallons of coal oil would be sufficient"?

Now, that is what we think; that is what we say we think. Do you think, under circumstances such as that, that the nations of the world would consider that we had honestly and genuinely—to adopt substantially the language of the Secretary of State—performed our obligation under article 5?

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly not.

Senator DONNELL. We would be obligated to do what you and I consider reasonably and honestly and genuinely necessary; namely, to take the reasonable steps toward repelling that attack, and treating in effect and in fact the attack against that other nation as an attack against ourselves. That is what we would have to do under this obligation.

Mr. ROBERTS. Who do you mean by "we"?

Senator DONNELL. Our country.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Now, as regards who is to do it for our country, as between the President and the Congress, I want to ask you just a little about that Mr. Justice, if I may.

Suppose that New York—well, let us get away from New York, we have used that so many times. Suppose Charleston, S. C., were to be attacked by 500,000 soldiers and 500 bombers, and Congress is not in session, and the attack occurs on Saturday of the week, and Congress cannot get here for 2 days, or 3 days, perhaps, a quorum cannot be secured any quicker than that, and some of us do not like to fly very much, and I am one of them. Suppose that situation.

PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

Do you think the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and Air Force of our country, would have legal authority to order troops and bombers and whatever is necessary to repel that attack against Charleston, S. C., or would he have to wait until the Congress could be convened before he could do anything?

Mr. ROBERTS. I am inclined to think that he would have the right to take emergency measures.

Senator DONNELL. That is your best judgment, that he would?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is my best judgment; yes.

Senator DONNELL. And as Commander in Chief he would have that power?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. This agreement—

Mr. ROBERTS. Of course, that is domestic invasion. Now you are trying to ask me whether Norway is made a domestic country by this treaty.

Senator DONNELL. No; I am not going to ask you that. This treaty does say that the parties agree that an armed attack against any one or more of them, and Norway is one or more of them—

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Shall be considered an attack against them all. And we are one of the all. So that the contract as far as we are concerned is that we agree that an armed attack against Norway shall be considered an attack against the United States of America.

Mr. ROBERTS. But I do not know whether that makes an attack on Norway a domestic invasion in the United States of America that would allow the President to call out the militia and the troops.

Senator DONNELL. I have not said it is a domestic invasion.

Mr. ROBERTS. This agreement says that if Norway is attacked we shall consider that that is an attack upon us. But it does not necessarily mean it is similar to an attack on Charleston, S. C., or whatever city you mentioned.

Senator DONNELL. Are you prepared to express an opinion, one way or the other—we have had, I think, really, two expressions, one by Mr. Acheson and one by Mr. Lovett, somewhat contrary, perhaps entirely so—would you be prepared to tell us today whether or not in your opinion, if Norway were attacked by 500,000 troops and by 1,000 bombers, and something had to be done quickly, and every minute counted, do you think the President of the United States would have power, under his obligation created by this treaty, and as Commander in Chief, to take whatever military action he deemed proper under those circumstances?

Mr. ROBERTS. I doubt it, because I think, in a situation of this kind, it would be entirely possible to call the Congress and lay the situation before it in time.

This is not like an attack on Philadelphia or some city in South Carolina, where the bombers are there. It is an attack on one of us, which we will consider an attack on ourselves. But what we are to do about it, what means we are to take, I think can easily be resolved by Congress, and very properly so.

And, if I were the President, I would take that course. Whether under our Constitution he has the power to take another course could only be tested by an attempted exercise of power by him, and, as often unfortunately happens, a long-after decision as to whether he exceeded his power by the Supreme Court. I would not take that chance if I were the President.

Senator DONNELL. If he were to take the view that he had the power to take immediate military action, say by sending some bombers across the ocean right away, on the theory that that was necessary in order to prevent Europe from being overrun like Belgium was in the first few days in the First World War, if he took that view, the Supreme Court of the United States would have no power to review that action, would it? Would that not be the action of a coordinate branch of the Government?

Mr. ROBERTS. It may very well be so. And some of many other usurpations by the Executive.

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard that as a usurpation?

Mr. ROBERTS. No; I say if you regard it as a usurpation.

Senator DONNELL. I do not. I think he has thorough power to do that. I think under this contract this country would be obligated.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think that is very doubtful. If I were the President, I would take no such chance.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice, you say the road to world unity—that is what your organization stands for—

Mr. ROBERTS. That is the long-range objective; yes.

UNITY OF DEMOCRACIES

Senator DONNELL. That is to say, the world unity so far as the Convention of Democracies is concerned. Do you say your organization stands for world unity of all kinds of countries, whether they are democracies or Portugals, or what?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. It just stands for Federal Convention of Democracies.

Mr. ROBERTS. As a starter, and to federate the kind of people that can federate, that understand our system of a people's government, a state that is the servant of the people and not its master as in some autocracies. Those people will have to start world law, international law, because they understand it.

You cannot undertake world law with people who have lived for centuries under an autocracy. I do not see how I could ever be a joint citizen in a world government with the citizens of a pure autocracy. The thing does not jell.

Senator DONNELL. In your statement you say the North Atlantic Defense Pact is an essential emergency measure to prevent an attack by Soviet Russia.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

AUTOCRACIES AND DEMOCRACIES

Senator DONNELL. Do you think it would be a much stronger preventive of an attack by Soviet Russia if the President had authority to send bombers across instantly in the event of an attack than if they had to wait 2, 3, 4, or 5 days for Congress to convene and maybe a day or two before Congress acted?

Mr. ROBERTS. Senator Donnell, many, many things can be done more effectively if power is concentrated in one man, one group of men. The difficulty that democracies always face is that they work close at the elbows because there is a division of power, and we do not like to concentrate power and authority in one man.

Certainly I think it would be stronger. I think the United States would be in stronger position today militarily if we had an autocracy or dictatorship, if you and I were ordered around by a boss that we could not gainsay. But that is not the democratic way of life. It is not the way we have practiced.

Senator DONNELL. I am not so sure I would agree, although I am not expert in military matters. It would appear to me that our forces, acting under American institutions and American traditions, have been able to take care of themselves pretty well so far. You agree with that, too, of course?

Mr. ROBERTS. No. I think democracy is the weakest form of government for aggression, for military activities, that can be conceived in the world.

Senator DONNELL. I am not talking about aggression.

Mr. ROBERTS. Autocracies are efficient, powerful.

Senator DONNELL. How about defense? Do you think democracies are inefficient for defense, and among the most inefficient means devised for that?

Mr. ROBERTS. Always so, because public opinion has to be mobilized in a democracy, and it takes time to do that.

Senator DONNELL. It would not take very much time if Charleston, S. C., were to be attacked, to mobilize public opinion over this country, would it? It did not take much time, in the case of Japan's attack on Hawaii in 1941, to mobilize on December 7, did it?

Mr. ROBERTS. No.

Senator DONNELL. Congress was in session then, and we started in the next day, I believe, with a declaration of war.

Mr. ROBERTS. If we had been able to mobilize public opinion a few months earlier, we would not have lost nine battleships in Pearl Harbor.

PRESIDENTIAL POWER

Senator DONNELL. You say if you were the President you think you feel that you would be very loath to accept this responsibility of sending the bombers over without congressional action. What do you understand the word in article 5, "forthwith," to mean when it says that "the parties agree that if such an armed attack occurs, each of them" and so forth, would assist the parties by taking "forthwith, individually and in concert with the other parties, such action as it deems necessary."

Do you think that would permit of some delay?

Mr. ROBERTS. "Forthwith" means just as fast as you can do it. That is all it can mean.

Senator DONNELL. And if the President does have power—and I am not asking you to commit yourself for the moment on it—if he does have power, then forthwith would mean forthwith, so soon as he could act.

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly.

Senator LODGE. If the Senator will permit an interruption.

Senator DONNELL. I certainly will.

Senator LODGE. Do you not hold, Mr. Justice, that the President has the legal authority to order the Army and the Navy and the Marine Corps and Air Force wherever he wants to?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. You mean, for instance, if he orders a fleet to Japan, to the Japanese Sea now? They go, certainly.

Senator LODGE. He can order the Air Force anywhere. Of course, he runs the risk of having public opinion disapprove. But he certainly has the power to do it; has he not?

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly.

Senator WATKINS. Would he have the power to order an attack on Russia right now if he wants to? Or order the planes to fly over Russia? I ask that because it seems to me it is made necessary by the question of Senator Lodge.

Mr. ROBERTS. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. However bad it would be for the Chief of Staff to order it, if the Chief of Staff could order it, and the troops followed his orders, it would equally be true if the President ordered it. They would follow the order of the Commander in Chief. But are we assuming that we are going to have, in this country, of course, ourselves, a President who will provoke a war by ordering something done to provoke another country?

Senator DONNELL. Do you think we are going to have a President here who would permit 500,000 men to go into Norway with a 100 or 500 bombers, with every intent obviously to capture Europe within 3 or 4 days? Do you think we are apt to have a President say, "I cannot do anything now until I send word for Congress to come to Washington from all over the four corners of the country"?

Mr. ROBERTS. Do you think a President who was really concerned about saving this country ultimately, whether he had this treaty or not, would act any differently? I do not think President Roosevelt had any treaty when he loaned over-age destroyers and sent muskets to Europe, which saved us and saved England.

NEED FOR SPEEDY ACTION IN CASE OF ATTACKS

Senator DONNELL. I think it comes back to one of the questions I asked at the outset. Is it not a fact that Russia should believe, from our previous action in the two world wars, that if we thought it was essential for the best interests of humanity we would get into the war without any Atlantic Treaty forcing us into it? Is that right? You would agree to that; would you not?

Mr. ROBERTS. That Russia would feel that way?

Senator DONNELL. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. No. I think they would calculate that we would be too late. This next war is going to be a blitzkrieg war. It would be a swell job for use to get into it after Russia was at the shore of the Atlantic and all over England.

The CHAIRMAN. Russia might have the view that she could pick them off in the meantime.

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Instead of waiting for us to mobilize.

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly. That is what I said in my statement. That was the Hitler technique.

Senator DONNELL. Do you not think that the very fact that the next war, if we ever have one—and we all hope we will not—may and probably will be a blitzkrieg, lightning war? In other words, do you not think that was the reason for the insertion in article 5 of the word “forthwith”?

Mr. ROBERTS. Very likely.

Senator DONNELL. To take forthwith that action?

Mr. ROBERTS. Very likely.

Senator DONNELL. And if the President has to wait 3 or 4 days, as we found way back in the much slower days of 1914 and the days of 1939, if we found out then that Belgium could be overrun in 4 days, I think it was, or thereabouts, do you not think it likely that the President, in the exercise of sound discretion and judgment, would and should and could send bombers across instantly after that action took place, and would consider himself bound to do so under the terms of article 5 of the treaty?

Mr. ROBERTS. And how would you have him act if we had no treaty?

Senator DONNELL. I would have him act in accordance with what he considers the military best interests of our country and the actual interests of humanity. I would say that there might be a situation in which he would have to act immediately. He might not, however.

Mr. ROBERTS. Is it conceivable that the interests of our country should be that France and Great Britain should fall?

Senator DONNELL. No.

Mr. ROBERTS. Is it conceivable that humanity should dictate that we stand aside and see it happen? If not, what less would our President do? What less would he do in case of such an attack without this treaty than he will do with it?

STRENGTHENING DEMOCRACIES

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice, I am not going to ask too many more questions, but I do want to ask just a few. You say, “The road to world unity is not through appeasement of tyranny, but rather through strengthening democracy." I suppose you mean strengthening in numerous ways, among which are military strengthening; is that right?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is, in my judgment, a small part of it.

Senator DONNELL. But it is a part of it?

Mr. ROBERTS. A small part of it. I have also had the complete conviction, Senator Donnell, that if in 1939 the United States, Britain, and France had been in a federation—we were all unprepared, utterly so, and Hitler knew it—Hitler would never have struck, because to strike France would have brought us into the war the same day. He would not have done it. The potential was too great, but he figured what every aggressor figures: if you can keep these democracies apart, then do what Senator Connally suggested—snipe one, then another, in the hope that the United States at the moment will be busy with something, or asleep, and you will have a fait accompli like Czechoslovakia, when it is too late; it is an accomplished fact.

That is the advantage of our being together. It is an assurance to Russia that the whole potential is together, and it is an assurance to our friends abroad that the whole potential is together. What good is the Marshall plan without this assurance to them, an assurance they think they can rely on? If you were an industrialist in France, would you build up a factory with the thought that Russia would take it when it was ripe? Can you rehabilitate economically a country which has always got its elbow up against an aggressor, where nothing but fear is rife?

These people abroad are afraid of a shilly-shally shifting policy in the United States. Our past record gives them some cause to feel that way. I do not think this treaty is any more than a piece of paper. I think this treaty is writing down for them the deep feeling of the people of the United States that we are not going to let them be destroyed, and turn our backs and say it is none of our business. That is the reason it is going to prevent war. This assurance is going to strengthen them. That very assurance is going to hold off an aggressor, who does not want to tackle the whole kettle of fish at once but whose technique is to get one at a time.

The CHAIRMAN. This treaty is, in effect, a double assurance: (1) to the people of the democratic countries, and (2) an assurance to any aggressor that contemplates armed attack.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is the story exactly.

MILITARY STRENGTHENING

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice, you mentioned the factory owner or investor in France, who you say hesitates to invest funds if he thinks there is danger of Russia crossing into that country and capturing France. Incidentally, your reference to Hitler having struck France was not correct. He struck Poland; did he not, instead of France?

Mr. ROBERTS. What I was trying to say was that, if France, Britain, and the United States had been in a union at that time, the moment he struck France he would have known we would be in the war.

Senator DONNELL. This is the point, however, to which I was really leading up, regardless of whether it was France or Poland that he first struck: You spoke of the factory owner in France who hesitates to make investments or to increase his investments with the fear hanging over him that Russia may come in same way and take them. Well, the best way to give that man confidence—is it not?—is to have enough power and force so that, to adopt the words of President Truman, Russia can look at overwhelming force, to have that force then and there, so Russia can look at it and figure, "We cannot take it." That is the best way for the investor.

MR. ROBERTS. Where would you put that force—in France?

Senator DONNELL. I am not saying that. I say the best assurance that would lead to the most confidence on the part of a fellow who is fearful that Russia is going to overrun France is to provide military force to prevent Russia from overrunning the European nations.

MR. ROBERTS. I do not know what you mean by that.

Senator DONNELL. I could not say it any more clearly, I think.

MR. ROBERTS. I think this pact is on the way to save us a great deal of money in the provision of military forces and matériel. I think a federation would save us much more, but that is another story, way beyond it. What are you talking about—the force that would assure this?

Senator DONNELL. I will tell you what I am talking about.

MR. ROBERTS. Build up that force and keep it bottled up here? Run a separate military policy and a separate army here? Send it to France to let them build up a separate military policy? Is that going to give any assurance? Those European nations, alone or together, cannot build a sufficient military potential to protect themselves separately or jointly.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice, I did not mean to interrupt you. I understood you to ask me what I meant, and I was going to state it. I mean this: In the first place, the investor in France, putting money into his plant, would derive more confidence if he knew there were military forces—men, material, bombers, whatever it may be—who could prevent Russia from coming in there. That is the best assurance he could have in putting his money into a factory; is that right?

MR. ROBERTS. I do not know what you mean. If there was overwhelming force in the United States, and he thought the United States would not use it to protect France, that would not help him much.

Senator DONNELL. That really is not the answer to the question.

MR. ROBERTS. You say: Would not assurance of overwhelming military force give him the courage to go on? Military force where? Available to protect him? Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Military force, since you ask it, that will prevent Russia from crossing the rivers and getting into the country—in France or other nations of this pact.

AMERICAN TROOPS TO EUROPE

MR. ROBERTS. I do not see the prospect of France as having that within your lifetime or mine.

Senator DONNELL. Very well. That leads to this question: Do you think, in order to provide an adequate guaranty that Russia could not come across the borders, that it would be necessary for the United States to supplement the forces which France and these other nations have by not only bombs and bombers and matériel but by American troops garrisoned in Europe, in order to prevent it?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is a military question that I am not competent to answer, but I should think there would have to be joint planning, joint pooling of matériel, and making of the matériel available, so that you would have available promptly a force big enough to do what you are talking about. What that would involve in dispositions of troops and placing of materials, I would not know.

Senator DONNELL. Your answer is entirely consistent with your view that this next war, if we have one, will be a blitzkrieg, and it would not help much if American soldiers are needed—we will not argue whether they are or not; at least I do not care to—if they are needed, it would not help much to have them 3,000 miles away and have to be sent there by ships, in the case of a blitzkrieg which is perhaps going to take London and Paris and these other place within a few days. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ROBERTS. You are beyond my depth. I do not know. It depends on what our Air Force says about it, and I do not know.

OBLIGATIONS UNDER ARTICLE III

Senator DONNELL. I mean to refer to article 3 of the treaty—and by the way it does not contain any such language as the words “as it deems necessary,” but reads this way: “In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous”—and note the word “continuous”—“and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity”—to do what?—“to resist armed attack.” Is there not there, Mr. Justice Roberts, a clear, definite, expressed promise on the part of our country to, by means of continuous and effective mutual aid, cooperate with these other countries in maintaining and developing their collective capacity and individual capacity, to resist the armed attack? Is it a definite obligation?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think so. And you, I take it, would not do that? You would wait for some European attack to be made before you did that, because that would preserve your national autonomy?

Senator DONNELL. I say this, since you have asked it: I think the proper thing for this country to do is to wait on each particular set of circumstances and do what we think proper at the time, rather than binding ourselves for 20 long years as to a course of conduct to treat the attack upon any one of 11 other nations, which may have their quarrels with other nations—

Mr. ROBERTS. Let me put one thought: Yes; we will wait. And then the question arises: Who will command the joint force? How long will we wait to settle that? And then the question arises: How shall the forces be allocated between the nations? We will take a couple of months to settle that.

I would a good deal rather rely on the President to get the Congress together and say, “Go to it, boys.” I think your delay is much longer than my way.

Senator DONNELL. Does this treaty say anything about who shall be the chief of staff?

Mr. ROBERTS. No. We say we will continuously confer with each other and try to settle these matters, which is the sensible way to do it, it strikes me; so that you will know which way you are going when you are going.

Senator DONNELL. There is nothing in here, however, which contains any requirement whatsoever for any particular nation to designate the chief of staff?

Mr. ROBERTS. No. That is because we are still preserving national sovereignties. Those things will have to be settled by agreement.

Senator DONNELL. How many of these nations would have to agree, by the way, out of these 12?

Mr. ROBERTS. I guess all of them.

Senator DONNELL. I suppose sometimes it is pretty hard to get a unanimous decision on most anything?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. You think the pressure would be greater after there had been an attack and France overrun. I agree with you.

Senator DONNELL. It might very well be. Just this final question or two, Mr. Justice: This is a 20-year treaty, is it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. I believe so.

WITHDRAWAL FROM TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Is there any provision by which any nation, during that time, may be expelled from the community created by the treaty because of having become a Communist country?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think not. I suppose you realize that although this treaty is a 20-year treaty, the body of which you are a member could revoke it in 2 years, under our present Constitution.

Senator DONNELL. You do not mean the Senate could do it?

Mr. ROBERTS. I mean Congress could do it.

Senator DONNELL. Under what provision do you mean? The provision in regard to 2 years beyond which provisions for war cannot be—

Mr. ROBERTS. No. I mean the treaties of the United States are on the same parity with law.

I think you are familiar with the fact that a law passed by Congress inconsistent with the treaty, repeals the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. That is correct. But I understood you to say something about 2 years.

Mr. ROBERTS. I say 2 years, 5 years, or 10 years.

Senator DONNELL. I thought you might be referring to the provision in the Constitution by which a Congress cannot be bound by more than 2 years to provide arms and maintenance.

Mr. ROBERTS. No; I did not mean that.

Senator DONNELL. Do you think, Mr. Justice, if this treaty is entered into, that for 20 years, where the parties have all signed up for 20 years, that it would be regarded as in the best of good faith if our country should, within 3 or 4 years, say we repeal that treaty by statute of Congress, and it comes to an end, though nothing is said in the treaty that it can be done?

Mr. ROBERTS. It has not been the thought of nations, where conditions developed, unforeseen when the treaty was made, for parties to denounce the treaty.

I suppose if this alliance were turned into a Communist pact—which is inconceivable to me at the present time—the American people might have the moral right to say that we do not care to stay in the Communist nest.

Senator DONNELL. Do you think that would be true if just one of these nations became Communist?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know.

Senator LODGE. May I ask a question?

Senator DONNELL. Permit me to ask one question before I yield.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

Is it not true, Mr. Justice, that there is considerable difference of opinion among different persons, as for illustration the St. Lawrence seaway debate, as illustrated on the floor of the Senate, as to whether this country can do more than exercise the physical power to revoke a treaty? What I am getting at is this: While it is entirely true, I think, under the law, that Congress can revoke a treaty 10 minutes after it is made, may there not be some liability under international law upon the country which has thus violated its contract with other nations?

Mr. ROBERTS. There is no such thing as international law.

Senator DONNELL. No such thing as international law?

Mr. ROBERTS. No. International law is power. If some of the nations who did not like our revocation of the treaty wanted to take the club to us, they might subdue us. That is the only international law that is applicable. It is the law of power.

Senator DONNELL. You say there is no such thing as international law?

Mr. ROBERTS. No.

Senator DONNELL. I ask you to state whether or not you read the statute of the World Court, Permanent Court of International Justice.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Did that not expressly refer to international law by name?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. We have used the name all the time, and anyone of us who were parties to that could have denounced that treaty and walked out.

Senator DONNELL. Is it not true that among those who so strongly urged at hearings by this country, to the World Court, the Permanent Court of International Justice, with that language in it, saying it should administer international law, was no less a personage than Elihu Root?

Mr. ROBERTS. You know very well that any decision of that Court was subject to the will of the nation that was immersed. If it did not obey, there was no means to make it obey. Its decisions were advisory. You know that.

Senator DONNELL. No, I do not.

Mr. ROBERTS. Well, you ought to.

Senator DONNELL. I do not know that at all. I know that there would be no way to enforce it without a police power. But I am not at all willing to concede that there is no such thing as international law.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think we are pretty far off the subject of this treaty.

Senator LODGE. Will the Senator yield?

Senator DONNELL. Yes.

COMMUNIST COUP

Senator LODGE. This question of what happens if one of the signatory nations falls under the domination of the Communists, as I see it, is a question that comes up, and will come up again. I would like to read two brief quotations from the text of the treaty, and then ask you whether you do not think that those two quotations would make it obviously inconsistent for a Communist nation to be party to the treaty. The first quotation is this:

They—

that is, the parties—are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage and civilization of their peoples—and here is the significant part—founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law.

That is the first quotation.

The second is from article 2:

The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations—and here is the pertinent language—

by strengthening their free institutions.

My question is, in the light of that language, would not the United States or any other party to the treaty, be justified in taking the initiative in seeing to it that any nation was no longer a member of the pact if it fell under the domination of the Communists?

Mr. ROBERTS. I should certainly think so.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Justice, the Senator from Massachusetts referred to the language in the treaty, the preamble:

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy.

As I understand it he used that as one of two bits of language in the treaty which he thinks would permit the expulsion of Communist nations.

Senator LODGE. It continues:

individual liberty and the rule of law.

Senator DONNELL. Where is that?

Senator LODGE. I read from the second sentence in the preamble and the first sentence of article 2.

Senator DONNELL. That is what I thought. Those are the same sentences that you referred to on the floor of the Senate the other day.

EXPULSION FROM THE PACT

Mr. Justice Roberts, referring to this provision of the preamble:

They are determined to safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy—

first, is Portugal founded on the principles of democracy, in your opinion?

Mr. ROBERTS. I have told you; no.

Senator DONNELL. If these parties desire to do so, the other parties, they can expel Portugal on that very principle 5 minutes after the treaty is signed?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think so.

Senator DONNELL. You do not think they would have any right to?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think the parties to this treaty can expel anybody from the treaty, but I do not think they have any moral right to do it.

Senator DONNELL. There are 12 members to this pact. Is there any provision by which 11 of them can expel the twelfth?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think 11 of them can denounce the pact and get a new one, and leave the twelfth out.

Senator DONNELL. In which event they have violated the provisions of the treaty, have they not?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know. If some member of the pact violated the treaty I would think they would have a perfect right to walk out.

Senator DONNELL. Is there anything in the treaty, Mr. Justice, that says that a member nation becoming a Communist nation, is a violation?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir. Not in those words.

WORLD DIVISION

Senator DONNELL. I want to ask you about one final point. On page 2 of your statement, after giving these four groups, which oppose the pact, you say:

These groups are loudly complaining that the Atlantic Pact will divide the world into two hostile camps, which will lead to war.

And you say:

Nothing could be further from the truth.

You do not regard it as any possible danger at all that there might prevail the opinion that the Atlantic Pact would divide the world into two hostile camps?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think it will make the division any more marked than it is today.

Senator DONNELL. I wonder if you read or heard the statement of Mr. Dulles given to us yesterday. I think it was, in which he said, among other things, this:

Of course, with every great enterprise there are risks and disadvantages. I think these should be seen and not covered up, because the risks are of such a character that if seen they can be guarded against.

Then he recites what these risks are and he sets out:

(1) The pact shall not be operated primarily as a military instrument.

And the second risk, as to which he says:

There is danger that these two pacts will be interpreted to mean that the only major concerns of the United States are within the American Hemisphere and North Atlantic areas and as long as they are free from attack we are relatively indifferent to what occurs elsewhere.

He lists the second of the dangers as:

The Atlantic and Rio Pacts should not be understood as tacit offers to divide the world with Soviet communism.

I take it you do not share Mr. Dulles' view that the danger which he mentions—I am quoting him, "the danger of this interpretation"—is a real danger. You do not think it is a danger at all.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think my statement is inconsistent with that, and I do not disagree with what he says.

Senator DONNELL. In what way do you not see an inconsistency?

Mr. ROBERTS. There are two ideologies in the world today. One is statism and the other is representative government, based on the democratic suffrage of the people. Those divide the world today. The making of a pact by those of us who believe in a democratic way of life is not going to divide the world and it is not going to threaten the peace any more than the peace is threatened by this ideological cleavage which you cannot eradicate.

I agree with Mr. Dulles that we ought not to treat the Atlantic Pact or the Rio Pact, either of them, as little top drawers in which we belong, and all the rest of the world is excluded, left out. We ought not to treat this pact as a sign that we want to possess the world. In the name of Heaven, that is the last thing that a democracy wants to do. They want to be let alone and develop their own way of life in cooperation with each other.

To suggest that this pact might be treated as an attempt to wall off, steal, part of the world for ourselves, close out the rest from trade, from benefit, is just grotesque to me. I do not think it is a real danger. Mr. Dulles thinks there may be some danger it will be so construed. I do not think so, but I can understand his point of view.

Senator DONNELL. At this point, Mr. Chairman, I read these two sentences from Mr. Dulles's statement. This is in the section pertaining to the subject matter, about the Atlantic and Rio Pacts should not be construed as attempts to divide the world:

I know that the administration is aware of the risk to which I alluded and that the President and Secretary of State have recently reasserted the concern of the United States with areas other than those marked out by the Rio and Atlantic Pacts. I believe, however, that the Congress may usefully reinforce that help to obviate a miscalculation so dangerous that if persisted in might undo all the good potential in the pact.

ATLANTIC UNION AND THE TREATY

Finally, one sentence in your statement:

The concept of such a federal union of Atlantic democracies can, however, become a practical reality only if the Atlantic Pact is ratified.

That is the key that is the point at which your particular organization, the organization which has as its purpose the federal convention of democracies, is particularly focusing its comments with respect to the pact. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. If the Congress of the United States should say, "We do not want to even have a treaty of alliance with our democratic friends, we are going to live in isolationism," then I would have very little hope that the Congress of the United States would ever explore a closer union of the democracies than is represented by this pact.

But as I have said to you, we have had a progression over 8 or 9 years now, one step after another, trying to bring these democratic countries into a better understanding and better cooperation; and an exhibition of utter-mindedness and generosity on the part of my people, for which I am utterly eternally proud, on the part of the Marshall plan and everything else that has been done here.

To turn back now and say, "You plow your own road, you take your own risks; we are friendly, if anything happens come see us," I think that is turning back the clock.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you, Mr. Justice, and Mr. Chairman, for the privilege of examination.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Justice. You have made a very enlightening and able statement. Now we have Senator Watkins, of Utah, with us.

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Justice, I listened very carefully—

The CHAIRMAN. I beg your pardon. Senator Lodge?

Senator LODGE. I have no questions, but if Senator Watkins suggests anything to me I will break in.

The CHAIRMAN. You are entitled to the witness now if you have any questions.

Senator LODGE. I have no questions, but I may interrupt Senator Watkins if he suggests something to me.

Mr. ROBERTS. There is my friend, Senator Fulbright, also.

The CHAIRMAN. I beg your pardon. He came in during the interrogation by the Senator from Missouri. That puts me in the clear. Go ahead, Senator Fulbright.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I do not wish to delay the proceedings, and I know that the Justice wants to return to Philadelphia. I have one or two points.

I wonder if you could expand a little on the thought that you expressed on page 2 where you say that the North Atlantic Pact is essentially an emergency measure, the implication being that there are further measures?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

STEPS BEYOND THE ATLANTIC PACT

Senator FULBRIGHT. You do not regard this as a final solution to our difficulties.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think anybody does. I doubt if any man who sits behind that table does. Once this pact is made we have economic questions to consider, we have military questions to consider. As Senator Donnell has pointed out, these parties to the treaty have to proceed by agreement. It is all a question of what the instrumentality is to be, and how they are to be set up to work out cooperation. I look at this treaty, and I look at the start that this treaty makes as a far bigger thing than a mere military arrangement. It is essential to us that these people thrive over there. It is essential to us that these people restore their economy.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think it will contribute to a closer political and economic union between these 12 countries?

Mr. ROBERTS. That the treaty will?

Senator FULBRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think it will contribute to it, but I do not think it is the be all and end all, as you know. You know my views very well on that. You think it will be a great help to have a union of the European democracies, a union of these western European states.

I see greater difficulties in that than the union that I envisage in which we shall be a part, but a union of the European democracies now will have to be supported by the United States of America. There is not the potential there to build up their economy without our help, and I do not think it makes very much difference whether we give them the Marshall plan or ECA help individually, or whether we give it to them as a union or a federation.

I do not think any union of the democracies will ever work unless the United States of America is a part of it. We have got to take the leadership. That is the reason why I think a union of the European nations, the western European nations, would be a step toward my goal just as I think this pact would be a step, but I think it is a pretty impractical step. I think we have got to be behind it, just as we have to be in this treaty.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you not see more signs, as a practical matter, of an interest and movement toward European union than Atlantic union?

Mr. ROBERTS. No; I do not, because Europe is just waiting until we take the lead on union. It is a very different thing for us to stand off and say, "You unite, you do so and so, than to say, "We will unite with you." Very different.

LEADERSHIP TOWARD ATLANTIC UNION

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you see any signs whatever in the Government of this country taking the leadership in the Atlantic union?

Mr. ROBERTS. I believe I do.

Senator FULBRIGHT. What specifically encourages you to believe that?

Mr. ROBERTS. The constant growth of public opinion. Constant growth, steady growth.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I said in the Government of this country.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think the Government of this country is taking what it considers one step at a time, but I think it is laying aside everything else now for this pact. It has been committed to it, the administration has been committed to it for years. I have great hopes that the Government of the United States will not discourage open discussion of further steps such as I advocate.

I believe greatly in the process of public discussion, of open debate.

UNIFICATION OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. Yesterday, I believe it was, the Europeans signed what they called a statute of Europe, creating a Council of Europe. I know of nothing that this country has encouraged, either in Europe or in the Atlantic area, comparable to that. That is as a practical move, I do not see any signs.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have not read the statute of Europe, as perhaps you have. I think it attempts to protect the complete sovereignty of every individual nation.

Senator FULBRIGHT. That is a defect, but it is something.

Mr. ROBERTS. It is something like this treaty. It is a step.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It is something like it, but it is not confined to military matters.

Mr. ROBERTS. No.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It purports to have authority at least to discuss all types of things.

Now, they had the Brussels Pact, which had more emphasis upon military matters. It goes into the other field, at least important discussion, a consideration of economic and political matters without any power to act. That is quite true.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I think it would be much better if they did have power to act.

Mr. ROBERTS. So do I.

But at least it is something, Senator, whereas among the Atlantic countries, including ourselves and Canada, I do not know of governmental people at least who are seriously considering any steps which might involve our sovereignty.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Would you say we have advanced in this field in an economic way, and do you contemplate that there will be a step perhaps in the political field?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do. There have got to be some kinds of steps. We have to make some economic arrangements.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I want to distinguish what ought to come about and what is coming about. Actually is there any movement toward it?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think we will be able to show that there is a movement for it, and that the thinking people of America want it discussed very seriously. It has grave difficulties in its way. Everybody knows that. I do not blame them.

ECA AND UNIFICATION OF EUROPE

Senator FULBRIGHT. Do you think that in Europe the ECA is tending to bring about political or economic unity?

Mr. ROBERTS. I would not know. I would not venture an opinion.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Have you happened to see a statement in the paper today on a report of the United Nations Commission on Europe?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, sir.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It was in the front page of the Star. It is a long article, two columns. There is one paragraph. I wondered what you thought of it. It is a report by the United Nations Commission, which as you know is composed of members from and including the United States and the European countries [reading]:

In 100,000 words the Commission said European nations striving for an economic comeback are tripping over their own isolationism, and that the ERP is aggravating the situation.

And it goes on to elaborate, which I will not take the time to read.

Mr. ROBERTS. Of course, the ERP is a very stopgap sort of thing. I do not see how you can strike down customs barriers, and to reach lack of parity of currencies, and shortage of economic change, and a thousand and one other economic things. I do not think it is an instrument calculated to do it. The only way it could do it is by bringing pressure on these sovereign nations to say, "If you do not do so and so, you do not get any more ECA aid," which will, in the end, create more division among the democracies than it will union among them.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Supposing it could be, that there was a way that it could be applied. Would you say it ought to?

Mr. ROBERTS. The pressure?

PROBLEM OF SOVEREIGNTY

Senator FULBRIGHT. No. Persuasion, we will say.

Mr. ROBERTS. You see, Senator, you run up all the time against the old bogey of sovereignty. Even little nations do not want other nations to pressure them to do something, do they, to persuade them to do something or pretend to be wiser than they, and tell them how to run the shop? If they are in a union where there is a common citizenship, and where a deliberative body acts for all, then views are expressed and entertained.

But when you have got this business of sovereignty, nations are very, very tender about other nations poking their noses into what they call their domestic affairs.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You have seen evidences of some resistance, of representatives of certain areas in this country?

Mr. ROBERTS. They are the exception and not the rule.

Senator FULBRIGHT. We have just had a very good demonstration of it.

Mr. ROBERTS. I know.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Yet of much greater value than that particular aspect of it is our union, and we are perfectly willing to stay in the union, even though there is this attempt. So I believe that there is such a thing as being too concerned over this sovereignty that you speak of, under the circumstances that exist in Europe today.

They are bound to have to do some things we want them to do. I think under your own description in the military field, you just said, I believe, that you did not think this would be very effective if they, each one of them, had their own military establishment.

Mr. ROBERTS. No. And the difficulty we are going to face after this pact goes into effect is the difficulty of persuading sovereigns.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Why do you say "persuading" here?

Mr. ROBERTS. Perhaps I am using merely a softer term. Maybe we are going to use pressure.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Why will it not be as offensive in the military field if we say no?

Mr. ROBERTS. That is what worries me. That is why I say a pact is not a perfect instrument.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You are quite prepared, though, to risk that in this field?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Because you are for the pact?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I cannot understand why you draw a distinction between the military and the civil.

Mr. ROBERTS. If they want to make an economic pact with us, then we can work persuasion within the pact after we finish this pact. But this business of standing outside with the purse strings and saying "You had better do so and so, or else," I think if you are dealing with independent nations that is a very ticklish proposition.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It is ticklish in both instances; I agree with that.

Mr. ROBERTS. Not nearly so much after you have come into a brotherhood, a pact.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You think the whole difference, then, between the two, is whether or not we are members?

Mr. ROBERTS. They have expressed a desire for voluntary cooperation in this pact, or the pact does not mean anything.

Senator LODGE. Will the Senator yield for a minute?

Senator FULBRIGHT. I will be through soon; but go ahead.

MILITARY OPERATION DURING THE WAR

Senator LODGE. It is on the point you are making. Is it not true that the nations of Europe have had, during the war, very extensive and intimate experience in working with us, in the military field, which is why they fall in so readily into the Military Establishment?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think it may very well be so. It is the most successful cooperation that there has ever been between allies in the military field. Do you not think so?

Senator LODGE. I think so. I think this is also true: When you are dealing in the military field you are dealing in a field where there is obedience to orders and not merely so much talk and debate in the very nature of the thing.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Of course, that is in a traditional field, I grant you, where people are much more accustomed to doing things than in the other fields; but that is to win a war. I thought we were talking about preventing a war; but I believe the political affiliations of this country were even more effective in prevention than a pact which is, as you think, of an emergency, which means a sort of temporary nature and that to really get something constructive out of it has to involve closer ties than the pact.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think you have to go farther, probably.

EUROPEAN UNION AND ATLANTIC UNION

Senator FULBRIGHT. The difference, then, between the two is that you think the political association of European countries would not add anything substantial.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do. I think it would not add anything substantial. It might be a step.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Therefore, unless you can get in a broader union, you are not interested in pursuing the European?

Mr. ROBERTS. I am not.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I think the difference, then, is whether or not there is a practical possibility of achieving either one. I have not seen the signs to encourage me, in fact either way I see very few, particularly in this country. I think there is much less concern in this country with any kind of a union, either European or Atlantic union, than there is in Europe today.

Those evidences that I mentioned were the adoption of the statute, as weak as it may be, but at least it concerned itself with other than military and economic. It gets into the basic. It seems to me the basic relationship is political.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is right. There is no doubt of that, sir.

STATEMENTS ON ATLANTIC PACT

Senator DONNELL. I would like to call your attention to what I am inclined to think is a slight error of fact which I know you would want corrected if it is. I understood you to say that the 12 statements—I do not think you said 12, but it is 12 that you brought—were derived from persons who, with the exception possibly of Dr. Compton, are not on the council?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think I said that. I said not all the people whose statements I had were on the council.

Senator DONNELL. Perhaps I misunderstood you. I want the record to show that 7 of the 12 whose statements you have given us are on the council, and if Mr. Harry R. Bullis and Harry A. Bullis are the same person, 8 of the 12 are on the council.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think they are.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Lodge?

Senator LODGE. No further questions.

Senator WATKINS. I almost feel like apologizing to start a series of questions after being on the stand as long as you have been.

Mr. ROBERTS. I am holding up pretty well.

Senator WATKINS. I think you are holding up very well, indeed. I want to say at the outset that I agree with that last statement you made just before we started to question you about the rule of law.

I think it was very well said, and I agree with that objective. I do not think I can come within any of the classes that you have described, and I have not yet made up my mind on this particular pact.

But I have committed myself to get as much information as we possibly can to get before the people, because if it is not sustained by the people it will be meaningless.

CONSTANCY OF AMERICAN PUBLIC OPINION

I was particularly interested in your statements about what would have happened had we had a pact like this at the beginning of the First World War, and then at the beginning of the Second World War, your judgment as to what should have been done.

Is it not a fact that American public sentiment is rather fickle, that it changes rapidly? I remember in the First World War, after we got into it, there was a period of time when I think maybe 100 percent of the people thought we ought to join the League of Nations.

I want to review this in a way so I can get to the question I want to ask you about. Then, after the campaign that President Wilson put on, and those in opposition put on, finally the sentiment went the other way. It seemed to swing away from it.

Then we went so far as to pass the Neutrality Act, which apparently was sustained by public sentiment. Then we finally got into the war, and now we have this apparent feeling at the moment that we ought to join this pact.

It seems to me that what we say when we speculate on what would have happened is that we are not taking into consideration all the elements of public psychology, Mr. Justice, that what you have said is very speculative, and probably it would have been impossible at the time of the First World War to have entered into any kind of a pact with European nations, in view of the state of the public mind in the United States. Is not that true?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes. I think so. The Wilson campaign was pitched on the fact that he kept us out of war.

Senator WATKINS. He did not want to get into a fight over there, or do anything about it.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think we have gone a long way since then.

Senator WATKINS. We may have, but we seem to swing around.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not think that has been a swing-around. I think it has been a long, bloody, and terrible education. It has taken two world wars to educate us to realize that the free way of life, if it is to persist in this world, depends very largely on our motivation and our initiative. That I believe from the bottom of my heart.

Senator WATKINS. I can believe that that is a sincere point of view and has considerable merit to it. Just to call your attention to what took place immediately after the First World War about pacts, the League of Nations, in the nature of the pact, went in this direction. I remember very well that former President Taft came to my State—to show you what was taking place in the country. They held a mammoth meeting in the Mormon Tabernacle and took a vote. There were some ten or twelve thousand people. And there was not a single person voted against entering the League of Nations.

A little later President Wilson was there, and with substantially the same result. Within a few months, if not within a few weeks, some of those who were opposed to the proposal came and presented their speech, and at the beginning of that speech, one or two instances, one I remember, Senator Hiram Johnson was almost hooted out of the place to begin with.

He stood there, stood his ground, went on with his talk, and before he got through he had at least half of the people with him on that very thing. I do not know whether my people are more fickle than others or not. But apparently the sentiment of the country changed.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

In getting to this point that you have made, which has been made so many times, I am wondering how much virtue there is in that argument, that if we had had such an agreement back there, these men would not have attacked. To get down to the Second World War, I have had a sort of feeling that these fanatics feel that they have been hemmed in, as Hitler said he felt, and kept telling the German people, and irrespective of the strength against them, they became so egotistical—as the Russian people are, they have been told they won the war. Why should they hold back when they have practically all of Asia with them now, practically half the population?

I wonder if you have some specific thing in mind that you say will stop them, other than general opinion that it will? Can you help me on that? I am telling you that the trouble in my mind is that it is difficult to give much weight to that. Maybe I am not properly considering it, and maybe you can throw some light on it.

Mr. ROBERTS. You take these Atlantic democracies that are represented in this pact. They certainly have a very large percentage of the know-how, of the physical and spiritual resources of the entire world.

I cannot help thinking that if they are together they represent a far greater deterrent to aggression than if they are apart.

It has been the technique, both of the Kaiser and of Hitler, to deal with the democracies one at a time. Look at what the Soviet has done to the free nations of Europe. It sniped off the Baltics, it sniped off Poland, it sniped off Czechoslovakia, it sniped off Hungary, it sniped off the Balkan countries. And for one reason or other the democracies were not united about what they should do about it, and they have done it with impunity.

Hitler had the same technique. If an aggressor in this world, Senator, can keep the freemen, the nations of freemen apart, and deal with them piecemeal, he has a tremendous advantage.

Senator WATKINS. I will come back to that.

Mr. ROBERTS. If we put it together, we have the potential, we have the know-how, we have the vital spiritual quality that is indomitable. But it cannot be indomitable if it is in the water-tight compartments that can be dealt with one at a time.

Senator WATKINS. I think we have the know-how. I think we have the basic philosophy of the dignity of man under the Christian ideals. I am a firm believer in that and absolutely against the idea of a man being the tool of the state. I think we have made greater progress, we have greater power, than any combination that the Russians may get together.

RUSSIAN RESPECT FOR TREATY

But what I am trying to get at is this fact: Do they know that? Do their people know it, do their rulers know that, and by reason of the fact that we get together, are they going to be deterred if they do not know it, and if they do not concede it? That is what worries me.

Mr. ROBERTS. So far as the foreign relations are concerned, "they" constitute perhaps 15 men. That is all. They are the ones who have all the opinion and all the power.

Senator WATKINS. They cannot go very far unless they have their people with them in the end.

Mr. ROBERTS. Why not? What they do is to whip up a campaign of patriotism for dear old Russia and turn these poor fellows in by the thousands.

Senator WATKINS. Does it make any difference to them, their men who have no regard for human life? I think as General Eisenhower pointed out in his conversation he had with Russian leaders when he asked them how they removed the mines, they said they just moved in the troops, marched them over them, and blew them up. "It does not make any difference about the losses. We would not have any more than if we had made an attack."

The men who have no regard for life do not seem to be deterred from that sort of thing, do they? In other words, they are deceived by their own propaganda. Sometimes the Republicans get deceived that way. We are deceived by our idea that we are going to win and do not win.

Mr. ROBERTS. No; I think they are very astute and very acute judges of the probabilities and all the considerations, and that would prompt aggression.

Senator WATKINS. Now of course, this is a matter for argument. I am presenting that point of view, and I want to get your reaction to it. I may be entirely wrong on that. I have been wrong a good many times in my life.

Mr. ROBERTS. We are together on that.

Senator WATKINS. Well, I think we have much better people; we have got a better idea; we have got more to fight for. Of course, it is a matter in the difference of the objective and how we are going to deal with it.

COMMUNIST INFILTRATION

Now we come to these nations you mentioned that the Russians have taken off one after another just like Hitler did. Suppose the Atlantic Pact had been in existence when Czechoslovakia was in the path of the Russians. How would we have stopped Czechoslovakia from setting up the type and form of government that she did? How could we have intervened if we had this pact, which, as I understand it, is against armed attack?

Mr. ROBERTS. Is what?

Senator WATKINS. It is against armed attack only. It does not go any further than armed attack. Now, I think it will be generally conceded there was no armed attack by Russia on Czechoslovakia.

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know that we could have reached it. I do not know that this pact would reach the complete denegation of French civilization by Communist infiltration.

Senator WATKINS. I would like to point out to you, and probably you will agree with me on this; so far as I can see, looking over the record, I cannot find any nation that Russia has actually taken over by armed attack.

Could you name one that she has taken over by an external armed attack?

Mr. ROBERTS. In and since the last war, no.

Senator WATKINS. During the last war, of course, she took over some by our agreement. Of course we cannot kick about that. She got part of Poland; she got the three Baltic states; and in effect she got most of the Baltic states, or at least her special sphere of influence, by reason of an agreement made at Yalta.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes.

Senator WATKINS. We cannot complain about that. I have been examining this record to see how we could use this pact, if we had it, as a practical matter to stop the kind of a campaign that she wages, and up to date the only kind she has waged.

Mr. ROBERTS. Senator, I have a very strong feeling that this pact would bolster the democratic governments in a number of these countries and almost put communism out of business there.

Senator WATKINS. Now there is that possibility.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think it is a very strong probability.

Senator WATKINS. But you said in your statement a moment ago, and I did not think you meant it, that Russia, just like Hitler, had picked off the Baltic states and Czechoslovakia.

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, she did, just like Hitler did. She picked them off one at a time, not by war, but picked them off because we were not prepared to say "No."

Senator WATKINS. Do you want this treaty amended so that it will take care of the infiltration as well as the armed attack? Now remember, this only goes to armed attack. We have an agreement that only covers certain things.

Mr. ROBERTS. I know.

Senator WATKINS. I voted for ERP. I voted for the Greek-Turkish loan. I voted twice for ERP. I feel we ought to help these people. There are certain things that bother me tremendously. I am going to come to one of those in a moment.

How on earth will this pact, maybe you can find a way, that is what I would like to get light of: How can this pact stop the kind of an attack and the kind of war that Russia is waging?

Mr. ROBERTS. Senator. I can only repeat what I said to your colleague, I cannot see how the economy of our friends in Europe is going to be rebuilt if they have got this constant threat that in a few days they could be over-run if Russia thought fit to over-run them. There is no way to stop them. They are without hope, I think.

FEAR OF WAR

Senator WATKINS. I call your attention to the fact that I think there has not been one single witness that has appeared here yet that says there is any imminent danger of war with Russia. They do not believe Russia is planning any armed attack. There may have been. I think I have heard them all, and I have not heard a one—the Secretary of State, the general of the Army, and all the men down the line have all agreed that they do not think Russia is planning an armed attack.

Mr. ROBERTS. You think, then, that the French all feel perfectly comfortable and happy and they do not fear Russia?

Senator WATKINS. Oh, no; we fear her over here.

Mr. ROBERTS. I disagree with you completely.

Senator WATKINS. No; I will agree with you that they fear Russia. We fear her over here. We are 3,000 miles away. We appropriate five or six times the money that anyone else—

Mr. ROBERTS. I would like to remove that fear if I could.

Senator WATKINS. I wonder if this will do it?

Mr. ROBERTS. They seem to think so. The French want it; they are anxious for it. Why do they want it?

Senator WATKINS. Maybe the next agreement, then, will be the logical step; that you think it is necessary that we have to take them in and make them a part of our country, not only for the purpose of—

Mr. ROBERTS. Make them a part of the federation; not a part of the country.

Senator WATKINS. I mean in the same government. Probably I have pursued that far enough.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think that would give them even greater assurance, of course.

Senator WATKINS. I do not see, unless you wish to add to that, that you can give, or anyone else up to date has given, any way to stop this infiltration thing by reason of this pact because we are already doing the economic thing under ERP in our Greek-Turkey—

The CHAIRMAN. The witness has already said that he did not think the treaty reached that.

Senator WATKINS. I just wanted it cleared up.

The CHAIRMAN. He said it. I do not see how he could make it any clearer.

OPERATION OF ATLANTIC UNION

Senator WATKINS. I have not asked him. I was just merely making a statement at that moment. Now, we come to this idea of yours that this first step in the pact is necessary in order to get this Atlantic union we are speaking of.

Have you projected into the future at all to see how a union of that kind would work among the States that are now in this list of those that have signed this pact?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think it would work very well with most of them.

Senator WATKINS. Suppose, for instance, over here we have a strong attachment to the private-enterprise system. Great Britain is now in the throes of nationalizing—going into socialism, and France, I understand, is more or less in that direction, and there is a definite trend over there for the socialistic idea.

Mr. ROBERTS. I think there is.

Senator WATKINS. There are more people over in Europe that would be in this union than we have in the United States. What as a practical matter would we do about that? Would we preserve the private-enterprise system or would we put it to a vote and go to socialism?

Mr. ROBERTS. They have nothing to do with our economy.

Senator WATKINS. They would not?

Mr. ROBERTS. No. The Constitution of the United States guarantees the republican form of government. Suppose California by a vote of its elected legislature adopted certain forms of State socialism.

Would you exclude her from the Union of the United States as long as she sent her representatives by election to Congress? Certainly not. She would have whatever government she had by virtue of her suffrage of her electorates. They would choose their form of government.

As long as they have a republican form of government, which means representative form of government, that is all the Constitution guarantees.

Senator WATKINS. And the constitution that you would project into the future would be the one that would let them preserve whatever they had?

Mr. ROBERTS. Certainly they could make their own internal economy, whatever they wanted.

Senator WATKINS. Notwithstanding it might be the cause for some irritation as between this part of the Federal Union and, for instance, Great Britain?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not see why it should cause any irritation.

SOCIALISM AND FREE ENTERPRISE UNDER ATLANTIC UNION

Senator WATKINS. We do have them, do we not, in the matter of trade and competition and all that sort of thing?

Mr. ROBERTS. I suppose that if California had a State socialistic system, her oranges and her lemons would still be shipped into other States, sold there, and paid for.

Senator WATKINS. I assume that. But when it comes to putting up the money from private enterprise, I mean paying the taxes to run a national federation, or I mean a federation of that kind—

Mr. ROBERTS. A national federation would collect its taxes from the citizens of California just as it does now, whether California had a Socialist system or what it had.

Senator WATKINS. How would the people of this country feel when they had to compete against solid blocks of people over there maintained by part of their taxes as competitors in their individual businesses over here? In other words, in Great Britain the steel industry would all be in one block partly paid out of taxes and protected by taxes paid by private enterprise over here in this country.

Do you think that would be fairer than anything that could possibly work under that condition?

Mr. ROBERTS. I think it would be entirely possible to work it out.

Senator WATKINS. I want to get your point of view. I am not going to pursue it any further. We have been a long time, and I would like to come to a statement made by Mr. Dulles with respect to the meaning of this pact.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you expect to interrogate the witness here and have him to construe what Mr. Dulles said or criticize what Mr. Dulles said?

Senator WATKINS. No, I do not intend to do that. I merely intend to refer to that to point up the problem that has been here more or less before us all the time, and that is as to the meaning of this pact.

Senator Donnell has asked some questions about it, but I want to call his attention to what I think is a very clear-cut statement of the purpose of the pact and what it actually means. I am quoting now from Mr. Dulles' statement made the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins, I do not want to be abrupt, but I hope you can indicate about how long it is going to take you. We have had a witness here all day. He has stood aside for others. He has to leave town, and he is a very important witness. We hope to hear him this afternoon.

Senator WATKINS. I do not think, Senator, I will be very much longer. This is the only one thing which I want to ask about.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

Senator WATKINS. Mr. Dulles in his very able statement on the pact, and I felt a very frank one, pointed out that the value in deterring war over there came because in this treaty, in this pact, we made it certain, and he emphasized the word "certain," that if any attack came on any one of the members that there would be a certain overwhelming force to meet it from all members of the pact.

He said, I recall, later on in his testimony, that we might just as well decide now and debate it now what we would do and what we certainly would do rather than to wait, because there would not be any time later on.

I think probably everybody would agree with that; that is, there would not be any time later on because of the blitzkrieg type of war that is engaged in.

As I gathered from his statement—I did not have the time at the moment while he was here to cross-examine him on it to be certain about it—but it seems from his language he indicates very clearly that he took the position that an attack on Norway—I do not just mean an incident, but I mean a major attack—

The CHAIRMAN. Five hundred thousand troops?

Senator WATKINS. I do not care whether it is 500,000; 200,000; or any other number, but any force that indicated, at least to Norway, that it was an all-out attack that she ought to repel and that she would repel; and she would call on us through her ministers and representatives to invoke the pact, get our help.

His point was, as he said it:

It means, I take it, that an armed attack upon Denmark—

let's put the word Norway, for example—is hereafter to be treated by the United States as an attack upon it—meaning the United States.

In other words, as I get it from his statement, he was clear-cut of the opinion that we would have to react just the same as if it were a major attack that had been made upon us. I think he finally said, in answer to Senator Donnell's question, that, under those circumstances, the President could go ahead, even if Congress were not in session, and start the fighting back and send our forces to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness has already gone into that and told his own views about it at some length right on that same point. Now, if we are just going to relash every point in this whole discussion by every member of the committee, we would be here until Christmas, I am afraid.

Senator WATKINS. You will never be here until Christmas by any holding up on my account. I assure you that.

The CHAIRMAN. Go right ahead. Ask your questions.

Senator WATKINS. I have used less time than anybody up to date.

Do you agree that that is the way we would have to treat it, as if it were an attack on our own country and that the President, under those circumstances—

Mr. ROBERTS. I stated, in answer to a number of questions by Senator Donnell, what my view was on that; and I do not think I care to add anything.

Senator WATKINS. Well, if you do not care, of course, to add anything to it; but I wanted to make it clear that if you take the position that Congress has no other choice left but to declare war if we live up to this agreement when that happens, that is what I want to know.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have not said anything of the kind.

Senator WATKINS. Is that your view; or do you feel that Congress still is free to act under those circumstances?

Mr. ROBERTS. Congress, in my judgment, is free to adopt the measures that it thinks are essential to carry out its obligation under the pact, to treat itself as if it had been attacked when some one of its allies has been attacked.

Senator WATKINS. Is it your view that Congress is free to decide not to do anything, has the right to decide not to do anything?

Mr. ROBERTS. Yes, Congress can violate a treaty. Nations have violated faith over and over again, but it cannot do it with any moral—

Senator WATKINS I mean still keep within the treaty. I am not asking about the violation of the treaty, Mr. Justice. I am asking about can it, in your view, refuse to do anything and still live within this treaty? That is the whole point that—

Mr. ROBERTS. No, it cannot, no. No, in my judgment, no.

Senator WATKINS. In other words, it is bound to act?

Mr. ROBERTS. If it determines there has been aggression, it is said:

We will take what we think are the proper measures to repel that aggression even to the extent of armed resistance.

Senator WATKINS. And will take the same steps we would have as if we had been attacked ourselves?

Mr. ROBERTS. Not necessarily. That is not what it says.

Senator WATKINS. That would be the reasonable interpretation, would it not?

Mr. ROBERTS. No, it would not, because I think in domestic attack—I have explained all this at great length in my views to Senator Donnell—I think a domestic attack calls on the President to repel the enemy from our borders immediately. He does not have to wait for Congress or anybody else.

Senator WATKINS. I was not clear whether you meant that an attack on Norway would not be the same as a domestic attack.

Mr. ROBERTS. I did not say it would be the same as a domestic attack on our own borders.

Senator WATKINS. You would not agree, then, with the statement made by Mr. Dulles?

Mr. ROBERTS. I do not know what Mr. Dulles said, and your question really confused me. It was such a long statement I could not follow it.

Senator WATKINS. I merely read what he said.

Mr. ROBERTS. I have stated my own view.

Senator WATKINS. Apparently it is not in agreement. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much. Mr. Justice, we are very greatly obliged to you for your outstanding statements and your clear views, and the distinctions which you make to these various questions and aspects.

Mr. ROBERTS. I feel it my duty as a good citizen to come and give you whatever little I can.

The CHAIRMAN. We think you are doing a great work in the field in which you are now active, as you did when you were in the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBERTS. It is a privilege to be here.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Kline, we will now hear you, sir.

STATEMENT OF ALLAN B. KLINE, PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION, ACCOMPANIED BY W. R. OGG, DIRECTOR, DEPARTMENT OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS, AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Mr. KLINE. I am Allan B. Kline, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation. I am happy to be here to present to you the views of our organization on the Atlantic Treaty for this committee.

The American Farm Bureau urges the approval of the pact. The members of the American Farm Bureau Federation, like the rest of America, want international peace and security. We do not like war. We want to live at peace with all the world. We want a peaceful and stable world in which men and nations can be free from fear and aggression. We want to assure that the basic human freedoms which we hold dear will be preserved.

Twice in our generation, America has fought in world wars to preserve these basic freedoms and to check totalitarian aggression aimed at world domination. Again, the peace and security of the world are threatened with totalitarian aggression. Already this ominous pattern of aggression has engulfed eastern Europe and much of the Far East.

Experience has shown that security from such aggression cannot be obtained through appeasement of totalitarian dictators. Heretofore, totalitarian aggressors have followed the familiar pattern of divide and conquer, picking off their victims one at a time, while lulling the others to a false security by nonaggression treaties or promises which later proved worthless. Each concession made to such dictators serves only to strengthen and encourage them to make further demands or seize further territory or power.

The American Farm Bureau Federation believes that America and the other peace-loving nations of the world must be strong enough to protect themselves against aggression and to preserve the peace. Peace-loving nations should unite their strength to protect each other and to safeguard their freedom.

RESOLUTION OF AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

I wish to quote the following excerpt from the resolution adopted at the annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation held last December:

Pending the time when the United Nations can become more effective, the United States should assist peace-loving nations to strengthen their leadership and resources to provide mutual security.

We favor regional arrangements such as the Inter-American Pact, the Western Union agreement, and the proposed North Atlantic Pact, so long as they are in accord with United Nations principles.

We favor continued support and strengthening of the United Nations. It must be recognized, however, that the United Nations has not been able thus far fully to achieve its objectives of maintaining international peace and security. Hence, the need for a regional pact.

SECURITY FROM AGGRESSION

Security from aggression is basic to the success of the European recovery program. We have invested huge sums to aid European recovery. Great progress has been made in spite of enormous difficulties. The very announcement of this program gave new hope and courage to the free people of Europe. The new spirit of unity in western Europe must be encouraged. It is now realized that these nations must also attain security from aggression, if they are to attain fully the goals of economic recovery and well-being contemplated under the European recovery program. Businessmen and financiers are reluctant to invest huge sums in plants, equipment, and other productive enterprises, so long as they are fearful that their countries and their properties and investments might be seized by Communist aggression from without or within.

These countries realize their own relatively defenseless position at this time and their inability, individually and unaided, to defend themselves successfully. But some 200,000,000 peoples in these countries, with their large industrial resources and technical know-how, when joined with the power and aid of the United States, constitute a formidable barrier to any nation which might contemplate aggression.

The North Atlantic Pact, therefore, is a powerful instrument for international peace and security. I believe that the chances of maintaining peace and preventing another world war will be greatly improved if this pact is ratified and implemented with the necessary military assistance.

Agreement by the nations signatory to the pact is a monumental achievement. This unity of purpose to present a united front against aggression, to settle their disputes by peaceful means, and to adhere to the principles of the United Nations is of great significance.

SELF-HELP AND MUTUAL AID

Like the European recovery program, the North Atlantic Pact is built around the principles of maximum self-help and mutual assistance. In article 3, the signatory nations agree separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, to maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

This pooling of resources in planning and mutual assistance will make these efforts far more successful than any individual efforts of the various countries concerned. Had these countries had such a pact, implemented by effective mutual military coordination and assistance, World War II might have been averted.

The signatory parties agree that an armed attack against any one of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all and that they will assist any signatory nation that is the subject of an armed attack. This is the heart of the North Atlantic Pact.

The very fact that this powerful group of nations agree to such a commitment will have great influence in restraining would-be aggressors and creating confidence among the peoples of these nations. We know this from our own experience in this hemisphere with our historic Monroe Doctrine. The North Atlantic Pact is patterned after the Inter-American Pact, which was signed at Rio de Janeiro in 1947 and which, in turn, is an outgrowth of the Monroe Doctrine. The Inter-American Pact provides that an armed attack against one of the signatory parties is to be considered an attack against all, and the members are obligated to consult and extend aid to any member that is attacked or threatened with aggression.

THE TREATY AND THE UNITED NATIONS

The North Atlantic Pact is designed to supplement and strengthen the United Nations, instead of undermining or jeopardizing it. It fits into the pattern and purposes of the United Nations. The Charter of the United Nations, in article 51, specifically recognizes the right of individual and collective self-defense by members of the United Nations.

The Charter also permits and contemplates the development of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the purposes and principles of the United Nations. The North Atlantic Pact makes it very clear that this regional arrangement must be conducted in accord with the United Nations Charter.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF THE TREATY

The pact is clearly directed toward self-defense against aggression. As Ambassador Austin and others have pointed out, no nation need fear this pact unless that nation is itself plotting aggression against some member of the pact.

The peaceful character of the pact is further evident from its provisions wherein signatory parties agree to settle their disputes by peaceful means, to refrain from the use or threat of force in their international relations in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations, to live in peace with all peoples and all governments, to promote stability and well-being in the North Atlantic area; to "safeguard the freedom, common heritage, and civilization of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law"; to seek "to promote stability and well-being in the North American area"; to develop "peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being"; to "seek to eliminate conflict in their international policies" and to "encourage economic collaboration between any or all of the members of the North Atlantic community."

These are not the purposes and declarations of warmongers but they represent the aspirations for peace, security, and economic well-being of the hundreds of millions of people in these nations.

THE MILITARY-ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

It is recognized that mutual aid in the form of military assistance will be required in order to make the Atlantic Pact fully effective. This assistance, like that furnished under the ECA program, should be based on the principle of maximum self-help and the coordination of programs. The relative need for economic and military assistance must be carefully appraised in the light of all relevant factors, and United States aid necessarily must take into consideration our own security requirements and our own resources.

We recognize that such additional assistance by the United States will impose an additional burden on our economy and will entail substantial sacrifices by the American people. It seems obvious, however, that these nations, by pooling their resources and by uniting their strength in common purpose and planning, can provide far greater security against aggression and at less cost than will be the case if each undertakes independently to provide adequate security for its own nation individually.

We believe that such expenditures should be regarded as investments for peace and security. The attainment of collective security is imperative, if all of the gigantic efforts and vast sums we have expended in the European recovery program are to be safeguarded and the gains under that program are to be maintained.

The purpose of the pact is to avoid a war, which would destroy all the gains so far made and more.

The nations signatory to this pact represent the culmination of western Christian civilization. The institutions and freedoms embodied in this civilization are gravely jeopardized. However, these same nations, given the means for unity of action behind the common purpose to maintain peace can be successful. This is the purpose of the North Atlantic Pact, embodying the combined will of hundreds of millions of people of good will who are determined to stand together to safeguard their freedom and security.

POSITION OF AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

The basis for our position in support of the pact is, first, the action of the voting delegates at the regular annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation last December. At that time we noted our belief that the regional pact approach to security was a sound one; and the proposed North Atlantic Pact we mentioned by name as one which in our opinion might well be followed, or might well be considered seriously as an approach in this regional pact field which would lead toward real international security.

It is fundamental in the thinking of our farmers that there is a close unity between the economics of security and the military aspects of security. We believe that the North Atlantic Pact as it has been approved by representatives of the European nations involved and the United States represents a continuation of the cooperative effort as between the United States and these various European countries for their mutual protection.

This North Atlantic Pact seems further to give a basis for a new confidence in and among the European nations, one which can lead to a dramatic furtherance of the sort of economic development in those countries which will not only support security in the military sense, but which also will further the kind of development which makes them strong in the economic sense and thereby contribute likewise to the economic aspects of security.

It is our opinion—it is, in fact, our desire as an organization—that the pact does make additional commitments on the part of the United States and that they are sincere and that they are significant. If it were not so, we would see no reason why any European country should feel any great benefit or enthusiasm for the proposition; nor would we think that citizens of the United States might feel that there was here something which would really correlate and unite the tremendous resources—the human resources and physical resources and technical resources, of the countries covered by the pact—so that they might individually spend less of their energies in this matter of defense and more in the promotion of the sort of things which democratic countries are designed to further as the fortunes of the individual citizens involved.

Mr. Chairman, that is the basis for the thinking of our farmers on the proposition. That is all.

DEFENSIVE NATURE OF TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much. I want to ask you one question. I notice in your statement on page 4 you point out that the pact is clearly directed toward self-defense against aggression.

As Ambassador Austin and others have pointed out, no nation need fear this pact unless that nation is itself plotting aggression against some member of the pact.

That is true, is it not?

Mr. KLINE. That, we think, is a clear intent of the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no aggressive action suggested anywhere in the pact, is there?

Mr. KLINE. We believe that this pact is a pact for defense. It is a pact to defend against the possibility of aggression. It is a bulwark against the probability or even the possibility of war. It is entirely designed to protect liberty. It has no aggressive aspects in it any place. Its purposes are clearly stated in the pact. Its purposes are further supported by the traditional attitudes of the countries which are signatory to the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there not a specific clause that "the peaceful character of the pact is further evidence of its provisions wherein signatory parties agree to settle their disputes by peaceful means, to refrain from the use of further force in their international relations in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the unit nations, to live in peace with all peoples and all governments," and other statements of that character?

Mr. KLINE. That is right, and it seems to me it is a perfectly clear statement and that it carries additional force because it is consistent with the traditions of the nations which are signatory to the pact.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Thank you. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins?

APPROVAL OF AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Senator WATKINS. I notice you state this is made in behalf of the Farm Bureau Federation. When was the matter of the approval or disapproval of the pact put up to the federation by the officials?

Mr. KLINE. The specific approval of this pact has not come to our federation's delegates, because actually the meeting was held in December. However, there is a quotation from the resolution passed at that time, which I read in my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that resolution by the membership?

Mr. KLINE. Yes, sir. The American Farm Bureau Federation has one annual meeting each year. At that meeting all the member States have delegates. There are some 130 delegates to the annual meeting. This was approved by the delegates.

Senator WATKINS. What date was that held?

Mr. KLINE. About the 14th of December 1948.

Senator WATKINS. The reason I ask the question, I think I am still a member of the Utah Farm Bureau; I have been for many years. I think I am still in good standing. But I do not remember this question ever being submitted to that State farm bureau for approval; it may have been.

Mr. KLINE. The resolutions committee of the Farm Bureau Federation is drawn from many States. In this instance I am sure that President Schenck, of Utah, was on the resolutions committee.

However, the resolutions committee is always free to approve resolutions on the basis of their best judgment and always take into consideration the various resolutions of all the States, the States again taking into consideration the resolutions of counties.

But it would be ridiculous to assume that all the resolutions which appeared in the national resolutions appeared in the resolutions of each of the States, of course.

Secretary WATKINS. What I wanted to know is just how far the members themselves have committed themselves on this point. I received many letters from our people at home. Some of them are Farm Bureau people, and they are violently against the pact. That is what suggested the question.

I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. His State was represented? Utah had a delegate?

Mr. KLINE. Oh, yes; all member States are represented.

The CHAIRMAN. And they had a vote on this resolution?

Mr. KLINE. Certainly.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask some questions?

The CHAIRMAN. I beg your pardon, Senator.

Senator DONNELL. Is that agreeable?

The CHAIRMAN. That is agreeable.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Kline, you say the meeting was held about December 14, 1948?

Mr. KLINE. It was the second week in December. December 16 was the date of the official passage of the resolution.

TIMING OF THE TREATY AND THE RESOLUTION OF THE AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION

Senator DONNELL. Of course, you are aware of the fact, as stated in the letter from the Secretary of State to the President, dated April 7, 1949, that negotiation of the treaty was begun in December and finished on March 15. There had been some preliminary conversations and agreement reached on the general nature of the treaty, but that actual negotiation of the treaty was begun in December and finished on March 15, 1949. You know that, do you not, Mr. Kline?

Mr. KLINE. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. So that at the time the resolution by your body was passed on December 14, the actual negotiation of the treaty had not been under way very long, and certainly the treaty had not then been completed, had it?

Mr. KLINE. That is quite true.

Senator DONNELL. I think we have had testimony here to the effect that there was a very material change in the treaty after Secretary Acheson went in as Secretary of State, January 21, 1949. Had you seen any draft of the treaty or had anyone in your organization, so far as you know, seen any preliminary draft of the treaty at the time this resolution was passed, December 14, or thereabouts, 1948?

Mr. KLINE. We did not at that time study the details of any draft of any treaty. We did, however, discuss the general principles of collective security; and we have, I think, as you know, a department of international affairs which closely follows the interests, as we see them, of our members in the international field.

We have followed closely the procedures with regard to the North Atlantic Treaty; and it does seem to us that, as it is stated in the more or less general terms essential in so brief a statement on so broad a matter, that the treaty is consistent with the principles which we had in mind at the time the resolution was adopted.

Senator DONNELL. At any rate, when the resolution was passed, you had never seen the draft of the treaty?

Mr. KLINE. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. And you know it has been quite considerably changed, even from what it was January 20, 1949?

Mr. KLINE. I think it is quite inconsequential in our present position what it may have been at various stages or in the minds of various people.

FAMILIARITY WITH TEXT OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Have you read the treaty yourself?

Mr. KLINE. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. When did you last read it?

Mr. KLINE. About 30 minutes ago.

Senator DONNELL. When did you first read it?

Mr. KLINE. This kind of thing we let our Department study. I would not be ready to say. Further, I do not exactly remember.

Senator DONNELL. Had you ever read it before 30 minutes ago?

Mr. KLINE. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. About how long ago had you read it?

Mr. KLINE. I am just not prepared to answer.

Senator DONNELL. Had you read it within the last week?

The CHAIRMAN. He said he could not answer.

Senator DONNELL. Surely he can tell whether he read it in the last week. I am not asking this critically. I think we are entitled to know.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not asking. You are making an argument.

Senator DONNELL. I am not. I am asking him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. He has answered the question that he does not know when it was that he had read it before a half hour ago.

Senator DONNELL. He may not know exactly when he read it. Do you know whether you read it within the last week?

Mr. KLINE. Is it fair to ask the purpose of the question?

Senator DONNELL. It is to find out whether you read it within the last week.

Mr. KLINE. It does not seem to be pertinent to me to the attitude of the Farm Bureau on the treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the committee, but I respectfully submit that that is not an answer to the question; and, after all, the witness, if he is appearing here in behalf of this Farm Bureau Federation, ought to answer the questions.

The CHAIRMAN. He cannot answer if he says he does not know, and that is what he says.

Senator DONNELL. I would like to ask him one further question. Had you read this treaty within the last month?

Mr. KLINE. I think the answer to that is "Yes." If you mean, had I read it within the last month, I have already answered it.

Senator DONNELL. You read it 30 minutes ago. I want to know if you had ever read it before that, during the last month.

Mr. KLINE. Yes, I had read the treaty before, during the last month.

REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS AND THE TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Very well. Now, Mr. Kline, you speak on page 2:

Hence the need for a regional pact.

Then again on page 4 you quote from the Charter:

* * * regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate * * * which is quoted precisely from article 2 of chapter 8 of the United Nations Charter, headed "Regional Arrangements."

Then you say:

The North Atlantic Pact makes it very clear that this regional arrangement must be conducted in accord with the United Nations Charter.

What do you mean by this regional arrangement? Are you talking about the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. KLINE. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You think it is a regional arrangement under this article 52 that you have quoted from here on page 4 of your statement?

Mr. KLINE. As a matter of fact, I am not a constitutional lawyer.

Senator DONNELL. I did not ask you that.

Mr. KLINE. I am not prepared to discuss technically the legal relationships between the United Nations Charter and the North Atlantic Pact, the North Atlantic Treaty.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Kline, with all due respect—

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute. He had not finished.

Mr. KLINE. I am through.

Senator DONNELL. With all due respect and without the slightest criticism of you or the Federation, for which, as you know, I have great respect, you come in here before this committee and say, "The North Atlantic Pact makes it very clear that this regional arrangement must be conducted in accord with the United Nations Charter."

I am asking you, therefore, whether this regional arrangement to which you are referring, which you say is the North Atlantic Treaty, is a regional arrangement under this article that you quoted immediately in advance of this sentence, namely, article 52 of the United Nations Charter?

Mr. KLINE. Again I say that I am not a constitutional lawyer. If the committee will permit, I will ask Mr. Ogg if he is prepared to make a technical answer.

Mr. Ogg. Mr. Chairman and Senator Donnell, it is my opinion, for what it is worth, that this is a regional arrangement such as contemplated in the Charter of the United Nations. In fact, throughout this Atlantic Pact there are references to the Charter of the United Nations. The very first declaration in the preamble reads as follows:

The Parties to this Treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations * * *.

And in article 5 it specifically requires that any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council of the United Nations.

Furthermore, article 5 specifically requires that such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

It seems to me that that is very clear that the parties intend to maintain the supremacy and jurisdiction of the Security Council in any matters involved in restoring and maintaining international peace; so that, in fact, when the Security Council is able and does act effectively, they must terminate any measures under this.

You have here some very distinguished Members, Senator Connally and Senator Vandenberg, who helped draft the United Nations Charter. They are much better qualified to answer that question than I.

The CHAIRMAN. You made a very clear statement.

Senator DONNELL. I thank you very much, Mr. Ogg. I am wondering if either you or Mr. Kline would answer this question. On page 4 of Mr. Kline's statement appears the language quoted right out of article 52 of the United Nations Charter, which is in chapter 8, which, in turn, is entitled "Regional Arrangements." Then immediately after that quotation, from article 52, is this sentence in Mr. Kline's statement:

The North Atlantic Pact makes it very clear that this regional arrangement must be conducted in accord with the United Nations Charter.

REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS UNDER THE CHARTER

I understand that that regional arrangement which the North Atlantic Pact makes it very clear that must be conducted in accord with the United Nations Charter is the North Atlantic Treaty. Is that right?

Mr. Ogg. That is my interpretation; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ogg, I have known you for some years. I want to ask, are you a lawyer?

Mr. Ogg. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. But you have studied the Charter and you have studied the treaty?

Mr. Ogg. I certainly have, very carefully.

Senator DONNELL. Perhaps you assisted in the preparation of the statement? Am I correct in that?

Mr. OGG. I assisted.

Senator DONNELL. In fact, I should not be surprised if the statement is very largely your work. Is that correct? Is that correct, Mr. Kline?

Mr. KLINE. We have a considerable staff; we divide up the work. It is quite true that Mr. Ogg did prepare most of this statement. It is in his field.

Mr. OGG. May I just add this, Senator Donnell?

The CHAIRMAN. That does not disparage your agreement with the statement?

Senator DONNELL. Not at all.

Mr. KLINE. It makes no difference in the responsibility of the statement whatever.

Mr. OGG. May I add this comment in the interests of clarification, Senator Donnell, with reference to your earlier question about the Farm Bureau's position in December. You will note the excerpt from our annual meeting resolution which President Kline quoted in his statement is worded in a way in which it states that we favor regional arrangements such as the Atlantic Pact, the Inter-American Pact, and so forth. Of course, you could not endorse something specifically that had not been actually negotiated, but it had been certainly publicly discussed for some time. Several months earlier, the Senate of the United States, in passing the Vandenberg resolution—I think there were only four votes against it—specifically directed the Government of the United States to use every effort to negotiate such an arrangement as is now embodied in this treaty.

Senator DONNELL. My question is not in the slightest critical. What I wanted to find out is this, and I am glad to find it: that you prepared a large part of the statement. May I ask you, if you will turn to page 4 of the mimeographed statement, the first paragraph, which is the one that quotes from article 52 chapter 8, under the heading of "Regional arrangements," and then makes that statement:

The North Atlantic Pact makes it very clear that this regional arrangement must be conducted in accord with the United Nations Charter.

Did you prepare that paragraph, please?

Mr. OGG. As a matter of fact, that particular statement was prepared by President Kline. That last statement.

Senator DONNELL. Do you concur in it?

Mr. OGG. I certainly do, 100 percent.

Senator DONNELL. I am very much interested to note your concurrence in the view that this is a regional arrangement under this particular article 52, chapter 8 of the United Nations Charter. I understand that is your view? Is that correct?

Mr. OGG. I think it is such an arrangement.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ogg, have you observed other statements to the effect, either official or unofficial, that this North Atlantic Treaty is a regional arrangement?

Mr. OGG. Almost every statement I have seen explaining it or commenting on it, as I understand it, so regards it as one of the types of arrangements contemplated under the Charter.

Senator DONNELL. In fact, it is called the North Atlantic Treaty, is it not?

GEOGRAPHIC SCOPE OF TREATY

Mr. Ogg. You only have to look at the map there on the wall to see that it is regional in character. Whether it is to be recognized as a regional arrangement under article 52 is a legal question for decision by the nations signatory to the pact and by the United Nations organization.

Senator DONNELL. Of course, there might be some question in the mind of some of us as to whether or not the United States of America and the Aleutian Islands are in the same region with the topmost part of Norway.

Mr. Ogg. Of course, it might be a little difficult to draw the line in some spots. You might have a difference of opinion as to just where it ought to be drawn, but it certainly is a very distinct region.

Senator DONNELL. And the treaty itself says:

They therefore agree to this North Atlantic Treaty.

And that fortifies you in your opinion to some extent in the view that this is a regional arrangement; does it not?

Mr. Ogg. I think, as I said before, it very clearly is a regional arrangement.

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Ogg, referring to this region, is Italy, in your opinion, on the Atlantic Ocean or anywhere close to it, particularly the North Atlantic?

Mr. Ogg. It is not very far away from the Atlantic Ocean. I have ridden across there from Italy to the Atlantic Ocean. It does not take very long. It would not take a military plane very long to fly over there.

Senator DONNELL. But it does not front on the Atlantic Ocean in any way; does it?

Mr. Ogg. And certainly it is a vital part of the community in Europe who are signatory to this pact, including France, which adjoins Italy.

Senator DONNELL. Do you recall that the original negotiations for this treaty did not include Italy at all? Did you know that?

Mr. Ogg. It started out with a smaller group.

Senator DONNELL. It started out with the Governments of Belgium, France, Luxemburg, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, and the United States. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. Ogg. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And did not include Italy.

Mr. Ogg. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know why Italy was comprehended within a regional treaty called the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. Ogg. Well, I think that is a question the State Department could answer with much more authority than I; but, as I said before, it does seem to me that, first, the inclusion of Italy is a very vital part of the security of the European nations that are signatory to the pact; secondly, it does seem to me very evident that, since the purpose of this treaty is to present a united front of the democratic nations against the threat of totalitarian aggression or aggression of any type, the more strength you unite in this purpose, the more successful it will be.

I just express that as an opinion.

REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS UNDER THE CHARTER

Senator DONNELL. I notice in this statement which Mr. Kline has presented that the use of this term "regional arrangement" involves precisely the same language as is contained in article 54, which is within chapter 8, Regional Arrangements, of the United Nations Charter, save only that it is "regional arrangement," whereas in article 54 of that chapter 8 it is plural, "regional arrangements."

Had you observed that?

Mr. OGG. I had not observed it until you called my attention to it. One is singular and the other is plural. I do not know what significance you attach to it. Mr. Kline's statements used both the singular and the plural forms, where appropriate to do so.

Senator DONNELL. There is no difference as far as I can see. In other words, the point I have in mind is: It is precisely the same language except that one is singular, and the one is plural that is used in the article 54 of chapter 8 of the United Nations Charter; is it not?

Mr. OGG. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And article 54 says:

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Is that not so?

Mr. OGG. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know the membership of the Security Council?

Mr. OGG. I do not know that I could give you every country right offhand. The United States, of course, is a permanent member.

Senator DONNELL. If you would be kind enough to turn to article—

Mr. OGG. I am familiar with that, but I do not believe I could give it to you from memory.

Senator DONNELL. I was just going to ask you if you would be kind enough to turn to article 23 of the Charter—do you have that before you?

Mr. OGG. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL (reading):

The Security Council shall consist of eleven Members of the United Nations. The Republic of China, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, and the United States of America shall be permanent members of the Security Council.

There is provision in the next section for the nonpermanent members. So that we find, then, Mr. Ogg, as I see it, that you or Mr. Kline make it very clear with your concurrence that the North Atlantic Treaty is a regional arrangement under article 52, chapter 8, of the United Nations Charter entitled "Regional Arrangements"; that article 54 provides that the Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements, or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security, and that among the permanent members of the Security Council, which is required by article 54, of the United Nations Charter, to be so kept fully informed of activities, is the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

That is correct; is it not?

Mr. Ogg. I believe it is a regional arrangement of the type contemplated by the United Nations Charter. Whether it is intended to be such an agreement is a matter for the signatory countries to determine; whether it is to be recognized legally as such is a question for the United Nations Organization to determine.

Senator DONNELL. That is all, Mr. Ogg.

Mr. KLINE. Mr. Chairman, would it be all right for me to summarize an attitude here and expression of attitude on the part of the American Farm Bureau Federation concisely?

The CHAIRMAN. If it does not provoke too much discussion.

Mr. KLINE. I withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN. No; go ahead and make it.

Mr. KLINE. I do not know about the discussion. I can guarantee nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. KLINE. In the first place, the objective of the pact is collective security. To a group of farmers, it seems that there is a real significance in an article like article 3 in that it is designed to mean something further than what we already have.

It is based on confidence and trust. It is not based on a quibbling with regard to the exact meaning of the legal definition. It is, after all, an over-all approach to the problem of collective security based upon confidence and trust.

It is accepted with a certain enthusiasm in Europe. I have been to Europe 4 out of the last 5 years. For each of the 3 years prior to this year, I found a very considerable unrest, and one of its major features was the fear that, while the United States was now there, when the zero moment came, if it came, we might be gone.

It does seem to me that there is here the intention to create a confidence that these nations in the North Atlantic Pact would be with each other when the zero hour came.

COLLECTIVE SELF-DEFENSE

It is, then, based on the assumption that we can create the atmosphere in which the third world war does not come along. We have had two just in my lifetime. We sort of backed into them. A little at a time we were dragged into them. Now we say, "That approach did not work. Let us try now to get together all these magnificent resources, all these grand determinations in the minds of the men in the free nations and let us see if that will not work."

That to me is the meaning of the Atlantic Pact. It is not a thing of quibbling about the exact definition. It is a matter of committing the United States of America to the purposes of collective security with, to be sure, that intention and determination understood, that you will act upon the basis of your best judgment as problems arise from time to time that require decisions.

But you have committed yourself to the proposition. That seems to me to be a very great and very significant thing in the proposal of the North Atlantic Pact.

That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much for your testimony. We thank you for your good statement.

We have one more witness, Mr. McKee.

STATEMENT OF FREDERICK C. McKEE, NATIONAL CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Mr. McKEE. Gentlemen, I will make this very brief. You have my statement. I know you want to get away.

The CHAIRMAN. You have been here all day; you have been patient. We want to hear you. Tell the reporter your name and your business.

Mr. McKEE. Frederick C. McKee, Pittsburgh businessman, national chairman of the Committee on National Affairs, with its headquarters in New York.

DEFERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

I believe that an Atlantic Pact would probably have prevented the First and Second World Wars and that the Atlantic Pact can probably prevent a third world war if its principles are applied throughout the world.

The Kaiser apparently never thought that the British would fight to defend Belgium and France. Had he imagined that both Britain and the United States would ultimately be involved, he would probably not have taken the risk of a war of conquest to satisfy his personal ambitions. After Britain and France had sacrificed the well-equipped army and air force of Czechoslovakia at Munich, Hitler apparently never thought that they would fight to defend Poland.

Mr. Winston Churchill is reported to have said that there were at least six times that Hitler could have been stopped short of a world war. We can see now where, over and over again, the failure of the democracies to take adequate cooperative action against aggression encouraged the Axis to think that they could get away with new seizures.

For lack of an Atlantic Pact, the democracies allowed Hitler to overrun one potential ally after another until at last the Axis, in control of most of Europe and China, felt strong enough to attack us.

COMPATIBILITY WITH UNITED NATIONS CHARTER

Some critics of the Atlantic Pact have argued that it is contrary to the Charter of the United Nations. I am national treasurer of the American Association for the United Nations, and I firmly believe that not only is the Atlantic Pact in keeping with the spirit of article 51 of the Charter, but that such defense pacts are essential until the United Nations can have its own international police force, superior in strength to that of any other nation.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Some have argued against the pact on the basis that we cannot afford the rearmament involved. Certainly a pact without rearmament is better than no pact at all. But the proposals for rearmament represent less than 3 percent of our total budget, less than five-eighths of 1 percent of our national income, and less than one-half of 1 percent of the cost of World War II.

Certainly this is a very small premium to pay for insurance to help protect what we have invested in Europe, what we have at home, and our very lives. The further away our front lines of defense, the fewer Americans would die in a war of guided missiles and atomic bombs. We could not exist for long as a North American island of 175,000,000 people in a world dominated by 2,000,000,000 Communists and slaves.

If our potential allies were sufficiently armed to render improbable further Soviet aggression, the increase in confidence, international and domestic trade, and security values would probably produce increased tax revenue far in excess of the expenditure involved.

PROVOCATIVENESS OF TREATY

Some of the critics of the pact have argued by some strange logic that the Atlantic Pact would bring on a third world war. This same argument was used against Greek-Turkish aid and ECA. On the contrary, whenever we have stood firm without potential allies Soviet aggression has halted, and where we have procrastinated it has moved forward.

I believe that part of the fuzzy thinking about the pact arises from an illusion that we are living in a state of peace, whereas we are actually not even living in an armistice. To a considerable extent we are living in a state of war—a hot war in Greece and China and a cold war in other parts of the world. Whether this condition can be converted into a state of peace will depend largely on whether we and our allies are so united and armed that the ruthless realists in the Kremlin will not risk new attempts at conquest.

We have studied this problem. Our executive committee has sent to a number of prominent Americans and has received letters from 120 of them endorsing the pact; and that has been sent to each Member of the Senate and was reprinted in the Herald Tribune and other papers.

The question in dealing with these men too often has been deferred. There is the question, Shall we irritate him? The question was said about Hitler; give him each time what he wants. Each time he wanted just one more country.

We will not read what they said. Hitler wrote Mein Kampf; Stalin has made his statements; Mao Tse-Tung in China has made his statement. We will not take these men at their word that they have no other ambition than complete world domination and conquest.

On the other hand, they are realists, and we have seen that where there is a united effort they have stopped.

The statement is made about fanatics. Will they see the facts? That same thing might be argued against any insane person. We do not give way to them. We get together sufficient force that they can be restrained.

I think that we are at a very critical point. I think that the failure to ratify this pact will be as great a disaster as Munich.

Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. We want to thank you. I have no questions. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George?

Senator GEORGE. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. Just on one point alone. Your testimony is titled "Testimony of Frederick C. McKee, National Chairman, Committee on National Affairs." Are you appearing here for the Committee on National Affairs, Mr. McKee?

Mr. McKEE. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. You are the national chairman of that committee?

Mr. McKEE. That is right.

MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Senator DONNELL. How large a membership, and where is it located?

Mr. McKEE. We have an executive committee of about 20, with headquarters in New York. We do not have a large membership as you would call in thousands throughout the country. It is made up of many of the people who are active in the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, in which I was the national treasurer. That committee had about 900 branches and sent millions of petitions to Congress. This committee is composed of leaders.

Senator DONNELL. Wait a minute. You mean this executive committee?

Mr. McKEE. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. The committee of 20 in New York City?

Mr. McKEE. Yes; that is right.

Senator DONNELL. Is composed of what, you say?

Mr. McKEE. That is composed of people who have been active in the Committee to Defend America and other committees of that type. We have not attempted to get membership running into the hundreds of thousands.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. McKee, if it is agreeable to the chairman, would you be kind enough to file for the record here, to be incorporated in the transcript of these proceedings, a list of the members of the executive committee?

Mr. McKEE. I will be glad to do that.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know what the total membership of the entire organization is?

Mr. McKEE. I cannot give you that exactly.

Senator DONNELL. I do not want it exactly. Is it as many as a thousand.

Mr. McKEE. It is less than a thousand.

Senator DONNELL. Is it as many as 500?

Mr. McKEE. I will not say that. I will have to check it.

Senator DONNELL. Would you be kind enough to put that information in also, and please also state the geographical distribution by States? Would you do that, please?

Mr. McKEE. I will give you a list of that.

(The list is as follows:)

FAMILIARITY WITH TREATY

Senator DONNELL. One final question, and that is this. Did your executive committee meet and authorize you to present this statement?

Mr. McKEE. Yes; they did.

Senator DONNELL. When was that meeting held?

Mr. McKEE. That meeting was held a week ago last Thursday.

Senator DONNELL. And was a copy of the Atlantic Pact exhibited to that committee at that time?

Mr. McKEE. I happened to be in Chicago on business. The other officers were there; that is, the secretary and treasurer. The Atlantic Pact had been under discussion by us for some time, both before and after it was actually published. That is, working on the basis of the newspaper reports.

Senator DONNELL. I mean, though, was there actually a copy of the North Atlantic Treaty before the executive committee at its meeting in New York that it held recently?

Mr. McKEE. I think they were all familiar with it. I am not able to say that because I stated I was unable to be at the meeting, being in Chicago on business.

Senator DONNELL. Do you know whether a copy of the North Atlantic Pact has ever been circulated to each member of the executive committee?

Mr. McKEE. I think each of them has read it. We did not send an actual mailing to all of them, because they are all people who are interested and have kept themselves informed on that. So I cannot answer that question specifically.

Senator DONNELL. You do not know actually, personally, whether they have all read it or not?

Mr. McKEE. I cannot say that as to each one.

Senator DONNELL. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. We want to thank you, Mr. McKee, very much for your statement. It was very informative and very clear.

The committee will recess at this time.

(Thereupon, at 5:20 p. m., the committee recessed until 10:30 a. m. Monday, May 9, 1949.)

THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

MONDAY, MAY 9, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment on May 6, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., at 10:30 a. m., Senator Tom Connally, chairman of the committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), Tydings, Green, McMahon, Fulbright, Vandenberg, and Hickenlooper.

Also present: Senators Donnell and Watkins.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Foreign Relations has the great pleasure and honor of having with us today former Secretary of War Robert P. Patterson, of New York, a very able and outstanding citizen and one of the warriors in behalf of peace and the settlement of international relations by peaceful means.

Judge Patterson, we have representatives here of the League of Women Voters and the General Federation of Women's Clubs and the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace. You were really scheduled ahead of them, but I understand they have very short statements to make and I was wondering if your characteristic chivalry would not allow that we hear them first.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is quite agreeable to me, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The League of Women Voters; Mrs. Stone.

STATEMENT OF MRS. KATHRYN H. STONE, FIRST VICE PRESIDENT, LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mrs. STONE. The League of Women Voters supports United States ratification of the North Atlantic Pact. We believe that the pact is a necessary step at this time toward a more stable world.

We in the league have been concerned for many years with the difficult and painfully slow task of building an adequate system of collective security. We had hoped and expected that the next advance in such a system could be taken by the United Nations itself. Unfortunately the hoped-for cooperation between the major powers has not materialized and the United Nations has not yet been able to fulfill its security functions. There is today no collective force to check aggression; yet fear of aggression, particularly among the nations of western Europe, has become a pressing reality. Some immediate security measures are needed to fill the gap. Reluctantly the league has come to the conclusion that the North Atlantic Pact is necessary to help keep the peace until the United Nations is able to do so.

PRINCIPLES IN SUPPORTING THE PACT

In supporting the pact, the league would like to stress two principles:

1. A universal system of collective security under the United Nations remains our goal. The pact should be used as a means toward that end, to give time in which a strong United Nations and a stable peace can be built. This goal should be kept constantly to the fore. We urge our Government to continue to work toward reaching agreement in the United Nations on UN forces, the regulation of armaments, and control of atomic energy.

2. While considering the pact a necessary holding measure, the League of Women Voters believes that the United States should build positively toward peace by vigorous action in the economic and social field—through such means as the European recovery program, the reciprocal trade agreements program, and United States membership in the International Trade Organization. These positive steps are as important in the long run as the security measures. In implementing the pact, its military arrangements should be subordinate as far as possible to the economic needs of Europe through ERP.

AUTHORITY FOR POSITION OF LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS

The league's position on the pact has been reached only after thorough consideration by our membership. I think you gentlemen on the committee will be better able to weigh our statement if I explain briefly the process by which it developed.

Authority for the league position comes from the program adopted by the delegates at the national convention in March, 1948, at Grand Rapids. The program reads:

The League of Women Voters will work for United States policies directed toward an enduring world peace, supported by a strong United Nations and made possible by a sound domestic and world economy.

In adopting item IV—

Use of all means available under the Charter to increase the security functions of the United Nations—

the convention foresaw the possibility of league support of a measure such as the Atlantic Pact. The explanation of the program which is based on convention discussion reads:

Pending the implementation of the major provisions (security provisions of the UN Charter), other steps toward international security are possible under the Charter. Joint action for self-defense is permitted under article 51, in case the Security Council fails to act. There are further possibilities in the development of regional arrangements—economic, political and military. The league will follow closely the growing trend toward regional integration, as seen in the Pan-American system and the progress toward a European union. The league will weigh, with a view to supporting, action which the United States might take to strengthen collective security through such special arrangements within the framework of the United Nations.

The league will keep to the fore the principle that a universal security system under the United Nations is still the primary and urgent objective; regional arrangements, or collective agreements under article 51, should be subordinate to this objective and integrated into a universal system once it is established.

Since the convention league members have carefully followed the development of the pact. In their discussion groups throughout the country, they have weighed the pros and cons, and have helped bring this important issue to the attention of others in their communities. The leagues have been unusually conscientious in keeping their national board abreast of their thinking as it evolved. During the week of April 25, our national council, consisting of two delegates from each State, met in Washington and brought to us the latest thinking of the membership.

I should like to add that we in the league are not enthusiastic about this step, but consider it as one which must be taken at this time. As one of our members has said, "We live in unsatisfactory times and must make unsatisfactory choices."

Beyond the immediate problem of ratification, the league will watch constantly, urging that the pact be carried out in accordance with the standards which we have outlined. We consider it the responsibility of all citizens to see that our Government works under the pact to build toward a world system of collective security within the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume from your statement that your group feels that the membership of the League of Women Voters is heartily in favor of the ratification of the pact.

Mrs. STONE. We do feel that way, Senator Connally. We feel that it has been one of the longest and most thorough considerations we have ever given an important issue in the league. We began last November with a publication on the subject of regional pacts, and I would say we had about three full rounds of discussion.

ADVANCEMENT OF THE CAUSE OF PEACE

The CHAIRMAN. You construe it as an advance in the cause of peace, the cause of peaceful arrangements, do you not?

Mrs. STONE. Under the conditions, we do.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know what your conditions are, but if there are conditions we have to face them, have we not?

Mrs. STONE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. I think I have no questions except to observe that I am happy to hear that this action stems from a meeting at Grand Rapids, Mich.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. I have no questions to ask, but I do want to congratulate the League of Women Voters through Mrs. Stone on having made this presentation, because I know from sources of information elsewhere that they have given most prolonged and conscientious consideration to this question. A great many doubts had to be considered, and I think that their conclusion is all the more worth-while because of those facts.

The CHAIRMAN. No doubt you are correct, Senator Green.

Senator McMAHON?

Senator McMAHON. I, too, have no question, but I just want to make the comment that I am intrigued with this line in the second to the last paragraph. It says so succinctly what I am sure most of us think:

We live in unsatisfactory times, and must make unsatisfactory choices.

Mrs. STONE. I would like to say that that stems from one of your constituents.

The CHAIRMAN. We suspected that when the Senator commented.

Senator McMAHON. We had better make it plain that this is not a conspiracy now.

Mrs. STONE. Quite. I have not talked with Senator McMahon in advance of coming here.

Senator McMAHON. Regardless of where it comes from, I still think it says it pretty well.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Senator Fulbright?

Senator FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate Mrs. Stone upon a very excellent statement. I know from personal experience how serious the League of Women Voters is, not only on this matter but on all matters of public importance, and I agree with their conclusions thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I have no questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Watkins?

THE TREATY AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Senator WATKINS. As I understand, you are not enthusiastic about this step, because you would much rather have had the situation taken care of by the United Nations directly.

Mrs. STONE. That is right.

Senator WATKINS. And you feel that this is more or less of a substitute for the time being, until the Security Council of the United Nations can operate satisfactorily?

Mrs. STONE. We feel that it is an essential holding measure.

Senator WATKINS. Would I be stating it too strongly by saying that this is a substitute for the United Nations?

Mrs. STONE. No; it is not.

Senator WATKINS. What would you call it, if the United Nations is not functioning and you have this as a holding measure? Isn't it something else being called in to take the place of the United Nations temporarily, at least?

Mrs. STONE. I believe that our Nation can carry out the provisions of the pact within the spirit as well as the letter of the United Nations, and it will ultimately be integrated into the United Nations system completely.

Senator WATKINS. The trouble with the United Nations is—

The CHAIRMAN. Ask a question, please; do not make a speech.

Senator WATKINS. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot always ask the question in the form that the gentleman might think is a question.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; go ahead.

Senator WATKINS. I decline to ask any more questions, in view of the chairman's attitude. I decline because this is not the first time I have been chided by the chairman when I think I have been conducting myself properly.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not complaining of the Senator when he asks a question to find out the witness' attitude, but the Senator spends a great deal of his time explaining his attitude. We have a great host of witnesses here. We have been working hard. I have no feeling against the Senator. We invited him here; we are consenting for him to be here. Why he should complain I cannot understand.

Senator DONNELL, do you care to interrogate the witness?

Senator DONNELL. I just got here, having been in another meeting, so I don't care to ask any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Thank you, Mrs. Stone.

The General Federation of Women's Clubs, Mrs. Frederic Beggs, committee on international relations.

STATEMENT OF MRS. FREDERIC BEGGS, CONSULTANT TO THE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS DEPARTMENT, GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS

Mrs. BEGGS. I am the consultant to the department of international relations, presenting the statement of the General Federation of Women's Clubs in support of United States ratification of the North Atlantic Pact.

RESOLUTION OF THE GENERAL FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS

The General Federation of Women's Clubs is an organization with an affiliated membership in the United States of approximately 5,000,000 and a voting membership of 1,300,000. On October 15, 1948, the board of directors of the General Federation of Women's Clubs had the foresight at its regular fall meeting to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs supports necessary legislation to implement the plans for self-defense of those members of the United Nations with whom the United States may join, in the interests of its own security, provided that such action is consistent with and supplementary to the continuation of the Economic Cooperation Administration program (European recovery).

The board of directors, numbering about 200, consists of the officers of the general federation, the chairmen and members of all departments and committees, and the presidents of each State federation and those of Alaska and the District of Columbia. The action of the board was subsequently reported to all federated clubs and copies of the resolution were sent for their consideration and support.

As soon as the terms of the North Atlantic Pact were available, they were reported and analyzed by our chairman of international relations in the bulletin of the department which is issued monthly.

As the result, therefore, of careful consideration over a period of 6 months, and following through on the policy established by the board, the following resolution was unanimously adopted by the General Federation of Women's Clubs at its recent convention held at Hollywood Beach, Fla., and time was requested to present our statement to the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate.

Although copies of this resolution are in your hands, I beg to quote it in full:

Whereas the board of directors of the General Federation of Women's Clubs at its October 15, 1948, meeting, recorded its support of necessary legislation to implement the plans for self-defense of those members of the United Nations with whom the United States may join in the interests of collective security; and

Whereas, since this date the signature of the United States has been affixed to the North Atlantic Pact, which now awaits Senate action: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, April 1949, urges prompt ratification by the United States Senate of this treaty; and be it further

Resolved, That after ratification adequate means for implementation of the North Atlantic Pact be provided by the Congress of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the proper authorities.

I should like to point out that the delegate body to our convention was comprised of more than 1,000 registered delegates from all over the United States, and it is significant that this resolution was the only resolution considered by the convention which met with no opposition from the floor. It was adopted unanimously.

REASONS FOR SUPPORT OF ATLANTIC PACT

The reasons for this unanimous action may be found in the following points:

1. We consider the North Atlantic Pact as being fundamentally a measure designed to assure the peace and security of all peoples of the world.

2. We regard the North Atlantic Pact as being within the provisions of article 51 of the United Nations Charter which recognizes the possible need for regional pacts during its period of growth, and until a security force has been developed by the member nations acting in unison.

3. We find the commitments undertaken by the member nations under the pact to be wholly constructive and defensive in character:

(a) to settle all disputes in which they may be involved by peaceful means;

(b) to strengthen their free institutions;

(c) to promote conditions of stability and well-being;

(d) to encourage economic collaboration;

(e) to consult together if the territorial integrity, political independence, or security of any one of the parties is threatened.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

Concerning these commitments under articles 1, 2, 3, and 4, respectively, we believe there can be no honest division of opinion. With regard to article 5, in which the parties agree to consider an armed attack against any one of them as an attack against them all, we believe that the history of two world wars should have convinced us that in the event of an armed attack against any member of the North Atlantic community the United States would be forced eventually to consider it an attack on our own security. And we are of the opinion that recognition by the United States of this inevitability will serve as a deterrent to any act of aggression which might be contemplated in the future against any member of the North Atlantic community. With American arms, western Europe can become a strong line of defense. Without them, it could become an area which American forces might again need to liberate after it had been overrun.

We are urging prompt ratification of the North Atlantic Pact as part of our own defense, and do so with the understanding that adequate implementation must follow. Inasmuch as "action" under article 5 might be economic, political, psychological, or military, depending on the character of the attack, we consider that adequate implementation demands such legislation as may be necessary to enable the United States to move quickly in any one of these four directions.

To conclude, we are presenting our statement in support of prompt ratification by the United States Senate of our membership in the North Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to congratulate you on a very splendid statement, a very clear distinction between the different processes.

Mrs. BEGGS. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. We are very much gratified that the Federation of Women's Clubs is supporting the treaty.

Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. I think I have no questions. I would like to observe, as you have done, that I think the paragraph on page 2, the third from the bottom is about as cogent and complete a summary of the irresistibility of argument for the North Atlantic Pact as I have seen.

The CHAIRMAN. I have marked that particularly on my copy.

Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. Mrs. Beggs, you state that this was the only resolution on which there was no opposition from the floor. Were there other resolutions?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

Senator GREEN. Many?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes. There was one which dealt with, shall we say, socialized medicine; there was one that dealt with extending the age at which people are retired for social security from 60 to 65; there was a resolution to raise the dues of the general federation.

Senator GREEN. I think the point is a valuable one, because it shows, as you intended it to show, that it was not a cut and dried convention where they just adopt everything that is recommended. That is the point you wish to make, is it not?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

I might say that we of the International Relations and Legislation Committee were prepared for a vigorous fight on the floor and were perfectly astounded ourselves at the unanimity and the general approval of the resolution; I mean the expressed approval in conversations.

Senator GREEN. I think the fact that there was no opposition is significant, as you point out.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE TREATY

There is one question I would like to ask. At the very end of your statement you said that you thought that the Congress ought to provide implementation as may be necessary to enable the United States to move quickly in any one of these four directions. Do you not mean all four?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes, I do. I think it was phrased "in any one" because we consider that through the Marshall plan and through the various other measures that are before the Senate the cooperation along economic lines is cared for.

Senator GREEN. Do you not think they ought to be ready to move quickly in all four?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes; we definitely do.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a very splendid statement.

Senator HICKENLOOPER, have you any questions?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator McMahon?

Senator McMAHON. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Fulbright?

Senator FULBRIGHT. No questions, except to say that I think it is a very excellent statement. You do not happen to be from Connecticut too, do you?

Mrs. BEGGS. No, sir; I don't. I am from New Jersey.

Senator McMAHON. After that statement we will be very happy to adopt you.

Mrs. BEGGS. My name was Wadsworth, so perhaps I belong to you.

Senator FULBRIGHT. It is a very excellent statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Tydings?

Senator TYDINGS. No questions, thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. I should like to ask Mrs. Beggs just a very few questions, with your permission.

In the first place, Mrs. Beggs, on page 2 of your statement, paragraph 2, if you have it before you—

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS

Senator DONNELL. You say, "We regard the North Atlantic Pact as being within the provisions of article 51 of the United Nations Charter, which recognizes the possible need for regional pacts during its period of growth, et cetera."

Is there anything in article 51 that refers to regional pacts?

Mrs. BEGGS. Not by name, but as I understand it, it recognizes the existence of the Pan American Union and the pact which exists between the members of the Pan American Union which was arrived at at the Conference of Foreign Ministers in the spring of 1940. That existed, and there had to be a provision for it in the United Nations Charter.

Now, as I see it, or as we see it, this is simply another community of interest which exists. It is recognized that there is a community of interest in the North Atlantic area similar to that which exists on the continents of North and South America.

Senator DONNELL. Do you consider Italy as being in the North Atlantic area?

Mrs. BEGGS. It depends on what "mutual interest" is. I would not say that it is within our province to designate which nations should join the pact. I should say that if the interests of Italy are such that they extend into the North Atlantic area, it definitely is.

Senator DONNELL. You consider this pact, the North Atlantic Treaty, as a regional pact, is that right?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Are you familiar with the fact that the United Nations Charter, which I am confident you carefully studied in your work, contains the portion applicable to regional arrangements in chapter VIII, which does not include article 51, to which you refer in this resolution?

Mrs. BEGGS. It uses the term, but article 51 implies it.

Senator DONNELL. Do you have before you a copy of the Charter?

Mrs. BEGGS. No; I do not.

Senator DONNELL. I would like to hand you a copy, if I may, for a moment.

ARTICLE 51 OF THE CHARTER AND REGIONALISM

Mrs. BEGGS. Could I say that in article 5 of the text of the North Atlantic Treaty the wording is "in exercise of the right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter," and "collective self-defense" would imply regional pacts, I would say?

Senator DONNELL. I have just handed you, Mrs. Beggs a copy of excerpts, I believe it is, from the United Nations Charter; perhaps all of the Charter, I am not certain. But at any rate, at the bottom of page 31 of the booklet, namely, Document 48, Senate Document, Eighty-first Congress, first session, do you observe that chapter VIII, beginning with article 52, is entitled "Regional Arrangements," and that that chapter includes articles 52, 53, and 54? You notice that, do you, Mrs. Beggs?

Mrs. BEGGS. I notice. May I answer?

Senator DONNELL. Certainly.

Mrs. BEGGS. Under article 51 the wording is "Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations. * * *" I am quite sure that collective self-defense implies regional agreements.

Senator DONNELL. Mrs. Beggs, I want to get your idea. I understand that you take the view that the North Atlantic Treaty is a regional pact. That is correct, is it?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. And you have so indicated in point No. 2, set forth at page 2 of the statement which you have handed in this morning, and then you have reiterated that view after reading article 51, or part of it, and after having your attention called to chapter VIII. I am correct in that?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. I am very much interested to note that, Mrs. Beggs, particularly as I understand the position of the Secretary of State as taking the view that this is not a regional pact. I think that is a correct statement of your position, and I am glad to get the information that your organization takes a view which I interpret to be diametrically opposite to that of the Secretary of State.

In the preparation of this statement that you have given this morning, who collaborated, particularly as to that portion of it giving the reasons for the unanimous action taken at Hollywood Beach, Fla., recently?

Mrs. BEGGS. I wrote the statement, sir, and then I called headquarters and checked it with our secretaries there, and not the exact wording but all of the points that are included here. I conferred with Mrs. Leslie Wright, who asked me to represent the department of legislation. That, I think, is all.

BACKGROUND OF WITNESS

Senator DONNELL. May I inquire, are you a lawyer? I hope you won't take any offense if I ask a few questions to get your background.

Mrs. BEGGS. I am a business woman. I am a Republican, sir.

Senator DONNELL. That stands very well for you. I am mighty glad to hear that.

Would you tell us just briefly what is the nature of the work in which you have been engaged over the past few years?

Mrs. BEGGS. I was former chairman of international relations in the General Federation of Women's Clubs, from 1938 to 1941. At that time my husband, who also was a Republican, I might point out, passed on, and in carrying on his estate I organized a silk finishing and dyeing company, reorganized it, for war work, and have carried on as its active president ever since. At the present moment, and in this administration of the General Federation, I have been very glad to serve as the consultant on international relations. Mrs. Ambrose Biehl, of California and New York, is the chairman, and Mrs. Dick Sporburg is the other consultant. She also is a former chairman of international relations. None of us is a professional lawyer, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Thank you.

IMPLEMENTATION OF TREATY

I notice also on page 2 of your statement that you say:

We are urging prompt ratification of the North Atlantic Pact as part of our own defense, and do so with the understanding that adequate implementation must follow.

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. In other words, I take it that you regard adequate implementation as being essential to the success of the North Atlantic Pact. Am I correct in that?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes, but I should like to say that I think that the weakness of our democratic system is that very often we ratify charters and we make grand, wonderful, idealistic statements with our tongues in our cheeks, and when the implementation comes we are not willing to follow through. We are simply trying to be entirely realistic in this.

Senator DONNELL. Certainly. And you feel, as many of the rest of us do, that if this treaty is to be signed, in order to make it effective it must be followed by, to quote your statement, "adequate implementation."

Mrs. BEGGS. I should say "adequate legislation."

Senator DONNELL. It says "implementation."

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes. But I want to point out that the implementation, as I have said here, could be along any one of four or five lines.

Senator DONNELL. I understood in answer to Senator Green that it should be not along any one of them but along all of them.

Mrs. BEGGS. You are right.

Senator DONNELL. And that includes military implementation?

Mrs. BEGGS. Definitely.

Senator DONNELL. Was this statement that you have presented here this morning, beginning particularly with the part of it which says "the reasons for this unanimous action may be found in the following points" before the convention at Hollywood Beach, or was that subsequently prepared?

Mrs. BEGGS. In was subsequently prepared, but as the basis of our discussion at Hollywood Beach, you see, the Department of International Relations had a luncheon at which several points were covered, including the International Trade Organization, and then later there was a workshop meeting at which these points were discussed, and it became very clear to us that what the United States is trying to accomplish in the world, all of these things fit into one picture. There is the Marshall plan, and following that comes the need for the International Trade Organization, and certainly if we are expecting our program to be successful in Europe we must be willing to assist in whatever means we can the nations that are turning their eyes toward the democratic way of life. We feel that all of these efforts are an effort, or that the general policy of the United States is an effort, to extend our way of life into the world, and we feel that if world leadership is to be forced upon us we must be willing to back it up. I did not include it in the statement because I felt it was extraneous matter, but when the matter of implementation comes up we will be very glad to be heard again.

We did discuss the budget of the United States, its break-down, and we discussed the estimated amount that the Secretary of State has made, that it would cost probably in the nature of $1,130,000,000. It seemed to us in comparing that with the items in our budget which deal with paying for past wars and preparing for the wars that we fear may come upon us, and carrying the service of debt that has been necessary, and veterans' services and so forth, that the $1,130,000,000 was rather reasonable, and we considered it, or we talked about it, as a sort of an insurance for our future security.

Nothing is positive in this world, but we believe in the League of Women Voters that this is the best step to take at the moment.

Senator DONNELL. The convention, as you stated, in Hollywood Beach, Calif., was last week? It was during the month of May?

Mrs. BEGGS. No; it finished a week ago last Friday night.

Senator DONNELL. And more than 1,000 registered delegates were present at the convention?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

FAMILIARITY WITH TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Could you tell us, Mrs. Beggs, please, whether the North Atlantic Treaty was read to the delegate body of more than 1,000 registered delegates before action was taken by that body on this resolution that you have presented to us here this morning?

Mrs. BEGGS. No, but it was read and discussed point by point at the workshop on international relations and, I think—I am not sure of that, as I was not there—at the legislative committee. It was discussed and the points were made, as I said before, at the luncheon.

Senator DONNELL. It was read at the workshop; it was not read at the luncheon?

Mrs. BEGGS. No.

Senator DONNELL. And it was not read at the meeting at which the delegates themselves voted on the resolution?

Mrs. BEGGS. No, but if you notice on my statement, the terms of the treaty had already been analyzed and sent out to all our clubs by our department of international relations. We have a monthly bulletin that goes to all of our federated clubs and to the local and State and national chairmen of international relations, and I also pointed out that even before the terms were available the whole subject of possible collective defense had been indicated by the board and the clubs had been asked to include it in their programs, to consider it carefully.

Senator DONNELL. At the workshop, would you tell us, please, approximately how many persons were present?

Mrs. BEGGS. I really could not tell you. It was in a moving-picture theater in the hotel and people were standing up. I am not very good at figures. There were several hundred.

Senator DONNELL. At the workshop at which this question of the North Atlantic Treaty was considered?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. Do you remember about how much time was devoted to the consideration of it?

Mrs. BEGGS. The whole workshop.

Senator DONNELL. How much time was that?

Mrs. BEGGS. An hour.

Senator DONNELL. One hour was occupied in the consideration of this pact by the workshop?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes, sir.

DISCUSSION OF TREATY BY FEDERATION

Senator DONNELL. In the analysis which had been previously sent out throughout the country, had there been, generally speaking, any opinion expressed at all as to whether or not the North Atlantic Treaty should be adopted or something of that kind?

Mrs. BEGGS. The policy had been established. That is my reason for including both resolutions in this statement. It was to indicate that the board of directors has the power, in our organization, to indicate the direction of policy, and at their fall meeting held here in Washington—

Senator DONNELL. October 15, 1948?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes—it was indicated that the group there, and the analysis of the group you will find there—

Senator DONNELL. That is the resolution set forth in the second paragraph of your statement?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes, sir. Then, following that resolution, you will find that the board of directors is a very representative body. All of the presidents of each State come to Washington to the board meeting, and in addition to that the officers of the federation and all of the chairmen of all committees and departments, and as many members of the committees as are able to be there, and at that time the possible need for some such thing as an Atlantic Pact was discussed and it was determined to put the policy down in principle.

You see, it works this way: The federation has many, many interests. We are the largest women's organization; we also are the most catholic in our interests, and each club will have many departments. When the board sends the notice of a resolution of this sort, it says to the clubs, "Here is something about which you must be concerned." That was the purpose of that resolution. That is one reason that I might point out that your question indicates that we only discussed it for an hour, and the charter was not read to the entire body, which might be answered by saying that the previous information that had gone out, and the fact that all of the delegates there knew that this was coming up, even though it was an emergency resolution, they knew that this matter was going to be discussed. It had to be an emergency because the signature of the United States was not attached until just a month before.

Senator DONNELL. It was attached on the 4th day of April of this year.

Now, Mrs. Beggs, I thank you for giving me so fully the outline of procedure, but what I wanted to know primarily were two things: First, was the expression of policy which has been put down in principle sent out throughout the country? Would you say that that was generally speaking favorable to the general idea behind the North Atlantic Treaty as you understand that idea to be?

Mrs. BEGGS. The paragraph is there, and I would say it definitely was, and I would leave it to your own discretion to decide whether you think it was.

Senator DONNELL. You think it was definitely favorable to the idea behind the North Atlantic Treaty; is that right?

Mrs. BEGGS. I see no other way of interpreting that, sir.

AVAILABILITY OF TREATY TO MEMBERSHIP

Senator DONNELL. Was there sent out at any time, either during the convention at Hollywood Beach, Fla., in April of this year, or prior thereto, a copy of the North Atlantic Pact to the membership of the General Federation of Women's Clubs?

Mrs. BEGGS. It was available.

Senator DONNELL. I want to know, was it sent out? Was it distributed throughout the country to the members of the Federation of Women's Clubs, either before or at the convention held in Hollywood Beach, Fla.?

Mrs. BEGGS. I understand your question, sir, and was attempting to answer it.

We have in our headquarters thousands of copies of the North Atlantic Pact, and it is available to any club that writes in. We do not have the resources to send out unless it is requested a million or five million copies of the North Atlantic Pact.

Senator DONNELL. So it was not sent out to the membership of the Federation of Women's Clubs, either during or at any time prior to the Hollywood Beach, Fla., convention. I am correct in my understanding, am I?

Mrs. BEGGS. I am not sure whether it was sent out or not; whether the entire wording of it was sent out I do not know.

Senator DONNELL. You have never heard of it being sent out?

Mrs. BEGGS. I would not say that. I know that our chairman sent out what she considered a complete report on its terms. Whether it contained the exact wording I am not sure.

Senator DONNELL. One final point. In the next to the concluding paragraph of your statement you say:

We are urging prompt ratification of the North Atlantic Pact as part of our defense, and do so with the understanding that adequate implementation must follow—which I previously read. Then this sentence:

Inasmuch as "action" under article 5 might be economic, political, psychological, or military, depending on the character of the attack, we consider that adequate implementation demands such legislation as may be necessary to enable the United States to move quickly in any one of these four directions.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ARMED ATTACK

I would like to submit to you a hypothetical question that has been submitted to various other witnesses, and I would like to have your opinion, if we may have it.

Suppose that in connection with the question of military action, 6 weeks after this pact shall be ratified, if it is ratified, that 500,000 troops from Russia shall enter into Norway attacking it militarily. Would you consider or would you not that adequate, prompt, forthwith action in pursuance to article 5 would make it reasonably desirable that military action should be taken in order to repel such an attack?

Mrs. BEGGS. I think, Senator, that that would be completely within the realm of the Senate decision, but I would say that if Norway had received aid enough before that happened, to be adequately prepared herself, that military aid might not be necessary from the United States. I would say that my personal opinion is that if this treaty is quickly ratified, probably that decision may not have to be made.

Senator DONNELL. If the city of New York were to be attacked by 500,000 foreign troops, would you consider that the President of the United States would be justified, in the absence of Congress being in session at that time, in taking prompt military action to repel the attack and protect America?

Mrs. BEGGS. I think it would be done, whether the President did it or not.

Senator DONNELL. Do you think he would be within his rights in so doing?

Mrs. BEGGS. I do not care to answer that. I don't know. I should say that he is Commander in Chief once Congress has declared war. I think it is a rather hypothetical question, and a rather academic question, if you will pardon me. I don't know whether I am allowed to answer back to a Senator, but I would say that I live right across the river in New Jersey, and in my feeble way I would be very willing to aid in any measures that might be necessary, whether the President told me to or not.

Senator DONNELL. Certainly. And do you think you might be interested in having the President take some action to assist in the local implementation of repulsion of the attack?

Mrs. BEGGS. I think it is entirely academic, and my personal opinion does not matter.

Senator DONNELL. You are familiar with the provisions of article 5, that "The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all"?

Mrs. BEGGS. Certainly.

Senator DONNELL. That is all.

ARTICLE 51 AND REGIONALISM

The CHAIRMAN. There are several questions I would like to ask you, but we are pressed very much for time.

There was a statement by the Senator and yourself about regional pacts under article 51. You said that it was a clear implication that it meant regional pacts. Is not the language in article 51 perfectly clear? "Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense." That "collective self-defense" means more than one, doesn't it?

Mrs. BEGGS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And that carries the idea that there will be a number within the scope of the collective agreement, which would be a regional pact under article 51?

Mrs. BEGGS. That is as we understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the way we all understand it, except for some contrary gentlemen.

Senator DONNELL. I thank the gentleman for the compliment I gather he has delicately put to me.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume the Senator includes others besides himself. I did not mean to single out the Senator from Missouri.

Senator DONNELL. I do not want to speak for any others than myself.

The CHAIRMAN. We thank you very much for a splendid statement.

Mrs. BEGGS. Thank you for your courtesy.

The CHAIRMAN. At this point we are going to call Mr. Patterson. We cannot hold him any longer, and the other witnesses will have to bide their time.

We have at this time former Secretary of War Patterson, a distinguished jurist, a lawyer of high ability who made a very outstanding and valuable contribution to the service of the United States while he was Secretary of War. He has shown a spirit of self-sacrifice and a desire to serve that is unusual, and I want to pay high tribute to Secretary of War Patterson, or Circuit Judge Patterson, and all the other honors that have been heaped upon him deservedly. Mr. Secretary.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I first state the pleasure I feel, Mr. Chairman, in appearing before this committee, and may I as a citizen express the confidence that we all feel in this committee and in the care that this committee gives to our foreign relations. We are sure of the exercise of wisdom, experience, and patriotism in your hands, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

STATEMENT OF HON. ROBERT P. PATTERSON, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE ATLANTIC UNION COMMITTEE

Mr. PATTERSON. I am here to urge ratification of the North Atlantic Pact.

I am appearing as a vice president of the Atlantic Union Committee and as a citizen.

The most urgent issue before the American people is prevention of another world war. That war would surely result, sooner or later, in the involvement of the United States as a participant. There are solid reasons for the belief that we would not be defeated in such a war. But the waging of a third world war would mean untold suffering and misery to millions of people, and the winning of it would cast such colossal expenses on the Nation as to bring utter ruin to our economic structure. The social changes that would attend an economic collapse of that character would be profound—so profound that the United States after such a war would not resemble the United States that we have lived in. No other issues of the day approaches in importance the warding off of another world war. I see no room for doubt on that point.

PREVENTION OF WAR

How are we to prevent that war? How are we to preserve peace? Not by wishful thinking. Not by appeasement, which is a synonym for surrender when we are dealing with dictators. Not by shutting our eyes to the fact that the world is faced with an ambitious and power-hungry dictatorship that has never had any moral scruples against launching a war, a dictatorship whose guilt in starting World War II in 1939 was second only to that of Hitler—I refer to the Ribbentrop-Molotov Treaty—a dictatorship that has respect for nothing but physical force. To follow those counsels of timidity is to take a straight road to war. Those policies led us unwillingly into a war 8 years ago, and they will lead us there again.

On the other hand, we reduce the chances of war to a minimum—there can be no absolute guaranty, of course, but we reduce chances of war to a minimum—if we, along with the nations of Europe that are still free, present a united front against conquest out of Moscow. Moscow, it will bear repeating pays strict attention to physical power. The combined strength represented by the free nations that have signed the North Atlantic Pact is far in excess of any that Moscow could muster—manpower at least equal, steel-making capacity 10 times, petroleum production 6 times, a lead in science and invention and industrial skill that cannot be measured in tons or cubic feet but is undoubtedly a long lead. (I say nothing as to the tremendous asset of freedom, for however priceless we feel it to be it is not an asset in the eyes of Moscow.) In the presence of that combined strength in the resources it takes to wage war the autocrats in the Kremlin will see no prospect of victory and will not give their soldiers the word to march. The case for ratification of the North Atlantic Pact, I submit, is as simple as that. It is a pact to preserve peace.

DETERRENT EFFECT OF TREATY

Why has the signing of the pact brought forth such wrath in Moscow? They know well enough that they have nothing to fear in the way of aggression against them, notwithstanding their stale and hollow charges of war-mongering, imperialism, Wall Street, encirclement, and the like. The true cause is that the taking effect of the pact will mark the end of their chance that intended victims may be knocked off one by one. I trust that we will not flinch in the face of the Moscow bluster.

The idea that anyone would be willing to start a war is hard for the average American to believe. But we know that Hitler in 1939 was utterly reckless as to whether his attack on Poland brought on a general war; and the rule of Stalin, point by point, is the same substance as that of Hitler. The Kremlin has pursued the same ruthless aggression and will continue on that course as long as it believes that it will not run the risk of defeat by so doing. We may also be sure that if there had been a North Atlantic Pact in existence in 1939, there would have been no World War II.

I have the firm conviction that this Nation cannot afford to quibble, to stall, or to equivocate on this measure. We gamble with war if we retreat. I urge that ratification should be prompt and unmistakable. If we have learned anything in the last decade, we have been made aware of the disaster that goes with "too little and too late."

After the pact has been ratified, the Atlantic Union Committee proposes that the Senate examine the project for Atlantic Union as a means of implementing the pact by a firmer union of the people who are free and are honestly devoted to the cause of world peace. But first and foremost we urge ratification of the North Atlantic Pact.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, just a question or two.

NOT PEACE AT ANY PRICE

When we state our desire for peace, we mean a desire for peace with our liberty and our independence preserved, do we not?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We could, of course, have peace by simply allowing the aggressor or the dictator to have his way, and bow down in appeasement and submission, but that is not the kind of peace that we want.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is the peace that ends in slavery.

The CHAIRMAN. Exactly; so that the extremists who want peace at any price could attain it only by submission to tyranny and to dictatorship and eventually to slavery, is that right?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is the way I see it, sir.

UNITED NATIONS AND THE TREATY

The CHAIRMAN. Judge Patterson, you are a very eminent lawyer. Do you find anything in the proposed treaty that impinges upon the authority of the United Nations, when it is specifically stated in several places that we recognize the authority of the United Nations?

Mr. PATTERSON. I believe that the conclusion of the North Atlantic Pact is in line with the United Nations, subordinate to the broad objectives of the United Nations, and thoroughly consistent.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not set forth in the treaty that when military or other measures are taken by the signatories to the pact to carry its purposes out, that they shall continue only until such time as the Security Council of the United Nations shall take adequate means of taking over the problem?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir. That is in article 51. This is a measure of collective self-defense, as I see it, within the terms of article 51 of the United Nations Charter. It would not have been necessary if our hopes in 1945, when the Charter was signed, had been fulfilled, but they have not been fulfilled.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not true that when we were at San Francisco it was the view of the Four Great Powers, or the Five Great Powers, that in peace, under the Charter, they would cooperate and try to attain the purposes of the Charter just as we had cooperated in time of war to win the war?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. But in that we have been disappointed by 30 vetoes of measures by the Soviet Union in the Security Council?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is right, and there has been an obstruction of the expected military security force to be set up under the United Nations. In spite of efforts for over 3 years there has been no fulfillment of that aim.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been obstruction in the military staff committee, whose function it was to revise and set up an international force, is that not true?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

PEACEFUL NATURE OF TREATY

Senator VANDENBERG. And in single sentence, Mr. Secretary, no nation on earth needs to have the remotest fear of the slightest ultimate impact of the North Atlantic Treaty unless it first identifies itself as an international criminal through armed aggression.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is it, in a sentence. Its aim is purely defensive. There is not a shread of aggression in it at all.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, all we ask of the other nations is to restrain their criminal intent and their criminal purpose to make armed attacks upon peaceful free nations.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Hickenlooper?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I do not believe I have any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator McMahon?

Senator McMAHON. I have a couple of questions, Mr. Chairman.

STEPS NECESSARY BEYOND ATLANTIC TREATY

Mr. Secretary, I note that you sum up the assets on both sides of this situation, that is, the Soviet side and our own side, and you come to the correct conclusion, I think, that this amalgamation of power will be so overwhelming as to certainly deter them from proceeding. I also note that in the last paragraph of your statement you suggest that you are going to examine a project for Atlantic Union. I wish to congratulate you and the organization for withholding that suggestion until at least we could get this done, but I take it that you feel as I do, that when we ratify this pact we will not have done the last thing that is necessary to forge a foreign policy that will protect this country in the future.

Mr. PATTERSON. I feel with you on that. I agree with you. That is true. There will have to be follow-up measures.

Senator McMAHON. I do not want to be understood as endorsing your proposed Atlantic Union, because I have not given that specific suggestion enough study, but I do think it is important that the American people not get the idea that we can go to sleep just as soon as we have done this, and any arms implementation that might be decided upon.

Mr. Secretary, do you agree that while the situation that you outline exists today, time might bring a different balance in the scales?

Mr. PATTERSON. We are going to have changes all the time. There is no doubt of that. Look at the changes that we have had in our own lifetime.

STRENGTH OF SOVIET UNION

Senator McMAHON. I am talking about increased power of the Soviet Union. As I say, you cast up the account and you say this will make us much stronger than they. But do you think that, say, in the next decade that necessarily is going to be so?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think the free nations of the world, preserving their freedom, need fear being overtaken in resources by countries under autocratic rule. In other words, I think that there is good reason to believe that the lead the free countries now have will be maintained, if not widened. I cannot see any other way to it. The individual initiative that is given to the citizens of free nations is a very powerful resource in itself, a resource that is absolutely denied to people who live under the rule of a conspiracy.

Senator McMAHON. I agree with you on that. I would point this out to you, however, that total resources and resources devoted to aggressive warfare are not the same thing.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is true.

Senator McMAHON. In other words, this freedom that you and I think pretty well of and are for must exist in a civil and not a military state. The tremendous burden of increasing armaments pro tanto reduces your chances of maintaining that kind of freedom in a civil state.

Now, granted the terrific differential between the efficiency of the free state and the slave state, you, I am sure, would agree with me that 85 percent of the total resources and potential devoted to aggressive warfare might overcome the free state that could not in time of anything except actual conflict maintain that kind of an expenditure and remain free.

The point that I am trying to make, Mr. Secretary, is that this balance that we talk about today certainly is not something, in my opinion, that we can look forward to in the next 10 years or the next 15 or 20, and certainly while that may sound like a long time, as you and I know it is tomorrow in the history of nations.

I think it is so important to impress upon the country and the world that we do not regard this as the last thing that we must do. This perhaps is not the time or place to go into some things that I think we ought to do in addition to this pact. I propose to develop that another time. I am definitely interested in the fact that you, along with Mr. Clayton and Justice Roberts, and men of your stamp and caliber, are thinking in terms of an expansion of our drive for peace, and I want to congratulate you on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Senator Fulbright?

Senator FULBRIGHT. Mr. Patterson, I think it is a very excellent statement. In view of your long and distinguished service during the war, particularly in the armed services, I think it is especially significant. I do think a little time could be devoted to your thoughts, because you are here, and I think this pact is going to be analyzed and confirmed, and then we are going to be concerned and analyzing what we are going to do further.

ATLANTIC UNION

In your idea about an Atlantic union, what is the particular significance of that union as contrasted to the pact?

Mr. PATTERSON. Of course, the pact is for self-defense, and relates to security alone. We have it in mind that a basis exists for a federation or union of the free countries; not world federation, but of the free countries, along broader lines of an economic character and political character, and we would like to have that explored.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Certainly I am agreed on that, and from what we have heard in this committee the great preponderance of people are for that now, but simply because you have obviously given great thought to this further step I think it is appropriate that we examine it in order that we can begin to think about it and that the people can.

Would you say the principal difference between the pact and what you are advocating in the Atlantic Union Committee is that it is based upon political affiliations, whereas this is among sovereign states and for military and defensive purposes?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir. This is a treaty. We would have in mind, as a longer-range objective, a governmental federation or organization.

Senator FULBRIGHT. Let us assume for the purposes of illustration that we are dealing with the same 12 countries. Would you say that they would have relationships similar to those among the 48 States of this country?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not welded into so complete an entity as the 48 States, but toward that objective, yes. I regard the United States as a political entity, with a fairly strong Central National Government.

Senator FULBRIGHT. But you know there are some of us who think the States still have some rights, do you not?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think they have, but they certainly have not nearly the exercise of the powers that they had, say, 100 years ago.

Senator FULBRIGHT. And when this country began the theory was certainly that of a limited central government. In that sense the theory of your idea is similar, limitation on the central government that might be set up among these Atlantic countries.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator FULBRIGHT. So that the basic theory is the same, although how rapidly you develop into a centralized government depends upon future developments.

EUROPEAN UNION

Do you think that that is the ultimate objective? Would you say that a federation of European countries who have progressed much further along this line than these Atlantic countries have would contribute to greater strength and stability in the world and, I would say, contribute to the ultimate formation of an Atlantic union?

Mr. PATTERSON. A good beginning has already been made toward European union of the west European nations, and further progress along that line is to be expected any day, and to be welcomed.

Senator FULBRIGHT. You approve of that? You think it would make a contribution?

Mr. PATTERSON. Surely. It is a very good stepping stone.

Senator FULBRIGHT. And the attitude of this country ought to be to encourage that?

Mr. PATTERSON. To encourage that.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I agree thoroughly with that view.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am working toward that too.

Senator FULBRIGHT. I think that would make a contribution not only to the present stability of the countries, but to the ultimate formation of a union of the kind that you desire.

I think the way you state it, particularly, is a very excellent statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Tydings?

Senator TYDINGS. Mr. Patterson, I am not going to ask you any questions, except to say that your statement is just about what I would expect it to be, that—

* * * the native hue of resolution in your face is not sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought.

I want to congratulate you on it. That is a little Shakespeare—Hamlet's Soliloquy:

And enterprises of greath pith and moment
With this regard their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action.

That does not apply in the case of Mr. Patterson, and I am in thorough accord with the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has scholarship as well as legal ability.

All right, Senator Donnell.

Senator DONNELL. I know that you are not including me in either of those categories, Mr. Chairman. But I will proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. You are not including yourself by not being a member of the committee. If you had shown the proper ambition to have gotten on the committee when it was organized, you might have acquired those qualities.

Senator DONNELL. I am sure the association with the members of the committee, particularly the chairman, would have been helpful along those lines.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Senator DONNELL. I notice with interest the fact that you are appearing not only as a citizen but as a vice president of the Atlantic Union Committee. There are two vice presidents; are there not?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think Mr. Clayton and myself are the two.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Clayton has already appeared before us, as you probably know.

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. And the president is Mr. Justice Roberts?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. And he, you know, has appeared also.

I was interested to know, and I am wondering if you could place into the record your knowledge, if you have it, as to why three members of one organization have been permitted to testify in this matter, and particularly an organization known as the Atlantic Union Committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is up to the committee. That was not up to us.

NATURE OF ATLANTIC UNION

Senator DONNELL. The name of your committee, "Atlantic Union Committee," has been somewhat explained, I think, by particularly Mr. Justice Roberts, as indicating that the committee is formed in advocacy of a federation of democracies; is that right?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. These democracies would include the United States of America; would they?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. The name of the committee, "Atlantic Union Committee," is therefore appropriate, in that it would include not only members on one side of the Atlantic but at least the United States of America on the other; is that correct?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. I was referring to the Atlantic Union as contemplating the formation of a union between not only democracies on one side of the Atlantic but at least one on the other side of the Atlantic, namely the United States of America. I take it, Mr. Secretary, that although you are favoring the North Atlantic Pact for itself, that you are also favoring it as a step in your judgment toward the ultimate creation of this Atlantic Union to which you refer; is that right?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Do you mind telling us just briefly, Mr. Secretary, what is this Atlantic Union that is contemplated in your mind, into which the United States of America would become integrated as a member?

Mr. PATTERSON. We believe that Congress should examine carefully how far we can go toward a Federal union with the free countries of the world, an organization along permanent lines with control over certain common interests, particularly in economic and political lines.

Senator DONNELL. Yes. Would it include military lines?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. So it would be economic, political, and military lines?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Any other lines?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think of any right now.

Senator DONNELL. You speak of this proposed organization of the free countries of the world as being a federal union. Do you consider the United States of America a federal union?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

DEVELOPMENT OF FEDERAL UNION

Senator DONNELL. So that this organization that you are advocating would be an organization analogous in large part, if not in all details, to the Union of the 48 States of our country; is that right?

Mr. PATTERSON. Analogous to it, but it would not be as firmly knit, certainly in the beginning phases, as the United States of America.

Senator DONNELL. How about in the ultimate phases, as distinguished from the initial phases?

Mr. PATTERSON. You would have to take that as it came.

Senator DONNELL. Would you contemplate the organization of a congress similar to the present Federal Congress of the United States of America, which Congress would operate for the federal union of all the free countries of the world?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not similar to the Congress of the United States, but a congress, or legislative body, yes.

Senator DONNELL. There would be a legislative body which would pass laws which would apply to all of the component entities, one of which would be the United States of America; is that right?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir; within the limited fields.

Senator DONNELL. Which include the political, economic, and military fields?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, but, of course, limits within those fields, too.

Senator DONNELL. Could you tell us what those limits are?

Mr. PATTERSON. Those are the limits where local interests were believed to be predominant.

Senator DONNELL. And who would decide whether or not they were predominant?

Mr. PATTERSON. That would be in the charter that you would adopt.

Senator DONNELL. Would you plan that the union itself, the Atlantic Union, would decide whether or not local interests were predominant, or would each particular component country in that union have the right to determine whether local interests were predominant?

Mr. PATTERSON. No nation would join it who thought its proper local interests would be infringed.

OPERATION OF ATLANTIC UNION

Senator DONNELL. And after such a union were formed, suppose that some matter of legislation should come up before the congress of the Atlantic Union and the point were made that it was a proposition that improperly infringed on local interests. Would it be your idea that the mere statement to that effect by any one of these free countries of the world with respect to itself would suffice to take that item of proposed legislation off the agenda of the congress?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think if you had good will and a desire to make the organization work you would not have any undue amount of trouble along that line. Those are problems, the details of which I acknowledge I have not considered, Senator.

Senator DONNELL. Has there been a tentative draft prepared of the proposed fundamental law or constitution of the Atlantic Union?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not that I know of.

Senator DONNELL. Would you have not only a legislative department in the Atlantic Union but also an executive department?

Mr. PATTERSON. I just do not know about that. I have not given it thought, myself.

Senator DONNELL. And you do not know of anyone that has explored that point?

Mr. PATTERSON. It has been explored, possibly, but not by me.

Senator DONNELL. Would there be also a judicial department in the Atlantic Union?

Mr. PATTERSON. I suppose there would have to be.

Senator DONNELL. That would be somewhat in the nature of the Permanent Court of International Justice that came out of the First World War, and perhaps similar to the court under the existing United Nations Charter?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes. It would decide matters that arose under the Charter.

Senator DONNELL. Would there be a power of enforcement of the decisions of that judicial department of the Atlantic Union as you envisage the plan?

Mr. PATTERSON. I suppose that would be up to the national governments themselves that were into it. I suppose they would be looked to to enforce it.

Senator DONNELL. If there were a decree issued by such a court, you would expect the country in favor of whom the decree was rendered to take adequate steps to enforce that decree against the others?

Mr. PATTERSON. Of course it would have to be enforced with the consent of the national government against whom the judgment was rendered, but I think you would have that support.

The CHAIRMAN. May I interrupt? I want to suggest that as I understand, the Secretary has already testified that the details of this organization have not been formed by anybody, that there is no written statement about the functions of each department and each branch, so that it seems to me that in view of that statement it is unnecessary to go into great detail about what somebody might think would be the details.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have no blueprint on it, Senator, myself.

Senator DONNELL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that inasmuch as the Secretary has stated very frankly that he regards the ratification of the North Atlantic Pact to be desirable in itself, but not only in itself but as a step toward the formation of an Atlantic Union, I think it is of some importance to get at least the outlines of what his plan is. I shall not go into it in great detail, and if I am exceeding the bounds of propriety in that respect I shall certainly observe the admonitions of the chairman.

MEMBERSHIP IN THE UNION

Mr. Secretary, you speak of the proposed Atlantic Union as one which would be a federation of democracies or free countries of the world. Would Portugal qualify under that definition?

Mr. PATTERSON. I believe so.

Senator DONNELL. I think you differ in that respect with Mr. Justice Roberts, as I recall his answer the other day when a similar question was asked of him. You think it would qualify?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do.

Senator DONNELL. You regard Portugal as a democracy?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, I do.

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard Spain as a democracy?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think Spain at the present time is.

THE TREATY AND THE UNITED NATIONS

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, Senator Connally asked a question which I am not able to quote with exactness, but I think I have the general gist in mind. When you were discussing whether or not the proposed North Atlantic Treaty is in harmony with the portions of the United Nations Charter he pointed out, not ipsissimis verbis but in substance, this provision in article 5, of the proposed North Atlantic Treaty:

The parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all. * * *

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

I understood you to concur with his general view that inasmuch as there is this provision in article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty, the provision for forthwith action by the parties in the event of an armed attack against one of the signatories is in harmony with the United Nations Charter, since it is expressly provided in here that the measures taken under the North Atlantic Treaty shall be terminated when the Security Council, under the United Nations Charter, has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security. Did I correctly understand your view on that?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir. I believe the treaty fits right in under the United Nations.

Senator DONNELL. Now, suppose that Russia—and I pause to ask, is not Russia and its conduct the predominant, primary reason for the proposed North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. PATTERSON. The conduct of those who are rulers of Russia; yes, sir.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

Senator DONNELL. Suppose Russia were to take action along the line of an attack against one of the signatory nations under the North Atlantic Treaty. We will say that Russia put in a tremendous force, a million or 2 million or 3 million soldiers in the field. It is provided in the North Atlantic Treaty that the armed attack so made by Russia would be considered as an attack against each and all of the signatories, as I understand it. You so understand it too, do you not?

Mr. PATTERSON. I so understand it.

Senator DONNELL. And then it is provided that "Such measures shall be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measures necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security."

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, you recall the fact that among the permanent members of the Security Council is the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, that is to say, Russia. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And also that in matters of this type the Security Council, I take it, could act only by unanimous vote. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. In the event of such a war by Russia against any one of these signatories, do you think it would be merely a temporary measure that would be taken under the North Atlantic Treaty? In other words, how long would it be before Russia, as a member of the Security Council, would vote in favor of approving the measures taken against her?

Mr. PATTERSON. They never would, of course.

Senator DONNELL. So that in that particular instance, instead of the North Atlantic Treaty providing for a mere temporary expedient to be replaced by action of the Security Council, the temporary expedient would be the permanent one.

Mr. PATTERSON. In that case you put, yes. But still the language is good language, because you can have temporary measures that would last only a week, another a month, and another maybe years.

Senator DONNELL. I realize that that is entirely possible, and I have no criticism of the language of the treaty, but the substance of it, because of the fact that the potential enemy of these various nations is Russia, is this, that to my mind the practical effect is virtually nil; that is, the practical effect of this last sentence in article 5, in any Senator DONNELL. I realize that that is entirely possible, and I think you would agree with that, would you not?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, I would.

Senator DONNELL. I want to take this opportunity to express first my great appreciation of your frankness. It has been very characteristic of you. As you know, we have been friends for some years. We met in my own home State under very interesting surroundings, as you remember.

Mr. PATTERSON. When you were Governor.

Senator DONNELL. I want to ask you this: In addition to being Secretary of War and having served upon the United States circuit court of appeals, you are today the president of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, are you not?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And a committee of that organization has been appointed of which Mr. Adolph Berle is the chairman, which is expected to report tonight on the subject of the North Atlantic Treaty. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Berle is chairman of the committee of the Association of the Bar on International Law. I think he is due to make a report tonight. I expect to hear it in a few hours.

Senator DONNELL. I understood, and as you say, you are now the president of the organization?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir. I do not know what his report is going to be.

Senator DONNELL. In substance, portions of it were set out yesterday in the New York Times, Mr. Secretary.

I am not going to infringe on the propriety of your modesty to ask you as to the prospects of reelection, which I am not in any sense bringing up in satire or criticism but in compliment, in fact. The paper does indicate that you will be reelected at that meeting.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is very good news.

Senator DONNELL. It is perfectly clear that that is not in any sense that I am using any sarcasm about you, but I know that the committee was appointed by yourself and you are president of it, and Mr. Berle is to present the report.

Mr. PATTERSON. The committee of which Mr. Berle is the chairman was appointed a year ago. It is not a special committee for this project.

Senator DONNELL. As I understand, it is a permanent committee.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is a committee that has been in existence for many years, and Mr. Berle became chairman of it by my appointment just a year ago.

Senator DONNELL. The term of this North Atlantic Treaty is how long?

Mr. PATTERSON. Twenty years.

PROVISIONS FOR WITHDRAWAL OR EXPULSION

Senator DONNELL. Is there any provision in it by which any nation may either itself voluntarily withdraw or be involuntarily expelled from the community forming the treaty?

Mr. PATTERSON. Not that I know of.

Senator DONNELL. So it is a 20-year obligation?

Mr. PATTERSON. A 20-year engagement.

Senator DONNELL. There is a provision regarding a review of the treaty at the end of 10 years, but that does not constitute any provision for withdrawal or expulsion.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would say not.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, do you know Prof. Edwin Borah, of Yale University?

Mr. PATTERSON. No.

Senator DONNELL. You refer in your statement in this language: "Moscow, it will bear repeating, pays strict attention to physical power." Am I correct in inferring from that statement that Russia would be deterred much more effectively by a powerful, or to adopt the language of the President of the United States, "an overwhelming" force than it would be by a mere signature of a pact, than by a mere small display of force? Am I correct in that?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

NEED FOR AMERICAN TROOPS IN EUROPE

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, have you given attention to the question as to whether or not Europe—that is to say the countries signatory to this pact in Europe—could successfully slow up and retard the coming in of Russian troops and the overrunning of that country without the assistance of United States troops joining with European troops?

Mr. PATTERSON. I believe that in the event of a march to the West by Russia there are elements of military strength in the countries of Europe still present.

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard that those elements of strength which are still present are sufficient to hold back Russia and prevent her from overrunning Europe and leaving Europe subject to the slow process of reliberation as took place in the war against Germany, the Second World War?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think anybody could say. You mean without the help of the United States?

Senator DONNELL. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not think anybody could say. That would be a very doubtful matter, in my opinion.

MILITARY IMPLEMENTATION OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. You say in your statement:

In the presence of that combined strength—and that combined strength is the strength under this North Atlantic Treaty, I take it—

In the resources it takes to wage war the autocrats in the Kremlin will see no prospect of victory and will not give their soldiers the word to march.

I take it in view of that statement and others which you have made that you do regard the military implementation of that treaty as a very substantial and material and important element in the effectiveness of the treaty, is that right?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Have you given consideration to how much of actual money or the equivalent of money would be required to properly implement this treaty, the money to which I refer being that to be put up by the United States in the next 4 or 5 years?

Mr. PATTERSON. Some consideration, but not detailed study. I think the amount mentioned and requested by the State Department is right.

Senator DONNELL. That is the $1,130,000,000?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And that is, of course, for the first year?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You have not given consideration, Mr. Secretary, or have you, to the probabilities of what will be required for the second, third, and fourth years?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, I regret it extremely, but I am going to have to leave. I did not anticipate this would take up so much time, and Senator McMahon will conclude the hearing. I apologize. We have some representatives of the British dominions over at the office. I had made an engagement to see them and extend some courtesies.

I want to congratulate you on your very clear and your very able view on this question, in all of which I most heartily concur.

Senator McMahan, will you take over? There is only one other witness.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, I assure you I shall not infringe very much longer upon your time either.

PROCEDURE IN THE EVENT OF AN ATTACK

I wanted to ask you a question, the substance of which has been presented to several witnesses on the stand, and that is this: Suppose that this treaty shall be ratified, shall come into effect, and that we will say 6 weeks after it has come into effect Russia should send into Norway an attacking force of 500,000 troops, and that at the time the troops were so sent into Norway the Congress of the United States should not be in session. Would you, Mr. Secretary, be of the opinion that the President of the United States, by virtue of his being Commander in Chief of the armed forces, would have the legal right to determine what, if any, military action should be taken by our country prior to the assembling of Congress, by reason of the attack so made by Russia, and in view of the obligations under the treaty?

Mr. PATTERSON. I would expect the President to immediately summon Congress into special session, and I would expect Congress at that time to make the necessary declaration of war.

Senator DONNELL. So that you would consider that in the eventuality that I have mentioned the most probable result would be a declaration of war by Congress?

Mr. PATTERSON. I would.

Senator DONNELL. And that means by both Houses of Congress?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is their prerogative. But it would be my expectation, after the signature to the North Atlantic Pact and the ratification of it, that that would be up to the Congress.

Senator DONNELL. So that the signing of the pact and the ratification of it, to quote your words, among the provisions of it being that "the parties agree that an armed attack against one or more of them in Europe or North America shall be considered an attack against them all"—you say that such signing and ratification of the pact would, in your judgment, plus the circumstances of attack by the 500,000 soldiers, produce inevitably, I assume you in effect judge, a declaration of war by Congress?

Mr. PATTERSON. I would expect Congress to take that action; yes, sir.

PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Secretary, suppose, however, that the Congress could not be assembled, we will say, within 2 or 3 days, and that in the meantime the President should be advised by the Secretary of Defense or his other military advisers that in order to prevent Russia from obtaining such tremendous advantage as might result in her being able to conquer the European nations attacked—that and the others—it was of the utmost importance that he should immediately dispatch bombers in great numbers from the United States of America before he waited for Congress to come together; is there any doubt in your mind as to his power to do that?

Mr. PATTERSON. I think he could easily dispatch them; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. You have no doubt as to his power to do so, in compliance with the obligations of the United States under the pact?

Mr. PATTERSON. But Congress still has the power to declare war, and he has not.

Senator DONNELL. I think that is precisely correct. But you do think that the necessary, or at least the most probable, effect of the facts that I have recited would be that Congress would feel it would be obligatory upon it to declare war and would do so. Is that right?

Mr. PATTERSON. In the case you put; yes.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE PACT

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, in your concluding paragraph you say, "After the pact has been ratified, the Atlantic Union Committee proposes that the Senate examine the project for Atlantic union as a means of implementing the pact by a firmer union of the people who are free and are honestly devoted to the cause of world peace." You consider, therefore, as I understand, that this Atlantic union of free countries of the world, which would include the United States, would, as you say, be a project, as I understand it, to be used "as a means of implementing the pact." Is that right?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Do you have in mind what additional implementation would be needed for this pact, other than what is already set forth in it, in the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. PATTERSON. No. You can have the North Atlantic Pact and means of implementing or exercising it and still not have an Atlantic union. That is true.

Senator DONNELL. As a matter of fact, article 3 of the North Atlantic Treaty reads:

In order more effectively to achieve the objectives of this treaty, the parties, separately and jointly, by means of continuous and effective self-help and mutual aid, will maintain and develop their individual and collective capacity to resist armed attack.

That section would certainly provide adequate powers for the implementation of the treaty, would it not?

Mr. PATTERSON. That is right. The idea of the Atlantic union is an extension rather than an implementation of the pact. I do not think my language was very good in that particular.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, in regard to the Atlantic Union Committee, Mr. Justice Roberts kindly gave us the list of the members of the council. You have a council, I believe, of possibly 150 or 200 members, something like that; is that correct?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. I think he said to us that the membership has not as yet been formed; that is to say, no great number of people have become members. Am I correct in that?

Mr. PATTERSON. It is still in process of formation.

Senator DONNELL. So that at the present time how many persons, substantially, would you say compose the Atlantic Union Committee for which you today appear, in all of its branches, committees, councils, or just ordinary members? How many persons?

Mr. PATTERSON. I would not have any idea.

Senator DONNELL. Would you say, Mr. Secretary, it would be as many as 250?

Mr. PATTERSON. Whatever number Justice Roberts says would suit me. He knows much more about it than I do.

Senator DONNELL. Have you been particularly active in the affairs of the committee, Mr. Secretary?

Mr. PATTERSON. Well, as active as I could be, but I have a living to make.

Senator DONNELL. How many times has this committee met since it was organized?

Mr. PATTERSON. It has met a good many times, but I have not been to many meetings.

Senator DONNELL. And it was organized, if I am not mistaken, about 8 weeks ago?

Mr. PATTERSON. Sometime in March, I believe.

Senator DONNELL. And of its membership today, about what proportion of it is in New York, do you know?

Mr. PATTERSON. I have no idea.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Secretary, I want to thank you and the committee for the courtesy of permitting me to interrogate you.

PRESIDENTIAL POWERS

Senator McMAHON. Mr. Secretary, this treaty does not add or subtract from the President's constitutional powers, does it?

Mr. PATTERSON. No, sir.

Senator McMAHON. As I understand this proposed Atlantic union, and I must confess I understand it in a most limited way at the present time, it is your objective to explore what could be done to bring about closer union among the free countries. That is the basic thought, is it not?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes.

Senator McMAHON. Senator Donnell asked you many questions about a specific blueprint, and you said that, of course, you could not give it. I suppose that blueprint would come out of the discussion between selected representatives of free countries, if that meeting were held?

Mr. PATTERSON. Yes, sir. That is quite a distance off.

Senator McMAHON. And that is quite a distance off?

Of course, when the framers of the Federal Constitution met, it was for the purpose of framing the charter which we know as the Constitution of the United States, and in that Constitution the States granted certain powers to the Federal Government, reserving all other powers to themselves. I suppose you have something of that nature in mind?

Mr. PATTERSON. The same approach.

Senator McMAHON. I just wanted to clear that up for the record. Thank you very much indeed, Mr. Patterson. It is good to see you again.

We have Mrs. Dana C. Backus, the interim chairman of the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace. Mrs. Backus, you may go right ahead.

STATEMENT OF MRS. DANA C. BACKUS, INTERIM NATIONAL CHAIRMAN, WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE FOR LASTING PEACE

Mrs. BACKUS. It may seem strange to some that an organization of women dedicated to the cause of lasting peace should be urging the ratification of a military pact, even though that pact is of a purely defensive nature.

Because our hearts are set on lasting peace, it would be nice if we could join the ranks of those who feel that the way for this country to achieve peace is to say that we won't fight and that we will disarm. The difficulty with that isolationist-pacifist approach is that it won't work unless every nation agrees to it and puts it into practice. The other approach to lasting peace, of course, is through collective consultation to settle disputes and collective action to prevent or stop aggression.

Last fall, when the North Atlantic Defense Pact was still only a rumor as far as the public was concerned, the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace adopted the following policy as part of its legislative program for the coming year.

Grant security guarantees and military aid to western Europe on terms that would be in accord with article 51 of the United Nations Charter.

The stated purpose of our organization is—to unite American women to work for full participation by the United States in the United Nations and related efforts to build a world of peace and justice under law.

THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE PACT

When the North Atlantic Defense Pact was published, we analyzed it from the point of view of these two statements. We consider that both the letter and the spirit of the pact are in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations.

I need scarcely quote the text of the pact to the members of the Foreign Relations Committee but, just to show that I have read it too, I would like to bring out these points. The signers of the pact not only give a general pledge to abide by the principles and purposes of the Charter, they commit themselves to carrying out certain specific procedures called for under the articles of the Charter. I refer particularly to the following passage in the pact:

Any such armed attack and all measures taken as a result thereof shall immediately be reported to the Security Council. Such measures will be terminated when the Security Council has taken the measure necessary to restore and maintain international peace and security.

We are convinced that the North Atlantic Pact is a well-considered and useful document. However, no treaty can of itself keep the peace. The effectiveness of the pact must be based on action, not on words alone. There are two aspects of the implementation of the pact which the people of the United States must consider. One is a decision which this country must make now for itself; the other depends on continuous consultation among all the signatories of the pact.

IMPLEMENTATION OF PACT

The first step which this country must take is to prove that we mean what we say in the pact by supplying our colleagues, as well as ourselves, with the physical means of carrying out the defense pact. Defense without weapons is an empty word. If an armed attack should occur in Europe and our friends were not adequately armed, we would either have to forget the pact or let the armed forces of the United States do the job of stopping aggression. Military aid provided now will enable the nations of Europe to help defend themselves in case of emergency.

The second aspect of implementing the pact involves the practical interpretation of its provisions. What constitutes an armed attack? What measures will be necessary to counter that particular attack? Above all, what will be the practical day-to-day relationship between the pact and the UN?

The pact itself provides for integration with the United Nations. In practice the nations who join the pact may either use article 9 as the basis of a separate little club for conferring outside the UN, or it can carry out the stated intent of the pact, which is to supplement and strengthen the United Nations. We urge that the latter course be followed.

Our organization does not consider that the North Atlantic Defense Pact is the sole or even the primary solution of the security problem. The settlement of disputes through negotiation, conciliation, and arbitration will always be the world's best hope for lasting peace. We have watched with interest and hope the slow but steady progress of the United Nations in developing practical techniques and achieving practical results in this field.

UNITED NATIONS AND THE PACT

Peace, however, depends not only on cooperation alone but on security against those who refuse to cooperate. For this reason the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace has always urged prompt agreement concerning armed forces to be made available to the Security Council; we have greeted with enthusiasm the proposal for a United Nations guard force; and we have studied various proposals for developing security commitments under article 51 of the Charter.

To tie in the implementation of the Atlantic Pact to the obligations under the Charter, we suggest action under article 43 of the Charter. The group of UN members in the Atlantic Pact might well offer to the Security Council to make available a mobile task force. Then, on the initiative of the Security Council, were it so minded, a special agreement for armed forces for the United Nations could be negotiated. If a veto were to intervene, the mobile force could be made available for use under General Assembly resolutions calling for its use for which the larger Atlantic Pact members have voted affirmation.

We feel that in view of the current lack of unity between East and West which manifests itself both within and outside the United Nations, the North Atlantic Defense Pact is a necessary step in the effort to provide a temporary security against disunity. We feel, however, that while Europe is the focal center of our security problem it is not the only danger point in the world. We must never lose sight of the global nature of our security.

Our organization would like to suggest that in addition to ratifying the North Atlantic Defense Pact and appropriating funds for arming our friends under the pact, the Congress, and this committee in particular, might well consider the advisability of a multilateral security pact open to all members of the United Nations and tied in with the machinery of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Senator McMAHON. Thank you very much.

Senator DONNELL?

HISTORY OF WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE FOR LASTING PEACE

Senator DONNELL. Mrs. Backus, you appear today on behalf of the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace?

Mrs. BACKUS. Yes; that is right.

Senator DONNELL. You are the interim national chairman of that organization?

Mrs. BACKUS. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. How long have you acted as interim national chairman?

Mrs. BACKUS. For a little over a year.

Senator DONNELL. What is that committee? Tell us, please, as to the number of members and how widely spread geographically.

Mrs. BACKUS. To go back historically a little bit, the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace is an outgrowth of the National Committee on the Cause and Cure of War, which was founded under the inspiration of the late Carrie Chapman Catt in the 1920's, and it was in 1942, I believe, that that committee, after Pearl Harbor, felt that merely to study the cause and cure of war at the time we were plunging into another World War would not be a very effective approach, and therefore that committee disbanded and the Women's Action Committee for Victory and Lasting Peace, which was our name during the war, was created out of the ashes, shall we say, of the older organization.

Senator DONNELL. What was the date of the creation, then, of the Women's Action Committee for Victory and Lasting Peace?

Mrs. BACKUS. That was created in March of 1943. It was just the time of the famous B2-H2 bill that went through before there was a United Nations or Dumbarton Oaks.

Senator DONNELL. Subsequently the words "Victory and" were stricken out, and the present title is "Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace"?

Mrs. BACKUS. That is right.

MEMBERSHIP OF WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE

Senator DONNELL. How large a membership does the committee have?

Mrs. BACKUS. We are both a holding company and an organization of individual members also. There have been 14 national member organizations, women's organizations, who have been affiliated with us and who have had representation on our general committee, which is our board, and then in addition to that we have now about 11,000 individual women members.

Senator DONNELL. How widely scattered are the 11,000?

Mrs. BACKUS. Throughout the United States.

ATLANTIC PACT DISCUSSIONS OF WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE

Senator DONNELL. You say that last fall the committee adopted the policy sentence you just read, in which you refer to article 51 of the United Nations Charter. Where was that convention held, and how large was the attendance?

Mrs. BACKUS. That particular policy was not adopted at a convention.

Senator DONNELL. At what was it adopted?

Mrs. BACKUS. I will explain that to you also.

Actually our general committee, our board, is our policy governing group.

Senator DONNELL. How large a body is that board?

Mrs. BACKUS. That is about 65 members, but there again I have to go back into history a little bit, if I may. At our convention which was held in Washington a year ago April, the delegates at that convention did bring up the subject of implementation of the United Nations Charter under article 51. Actually that subject was brought up by one of our local groups, one of our very strong local groups, in Buffalo, N. Y. At that time various plans were discussed.

Senator DONNELL. It is all right, but I would like to make this statement. I just wanted to find out approximately how large a body it was which last fall adopted this expression which you quote as a part of the legislative program for 1949:

Grant security guarantees and military aid to western Europe on terms that would be in accord with article 51 of the United Nations Charter.

Mrs. BACKUS. That was 65, but I do not think, without that background, it would give quite a fair picture. In other words, the general principle of either a general multilateral pact, a universal pact under article 51, or possibly some regional set-up under article 51, that over-all principle, was accepted at our convention over a year ago, and the general committee was asked to consult with our national consultants, with our member organizations and with our local groups, as to ways and means of putting that into more concrete terms, and therefore last fall, when our new policies were set up, we had in consultation with these various groups worked through and thought through the development of that idea, and that is why we were in a position last fall to put that statement in among our policies.

Senator DONNELL. The convention that you speak of a year or more ago, where was that held?

Mrs. BACKUS. That was in Washington.

Senator DONNELL. How largely was that attended?

Mrs. BACKUS. That was attended by about 200 representatives from throughout the country.

Senator DONNELL. Were these mostly from one section of the country or were they from all over?

Mrs. BACKUS. They were from all over.

Senator DONNELL. Just one further question along this line. You say, after telling us in your written statement of the adoption of this particular sentence that I have quoted, beginning with the words "Grant security guarantees and military aid * * *" as part of the program for the coming year, "When the North Atlantic Defense Pact was published, we analyzed it from the point of view of these two statements," referring to that statement and another. Has your membership had a convention and acted at all upon the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mrs. BACKUS. It has not acted as a body.

Senator DONNELL. Who is it that you refer to when you say "we" analyzed it?

Mrs. BACKUS. There again it is the policy forming board of directors.

Senator DONNELL. Has it held a meeting since last fall?

Mrs. BACKUS. Oh, yes; it holds a meeting once a month.

Senator DONNELL. And has that board passed any resolution with respect to the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mrs. BACKUS. Yes, it has.

Senator DONNELL. Did you bring that with you today?

Mrs. BACKUS. That I do not have, but the resolution itself was merely confirming the general action taken last fall, and saying that we feel the North Atlantic Pact lies within, as I stated, the U. N., and our purpose of supporting the United Nations.

Senator DONNELL. Would you be good enough, if it meets with the approval of the acting chairman of the committee, to furnish the chairman of the committee with a copy of each and all expressions, official expressions, by any committee or board of your national organization which has occurred since the meeting last fall, which was participated in by the 65 members whom you have mentioned? Will you do that?

Mr. BACKUS. I will.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

NEW YORK 22, N. Y., May 10, 1949.

SUPPLEMENTARY STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO TESTIMONY PRESENTED BEFORE THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, MAY 9, 1949, BY THE WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE FOR LASTING PEACE, INC.

On November 4, 1948, our board (general committee) adopted the policy regarding security guarantees and military aid quoted in my previous testimony. This subject had been discussed also at the October meeting of our general committee. In December our full new statement of policies was mailed out to all of our cooperating organizations and local groups (see exhibit A) and a summary of our new policy statement was included in our monthly chairman's letter which goes to all of our individual members (see exhibit B).

On March 3, 1949, the general committee empowered me to write to each of the members of the Foreign Relations Committee indicating our support of the general principles of the proposed North Atlantic Pact, together with military aid to implement that pact. A summary of this letter was sent to all of our members in our March chairman's letter (see exhibit C).

During April members of our general committee and executive committee studied the published pact and attended several meetings of citizen's groups at which the pact was discussed. An informal statement regarding a possible integration between articles 3 and 5 of the pact and article 43 of the Charter was drafted but has not been officially acted upon.

On April 29, after informal consultation with members of our executive committee, I followed the advice of our Washington chairman of governmental information and requested a hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee.

On May 5 our general committee empowered me to appear before the Foreign Relations Committee in support of the pact. In discussing this move, note was taken of the fact that we have not had an annual convention this year. It was pointed out, however, that (1) at our 1948 convention the idea of defense pacts under article 51 of the United Nations Charter had been discussed and had received general approval; (2) the subsequent action of our general committee had been fully publicized to our members and ample background information on this subject had been circulated to our members over a period of 5 months; (3) during this period we had received less than a dozen letters from our members questioning the committee's stand and only two voicing strong criticism.

EXHIBIT A. STATEMENT OF POLICY

The concern of the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace is with United Nations recommendations and agreements and with congressional and executive action by the United States Government concerning foreign policy or closely related matters. When a measure is before the United Nations, we may present our stand to the United States delegates to the United Nations and to the executive branch of our Government. When measures adopted in the United Nations require action by the United States, we may urge such action upon Congress and upon the appropriate Government agencies.

I. The Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace urges that Congress shall—

A. Give continued support to the European recovery program, with the appropriation of adequate funds to enable the Economic Cooperation Administration to carry on effectively.

B. Encourage and expand international trade by—

1. Prompt approval of United States membership in the International Trade Organization under the terms of the Habana charter, with adequate enabling legislation to provide for effective participation.

2. Continued authority to the executive, not subject to congressional veto, for negotiating reciprocal trade agreements under a unified system for the planning and administration of United States trade policy.

C. Grant security guaranties and military aid to western Europe on terms that would be in accord with article 51 of the United Nations Charter.

D. Amend the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 to provide—

1. Admission of a greater number of refugees.

2. Elimination of discrimination for eligibility of refugees.

3. Elimination of cut-off date of December 22, 1945, for eligibility of refugees.

4. Efficient and humane administration.

E. Authorize and appropriate funds for an adequate and carefully planned program of international information and educational exchange.

F. appropriate promptly $65,000,000 for the building loan and pass measures necessary to the establishment of the permanent headquarters of the United Nations in the United States.

G. Revise or repeal the prewar neutrality acts to bring our national policy into line with our obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and our other collective security commitments.

H. Pass domestic legislation which will give concrete effect to the international declaration of human rights.

I. Ratify the international convention outlawing genocide.

J. Approve an amendment to the United States Constitution to provide for ratification of treaties by a simple majority of both Houses of Congress.

II. The Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace urges that our Government continue to support the United Nations in the full exercise of its powers as conferred by the Charter. We recommend that particular attention be given to the following measures now before the United Nations:

A. Full use of the General Assembly as a medium for registering the will of the nations on matters involving international peace and security, including the permanent establishment of a year-round committee of the Assembly.

B. Fulfillment of the recommendations of the interim committee with regard to the application of the veto; particularly with respect to not using the veto in the case of peaceful settlement, or admission of new members.

C. Progress toward eventual international reduction and limitation of armaments, stressing at this time:

(a) Continued search through the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission for new areas of agreement on the effective international control of atomic energy. Pending further developments we continue to support:

1. The setting up of an International Atomic Energy Development Authority along the lines of the majority reports of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission.

2. Abolition of veto in votes involving: Day-to-day decisions of the development authority. Action by Security Council in punishment of violations.

(b) Conclusion as rapidly as possible of agreements for contingent forces to be furnished to the Security Council.

D. Establishment of a United Nations guard force immediately available to perform duties of a protective nature.

E. Admission of Israel as a member of the United Nations. Agreement on a just and peaceful settlement in Palestine.

F. Full use of the Economic and Social Council and its commissions not only for study and discussion but as a medium for solving specific problems and developing constructive projects.

G. Provisions for the free exchange of information among nations.

H. Adoption of an international convention on human rights with adequate provisions for implementation.

I. Development and codification of international law.

EXHIBIT B

NEW YORK 22, N. Y., November 1948.

DEAR MEMBER OR SPONSOR: High lights of the meeting of the general committee, November 4, were as follows:

New policy statement.<sup>1</sup>—The general committee approved a revised statement of policies. The most important items in the new statement are—

I. Legislative program:

A. Adequate funds for the continuation of the European recovery program.

B. (1) United States membership in the International Trade Organization;

(2) continuation of the executive authority to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements without congressional veto.

C. Security guaranties and military aid to western Europe.

D. Amendment of the Displaced Persons Act of 1948.

Other legislative measures to have our support include (1) international and cultural exchange; (2) appropriation of the United Nations building loan authorized last summer; (3) revision of the prewar neutrality acts; (4) domestic support of the international declaration of human rights; (5) ratification of treaties by a simple majority of both Houses of Congress.

II. Measures before the United Nations:

A. Permanent establishment of a year-round committee of the Assembly.

B. Fulfillment of recommendations of the Little Assembly concerning the use of the veto.

C. Agreement on the international control of atomic energy.

D. Agreement on the forces to be made available to the Security Council.

E. Establishment of a United Nations guard force.

F. (1) Admission of Israel to the United Nations; (2) agreement on a just and peaceful settlement in Palestine.

Other items include (1) full use of the Economic and Social Council; (2) free exchange of information; (3) a convention on human rights; (4) a convention on genocide; (5) development and codification of international law.

LOUISE LAIDLAW BACKUS,
Interim National Chairman.

EXHIBIT C

WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE FOR LASTING PEACE.

New York 22, N. Y., March 1949.

DEAR MEMBER OR SPONSOR: The following is a summary of discussions and decisions at the meeting of the general committee on March 3, 1949.

<sup>1</sup> Full text of the revised statement of policies will be available on request.

North Atlantic Pact.—Our committee on governmental information advised us that Congress has had little reaction so far from the country at large concerning the proposed North Atlantic Pact. The general committee voted to send a letter to all members of the Foreign Relations Committee asking that when the pact is presented to the Senate every effort should be made to give prompt and favorable consideration both to the pact and to supplementary legislation for military aid. The letter also contained the following points:

1. "We consider that the pact will lose much of its value unless it contains specific, though perhaps limited, commitments for the prompt use of military force in case of an armed attack.

2. "We feel strongly that the pact should be definitely tied in with our obligations under the United Nations Charter.

3. "It might be advisable to consider, in addition to the North Atlantic Pact, some broader commitment for collective action under article 51 of the United Nations Charter that would be open to all members of the United Nations."

LOUISE LAIDLAW BACKUS,
(Mrs. Dana Converse Backus),
Interim National Chairman.

EXHIBIT D. RESOLUTION ON ARMSTRONG PLAN FOR STRENGTHENING THE CHARTER ADOPTED BY THE WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE FOR LASTING PEACE AT ITS FIFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION APRIL 7-9, 1948

Whereas it is daily becoming increasingly apparent that the power of the United Nations must be strengthened; and

Whereas the use of the veto in the Security Council is one of the major factors in the situation; and

Whereas the studies of this subject recently begun by the interim committee of the Assembly, on the initiative of the United States delegation, will in all probability take a considerable length of time; and

Whereas revision of the Charter at this time would be a most difficult and hazardous task;

The delegates to the annual convention of the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace recommend that the general committee, in cooperation with the consultants, give careful consideration to the Armstrong plan for the implementation of article 51 of the Charter, by a supplementary agreement, binding as many nations as may desire, in a pact of collective self-defense, as has already been done in the Western Hemisphere, and more recently in Brussels.

EXHIBIT E. STATEMENT OF THE WOMEN'S ACTION COMMITTEE FOR LASTING PEACE CONCERNING THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE USE OF FORCE

In the present state of the world, the strength of the United Nations must at times rest on the power of the Security Council to use force. Ultimately it rests upon the determination of the member nations to cooperate in building up a system of collective security which can effectively prevent or check aggression. The Women's Action Committee considers that it is most unfortunate that there are still no armed forces immediately available to the United Nations.

There are three types of circumstances which warrant the use of armed force within the framework of the United Nations.

(1) The Security Council may take military measures to restore international peace and security.

(2) It may also take military measures to maintain international peace and security.

(3) Individual nations have the right of self defense, both individual and collective, in case of an armed attack.

1. Armed forces.—Under article 43 of the Charter member nations are, by special agreement, to make available to the Security Council a specified number of armed forces and facilities for the purpose of maintaining international peace and security. In case the Security Council found it necessary to apply military sanctions to prevent or stop aggression, these national forces would be turned over for use by the Security Council under the strategic direction of the Military Staff Committee, composed of the chiefs of staff of the five great powers.

Under the Charter it would be impossible to use these national forces against a great power because of the veto, but they would be useful in dealing with minor international disputes and with cases of aggression on the part of smaller nations. However, because of disagreement between the great powers concerning some of the principles that should govern the use of national armed forces, no such forces have yet been made available to the Security Council. It does not seem likely that agreements will be reached for some time to come. Moreover, as a matter of practical application, there will be many situations in which the use of national contingents would not be considered advisable.

2. United Nations guard force.—Before the San Francisco Conference, many organizations in the United States, including the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace, advocated the setting up of an international police force directly responsible to the United Nations. At that time, however, it appeared impossible to get the great powers to agree to anything more than the joint use of national forces to maintain peace and security.

It has now become apparent that the recruiting of an international police force on a very small scale may become the first practical step toward developing force to back up the decisions of the Security Council. Recently Secretary General Trygve Lie suggested that "a beginning could be made now through the establishment of a comparatively small guard force as distinct from a striking force." Indeed, more recently on the request of the United Nations Mediator Count Bernadotte, the Secretary General has actually sent over 50 United Nations guards to Palestine to check on the supplies being sent into Jerusalem.

While the United Nations Charter does not specifically provide for such a force directly recruited under the United Nations, neither does it say anything which would prohibit such a force. Indeed, the Secretary General may, within the budgetary provisions and other regulations adopted by the General Assembly, appoint and assign whatever staff may be required by any organ of the United States. Thus, if the General Assembly wishes, it could authorize Mr. Lie to assemble a sizable guard force. It would be extremely useful to have on hand a guard force of several thousand men who could be sent to trouble spots to guard against outbreaks of violence until a solution has been reached.

Thus an adequate guard force would prove most helpful in Palestine during the truce period. Such a force should also be helpful in creating a sense of security in a situation like that in Kashmir where the chief obstacles to acceptance of the Security Council's recommendations for a plebiscite seems to be fear on the part of both sides as to what the other side may do if it complies with the Security Council's request to withdraw the contending forces.

3. Collective action.—Article 51 of the Charter guarantees the right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations. This article would come into play in an emergency pending action by the Security Council. It also would operate if for some reason the Council failed to act.

Article 51 may be implemented by regional agreements as provided in chapter VIII of the Charter, or it might be implemented through a general multilateral pact under which the signatories to the pact would take action upon the recommendation of the General Assembly. The advantage of regional pacts is that they are built on a community of interest which would tend to facilitate prompt and effective action in an emergency; on the other hand, regional pacts might accentuate the current tendencies toward power politics and spheres of influence. The chief advantage of a general multilateral pact would be its approach toward universality; however, it might suffer the disadvantage of unwieldiness and lack of focused responsibility.

Article 51 opens the way for collective action in circumstances beyond the control of the Security Council, that is in case of aggression on the part of a great power. However, this article provides for the posse type of action—agreements to join forces against the aggressor after the aggression is committed. This is not a substitute for having armed forces in existence immediately at the service of the United Nations.

Conclusion.—It is the considered judgment of the Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace that the above methods for maintaining peace and developing collective security are in no way mutually exclusive and no one of them can be thought of as a substitute for the others. Every effort should be made to encourage the immediate development of United Nations machinery along all three lines—the joint use of national armed contingents, the development of an international guard force, and commitments for collective self-defense.

Turning to the future, the Women's Action Committee suggests that eventually a large-scale international police force should be established. Permanent international security cannot be achieved until the world is freed of the fear of military domination by one or more of the great powers. Gradually the balance of power must be shifted to the world organization itself.

A United Nations Air Police Force would be particularly important. The development of such an international air force should be coupled with the international control of all weapons of mass destruction under a United Nations Authority along the lines of the atomic energy control plan already agreed upon by 9 out of the 11 members of the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission.

Attention should not be centered solely, however, on the use of force. It is vital that profound and sustained consideration be given to the development of machinery for conciliation and other means of peaceful settlement. The existence of United Nations forces and commitments for the use of force within the framework of the United Nations should be considered primarily as supplementary instruments for creating security and maintaining order which will facilitate negotiations leading to the peaceful settlement of international disputes.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, that is all I desire to ask.

POSITION OF PROFESSOR BORCHARD

There is one matter I would like to bring to the attention of the committee at this point. Senator Connally, the chairman, made a statement the other day in the record to the effect that the last date for the application by persons to testify would be at 10:30 tomorrow morning, Tuesday morning of this week. I may tell the committee—I think I ought to do this in fairness both to it and myself—that I thereupon communicated over the telephone with Professor Nettles, of Cornell University, whose name I have observed frequently in the press, and I also attempted to communicate with Prof. Edwin Borchard, of Yale University. I learned some weeks ago of the illness of Professor Borchard, although I received a telegram back from him at a time of an earlier attempt to communicate with him. I reached Mrs. Borchard on the telephone possibly Friday or Saturday of last week, and explained to her the fact that the time limit for persons to apply for permission to testify is Tuesday of this week.

She told me of the very serious illness of Professor Borchard and indicated he would not be able to be here. I made inquiry along the line of whether he would desire to present a statement, and I just left it that way, as to whether he would or would not. I have subsequently received a telegram, which is short, from Professor Borchard, which I would like, if I may, to read into the record at this point. It is dated May 7 at New Haven, Conn., and was received, I may say, in Washington May 7 at 6:16 p. m., and was telephoned to me. It is addressed:

HON. FORREST DONNELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I am entirely in accord with you as to the true meaning of the Atlantic Pact. If Gerard thinks we will be at war with Russia within 1 year if we do not sign the pact I think we shall be at war in less time if we do sign it. I am opposed to this tremendous change in our foreign policy. We are repudiating the founders of this country, but we shall be at war with or without declaration because a vote for war automatically follows the pact. An alliance is constitutional as I explained to Vandenberg.

EDWIN BORCHARD.

QUALIFICATIONS OF PROFESSOR BORCHARD

Mr. Chairman, I should like, with your permission, to introduce in connection with this statement first the current statement in Who's Who In America with respect to Professor Borchard, which

I shall furnish to the reporter; and, second, excerpts from certain remarks made on January 28, 1949, in the course of the St. Lawrence Seaway debate, by the Honorable Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., Member of the Senate of the United States, in which comment is made by him with respect to the experience of Professor Borchard, in which he offers a copy of a certain agreement with Professor Borchard's underlinings.

May I have the statement inserted in the record at this point?

Senator McMAHON. That certainly will be done, Senator.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

SENATOR LODGE, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, SENATE, JANUARY 28, 1948

Reverting to the 1941 compact itself, Prof. Edwin Borchard prepared in 1944 a very informative analysis of the 1941 agreement. It will be recalled that Professor Borchard has had wide experience as an official of the Department of State, a practitioner in many important cases before the Supreme Court, and other Federal and State courts; was counsel for the United States and for other governments in outstanding international arbitration; was representative of the United States on international legal commissions and for 20 years was professor of constitutional and international law at one of our leading university law schools. He is also the author of several recognized standard works on constitutional and international law. Professor Borchard took a copy of the 1941 executive agreement between the United States and Canada and underlined in that agreement those provisions which he believed, in his considered opinion, were properly the subject matter of a treaty rather than an agreement. I do not have the time and I do not want to take the time of the Senate to go through this agreement line by line, pointing out Professor Borchard's emphasis. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point in my remarks a copy of the 1941 agreement between the United States and Canada, with Professor Borchard's underlinings included therein. I think that if Senators will take a look at this document, as analyzed by Professor Borchard, they will be impressed, as I am, with the fact that by every test of form, substance, and magnitude the St. Lawrence seaway and power project are most certainly well within our traditional concept of a treaty.

Senator DONNELL. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Senator McMAHON. Senator, I direct your attention to the fact that I not only have a luncheon engagement, but I want to eat. We have two more witnesses here, the first of which is Mr. Fadler, of the Young Democratic Club of the District of Columbia. I understand you want only 2 or 3 minutes, Mr. Fadler.

Mr. FADLER. Yes, sir.

Senator McMAHON. That is, 3 minutes with me, but how long with Senator Donnell?

Senator DONNELL. I did not catch that.

Senator McMAHON. Maybe it is just as well.

He promised me he would take only 3 minutes, and I hoped he would not have much more than that with you, because I want to go to lunch, and also see if I can make an appearance on the floor.

Go ahead, Mr. Fadler.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM F. FADLER, JR., MEMBER OF THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE, YOUNG DEMOCRATIC CLUB OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. FADLER. Mr. Chairman, my name is William F. Fadler, Jr. I am a practicing attorney in the District of Columbia with offices in the Union Trust Building.

I am happy to have the opportunity to appear in behalf of the Young Democratic Club of the District of Columbia as a member of its legislative committee.

The Young Democratic Club of the District of Columbia is an organization composed of 400 young men and women, nearly all the men being veterans, in the District of Columbia, who are actively interested in governmental affairs and have organized to foster and perpetuate the ideals and principles of the Democratic Party.

Although our organization is located in the District of Columbia, over 90 percent of the members maintain a voting residence in various States throughout the country.

RESOLUTION OF YOUNG DEMOCRATIC CLUB

At a regular meeting of the club on April 18, 1949, the following resolution was passed, which constituted an endorsement of the North Atlantic Treaty:

Whereas the American people earnestly desire assurances of peace in these troubled times; and

Whereas under the leadership of President Harry S. Truman and through the earnest efforts of the Honorable Dean Acheson, Secretary of State for the United States, and through the efforts of other outstanding statesmen in both the legislative and executive branches of the Government, the United States has signed the Atlantic Pact; and

Whereas the free peoples of the world look to the Atlantic Pact and the United States as bulwarks of their freedom; and

Whereas the Atlantic Pact is an instrument of peace and is properly entered into under the provisions of both the Constitution of the United States and under the articles of the United Nations Charter: Now, therefore,

We, the Young Democratic Club of the District of Columbia, in regular meeting assembled, do hereby earnestly petition the Senate of the United States to ratify promptly the Atlantic Pact and to thus show the world that the United States is not an aggressor, but rather a country which is jealous of the freedoms of its peoples and which believes that freedom can best be protected by joining with other freedom-loving peoples in an effort to preserve the peace of the world.

MEMBERSHIP OF YOUNG DEMOCRATIC CLUB

Senator McMAHON. How many members have you in your club?

Mr. FADLER. About 400, sir.

Senator McMAHON. How many were at the meeting?

Mr. FADLER. A few over 100. I was at the meeting.

Senator McMAHON. Was the matter carefully debated?

Mr. FADLER. It was, sir. I think the meeting lasted for about 2 hours. Of course the legislative committee had previously discussed it at great length.

Senator DONNELL. Was a copy of the North Atlantic Treaty read to the meeting?

Mr. FADLER. It was not read in open meeting. However, it was debated and deliberated upon by the legislative committee, and there were pros and cons of the deliberation presented to the group, both sides.

Senator DONNELL. How many members are there of the legislative committee who considered the actual text of the North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. FADLER. Approximately 20, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And those are lawyers in the District of Columbia, is that right?

Mr. FADLER. I would say a good portion of them—lawyers and law students. They are young Democrats.

Senator DONNELL. I am sure that the fact of the youth of the members is no argument against them. It is very commendable indeed that they are studying these questions. I am glad they are.

At any rate, there were about 20 members of the committee who did?

Mr. FADLER. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Are they all members of the Democratic Party?

Mr. FADLER. They are all members of the Young Democratic Club.

Senator DONNELL. And one of the qualifications for membership is membership in the Democratic Party?

Mr. FADLER. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. I believe you said, though, that the treaty itself was not read to this gathering of 100, the meeting which actually passed on the matter?

Mr. FADLER. No, sir; it was not.

Senator DONNELL. That is all.

Senator McMAHON. Thank you very much.

Mr. Robert B. Ely III.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT B. ELY III, ESQ., ATTORNEY, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mr. ELY. This is a problem which I have studied intensely for the last few years, the problem of how one may work for the form of world government that the Secretary of War mentioned. The proposal which I offer to the committee was characterized by the editors of the American Bar Association Journal, whose editorial staff have characterized it, in volume XXXV, American Bar Association Journal, page 3132, as—a closely reasoned proposal for the creation of an important instrument for promotion of greater international understanding, and through that understanding of a more secure peace for the world.

The proposal is that as a preliminary step to the type of world order which the Secretary mentioned—

Senator McMAHON. I think it is important that we keep the record straight. The Secretary specifically put aside world government as that is commonly known, and talked about a closer union between this country and the free countries of the world.

Mr. ELY. That is right, sir. That is the essence of what I have in mind as a first step toward the union, not toward a complete world federation. I think that is completely visionary, and I would echo Senator Austin's words quoted in yesterday's Times on that.

INTERNATIONAL COURTS

My proposal is that as a step toward world order we take a repetition of what our English ancestors found as the first step toward the development of the reign of law which we rejoice in today; that is to say, the establishment of additional international courts, through whom and through whose daily operations in the activities of individuals international law can be given a real meaning, so that people will appreciate not only that it exists, but that it works, and I conclude only by reading from the statement, and this is all I shall read from it, the specifications which such a court should meet, and which it seems to me that the council established under the Atlantic Pact might devote its attention to and act as a drafting committee in preparing a protocol for. I say "a court;" I should have said "a series of courts."

The proposed courts must be created by the United Nations, as the supreme authority in international affairs.

They should be created by the General Assembly of that Organization, in view of its duty under article 13 of the Charter to encourage "the progressive development of international law," and its authority under article 22 "to establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary."

The proposed courts must be subsidiary to the International Court of Justice, designated by article 92 of the Charter as "the principal judicial organ of the United Nations."

Their jurisdiction, although it should be compulsory so far as it extends, should only be imposed with the unanimous consent of the countries concerned.

That jurisdiction should extend to individuals, corporations, and other legal entities, as well as states, in the same manner as does the jurisdiction of the national courts in the countries concerned.

On that we have the authority of our Ambassador to the United Nations, that the keystone of a revised international law is its application to individuals.

That jurisdiction should, for the present at least, be civil only—in order to avoid a premature venture into the highly controversial and ill-defined criminal field.

It should also, for the present, be appellate only, so that there may be no sudden and unnecessary departure from established national trial procedures.

The decisions of the proposed courts should, in the interest of certainty and uniformity, be superior to rulings of national courts on questions of international law; just as constitutional considerations require decisions of national courts of last resort to be supreme in questions of national law.

Similarly, the decisions of the proposed courts should be given in the field of international law the same force as precedents as, in the field of national law, is given under the doctrine of stare decisis.

The argument in favor of such a proposal would go on for far greater length than I know you want. I would, however, with your permission, like to submit for the record a draft of a statute such as that which the United Nations General Assembly might enact to bring into being such a set of courts, and an article written by me for the American Bar Association Journal.

(The draft of statute referred to is as follows:)

(Drafted by Robert B. Ely III, Philadelphia, Pa., April 22, 1949)

PROTOCOL FOR STATUTE OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS ESTABLISHING INTERNATIONAL COURTS OF CIVIL APPEALS

PREAMBLE

We, the peoples of the states signatory to the present protocol, believing that the progressive development of international law would be effectively promoted through the establishment of permanent international judicial machinery for the enforcement of the rights and duties of individuals, associations, and other legal entities, as well as states, under international law, have resolved to combine our efforts as members of the United Nations to assist that Organization in the accomplishment of that aim.

Accordingly, our respective Governments, through their duly authorized representatives, have agreed to present to the General Assembly of the United Nations for enactment the present statute establishing International Courts of Civil Appeals as subsidiary judicial organs of the United Nations:

STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURTS OF CIVIL APPEALS

Article 1

The International Courts of Civil Appeals, hereinafter described for the sake of brevity as the "Courts," established by the General Assembly of the United Nations as subsidiary judicial organs of that Organization, shall be constituted and shall function in accordance with the provisions of the present statute.

Chapter I. Organization of the Courts

Article 2

1. Each Court shall be composed of a President and Associate Judges chosen in the manner hereinafter provided.

2. The President of each Court shall be that judge of the International Court of Justice who shall be from time to time designated by rule of that Court to exercise this office.

3. The Associate Judges of each Court shall be those persons who shall be appointed in the numbers specified in section 5 of this article by the governments of the countries signatory to the present statute in the same manner as though appointed to the supreme court of the country in question, shall file with the Secretary-General of the United Nations a written agreement to accept such office in accordance with this statute, and shall be confirmed in such office by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

4. The Associate Judges of the Courts shall be commissioned by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in the name of that Organization.

5. The countries signatory to the present statute are grouped into the following judicial districts, for each of which there shall be one Court, and each country shall select Associate Judges for the Court of its district in the number specified:

[This division into districts to be as the signatories may agree.]

Article 3

1. No member of a Court may exercise any political or administrative function, or engage in any other occupation of a professional nature.
2. Any doubt on this point shall be settled by the decision of the said Court.

Article 4

1. No member of a Court may act as agent, counsel, or advocate in any case, nor may he participate in the decision of any case in which he has previously taken part in such or any other capacity which would incapacitate him from sitting in the national courts of the country in which the proceedings arose.
2. Any doubt on this point shall be settled by the decision of the said Court.
3. If, for some special reason, a member of a Court considers that he should not take part in the decision of a particular case, he shall so inform the President of said Court.
4. If the President of a Court considers that for some special reason one of the members of the said Court should not sit in a particular case, he shall give him notice accordingly.
5. If, in either of such cases, the member of the Court and the President disagree, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the Court.

Article 5

1. No member of a Court can be dismissed unless, in the unanimous opinion of the other members, he has ceased to fulfill the required conditions.
2. Formal notification thereof shall be made to the Secretary-General of the United Nations by the Registrar.
3. This notification makes the place vacant.

Article 6

The members of the Courts, when engaged on the business of the Courts, shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

Article 7

Every member of the Courts shall, before taking up his duties, make a solemn declaration in open court that he will exercise his powers impartially and conscientiously.

Article 8

The Courts shall appoint Registrars and may provide for the appointment of such other offices as may be necessary.

Article 9

The seats of the Courts and the offices of their Registrars shall be established at the site of the United Nations. However, sessions of the Courts shall be held as provided in article 11.

Article 10

1. The Courts shall remain permanently in session except during the judicial vacations, the dates and duration of which shall be fixed by the International Court of Justice.
2. The President and Associate Judges of the Courts shall be entitled to such periodic leaves as are granted them by the International Court of Justice.
3. Members of the Courts shall be bound, unless they are on leave or prevented from attending by illness or other serious reasons duly explained to the President of their respective Courts, to hold themselves permanently at the disposal of the Courts of which they are members.

Article 11

1. A quorum for a session of any of the Courts shall consist of a President and not less than the following number of Associate Judges: [as the signatories may agree].

2. Should illness or other serious reasons, as provided in article 10, or disqualification, as provided in article 4, prevent a quorum for any session of the Courts, the number of Judges requisite to complete the quorum shall be assigned by the International Court of Justice from among its own members or the members of other of the Courts hereby established.

3. Sessions of the Courts shall be held in the rooms of the national supreme courts of the countries signatory to the present statute at such times as shall be fixed by rules of the Courts with a view to the speedy dispatch of business and the convenience of the said national supreme courts.

Article 12

The Courts shall frame rules for carrying out their functions. In particular, they shall lay down rules of procedure, which shall conform as nearly as may be with the rules for appellate procedure in the courts of the nations in the district concerned.

Article 13

1. The compensation to be paid to the members of the Courts shall be fixed by the General Assembly and shall not be decreased during the term of office.

2. The salary of the Registrar and other officers of the Courts shall be fixed by the General Assembly on the proposal of the Courts.

3. Regulations made by the General Assembly shall fix the conditions under which retirement pensions may be given to the members, the Registrar, and the other officers of the Courts, and the conditions under which they shall have their traveling expenses refunded.

4. The above salaries, allowances, and compensation shall be free of all taxation.

Article 14

The expenses of the Courts shall be borne equally by the countries in their respective districts.

Chapter II. Competence of the Courts

Article 15

The jurisdiction of the Courts shall comprise all proceedings involving questions of international law as defined in article 16, arising in the national courts of the countries signatory to the present statute, which shall be certified to the Courts by the national supreme courts of those countries in the manner provided in article 19.

Article 16

1. A proceeding shall be considered to involve a question of international law for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon one of the Courts whenever it is alleged, and there is produced prima facie evidence to support the allegation, that the proper determination of the rights or obligations of any one or more of the parties to the proceedings requires an interpretation, definition or application of—

(a) Any international convention, whether general or particular, or

(b) Any international custom generally accepted as law, or

(c) Any legal principle generally recognized by civilized nations as being one of international law.

Article 17

In the event of a dispute as to whether one of the Courts has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by the decision of that Court.

Chapter III. Procedure

Article 18

The official languages of the Courts shall be [as the signatories may agree] but all reports of the Courts shall be published in English, French, Chinese, Russian, and Spanish.

Article 19

1. If, upon any appeal to the national supreme court of any country signatory to the present statute it shall appear to that court from the record, or be argued in the pleadings or brief of any party, that the proceedings involve a question of international law, as defined in article 16, the appeal shall not be finally decided by that court, but the full record, pleadings and briefs therein, shall be certified to the Court for the district of which that country is a part, for final disposition.

2. In certifying a case to the Court for its district the national supreme court so doing shall accompany its certification with an opinion (which shall be binding upon the Court) only as to such questions, if any, of national law as it may be necessary to decide in determining the rights of the parties to the appeal.

Article 20

Each Court shall have the power, upon such conditions as it shall deem proper, to grant a supersedeas or make such other interlocutory order as may be necessary to preserve the respective rights of the parties pending final disposition of an appeal to it.

Article 21

The parties shall be represented by members of the bar of the respective Courts, who shall comprise such of the members in good standing of the bars of the national supreme courts of the countries signatory to the present statute as shall apply for admission to the bar of the Courts and shall be admitted thereto as the Courts may by rule provide.

Article 22

The hearings in the Courts shall be public.

Article 23

1. Minutes shall be made at each hearing and signed by the Registrar and the President.

2. These minutes alone shall be authentic.

Article 24

1. All questions shall be decided by a majority of the judges present.

2. Judgment of the Courts shall state the reasons on which they are based, and shall be accompanied by the opinions rendered in accordance with article 19 by the supreme court of the countries in which the proceedings arose.

3. It shall contain the names of the judges who have taken part in the decision.

4. If a judgment does not represent in whole or in part the unanimous opinion of the Judges, any Judge shall be entitled to deliver a separate opinion.

5. Each judgment shall be signed by the President and by the Registrar. It shall be read in open court.

6. The minutes, judgments and opinions of the Courts shall be published in official reports under the direction of the Registrars.

Article 25

The decisions of the Courts shall be enforced in the same manner as are decisions of the supreme court of the country in which the proceedings arose, except only, that any process issued for such enforcement shall be in the name of the United Nations.

2. Judgments of the Courts shall be given in future or collateral proceedings in the national courts of the countries signatory to the present statute the same force and effect as a judgment of the supreme court of the country in which such future or collateral proceedings may arise.

Article 26

Judgments of the Courts shall be final and without appeal, except that construction or revision of such judgments may be had upon the same conditions as might apply to construction or revision of a judgment of the supreme court of the country in which the original proceedings arose.

Article 27

The Courts shall by rule provide for the intervention as amici curiae in appeals before them of any states alleging interest in the questions of international law raised by such appeals.

Chapter IV. Amendments

Article 28

This Statute may be amended, either to admit as adherents members of the United Nations other than the present signatories or in any other respect, only upon the consent of the peoples of all of the countries adherent to this statute at the time of the proposal of any such amendment, and upon the approval of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Chapter V. Ratification and Approval

Article 29

This proposed Statute shall become effective upon ratification by the constitutional authorities of the countries signatory hereto, and upon enactment by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

INTERNATIONAL COURTS OF APPEAL: A JUDICIAL APPROACH TO WORLD ORDER

(By Robert B. Ely III, of the Pennsylvania bar, Philadelphia; reprinted from American Bar Association Journal, February 1949)

One of the most important problems today facing the world in general, and lawyers in particular, is that of substituting world order under law for the periodic and ever-increasing horrors which were last suspended on VJ-day. This problem will never be solved by any form of inter-governmental arrangement until the peoples supporting those governments have formed the firm habit of settling all disputes by legal means, rather than by war.

History shows how this habit of law-abidance has grown: from the family into the tribe, city, and state. It must now be spread throughout the world. As before, its growth must be from the private and domestic into the public and foreign. The roots are in the individual, the branches in institutions. Without these roots, the branches will never come to flower. Above all, the seeds must not be sown on barren ground.

What, then, are the circumstances under which the habit of law abidance can be formed?

A necessary condition to orderly life in any community is an adequate body of legal rules that are clearly defined, widely known and universally respected. The sufficiency of this condition has been repeatedly demonstrated throughout the world at the municipal, state, and national levels. Its necessity becomes apparent when one considers the comparative chaos which accompanies its absence from the international field. Two world wars in a single lifetime have been the effects, and Judge Manley O. Hudson (as quoted in 30 A. B. A. J. 560; October, 1944) has well stated the cause:

"To many laymen [international law] seems to present itself as a ghost which stalks only in distant parts of the earth, without any relation to the workaday world in which we live and toil. Even to some lawyers it looms as an esoteric if not an evanescent mystery to be invoked only when it serves to bolster a prior political opinion. * * *

William E. Jackson, personal assistant to the American chief of counsel at the German war crimes trials, writing in the July 1947 issue of Foreign Affairs, put the matter more succinctly when he said:

"For a long time prior to Nuremberg international law was scoffed at as pious but impotent."

The reason for these attitudes of bewilderment, cynicism and scoffing is not hard to understand. To the average layman and to nearly all lawyers, a respectable body of law is one which consists, in addition to legislative enactments and executive rulings, of systematically published and collated decisions of permanent courts with jurisdiction to declare the law and to enforce it on individuals. International law lacks all these essentials to knowledge and respect, which alone can make it effective.

AN INTERNATIONAL JUDICIARY IS THE ONLY SOLUTION

There are no regularly constituted international legislative assemblies or executive departments. Apart from the International Court of Justice, whose jurisdiction is limited to proceedings in which states are parties and is only contingently compulsory, international law has no permanent tribunals of its own. It is obliged to rely on isolated and temporary ad hoc courts and commissions or on the good graces of national judiciaries. The awards and decisions which compose the precedents of international law are not collected into a single International Law Reporter of the form familiar to lawyers in other fields, but have to be sought under such misleading headings as "War," "Aliens," or "States" in national digests or in textbooks whose only authority lies in the reputation of their authors. Finally, none of these awards or decisions has ever been enforced against individuals by other than national law enforcement officers.

In short, international law is now in the easily imaginable state in which the Federal law of the United States would be had the Constitution made no provision for a President; had the Congress been merely a national open forum; had the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court been made subject to consent of the parties and limited to suits between States; had there never been any Federal Circuit Courts of Appeal and district courts; had the declaration of Federal law been left to State courts and its enforcement to State sheriffs; and had there been no interpretations of Federal law other than such writings as the Federalist, the decisions of State courts and interstate compacts. Under such circumstances the words of Judge Hudson and Mr. Jackson, quoted above, would but mildly describe the attitude of the average layman or lawyer toward American Federal law.

The foregoing catalogue of the weaknesses of international law suggests the general form of necessary remedy. To achieve complete world order under law will require the development of an international judiciary to declare and enforce international law in particular cases, an international legislature to enact laws in keeping with changing world conditions and an international executive to perform traditional administrative functions. For the purposes of present discussion we put aside the legislative and executive problems with only reference to the comments of the winner of the American Bar Association's 1947 contest for essays on the improvement of international legislation. He says in effect that attempts to constitute an international legislature or executive with authority to make international law what it should be would be both futile and dangerous until there has been built up a world-wide consensus as to what international law is.

MINIMUM REQUIREMENTS FOR INTERNATIONAL JUDICIARY

Turning to the question of an international judiciary, our discussion so far indicates that it must meet the following minimum specifications:

(1) The courts composing it must derive their authority from an international rather than a national or multinational source.

(2) Its rulings must be superior to those of national courts;

(3) Its decisions must be binding upon the individuals concerned, and must have all the future force accorded under the doctrine of stare decisis.

In seeking to establish such tribunals by other than forceful means, it would seem that the greatest chance of success would be insured by close adherence to the following principles of action:

(1) No step should be taken without the unanimous consent of all countries concerned in that step;

(2) In order to make such consent likely, surrenders of national sovereignty should be kept at an absolute minimum, while no greater than necessary departure should be made from existing procedures.

Proceeding along these lines, we find that the only possible international creator of international courts is the United Nations. That organization already has an International Court of Justice as its principal judicial organ. Could this tribunal be remodeled to meet the foregoing requirement? In theory, yes, but in practice, no. Any revision in this court's set-up would be subject to the veto which the Russian bloc would certainly use. On the other hand, the General Assembly is given by article 22 of the Charter the authority to establish "such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary for the performance of its functions," including (article 13) "encouraging the progressive development of international law"; and here no more than a two-thirds majority vote is required.

Why, therefore, should not a group of nations operating under substantially similar legal systems (as for example the United States and one or more members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, or the countries of Central and South America plus Spain and Portugal) execute a protocol for a statute of the General Assembly providing, subject only to the Assembly's approval, for the establishment of an International Court of Civil Appeals with organization, competence and procedure substantially as next indicated?

Its full bench would consist of a president judge, designated to the task by the International Court of Justice, and of additional judges appointed in equal numbers by each nation of the circuit in the same manner as judges of the national court of last resort, subject to confirmation and commissioning by the General Assembly. Particular sessions would be composed as the adhering nations might agree.

Whenever there came before the court of last resort of any adhering nation a proceeding in which it appeared or was claimed that there was involved a question of international law (in the sense that disposition of the case required interpretation or application of any international convention or any generally accepted international custom or legal principle) the proceedings would be certified by the national court of last resort to the International Court of Civil Appeals for final determination. The certification would be accompanied by an opinion (to be binding on the ICCA) by the certifying court on all questions of national law. The final decision by the ICCA would be remitted and enforced in the same manner as a judgment of the court of last resort of the country in which the proceedings arose, and would thereafter be accorded in each of the adhering countries the same force as a judgment of the court of last resort in that country.

If no more than one such court were established, its day-to-day functioning in actual litigation involving individuals would go far toward publicizing and more firmly establishing those principles upon whose recognition and respect rests the whole future of international law, namely:

(1) That international law already exists, independent of and superior to national law;

(2) That it is binding directly on individuals;

(3) That it is possible to establish international agencies for its interpretation and enforcement.

If more than one such court were established, and if conflicts were to arise among the decisions upon particular points, the various countries concerned might then avail themselves of the International Court of Justice's power to render advisory opinions as to which of such decisions was correct. In this fashion the codification of private international law would progress in an orderly and efficient manner.

Full discussion of the arguments in favor of the foregoing proposal would unduly extend this discussion. However, in support of the principles it seeks to embody, we quote brief portions of a recent address by Justice Robert H. Jackson, of the Supreme Court of the United States (22 Temple Law Quarterly 153):

"It is indispensable to development of an effective modern law of nations that it lay obligations upon living individuals as well as upon that abstraction known as the state * * *. We should take advantage of every opportunity to deal with international controversies by adjudicative or arbitral techniques. In this way we will enlarge and expand the world's experience in using these orderly and reasonable processes, fashion and increasing body of decisional and customary international law, and encourage the law-abiding habit among nations."

THE PACT AND PEACE

Senator McMAHON. How do you feel about the pact?

Mr. ELY. The pact, I think, is a striking development toward world peace, not so much for the military reasons which have heretofore been advanced, but as an international analogy to the foundation of the Republican and Democratic Parties in this country. By this pact a group of like thinking nations have expressed their desire to strengthen their free institutions and increase the understanding of them, and it seems to me the parties to this pact can do a tremendous job within the framework of the United Nations, precisely analogous to what the Federalists, Democrats, Republicans, and even the Dixiecrats are doing in this country.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ely, I was not quite clear as to whether the primary proposition you desire to present to the committee is the matter of the creation of the courts or whether you were intending primarily to discuss the pact.

Mr. ELY. I intended, sir, to discuss the pact, because I think within the terms of the pact lie the means whereby these courts may be established, through the Council in article 9 acting as a party caucus and as a drafting commission to assist the United Nations General Assembly.

Senator DONNELL. I assume you are filing with the committee your complete written memorandum, which is marked "Memorandum Favoring Ratification and Proposing Implementation."

Mr. ELY. I am, sir.

Senator DONNELL. I assume that will be printed in the proceedings.

Senator McMAHON. It will be.

(The memorandum is as follows:)

MEMORANDUM FAVORING RATIFICATION AND PROPOSING IMPLEMENTATION

To the Honorable, the Members of Said Committee:

The purpose of this memorandum is to recall respectfully the attention of the committee to what the Secretary of State, in his testimony on this pact, described as "the really vital things with which we are concerned," and to submit a proposal as to how these things may be brought about within the terms of the pact.

Mr. Acheson, in his statement before the committee on April 27, 1949, described as the real "ethical essence of the treaty—the common resolve to preserve, strengthen, and make better understood the very basis of tolerance, restraint, freedom, and well-being." In making this statement, the Secretary gave an accurate paraphrase of article 2 of the pact, in which the parties agree to "strengthen their free institutions by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded. * * * Those principles are enumerated in the preamble as "democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law."

As a means for accomplishing this end, article 9 provides for "a Council, on which each of [the parties] shall be represented, to consider matters concerning the implementation of this treaty."

While it is true that the only specific duty conferred upon this Council is the immediate establishment of a "defense committee" to provide for the "capacity to resist armed attack" (art. 3), clearly its additional duties include the accomplishment of the nonmilitary aims sketched in article 2. After all, to what purpose is the next war to be postponed or won if the peace thereby continued or renewed is to be one without "individual liberty and the rule of law"?

Consequently it would seem that the more important function of the Council should be to act, not as a military super-staff, but as a party caucus of like-thinking nations. In this capacity its activities would be free of any criticism for inconsistency with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations. The creation of eastern and western parties in global affairs need not be more subversive of world order than has been the existence in this country of Republicans and Democrats.

Acting as such a party caucus, the Council provided by the pact could well undertake, in an atmosphere free from the Soviet intransigence which seems inevitable in plenary United Nations activity, the progressive development in the international field of those theories of law and order common to the signatories of the pact, but radically different from those of the east.

As to what those next steps must be, we have the combined authority of our Ambassador at Large to the United Nations, Dr. Jessup, and our Chief Prosecutor at the recent Nuremberg trials, Justice Jackson of the Supreme Court of the United States. As the former has said in his Modern Law of Nations:

"The first [keystone of a revised international legal order] is the point that international law, like national law, must be directly applicable to the individual. It must not continue to be remote from him. * * *"

After referring to this passage, Justice Jackson goes on to say in a recent address:

"We should take advantage of every opportunity to deal with international controversies by adjudicative or arbitral techniques."

The crucial need for such use of judicial machinery and procedure was earlier well expressed by the late Justice Cardozo in New Jersey v. Delaware (291 U. S. 361 (1933)) quoted in a most stimulating article by Robert B. Walkenshaw in the current issue of the American Bar Association Journal at page 362:

"International law * * * has at time * * * a twilight existence during which it is hardly distinguishable from morality or justice, till at length the imprimatur of a court attests its jural quality."

It would, therefore, seem essential that, among the duties assigned to the Council created by article 9 of the pact, there should be included that of drafting plans, to be promulgated in a statute of the General Assembly of the United Nations, for the establishment of tribunals subsidiary to the International Court of Justice with power to bring private international law out of this shadowy twilight and into the full glow of common knowledge, understanding, and respect. It is hoped that your honorable committee will direct its efforts to seeing that such an assignment is given to the North Atlantic Council.

A general outline of the necessary competence and procedure of such courts was sketched in an article by deponent, appearing in the current volume of the American Bar Association Journal at page 105. Reprints have heretofore been informally submitted to the members of your honorable committee, and are herewith resubmitted for the record. A brief summary of the salient points in this sketch is as follows:

(a) The proposed courts must be created by the United Nations, as the supreme authority in international affairs.

(b) They should be created by the General Assembly of that Organization, in view of its duty under article 13 of the Charter to encourage "the progressive development of international law," and its authority under article 22 "to establish such subsidiary organs as it deems necessary."

(c) The proposed courts must be subsidiary to the International Court of Justice, designated by article 92 of Charter as "the principal judicial organ of the United Nations."

(d) Their jurisdiction, although it should be compulsory so far as it extends, should only be imposed with the unanimous consent of the countries concerned.

(e) That jurisdiction should extend to individuals, corporations, and other legal entities, as well as States, in the same manner as does the jurisdiction of the national courts in the countries concerned.

(f) That jurisdiction should, for the present, at least, be civil only, in order to avoid a premature venture into the highly controversial and ill-defined criminal field.

(g) It should also, for the present, be appellate only, so that there may be no sudden and unnecessary departure from established national trial procedures.

(h) The decisions of the proposed courts should, in the interest of certainty and uniformity, be superior to rulings of national courts on questions of international law, just as constitutional considerations require decisions of national courts of last resort to be supreme in questions of national law.

(i) Similarly, the decisions of the proposed courts should be given in the field of international law the same force as precedents as, in the field of national law, is given under the doctrine of stare decisis.

At the outset there is no need to establish a single such court. The signatories to the pact might group themselves into, say, civil- and common-law circuits, each with its own court—analogous to a United States circuit court of appeals. Differences in opinion among these courts as to a given legal question could be taken, on petition of the countries concerned, to the International Court of Appeals for an advisory opinion under article 65 of that Court's statute.

Similarly, the original organization, competence, and procedure of the court or courts could be modified from time to time as the countries concerned might unanimously agree and as the General Assembly might approve. This latter approval would only require a two-thirds majority vote (United Nations Charter, art. 18.2), free from Soviet veto. Inasmuch as the United Nations members directly concerned would, by hypothesis, already have agreed, there would seem to be little doubt that such approval could be readily obtained.

For example, original circuits might be merged or new ones created; additional adherents could be admitted; the method of selecting judges for the courts might be changed from a nation-by-nation basis to that used for the bench of the International Court of Justice; or the jurisdiction of the courts might be extended to include appeals from state as well as national supreme courts in countries having federal governments.

The United Nations as a whole has taken a great step forward in stimulating the progressive development of international law by establishing the International Law Commission, of which our own Judge Manley O. Hudson is a member. Given the same working conditions as the American Law Institute has had in this country, there is every hope that this Commission will produce a catalog of international law, both as it is and as it should be, comparable in scope and authority to the Institute's various "restatements," which have been cited by every court in the United States and are known to nearly every lawyer.

The most important of such working conditions for the American Law Institute has been the existence of full-fledged national and state judiciaries, ready, willing, and able to adopt the works of the Institute and give them the vigor of binding rules in actual cases. It is hoped that your honorable committee, and the Senate as a whole, will use their full powers to secure for the International Law Commission of the United Nations similar working conditions in the area covered by the North Atlantic Pact through the establishment of courts of the type suggested.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT B. ELY III.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Ely, I understood you to say you are not advocating world government in the sense of all the world coming under one government.

AREAS OF AGREEMENT

Mr. ELY. Definitely not, sir. It seems to me that there are areas of agreement, agreement on different principles but nevertheless varying areas of agreement throughout the world. The Pan American Union is one. The signatories to this pact are another. And insofar as such areas of agreement may be consolidated and put into working form, it seems to me that every time that is done we are getting one step closer toward the world order which, although at present it is remote, we all hope will eventually come.

Senator DONNELL. Am I correct in understanding that you favor, generally speaking, the same proposal that the Atlantic Union Committee, which was represented here by Mr. Secretary Patterson this morning, favors? Is that correct?

Mr. ELY. Not at the present time. I think that is an ultimate goal, but I think to attempt to set up a world federation or even a regional federation with full executive and legislative powers at the present time would be a mistake. I think it is going too far in advance of the law, and would probably get into the same trouble that the prohibition amendment did, when you try to legislate on matters that are not yet the subject of common consent.

The first step, I feel, is a crystallization of the agreements of the world through judicial means, so that it would be known what is agreed on and that agreement is put into action. After international law, as it is known, then you can begin to consider changing that law into what it should and ultimately may be.

FEDERATION OF THE WORLD

Senator DONNELL. Do you advocate a federation of various countries of the world, including the United States of America?

Mr. ELY. Not until the preliminary step which I suggest has been taken.

Senator DONNELL. After that preliminary step has been taken do you deem it advisable that such a federation of certain countries, including the United States, should be effected?

Mr. ELY. I think that will be the inevitable result, sir, automatically.

Senator DONNELL. Would you favor including in that federation only countries that are democracies or republics?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir. Within each group it seems to me there should only be countries whose political and legal theories are so close that the friction which bringing them together would produce is at a minimum.

Senator DONNELL. Do you regard Portugal as a country which it would be advisable to introduce into such a federation of countries of which the United States would be one?

Mr. ELY. I hesitate to speak on that, sir. It seems to me that is a political question and I am not sufficiently familiar with the legal and political theories to which Portugal adheres to come to a conclusion.

Senator DONNELL. In my last question to you I used only the words "United States." I meant the United States of America, and I assume you so understood my question.

Mr. ELY. The extent of divergence between their political and legal views and our own is not well enough known to me for me to give you precise answers.

Senator DONNELL. Have you studied the proposed North Atlantic Treaty, the text of it?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir; word for word, clause by clause.

Senator DONNELL. I am very glad you have, Mr. Ely. Are you practicing law in Philadelphia at the present time?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir. I am a member of the bar of the Supreme Courts of Pennsylvania and of the United States and am at present a member of the legal department of the Insurance Co. of North America.

Senator DONNELL. Located at Philadelphia?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Are you also a member of the Young Democratic Club of the District of Columbia?

Mr. ELY. No, sir.

Senator DONNELL. There must be an error, then, in the typewritten memorandum given me of the list of witnesses. It gives Mr. Robert Ely as a member of the Young Democratic Club of the District of Columbia.

Do you mind telling us whether you are a member of the Democratic Party?

Mr. ELY. I am a Republican.

Senator DONNELL. How long have you been practicing your profession?

Mr. ELY. Since 1932.

Senator DONNELL. Have you been practicing for nearly all of that time in Philadelphia?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir, except for 5 years' tour of duty with the Navy.

WORLD COURT

Senator DONNELL. I have been interested in your observations about the courts, and while it has nothing to do with the particular matter under discussion it might have some application to my own attitude. I would like to state into the record and I would like to have it noted at this time that for some years I was chairman of the St. Louis World Court Committee which advocated very strongly adherence by this Nation to the Permanent Court of International Justice, and appeared, I think in this very room, in advocacy of it before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. That is not relevant to your testimony, but I wanted the record to show it at this point.

I notice in your statement you quote Judge Manley O. Hudson, who happens to come from my own State, and you say, "The United Nations as a whole has taken a great step forward in stimulating the progressive development of international law by establishing the International Law Commission, of which our own Judge Manley O. Hudson is a member."

INTERNATIONAL LAW

Do you think there is such a thing as international law?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir. I am quite convinced of it.

Senator DONNELL. I wanted to ask you your reasons for your belief to that effect.

Mr. ELY. Well, my reason for saying so, first, is, you can point to it in bound books. The only trouble is that there are inconsistencies within those books. If you ask me what is the law of Pennsylvania, I can show you 300 volumes of Pennsylvania Supreme Court Reports. I can do the same thing for the United States law. When it comes to international law, and here is the difficulty with international law as I see it, it exists, but it is declared by the Supreme Court of the United States; it is declared by the Supreme Court of Canada and by every court of last resort across the world. If there is consistency in those decisions it is a matter purely of chance. There is no single authoritative source of international law as there is in national, State, and municipal law, and it seems to me that it would be a tremendous advance if this country should take the lead and give to the International Law Commission established by the United Nations parallel working conditions to those which have been had by the American Law Institute in this country.

As the committee well knows, the American Law Institute has done a magnificent job in preparing restatements of the law, but those documents have only been given force and reality by the fact that courts have adopted and applied them. The United Nations has taken the first of those two steps. It has created an International Law Commission under the chairmanship of Dr. Lian. That Commission is undoubtedly going to do an equally superb job in compiling a statement of international law, but that statement will have no meaning other than as one more text in the field until some set of courts adopts and applies it, and that is what I think, acting with the terms of the pact, this country might see to, that the Council created by that pact could do it.

Senator DONNELL. Your suggestion is very interesting, and I know the committee, and certainly I as a nonmember, are very much interested to observe it.

WORLD COURT

You are familiar, of course, with the statute of the International Court of Justice which was established by the Charter of the United Nations as the principal judicial organ of the United Nations? You are familiar, I say, with that statute?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir. As a matter of fact, the proposed protocol which I submit is patterned, I should say, 80 percent upon the wording of that statute.

Senator DONNELL. And the International Court of Justice therein mentioned is presently functioning, is it not?

Mr. ELY. Yes, sir, but with jurisdiction limited to States only, and therein lies the difficulty. It has no significance to individuals other than as members of a country.

Senator DONNELL. But it is functioning, and if I am not mistaken I observed recently some quite interesting decisions by that Court. Am I correct in that fact?

Mr. ELY. Yes; in the British-Albanian case of the mining of Corfu Channel, and an extremely interesting advisory opinion with respect to the juridical personality of the United Nations.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I should like, if I may, to ask that the committee be kind enough to incorporate at this point in the record a copy of article 36 and of article 37 and of article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, which Court was established by the Charter of the United Nations.

Senator McMAHON. It is so ordered.

Senator DONNELL. I call attention to the fact that article 36, I observe, begins—

Any question of international law—

I observe in article 38 this language:

The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law, such disputes as are submitted to it—et cetera.

Mr. ELY. I thank you very much for your courtesy, and the chairman for his permission to me to interrogate you.

Senator McMAHON. Thank you very much.

(Arts. 36, 37, and 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice are as follows:)

ARTICLE 36

1. The jurisdiction of the Court comprises all cases which the parties refer to it and all matters specially provided for in the Charter of the United Nations or in treaties and conventions in force.

2. The states parties to the present Statute may at any time declare that they recognize as compulsory ipso facto and without special agreement, in relation to any other state accepting the same obligation, the jurisdiction of the Court in all legal disputes concerning:

- a. the interpretation of a treaty;
- b. any question of international law;
- c. the existence of any fact which, if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation;
- d. the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation.

3. The declarations referred to above may be made unconditionally or on condition of reciprocity on the part of several or certain states, or for a certain time.

4. Such declaration shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who shall transmit copies thereof to the parties to the Statute and to the Registrar of the Court.

5. Declarations made under Article 38 of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice and which are still in force shall be deemed, as between the parties to the present Statute, to be acceptances of the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice for the period which they still have to run and in accordance with their terms.

6. In the event of a dispute as to whether the Court has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by the decision of the Court.

ARTICLE 37

Whenever a treaty or convention in force provides for reference of a matter to a tribunal to have been instituted by the League of Nations, or to the Permanent Court of International Justice, the matter shall, as between the parties to the present Statute, be referred to the International Court of Justice.

ARTICLE 38

1. The Court, whose function is to decide in accordance with international law such disputes as are submitted to it, shall apply:

- a. international conventions, whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting states;
- b. international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law;
- c. the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations;
- d. subject to the provisions of Article 59, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations, as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law.

2. This provision shall not prejudice the power of the Court to decide a case ex aequo et bono, if the parties agree thereto.

Senator McMAHON (acting chairman). The committee will reconvene at 10:30 tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 1 p. m., the committee adjourned until Tuesday morning, May 10, 1949, at 10:30 a. m.)

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY

TUESDAY, MAY 10, 1949

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met at 10:30 a. m., pursuant to adjournment on May 9, 1949, in room 318, Senate Office Building, Senator Tom Connally (chairman of the committee) presiding.

Present: Senators Connally (chairman), Pepper, Green, McMahon, Vandenberg, and Hickenlooper.

Also present: Senator Donnell.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Our first witness this morning is Mr. Schwebel. Mr. Schwebel is national chairman of the Collegiate Council for the United Nations.

Proceed, Mr. Schwebel.

STATEMENT OF STEPHEN M. SCHWEBEL, NATIONAL CHAIRMAN OF THE COLLEGIATE COUNCIL FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

MR. SCHWEBEL. The Collegiate Council for the United Nations is a national federation of student associations of 170 American colleges and universities uniting a great part of that segment of the student community of our Nation which takes peace as seriously as it should be taken. The Collegiate Council is the college affiliate of the American Association for the United Nations, though it presents this testimony on its own behalf. We believe that the best hope for peace is to be found in the development of a potent system of universal, collective security, and we view the United Nations as the best available instrument of that development.

That is not to say that we are content with the present stage of the evolution of collective security. On the contrary, concerned as we are with the UN's success, we are the more sensitive to its failures; concerned as we are with the realization of collective security, we find today's insecurity particularly oppressive.

So we unreservedly favor strengthening the existing security structure.

The limitation we would put on an effort to do so would be that of consonance with the universal demands of security. We see meaningful security as world-wide, collective security. We see peace as indivisible today as it was just yesterday in Manchuria and Ethiopia and Spain. The tragedies of the 1931-41 period surely carry the lesson that an armed attack on any peaceful nation is an armed attack on every peaceful nation. In our view, to lose sight of the global dimensions of security is to lose security altogether.

We welcome the North Atlantic Treaty insofar as it is a reaffirmation of America's awareness of its crucial international role. We of course favor the promotion of the "stability and well-being of the North Atlantic area," and recognize that the bolstering of the defenses of this particularly sensitive area can be a bolstering of the defenses of the peace-loving world. We agree with Secretary of State Acheson's statement that—if peace and security can be achieved in the North Atlantic area, we shall have gone a long way to secure peace and security in other areas as well.

We are in full sympathy with the obviously nonaggressive, peaceful aims of the treaty.

DANGER OF REGIONALISM

However, our adherence to the aims of the Atlantic Treaty is not matched by a like cordial endorsement of all of its procedures, nor by an unqualified accord with its spirit. For we fear that a regional pact, of its very nature, may tend to emphasize regional security obligations in contrast with universal ones. And we believe that any weakening of universal security obligations is a step in the wrong direction, away from the development of that world rule of law which is the expression and stimulus of the spirit of international community upon which our best hopes for peace must ultimately rest.

Our reservations about the North Atlantic Treaty thus fall into two categories, the first in the form of a brief exposition of the weaknesses of the regional approach to security, the second a briefer critique of certain clauses of the treaty. May I then conclude by offering for your consideration one possible means of coincidentally providing for the security of the North Atlantic community while strengthening the universal security structure.

UNIVERSALITY OF UN CHARTER

When the Senate ratified the United Nations Charter by a vote of 89 to 2, the American people accepted wholeheartedly a universal security commitment. Nowhere in the charter is there a geographical limitation on the rights and duties of the members. The spirit of the charter is dominantly universal. Regional arrangements are authorized, to be sure, in chapter VIII. Chapter VIII, however, concerns regional arrangements for the settlement of disputes among the states of a particular region, and apparently does not authorize regional accords for defense against violations of the peace originating in an extra-regional source. It is significant to note in this regard that the charter's legal basis for the Atlantic Treaty, article 51, which authorizes individual or collective self-defense, is not to be found in the chapter dealing with regional arrangements, but rather in chapter VII, which is concerned with action with respect to the peace, breaches of the peace and acts of aggression. It could be said with some justice then that the Atlantic Treaty, while within the letter of the charter, is not so decisively in accord with its spirit.

Our concern with any tendency to substitute a defensive pact or series of defensive pacts within arbitrary geographical boundaries for the general commitment of the charter is not grounded in metaphysics, however—in any mere variance of the treaty with something as elusive, if important, as the spirit of the charter. There are down-to-earth, practical reasons for concern over a regional concept of security.

REGIONAL PACT AND THE UNITED NATIONS

A regional pact, because it pertains to a restricted geographical area, provides, or attempts to provide, security reinsurance only for its members. It obviously does not provide this reinsurance for non-signatories. Thus, the danger arises that within the UN there might be first- and second-class members: On the one hand, those who have the imposing reinsurance of America's specific pledge to regard an attack upon them as an attack upon herself; and, on the other hand, those who must content themselves with the somewhat less explicit obligation of the United States to their integrity which is assumed by all members of the United Nations, America included. Of the nature of the situation, there seems some danger that those nations included in a regional scheme will tend to feel that their pact sets the actual practical limits of their obligations. Correspondingly, those nations not included, necessarily feeling their secondary degree of protection, may tend to drift into the other camp to seek by conciliation what they now lack in collective security. Or, less ominously, the "second-class members" may incline toward neutrality.

In fact, the limitation of obligation implicit in regionalism may very well tend to rehabilitate the amoral and strategically obsolete concept of neutrality. A state contemplating aggression would, no doubt, welcome a refurbishing of neutrality, but the United States can have no interest in limiting geographically the right of all UN members to receive aid against aggression and the duty of all members to render such aid. On purely strategical grounds, a resuscitated neutrality is a danger to the United States. Who can say, in case of aggression, where and what facilities we or any other UN member would need in order to defeat an aggressor? How many of our military strategists in 1939 could then perceive the later importance of New Caledonia or Dakar to American security?

The force of all the reservations so far made is increased by the fact that the parties to the regional alliance under consideration embrace so much of the world's power potential. The size and importance of the nations adhering to the Atlantic Treaty could result in the creation of organs overshadowing those of the United Nations. Article 4, combined with article 9, raises the possibility of a consultative council, ranging beyond the limits of the North Atlantic in its discussions, which could drain consideration of world problems from the organs of the United Nations—which, in the words Mr. John Foster Dulles used before this committee, might "cut the heart out of the United Nations." We wish to associate ourselves with Mr. Dulles in urging that it be made clear that such a possibility has no place in the intentions of our Government. It is further our belief that any action which might be recommended as a result of consultation under article 4 of the treaty should be effected through United Nations machinery.

REAFFIRMATION OF UN CHARTER

It is with pleasure that we note that in other clauses the relation of the Atlantic Treaty to the United Nations is more carefully and positively defined. We find it reassuring that in the preamble the "parties to this treaty reaffirm their faith in the purposes and principles of the charter of the United Nations" and that the relation of the treaty to the charter is detailed in articles 1, 5, 7, and 12, reaffirming the primary responsibility of the UN Security Council for the maintenance of peace and security.

We further welcome the restatement of America's universal obligations under the charter by the President in his message of April 4, and by the Secretary of State in his statements of April 10 and 28. We are in cordial accord with Mr. Acheson's declaration before this committee that—the hopes of the American people for peace with freedom and justice are based on the United Nations.

However, we feel the need for vitalizing these declarations with specific action designed to strengthen the United Nations security structure.

ARMSTRONG PROPOSAL

We therefore recommend to our Government the initiation of negotiations for a multilateral treaty, based on article 51 of the charter, and open to all members of the United Nations, which, we believe, would supply much of the reassurance the current inadequate state of collective security demands, while sacrificing the least possible of the charter's universal ideal.

Such a treaty has been proposed with slight variations by the American Association for the United Nations, its research affiliate, the Commission to Study the Organization of Peace, by Mr. Hamilton Fish Armstrong, and, most recently, by Senator Paul Douglas. In view of the demands upon your time, I will not discuss the proposed protocol in detail at the moment.

The legal basis of such a protocol, under article 51 of the charter, is clear. Certainly it is wholly within the letter and spirit of the charter, for it would commit the signatories to doing nothing substantive to which the charter does not already commit them, and it would commit them procedurally merely to doing as a group in certain cases what they said they intended doing unanimously in all cases.

Moreover, the initiation by our Government of negotiations for such a protocol would be in conformity with Senate Resolution 239, the Vandenberg resolution, unanimously reported out by this committee on May 19 of last year. Clause 2 of the resolution recommends that our Government promote the—progressive development of regional and other collective arrangements for individual and collective self-defense in accordance with the purposes, principles, and provisions of the charter.

Even the Atlantic Treaty itself appears to adumbrate such a protocol in its reference in article 12 to—the development of universal as well as regional arrangements under the charter of the United Nations for the maintenance of international peace and security.

RATIFICATION OF TREATY WITH INTERPRETATIONS

In conclusion, then, we favor ratification by the Senate of the North Atlantic Treaty, and concurrently respectfully suggest for your consideration the adoption of a Senate resolution of two parts:

The first, advising the President of the sense of the Senate that in ratifying the North Atlantic Treaty it is understood that articles 4 and 9 in no sense authorize the creation of a council which may arrogate to itself the consideration of world problems properly within the competence of organs of the United Nations, and

The second, advising the President of the sense of the Senate that this Government should initiate negotiations for a multilateral security covenant, as elsewhere detailed, open to all members of the United Nations.

Like all treaties—said the Honorable Warren R. Austin in testifying before this committee—the words of the North Atlantic Treaty will take on meaning in the light of the policies and actions that the signatories follow in implementing it.

We believe that the Atlantic Treaty will be a pillar of peace if the rest of the structure is correspondingly strengthened, and we submit that the adoption of a Senate resolution along the suggested lines will give the treaty a meaning of unquestioned consonance and harmony with the high purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter.

The CHAIRMAN. You are for ratification?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is right, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. These other matters you will postpone until a more appropriate time, is that right?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. We would favor the adoption of a Senate resolution saying that it is the sense of the Senate that it be made clear that articles 4 and 9 do not envisage the creation of a Council which may drain consideration of world problems from the UN, and pressing for the negotiation of such a multilateral treaty now, we would favor adoption of such a resolution more or less at the same time as the North Atlantic Pact.

REAFFIRMATION OF UN CHARTER

The CHAIRMAN. It is not clear from the whole text of the Treaty in four or five different places that it recognizes the over-all authority of the United Nations, and its purpose to be in harmony with the United Nations. You have read the treaty carefully, of course?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes. It is certainly good that the treaty does take such careful cognizance of the United Nations, as it does in articles 1 and 5 et cetera but as we hope we have pointed out, there are dangers that the treaty will impinge on the correct jurisdiction of the United Nations and set up a sort of "little United Nations" which will perhaps be an exclusive club of the Western World, and there is a danger in that which is not made sufficiently clear in the text of the treaty, and the danger lies in articles 4 and 9 which, combined together, could set up a Council whose limits of discussion are not defined in the treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. We would be represented, would we not, on the Council?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Vandenberg?

Senator VANDENBERG. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Green?

Senator GREEN. I might ask one question.

In the first place, in this text there is a mistake, I think, if you want to give it to the public. On the second page, in the fifth from the last line, you refer to chapter VII when you mean chapter VIII.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. The text is correct. My reading may have been erroneous.

ARMSTRONG PROPOSAL

Senator GREEN. You recommend that the Senate pass certain resolutions in connection with this, how you want to have a multilateral treaty similar, I suppose, to the Atlantic Treaty. What do you think of the practical chances of any such initiation of negotiations resulting favorably?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I think the chances are very good.

Senator GREEN. Why should they be more than operating under the present United Nations? The chances there are not very good, are they? Or perhaps you think they are.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I think they are good in some senses, but certainly it cannot be said that the United Nations is fulfilling its security obligations in the full.

Senator GREEN. Does that not provide the necessary machinery?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. It would.

Senator GREEN. Then why do you go to other machinery?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. It would suggest other machinery assuming that the Soviet Union would cooperate. In the second case we do not assume that the Soviet Union would join in a multilateral treaty.

Senator GREEN. I thought your idea was to include all the nations and not leave any of them out.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. And we would certainly have the door open to the Soviet Union should she wish to join, but certainly the treaty would be a much closer approximation of universality than it would in the Atlantic Treaty.

Senator GREEN. I do not see how it would be. There would still be some nations outside, all those behind the iron curtain, in one case as in the other. It seems to me it is a very impractical suggestion, and I give you the opportunity to explain why it isn't.

PRACTICALITY OF ARMSTRONG PROPOSAL

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I am happy to take that opportunity. I have a list of reasons here which perhaps you might be interested in hearing, as to why we believe that this multilateral approach is somewhat superior just to the approach of the Atlantic Treaty.

Senator GREEN. What do you understand my question to be?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I understand your question to be, Why is the multilateral treaty at all practical since it will not include all nations anyway, and therefore will not be truly universal? And my answer to that will be that it will be virtually universal. We believe it would include all nations save those of the Soviet bloc, and we see such a protocol as superior to the Atlantic Treaty for seven reasons, and I can detail them if you like.

First. Such a protocol, rather than catching the United Nations fabric with an Atlantic alliance via a pact would integrate and cohere the necessary procedure of strengthening collective security. It would tie together the existing regional pacts and cover the gaps left by them.

Second. We feel this protocol more closely approximates universality than any regional pact and would to that degree more closely conform to the universal spirit within the idea of the Charter.

Senator GREEN. My question was not that. My question was, Why is there a greater chance of success under this proposal than under the United Nations, which already exists?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Under this proposal, if the Security Council failed to take action in the case of aggression—that is, if the Soviet Union vetoed Council action in the face of aggression or threat to the peace—then the problem would be turned over to the United Nations General Assembly, and all the signatories to the multilateral pact beforehand will have pledged to take account and to follow any recommendation of the Assembly made by a two-thirds vote, including three of the permanent members of the Security Council, as binding upon them. Therefore, should two-thirds of the General Assembly, for instance—and this is merely illustrative—vote that Yugoslavia has attacked Greece, all of the nations would regard an attack upon Greece as an attack upon them and would take action under the Charter, as they are pledged to under the Charter, but which may be stopped by the Russian veto or anybody else's veto. The proposal would move the final power of security sanctions from Security Council to the General Assembly.

The CHAIRMAN. How would you get it there when the Security Council votes "no"?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Any matter may be taken off the Security Council agenda by a procedure vote not open to veto, and that can be done by seven members of the Council.

Senator GREEN. Is it your idea that you can overcome the Soviet veto in that fashion?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. We do believe that this protocol would demonstrate to the world that security does not go only so far as the Russian veto, and that should there be a Soviet veto the obligations under the Charter will still be met.

Senator GREEN. I simply want to get your idea. It seems to me it is a very unconvincing argument.

Senator VANDENBERG. I do not want to start an argument but I would like to tell you that I substantially agree with you.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other questions?

You have proposed a plan with very far-reaching implications. If you can destroy or impair or limit the action of the Security Council under the United Nations, to which we are all parties, you have undertaken a very great deal.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. We do think it is a practical plan that can work.

PROCEDURE UNDER ARMSTRONG PROPOSAL

The CHAIRMAN. It would work if it worked, but our trouble in the United Nations has been the veto of the Soviet Union and its satellites. If you can eliminate that, that's fine.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. We believe this plan would do that, in effect.

The CHAIRMAN. You believe it would effectively eliminate the veto.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. The Soviet Union could veto first on the issue. Thereupon the other members of the Council would vote to take the issue off the agenda of the Security Council and put it on the agenda of the General Assembly, and the Assembly would vote on the issue, and if two-thirds of the Assembly voted to take action on it, all the states signatory to the proposal would take action.

The CHAIRMAN. What university do you represent?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I am from Harvard University.

The CHAIRMAN. What class?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I am a junior at Harvard.

The CHAIRMAN. This is your third year? How old are you?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Twenty years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. What are you majoring in?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. International law and relations.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought you were.

Senator VANDENBERG. As I said, I substantially agree with the witness, because I think he is really presenting the so-called Armstrong plan in one phase, at least. I think it is entirely possible as an ultimate evolution, if there is no better way found, to create within a broadened concept of an almost universal regional arrangement, which includes everybody except the Soviets and their satellites, and instrumentality with which to fight armed aggression inside the Charter and outside of the veto.

The CHAIRMAN. That would take some time to do all those things; would it not?

Senator VANDENBERG. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not questioning you. Is that true, young man? Do you want to postpone action on this matter until we do all those things?

RATIFICATION WITH UNDERSTANDINGS

Mr. SCHWEBEL. No. We believe that the Senate should ratify the North Atlantic Pact as soon as possible, but concurrent with its ratification that it adopt a resolution advising the President that it is the sense of the Senate that we should undertake negotiations immediately.

Senator GREEN. That is giving the authority to the Senate, or the United States Government, to a violation of the Charter of the United Nations; is it not?

Senator VANDENBERG. No.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I do not believe so, sir; no.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Armstrong will be here in a few days and will probably give a complete exposition of his views.

Senator Hickenlooper?

REGIONAL AND UNIVERSAL ARRANGEMENTS

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the witness whether or not his proposal, his second proposal, which Senator Green has been talking about, would not in effect be the establishment of a new United Nations with the exclusion, let us say, of one country and its satellites. I rather approach the North Atlantic Pact from the idea that it is a small group with a common regional problem that is attempting to work within the United Nations, and that its ultimate result is not to have the Atlantic Pact be the final authority on these things, but to work it into the authority of the United Nations eventually, with the hope that the United Nations can somehow take over.

It seems to me that the second proposal that you have made is, in effect, the setting up of another United Nations—whatever its terms may be is immaterial—but it is setting up another United Nations to be the all-powerful group, with the exclusion of Russia and its satellites, who did not come in, which would be a different step in its eventual result than the North Atlantic Pact.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. There certainly is much to what you say, sir. In reply, may I say that as for the attitude of the Soviet Union toward the two moves, I think it is reasonable to assume that the Soviet would have less reason to be antagonized by a pact which is open to her, and in which she may join, than by a pact such as the Atlantic Treaty which, from the outset, is restricted and exclusive.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. If I may interrupt there, it seems to me that we have one pact that has been universally signed, and that is the United Nations Charter. That has been open to all nations to come in, with some exceptions, the reason for which I still do not fully understand, but it is a universal pact and these nations have come in.

Now, the proposal to set up another universal pact, which in effect takes everybody in that is already in the United Nations if they want to come in, with the exception of one country, would seem to me pretty destructive of the United Nations as an organization. Maybe we will have to come to that. I do not say that we will not. But I vision the North Atlantic Pact as only one step or one procedure within the United Nations, in other words taking care of our own affairs that we think ought to be taken care of in this region within the United Nations, with the hope that it will fit itself in the United Nations structure by some lucky or fortunate happening in the future.

THE UNITED NATIONS AND A MULTILATERAL PACT

And at this moment, without further thought about the thing, I would hate to support, or I would dislike very much to support, the idea at this moment of another universal pact, because of what it might do. It just might make the United Nations archaic, that is all.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. The reason we propose another universal pact, even though there is one in existence, as you so correctly say, is that the initial one is not working in the way it should work, and the main reason it is not working, of course, is apparent to us all—the obstruction and vetoes of the Soviet Union. We believe the second universal multilateral pact would repair that key defect in the present United Nations structure and would have the extreme virtue of doing so without the necessity of any formal amendment to the Charter, which is impossible under the present situation, since the Soviet can veto any amendments.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I do not want to pursue this too far this morning, but if you had a second universal pact would you not virtually be taking a cleaver and chopping out a great portion, or a substantial portion, of the United Nations machinery, at least, and cooperating nations, at the moment? Again I say we may have to do it: I don't know. But in effect another universal pact would do just that, in my opinion.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I would quite agree with you, sir, if we did not envisage provision for the use of the present machinery of the United Nations in the working out of this plan. It is the present General Assembly of the United Nations which would take the two-thirds vote, which would make operative the multilateral accord.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. The second proposal of another universal pact—does that not presuppose that the United Nations has failed?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. No.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I mean, if we go into another universal pact, leaving out just one segment, do we not almost have to say that the reason for that is that the United Nations has, in effect, failed, and we have little hope of it eventually doing all the things we would like to have it do?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I think it is an admission of the United Nations failure in one phase of the United Nations activities, that of providing genuine collective security against aggression, but certainly it would not be a blanket admission of United Nations failure.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Is there any other major objective of the United Nations than universal collective security? I know all about these other things, but is not the big thing universal collective security?

ABILITY OF UN TO ATTAIN SECURITY

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes. I think we can narrow it down further and say it would be a failure of the United Nations to effect universal collective security up to the sanction state. Certainly the United Nations is doing an excellent job in mediation and conciliation, as Palestine, Kashmir, and Indonesia indicate, but so far as the point of the ability of the UN to take action against aggression, particularly by any major power or by a small power backed by a major power, to throw an international police force against the aggressor, the United Nations has not evolved to that hoped-for point of counsel in the United Nations and in its various committees, and we feel that if the final power of determining whether the weight of the nations of the world which do take their Charter obligations seriously would be shifted from the Security Council, where the Russians are now in a position to legally block the employment of that weight, to the Assembly, where they cannot block it, then we will have vitalized the concept of collective security which is very explicit in the Charter.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Perhaps, but would it also be an admission of the futility of trying to get the United Nations together, the setting up of another universal pact? We have, in one way or another, admitted that it was futile to try to get the United Nations to function as we want.

Now, do you think there might be some logic in that argument?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes; I do so. I think it is logical to say it is an admission of futility.

REGIONAL AND UNIVERSAL SECURITY ARRANGEMENTS

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Then let me ask you this: If the North Atlantic Pact is adopted and goes into effect, being a regional pact of at least a small area in the world, and if the strength of that pact does develop to the point where perhaps nations all will come in and begin to function properly in the United Nations, would that not be a better procedure than to set up another universal pact?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Do you mean actually become parties to the Atlantic agreement?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. No; I mean if the strength of the Atlantic Pact is such that nations that are not now cooperating in the United Nations—for instance Russia; I merely use this as an illustration—would lift the blockade in the United Nations, as she has lifted the blockade in Berlin, whether that means cooperation or not I don't know, but if she would do it as a result of the unity of the North Atlantic Pact, would that not be a better procedure than for us to go on record now as at least admitting the futility of the United Nations at the moment and setting up another universal pact leaving out Russia? It may be a chance we are taking; I do not know.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. It is certainly to be hoped, and I am sure it is the prime hope of the United States in effecting the Atlantic Treaty, that it will create a balance of power or something to that effect which will bring the Russians to their senses in a way, but we feel that this multilateral accord, at least in the short run, would give to the nations of the world, outside of the Atlantic community, the security of reinsurance which they have a right to. We do not feel that Holland or Belgium has any more right to security, particularly, than India or Iran, and we believe there are dangers in taking the approach that one nation's security is of a higher value than another's.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. We have already taken the approach in the United Nations that the security of one nation is as great as another's.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. And we feel that the Atlantic Pact is a deviation from that in some sense, but that the deviation can be corrected by the initiation of negotiations and the conclusion of this universal protocol.

Now, should the Soviet Union, either through the force of the Atlantic Pact or the European recovery program or the whole policy in a group, shift its policy and become cooperative in the United Nations, then there would be absolutely no need for this multilateral accord. Then it would never come into effect, because if an issue came up before the Security Council and the Soviet Union did not block it, the Security Council would take action and the application of the multilateral accord would never come into question, but there would always be this second insurance behind the Soviet Union which would perhaps make her think twice and say "Let's be a little more cooperative, because if we are not, the rest of the nations will take action anyway."

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I was going to ask you whether you thought there would be any greater inducement for Russia to come in after the formation of the second universal pact than in the present circumstances.

Senator VANDENBERG. Will the Senator yield?

Senator HICKENLOOPER. Yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. I would like to suggest to him that I am totally in agreement with him that this is not the time to proceed with such alternative. The thought I suggest is in the ultimate, if all other recourses fail, this is a way in which one can proceed.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I said a moment ago we may have to come to that.

Senator VANDENBERG. This is no time to do it.

Senator HICKENLOOPER. I think I agree we would be far better off leaving the second universal pact out of consideration and taking one bite of the apple at a time. We may have to come to that. I don't know.

Senator VANDENBERG. I entirely agree.

The CHAIRMAN. You are for the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Your favoring the ratification is not dependent upon us adopting this resolution? Is it or not? Would you be for it without the resolution if the Senate does not see fit to pass it?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; that's fine.

Senator Pepper?

Senator PEPPER. I have not had an opportunity to read your statement or to hear your testimony.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose we let Senator Donnell go on, and you can come in later.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Schwebel, I thought perhaps you intended to amplify just a little your answer.

The CHAIRMAN. If I may interrupt, I was in error when I said Mr. Hamilton Fish Armstrong would be here on Friday. I got confused over a telegram from Mr. Hamilton Fish, without the "Armstrong." He is not scheduled.

Go ahead, Senator.

RATIFICATION WITHOUT RESOLUTION

Senator DONNELL. I was just saying, Mr. Schwebel, that I thought perhaps you intended to amplify just a little your answer to the question of Senator Connally as to whether you would favor the pact, the North Atlantic Pact, without the adoption of your two resolutions. Would you be kind enough, if you were intending to amplify that a little, just to do so at this moment?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I greatly appreciate the opportunity to do so. We do not propose these resolutions in any sense as reservations to the treaty. We hope for Senate ratification of the treaty without reservations, but we would be elated, and we feel it a matter of real importance that these resolutions be adopted now, concurrently with the ratification by the Senate of the North Atlantic Treaty, because we believe the states of the world other than those of the Atlantic community now deserve and perhaps demand the security reinsurance which they merit as well as the members of the Atlantic community, and therefore we feel it the best possible thing under the circumstances to have these resolutions adopted concurrently with ratification. We do not put them forth as reservations.

However, if we are pressed to the wall and we must say whether we would favor ratification or not favor ratification, with or without the reservations, although we would be extremely sorry to see the resolutions not adopted, pressed to the wall at that point we would say "Yes, ratification."

Senator DONNELL. In other words, as I understand from the last sentence of your statement, and I quote it, "We believe that the Atlantic Treaty will be a pillar of peace if the rest of the structure is correspondingly strengthened." Is that correct?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. I judge by that, the language of your statement, "correspondingly strengthened," you mean by the adoption of the proposals set forth in your two resolutions?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And you condition your belief that the Atlantic Treaty will be a pillar of peace on the proposal that "if the rest of the structure is correspondingly strengthened," meaning thereby the adoption of the two plans set forth in your resolutions. Is that correct?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is correct.

Senator DONNELL. I take it from the fact that you have conditioned your opinion that the Atlantic Treaty will be a pillar of peace on this corresponding strengthening that you are not so sure that the North Atlantic Treaty is going to be such a pillar of peace unless the contents of your two resolutions are adopted. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Quite so.

Senator DONNELL. You have some doubts as to whether the North Atlantic Pact will be a pillar of peace unless the proposals in your resolutions are adopted?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, sir.

MEMBERSHIP OF COLLEGIATE COUNCIL FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

Senator DONNELL. Now, Mr. Schwebel, I was very much interested in noting the broad extent of your organization, and I wanted to ask you about it. You say that it is a national federation of student associations of 170 American colleges and universities. I am not going to ask you for the list of them, but could you tell us, please, how widely distributed those institutions of learning are over the country?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. They are in over 40 States, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Are there any State universities included among the number?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Oh, yes; quite a number.

Senator DONNELL. I am wondering whether you happen to recall whether that of my own State of Missouri is included?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I believe it is; yes.

Senator DONNELL. You are the national president of that organization?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Has your organization met and expressed itself to the effect set forth in your testimony?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes; to the extent of perhaps what might be called an outline stage at our national convention last June, and in the actual preparation of this testimony our national board of directors was consulted on a very close basis, and our texts were exchanged in great detail.

Senator DONNELL. So the statement does represent the opinion of your national board of directors?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is right.

Senator DONNELL. Do you mind telling us how many members there are of that board?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Seven; one for each region of the country.

Senator DONNELL. Do you mind just telling us, please, what those regions are? What is region No. 1?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. New England is No. 1; Middle Atlantic, Southeast, Southwest, Far West, Midwest, and North Central.

Senator DONNELL. Are you able to tell us approximately the total membership of the 170-student organizations which constitute your organization?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Well, the average chapter runs in membership between 50 and 300 members.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Schwebel, I don't know whether you were asked anything about yourself or not, other than where you are attending the university at this time. I understood you to say you were a junior in Harvard University. Is that in the collegiate department or in the law department?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. In the college, sir.

Senator DONNELL. And you have specialized along the line of international law and obviously devoted a great amount of study to that subject, is that correct?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Are you intending to teach, if I may ask, or is it your expectation to engage in the practice of law, perhaps, or something of that kind?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I am really not quite sure. I am tentatively planning a career in the State Department or the United Nations or something of that sort.

Senator DONNELL. Have you thus far been associated in any way with any organization as that, in the capacity of any employee or anything of that sort?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. No; I have not.

Senator DONNELL. Where is your home, Mr. Schwebel?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. In New York City.

Senator DONNELL. What is your street address, please?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. 2506.

THE TREATY AS A REGIONAL ARRANGEMENT

Senator DONNELL. You speak in a number of instances in this statement of yours of a regional pact. You say that you fear a regional pact of its very nature may tend to emphasize regional security obligations; you speak of your reservations about the North Atlantic Treaty, and I take it you are making reservations by your statement, as you have indicated.

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is right, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Your reservations fall into two categories, the first in the form of a brief exposition of the weaknesses of the regional approach to security. You speak a little further down of "regional arrangements"; you speak elsewhere of the "regional concept of security," and then on page 3 of a "regional pact." Am I correct, therefore, in understanding that you consider that in fact the North Atlantic Treaty is a regional arrangement or a regional pact?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. A rather tortured version of one; yes.

Senator DONNELL. It is, however, in your judgment, a regional arrangement, is that correct?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes. Certainly the parties seem to regard it as such, and though in our judgment it is not a regional arrangement as the United Nations Charter thought of regional arrangements, it seems that grammatically it is fair enough to apply that term.

Senator DONNELL. I am curious to know why, Mr. Schwebel, if you consider that it is a regional pact, you have stated that the legal basis for the Atlantic Treaty is article 51 and not article 52. Where is it you find that in the proposed North Atlantic Treaty, if you do so find it?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Because article 52, as we understand it, though it most certainly discusses regional arrangements, gives the clear implication that regional arrangements are to be for the settlement of disputes within the region, and it does not seem to adumbrate a regional accord which would be a defensive pact against a violation of the peace from outside the region against a member or members of the region. Therefore we see no legal basis in article 52 for the treaty, but only in article 51, which speaks of individual or collective arrangements for self-defense.

Senator DONNELL. Yet you do still feel, as your statement says in numerous places in substance, or at least refers in numerous places, that this is a regional pact and a regional arrangement, is that correct?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is right. We believe, though, that it is out of the spirit of the Charter insofar as the Charter envisaged regional pacts.

NATURE OF REGIONAL ARRANGEMENTS CONTEMPLATED BY CHARTER

Senator DONNELL. Article 52 opens with this sentence [reading]:

Nothing in the present Charter precludes the existence of regional arrangements or agencies for dealing with such matters relating to the maintenance of international peace and security as are appropriate for regional action, provided that such arrangements or agencies and their activities are consistent with the Purposes and Principles of the United Nations.

There is nothing there that restricts the operation of regional arrangements to matters within the region itself, is there, Mr. Schwebel?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. No, not in that article itself, but I believe in the chapter, the tone of the chapter clearly does have that implication. If you will bear with me a moment I will drag out a text of the Charter.

In point 2 it speaks of pacific settlement of local disputes. In point 3 [reading]:

The Security Council shall encourage the development of pacific settlement of local disputes through * * * regional arrangements.

Therefore, we find the emphasis of chapter VIII is upon the regional arrangements, such as the Pan American Union, settling a dispute between Bolivia and Peru, but it does not seem to us that the tone of that article thinks of what would now be the Rio de Janeiro Pact, taking action against an attack from Australia.

Senator DONNELL. Article 54 of chapter VIII, which chapter is entitled "Regional Arrangements," reads:

The Security Council shall at all times be kept fully informed of activities undertaken or in contemplation under regional arrangements or by regional agencies for the maintenance of international peace and security.

Does that broaden in your judgment the meaning of chapter VIII so as to include, perhaps, regional arrangements that pertain to more than purely local matters?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. It could, and it could not. I will concede the point that it could, but "international," of course, can refer to matters dealing with just two countries, as well as many.

Senator DONNELL. There is nothing in the North Atlantic Pact, itself, except in article 5, is there, Mr. Schwebel, that mentions article 51 of the United Nations Charter?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I do not believe there is; no.

Senator DONNELL. So that there is nothing in the North Atlantic treaty that says that it is not formed under article 52; that is correct; is it not?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is correct. I do not believe there is anything that says it is, either; is there, sir?

Senator DONNELL. I understand that, but the only mention of article 51 is in article 5, and there is nothing in the treaty that says that the treaty is formed under article 51; is there? I am correct in that; am I not?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, but may I qualify my answer by saying that it is my impression that in the rationale given out by the State Department of the treaty, the State Department, though at first it put some emphasis on articles 52 and 53, later shifted that.

THE TREATY AS A REGIONAL ARRANGEMENT

Senator DONNELL. Precisely the point that I was getting to. Did not the State Department start out with the idea that this was a regional arrangement, and was it not called the North Atlantic treaty, signifying that it was a regional arrangement? Then, as you have indicated, the rationale as given out by the State Department, as you perhaps have appropriately mentioned, has indicated a shifting on the part of the State Department. Am I not correct in my understanding?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I believe the State Department found it was in error, as all human beings may be, and therefore shifted its emphasis to article 51, which we believe is certainly an ample legal basis for the treaty. The treaty is legal, we feel, definitely.

Senator DONNELL. The point to which I direct your attention is the one you have anticipated me on, namely, that there was a shifting of position, if I understand your view, by the State Department, from the original concept that this was a regional treaty, a regional pact, over to the concept that it was formed under the provisions of article 51 in recognition of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense. You are in accord with that general observation, are you not?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. That is right, though of course I have no access to the processes of the State Department. Exteriorally that seems to be the case.

GEOGRAPHIC SCOPE OF TREATY

Senator DONNELL. Do you know why it is called North Atlantic Treaty?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Well, it would seem that the reason is that the bulk of states parties to the treaty border on the North Atlantic.

Senator DONNELL. The bulk of them do?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes.

Senator DONNELL. I have not counted them or taken the seacoasts of them, but Italy does not front on the North Atlantic, does it?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. No, it hardly does.

Senator DONNELL. And was Italy originally contemplated as being a party to this treaty, so far as you have ever heard or observed?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. It was, of course, not included in the original negotiations, but so far as I recall, mention of Italy was made early in the procedures of negotiation.

Senator DONNELL. However, the negotiations as made, and the initial steps taken in this matter as recited in the letter of the Secretary of State of April 7, 1949, to the President, included not Italy at all, but the Brussels Pact parties and the United States and Canada. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. I believe that it is, sir; yes, sir.

Senator DONNELL. Mr. Schwebel, you have read Mr. Dulles' testimony, I judge, from your comments?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, I have, sir.

DANGER OF WORLD DIVISION

Senator DONNELL. You feel, am I correct in understanding, that there is, as he pointed out, a danger in that the North Atlantic Treaty may be considered as splitting the world into two camps, and the very danger to which you refer in your statement here this morning along that line. You concur in Mr. Dulles' observations to that effect, do you not?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Entirely, and we believe that our multilateral accord would obviate that danger.

Senator DONNELL. That is all, Mr. Schwebel. Thank you very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Pepper?

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Schwebel, I don't know whether you were asked this question earlier or not. Are you a veteran of World War II?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. No; I am not. I was underage.

Senator PEPPER. I think it is quite within the prerogative of the college people of the country, who are primarily the ones who would serve in war, to come here to express to this committee and to the country their opinion about the future, which, after all, is more theirs than it is that of their elders.

I have read your statement, and it looks to me like it has a lot of far-sighted merit and value in it.

DANGER OF REGIONALISM

What you are afraid of is that this is setting up, if it is pursued to a possible conclusion, a series of regional arrangements in the world. I am not talking about regional within the meaning of article 52 of the Charter, but I mean geographically regional arrangements which are likely to, or which might if pursued ever farther, take the place of the national rivalries of the past. That is to say, if we formed one regional entity which became more or less self-sufficient and became a new international organism, and if another one were formed in another part of the earth and another one in still a third part of the world, that you might supplant the old national rivalries which have led to the wars of the past with regional rivalries which might lead to the regional wars of the future. Is that one of the fears that you have entertained?

Mr. SCHWEBEL. Yes, certainly. I think that is a very reasonable fear.
