Journal of Race Development

The Journal of Race Development was the first American academic journal of international relations. It was founded in 1910 by G. Stanley Hall^[1] along with George Hubbard Blakeslee, both of Clark University. Despite a name which now suggests a journal devoted to eugenics, the journal, in fact, dealt with a variety of topics connected with politics, foreign affairs and international relations. It was renamed the Journal of International Relations^[2] which in turn was merged with Foreign Affairs in 1922.

[Numerous citations from the journal prove this Wikipedia notation downplaying a EUGENICS priority to be a lie and evident propaganda misdirection. See snippet examples on following pages.]

the best man. We are faced in our own country by this question in a more serious form than is any other great nation. A tenth of our population is now negro which is rapidly in the north mixing with the white; the incoming population is largely itself negroid, particularly that from the Portuguese islands, less markedly from Portugal itself developed, trained and adjusted in the negroes, has been made, no basis of industrial efficiency or citizenship has been worked out. Race development is advocated but no inquiry is made into the principles of eugenics or orthogenics applied to negro children. Education is recommended and discussed but pedagogical applications are not specially studied or adopted. There are few studies even of more elementary problems of school grades, progress or

The foregoing sufficiently characterizes the book and exposes its most glaring defects. One notices the omission of lines of investigation which are of utmost current interest, such as the entire mass of phylogenetic studies begun by Haeckel, the studies of the Eugenics Laboratory on assortative and preferential mating, fecundity of the social classes, selective birth and death

The writer is the well-known English sociologist who has made authoritative studies on various 'population' problems. In this collection of 18 essays, only the first six deal with the subject of war; they treat of its sociological aspects and particularly of its influence on future generations. "War and Eugenics" is the most valuable contribution of the group, stressing the great danger to the race in the war's drain on the more virile types of selected men. "Evolution and War," "War and the Birth-rate," and "War and Democracy" are some of the other topics discussed.

The book closes with a chapter on "Eugenics," and a discussion on the propagation of only the best after the "War."

George H. Blakeslee, founder of the Journal of Race Development (1910), renamed the Journal of International Relations (1920), then Foreign Affairs (IPR, 1923). The Journal of Race Development promoted eugenics (Wikipedia's lies and whitewashes the evident eugenics priority in Blakeslee's Journal). Here are some citations: In his inaugural issue: (1) "The problems of eugenics will be emphasized, for the record of social evolution shows clearly the immense importance of sound stock in the survival of races and nations." (2) "We preach greatly what we now term eugenics which translated broadly means the product of the best man." (3) In critiquing another work, "Race development is advocated but no inquiry is made into the principles of eugenics or orthogenics applied to negro children." (4) In another review, "The book closes with a chapter on "Eugenics," and a discussion on the propagation of only the best after the 'War.'"
